"Render me some little assistance in the adjustment of my machine, my good fellow," he grandiloquently remarked, "and I will see that you have a quid pro quo."

"Robert" scratched his head and assumed a puzzled air.

"If it don't mak' any difference to you, guv'nor," he sagely observed, "we'll say nowt about the pro quo, but I don't mind takkin' the quid, though, an' thank yer!"

W. C.

Why the Case was Dismissed.

A MAN was charged in the North with catching a fish that weighed less than two pounds.

The constable who made the arrest testified to arresting the prisoner with the fish in his possession.

"Where is the fish?" asked the lawyer for the defendant.

"Why, it wouldn't keep," answered the officer.

"What did you do with it?"

"Oh, I disposed of it."

"What did you do with it?"

"Well, I knew it wouldn't keep, so I disposed of it."

"But what did you do with it?"

"My wife cooked it."

"And you ate it?"

"Yes, your honour."

The case was dismissed on the grounds that the arresting officer "ate the evidence."

J. H.

"What's Up?"

HE was a stout, middle-aged member of the force, his number X 94, and his beat the busiest street in the town.

It was evening, and as he pursued his not very rapid way, thinking of nothing particular (for the wife of his bosom had been a cook, and he was supplied with every dainty he could desire), a slight touch on the sleeve of his official coat made him turn to see what was up.

It was a young lady, evidently in distress, but well-attired. She spoke not, but made movements with her fingers, to him unintelligible.

"What's up?" he asked.

But no reply came, save an increased motion of the digits. His official mind was puzzled. He took off his helmet, replaced it, pondered, and then the idea came that she was a deaf mute.

A crowd had collected, and were asking each other, "What's up?" Could he find help there?

Happy thought!

"Is there any of you here," he exclaimed, "that's deaf and dumb, and can tell what's up, for I'm blest if I can."

J. T. M.

NOW ON SALE.

No. 2 of

"The Curiosity Shop."

THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION TO "P.W."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP is the most Wonderful Paper in the whole wide world. Nothing like it has ever before been published—nothing. It is a Marvel.

The contents of THE CURIOSITY SHOP are not musty or stale; they are not old or worm-eaten.

Everything in THE CURIOSITY SHOP is Fresh and Brand New.

Curiosities need not necessarily be old. People always seem to associate a curiosity shop with ancient and well-worn goods. No mistake could be greater.

Curiosities are of two sorts—old and new.

Old curiosities are curiosities largely because they are old, because we do not see the same things in general nowadays.

New curiosities are curiosities largely because they are new, because no one has ever seen or heard of them before.

These, then, are the curiosities that you will find in THE CURIOSITY SHOP.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP contains: Absolutely new and fresh articles. Bright and originally-conceived pictures. Strong and well-seasoned fiction. Nothing that you can get anywhere else.

Unlike all other curiosity shops, the contents of this one are changed every week, and you can buy every article and picture in the shop for one penny.

REMEMBER: You can buy THE CURIOSITY SHOP itself for One Penny.

If you buy THE CURIOSITY SHOP every week for a year, at the end of twelve months you will have bought 52 shops and their contents for the small sum of 4s. 4d.

Digitized by Google

COOLIE-LI.

THE STORY OF THE ADOPTED ONE.

THE PROLOGUE.

MORE than forty years ago, there dwelt in the city of Pekin an old Chinaman, by name Wung-Fu.

Where the street of "The Lantern-Makers" abuts upon the covered passage running round the inclosed Joss-House of "The Golden Dragon," stood a little dilapidated lean-to tenement, within the shelter of which lived Wung-Fu and his grandchild, the boy Oh-Sung. The old man's record was open to adverse criticism, inasmuch as in his palmy days he had been more than shrewdly suspected of piracy.

This suspicion, however, went but little in his disfavour with those amongst whom he neighboured. Many, indeed, admired him for his past deeds in the piratical way, for were they not here and there themselves more or less tainted with the same incriminatory perfume.

But Wung-Fu was now old, and worn, and nearly blind. Scarce a body-and-soul existence could he, howsoever painfully, scrape together for himself and the only being left to him since the scourge of the "Black Death" five years before.

Oh-Sung was not a lovable boy. There were indications to the ear, if not to the sightless eyes of his grandfather, that the lad was rapidly developing a selfish, cruel spirit. This, to one of old Wung-Fu's antecedents, might naturally be thought not to have been of much moment, would, in fact, be in full harmony with his own ideas and bent of mind.

But human nature, especially Chinese human nature, is complex and inexplicable. Wung-Fu bitterly resented this early warping of his grandson's disposition. Whether himself having greater leisure for repentant broodings, or whether he had come to believe in respectability and moral virtue as things to be desired to make one wise, no man knoweth.

Certain it is that Oh-Sung came in, not unfrequently, for the thick end of his grandsire's bamboo, much mortification of the flesh thereby ensuing, together with the ignition of a slow, smouldering, vengeful flame. Then there came a day when in the little house food and firing were not.

It was winter.

On a ragged straw mat in a corner of the hut, without covering of any kind, lay old Wung-Fu. A few hours would see the end.

Every now and then, cunningly curious, nothing more, would Oh-Sung peer silently through the doorless entrance in upon the dying man, and then as silently return to his playmates, the juvenile idlers of the street.

Clang! Boom! Clang! Boom!

A mandarin, or maybe the viceroy himself, the focus of a deafening chorus of men's voices and torturous instruments, is approaching along the route of the street of "The Lantern-Makers."

The boys, Oh-Sung in the van, hurry to the spectacle, heedless of the thwacks and hustling of guards and policemen.

Suddenly the great man calls a halt, imperiously beckoning to Oh-Sung to come near to him. He was a finely-made, well set-up, taking lad; the peculiar expression of his eyes, to the superficial observer, detracting in no way from his general beauty and charm.

"Your father, boy, who is he?"

Oh-Sung, too terrified to speak in such a presence, cast down his eyes, and thought only of how to escape. From the outer fringe of the crowd the reply is forthcoming.

"The boy Oh-Sung is the last left to the old Wung-Fu."

Two of the guards drag the speaker forward to the official chair.

"Where lives the old Wung Fu?" came the swift, sharp query.

"Honourable Excellence! Your abased slave will guide you thither; 'tis but a step."

A few bustling minutes, and the boy Oh-Sung, has been bought and adopted by his Excellency, the Viceroy of the Province. Half-an-hour after the consummation of the contract, old Wung-Fu departed this life to join the shades of his ancestors, and Oh-Sung, now, by Vice-regal command to be henceforth known as Li-Sung, set out with joyous anticipation for the unknown fairyland of the Yamen of the favourite of the "Son of Heaven."

* * * * *

It is the present year of grace, 1900.

A small sampan is rocking gently on the swell of the bay. Seated in its after part, lazily manipulating a scull with just sufficient motion to keep the little craft's head to wind, is a man, naked to the waist.

Digitized by Google

He is brown from exposure, and apparently fifty years old. He wears no hat, his cue being wound round his head in the orthodox Chinese fashion.

He appears to notice nothing, waterward or skyward, and yet, were you close enough to him you might observe ever and again a furtively keen glance in the direction of the Ly-ee-moon Pass. He must be a patient man, for he has been upon the spot since sunrise, and now it is long past the meridian.

Suddenly a dull booming roar breaks the silence, reverberating from hill-top to hill-top. Evidently interested, the sampan's owner assumes the alert, sits upright, and with a few strong, rapid strokes impels the tiny boat towards the source of the echo which still trembles on the air.

Her Britannic Majesty's ship Nelson, flying the Rear-Admiral's flag emerges from the Pass, and with another thunderous salute, makes for her berth, and is soon at anchor.

No one on board appears to trouble about a sampan which a half-naked Chinaman keeps well in the shadow of the big warship. At length, seemingly satisfied, the occupant puts way upon his little craft and heads for the shore.

That night the innermost and evilest recesses of Tai-Ping-Shan, Hong Kong's native quarter, are a-hum with the low mutterings of a thousand tongues.

Men in groups, men in twos and threes eagerly chatter and gesticulate. Sinister-looking men, truculent, dangerous, ready for murder, rapine, and a wholesale committal of the seven deadly sins. One man in particular moves swiftly and silently from street to street, and from group to group, whispering here, impressing there, with words which seem to burn wherever they are dropped.

This man, though clothed in native dress, is unmistakably him of the sampan. The face alone would identify him. Cruel eyes, set wider apart than is usual with the average Celestial; high cheek-bones, and a complexion burnt to blackness with the winds and suns of more than forty years.

You may hear following him such remarks as: "Coolie-Li, he savvey, trick foleign devil; Coolie-Li no fool! Englishman come; Coolie-Li alle same cut him throat."

For days the British authorities at Victoria had suspected Boxer gatherings and secret society mischief generally as being rife in Tai-Ping-Shan, but although alarming rumours had reached Government House of dark deeds done in Pekin and Tientsin, of ministers and their families slaughtered, and of unrelateable horrors committed in the name of the "Red Dragon," it was deemed improbable that any serious Boxer rising would take place in Hong Kong itself.

True, there was a story afloat, traceable to one Ho-Shan, a shifty, wily ship's "comprador," that a dangerous member of the Boxer Society, one of its chiefs, in fact, was in the town, upon revolutionary propaganda intent.

This man, it was said, owing to his working occasionally as a common coolie, now in this port, now in that, had come to be known in certain circles as Coolie-Li.

Undoubtedly there was a mystery with regard to him. Some averred that he was no better than that which he sometimes pretended to be; others insisting that in some way he was closely connected either by blood or by adoption with a certain great Imperial functionary. Anyway, sharp English eyes, both ashore and afloat, were on the watch for him.

The next evening but one after her arrival H. M. S. Nelson lay peacefully at anchor. Save and except for the periodical hoarse interchange of challenge and reply, complete silence reigned on deck from taffrail to knightheads.

Commander Blake sits in his cabin, on the qui vive certainly, but at the same time comfortably assured that the ship is ready for "business" at a moment's notice.

Right aft, on the starboard side, a midshipman leans upon the rail looking across at the lights which dot, firefly-fashion, the town and hill above it.

Sound upon the water there is none, only the monotonously pleasant lap-lapping against the ship's side.

About "three bells" the middy fancied he could detect a slight grating noise, and a man's heavy, laboured breathing on the port quarter.

Regulations or no regulations he would go over and find out. When within a yard of the rail he saw distinctly a man's ten yellow fingers spread eagle-wise upon its broad flat top, preparatory evidently to a spring-up on to the deck.

The budding young sailor was, though small for his years, a veritable little hero. Knowing that such a digital display boded no good, could indeed have but a nefarious significance, the ship's cutlass at his side was in a flash, in his hand, and brought down with all his boyish force upon the extended fingers.

A yell! a splash! and a sampan, bottom up, floating away to the southward told the truth of the tale, while, most condemning evidence of all as to criminal purpose, lay, bloody, upon the rail-top the four severed yellow fingers of a man's hand.

Hastily summoned upon deck, the Commander listened to the middy's story, as a consequence ordering a stricter watch to be kept through the remainder of the night.

Two days passed without a sign. On the third day Commander Blake took a day's leave. Before quitting the ship he was warned by his superior officers of possible trouble ahead, impressing upon him the absolute necessity for keeping, during his stay in the town, altogether to the European quarter. Blake, somewhat resentful of interference with his movements, departed in one the ship's boats.

Twenty-four hours—forty-eight hours—three days! but no Commander. Then was a search-party organised on the morning of the fourth day. The town was scoured from end to end without result. There remained only the worst portion of the native quarter, Tai-Ping-Shan. The exploration of this foul centre of native life, this cluster of gambling hells and opium dens, was, indeed, a forlorn hope. Still it must be made. Securing an access of military strength from the barracks, the little force marched resolutely through the dirty, narrow streets, into the very hub of the place.

The streets themselves were quiet, almost to absolute desertion, but from doorway and window yellow faces looked out, scowling hatred and contempt upon the foreign devils. Half-an-hour of this and the officer in command gave up all hope.

Then they came to a dark, tortuous alley, entrance to which was through a ruinous archway at the head of a short flight of rickety steps. The side-posts of the arch, as was the rough carving over the top, were painted a blood-red, while dependent from the centre hung a large paper lantern of grotesque form, and of the same colour.

One of the Nelson's men in advance of the rest quickened his pace.

"There's something lying along the top of those steps!" he suddenly exclaimed, pointing his finger towards the dimly-lit spot.

Digitized by Google

Springing excitedly up the rotten stairway, he saw at once that the search was over. Upon his back, his right arm by his side, the hand holding his cap, lay the hapless Commander. Closer scrutiny revealed a knife, buried to the haft in the dead man's left breast, the weapon serving also to pin down a small black sheet of paper, inscribed with Chinese characters in red.

The houses in the alley appeared to be deserted, so that no arrests or reprisals were possible.

Carrying the body to the ship, a report was presented to the Admiral, who in his turn communicated the matter to the Governor, and for the moment the affair was at an end.

Strong convictions prevailed, however, in official circles that this was something more than the outcome of mere personal revenge.

The middy's story had circulated freely, and English eyes were keenly on the look-out for a Chinaman minus the fingers of his left hand.

Interest in Coolie-Li, as being, if not the actual perpetrator of the outrage, in all probability its instigator, increased hourly. So matters stood when notification of the impending visit to Hong Kong of His Excellency Li-Hung-Chang was received at Government House.

The old dabbler in chicanery and the devious ways of Celestial diplomacy was on his way to Pekin, at the command of and to join the Empress Mother.

In Hong Kong he was no welcome guest, for confidence in his integrity had long been banished from the Western mind.

With the announcement of his almost immediate arrival, there was also a private intimation to the Governor that business of an important personal nature might render the co-operation of the latter necessary.

The Governor, good, easy man, was singularly single-hearted, and, Briton-wise, impatient of mystery and implied deceit, groaned in the spirit in anticipation of coming unpleasantness and political complication.

On board the Nelson no expectation existed of another visit from either the "man of the sampan" or of his fellow miscreants. But in China it is as well not to reason from analogy.

The evening of the day before Li-Hung-Chang's advent was sultry almost beyond precedent. About four bells a thunder-storm of exceptional severity broke over sea and land.

It was at the height of the tempest that the sentry forward made out five or six large river or "slipper" boats heading for the Nelson's port quarter. In the van a small sampan, sculled by one man, naked to the waist, with his right hand only, seemed alike guiding and rallying point.

In a moment the ship was alive from stem to stern; men sprang to quarters, and the oncoming boats, crowded with men who saw their enterprise defeated, went about in a body and swiftly made for the shore. The man in the sampan in vain endeavoured to inspire his confederates with his own spirit, but to attempt to attack a British man-of-war ready at all points to receive them was an absurdity evident even to their limited understanding.

Then occurred a strange thing.

Among the men upon the Nelson's deck was the one who had discovered the Commander's body in the native town, and who had been that officer's servant and orderly. Regardless of consequences and of service regulations, he now cast the end of a rope overboard, and, making the in-board end fast, swarmed down it to the surface of the water.

The sampan-man was now within a few yards of the ship, and the sailor, hoping to reach him before he himself was observed, struck out for the little craft. It so happened that, as he kicked himself free from the Nelson's side, the Chinaman saw him. With two mighty strokes the sailor reached the boat, the gunwale of which he grasped with one hand. Down into his face grinned the diabolical eyes of the other.

A knife between his teeth, upon the bright blade of which played occasional flashes of lightning, he appeared the very incarnation of devilry and death.

Not one whit dismayed, the sailor tried to raise himself out of the water. The Chinaman, dropping his scull, sprang at his enemy's throat, to force him back. But the little boat was unequal to the strain. As the Celestial reached out towards the sailor, the latter flung up his left hand, and with a supreme effort dragged the other to him by his loin-cloth.

In a second the two men were in the water. It was then that the plucky tar first noticed the bound-up left hand of his antagonist.

"By Jove!" he cried exultantly, and tightening his grip. "I've been looking for you, my chap! No, you don't!" as the other sought to slip eel-wise from his grasp. "Ahoy! deck ahoy! on deck there!"

Knowing the fate in store for him should he be captured, the Chinaman shook himself free, and taking a leaf out of the book of his prototype the shark, turned suddenly upon his back, with his knife in his hand diving dexterously under his foe.

The fatal upward stroke was made just as the ship's cutter reached the spot, and when lifted exhausted into the boat, Coolie-Li saw that the sailor lay in the stern-sheets white and still, he smiled, the smile of one who had offered a grateful sacrifice to the dark nature of his tutelary deity.

The next day the Viceroy on arrival was informed of the incident of the night before.

"Let me see the prisoner, if I may," said Li.

There being no reason for objection, the Governor consented. The interview took place on board the Nelson in the doctor's cabin, that being the only available place for such a purpose.

"I would speak in private with this man," said the Viceroy.

Ten minutes, fifteen minutes, and then a smothered laugh from within. A gentle opening of the cabin door, and the old statesman stands upon the threshold, a half smile playing about his lips.

But the prisoner! Where is he? An open port answers the question.

Li-Hung-Chang revealed nothing, and it is currently reported to-day among the English in Hong Kong that there was beyond doubt some truth in the story of the connection between the great Li and the lesser; and that not only for the sake of that adoptive relation, but from actual sympathy with the revolutionary principles of the "adopted one," he, the shadow of the "Son of Heaven," had allowed the murderer to escape the retributive justice of the foreign devil.

* * * * *

Dr. Frank Nairn, R. N., has upon a shelf in his cabin on board the Nelson a fair-sized phial containing, spirit-preserved, four severed yellow, shrivelled human fingers. The good doctor will, when in the vein, expatiate upon their history, and offer them for the inspection of the curious.

RALPH ENDERBY.

Digitized by Google

TRICKING THE EGYPTIANS.

When the firm of Heywood, Stone and Co., of London, established an agency at Cairo, Egypt, I was placed in charge. My business was the buying of rugs, vases, arms, cloths and whatever else might find sale in England. That was what I may call my general and legitimate business. As a side line I was to pick up bargains in mummies. Up to the founding of that agency in Cairo, only a few museums in Europe had been able to secure specimens. To get hold of a mummy with a history required a couple of years diplomatic correspondence between Governments, and the cost would run up as high as £5,000.

Under the laws of Egypt it was death to disturb the dead without official permission, and death to any foreigner discovered trying to ship a mummy out of the country without special license. In justice to the old and respectable house I have named I must say that they had no knowledge of my side line.

I had a partner in London who advanced the money and shared the profits. When I was ready to begin business, we had orders for thirty mummies.

Let me tell you that I had a crafty part to play. In a way the branch was under the supervision of the Egyptian Government. At the end of each week I had to submit a list of my purchases. All my shipments had to pass the Customs officials. My ware-rooms must always be open to official inspection. I was not told in so many words that all this watchfulness was to prevent me from dealing in mummies, but I knew that it was.

My first step was to bribe every official who could obstruct me, and I had to move slowly in the matter and make no mistakes. Then an agent must be found to look up and ship me the specimens from points in the interior, and he had to be a man without fear, as well as an honest man. He in turn would have to find faithful men, and, taken altogether, it was a bit of business to be handled with care. It was six months before I got it under way, and after once fairly in it there was not an hour in which I felt safe from discovery.

In most cases the burial places in Egypt are easily to be got at. Most of our orders simply called for a specimen, and it made no difference about the sex or whether there was a record attached. There were a few museums in want of particular bodies. They wanted kings, queens, generals, or poets who had been dead from 3,000 to 5,000 years. It is perhaps unnecessary to inform the reader that I always executed these orders.

After getting a mummy into my warehouse I had a way of making it fill the bill and give general satisfaction. My assistant, who was a native antiquary, a native doctor and a villain, was handy at unwrapping and rewrapping and carving hieroglyphics and manufacturing relics. If there was fraud in it, I do not seek to defend myself. I simply say that if there is a public demand for the mummy of Pharaoh it is the duty of some agent to supply it as near as possible and keep people good natured.

In the course of two years I shipped fifty-six mummies safely out of Cairo and landed them in London, and I am frank to say that my dividends were considerably larger than those paid last year by the London and North-Western Railway.

The mummy business was booming, and I was executing orders for anything up to 10,000 years old on demand when a Government official gave me a hint that my business had been found out. He exchanged his information for my five-pound note and went his way.

I don't know that anyone had given me away directly, but suspicion had somehow become aroused, and I was to be put under surveillance and caught red-handed. My shipments suddenly ceased, and the mummy market became dull.

After a couple of weeks my assistant villian went up the Nile towards the ruins of Memphis to look for a man. It was a live man and a particular sort of man he wanted, and when he found him the sum of ten pounds changed hands.

Then the man died. At least he was swathed in bandages which had come from the looms 2,000 years before, scented and spiced in A1 style and then put in a coffin which gave him away as having been dead almost twenty centuries.

Digitized by Google

The hieroglyphics on that coffin and on a manuscript inclosed revealed the fact that the dead man was the celebrated fakir Sonadi Hassassan, and that when he had slept his sleep he would awaken and begin another pilgrimage on earth.

The mummy reached my warehouse one afternoon, and within an hour a Government official, backed by a file of soldiers, had arrived to make a search. There had been no concealment. The mummy occupied a conspicuous position. They had caught me red-handed in a way, and yet they could not understand why I had been so open about it.

"My dear sir," I said to the official, "I know the laws of Egypt. I am not dealing in mummies. The law does not say I may not restore a dead man to life. At this present hour that thing there is a mummy. To-night at nine o'clock it will be a living man."

"What nonsense is this?" exclaimed the man as he struck the coffin with his cane. "Do you think I am a child to believe such tales?"

"I think you are a very smart man," I replied. "But there is yet something to learn. Read of Sonadi Hassassan. He was the greatest magician the world ever knew. He it was who made the Nile flow backwards for a day. When he had lived for 1,000 years, he became weary for the want of sleep. He fell into a trance which was not to be broken for 2,000 years. The time is up at nine o'clock to-night."

"And he will come back to life?" queried the man, with an incredulous smile.

"He will. You and your friends will be here to see. I had read of him, and I was anxious to get his body. I paid a large price for it that I may see it restored to life with my own eyes."

The Egyptian's natural superstition and my earnestness staggered the man, and when I saw it I clinched the matter by saying:

"It is only a few hours to wait. You shall dine with me at eight o'clock. At nine my assistant shall unwrap Hassassan and bring him to life. Let two of your soldiers watch the coffin meanwhile. If things don't turn out as I say, you shall carry me off prisoner and have £20 in gold as a present."

"So be it," he said after a long look at me, "but do not attempt to trick me, I am no fool."

Two soldiers were left to watch the coffin, and in my hearing he warned them that any remissness on their part would be followed by swift punishment.

My living rooms were over the warehouse. When the dinner hour arrived, I had the official and two of his friends to sit down with me. All three of the men had made up their minds that I was playing a game of bluff, and they were curious to know how I was going to carry it through. Five pounds would have bribed any of them to shut his eyes for a year, but in this case they had received their orders direct from the Minister and dared not trifle with him.

They drank sparingly of the wine that they might keep their heads clear, but grew sufficiently good-natured to hope that I might get out of the trouble without serious loss.

"There will be no trouble," I replied, with calm assurance. "Sonadi Hassassan has had his sleep and will return to life, and the Government will probably reward me for restoring such a celebrated man to earth. Come, gentlemen, it is time."

The soldiers had been sitting before the coffin for hours. My assistant was at hand and ready, and we lost no time in getting to work.

The coffin was tilted up on end, the body lifted forward so that it could be got at, and the wraps were soon removed.

I knew that the mummy was a live man, but never had I looked upon the face of a subject showing death and the passage of time more plainly. The face would have deceived the wisest professor in Europe.

There were the sunken eyes and cheeks, the loss of teeth and the seal brown colour, and I found myself wondering if some mistake hadn't been made. The official and his friend quietly chuckled as the business proceeded, and my assistant villain was the only one who was perfectly placid.

He did not hurry his work. He was a full half-hour getting down to the last wrapping, which was a sort of union garment made for the occasion. Then he stepped back with a flourish, picked up a stick, and, striking three blows on the coffin, he called out:

"It is time, Sonadi Hassassan; it is time!"

The chest of the mummy began to heave and its eyes to flutter. Then came a long breath and its eyes unclosed.

The soldiers bolted from the warehouse in affright, and the three men retreated several paces in consternation.

Very slowly and without a false motion the mummy gasped and stretched and looked about. A hand went up to rub sleep from its eyes. Then it moved uneasily, and presently stepped from the coffin, straightened up, and passed out of the door into the night with slow and dignified steps.

"Well?" I queried as I turned to the dumfounded trio.

They stood staring with open mouths, and I had to put hands on them before they came back to earth.

"Did I not tell you so? Did I not say that after a sleep of 2,000 years the great magician would return to life?"

They did not answer, but with pale faces and chattering teeth they tottered out into the darkness with a mighty fear upon them.

I had the agency for two years longer, and there was a continuous boom in the mummy market, but after that incident there was never an official inspection of my stock. The officials could not have been hired for money to poke about in the dark corners.

C. B. Lewis.

YOUR FACE ENLARGED FOR 7/-

If you have a relative who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. × 12in. mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. × 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

Full particulars have already appeared, and will appear again shortly. They also appear in the current issue of

THE CURIOSITY SHOP.

A coupon from that paper must accompany each order.

Digitized by Google

A YACHTSMAN'S ROMANCE.

THE London season was over, and a considerable number of its late celebrities were collected in various pleasant spots closely contiguous to the waters of the Solent. Blighted beings had repaired to Cowes, and shattered hearts to Ryde. Gentlemen who were, in popular parlance, about "done up," were enjoying themselves with a hilarity that might have betokened the zenith of worldly prosperity and commercial success, in different crafts belonging to the pleasure fleet which covers the English Channel with animation during the months of July, August and September.

The scene is Ryde Pier, and the hour about 7.30 p.m. A pretty spot, and by no means an unfavourable hour for visiting it. Like Melrose, Ryde Pier and the view it presents may be visited with signal propriety by the pale moonlight or in the pale twilight.

The eternal promenade on the pier-head, the perpetual accompaniment of brilliant music and interminable scandal, the ceaseless tide of demonstrative flirtation—these things are pleasant enough per se, but they have, no doubt, a tendency to become monotonous. It is a very different thing, Ryde Pier after dinner. You can secure society without crowd and company without effort. You may meditate solus, or solus cum sola you may flirt. And the prospect is not without its charm. There in the Solent is the squadron of dainty craft, their sails furled, still and motionless at anchor, the lamp fixed to their mastheads reflecting itself with a quivering motion in the tide below; and the whole effect being that of a marine illumination. A little further on, and you can see the line of light on the mainland and distinctly trace the terraces of Southsea and Portsmouth. If you turn round you will see full in your face the little town of Ryde alive with gas and the windows of the Victoria Yacht Club all aglow.

Mr. Jim Lawlesse, to address him at once by his familiar title, was scarcely a gentleman of a poetic temperament, yet from the prolonged intentness of his gaze upon the waters as he lounged across the railings of the pier, and the fact that he had suffered his cigar to become extinguished in his hand, he might, for all one could have told to the contrary, been meditating a sonnet to his mistress's eyebrow, or be speculating deeply on the philosophy of the unconditioned.

Of that little yacht yonder, the one nearest the shore, with its tiny light twinkling from amid its rigging—the Sea Fan was her name—Mr. Jim Lawlesse was temporary proprietor.

Jim's friends were in the habit of saying that, having made the land too hot for him, he had taken to the waters; and there may have been reasons which rendered St. James's Street a slightly too public place for our hero. So Mr. Lawlesse had accepted an invitation from an old college friend to go on a yachting trip in the Sea Fan. But the Sea Fan's owner had been called away, and Mr. Lawlesse was the man in possession for the time being.

A boat containing a gentleman and two ladies pulled up to the pier, and Mr. Lawlesse's attention was aroused. The party had come from the Petrel, about a mile out, and consisted of the proprietor of the Petrel, Sir Hedworth Dare, and his two daughters, who stood to each other in the relation of step-sisters, as Sir Hedworth had married twice, Edith and Kate. When Mr. Lawlesse went up to the two as they landed it was pretty obvious that Sir Hedworth Dare would have been quite as well pleased had that gentleman not chosen to present himself; for the baronet regarded Mr. Lawlesse as a detrimental, and had a wholesome and parental horror of the class.

"Ah! Lawlesse; thought it was Moonington," said Sir Hedworth, "said he would be here to meet us."

The Hon. Sam Moonington was the eldest son of the heir of Moonshine, and desperately smitten with Miss Kate Dare. Sir Hedworth—so said Ryde society—was bent upon the match.

The Hon. Sam was certainly a catch; so said the ladies; Moonington was an ass; so (somewhat abruptly) said the gentlemen in general, and Mr. Lawlesse in particular.

Jim, however, was not to be taken aback by this very tepid welcome, and walked down the pier with Sir Hedworth and his two daughters.

"Are you going to the ball to-night, Mr. Lawlesse?" asked Kate Dare.

It happened to be within a few hours of the commencment of the Yacht Club Ball.

Of course Mr. Lawlesse was going; and so was Mr. Moonington—that gentleman had just joined them—and so they all were. "And so we shall meet again presently."

And Jim Lawlesse sauntered off after having bade the ladies an au revoir—in decidedly better spirits than when he had first met Sir Hedworth and the Misses Dare too.

"I don't think I should mind backing my luck against that of the Hon. Sam's," said Jim Lawlesse as he proceeded to dress. Miss Kate Dare had promised Mr. Lawlesse the first waltz.

The dance given by the Royal Victoria Yacht Club was unusually and brilliantly successful that year; so said everybody; and the ball is certainly one which, if for no other reasons than those of a spectacular nature, is well worth seeing. The elegant devices which convert a balcony into a corridor, the profusion of banners, the trophies of yachtsmen, the decidedly nautical features in the dresses of the ladies—all these add a charm which is exclusively their own to the affair.

Digitized by Google

Mr. James Lawlesse entered the room almost at the same time as the Dare party. On the arm of Sir Hedworth rested his elder daughter, and on that of the Hon. Sam, Miss Kate Dare. The baronet's tone was more chilled than ever when he caught sight of our hero approaching in the distance.

Amid an indescribable chatter strongly flavoured with marine jargon the first quadrille was danced. Mr. Moonington's partner was Miss Kate Dare, his vis-à-vis the gentleman whom we have for form's sake christened the hero of this slight narrative. But the first quadrille, as even first quadrilles are some time or other, was over at last, and within a very few minutes of its termination Mr. Lawles e claimed the younger of Sir Hedworth's two daughters as his partner in the first waltz; and Mr. Moonington surrendered the lady who without doubt was the object of his affection and ambitions, certainly not with the best grace in the world.

Miss Dare, however, was close by, and disengaged. Would Miss Dare give him, the Honourable Sam, the pleasure of that waltz? Most happy: and the pair whirled off.

The elder of Sir Hedworth's two daughters was far from displeased at the contretemps, and she determined to make the most of it. She did not see why the heir to the Moonshine peerage should be calmly appropriated for and by her younger and half-sister. For her part, she could never quite understand what there particularly was to charm people in Kate. Besides, Kate had her time before her; she had only finished her first season, and Edith Dare's first season was an affair of the more or less long past. If Kate did not choose to know her opportunity such a charge of ignorance should not be brought against Miss Dare. In plain truth this young lady was as little pleased with her father as with her sister in the present matter. It would be no such bad thing, she thought, if the event should prove that the calculations of the former were at fault; as for Kate, the child was far too ignorant to calculate at all.

The fair partner of Mr. Moonington put forth all her powers—and they were not inconsiderable—to captivate and please. She suggested a walk in the corridor, it was so hot in the ball-room. Curiously enough, Kate and Mr. Lawlesse had proceeded in the same direction only a few minutes previously. Curiously enough, also the keen eyes of Edith Dare had noticed the movement.

"I think," said that young lady, in a low tone, "we will sit here, just behind that pillar. The air blows in so cool, and we have such a pretty view of the sea."

Almost immediately on the other side of the pillar were Miss Kate Dare and Mr. Lawlesse.

"Ah! Mr. Moonington, there, I declare, are my sister and Mr. Lawlesse. How very sentimental!"

And Edith looked up into the face of the Honourable Sam, who, judging from his expression, was not particularly pleased. He looked in the direction indicated, and then turned again to his partner.

Under the shadow of the pillar Edith advanced with her cavalier a little nearer her sister.

"Romance, did you say, Mr. Lawlesse? I don't think there's much romance in the present century, least of all at Ryde. If you want romance I think it would be necessary to search for it on far wilder waters than those of the Solent."

"I suppose," returned Mr. Lawlesse, who had evidently been reading 'Ixion in Heaven,' "that romance is to the romantic."

"And who is romantic nowadays?"

The pair were standing close together, and Mr. Moonington and his partner could distinctly see Mr. Lawlesse's hand laid upon Kate Dare's.

"I think, Mr. Moonington, we will go inside. It is getting rather chilly here—romantic perhaps, rheumatic certainly," said Miss Dare, in accents sufficiently audible to arouse the attention of her sister and Mr. Lawlesse.

"Hadn't a notion," remarked Jim, turning round with something of confusion, "that anybody was so near."

The Hon. Samuel Moonington did not ask Miss Kate Dare to dance again that evening.

In her dreams that night, when the ball was over and the dancers dispersed, Miss Dare saw herself the Countess of Moonington; and if any thoughts visited her sister's slumber, I am disposed to fancy that they were principally relative to Jim Lawlesse.

* * * * *

A beautiful morning two or three days after the club ball; Ryde was thinning gradually, but among the visitors who remained, were Sir Hedworth Dare, his two daughters, the Hon. Sam Moonington, and Jim Lawlesse, the latter of whom still waited the return of his friend, the proprietor of the Sea Fan.

Sir Hedworth Dare was going to take a morning's sail in his yacht the Petrel, his two daughters were coming, and they were to be accompanied by Mr. Moonington. The baronet had noticed something of the events of the ball-night, and Mr. James Lawlesse was discreetly omitted from the party.

Kate Dare was passionately fond of the sea, and was herself an excellent oar. She told Jim as much the other night. She could not imagine, she said, any life more perfect than the yachtsman's and it must be allowed that the existence is not without its attractions.

Sir Hedworth's party were on board the Petrel, and the yacht was just about to slip her moorings.

"Where's Kate, Edith?" inquired the baronet, not seeing his younger daughter on deck.

"Oh, down in the cabin, papa, I suppose."

These last two words were added in a somewhat lower tone, and as she said them Edith rather blushed. She sat down, however, presently, next to Mr. Moonington, and was soon making the running not less than that of the good yacht Petrel.

"Tell Kate to come up," said Sir Hedworth, after he had leisure to think of other things than certain matters of purely nautical importance; and Edith Dare called for her sister down the companion ladder. Receiving no answer, she descended into the cabin.

"Papa," she said on returning, "I don't see Kate at all. I suppose at the last moment she made up her mind not to come."

This was not exactly the truth. Edith Dare had determined from the first that Kate should not be amongst the party, and to this end she had managed to divert her attention to something else at the moment they were leaving the house. Sir Hedworth was not satisfied with the explanation, and knit his brow. His younger daughter was his favourite, and not being blind to the character of the elder, he did, in plain truth, suspect something of the ruse that had been executed; but he said nothing, and the Petrel went on.

Digitized by Google

Some person else had selected the present morning as a favourable one for a sail, and that was Jim Lawlesse. He had taken no companion, and was talking abstractedly to the master of the Sea Fan. The regulation telescope was suspended from his neck, and something impelled him to look through it in the direction of what seemed a black speck. He examined it again.

"Looks uncommonly like a boat; and so far as I can make out, whoever is inside her is in distress, for it appears to me," said Jim, "as if they were making signs."

The master of the Sea Fan was of the same opinion, and the pair decided that they would "stand about," and try to get at the object.

"By Jove!" cried Jim, as they drew a little nearer, "it's a woman, I declare!"

And a woman it certainly was—evidently exhausted with the severity of her efforts to make headway against the waves. They were now within two or three hundred yards of the boat; and Jim ordered the yacht's pinnace to be let down, and said he would himself run up to this female Columbus.

"Miss Dare!" cried Jim, as the pinnace touched the boat, "is that you? What on earth brought you here—three miles from shore?"

"Oh! Mr. Lawlesse, I am so glad to see you, or someone. I was getting about exhausted, and thought ——"

But Kate Dare was unable to say more, for she fell back in a dead faint.

Jim Lawlesse transferred himself into her boat, and rowed to the yacht; and when Kate Dare next became sensible, she found herself lying in the ladies' cabin of the Sea Fan, with Mr. James Lawlesse at her side.

"How very kind!" were her first words; and "How very fortunate!"

"It was certainly very fortunate that I should have seen you; but there is no kindness," said Jim. "Don't speak till you have quite recovered."

The recovery was not long delayed; and Kate Dare commenced to tell Jim Lawlesse exactly what had occurred.

"You know," she said, "that we—that is, papa, and Edith, and Mr. Moonington—were to have gone out for a sail in the Petrel this morning. Well, I was dressing and thought I had plenty of time, when, on looking out of the window, I saw the yacht starting. I was determined not to be robbed of my cruise, so I hurried and went down to the water, and got into the little boat. You see, they were close to me. The Petrel didn't seem to be more than a hundred yards ahead, and I thought that I could easily attract their notice. Besides, I had imagined, naturally, that they would discover I was left behind; and I thought, most likely, they would put back for me. However, I couldn't manage it; and I rowed on and on; and when I looked back, the shore was ever so far behind, and I didn't know what to do; and I only hoped some person would pick me up—and at last you did; and I am really more obliged than I can say."

Jim blurted out some disclaimer, in reply, which does not materially affect the course of this narrative.

It was decided that the best plan would be to st er for home immediately, and to land as near Sea View as possible—where Sir Hedworth Dare's house was situated.

"People talk so absurdly in Ryde," added Miss Kate Dare, as an argument to clench the plan.

When the shore was reached there was scarcely a person visible; two persons, however, had noticed the disembarkation from the Sea Fan—one was Edith Dare, and another Mr. Moonington.

"If that does not convince him no'hing else will," thought Miss Dare.

Miss Dare's wish was accomplished, and before the house was reached the heir of Moonshine had declared himself.

"Where on earth is Kate?" said Sir Hedworth, as he met Mr. Moonington and his newly gained fiancée.

"We have just seen her, papa, landing from Mr. Lawlesse's yacht," was the sisterly reply.

"The dickens you have?" replied the baronet, under his breath.

"Ah, here they come, I declare," added Miss Dare. "Hope you've had a pleasant sail, Kate?"

"Kate?" said Sir Hedworth, as that young lady was bursting out into all manner of ejaculatory explanations, "I want to speak to you at once. I am surprised," said the baronet when the library was reached, "that you should have given me the slip in the dishonest manner you did simply to do a most improper thing—go out in the yacht of a young man to whom you know I exceedingly object. As for his conduct it is simply disgraceful. I don't understand it, upon my soul I——"

"Oh, papa! what do you mean?" burst in Kate. "Mr. Lawlesse has saved my life." And Kate narrated to her father all that had occurred. The baronet's face changed more than once in the course of his daughter's story.

"Go up and dress for dinner, Kate. I will go and thank Mr. Lawlesse."

Sir Hedworth met that gentleman standing on the steps of the porch.

"No thanks whatever are due, Sir Hedworth," replied Jim. "I am only sincerely grateful that I saw your daughter when I did."

"Don't go, Lawlesse," continued the owner of the Petrel. "Come and stay to dinner."

And so saying, Sir Hedworth turned aside to speak to his elder daughter whom he saw coming.

"Edith," he said, "I should like to know what you meant by telling me that Kate was in the cabin this morning?"

"Really, papa, I knew nothing to the contrary. I'm glad she was in more agreeable society. But Mr. Moonington is in the library and I know he is anxious to see you. He is calling—pray go!"

Later on that evening there was another interview—this time between Sir Hedworth and Mr. Jim Lawlesse, It was entirely satisfactory.

Kate had spoken to her father in the interval on the subject of her lover. Jim had made, and would make no declaration without Sir Hedworth's consent. That consent was given.

"Lawlesse, you have not only saved my daughter's life, you have acted in a manner infinitely creditable to yourself."

"Kate," said Jim to his affianced bride, before they parted that night, "don't you think I was right, that there may be some romance even close to Ryde, and on the waters of the Solent, after all?"

SUSIE LANCE.

Digitized by Google

Have You Eczema?

or any form of Skin Disease? If you have, do go to your Chemist or Store, or send stamps or P O. for 1/3 to the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., for a bottle of "ANTEXEMA." It gives immediat re lef directly it is appli d, and soon cures even the most obstinate cases. A Booklet on Skin Troubles is enclosed with each bottle.

All orders are sent securely packed, free from observation.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 23 Warnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 23lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

TOO STOUT

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

SEND FOR

DR. EVANS'S (U.S.A.)

Pamphlet on Nervous Diseases of All Kinds. THIS PAMPHLET describes all the symptoms which arise from Diseases of the NERVOUS SYSTEM. It is up-to-date, having been compiled after years of labour and experience in the Treatment of these Maladies. It is complete, practical, and can be readily understood and acted upon. It gives pure and simple advice to Sufferers. Send stamped addressed envelope to GEORGE WRIGHT, Esq., Colne House, REMBRANDT ROAD, LEE, LONDON, S.E. (Name this Paper.)

DO YOU KNOW

that with every copy of THIS WEEK'S

HOME NOTES

A Paper Pattern of a

PRETTY NIGHTDRESS

is

GIVEN AWAY?

HOME NOTES is the best and daintiest of ladies' weeklies. Order a copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
106 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

The Only Efficacious Substitute for Cod-liver Oil.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins. ¼-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin and Postage.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

A MAGNIFICENT COMPLEXION GUARANTEED

By the free use of LILLIE POWDER. It nourishes, heals, soothes, and brings Health and Beauty.

Order it of your Chemist and refuse all substitutes, as they may be injurious.

Three Tints: Blanche Naturelle, and Rachel.

Of all Chemists, Hairdressers, Stores, &c.

THE LILLIE SYNDICATE,
3 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE BEST OF ALL BEVERAGES
AND THE CHEAPEST.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S

Extract of Herbs

8 Gallons Prime Beer for 6d.

Sample Free for 9 Stamps.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

NEWBALL & MASON,
NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, October 1st, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 217.

MY whole is a fish; my 4, 5, 6, 7, is splendid; my 8, 9, 10, is an adjective; my 1, 3, 11, 2, is a disease.

No. 218.

ONE quarter of tare, plus one-fifth of swear, plus one-sixth of bubble, plus one-fourth of gate, plus one-third of net, plus one-third of tea.

The sum is equivalent to: to diminish.

No. 219.

MY initials and finals, read downwards, will give the names of two great powers:

A village in Norfolk.
A town in France.
A town in Germany.
A town in Russia.
A state in America.
A county in Wales.
A river in Scotland.

No. 220.

MY FIRST a sound which may denote
Disoredit or surprise,
To kiss it, when on bended knee,
Humility implies.

From gold to silver LAST is changed
By alchemy of time;
To tamper with it when not yours
Is deemed a heinous crime.

Unjustly charged, unjustly doomed,
The sage took up my WHOLE;
"With this," said he, "I will unLAST
The mysteries of the soul."

No. 221.

THE following letters, when re-arranged, will form a double word-square, the connecting word of which means a communication:

AAAA EEEEE GG LLLL MM NN PP RR SSSSS UU Y.

No. 222.

A MAN left £400 to be divided among his eight children in the following proportions:

The first was to receive as much as the 2nd and 3rd,
The second	,,	,,	twice as much as the 3rd.
The third	,,	,,	,,	,,	5th.
The fourth	,,	,,	,,	,,	6th.
The fifth	,,	,,	one-sixth	,,	1st.
The sixth	,,	,,	twice	,,	7th.
The seventh	,,	,,	one-quarter	,,	4th.
The eighth	,,	,,	one-fifth	,,	2nd, [6th, and 7th together.

What did each child receive?

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 199 to 204.

THE first prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Mr. Charles H. Moore, of The Nest, Record Road, Emsworth, whose solution was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "A Strange Executor," by Bennett Coll has been sent to each of the following:

W. Armstrong, Marchmont Road, Edinburgh.
S. S. Napper, Highbury New Park, N.
Miss K. Brien, Wilton Place, Dublin.
Mrs. Frances Thomas, Kingswood, Bristol.
C. G. Chesterman, Fairfield, Liverpool.
F. Lucas, Freemantle, Southampton.
A. Milligan, Lit le Woodhouse Street, Leeds.
A. E. Bunn, Thornham Street, Liverpool.
J. P. Gross, Rue des Belles Feuilles, Paris.
Mrs. J. L. Keys, Flaxman Road, Camberwell, S.E.

SOLUTIONS OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.

Nos. 205 to 210.

No. 205. 1½.

No. 206. Canton, Stirling, Port Arthur.

No. 207.

O B A N
B A N E
A N E W
N E W T O W N
O B O E
W O V E
N E E D

No. 208. Bream, cream, cram, dram, ram.

No. 209. TARTAR.

No. 210. "Sweet are the uses of adversity."
Afraid, share, verity, toe.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ...	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,, ...	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate. Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Sept. 25th, if intended for the issue on sale Oct. 9th, and dated October 13th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SEE SPECIAL 10 DAYS' OFFER AT FOOT OF PAGE.

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

UNDER ROYAL PATRONAGE.

Eradicates Scurf and Dandriff.

Prevents Hair Falling and Turning Grey.

Promotes Growth.

Contains no Dye.

Is delightfully Cooling, Refreshing, and Invigorating.

Keeps the Hair Soft and Pliant, and Imparts to it the Lustre and Freshness of Youth.

Invaluable for Use after Sea Bathing.

Allays Irritation and Keeps the Scalp Clean.

Recommended and Used by
H.M. THE QUEEN (of Greece), PRINCESS VICTORIA (of Schaumburg-Lippe), PRINCESS HOHENLOHE, PRINCESS MARIE (of Greece), PRINCESS HENRY REUS, Rear-Admiral TINKLAR, &c., &c.

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

SPECIAL OFFER to those who have not yet tried KOKO.

A 4/6 TRIAL BOTTLE for 2/-.

Any person forwarding this Coupon and P.O. for Two Shillings, and four Stamps to pay postage, packing, &c., will receive immediately for trial, by Parcel Post, under cover, prepaid, One Regular 12 oz. Bottle of Koko for the Hair, the price of which is 4/6, provided it is ordered within ten days from the date of this offer. In no case will more than one bottle be sent for the use of the same person on this coupon, as we make the offer solely for trial, knowing it creates a demand when once used; and this large bottle gives it a fair trial. We find it better to thus practically give away one bottle to make a customer than to spend large amounts in advertising. Any person into whose hands this offer comes may avail themselves of it. Address all Orders with Coupons to—

THE KOKO-MARICOPAS CO. LTD., 16 BEVIS MARKS, LONDON.

Orders may be sent with this Coupon after the expiration of date, provided we are then issuing these trial bottle Coupons, and if we are not, the money will be returned. This Coupon will be received at 16 Bevis Marks, E.C., or 113 Regent Street, London, W., and 2/- only will be required when presented personally.

KOKO is sold by all Chemists, &c., at 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle. For the sake of greater profit you may be asked to buy some other hair preparation instead. In justice to us kindly insist on having Koko.

Digitized by Google

OROCO SOX

A New Invention to keep the feet warm and dry yet allowing perfect ventilation

18 pairs post free for 1/-

State size required.

A boon for tender & tired feet

WILL SUIT YOU DOWN TO THE GROUND.

OROCO M'F'G. Co. WIGAN.

PARASITENE

is a new and important remedy for GOUT, RINGWORM, ECZEMA, and all IRRITANT SKIN DISEASES.

Prescribed by members of the London Medical Profession.

Can be obtained from all Chemists as a Lotion or an Ointment at 1/1½ and 2/9, or Post Free from the Proprietors.

"SKIN DISEASES & HOW TO CURE"

By Parasitene Treatment, post free from

The WEDNESFIELD CHEMICAL SYNDICATE Limited,

WOLVERHAMPTON.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

"HAIR LIKE AN ENGLISH WOMAN."

That is the generally expressed desire of a foreigner. To have hair like an English woman. Hair is a woman's chief adornment, but hair to be nice must have nice treatment. Hair must be stimulated to live.

Continual brushing does this, and nothing else does it as effectually. Our grandmothers, and even our mothers, knew this so well that hair brushing was one of the most important features of their toilet. Half an hour at night and half an hour in the morning were thought none too long a time to devote to this. If this attention cannot be given, recourse must be had to a stimulant, and as a stimulant for the hair there is none so safe and so effective as the discovery of Mr. Geo. R. Sims, called by him "TATCHO," which is the Romany word for "genuine."

GEO. R. SIMS'

HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO."

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous liquor, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair, but more especially with those that have not received their quantum of care.

If you value your appearance—and who does not?—get a bottle of "TATCHO" to-day. The result will surprise you and be intensely gratifying.

"TATCHO" will stop the hair falling, and will make it beautiful in texture and double in volume.

"TATCHO" gives vitality to the hair at once, and after a few days of treatment its youthful brightness; and what is more, this vitality and brightness may be retained.

Mrs. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, uses nothing but "TATCHO."

Geo. R. Sims' Hair Renewer, "Tatcho," is obtainable of all perfumers, 2/9 & 5/- per Bottle; or can be had direct in plain wrapper on sending 2/11 or 5/3.

ADDRESS

The Geo. R. Sims Co.,

81c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

SAMPLE TRIAL BOTTLES 1/6 TO-DAY.

Sent post free in plain package, twenty-one stamps.

Digitized by Google

"HAVE YOU GOT THAT TEN POUND NOTE?"
See this week's "Pearson's Weekly."

SHORT STORIES
A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 613. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 29TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

REASONS WHY

YOU SHOULD DRINK THE DELECTABLE

NON-INTOXICATING BEER

MADE FROM

Good for the HEALTH,
Good for the POCKET,
Good for the OLD,
Good for the YOUNG,
Good for EVERYBODY,
Good for YOU!
TRY IT!
SOLD EVERYWHERE

Good for the HEALTH,
Good for the POCKET,
Good for the OLD,
Good for the YOUNG,
Good for EVERYBODY,
Good for YOU!
TRY IT!
SOLD EVERYWHERE

A 6d. BOTTLE MAKES 8 GALLONS OF WHOLESOME, PALATABLE BEER!!

Try also MASON'S COFFEE ESSENCE (Sample sent free) and MASON'S WINE ESSENCES (Sample Bottle free for 9 Stamps).

NEWBALL & MASON, Nottingham.

AGENTS WANTED.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KOKO

FOR THE HAIR

UNDER ROYAL PATRONAGE.

KOKO for the HAIR is a tonic, cleansing, invigorating preparation, it eradicates scurf and dandriff, prevents hair from falling or turning grey, promotes growth, contains no dye or greasy substance, is the most cleanly of all hair preparations and invariably gives satisfaction.

1/-, 2/6, and 4/6, of all Chemists, Hairdressers, &c., everywhere.

OLD PEOPLE LIKE IT for its wonderful power to invigorate decayed hair, and induce an entirely new growth when that is possible.

MIDDLE-AGED PEOPLE LIKE IT, because it prevents them from getting bald, keeps dandriff, away, and makes the hair grow thick and strong.

YOUNG LADIES LIKE IT As a dressing, because it gives the hair a beautiful glossy lustre, ensures a luxuriant growth, and enables them to dress it and keep it in any style that may be desired.

CHILDREN LIKE IT, Because it keeps the hair and scalp cool and clean, allays irritation, and keeps the hair in whatever position desired.

THEY ALL LIKE IT, Because it is as pure as crystal, perfectly colourless, contains no poisonous substance, no sugar of lead, sulphur, nitrate of silver, or grease, and does not soil or colour the scalp, face, or the most delicate fabric in clothing.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

FREE

QUAKER OATS COOKER

OUR OFFER, READ IT

2-Pint Cooker Free. { For 25 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

2-Pint Cooker Free. { For 50 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

3-Pint Cooker Free. { For 40 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

3-pint Cooker Free. { For 75 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

Required number of White Squares must be sent in at one time.

On receipt by us, POSTAGE PAID, of required number of WHITE SQUARES, or price mentioned below, before Sept. 1, 1901, a Quaker Oats Cooker will be sent at once, carriage paid, to any address in Great Britain or Ireland.

If you want the Cooker at once, and have not the required number of WHITE SQUARES, send 2/- for 2-pint size, or 2/6 for 3-pint size. The amount you pay will be refunded immediately correct number of WHITE SQUARES is sent us, postage paid, if received by us before Sept. 1st, 1901. Write your address plainly and mention this Paper.

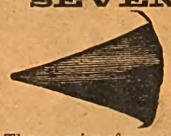
ADDRESS: DEPT. W 3

QUAKER OATS, LTD., EASTCHEAP, LONDON, E.C.

QUAKER OATS, sold in 1-lb. and 2-lb. Packets only.

Beware of substitution. Quaker name and Quaker Figure on every Packet.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.



C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, MISS E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street London, W.

SENSATIONAL BARGAINS for LADIES

LADY'S MARVEL "ACME" WATCH.

A MONEY SAVING OF NEARLY 50 PER CENT.

Every Lady Reader of SHORT STORIES should send a postcard to H. SAMUEL and secure a HANDSOME FREE GIFT.

Every applicant will receive H. SAMUEL'S GRAND ALBUM of Bargains, a magnificent work of nearly 200 Pages, adorned with over 3,000 Illustrations of wonderful Bargains in Ladies' and Gents' GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, Clocks, ELEGANT JEWELLERY, Plate, BEAUTIFUL DIAMONDS, Cutlery, &c., &c., all of which H. SAMUEL supplies to you direct at Wholesale Prices. Every volume contains full particulars, and ten lists of GRAND BONUS REWARDS. Don't forget it is sent you ABSOLUTELY FREE.

H. SAMUEL'S LADY'S "ACME" WATCH,

As Illustrated, has a fine Three-quarter Jewelled Plate Lever Movement, Richly Decorated Dial (Plain, if preferred), and Highly Engraved Case. Warranted for FIVE YEARS and sent complete, with Key, Instructions, and BONUS FREE GIFT on receipt of 25/-.

A MONTH'S FREE TRIAL

is allowed with every article; thus fullest opportunity is afforded of thoroughly testing the goods.

H. SAMUEL (DEPT. 29), 95, 97, 99, 101, 33, 89 & 121 MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 613.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending Sept. 29th, 1900.

PIERROT.

The Story of an Innocent.

AT the foot of a big frowning mountain which for ages has stood like some doughty sentinel, refusing to leave his post, there nestles the quaintest and neatest of all the villages of southern France.

It is not a large village, but is too small to appear on the maps. History does not mention it; fame has not visited it; but it is a very happy little village for all that, and the simple peasants who live in it are contented with their home, and proud to have been born there.

If once in a while a tourist happens to pass through the place, and admits that he has never even heard of their village or the great château above it, or even of the fine monument of polished marble which the inhabitants point out with pride as marking the grave of a hero second only to the great Napoleon himself, they shake their heads in pitying astonishment at the crass ignorance he displays.

What! Never heard of Pierrot, their own Pierrot, who was so brave and noble and good? Was it possible!

And here Misette, who proudly asserts that she was named for the hero's young mother, clatters out in her neat wooden sabots, and, as the most venerable woman in the village, is accorded the honour of telling this wonderful story to the stranger, while all the other village women, with their round-faced, solemn-eyed brood, cluster eagerly around and listen with reverent awe, although they have heard the tale many times before.

Mère Misette is somewhat garrulous in her story-telling, and intersperses her remarks with pious ejaculations and apostrophes to the many virtues of their own Pierrot.

"An Innocent, M'sieu, as you may see by the words on the monument; but a very wise boy, for all, and a shining example to these lazy, worthless know-nothings!"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

It happened, oh! long ago, in the golden days of the First Empire, when all France was bubbling over with joy, after many months of boiling over with rage. All the village took a holiday when Gustave and Misette were married, and all the village wept as one man when the happy couple departed—Gustave proud and radiant, Misette blushing and happy—to "live at the great fort where Gustave's regiment was stationed."

Pere Milleux came to her as she sat crushed and grief-stricken by her recent discovery.

All the maids in the village were more or less openly envious of Misette, not that they did not love her well, or honestly own that she was the gayest and prettiest of them all, but then Gustave was a soldier, very handsome and tall and straight, and wore so beautiful a uniform. He could tell the most marvellous tales, of war and fighting too, until one's flesh would fairly creep with the delighted horror.

Their own more prosaic lovers were quite cast in the shade when Gustave made these all too brief and infrequent visits to his old home; and Pepin, the vine-dresser, and Antoine and Pierre, who worked so industriously in the quarries, felt dreadfully overshadowed and not a little aggrieved when the gay soldier came and absorbed everybody's attention, holding all the village spellbound by his account of how he had actually seen the emperor face to face.

But, when, not a year afterward, Misette returned to them, a desolate and broken-hearted widow, refusing to be comforted, because her merry, loving Gustave had been ordered to the front and cruelly killed in battle, and even his poor mangled remains denied her, being buried hastily, then and there, with many others in a great trench, pretty Marie sobbed from the very depths of her tender little heart, and thanked the Holy Mother that her own Pepin was but an humble vine-dresser, instead of a fine soldier, as she had once wished and all the village wept for sympathy with Misette, and mourned the loss of their gallant soldier.

The days were long and dreary enough for Misette, after that; but soon a little comforter was sent to gladden her eyes and warm her poor numb heart—a tiny, round-eyed baby, with such loves of dimples, and a mite of a nose which looked like a mere dot in the middle of his funny wrinkled face.

He was never romping or naughty, like other children, but would lie quiet for hours at a time, staring with unblinking eyes at the warm blue sky, and making no noise except an occasional gurgling coo.

Misette was charmed, delighted, with such exceptionally good behaviour. Was there ever such a wonderful child as her Pierrot, and would not his father have been proud of the blessed little angel?

Ah, his father! Misette would weep a little at the memory, and hug her Pierrot more closely, as she remembered the gay, brave soldier.

As the child grew older, Misette would sometimes see her kind neighbours look at him in a puzzled way, and then pityingly at her, and shake their heads silently, or even furtively dash away a tear.

She was perplexed for a while at this strange behaviour, for her fond mother-heart could not yet realize what they saw all too plainly—that no gleam of human intelligence lit up the big brown eyes, as wistful and pathetic as a dog's; but, when the time came for the child to talk, and reason a little on his own account, it slowly dawned upon her that something was lacking.

Père Milleux, the good Priest, came to her, as she sat crushed and grief-striken by her recent discovery, and laid a kind hand on Pierrot's chestnut curls—the pretty, tousled locks that hid no actively working mind.

"My daughter," he said, with loving sympathy, "God is good. He sent thee a beautiful child to sustain thee in thine affliction. Now, when thine heart would revolt against His divine will, remember that He does no thing without a wise purpose, and, if thy little Pierrot is an Innocent, be assured that it is because He wishes to use this helpless one for some great good. Be comforted."

Misette bowed her head meekly before the holy man, and said:

"It is the will of God."

But still in her heart she mourned bitterly, and, before another year came, she died, bequeathing her Innocent to the care of the village.

They accepted him as a sacred trust, these simple peasant folk, who knew little of the intricacies of law and government, but ever followed the dictates of their own honest hearts.

The child made his home with all of them, wandering at will from house to house, always welcomed, always cared for tenderly and lovingly, and given a generous share of the poorest meal, because he was an Innocent, their poor Pierrot.

Digitized by Google

As time went on, he grew into a tall, strong boy pitifully simple and childish in his tastes and amusements, but always faithful and loving to his kind friends, and more than delighted when he could be of some little service to them.

The little children loved him, and clung to their Pierrot with unlimited trust and confidence. Possibly they may have felt, with dim, childish intuition, the mute appeal that always shone in his dull, patient eyes, but they could not realize, and would not have cared if they had, that those eyes were hopelessly vacant, and that he would never be more than a child. They knew that he was an "Innocent," because they had heard their elders say so, but he was their own dear Pierrot, and that was sufficient for them.

Pierrot was happy in the love of little children and dumb animals, and in the beautiful summer land in which he lived. He took immeasurable delight in the great château which towered above the village, about a mile away, and he would hover about the deserted grounds for days at a time.

The château had been closed and empty for many years, but to Pierrot it was indeed a fairy castle, and almost as wonderful in its loneliness as though it had been thrown open and filled with a brilliant throng of guests.

When he saw workmen busy on the grounds one day, and was told that the grand marquis was coming there for the summer with his lady and their little son, the Lord Montalembert, and all their retinue of servants, his ecstasy knew no bounds; and this feeling the entire village shared with him.

When the long-expected day came when their lord should arrive, they decked themselves in gala attire, and clustered, all agog with eagerness, along the road by which the marquis and his retinue were to pass through the village.

It was a day long to be remembered. Did one ever see such a fine gentleman as their own marquis, or such a sweet and beautiful lady as his wife? Such a handsome, merry little boy, too, was the young lord, who threw coins out of the carriage-window, and shrieked with laughter to see the children scrambling for them, and who thanked Pierrot so politely—the sweet young gentleman—when his fine cap fell off in the dust, and Pierrot picked it up and handed it back with awkward shyness.

Pierrot took him on his broad shoulders and strode patiently along.

Ah! that was indeed a wonderful procession, with servants enough for a king at least, dressed in the most beautiful coats, all aglitter with fine gold lace. It formed a topic of conversation for years.

The next day the marquis rode down into the village with his son, attended by two very erect and stern-looking grooms.

The little lord's face was sparkling and eager at the queer things he was seeing, so different from the sights at his city home, with which he was so familiar.

The wonderful marquis was good-naturedly resigned. He would never have ridden down into the commonplace little village that morning, if the young Lord Montalembert had not coaxed and teased to be taken again to see those funny peasant children and the big boy who had picked up his hat, and, on being refused once, had screamed his displeasure in so terrifying a way that the delicate nerves of his lady mother had been quite shaken.

Madame la marquise had been very, very ill, and they had come to this quiet place for the absolute rest she could not get in any of their gayer homes; but, if the young lord was going to scream like that, she might as well be in Paris itself. So the young lord had his way, as usual, and now, from the back of his shaggy pony, he hailed Pierrot with delightful familiarity:

"I say, come here!"

Pierrot shuffled slowly forward, a big awkward figure, grinning in sheepish delight at the honour conferred upon him, and stood looking at the smart velvet suit and jaunty cap his lordship wore.

Lord Montalembert, on his part, was looking down at Pierrot's bare brown legs and feet.

"Do you never have to wear shoes?" he asked, looking back to his own dantily-shod foot with a dissatisfied air.

Pierrot looked mystified, and shook his head.

After a moment his dull face brightened, and, looking up at the small figure of the seven-year-old horseman, he said in the confidential tone of one who is sure of the efficacy of his charm:

"Rabbits! Bird! Want to see?"

Lord Montalembert was a very human little boy. He slid down from his pony in a twinkling, and was ready to start before his father could interpose a word.

"Come on," he said, peremptorily, and Pierrot went, nothing loth, while an admiring knot of villagers followed at a respectful distance, vowing that there never was such a fine, frank little lord as theirs. He was a merry, imperious little gentleman, sadly spoiled and accustomed to his own sweet will, but with a warm childish heart under all his velvet and lace ruffles. He went to Pierrot as the village children went to him—with a childish trustfulness that this was a friend, a bon camarade, in spite of mental deficiencies.

Digitized by Google

He was charmed with the two shy little rabbits, one of which was promptly given to him and carried back to the château by one of the dignified grooms, who looked dreadfully distressed over his wriggling charge; but Father Crow, with his one lame foot and his knowing wink, was a treasure such as all the great shops in Paris did not contain.

His father smiled to himself, and waited with commendable resignation until his son should be through, listening the while most courteously to what Père Milleux had to say about the dreadful leak which let the rain down in Grandmère Gabrielle's cottage, and made her dependent on her neighbours for shelter.

Père Milleux was quickly satisfied with the promise that a carpenter from the château should mend the bad roof, but it was quite another matter to persuade Lord Montalembert to leave the novel society of his humble friends.

Not forty paces below the little lordling lay—unconscious or dead.

That afternoon the marquis said to his lady:

"Our son has made a particular friend of that halfwitted boy in the village—the Innocent, I believe they call him—and seems to prefer his society above all things."

"He is fine fun, anyway," broke in the little lord in loyal defence of his new friend. "He knows all about trees and birds and things, and everybody likes him. He is ever so much nicer than cousin Victor. Come, chère maman, you will let him come here often and play with me?"

His chère maman stroked his cheek with her thin fingers, and smiled down into his eager face.

"From all that I hear, your Pierrot will be a safer companion for you than any groom or tutor we could employ."

That was Pierrot's golden summer. Wherever the little lordling wished to go, he followed like a faithful dog, guarding him from danger and fatigue, and looking after him in a thousand other ways. His plantive brown eyes would brighten at the first glimpse of the slender little figure in its black velvet suit and gay red sash, and the beautiful buckles on his shoes.

Like all summers, this one drew to a close.

Pierrot grieved silently when he was made to understand that within a few weeks his little master and playmate must leave him. He should be so lonely now.

He went up to the beautiful chateau quite early one day, and so heavy at heart that he did not see the agile little figure darting behind the shrubbery, until it sprang out with a great "Boh!"

"Come, Pierrot," coaxed the little lord, in his most insinuating tones, "take me over to the quarries. Jean says they are blasting to-day, and I wish to see it so badly. Besides, I shall not be here much longer."

Digitized by Google

Thus artfully adjured, Pierrot obediently started, and his small companion danced and chattered along by his side, singing gay songs and eating the sweets that he had purloined to fill his own and Pierrot's pockets.

The way to the great quarries was very long, and soon the little legs grew dreadfully tired. Pierrot took him upon his broad shoulders, and strode patiently on.

They had arrived on the outskirts of the quarry, and stood by the side of a huge block of marble, which had long rested there on the mountain side, when suddenly there was a great roar and rumble, and the ground rocked beneath their feet.

Pierrot knew that it was only the blast, although he cowered and trembled, being ever afraid of a loud noise, but the little lord, who had never heard it before, shrieked in affright, and, starting to run, tripped over a root and fell headlong, with a single sharp cry of:

"Pierrot!"

Pierrot started frantically after him, his teeth chattering in terror and anxiety lest his little charge be killed. Then he stopped and whirled round, as he heard a noise behind him.

The shock had loosened the great block of marble, and it was slowly tottering, as though uncertain whether to go tearing and rushing down the mountain side, or stay where it was.

Directly in its path, and not forty paces below, the little lordling lay huddled in all the brave finery of the velvet suit and red sash, one little foot twisted under him. Unconscious—or dead? Whichever it was, in another moment the pretty slight figure would be cruelly, remorselessly crushed under the awful weight that threatened to crash down upon him.

All this Pierrot saw, with his dull senses sharpened by love and peril, and as quick as a flash he had leaped under the tottering mass, and crouched at its base.

He had often seen the workmen put huge wedges under a block to steady it, and, as there was nothing better near enough, the wedge this time must be his own strong awkward body.

The great stone wavered a moment, and then settled, with a grinding, crunching, horrible sound, on human bones and flesh—settled and stayed, its delicate equilibrium restored.

Awful thrills of agony shot through Pierrot's crushed and tortured body. He could still see the figure of his beloved playmate and friend, now sitting up and looking around him in a dazed way, and sobbing a little because his leg hurt so, and because Pierrot had deserted him.

Then a merciful God sent kindly oblivion to Pierrot, and, with the last twinge of anguish twisting through his limbs, he dropped his head, and slept.

* * * * *

When a band of workmen came past an hour later, they found the little Lord Montalembert lying there with a broken leg, while scarcely forty paces above him, holding back destruction with his own body, now crushed and mangled to an almost shapeless mass, lay Pierrot, the Innocent, his white face turned in a last look of wistful appeal toward the child he had loved so faithfully and so well.

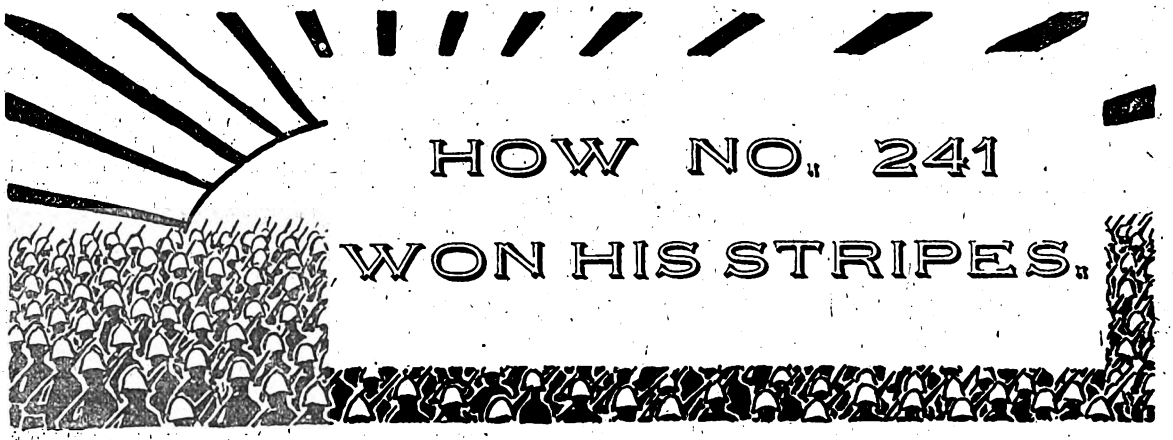
"Now was he not a remarkable boy, M'sieu?" asks Mère Misette, triumphantly, while all the women wipe their eyes sympathetically over the pathetic tale they have heard innumerable times. "There's a real hero, now! How many of your great men would have done it, eh? Easier to stand in front of a bellowing cannon M'sieu, than to crawl under a mountain of marble and have all the life cr-r-r-ushed out of one," rolling her "r" with such fearful effect that the round-eyed children quake with fear.

"And this is the superb grave stone the marquis had cut out of the very block that killed him—did you ever see a finer piece, M'sieu? And, when Pierrot was buried, everyone came from miles round, and the little lord, the sweet young gentleman, sobbed as though he had lost a brother. Madame la marquise, too, wept all during the beautiful sermon Père Milleux preached for Pierrot, and the marquis himself wiped his eyes. Ah, it was a grand funeral! He was indeed a brave lad, was our Pierrot."

And the stranger turns with new interest to the polished marble shaft, and bows his head reverently over the grave of a hero.

James Roberts.

Digitized by Google



CONSTABLE JOHN DIXON, Z Division, No. 241, was young and good looking. Constable Dixon was also ambitious. One stripe decorated the arm of his official coat already, and the goal of that ambition was to multiply that stripe by three.

The constable had other yearnings, chief of which was the desire to make Mary Hackett, the pretty housemaid at "The Cedars," Mrs. John Dixon, but this was also contingent upon the stripes.

Mary had more than once hinted at her willingness to content herself with the tunic as it stood, and the limited pay connected therewith, but John was wiser, and resisted the temptation; for in addition to being ambitious, he was likewise conscientious.

There was a feeble old woman living down in the country, to whom the loss of the few shillings weekly, her son sent her out of his pay, would have been a very serious loss indeed.

A constable's wage is not a very extravagant amount, and what remained to John, after his mother's allowance had been sent, would have sorely puzzled even those wise-acres, who write descriptive articles on "How to Keep House on £50 a Year!" to plan out into sufficient for the bare existence of a married couple.

So for the present, John possessed his soul in patience, contenting himself in the interim, while waiting for those extra stripes, with taking Mary an occasional Sunday trip to a bread and butter and shrimp tea at Gravesend, viâ the penny steamboat, to the gallery of a theatre, when his "night off duty," and her evening off happened to correspond, to say nothing of a frequent ten minutes chat at the front gate, under the shadow of the trees, which gave "The Cedars" its name.

Constable Dixon had not been long in the force—somewhere about four years—but thanks to his intelligence, and a natural aptitude for the work, he had been very successful. Thanks too, to his former experience as a farm hand, he had not that rooted objection to a wet jacket, or a cold corner, peculiar to the ordinary police officer, consequently he was always to be found upon his beat.

The result of all this was that No. 241 was trusted by his officers, and reckoned by his colleagues to be in a very fair way of promotion, an opinion in which John himself coincided.

In fact, from what the superintendent had recently let drop, No. 241 believed that the next "good case" which fell in his way, would get him the coveted step. From this it may be gathered that when on duty, John kept his weather eye open.

So it came about that on a certain evening of a certain week, when the road in which "The Cedars" stood, happened to be included in his beat, and John likewise happened to be passing, a seedy-looking individual, who after furtively watching the constable down the road, entered the grounds, did not escape his observation.

No. 241 had only caught a glimpse of the man as he slouched by, but there was something about his close-cropped head and peculiar gait, which, to the obs rvant constable, seemed to bear the hall-mark of Portland or Dartmoor.

The family at "The Cedars," which consisted of Mr. Adolphus Rosenberg—a Hatton Garden diamond merchant—his wife and daughter—were out of town for a day or two, so with the exception of the servants the house was unprotected.

Mr. Rosenberg, who was somewhat eccentric in his habits, frequently kept a large quantity of valuable gems in the house, preferring to have them under his immediate eye, at his private residence, and suffer the inconvenience of conveying them to and fro to Hatton Garden, which more than once has been the scene of extensive robberies.

John had observed the man's movements, and his suspicions were therefore at once aroused.

The police-officer who desires to get on, is no believer in the adage "Prevention is better than cure!" So affording the supposed burglar sufficient time to get to work, and chuckling as he went at the thought of giving Mary an ocular demonstration of his prowess, and with a passing glance at his left arm, upon which in his mind's eye he already saw those additional stripes, No. 241 stole back towards "The Cedars."

As he neared the gate, walking slowly—for official "brogues" are not the most noiseless footgear in the wo ld—he heard low voices on the other side of the wall.

So there were two of them, he thought. An entrance into the house had not yet been attempted, probably because the servants had not retired to bed—the hour was ten-thirty.

John stopped and listened.

"Now take care of yourself for my sake, if not for your own, Jim! And whatever you do, don't let John Dixon see you. He is on this beat, and as likely as not he'll be passing directly."

Digitized by Google

"Is Dixon a tall, smart-looking chap—clean-shaven—darkish?".

"Yes."

"Then there's no fear, for I passed him going down the road."

"That's all right! But you'd better go, one of the other servants might come out."

"Right! So long, old girl! See you again in a day or two."

"Yes. Good-night, Jim, dear!"

Then there was the sound of a kiss, and the man issuing from the gate, and catching sight of the lurking figure of the constable, abruptly took to his heels.

No. 241 was too dumfounded by what he had overheard to follow, even had there been an excuse for so doing, which, as far as he knew, there was not.

The stranger had evidently not entered the grounds with any nefarious design, or rather not with one which brought him within reach of the law—for the voice which John had heard in conversation with him was Mary's, and what to the miserable lover told its own tale, the kiss, which he had heard exchanged, was with Mary, too—Mary, upon whose faith, John would, a minute ago, have staked his life.

Before passing condemnation, the law mercifully gives the suspected one the benefit of the doubt. John decided to do likewise, and throwing open the gate, found himself face to face with a trim little figure, looking very attractive, the poor fellow thought, in her black frock, with its white collar and cuffs, her white muslin apron, and natty little cap with its broad white strings.

"Good gracious! How you startled me, John!" she cried, emphasising the fact with a start.

"So it seems," he rejoined, shortly.

He had thrown the light of his lantern upon her, and instead of the usual smiling face, it had shown him one strangely disturbed.

She held up her head for the customary salutation, but John, forgetting his resolution of a moment earlier, thrust her at arm's length.

"Who was that man who has just left you?"

"What man?"

The question was evidently but to gain time, and her lover scorned a reply.

She gave a half-hysterical little laugh and went on:

"Oh, you saw him, then, did you? Did you see his face?"

"No!"

"Ah!"

There was something of dismay, something of relief in the exclamation.

"Who was the man?" he repeated sternly.

"Oh, nobody in particular"—and she seized his arm and endeavoured to peer up into his face—"Why, surely you're not jealous, John?"

"Oh no, not at all! Why should I be? I'm only curious to know who the chap is to keep so carefully out of my sight."

A little catch came in her voice.

"He's only—someone I knew years ago—an old——"

"Sweetheart, I s'pose!"

"No indeed!"—reproachfully—"Only there are reasons why I don't want you to see him. But there's no harm in them."

"And no harm in your kissing each other either?"

"No, John! Truly there isn't!"

"Ha-ha-ha! What a fool you must take me for! Now for the last time, lass," and in his agitation he gripped the girl's shoulder so fiercely that she winced, "will you tell me who he was?"

She hesitated, then replied slowly:

"I—I can't, John—there!"

He drew a deep breath. His face flushed darkly, and he abruptly snatched away his hand.

"Then I'll tell you my opinion on the subject. You're getting tired of waiting for me, and wondering whether I'll ever get my stripes. Like many another of your sort, you think it's as well to have two strings to your bow, in case one fails. Well, I don't intend to be one of 'em any longer."

She went very pale, and her apron, which she was twisting and untwisting, began to tear, still she answered quietly enough.

"Then you mean to break off with me?"

"I do."

The answer came through his clenched teeth.

She sighed heavily.

"You'll regret it by and bye."

"I'll chance it, my girl! In the meantime, I wish you joy of the other chap, for if he isn't a goal-bird, then I'm as big a fool as you've tried to make of me,"—with which startling affirmation, No. 241 turned upon his heel and strode away, leaving Mary sobbing violently.

Despite John's firm resolution to think no more of his—as he supposed—faithless sweetheart, he found the task he had set himself was not one easily learned; and a week or two later, while striving for strength, he was guilty of very great weakness.

Patrolling past "The Cedars" in the small hours, he was seized with an irresistible desire to open the gate and steal into the grounds, which proceeding was merely to give himself the painful satisfaction of staring up at the window of Mary's sleeping room, where perhaps, at that very moment, so he told himself, she lay dreaming of his rival.

The servant's apartments overlooked the back of the house, and thither, treading noiselessly over the soft turf which bordered the paths, No. 241 made his way.

He had expected to find the house in darkness, but to his intense surprise, in one of the lower rooms he saw a light.

John rubbed his eyes, thinking they must have deceived him, for he had no sooner perceived it, than it had gone. But suddenly it came again, and as before, as suddenly disappeared.

The constable's intelligence quickly supplied him with an explanation of the phenomenon. The light proceeded from a dark lantern, which was being used by someone within. A burglary was evidently taking place.

Instantly P. C. Dixon's senses were on the alert, and sinking the lover in the official, he applied himself to a search for the means by which an entry had been made.

He found them in the shape of a small window in the basement, from which a pane of glass had been removed and the catch forced back, in a manner which showed him that the man he had to deal with, was no novice at the work.

Making use of the same means, the constable entered in his turn, and removing his boots, crept upstairs.

On reaching the landing, he perceived a glimmer of light proceeding from a room he suspected to be the library in which Mr. Rosenberg kept his stock-in-trade.

Softly turning the handle, John stepped within and by the light of the lantern which stood on a convenient chair, he saw that the door of a safe stood open, while a rough-looking individual was kneeling before it, examining the contents.

Digitized by Google

Alarmed by the faint noise of the constable's entrance, the man sprang to his feet, and uttering a fierce oath made for the door.

In shadow as the room was, as the burglar came towards him, John's recognition of him was instantaneous. It was none other than "his rival!"

A savage joy shot through No. 241's breast at the discovery, and as the man attempted to dash by him, John seized him by the throat, and after a sharp struggle—for the other was of powerful build—rolled with him to the floor.

There, until the constable's face came within the light of the lantern, the struggle, which was silent and deadly, continued, then the thief suddenly ceased to resist.

"Are you John Dixon?" he gasped.

"I am!" was the exultant reply, "and you are my prisoner!"

"All right! As it's you, I give in!" and quietly the man held out his wrists for the handcuffs."

"If it had been anyone else," he went on, "they should have made a 'stiff 'un' of me before I'd 'ave been took. But as it's you, I ain't sorry, for you'll get your stripes, then you and Mary can get married right away."

"What do you mean?"

No. 241 was so astonished by his prisoner's words that he not only omitted to handcuff him but released his grasp.

The other made no effort to take advantage.

"I mean if I'd been able to get clear away with the 'swag,' I'd have taken a trip across the 'Pond,' but as you've spoilt my chance of that, I may as well go back to 'chokey,' and do you and my sister a turn."

"Your sister?"

Dixon turned his lantern full upon the fellow's upturned face, endeavouring to trace out, in the crime-stained features some likeness to Mary.

The man gave a hoarse laugh as he observed.

"It's true—worse luck for her! I'm Mary Hackett's brother. You wouldn't think it to look at me, would you?"

John shook his head.

"A spell among the stone quarries soon works a change in a chap, and for the worse, most times. That's who I am all the same. Jim Hackett, the convict who broke gaol a month ago, and who your chaps have been looking for ever since. A bit of luck then, for you, ain't it mate?"

John Dixon made no reply.

He understood Mary's conduct now, and was bitterly reproaching himself for his want of faith—thinking what recompense he could make for his unjust suspicions—how make his peace with the girl he had wronged.

He quickly arrived at a decision. There was only one way. Jim Hackett must be allowed to go free. Grave breach of duty as this would be there was no other course. He could not, he told himself, accept promotion at the cost of the brother for whose safety Mary had been ready to sacrifice so much.

"Get up," he said, "and make your escape while you can. I can't take you, and what's more, I won't. Quick man, quick, someone is stirring upstairs."

Hackett bounded to his feet, and seizing the constable's hand, wrung it gratefully.

"You're a good chap, and if there were more like you, there'd be less like me. Tell Mary that whatever happens, Jim Hackett will go straight from this minute," and the burglar sped down the stairs.

A minute later an elderly man entered, carrying a lighted candle in one hand, and a revolver in the other, and in whom John had no difficulty in recognising the diamond merchant.

His eye fell upon No. 241, and an expression of relief swept over his face.

"A constable!" he ejaculated. "What's the matter? What's been going on?"

John pointed to the open safe.

"A burglary has been attempted, sir," he faltered, "but I don't think any damage has been done more than to the safe."

Mr. Rosenberg in his anxiety for the safety of his gems, failed to notice the constable's confusion.

"No! Nothing has been taken," he said, "but"—observing the disturbed state of the room—"there's been a struggle. Burglar got away, eh?"

"Yes, sir!"

"Humph! Well, as the diamonds are safe, that's a minor detail. You were quite right not to leave the room until someone arrived. Most officers would have troubled more about making a capture than saving the property. I shall certainly recommend your discretion to the authorities. In the meantime, take this!" and he thrust notes for a handsome amount into John's hand.

No. 241, being conscientious, made a half movement to decline it, at the same time feeling a strong inclination to avow his unworthiness of the praise which was being passed upon him.

But on second thoughts, he resolved to sleep over the matter, and also to consult Mary. He did both, and the result was, that No. 241 retained the notes, kept his own counsel, and in due time got his promotion—and his Mary; while Jim Hackett was never re-taken, and is now a useful member of society.

Had John Dixon been the creation of a novelist, he would have confessed his deriliction of duty, and been dismissed the force. Being a real personage, his conscientiousness had its limitations.

Hubert Bartlett.

Digitized by Google

THE Strand was at its busiest. The July sun beat down, mercilessly hot, upon men's heads. But of all the much-enduring throng the most to be pitied were the sandwich-men, a long dreary line of whom moved with sadly-solemn deliberation along the gutter-way of the great thoroughfare. Boards on back and breast, overhead boards carried high on shoulder-irons, announced the forthcoming early production, at the Theatre Royal Saint Georges, of a new play.

In itself this was no great novelty, although the title of the piece, Bathsheba, had about it a decidedly daring ring, while it certainly promised something out of the common in dramatic experiment.

But it was not so much that which they set forth, as it was one in particular of the twenty or so human derelicts themselves that irresistibly attracted att ntion.

Hunger-pinched, bowed of shoulder, his eyes seeking the ground, he walked as a man in a dream. Old he could not be, in spite of his iron-grey hair, and the bleached stubble of a fortnight's growth of beard.

There was something, too, altogether different to that of his comrades, in his garb, which evidently like its wearer, had seen better days, being well cut although woefullly shabby,

Just where Wellington Street runs into the main artery, continuing i s course over Waterloo Bridge, a block occurred in the road traffic, the long line of peripatetic advertisments halting in obedience to the uplifted hand of authority.

It was then that the man in question lifted his eyes for a moment, to meet those of a gentleman, of spic-and-span appearance, hurrying by from the opposite direction.

As hardly believing what he saw, the latter stopped short in sheer bewilderment.

"It isn't Eliot, is it?" he said in a low tone to the man in the gutter. "Heavens! it is, though! Man!" gripping him by the arm, regardless of the curious stares of the passers-by, "Come out of that infernal crowd! here, up this passage," half-pushing, half-dragging his companion into the comparative privacy of the Lyceum Pit Entrance. "Take off th se wretched boards," excitedly helping him in the process. "Throw them down there, anywhere! they belong to me. Now, tell me! Why don't you speak?"

The other leaned against the wall, reluctance and shame still seal ng his lips.

"Come, Eliot! we'll go into a quiet little restaurant I know of hard by, and over a bit of lunch you shall tell me just so much as you please, and how I can in any way help you."

"You are very good, Barker; as you will, I am incapable of argument or contention. But what about these?" pointing down to the discarded boards.

"Oh! never mind them. Here, you!" calling to the hindmost man of the string, just preparing to move on. "Go you up to the theatre, and tell them to send a boy for these. Sharp! say I sent you—Mr. Barker."

Within five minutes Eric Eliot and his friend were snugly seated in the little restaurant aforesaid, and then the former, under the influence of a generous and much-needed meal, told his tale.

It was an eminently sad one. He a wealthy man, had married a young girl, beautiful, but headstrong, vain and extravagant. Three years after the wedding-day his wife's repeated absences from home, her neglect, not only of himself, but of their one child, a wins me little daughter, together with an utter disregard of his financial position, now seriously involved, rendered necessary some de isive action on his part. This, however, was anticipated by her flight. No letter, no message gave him any clue to her intentions or whereabouts.

Two days afterwards he discovered that he was irretrievably ruined. Bills to an enormous amount came pouring in, and after making over everything to his creditors, and consigning his h pless little one to the care of an old nurse of his own, he left his West End home with a twenty-pound note in his pocket, and blank desolation before him.

This was two years ago, and all that he had undergone during that terrible period he would not say, his pride refused to stoop to a disclosure of mere personal privation, even to so genuine a sympathiser as Frank Barker. Sympathy, to such a nature, is always repugnant.

"And you haven't seen your wife since?"

"Neither seen or heard of her. But let us change the subject, Barker; as you may imagine, it is not one the most grateful fo me."

"I'm sorry, old man! I ought to have known that, but I'm really so wishful to be of some service to you that—well, what can I do for you?"

"Get or give me work of some, of any find. I want to earn a living. This," bitterly, indicating with his hand his back and breast, "is but death in life. A university man, and not, I think, a fool, I seem to be banned. People laugh and sneer, are sometimes downright insulting when I apply to them for employment, implying by their manner, if not by word of mouth that there must be something shady about me, or I should not be as I am."

"Hard! very hard! I know the kind of folk you mean. Pharisees every one of them. But let me make a suggestion. How would this do for a start? It so happens that I want an intelligent, trustworthy man to take the one supernumerary part in our new play at the St. George's. There is practically nothing to do, except in the great scene. The salary would be—well—four guineas a week. What do you say? Would it suit you?"

Digitized by Google

"Barker, your're a good fellow, but your're a bad dissembler. I know the market value of a super's services, that they are far and away below four guineas a week."

"Hang your scruples, Eliot! that's the worst of people like you, your confounded pride, and conscientious stickling for what you believe to be the right thing are always barring the way."

"Perhaps I oughtn't to have said that," said Eliot, gently, yet earnestly, "I beg your pardon, it certainly was ungrateful."

"Then you accept?"

"Yes, only too thankfully; tell me all about it."

"Not now, to-morrow, when you come to the theatre. Now, don't jump down my throat at what I am going to say, but subbing, you know, is a super's institution and prerogative, and so you must allow me to give you a week's salary in advance," laying the money on the table as he spoke.

"I'll take it," said Eliot, "because, in a way, I am going to earn it."

"To-morrow, then," said Barker, wringing the other's hand, as they parted outside the restaurant, "I shall expect you not later than eleven. Good-bye!"

* * * * *

The Theatre Royal, St. George's, is a fashionable house; in not exactly the traditionally theatrical quarter of the town, but upon the fringe of it. It was run by a man moving much in Society, and by a natural sequence it was upon the immediate patronage of Society that its fortunes depended. The plays produced upon its stage were of the drawing-room, chit-chat, and "exclusive" order, "caviare" to the multitude, but to the "elect" milk and honey.

The new play, Bathsheba, while mainly dealing with high life, was in the nature of a departure from accustomed and familiar fashion. It had a more serious "metier" than usual, and being written by a man whose views upon things social tended almost in the direction of the revolutionary, it was an experiment fraught with no little risk to the producer.

Eliot duly kept his appointment next morning, and was carefully coached in his duties, by stage-manager Barker.

The rehearsals of the piece were over, but as the super's sole entrance consisted only of the delivery of a card, and a message of half-a-dozen words, it was agreed that it would be all right upon the opening night, a week ahead.

It may be briefly premised that the scheme of the play was just a modern version of the old Biblical story.

"Bathsheba," said Barker, "is a woman who succumbs to temptation, the tempter, one Sir Guy Etheridge, being the prototype of King David. By the way Eliot, have you seen our new leading lady, Miss Sara Cleave?"

"No! I haven't been in a theatre for years."

"Well, she, of course, plays the title-role, and although she is a bit of a spit-fire, and confoundedly imperious, I think she'll make a big success in the part. She's only been upon the stage about a couple of years. You know, society beauty, separation, scandal, and all the rest of it; but she's an actress, and a fine one."

"A rara avis!"

"Quite. You're all right now aren't you? Ask for me when you come down to the theatre this night week, and make it as near seven as possible."

* * * * *

It so happened that Eric Eliot on the night of the production of Bathsheba was oppressed with a strange feeling of coming disaster. Whether it were the failure of the piece, or something more akin to his own personal interests he could not determine. Anyway, as he dressed the feeling of depression strengthened so much that, knowing that his presence upon the stage would not be required before the middle of the third act, he elected to remain quietly in the dressing room till called..

Every now and again could he hear distinctly the the roar of applause going up from a crowded and enthusiastic house.

Evidently the play was going splendidly.

In the course of about two hours Barker sent the call-boy for him. The first scene of the third act was near its conclusion.

"I haven't a minute," breathlessly said the stage manager, "look out for my signal to go on. You enter through that curtained archway, don't forget that."

"I quite understand," replied Eliot. "There's no fear, I think, of my making a mistake."

"That's all right, then. They're shifting the scene now! I must be off!" and he rushed away.

Impelled by a force he has never been able quite to explain, save that his heart must have been the prompter, he moved to where the heavy plush curtains of the archway hid him from the view of the audience. He could see the whole of the stage, though, distinctly.

Sir Guy was writing at a table. The actor playing the part was a man of five-and-thirty, or thereabouts, The character he was assuming, a blasé man of the world.

Digitized by Google

fitted him like a glove. Among his professional intimates as also in the society in which he moved he was known as the "Butterfly." With a superlative self-opinion of his own powers of attraction and fascination, he was never without, at least, one string to his bow.

The new leading lady was his latest flame, and he considered himself as being fortunate in that the play demanded passionate love-making as between himself and Bathsheba.

Eric paid but little attention to him, he was looking, curiously expectant, for the entrance of the exponent of the title part.

Almost before he was aware of her vicinity, she passed him, brushing his feet with the folds of her dress. He saw a tall woman, of regal pose and figure, move towards the baronet at the table. Sir Guy turns his head, springs to his feet, and taking her in his arms imprints upon her lips a passionate kiss.

It was then that the watcher saw her face. He could not err. There was but one face in the whole world like that.

Convulsively grasping a moment at the curtain for support, his soul then leaped to life. With a cry that must have been heard across the footlights, he rushed through the archway towards the pair. Seizing the actor by the throat with one hand, and forcing back with the other the now pallid representative of Uriah's wife, the maddened man shook the pseudo Sir Guy, as does a terrier a rat, hurling him with a mighty effort sheer over the table at which he had been lately sitting.

All was now confusion and hurly-burly.

"Ring down! ring down!" shouted Barker, frantically.

With a crash the act-drop fell, almost crushing in its hurried descent the head of the actor, who had rolled perilously near to it.

Barker's next business was with Eliot.

"You've ruined me and the piece!" he cried.

Eliot stood, altogether oblivious of the manager's presence, gazing fixedly upon the face of the actress, who had not stirred.

She knew him, and all her former contemptuous feeling for him seemed to die away in the glory of his anger. It might be, too, that his sudden and unexpected appearance had much to do with this revulsion of sentiment. Happy, away from him, she had never been; now she would give anything, life itself almost, for one word of his lips, one touch of the hand from him she had so deeply wronged.

"Who is this man?" cried the actor to Barker, and painfully rising to his feet.

"Her husband!" said Eric triumphantly, moving a step nearer to Bathsheba.

A sudden gleam of glory and of hope illumines his face. He looks at her with his heart in his eyes.

Stealing up to him his wife places her hand timidly upon his shoulder.

"Eric! Eric! I did not know you cared so much!"

* * * * *

In a certain western suburb there live a man, his wife, and their little daughter than whom I know not a happier trio.

But a humble daily toiler in the great city, the man ever turns at the day's end, with brightened eye and eager step towards his home.

The woman who greets him is beautiful, but it is the beauty of a transfigured nature. And as the sun goes down it is upon a picture no wall could ever receive, because it is unpaintable.

RALPH.

THE LATEST CATCH PHRASE:

"Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?"

Read the three startling new developments in the great Pearson's Weekly scheme.

DEVELOPMENT NO. 1.

FIVE TEN-POUND LADIES

have been dispatched all over the country. Each of them is, needless to say, very charming, and will give up the Sealed Envelope to the lady who fulfils the conditions mentioned in this week's Pearson's Weekly. No gentlemen need apply.

DEVELOPMENT NO. 2.

It has come to the knowledge of the editor of Pearson's Weekly that there are many thousands of readers who, by force of circumstances, cannot leave their homes for any length of time, and who do not, therefore, enjoy the opportunities for coming into contact with the Ten-Pound Men who are at present wandering about the Kingdom.

Moreover, there are many thousands of people who do not care to approach strangers on the subject of the £10 notes. They are too modest and fear a rebuff.

In order, so far as it is possible, to remove the handicap placed upon such people, the editor of Pearson's Weekly has prepared a dainty little card with the words: HAVE YOU GOT THAT TEN-POUND NOTE? printed in scarlet upon it. All you have to do is to either that of a private house or that of a shop, and if one of the Ten-Pounders happens to pass along your street, and sees this notice, he will at once call, and upon your producing a copy of the current number of Pearson's Weekly he will hand you over a Sealed Envelope entitling you to the sum of £10.

PLACE THIS CARD IN YOUR WINDOW,

Address a halfpenny post-card to The Ten-Pound Card Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London W.C., and you will receive one of these cards under cover and post free.

The cards contain full details of the Ten-Pound scheme.

DEVELOPMENT No. 3.

The latest song: "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?" is being sung every night by Mr. R. G. KNOWLES in various London music-halls. Copies of the song will be ready on October 8th, and may be obtained at 1s. 6d. each.

Ten-Pound Notes have already been claimed at London (Ludgate Hill), Norwich, Southend, Wimbledon, Southampton, Brixton, Lincoln, London (East Central), Worcester, and St. Albans, and there are still thirty others going begging.

Full particulars will also be found in Pearson's Weekly, and fresh developments of the scheme appear in the Daily Express every day.

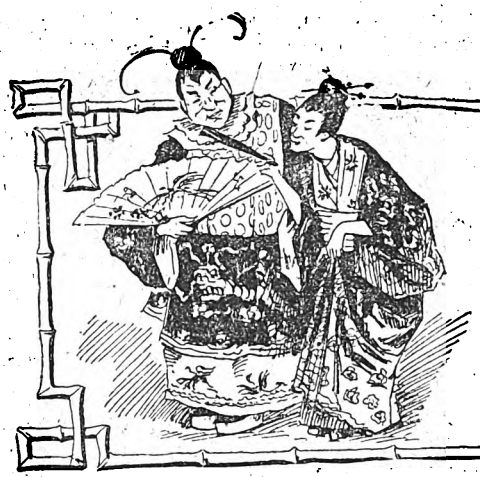
The original Sealed Envelopes by which claims have been made can be seen at the following places:

Mr. John Lotan's, Ludgate Hill Station; Mr. H. E. Baker's, offices of Eastern Daily Press, Norwich; Inspector Lee's, Cooper Brothers, Cliff Town Road, Southend; Mr. C. Wright's, Crown Hotel, Southampton; Mr. W. W. Tonkin's, Lang Sims, 437 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXV.—He Exercises his Will Power to Stop Smoking.

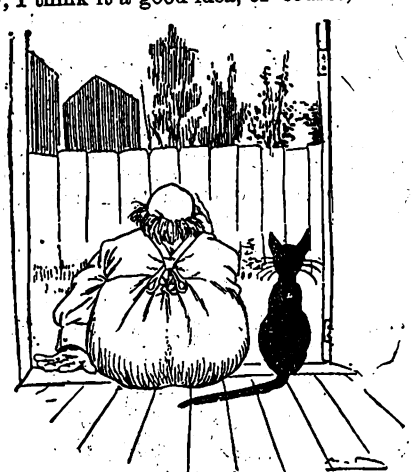
Mr. Bowser came home to dinner the other night looking a good deal worried, but all of Mrs. Bowser's inquiries as to what had happened were put aside until dinner was finished. Then he made a considerable ado about pulling out his cigar case and breaking up three or four cigars and tossing them out of the back window. As he had been an inveterate smoker for fifteen years, and as he had treated the advice of friends and the family doctor with contempt, Mrs. Bowser had a right to feel a good deal of surprise at his action. As she looked at him in an inquiring way he crossed his hands under his coat-tails and fixed a stern gaze upon her and said:

"Mrs. Bowser, you behold before you a man of will power."

"You have decided to stop smoking?" she queried.

"I have. That is, I shall break off for a year and give my system a chance to throw off the nicotine. After thinking the matter over I have fully and firmly decided. It was smoking that ailed me all the time, but I was reluctant to admit it. It has given me about nine different diseases, but if I stop now and drink plenty of butter-milk I am in hopes to restore my health. Have you no congratulations?"

"Why, I think it a good idea, of course," she replied as she remembered fifty other occasions when he had come to the same decision. "Yes, it will be a good thing for you if you can only carry it out."



At the back door.

"If I can only!" he indignantly repeated. "Of course I can carry it out. All that is needed is the exercise of a little will power. I shall hanker for a smoke now and then, but all I have got to do is to stand firm. I should despise myself if I felt that I couldn't get the better of a habit."

Mrs. Bowser looked anxious, and the cat came up the basement stairs with a grin on her face, while Mr. Bowser sat down to his newspaper. He kept quiet for five minutes. Then he rose up with the remark:

"You bet I can stop smoking! If I thought I couldn't, I'd go and hang myself! However, as I don't want any sudden shock to my nervous system I think I'd better——"

"You'd better smoke half a cigar?" suggested Mrs. Bowser with a smile.

"Never. Do you take me for a fish-worm? I have stopped smoking for a year, and that settles it. I was thinking, however, that I might chew cloves or spice or something to divert my thoughts."

He went down to the pantry and got a handful of roasted coffee berries and then sat down for awhile on the basement stairs to call himself names for throwing away three sixpenny cigars instead of putting them away somewhere. The cat came and sat down beside him and plainly showed her sympathy, but at the end of five minutes he gave her a slap and ascended to the sitting-room to announce that he was going over to the chemist's for liquorice root. He was about to put on his hat when he noticed a smile on Mrs. Bowser's face, and he turned on her with:

"Oh, you are grinning are you? You think it will turn out as it has before, but I'll show you to the contrary. If I was told that my life depended on my smoking, I wouldn't take a single puff. After living with me another fifteen years perhaps you'll find out that I'm a man of my word."

"I have always known that you had great will power," she quietly replied.

"You bet I have, and I'll give you a surprise over this smoking business. They say that if you chew liquorice root it will take away the longing, but let her long and be hanged!"

During the next hour Mr. Bowser hunted the pantr for spice, cinnamon, nutmeg and other things, and he even went so far as to sprinkle a piece of raw cabbage with cayenne pepper and shed a liberal supply of tears as he worried it down. The consolation in each instance was brief.

Digitized by Google

As Mrs. Bowser watched him prowling about she knew what would happen sooner or later, but she was powerless to avert it. As he paced back and forth, his nerves on edge for a smoke, he suddenly discovered a hairpin on the floor. It was a cheap steel hairpin, costing about a fifth of a farthing, but it was enough to serve his purpose.

"Woman, is it any wonder that we are going to the workhouse at a gallop?" he demanded as he picked up the pin and held it out towards her with flushed face.

"It dropped out of my hair," she replied as she took it and found a place for it.

"Certainly it did, and if I hadn't discovered it it would have gone into the ash-bin where millions more have preceded it. Is it any wonder I can't save a penny in the year."

"Please don't make such a fuss about one cheap little hairpin. If I lost a thousand a year you wouldn't be five shillings out of pocket."

"It's not the cost of that hair-pin, but the principle of the thing. A wife who will waste hairpins will waste clothing and fuel and gas and provisions. If I wanted proof that you were a reckless, extravagant wife, that hairpin would be living evidence. I have borne and borne, but I tell you the limit has been reached!"

"If you had been smoking you wouldn't have noticed such an insignificant trifle," she said as he walked up and down and the cat took good care to keep out of his way.

"No, of course not!" he shouted. "If my senses had been steeped in nicotine my eyes would have been blinded to your extravagances. I have been your victim for years and years, but my eyes are opened at last. Beginning to-morrow morning, I shall take the full management of this house into my own hands and make a wonderful change."

On a seat in the back garden.

Mrs. Bowser was wise enough to make no answer, and as he descended to the basement to hunt for something more to chew she slipped upstairs.

He missed her when he came back, and he did not know whether to follow her and make a fuss about the last gas bill or to look over his papers with a view of applying for a separation at eight o'clock in the morning. The question was still undecided in his mind when the thought of a smoke flashed across his mind.

"No, never!" he exclaimed as he drove it out. "I am a man of will power. I have said I wouldn't smoke and I won't."

He had found a lemon on his last trip to the pantry, and he sucked away at it and mused:

"All I've got to do is to put my will to work, and I'll show Mrs. Bowser that it is the will of a Napoleon."

The lemon seemed to increase his longing instead of blunting it, and after exchanging it for a stick of cinnamon he mused:

"Still, the question arises if stopping so suddenly won't give the nervous system a shock? If I should reduce my cigars to two or three a day?"

A gleam of hope came to his heart and a smile to his face.

"Reduce to three a day at first, and then gradually to none at all. Of course, I could stop straight off from to-night and never smoke again. I've got an iron wi l——"

He suddenly remembered that he had a long, black cigar in the pocket of a coat hanging up in the cupboard—one given him by the family butcher as he paid his last bill—and he could hear his own heart beating.

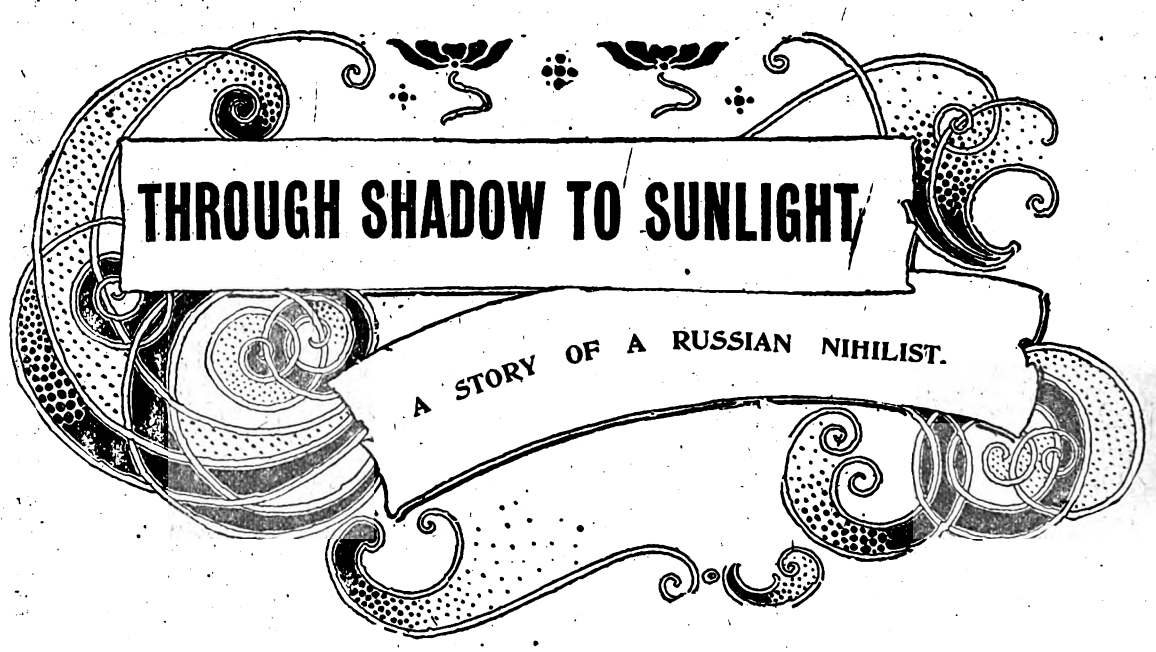
Five minutes later Mrs. Bowser looked out of a back window and saw Mr. Bowser on a seat in the back garden. He was puffing away at that cigar and had the cat by his side. There was a smile of acute satisfaction on the face of each, and as she looked he slapped his leg and laughed and chuckled and said to himself:

"You may take it from me that Mrs. Bowser is one of the most careful and economical wives in this land, and if she wants five pounds pin money in the morning she can have it!"

M. QUAD.

Next week: "He Turns to Root Beer as a Family Tonic."

Digitized by Google



PARGITT'S PRIVATE DETECTIVE AGENCY.

THIS legend was painted on a top-floor window in a street off the Strand. Occupying a room with a blackened ceiling, and no decorative or superfluous furniture, sat the Firm. He was fat, rubicund of visage, and to the least observant eye an ex-police officer. With a look of elation he dipped a pen in the ink, made a mystic flourish, and wrote:

YOUR HIGHNESS,—Obeying your instructions I have made all necessary inquiries concerning Israel Baretsky, bric-à-brac dealer of Wardour Street. He is a man of quiet habits, and has no suspicious associates.

He is quite blind, and spends his Sundays near the Marble Arch, listening to Socialistic doctrines. Baretsky is a widower, and has a daughter nineteen years of age. Her name is Ziska, and she is of great beauty. I have also ascertained that nineteen years ago he came into collision with the Russian police at St Petersburg. He was then a member of a Secret Society of Nihilist tendencies. The head of the group was a certain Count Nouvoroff, a Polish nobleman. The police raided the club, upon which occasion the house was fired by the conspirators, the Count losing his life in the flames, and Baretsky his sight. So far as I have learnt Baretsky is now quite unconnected with any Anarchist group. With regard to his means, he appears to be in comfortable circumstances.

Waiting your further instructions,

I am,

Your Highness's

Most obedient servant,

JAMES PARGITT.

Descending the stairs the detective carefully deposited the letter in the nearest pillar-box.

During the day he received a reply.

Princess Sophie Manicheff has received Mr. Pargitt's letter; so far the information acquired is satisfactory. The Princess herewith incloses cheque for services rendered. Her sole object was to ascertain the respectability of Mr. Baretsky as a bric-à-brac dealer. Will Mr. Pargitt supplement his inquiries by calling upon Mr. Baretsky, and propose to him the purchase of Princess Manicheff's collection.

Pargitt smiled, but he was as discreet as he was ready-witted, and set off therefore, without delay, for Soho.

The cosmopolitan denizens of the neighbourhood had melted away to cafés and restaurants, and Wardour Street was well-nigh deserted. The shop, when the detective reached it, was in semi-gloom. Through the half-open door he saw into the inner room, where a light was burning. It revealed the blind dealer and his daughter.

Pargitt entered the shop. The slight noise he made was evidently unheard, and he stood for a moment in the shadow. The place was crammed with curios of every description, old helmets, French Liberty knives, bits of faded tapestry, ivory carvings, fans and pottery.

The detective rapped sharply upon the floor with his stick: "Shop!" he cried.

Ziska came forward and turned up the gas.

In a few words Pargitt explained the object of his visit. Whilst he was speaking Baretsky joined them. Save for his infirmity the dealer was a tall, handsome man.

"The name of the lady who wishes to dispose of her collection is Princess Sophie Manicheff, and her address is 171 Grosvenor Square."

The name of the princess had a curious effect on Baretsky. His hand went out, and touched a piece which stood upon an old cabinet. It fell with a crash to the floor. Ziska turned towards her father with a look of alarm. He was trembling violently.

"Father!" she cried, with affectionate concern, "are you ill?"

"No! no!" he said to her, striving to control himself, "it's only the heat, child."

Then to Pargitt:

"Tell the Princess that I will attend to her wishes to-morrow."

"Very well," replied the detective. "Good-night."

Pargitt walked down Wardour Street deep in thought. Coupling the conduct of Baretsky with the transparent "sole reason" of the Princess's letter, it was certainly suspicious. The instincts of the police-officer were aroused, and instead of going back to his den, he made for New Scotland Yard. He wondered whether a warrant under the Extradition Act (particularly with a reward attached) had ever been issued for the arrest of Baretsky for any crime against the laws of Russia.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

The marriage of Princess Sophie Manicheff was a failure. The man of her romantic choice was a certain Count Ivan Nouvoroff, a poor Polish nobleman of good family. He was handsome, and everything that a fine manly nature should be; but being also a dreamer and a visionary, his altruistic ideas soon created a gulf between them.

Soon after the honeymoon the spirit not only of conjugal, but of political opposition grew to abnormal proportions. After a terrible quarrel, during which his wife upbraided him with neglect, disloyalty and a thousand other things which come so tripplingly from the tongue of an angry woman, a mutual separation was agreed upon; the Count taking charge of the issue of the marriage, a baby girl. Six months later she heard of her husband's death, during the raid upon the Nihilist rendezvous.

This tragedy seems to have melted the ice of the Princess's nature; she wept and mourned for him, devoting her whole energies to the search for their child, who, strange to say, disappeared the day after the Count's death. She had now pursued the quest for many years, and was at last, she told herself, upon the brink of a discovery, the possibilities of which startled even herself.

The day following the detective's visit to Soho, the Princess remained at home, anxiously awaiting the promised arrival of Baretsky. As the little French clock on the mantelpiece chimed eleven, the strain upon her nerves became almost unbearable. She turned to look at her face in a mirror, and there saw reflected the figure of a tall, graceful girl, who must have entered without sound.

The unexpected always happens, and in this case the surprise was startling and bewildering. Looking for the man who, she believed, could alone relieve her heart of its load of anxiety and maternal longing, it was only natural that the advent of someone altogether different would, at first, disappoint and depress her.

The first to speak was Ziska.

"Madame," she said gently, "you are the Princess Sophie Manicheff?"

Was it the voice of the girl, or was it something in the expression of her features, the poise of her head, the colour of her hair, that carried the elder woman's thoughts back nearly twenty years, to an ever haunting memory.

"Child," she said at length, with trembling lips, "Who are you? whence come you?"

"Madam," returned Ziska, wondering in her own mind at the other's strangely moved manner. "I am sent by my father, Israel Baretsky, of Wardour Street, to discuss with you the purchase of your Highness's collection."

"You!—a girl!—you!" exclaimed the Princess in amazement, surprised for the moment out of her self-absorption in her one great life theme, "What know you of such matters, or who taught you, a mere child? Tell me, why did not Baretsky come himself?"

"Madam knows," replied the girl deferentially, and yet with a sweet smile, "that my father is blind; but she does not know, perhaps, that his sense of touch is as eyes to him, and that it has enabled him to teach me, so that I can now be of use to him, while between us we can judge and buy, and sell."

"Marvellous! but I think, to save time, you had better, perhaps, go and see my pretty things. I will ring for a guide for you," suiting the action to the word

Ziska then left the room upon her visit of inspection. In a short time she returned. The Princess gazed at her long and tenderly, and then handed her an English Society newspaper, drawing her attention to a marked paragraph. It announced the approaching marriage of the Princess Sophie Manicheff with a prominent member of the Russian diplomatic service.

"Take this paper, and when you reach home, read this paragraph to your father," said the Princess.

With hungry eyes she watched Ziska from the window till she disappeared, and with a half-sob she cast herself upon a lounge.

"Pray God!" she gasps, "that my ruse may succeed."

That night the Princess did not attend any society functions. She sat alone in her room with the lamps unlit, waiting, listening, her heart wildly beating.

At last a name was spoken which brought her trembling to her feet. With panting breath she heard footsteps slowly ascending the stairs.

Their sound ceased, and she saw Baretsky standing in the gloom of the room. She stole to his side, and took his hand. "My husband!" she sobbed, "do you forgive me?"

The blind man put out his hand, which touched her hair.

"For years," he said, brokenly, "I have hidden myself from you, under the name of Baretsky. Now, only to save you from committing a great sin, have I, blind, helpless, and a burden sought your presence."

"But suppose," cried the Princess wildly, "that the report is untrue?"

The count dropped his hand, and moved backward a pace.

"If it be untrue," he exclaimed hoarsely, "why did you send the report to me?"

"Because," cried his wife passionately, "I love you! I am older, wiser, and I know now that my life is a waste without you."

"You shall have your daughter," said the Count sadly, "but I—I must go, Sophie."

"No! no!" she cried, "if you love me you will stay, and we will together take up the threads of life again."

* * * * *

Note (belated) from detective Pargitt to the Princess Sophie Manicheff:

> Your Highness,—I have just discovered that Israel Baretsky was killed in the fire at St. Petersburg, and that Count Ivan Nouvoroff has been passing under his name.

Telegram from the Princess Sophie Manicheff to detective Pargitt:

> I knew it long ago.

Ralph Enderby.

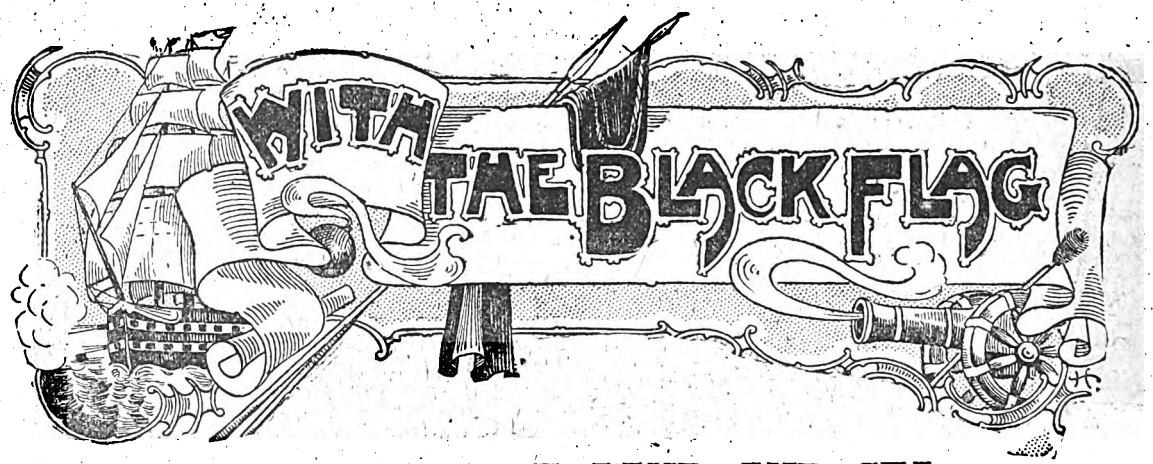
THE MISTAKES WE MAKE.

Compiled by C. E. CLARKE, with Index.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth. Price, post free, 1s. 8d.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. He is intrusted with dispatches for delivery to Bolivar, the Supreme Chief.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic. He received Wyvenhoe and Cautley on their arrival in Venezuela.

Dons Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who accompany Wyvenhoe when he takes the dispatches to Bolivar.

CHAPTER XIV.

The scene was wild and picturesque, and reminded me—with a difference—of the stories I had read about Robin Hood and his merry men.

The guerilleros and their guests were gathered round the fire, which, fanned by a light breeze, flared and roared like a furnace, sending forth showers of sparks that were like to make a bonfire of the entire grove, and had not rain fallen a short time before should have had a general conflagration. Even as it was I felt by no means sure that we might not have to run for our lives. But the blaze had the satisfactory effect of keeping all winged and crawling vermin at a respectful distance.

In the background the horses and mules, divested of their trappings, were browsing with good appetite, and on improvised spits were roasting the remains of the buck which was to form the pièce de résistance of our supper.

I suggested to El capitan, as the guerilleros called their leader, that the fire might be seen by the Godos, and inquired whether there were no pickets in the neighbourhood.

"The Godos have too much respect for their skins to venture forth at night when we guerilleros are about," he answered with a scornful laugh, "and they know that if they established pickets we should stalk them. They dare not post sentries at night more than a stone's throw from the walls, or even by day if there be cover within musket shot. You may go to sleep with an easy mind, señor, the Godos won't disturb your rest."

El capitan was evidently an embustero, yet I thought there might be truth in this, also that the favourable opinion Santleo had formed of the fellow was not without warrant. Though his ugliness was satanic his manner was straightforward, and he had not the look of a treacherous dissembler. But looks are not always to go by, and on the whole I would rather have been in other company.

The venison was served on palm leaves. We had neither bread nor salt and our fingers had to do duty for forks, but I was too hungry to be fastidious, and never did I more enjoy a meal or eat with better appetite. Presently the aguardiente began to go round, a raw, fiery spirit, of which we took no more than courtesy compelled, but it was greatly relished by the Zambos, whom we had hard work to prevent from getting drunk.

The guerilleros, however, drank copiously, and after a while started gambling, which before long led to quarrelling. Fierce oaths were shouted, knives drawn, and if Gonsalvo had not knocked a few of the roysterers down and threatened to brain the first man who broke the peace there would have been battle and sudden death.

Order being restored, quietness followed, and most of the men disposed themselves for sleep. I was so sleepy that I could hardly keep my eyes open, partly as the result of the long ride yet more of the enervating heat which had made me feel unspeakably somnolent and limp.

"Do you see that the Spanish deserter—I have ascertained that he is a deserter—and the mulatto with whom he has been talking so much are as wide awake as ever, and they drank next to nothing," whispered Don Antonio. "They must be closely watched, and Diego is fast asleep already. I shall take the first watch, Don Iago the second, and Ready the third, so that you may get a good long rest."

To this I objected as unfair, and proposed that I should take the second watch if not the first.

"No, let it be as Don Antonio says," urged Santleo. "Unless you have a good long sleep you will be ill. I can see it in your face, and that won't do at all. Besides, we are acclimatised and you are not."

"And I can pretend to be asleep yet keep awake all night," put in Bonanza.

I was too tired to insist, almost too tired to talk, so folding myself in my cobija I laid my head on my saddle-bag and was asleep almost before I could shut my eyes.

"Already! You might have given me an hour," I exclaimed when Ready roused me.

Digitized by Google

"An hour! You have had nearly nine. It is nearly five, and the men are beginning to stir."

"But why did you not waken me sooner that I might take my turn at watching?"

"Don Iago and Don Antonio would not let me. They said you needed a long sleep. They did not waken me till past three."

"Where are they?"

"There, fast asleep."

I looked round. Fresh logs had been thrown on the fire, water was boiling in great pans made of bull's hide, the guerilleros were moving about, rubbing down their horses and seeing to their saddles and arms. Diego still slept, and I could see nothing of the deserter and the mulatto. But that did not trouble me. If they had intended to sell us to the enemy the peril was past; all were on the alert and daylight near.

"Buenas dias, señor!" said Gonsalvo, coming forward to greet me. "I hope you have slept well. Your friends are sleeping yet. Better awaken them. Breakfast will be ready in a few minutes, and we shall cross the river at sunrise."

"You also are going to cross the river then?"

"Si, señor, and it will be well for us to cross together. The Godos are less likely to attack a large party than a small one."

So El capitan was afraid of the Spaniards despite his boasting.

"I thought the Godos never ventured outside the walls," quoth I.

"I meant at night. They are bolder by day, and might send a detachment to intercept us at the pass, which is another reason for being well on our way before we can be seen."

On this I awakened the two dons and told them what had passed.

"That is the secret of our hospitable reception and handsome treatment. Gonsalvo wanted a reinforcement, and cutting our throats would have defeated his object," said Santleo, laughing.

After a hasty breakfast of coffee and tasajo (jerked beef) we mounted our horses and el capitan mustered his men.

"Two are missing. What has become of Calzada and Lucar?" he asked.

Nobody answering, he turned to Santleo and me, who were near him.

"I don't like this at all," he observed in an undertone. "Calzada came to us from the Godos only a few days ago. He may have gone back to them, and Lucar, who is a great friend of his, with him. Both of course knew that we meant to cross the Apure this morning. What do you think, señores. Would it be wiser to fall back towards San Juan?"

"In my opinion there is just as much danger in falling back towards San Juan as going on forward," said Don Iago.

"Anyhow, we shall go on," I added.

The guerilleros started quarrelling.

"And we will go with you," quoth Don Gonsalvo after a moment's thought. "As we are thirty well-armed men and the Godos know me, they may not molest us. But we shall have to look out. I never quite liked Calzada, and regret that I received him into the band." Then to his men: "We cannot wait for those two fellows. But one of you might look round for them and follow on. You, Laterro."

"Si, Señor Capitan, I will look for them," answered the man.

"Good! But you must not tarry long or you will have to cross the river alone. Now march!"

So soon as we were out of the wood we rode in twos, Gonsalvo and Soto, his lieutenant, first, to whom followed our party, Don Iago and myself leading.

It was still dark, and the sun would not rise for an hour.

"We shall be at the pass just in time, and must cross the moment we can make out the other side of the river, and if possible before we are seen by the Godos," remarked Gonsalvo as we emerged from the grove.

A pass in Venezuela is not necessarily a ford, rather a point where the stream runs between two ends of a trail and is accessible on both sides. Where the banks are steep or swampy, or covered to the water's edge with dense vegetation, crossing is of course impossible. The pass by which we were to cross the Apure was near San Fernando. Unless we found canoes, which was very unlikely, we should have to swim, not an agreeable undertaking even had there been no Spaniards to fear, for the river thereabouts swarm with alligators and caribe fish, the latter a species of diminutive demon shark, formidable by their numbers and ferocity. Blood has an irresistible attraction for them. They fasten on the slightest wound or cut, and will disable a horse in a few minutes.

We had ridden about half-an-hour, all smoking, for the benefit of the zancudos, which filled the air with their humming, when three or four vulture-like birds rose right in front of us and flew heavily away.

Gonsalvo pulled up in sudden alarm.

"Look! What is that?" he exclaimed, pointing to two dark forms that lay like logs across the track. "Dismount and see, Soto."

The lieutenant obeyed, and after he had examined them, kneeling, looked up.

"What are they?" demanded Gonsalvo somewhat impatiently.

"Two dead men, Señor Capitan—Calzada and Lucar. I cannot see their faces, but I know them by their clothing and their weapons."

"Cien mil demonios! The Godos have done this."

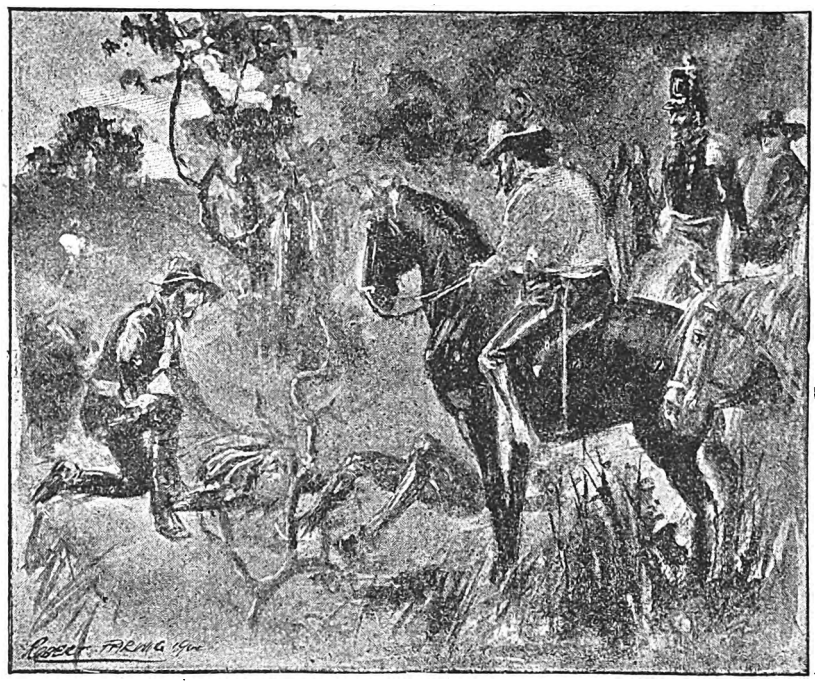
"I don't think so, Señor Capitan. The Godos would have taken them to be questioned by the general before execution. Besides, the Godos don't kill people in this fashion. Calzada's head is nearly severed from his shoulders and

Digitized by Google



"They are two dead men, Señor Capitan—Calzada and Lucar."

Lucar's skull is split in twain. Only one expert with the machete could have done the work so neatly."

"Who then?"

"Quien sabe?" (Who knows). "Either robbers or Indios brutos" (wild Indians) "I should say."

"It is very strange. The two men could only have had one object in coming this way—to give information to the enemy, so they are rightly served. Shove the bodies on one side. You have good ears and sharp eyes, Señor Teniente. Ride ahead, and if you hear or see aught suspicious let me know."

"I also have good ears and eyes. I will go with him," put in Bonanza.

"Many thanks, señor. I shall be glad of your company," replied the lieutenant, and they rode off at the swift ambling run known as "pacing" peculiar to South American horses, which are never taught or allowed to trot and seldom gallop.

We others followed more slowly and reached the pass just as the sun rose fiery red, throwing a ruddy glow on the great rolling river.

"The coast seems to be quite clear, and if we are sharp about it may get over before the Spaniards get sight of us. We shall have to swim with our horses though, there are no canoes," observed Don Antonio.

So all went into the water, some riding, others, like ourselves, dismounting and holding on to their horse's mane, and gained the other side without accident. There was no blood to attract the caribe fish, and alligators seldom molest a crowd, probably because they object to splashing and like a quiet meal.

Bonanza and I were amongst the first to reach dry land.

"Do you know how those men came by their deaths?" I asked him.

"I don't know," he answered with a strong emphasis on the "know."

"Have you any idea?"

"Well, Diego was away for two hours during the night, so you may draw your own conclusions, and if he did it he deserves our thanks, for if those rascals had got to San Fernando we should not be here now, nor perhaps alive."

I had a strong suspicion that the Zambo had not gone alone, but I said no more. Calzada and Lucar doubtless deserved the fate that had befallen them, and if I had objected to killing suspected traitors without absolute proof of their treachery Bonanza would have thought me a fool for my pains. Everybody in Venezuela appeared to act on the principle enunciated by General Arismendez of never sparing an enemy, actual or potential.

"Look out!" cried one of the guerilleros as a dull roar came from the ramparts, and a cannon ball plumped into a sand-bank close behind us.

A general scramble followed, all the band mounting in hot haste and hurrying away.

"Won't you wait for the man you left behind?" I asked Gonsalvo.

"Not I. Laterro must take his chance," he replied, and rode off.

"Well, we will wait for him," said I. "Don't you think we should, Don Iago?"

"Certainly," was his answer.

"As you please. It's all in the day's work," remarked Bonanza resignedly. "Nevertheless, I don't see that our waiting will do the fellow any good. Ah, there he comes!"

Laterro rode boldly into the river, guiding his horse obliquely up stream so that he might the better breast the current and land at the right place. All went well until they were two-thirds of the way across when a great alligator appeared in front of them, so startling the horse that he reared and swerved, on which Laterro, to save himself from drowning, slipped out of the saddle, but only to meet the alligator, which made for him with wide open jaws.

The poor fellow screamed for help, which we were powerless to render, and struck out for the shore, but it is not easy to escape from a cayman by swimming. We thought Laterro's doom was sealed, and I was averting my face to avoid witnessing the sickening catastrophe that seemed inevitable when a second ball from the ramparts hurtled over our heads and fell between the alligator and his prey with a mighty splash, so alarming the creature that it turned tail and made off. On this Laterro swam after his horse, seized its mane, and in a few minutes the two were on dry land.

A word of congratulation and we were mounted and away. The Spanish gunners had got our range and we had every reason to believe that if we had not been intercepted we should be pursued. But save a few more futile cannon shots nothing further happened, either, as we supposed, because the governor of San Fernando had no horse at his disposal, or knowing that General Paez and his llaneros were not far off, deemed it advisable not to risk an encounter in which the royalist cavalry were sure to be worsted.

Though still among woods we were in a less thickly timbered country than that which we had left behind us, a level country of broad savannahs, interspersed with clumps of trees and bosky glades, and here and there a farmhouse or plantation, all, like the few villages we encountered, wasted by war, deserted and forlorn.

Digitized by Google

Gonsalvo and his band had gone their own way, whither and for what purpose we neither knew nor cared.

We rode on in the track of the army until nearly noon when we overtook the rear guard, and presently came up with Bolivar and his staff. It was the most grotesque-looking army and the queerest staff I had ever beheld.

Compared with those Venezuelan soldiers the ragged regiment which Falstaff led through Coventry was gorgeously apparelled. Many of the infantry had not even rags. A pair of crossbelts, to carry his ammunition and his bayonet or machete, an old hat, and an apology for a fig-leaf constituted the whole equipment and clothing of many of these multi-coloured warriors, for like the devils in "St. Anthony's Temptation" they were of every shade and hue and as many breeds and half-breeds as the republic could produce.

Many wore the simple national costume which I have already described, some wore Spanish uniforms, captured from the enemy, and several companies were clad in cast-off militia uniforms brought from England.

The cavalry presented a somewhat better appearance than the infantry, though even of them many were more than half naked, but Paez's guard of honour, a picked body of five or six hundred men, wore serviceable uniforms, yet none of the privates and few of the officers were shod.

As we approached Bolivar several of his officers rode to meet us and asked our business. When I announced that we brought dispatches from Angostura there was great excitement, and Don Iago and myself were straightway introduced to the Chief, who had just ordered a halt for the midday meal and rest, alighted from his horse.

He received us with the high-bred courtesy of a Spanish hidalgo of the blue blood, for Don Simon belonged to the most exalted order of colonial nobility, and after asking a few questions about our journey sat down under a tree to read the dispatches, an opportunity by which I profited to observe his person and study his face.

At this time Bolivar was about thirty-five years old, but looked at least ten years older. His typically Spanish face, begirt with bushy black whiskers, was thin and careworn and expressive rather of patient endurance than stern resolve. His eyes were dark and intelligent, and it was said on occasion could blaze with anger, but in repose they were dull, furtive, and shifty. Except under great excitement he never looked a man in the face, and when speaking he had an unpleasant habit of glancing sideways and turning his head like a hare.

In height the Supreme Chief was perhaps five feet five, rather less than more, his hips were very narrow, and his legs fully answered to Bonanza's description of them, being short in proportion to his body, and his tight-fitting scarlet breeches and wide horseman's boots made their thinness and shortness all the more conspicuous.

For the rest, he wore an English yeomanry helmet, a round-about jacket of blue cloth, with three rows of gilt sugar loaf buttons, and when mounted carried in his hand a light lance with a black bannerol, or pennon, on which were embroidered a white skull and crossbones, and the legend "Muerte o Libertad" (Death or Liberty).

The officers by whom Bolivar was surrounded were nearly all men of colour, some of them full-blooded Indians, two black as night, the rest, except one who was almost white, a fantastic mixture of hues and breeds.

Their uniform consisted of a shirt made of handkerchief pieces, as many coloured as Joseph's coat, with wide sleeves, worn outside roomy drawers which reached to a little below the knee, and a hat of split palm leaves with variegated plumes. One colonel, however, sported a silver helmet; another wore a helmet with a casque of beaten gold. Most of the officers carried a lance ornamented like Bolivar's with a death's head bannerol.

All were barefoot, and all wore on their naked feet either brass or silver spurs armed with rowels five or six inches long.

When Bolivar had run through the dispatches he invited me and Santleo to sit down, one on either side of him. Bonanza, whom he had not yet deigned to notice, was talking with the officers, all of whom he appeared to know.

The Chief was very courteous and his manner sympathetic and engaging. He asked us about our journey, and seemed greatly interested in the story we had to tell him. Thinking to put in a good word for Don Antonio I said how useful, bold, and resourceful he had been, and that without his help I doubted whether we should have won through.

"Oh, Captain Bonanza is brave enough, nobody can deny that, but he is very erratic, often acts and speaks foolishly, and I should not advise you to trust him too much," was the rather chilling answer.

Then the General spoke graciously and gratefully of the help he had received from England, adding that his secretary, Colonel O'Leary, was an Irishman, that several British officers were then present with the army, and that he hoped ere long to be joined by a large body of British troops.

"You shall of course have a command, Major Wyvenhoe," he said, turning to me, "unless you would prefer to join my staff for a while."

This offer I accepted as a matter of course. Without giving offence I could not have done otherwise, nor, to tell the truth, did I particularly desire a command in an army which, I felt pretty sure, would be scattered to the winds at its first encounter with the enemy.

"Good! You shall be my second aide," returned the Chief, "and I shall promote Don Iago to major in consideration of his valuable services and the help he has given you in bringing these dispatches."

Santleo made a suitable reply, and we were rising to take our leave when the Chief invited us to join him at his frugal repast, which would be ready in a few minutes.

"I cannot offer you luxurious fare," he observed, smiling, "only a sancoche de gallina (chicken broth) and cold fowl, but both of you have seen war and know what it is to campaign in a country bare of supplies, and I am afraid our commissariat service leaves a good deal to be desired."

Don Iago and I of course protested that we wanted nothing better than sancoche de gallina and cold fowl,

The alligator made for Laterro with wide open jaws.

Digitized by Google

which were presently brought, and with them, to my surprise, several bottles of London porter.

"My favourite beverage," said Bolivar. "I drink little else and nothing stronger. I hope you will not find it too warm. It is kept in wet cloths frequently changed so should be in pretty good condition."

It was rather warm, though less so than I expected, and I found it vastly refreshing, but Don Iago who had never tasted malt liquor before pulled a wry face.

"You don't like it? Well, Chateau Lafitte would be better, but unfortunately I have none to offer you. This is very different from a déjeuner à la fourchette in the Palais Royal or a luncheon at Limmer's Hotel."

"You know Limmer's Hotel?" quoth I, more surprised than before.

"Yes, it was at Limmer's I had my first bottle of double stout. There used to be a famous waiter there."

"You mean John Collins, head waiter at Limmer's. He is there still, at any rate he was when I left London, and likely to be as long as he lives."

"I remember him well, an amusing fellow whose fame has been celebrated in verse, something like this I think:

"My name is John Collins, head waiter at Limmer's,
At the corner of Conduit Street, Hanover Square;
My chief occupation is filling up brimmers
To solace young gentlemen laden with care.

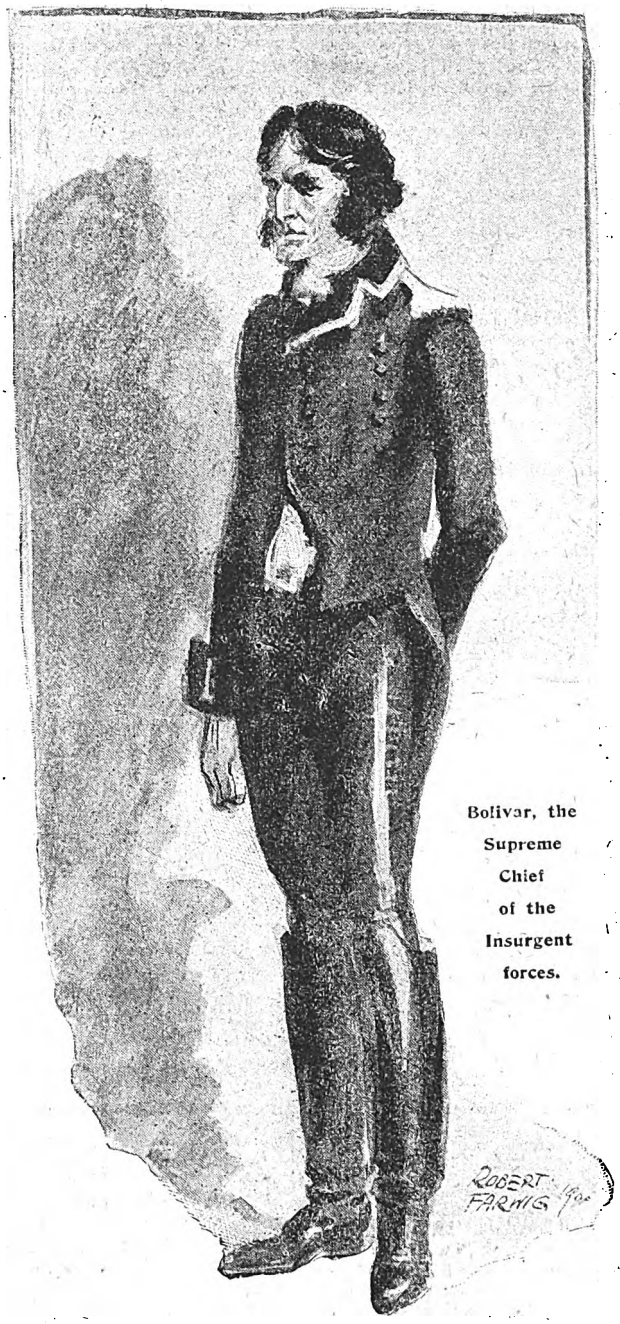
"Do I quote correctly?"

"Quite, and with a good accent. You know English well, Señor General."

"I know French better though," and then he spoke of Paris, where, when he was in Europe, he had made a long stay, and, judging from the stories he told, had led a wild life. "I wish I were there now, and if my country would spare me I would be," he added with a sigh of regret.

When the march was resumed Bolivar kept me with him, but Don Iago, not being included in the invitation, found other company.

"How do you get on with Captain Santleo?" asked the Chief in English, in order, I supposed, that those of his officers who were with us might not know what we were talking about.



Bolivar, the Supreme Chief of the Insurgent forces.

"Very well. We began by being comrades, and are now, I think, fast friends."

"Did he tell you much about himself or his family?"

"Not much—practically nothing."

"So despite your camaraderie and friendship you are no better informed as to his antecedents than any of us. Santleo is a very mysterious gentleman. He entered the army as a private two or three years ago and distinguished himself in several engagements that we gave him a commission, and he is evidently a caballero and a man of some education. But his reticence is extraordinary.

"When asked whence he comes his answer is always either from the west or from the mountains, meaning, I suppose, the Cordillera, which comes to the same thing. The lightness of his complexion adds to the mystery. He is generally mistaken for an Englishman, and if he spoke the language might pass for one. Of course there is a secret, and he must have some motive for guarding it so strictly. What it is I can only conjecture."

"And your conjecture, Señor General?"

"Is very simple and therefore very probable. I think Santleo comes from Grenada and that he belongs to one of those fanatically loyal families who would rather perish than renounce their allegiance to Spain, and that this young man, sympathising with the patriots, enlisted under a false name, unknown to his people, after telling them, perhaps, that he was going to travel in Europe or North America. That would account for a good deal. As for his light complexion that, after all, is nothing. Most men of our blood are dark, but there are blonde Spaniards, and his mother may be English, or German, or an American of the North."

This was a plausible theory, though it failed to explain why, if Santleo had learnt English from his mother, he did not say so, nor why, seeing how intimate we had become and how unreserved on my part had been our intercourse, he refrained from telling me in confidence something about his family and something more about himself.

"I may be mistaken, for all this is pure conjecture,"

Digitized by Google

Bolivar continued. "Nevertheless, I think my guesses are not very wide of the mark. Curiosity is one of my weak points. I like to know all about people, especially about my officers, and if Santleo tells you aught of his past and his connections, or you can worm anything out of him, you will perhaps be good enough to inform me."

This was an awkward request. I had no intention of trying to surprise my friend's secret either for the gratification of Don Simon's curiosity or my own. But as saying so might be detrimental as well to Don Iago's interest as my own I answered diplomatically:

"If I do worm anything out of Captain Santleo I shall not fail to inform your excellency."

Bolivar gave me a suspicious side glance as though he detected the equivocation and divined its motive, and, changing the subject, questioned me straitly about Margarita, as to what had happened there during my stay, and the differences between the two generals, of which there was mention in the dispatches.

I answered frankly and fully, being too much incensed against Urdenetta either to disguise my sentiments or keep aught back, telling him all that had befallen, how well I had been treated by Arismendez, how ill by Urdenetta, against whom I made a formal complaint for arresting me on a trumped-up charge without asking me a question or giving me a hearing.

"General Urdenetta must have been misinformed, and I think I could guess by whom. He is a particular friend of mine and one of our bravest generals, and I think it would be worth your while to preserve silence as to what happened at Margarita and let bygones be bygones," said the Chief quietly and, as might seem, kindly, but there was a nameless something in his tone that told me, and I had no doubt was meant to tell me, that if I desired to retain Bolivar's favour I must keep on good terms with his friends.

(To be continued.)

SAVING THE CIDER.

Mr. Hathaway, Mr. Leffingwell, Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Sherwood are four gentlemen who board together, and are the best of friends. The other day they invested in a cask of cider, and at supper that evening sampled its contents.

"One thing is certain," said Mr. Hathaway emphatically, "forty gallons of cider won't keep while we're drinking it. There must be something to put in it to keep it from spoiling, and I've heard that mustard seed is the article."

"I agree with you," observed Mr. Leffingwell. "If we don't take care of it the cider will go sour; but I incline to the idea that horse-radish is the best. Put in horse-radish, and your cider will keep any time."

"Let me remark, gentlemen," said Mr. Anderson, wiping his moustache, "that raisins are what you want. Dump in plenty of raisins, and you've got your cider as long as you want it. Don't you think so, Sherwood?"

"I can't say I do," rejoined Mr. Sherwood. "There is no doubt that the cider will spoil unless you put in something, but what you want is borax. A pound of borax will keep that barrel of cider until winter."

Each gentleman sustained his view with potent arguments, but the dinner was finished before any conclusion was arrived at, and the party separated.

"They can talk about their borax, and raisins, and horse-radish till they're grey," said Mr. Hathaway, as he flopped out of bed at daylight the next morning, "but I'll have my mustard seed in before they roll over," and cautiously stepping downstairs he extracted the bung and poured a liberal dose of the seeds into the barrel. "That will keep," he muttered "for six years," and driving the bung home he went back to bed.

"It's clear to my mind that Hathaway is trying to save that cider by faith," muttered Mr. Leffingwell, an hour later, as he groped round for his clothes. "Mustard seed! Why, he might as well put in melon rind. I'm going to fill that barrel with horse-radish before he's up, and show him how to keep cider. Mustard seed! I'll head a subscription list with a sovereign to test his sanity."

And Mr. Leffingwell shivered down to the cellar and cracked away with a hammer until the bung flew out like a bullet. "There!" he ejaculated, as he poked the horse-radish in with his thumb, "that'll do the business," and with chattering teeth he prowled back to his room.

"One would think to hear these people talk that they'd been brought up in an orchard," said Mr. Anderson to himself as he jabbed the right foot into the wrong slipper. "Borax! Horse-radish! Mustard! What that cider wants is raisins, and that's what it's going to get."

Upon which Mr. Anderson crept down into the cellar, and inoculated the barrel with a couple of pounds of raisins. "It's beginning to spoil already," he soliloquised, eyeing the floating seeds and radish suspiciously, but without identifying them. "If I hadn't been quick we'd have been drinking vinegar by this evening." And, satisfied that he had saved the beverage, he went back to the sheets.

"What I'm afraid of," remarked Mr. Sherwood, as he opened his door and slipped downstairs, "what I'm afraid of is that those fellows will begin to tinker with that barrel before I can get there. If they manage to stick their foolishness in first I'm done, but if I can empty in this borax before they're about there's so much cider saved."

Mr. Sherwood belted away at the barrel until the bung toppled out, and in went his borax. "That's the business," he observed with great satisfaction as he replaced the bung. "It will teach those boys not to be so dogmatic with their remedies hereafter."

"I don't believe that cider was very good in the first place," said Mr. Anderson, as he pushed his glass from him that night at supper. "We got swindled about that cider."

"I think so," said Mr. Sherwood. "It had a very bad taste when we tapped it. It isn't fit to drink now."

"It certainly is not," observed Mr. Leffingwell severely. "It is not good cider. We couldn't have put anything in to keep it. What do you think, Hathaway?"

"I had my suspicions of it from the first," replied Mr. Hathaway. "It's old stock, and I think we'd better give it away."

And then there was silence, and each gentleman wondered if it would not have been better to have let the other gentlemen try their various recipes before zealously administering his own.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT CATCH PHRASES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Three Women and Mr. Frank Cardwell," by W. Pett Ridge, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. A. E. Thomas, 34 South Road, Kingswood, Bristol. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about DUSTMEN, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 1st. Post-cards only, please.

Mr. Bowser and the £10 Note.

BOWSER was taking Mrs. Bowser for a walk in town the other day, when he was accosted by a nervous-looking individual, who was carrying a copy of Pearson's Weekly.

"Excuse me, sir," said the man, "but have you got that Ten-pound note?"

Bowser glared at him wrathfully for a full half-minute before replying, and then the torrent burst forth.

"Now look here, my man," said Bowser, "you are the nineteenth fathead who has asked me that question this week. Confound your impudence! Do you take me for a travelling missionary box, or do you think I am an automatic machine, that only requires a penny in the slot to deliver ten-pound notes like chocolates?"

Turning to Mrs. B., he went on: "I can't get any peace in the town, let's get right away to the restful country, where they haven't heard of this mad scheme of Pearson's."

Next day accordingly they went. The first man they met was Dusty Jim, sitting on a head of stones by the roadside, reading a copy of P.W.

"Say, mister," said the tramp, "have you got that ten p——"

Before he could finish, Bowser had rushed at him, but, profiting by experience, Dusty Jim fled.

A. E. T.

A Prophetic Retort.

SOME years ago when the catch phrase "Does your mother know you're out?" was on everybody's lips, a bye-election took place at one of our northern constituencies.

One of the candidates for Parliamentary honours was a noble lord of extremely youthful appearance, and on this alleged weakness his opponents taunted him on every possible occasion.

A few days before the election he was addressing a meeting, and was just warming to his subject when he was interrupted by one of his opponents exclaiming:

"I say, boy, does your mother know you're out?"

"Yes, she knows I'm out," retorted the youthful candidate, "and I venture to prophesy that if she's living at this time next week, she'll know I'm in."

The effect of his words on the audience was electrical, and during the cheering which followed the would-be heckler contrived to make himself scarce.

Better still, the prophecy was fulfilled to the letter, for on the day of election he was returned as member by a substantial majority.

A. V.

The Ten-Pound Note Again.

IT was in a railway carriage two scowling men sat one on each side of the carriage, brooding darkly. What was it they contemplated? At first they glared at each other, and then cast down their eyes. The man on the right muttered and said. "It has been on my mind all day. Dare I do it?" The man on the left to himself did say: "Shall I screw up courage and chance it now?"

They both clenched their fists and fidgeted about, and then, suddenly bringing forth a paper with a red cover, they flourished it in each other's faces, yelling:

"Have you got that ten-pound note?"

O. E.

They All Came.

BIFFKINS is dead against catch phrases since he invited his Uncle George to spend a week with him.

"Look me up any time, uncle," he said one day, "and I shall fix you up for a week easily."

"What about the missus, an' childers?" said the cautious uncle.

"Oh, never mind them," said Biffkins, smiling, "'let 'em all come,'—good-bye."

The result of Biffkins using this catch phrase was that Uncle George, the missus, and eight of a family turned up, and Biffkins had to bear it.

W. H.

Too Sharp.

A FEW weeks ago, at a certain seaside resort, I was in a music-hall. One of the audience, evidently trying to be witty, called out: "There's 'air!"

The comedian, pulling off his hat and showing an abundant crop of hair, exclaimed:

"You didn't expect to see feathers, did you?"

R N.

What the Officer of the Watch Said.

A BURLY tar was recently called up to give evidence at a court-martial.

Ex: "Were you on the bridge at the time the ship ran ashore?"

Jack: "Yus, sur, I wor."

Ex: "What did the officer of the watch say?"

Jack: "Wal, sor, seein' as 'ow what he said warn't regulation like, I dunno as 'ow I orter say."

Ex (flaring up): "Now, sir, on your oath inform this Court immediately, all you heard the officer of the watch say at the time the ship struck the bottom."

Jack: "All I 'eard 'im remark, sor, was, 'Watto she bumps!'"

C. R. F.

Digitized by Google

SOME OTHER LITTLE STORIES.

A Hard Bull.

Bowser: "Where's that fierce bull you had last time I was down here—the one that tossed me into the duck-pond?"

Farmer: "Oh! yes, I know; I've had a lot o' trouble over that beast. I left the gate open one night, thinking the critter would stray on to the railway and get cut into mincemeat, and then I'd send in a heavy claim to the company."

Bowser: "Didn't work, eh?"

Farmer: "Not exactly. The darn thing charged the engine and threw the blessed train off the rails, and now the company is suing me for damages." E. C.

The Cheque was Incomplete.

"Here is a poem which you may publish in your paper," said a young man with eyes in a fine frenzy rolling, as he entered the editorial room. "I dashed it off rapidly in an idle moment, and you will find it in its rough state, as it were. You can, of course, make such corrections as you think necessary."

"Ah, much obliged," said the editor. "I will give you a cheque for it at once."

"You are very kind," said the contributor. "I shall be delighted."

"There you are," said the editor, giving him a cheque.

"Many thanks," exclaimed the young man; "I will bring you some other poems."

When he got to the door he suddenly paused; then he came back.

"Excuse me," he said, "but you forgot to fill up the cheque. You have not written the date, you see, nor the amount, nor have you signed your name."

"Oh," said the editor, "that's all right. You see, I have given you a cheque in its rough state, as it were. You can, of course, make such corrections as you think necessary."

He Obeyed Too Literally.

"Now, Harry," said the bride, "I want you to understand distinctly that I do not wish to be taken for a bride. I am going to act exactly as if I were an old married woman. So, dearest, do not think me cold and unloving if I treat you very practically when there is anybody by."

"I don't believe I can pass for an old married man. I am so fond of you that I am bound to show it. I am sure to betray myself."

"No, you mustn't. It's easy enough. And I insist that you behave just like old married men do. Do you hear?"

"Well, darling, I'll try, but I know I will not succeed."

The first evening of their arrival the bride retired to her chamber, and the groom fell in with a whist party, with whom he sat playing cards until four o'clock in the morning. His wife spent the weary hours in weeping. At last he turned up, and met his grief-stricken bride with the hilarious question:

"Well, ain't I acting the old married man well?"

She never referred to the subject again, and everybody knew after that they had just been married.

The Infant Again.

"Why do your part your hair in the middle?" said Mrs. Jones to Mrs. Brown. "It is not nearly so becoming as at the side. I used to part mine in the same way until I knew better."

The conversation then became general, and Mrs. Williams told how she used to do her hair, and Mrs. Jenkins lamented the bad taste of the present styles of hair-dressing.

The only lady who did not join in the conversation was Edith's mother, who sat silent in the corner. Evidently Edith did not like to see her mother ignored, as she thought, for presently her little voice was heard to exclaim:

"My mother parts her hair on the table!"

G. A. F.

From Sunshine to Storm.

The other day an Irishman went to his late employer's house and said cheerfully:

"Good morning, sor. Begorra, you're a gentleman," shakes hands with him; "shure yer woife's a perfect lady," shakes hands with her; "yer daughter's a little angel," takes her up in his arms and kisses her; "and yer dog's a beauty," pats dog on the head.

"Well, Pat," said his employer, "I must thank you kindly for your compliments, but I am very sorry to say I have no work for you this morning."

"What!" exclaimed Pat aghast, "no work? Then yer an ould pig; yer woife's a female alligator; yer daughter's a baboon-faced haythen, an' yer dog's not worth cats' meat," and then he bolted. M. A. B.

To Reclaim His Brother.

An unpopular German, who has long stuck to the position of cashier in a mercantile office, is loud in his praises of conscription, and does not spare the feelings of the British clerks beneath him.

"You keep saying we are afraid of compulsory service," retorted a plucky junior once, "and that we should funk the fighting when it came, but how about yourself? Have you ever stood your chance at the ballot?"

This was a facer, and the German flushed and hesitated, but soon recovered himself.

"Ach! no," he exclaimed. "It is true I never wore my country's uniform, but I did not run away. I came to find my brother, who lost heart and fled from the conscription many years ago. I don't know where the coward is—the world is wide—but I shall find him before I die, and send him back to serve the Fatherland. Ah, yes! Even if I have to pay his passage home, he shall not escape." R. A. H. G.

YOUR FACE ENLARGED FOR 7/-

If you have a relative who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. × 12in. mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. × 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

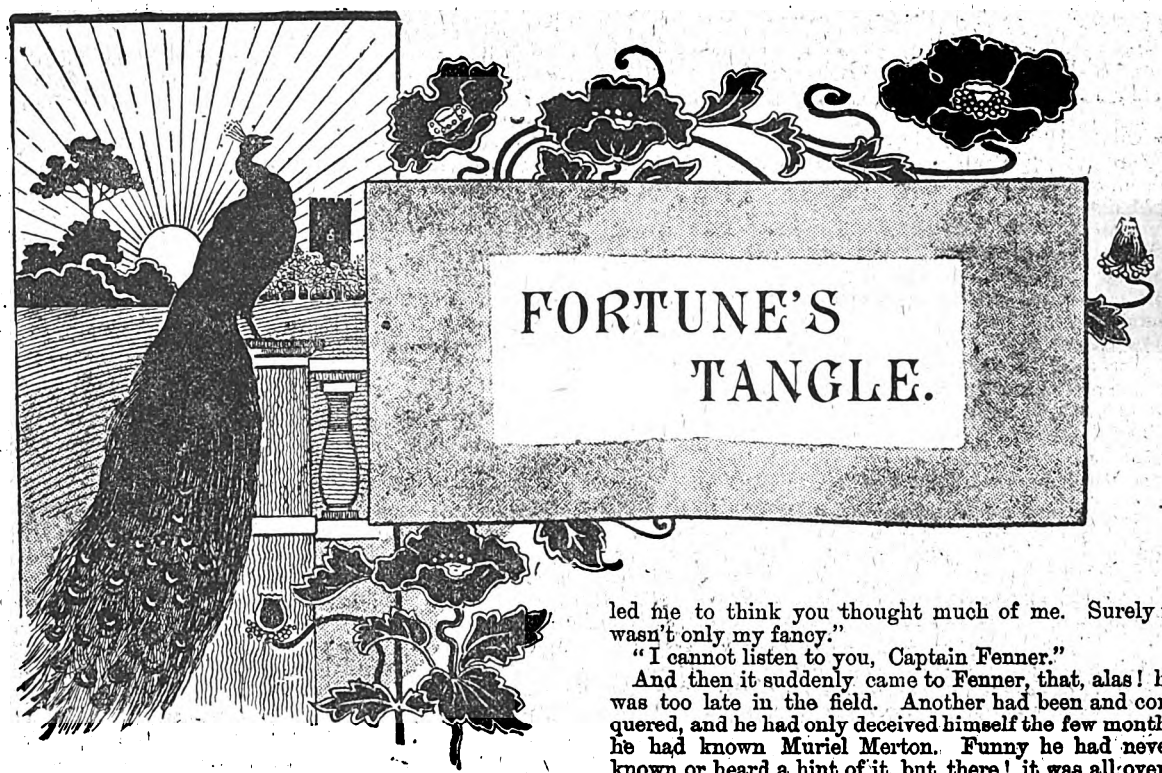
Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

Full particulars have already appeared, and will appear again shortly. They also appear in the current issue of

THE CURIOSITY SHOP.

A coupon from that paper must accompany each order.

Digitized by Google



THE windows looked over the waters of the Western Pacific, and Fenner in this crucial moment could not help comparing their perfect blue with that of Muriel Merton's eyes.

They were alone—by a wished-for disposition of Providence; and he, in the few minutes succeeding the participation in tea which never seems so refreshing as in China, determined to put his fate to the test, and to ask her the question which she had shown herself almost waiting for some days before.

Lately, however, ever since the evening young Merton made such a fool of himself after mess and lost some hundreds to the Major, she had treated Fenner much less warmly. Hence perhaps, his sudden determination.

The remembrance reminded him of some tale of young Merton's suddenly going to Pekin, of which he had not taken much notice.

This however, again sank into oblivion before his present thoughts.

She turned very pale as he spoke and clutched the side of the window as if for support. She seemed to be afraid to look at him then.

"No, Captain Fenner, it is very kind of you to do me—"

"Don't call it honour, Muriel; say, oh! say you do love me, you must have seen—"

"I cannot marry you, I simply cannot," and she moved away.

He was sorely puzzled. The tone of her voice was not that of a girl who meant what she said, and yet it all seemed so stereotyped. He stepped forward.

"Why? Tell me why! You have, meaningly or not, led me to think you thought much of me. Surely it wasn't only my fancy."

"I cannot listen to you, Captain Fenner."

And then it suddenly came to Fenner, that, alas! he was too late in the field. Another had been and conquered, and he had only deceived himself the few months he had known Muriel Merton. Funny he had never known or heard a hint of it, but there! it was all over; and yet—he had grown to love her more than he had ever thought he could love anyone. Well, well, he could forget her, perhaps. He felt a feeling almost of resentment that she had not told him of this attachment—such is the illogical and inconsistent reasoning of man.

Yet how different would have been his thoughts had he but known.

Muriel Merton apparently cool, and austerely collected, though with a certain sympathy in those blue eyes, went out of the room, rushed to her own room and threw herself headlong on her bed, and burst into tears of misery.

"To think he would be so mean, and I did— I do love him so much. Oh! how could he take advantage of poor Hugh's weak will and make him play, play, play. Oh! those vile cards, and we're so poor, too. Oh! it was mean, mean."

And here was a pretty little complication so dear to Dame Fortune's heart; Muriel under a mistaken impression, and Fenner fancying himself too late.

Fenner walked back to his quarters, moodily accompanying some brother officers. Their conversation scarcely interested him save that the name Merton made him give a listless sort of attention to it.

All he gathered was that Merton had been very much in the dumps for the last day or two and had suddenly applied for leave to go to Pekin, in fact had gone that morning. They could only explain that it was something to do with that money he had lost and of course must pay Major Crookes.

The Mertons' had an uncle, a prominent personage in the English Legation, and the men guessed it was to him he had gone.

Fenner had only recently arrived in China from home on his way to a military post at the Pekin Legation, and had been detained by orders from home in Faihi. China for a year or two had been a smouldering heap, ready to burst into flame at the least fanning. The European Ministers were helpless in face of the machinations of the Empress whose position had been won at the expense of the lives or imprisonment of others of the Imperial family.

Digitized by Google

Joint letters were of no avail to stem the tide of rebellion against all order and rule, and especially against foreign interference, which a huge section of the Celestials were resenting very practically.

For some days Fenner saw no more of Muriel and then he heard that she, too, had gone on to Pekin. Mrs. Hawley, her boon companion told their mutual friends she had gone on a visit to this same uncle, though Fenner, among other wild ideas, thought his successful rival might be a Pekin Englishman or, but scarcely possible, that she had gone to avoid himself.

Outside Pekin more anxiety was felt for the Europeans than those in the capital itself, and it was being felt advisable to leave the city unless kept there by actual business.

The people of the Pekin Legations, however, could see no immediate danger, and only awoke to reality when the German Ambassador had been assassinated and the way to the coast was practically blocked by rebels.

Just before communication was cut off, a letter arrived from Merton to Mrs. Hawley, throwing everyone into consternation by asking why he had not heard from Muriel who, he thought was coming up, and saying that none of his letters had been answered.

Muriel not in Pekin? What had happened? and everyone was dumfounded. She had certainly left with the intention of going to Pekin, and she—yes, there was no doubt—she must have fallen into the hands of the Boxers either en route, though that seemed impossible before the line was touched, or on arrival at Pekin.

No fiercer, more uncontrollable fanatic lives than the hardly-roused Chinaman, and many feared that the worst had befallen the girl. Fenner became almost a raving madman. Nothing could be thought of for a moment, till someone suggested the most likely thing was that the girl had been entrapped en route, and if alive was in one of the monastries, the most impenetrable buildings in China.

Fenner needed no more suggestions, but for want of a better clue laid himself out to follow up this hazy chance.

* * * * *

The Mandarin Ku Lu was a persona grata at the Manling Monastery where the High Priest Kung Chin had been Ku Lu's friend for many years. Ku Lu was a person of much importance in the province of Faihi, and as such had come into continual contact with the English quarter residents. It is necessary for the climax of my story to retrace our steps thus a little, for it was owing to the Mandarin's headstrong infatuation for Muriel Merton, which was quite unsuspected, that the after occurrences took place. The old Chinaman—not so very old though, after all—knew it was useless to expect to make the English girl his wife with the consent either of her or of her friends; and for some twelve months he had nursed his desires in secret. Time would doubtless have increased Ku Lu's discretion, and he would have learnt to put the idea aside. The Boxers' rebellion, however, had furnished the wily old Chinaman with—if not a pretext—certainly a blind wherewith to baffle his pursuers.

And so it was that the unprotected girl had with little trouble been wheedled away from the train on the way to Pekin and had been placed in the charge of Kung Chin at the monastery.

It was unfortunate for Ku Lu's plan that an English official at the particular station remembered, when Fenner's investigations brought him there, one or two circumstances which made Fenner fasten his attention upon the Manling Monastery. How to reach it he knew not. He dared not report the matter for fear of its being a mistake or that he might bring the fanatical Chinese near Faihi to still more heat. And he puzzled his brains for days while the vague tales of horror from Pekin and the threats of the scarcely quiet provincial population almost unnerved all the Europeans.

Some ten days after it was known that Muriel Merton had disappeared, a Chinaman, evidently a high functionary, made his appearance at the gate of the Monastery praying for admittance and an interview with the High Priest on grave matters. Though the order of Confucians to which the monks belonged was not so strict as some others, it was very difficult for even a Chinaman to be admitted, and it was only on persuading the officials that he was sent by the Imperial Court in connection with the rebellion, that Fenner, thus disguised, was admitted. He entered the awful presence of the High Priest with his life in his hand, for he had not been able to formulate any plan, and he felt convinced that time was the chief object. I say, he entered the presence, but he had to wait till Kung Chin came in, and in the meantime was astonished to recognize the Mandarin Ku Lu leave the room as he came in. The Mandarin disappeared behind a heavy awning, and for the minute or two in the deathlike silence of those present Fenner could hear voices in the apartment beyond.

The prostration of the few monks assembled—in masks—called his attention to the entry of the High Priest. Fenner prostrated himself. The High Priest—as autocratic as the Emperor himself—demanded his errand. In short, jerky sentences which by their very formality passed muster, Fenner announced that the Aunt of the Son of Heaven wished to know whether His Holiness was at all disposed to mediate with the Boxers if they rose in that province. Fenner was all ears at the same time, for he had an impression that he had heard English sentences behind the awning.

Now Fenner had rather reckoned without his host, for Kung Chin knew that the Empress was behind the Boxers and was practically as well as morally encouraging them. Fenner's want of forethought almost deserved a fatal issue, for he had entered the place quite blindly, only hoping for inspiration on the spot. He had, however, taken the one precaution which was his salvation. He had left word with his friends that if missing, there he was to be searched for and the limit of time was two days.

It needed very little investigation before Kung Chin gave orders for the imposter to be seized. He had to be taken to his dungeon through the apartment into which Ku Lu had disappeared.

Imagine his surprise to see Muriel Merton, pale with fright and misery, trembling before the mandarin. Ku Lu hastened forward to find out the cause for the disturbance, and in the midst of the scuffling, Fenner revealed himself to the girl by calling her by name. His disguise, being disarranged, however, as it was, it needed little trouble for the wily Ku Lu to recognise him.

Digitized by Google

Quick as thought the cunning old Chinaman had thought of a diabolical plan. Evidently this foreign devil was known to Muriel; was even, perhaps, her lover. Her submission alone should save his life.

Dragged off to his dungeon and disarmed, Fenner felt helpless. He could almost see through the mandarin's designs, however. His expectations were realised when he was visited by Ku Lu, and the latter's nefarious scheme unfolded to him. Then his naturally ready wit came to his rescue. He was informed that each day the girl refused to comply with Ku Lu's wishes he should be tortured as only Chinese know how to torture. He asked to see her, and while endeavouring to influence her he, unnoticed, managed to get her to promise the mandarin to give him her final answer in five days, without letting her think he should suffer for it. The gratitude in her looks to him made him more her devoted slave than ever, but the fixed idea that she was promised to another and had no love for him, had taken very deep root and he could only, from blind love for the girl, suffer.

The details of the sufferings poor Fenner went through are not necessary; suffice it to say that the fourth day saw him nearly succumb. In the time that he was alone on the fourth day, all his poor limbs racked with awful anguish, a sudden commotion in the building accompanied by heavy firing from inside told him that the English troops had arrived and were bombarding the place, their admittance being refused.

His first thought was for Muriel. Would the brutes do her any harm in vengeance? The door opened and Kung Chin thrust the girl inside, telling her in English in his hurry that her English friend was evidently dying, and that was what her non-compliance had caused, and his death could only result from her continued obstinacy.

But the mandarin was too sanguine. The English soon had the place at their mercy.

* * * * *

"Don't trouble about me, Miss Merton," said poor Fenner, as he lay in the camp outside when the storm was over, "I shall be all right."

"But I do trouble about you. I know now—I want to——"

"No, no! don't thank me. Be happy, forget me," mumbled Fenner, his one idea again coming uppermost.

"I can't, I can't be happy without you. Tell me you still love me," she sobbed.

Cobwebs and misunderstandings were soon swept away, and Fenner's unreasoning love had its reward.

STUART BLOFELD.

YOUNG MR. FITTS (at breakfast): "You look annoyed, my dear. Is it anything I have done?"

Mrs. Fitts: "——."

Mr. Fitts: "I say, is it anything I've been doing?"

Mrs. Fitts: "——."

Mr. Fitts: "For goodness sake, don't sit there dumb. What's the matter with you this morning, anyway?"

Mrs. Fitts: "You were talking in your sleep last night, and—and——boo-hoo!"

Mr. Fitts: "And I said——"

Mrs. Fitts: "And I listened and listened as hard as I could, and you wouldn't say a single word that I could understand. There!"

NOW ON SALE.

No. 3 of

"The Curiosity Shop."

THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION TO "P.W."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP is the most Wonderful Paper in the whole wide world. Nothing like it has ever before been published—nothing. It is a Marvel.

The contents of THE CURIOSITY SHOP are not musty or stale; they are not old or worm-eaten.

Everything in THE CURIOSITY SHOP is Fresh and Brand New.

Curiosities need not necessarily be old. People always seem to associate a curiosity shop with ancient and well-worn goods. No mistake could be greater.

Curiosities are of two sorts—old and new.

Old curiosities are curiosities largely because they are old, because we do not see the same things in general nowadays.

New curiosities are curiosities largely because they are new, because no one has ever seen or heard of them before.

These, then, are the curiosities that you will find in THE CURIOSITY SHOP.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP contains: Absolutely new and fresh articles. Bright and originally-conceived pictures. Strong and well-seasoned fiction. Nothing that you can get anywhere else.

Unlike all other curiosity shops, the contents of this one are changed every week, and you can buy every article and picture in the shop for one penny.

REMEMBER: You can buy THE CURIOSITY SHOP itself for One Penny.

If you buy THE CURIOSITY SHOP every week for a year, at the end of twelve months you will have bought 52 shops and their contents for the small sum of 4s. 4d.

An Interesting Book.

CONSULT THE ORACLE;

OR,

How to Read the Future.

Crown 8vo, price 1s. Post Free, 1s. 3d.

Some of the thirty-nine chapters are:—

The Meaning of your Dreams	Chap. I.
Omens, Charms, and Spells for Lovers	Chap. III.
Judging Character by the Hands and Fingers	Chap. VII.
Married Life Begun as it Should Be	Chap. XV.
Table-Turning	Chap. XXIV.
Mystery and Danger of Mesmerism	Chap. XXVIII.
Things Seen by Second-Sight	Chap. XXXIII.
Looks showing your Character	Chap. XXXIX.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A DIAMOND RING.

If any one had told my friends that I was possessed of the slightest spark of romance at the age of forty-five, the information would have been received as a base canard. A bachelor of that age who has drifted about with all sorts of people and had all sorts of adventures is pretty sure to have had all romance knocked out of him.

He thinks more of his hat than his heart and more of his pipe than the female sex. Yes, I was a hardheaded, practical man, and had the most beautiful woman on earth attempted a flirtation with me I should have scowled on her.

That was the sort of man I was, and I gloried in it, but, alas, no man can tell just what day in the week he is going to fall over his own feet and make an ass of himself.

On a certain Tuesday I took a train at Elmer Junction for London, and as there were but few passengers I had a compartment to myself. I had been busy with a newspaper for half an hour when I noticed a small package lying under the opposite seat. I found it to be a plain cardboard box and was prepared to find a free sample of cocoa or a new brand of cough drops inside. It was something different, however.

It was a lady's diamond ring made up of five stones of the purest water, and on the inside were the initials "B. P." The ring was a double hoop of gold and had probably been made to order.

It was lying loosely in the box, and the box had once contained steel pens. I argued that it must have been some careless person who carried a valuable ring about in that fashion and that it had been lost by a passenger who had left the train at the junction.

I am only a fairly honest man. My first idea was to keep the ring and sell it, but I remembered that I was known to the railway porter and that the property might be traced to me. If not strictly honest, I am prudent, and I therefore gave up the idea of realising the ring. I would keep it for a reward, however. That bauble must have cost at least fifty pounds, and was perhaps valued beyond price as a gift. I calculated that I ought to get ten pounds out of it, and I calculated just what I would do with that extra money.

Half an hour later I felt a curious sensation stealing over me. I began to feel sentimental. I began to connect that dear little ring with a dear little golden-haired, blue-eyed girl. I got up and kicked myself three times and called myself a fool, but the feeling did not go away. To my astonishment and indignation I found it growing stronger, and before I knew it the grip of romance had got me by the neck.

I was a man of leisure, though I had no great amount of money to my credit. I would hunt up the owner of that ring, and if everything went well I would marry her. I settled on that, even as I kicked myself again. Common sense told me that I might better fall in love with the old apple woman at the Waterloo terminus, but when romance takes hold common sense has to let go.

For a week I watched all the papers, but the ring was not advertised. This seemed to prove to me that the loser was either rich and indifferent to her loss, or for some reason the loss had not yet been discovered.

Romance made me anxious, and I therefore went to the expense of advertising in five different papers. I simply stated that a diamond ring had been found in a railway carriage and asked the loser to correspond.

Inside of three days I received about one hundred and fifty letters in reply. They came from all sorts of places and from all sorts of people. The number of stones was given all the way from one to ten, and almost every railway in the kingdom was mentioned. The one hundred and fifty writers knew nothing about the ring, and the true loser had not answered me. I was a bit nettled at this neglect on her part. She was not meeting my romance half way. I advertised a second time, and this time I gave date and day and train.

Again I got a peck of letters, and at least half of them were from people who had answered before. As none of them could describe the ring I was no better off than before. Indeed, I was worse off.

A railway official wrote me that in keeping an article of value found on the line I had made myself a thief, and that he would take great pleasure in seeing me behind the bars.

I was now in love with the loser of that ring. Sentiment had a firm grip on me, and I got all sorts of silly notions into my head. I must see the affair to the end at whatever cost, and the end must be my marriage with the fair-haired Beatrice. That was the name I gave her, and I put her age at nineteen without stopping to reflect that I was probably as old a man as her father.

A third crop of advertisements went out. This time I called it a hoop ring, and I got two hundred replies from losers of hoop rings. In sending out the fourth batch of advertising, I described the ring with the exception of the initials. The replies numbered over four hundred. I also got something beyond replies. A detective followed me to my lodgings and was insulting enough to ask:

"Look here, my man, what sort of a game are you trying to play on the public with that ring?"

"None of your business," I replied in my anger at finding I had been dogged.

"But it is my business," he insisted. "I don't exactly twig your lay, but I'll have an eye on you for the next few weeks and be prepared to make it hot for you."

"If you want to know who I am, go to Brown and Brown, solicitors."

"I'll find out soon enough without any help from them."

For half an hour after he had gone I was too put out to feel much romance, but as I cooled off it came gently stealing back, and I was more than ever determined to find my unknown love.

With that independence which should characterise the actions of a fairly honest man I advertised for the fifth time. This time I asked "B. P." to communicate with me in case she had lost anything.

There was just one hundred and seven "B. P." answers, but among them I selected one which appeared to be genuine. This "B. P." had lost a double hoop diamond ring containing five stones. It had been lost in a railway carriage and was a birthday gift from a dead mother.

I was asked to call at the chambers of a certain solicitor to have the ring further identified. There is nothing romantic about calling on a solicitor. It was quite possible, however, that the golden-haired heiress would be at the solicitor's and that all would be well, and so I was there at the appointed hour.

Digitized by Google

So was a stern-faced and aggressive looking householder, together with a sleek-looking villain whom I at once spotted for a detective and a young woman whose hair was red instead of golden. The ring was speedily identified by the stern-faced man and red-headed girl. "B. P." was Bertha Perkins, and her father and her maid were before me. Perkins was a country squire, and on the night previous to my finding the ring his daughter's jewels had been stolen. The hoop ring was part of the plunder.

Of course, I was ready to hand over the ring, but it wasn't to stop there. That red-headed maid was sure she recognised me as the man who was hanging about the grounds a few hours before the robbery, and that villain of a detective was only too glad to snap the handcuffs on my wrists and hurry me off to gaol.

It took me three days to prove myself a respectable character and an alibi. They had to give me my liberty, but it was grudgingly done, and the detective said he'd have an eye on me all the rest of my days.

Old Perkins had helped the red-headed girl to conclude that I was the robber, and I went down to his country seat to receive an abject apology or pull his nose. He not only refused an apology, but threatened to kick me off the grounds, and the red-headed girl declared that I had a cast in my left eye, and by that cast she would swear to me in any court as a man who would not stop at murder.

There was one more thing to be cleared up. I wanted to find out about "B. P." herself. Was she the golden-haired, blue-eyed girl of my dreams, and was she worthy of my love? I had not long to wait. I was walking from the house to the village when a dogcart knocked me down and rolled me all over the road, and the driver halted to call me a tramp and threaten me with the law. The driver was "B. P." Her hair was dyed, her eyebrows coloured, and her nose turned up. She had a big mouth, and green eyes, and when she drove on she whistled like a man.

C. B. LEWIS.

IN A MAD WORLD.

"WHAT a lovely old house!" said the lady.

"But what a terrible condition it has been allowed to get into," said the gentleman.

As it certainly had.

It was set down in the midst of a small, but beautiful park-like demesne. Old elm trees of gigantic height and girth shaded it on every side, except that on the front lawn, hidden from the road by a rustic fence, and an immensely high and thick hawthorn hedge, grew a large, widely-spreading cedar. This gave the name to the house, and as the "Cedars" it had, until within about two years previously, been known as the scene of many a county festivity and revel.

It seemed strange that the owner, Colonel Reuth, should have had no relatives, or rather that such were neither seen nor alluded to, even remotely, by either himself or his servants. Country folk have a way of putting two-and-two together and so here. Spite his artistic tendencies the Colonel would have no picture hung in his house. His especial predilection was for old glass, Venetian, Old English, etc., notably that of the Georgian period.

His collection was esteemed by experts to be the finest in Europe, consisting as it did of some of the rarest examples of old "Kit-kat" club wine-glasses. The inspection and consequent admiration of these, was always an important item upon the programme whenever visitors were present. So it was hinted that the lack alike of pictures and relatives had a more than ordinary significance.

Matters went on in this fashion for some years, but there came a day when without word or warning the Colonel disappeared.

Local conjecture waved rife as to the cause.

Although the Colonel was an admitted bachelor, there were rumours to the effect that at some time or other he had been married. If that were so his wife must have been dead for many, many years; while so far as the quidnuncs knew no children existed.

There was a nephew some said, whom at one time the old man had made much of, but who after an unusually festive Christmastide has ceased to appear at the Cedars. Without doubt a serious quarrel had taken place between the two men, but the nature and practical outcome of it were wrapped in mystery.

So much, however, of the loud war of words in the library was overheard by the servants, as to make it clear that the younger man had deeply committed himself in some way and that not for the first time. The Colonel's last words were:

"Long ago I forswore and discarded the name you have disgraced. You have already made my life a misery and a burden to me! by this last act you have altogether wrecked it!"

Within an hour the delinquent had left the house. The same night, after paying and discharging his whole household, the Colonel, too, departed. Whether he went abroad, or merely hid himself in London, or some other great city none knew. A caretaker was put into the Lodge by the agents to the estate, and curiosity had to be content with general surmise, and much imaginative weaving of probabilities. In the east turret-room, a fitful light might now and again be seen towards midnight, but, inasmuch as the village was a model one, and early hours the rule, it passed unnoticed.

The house was shut up, and where once had reigned brightness, laughter, and all the sun-flecked atmosphere of vitality and warmth, now hovered the brooding influence of desolation and neglect.

The lady and gentleman passed through the rusted, dilapidated gates, and along the leaf-strewn, weed-disfigured carriage drive up to the front door of the house.

The lady was young, piquantly fair, exquisitely gowned in the latest Paris mode, and without doubt the object of adorative attention to her companion.

He was, it was easy to see, a military man, tall, upright, about thirty years of age.

Digitized by Google

"Alwyn, it's very nice, you know, but I'm just a tiny bit afraid; it all looks so weird doesn't it?".

"It certainly does. But," looking at his watch, "I wonder where Carstairs can be, it's more than half-an-hour past the time he appointed to meet us here."

"My dear fellow! I've been here an age," came in unimpassioned tones from immediately behind the other.

Ethel uttered a little scream, while Alwyn turned sharply round in the direction of the voice.

At an open window, nearly on a level with the ground, lounged, smoking a cigar, and leaning carelessly with one arm upon the sill, an individual whose personal peculiarities seemed to fit in admirably with his surroundings. He was pale to ghastliness; his eyes piercingly black, and set somewhat unpleasantly close together. This with black hair cropped short, a heavy black moustache, and a nose of the Cæsarian order and proportions, indicated at least a forceful if an unscrupulous nature.

"Oh! Mr. Carstairs! how you startled me!"

"Did I? Sorry I'm sure. Wait a moment, and I'll open the door for you, there isn't a soul about but myself," with that disappearing into the gloom of the room.

"Well," said Alwyn, while they waited, "I always thought Carstairs to be a trifle uncanny, but his appearance in this fashion is dramatic to a degree. He looks the familiar spirit of the place to perfection, doesn't he?"

"He does indeed, dear, I hope, however, he won't be too familiar, and call up his brother spirits."

"I haven't any, Miss Devine, that I am aware of," said Carstairs imperturbably, as the door opening at that instant, he himself stood in the entranceway.

"Mr. Carstairs! if you continue to startle me in this way, you'll really frighten me to death."

"I hope not—but come in. Perhaps you don't know that the owner of this place, Colonel Reuth, is my uncle, and that 'yours truly' is the heir expectant."

"No," returned Alwyn, "is that so? You'll have to spend some money upon it when you do come into possession."

"Oh! I don't know; I rather fancy it in its present state. This is the only habitable room in the house," holding open the door for them to pass in. "The collection of old glass is here, and although you were ignorant of my connection with the owner, at the time I invited you here to see it, you will now understand that as a guide, philosopher, and so on I am in a position to be especially authoritative."

Seyd Carstairs, M.D., was no ordinary man. While walking St. Luke's, the leading London hospital, he had evinced acute perceptive powers, and a faculty for scientific investigation that earned him the approval and encouragement of his chiefs. Toxicoligy and hypnotism were not only his fads but a positive passion with him. More than once had whispers reached the Colonel's ears of shady tricks done in connection with the latter, but until he himself had personally suffered, but little credence had been given by him to the incriminatory rumours.

Since his uncle's strange disappearance he had rummaged the old house for what he could find, and had discovered, among other things, a certain old wineglass, time of the second George, connected with which was a tradition, that fairly harmonised with his own ideas of supernatural influence and power.

Now, as he ushered his visitors into the room, lined round, ceiling-high, with books in rare old bindings, he appeared to be the true presiding genius of the place.

In the centre of the room was a large octagon-topped table of heavy mahogany, black with age, its massive central supporting pillar terminating in three immense feet, carved as dragons.

Upon this table, and in the midst of it stood, upon a large silver salver of ancient workmanship, a slenderly-tall, short-stemmed wine-glass. It was of delicately thin crystal, the rim being engraved with a beautiful running pattern, gold-incised. On its side was also graven the head of a young girl, her hair arranged in the towering fashion of one-hundred-and-fifty years ago. Underneath the portrait ran the legend:

"Charming Miss Jenny Adair! Kit-Kat Club, 1792."

It needed, of course, close inspection to see this inscription clearly.

The moment Ethel's eyes encountered this crystal treasure, she was fascinated, Seyd Carstairs keeping his own gaze fixedly upon her the while.

"Oh! Mr. Carstairs! what a beautiful old glass! May I take it in my hand?"

"Not just yet, please, presently you shall."

"In all the Colonel's collection," said the doctor "this old glass," pointing to the one upon the table, "is the most remarkable specimen. Tradition has it (and from certain documents I have seen, tradition may in this instance be relied upon) that this wine-glass possesses the strange power, when in the hand of a sensitive subject, of revealing (under certain conditions, unnecessary to explain) the fate of the holder through the spirit-lips of its original Georgian owner. It is said its realistic power is so great that the old Sir Carnaby Carstairs of that day appears to the subject to be actually present and speaking."

"How interesting," said Ethel animatedly. "I wonder what he would have to say to me!"

"Nothing but good, I am sure," observed Carstairs smilingly.

"Now I am sure you must be in need of refreshment after your journey here; allow me to give you a glass of wine."

So saying he filled two glasses, but from two separate decanters.

"We will imitate the men of the period when that relic was in nightly use," he said, smiling peculiarly. "Charming Miss Ethel Devine!" lifting his glass high above his head.

"Charming Miss Ethel Devine!" repeated Alwyn, entering into the spirit of the thing.

"Gentlemen! I thank you!" and Ethel sank down in one of those old-world stately curtsies, beloved of our great, great grandmothers, the art of which, except upon the stage, and among the very few, has been lost for ever.

Still the inscrutably peculiar smiling expression on Carstairs' face.

"I don't feel quite well," said Alwyn, suddenly, "it must be this musty old place. I think I'll take a turn in the open air."

"Yes, do," said Carstairs, with a professional air, "the best thing, quite the best thing. "I'll look after Miss Devine."

"Yes, do, Alwyn, and Mr. Carstairs will explain about that glass to me while you are away."

"With pleasure," said Syd, bending his head courteously.

Alwyn Brocklebank had scarce set foot in the corridor when Carstairs, with a swift stride towards the door locked it, putting the key in his pocket.

The click of the turning key caused Ethel to look round, and see upon the doctor's face the expression of triumphant devilishness.

Digitized by Google

"Dr. Carstairs! please unlock that door! I think you are behaving very strangely. Unlock the door at once; I wish to join Mr. Brocklebank."

"Pardon me, you will sit down upon that chair," indicating one with his finger, and fixing his eyes intently upon her own; looking into them as if he would sound their very depths.

Ethel, like a bird held by the eye of some venomous snake, struggled bravely to shake off the influence of Carstairs' fascinating gaze. But in vain.

She walked to, and sat down upon the chair he had pointed out, and although trembling in every limb, submitted dimly to a power she was altogether unable to fight against.

Never taking his eyes from her face Carstairs reached out his hand and took up the wine-glass from the centre of the table. He held it out to Ethel.

"Hold it in your right hand," he said distinctly and deliberately.

She did so, passively, but with a tremor that caused wet beads to break out upon her white brow.

Drawing a chair close to her left side, Carstairs sat down, and lifting her hand, took hold of the thumb, firmly pressing it. He then after making two or three passes before her eyes, with his right hand finger tips, gently, and by a semi-rotary motion, stroked her forehead.

"Do you see anything?" he asked her.

No answer.

"Do you see anything?" in a sharp, angry tone.

"Yes, I see an old gentleman in a strange dress. He has on a wig, a large wig, and a sword by his side. He is coming towards me. He is very grave, but kindly looking. He is sitting now in the large leathern armchair by the table."

"Go on," said Carstairs, stroking her forehead once or twice again gently.

"I can hear his voice now. He is speaking to me. He calls me by my name. He says that he will tell me his own story first. 'I was a member,' he says, 'of the famous Kit-Kat Club, and can remember how Lady Mary Wortley Montague, as a small child of five years, was brought there one evening by her father the Duke of Kingston, and how we all toasted her till she clapped her little hands with glee.'"

"Don't let him run into irrelevant reminiscences," said the doctor, impatiently.

"I have asked him who the girl is whose head is on the glass, and he says:

"'That was our charming Jenny—my Jenny. We never met on club nights but we toasted her in full bumpers. One night my Lord Tregarthen slightingly mentioned her name in connection with mine. I threw a glass of wine in his face. The glass is that you hold in your hand. The next morning at daybreak, we met behind Montague House, and he ran me through the body. He had taunted me with my age, and with her youth. I was certainly an old man compared to her; but old as I was, I could have shielded her from all sorrow and care.'

"He sighs, and opening his coat, shows me a large red stain upon the bosom of his white cambric shirt. He is speaking again. 'You are young and beautiful. Your lover is a good man and true. There will be a brief moment of suspense and agony, and then all will be well. Beware of a dark enemy. He seeks now an admission of love from you. His own love for you is false, cruel, deadly! Be not deceived. Listen not to him. Beware!'"

At this moment the room was violently shaken.

"Open the door at once, whoever is inside," said a stern voice from without.

Carstairs recoiled with a white look upon his face as he recognised the speaker's tones.

"If you don't unlock the door at once, it shall be burst open!"

A moment's pause and then with a thunderous noise, the effect of a heavy body's ramming of the obstruction, the door flew open, in the entrance-way standing a tall, grey-bearded man of distinguished appearance; his eyes fiercely glowing like coals of fire.

Simultaneously with all this, was Ethel started out of her temporary trance, at the awakening moment, dropping out of her hand on to the floor the wineglass, which was shivered into a thousand fragments.

Carstairs made as if to pass by the stranger, and leave the room; but the latter gripped the doctor by the coat collars and held him as in a vice.

"So, Seyd Carstairs, you thought me miles away, did you? When I have been at your elbow here, in the Turret-room, for months, sir, watching your every movement, and witnessing your miserable endeavours—futile, I am glad to say—to get at those papers you and I know of. Young lady," continued the captor, to Ethel, who sat, trembling and white, unable to move, "young lady, I need not ask if this scoundrel, whom I have the honour to call son, has been trying his dastardly tricks upon you. My name is Reuth Carstairs, at your service, and I shall have much pleasure in doing for you everything in my power!"

"Quit your hold of me, sir!" said the younger Carstairs to his father, "or I may possibly forget myself."

"You did that years ago when you sought to clutch at my money, over my body. For a parricide, even but in intent, what mercy can there be? Still, for your mother's sake—for this young lady's sake—I will so far have consideration for you, as to let you go, but on the condition that you leave England within forty-eight hours, never to re-visit it. On this condition, and on this alone, I will remit you, to your order, wherever you name, a yearly sum sufficient to keep you, should you be so inclined, which I very much doubt, out of mischief. Now, sir, relieve us of your presence."

As the baffled man turned to go, Alwyn, roused from his torpor by the uproar and bustle (he had fallen in the corridor on his way to the garden after drinking the drugged wine) met him face to face.

Both young; both hot tempered, the consequences of a personal encounter between the two would have been serious, but the Colonel took the matter into his own hands.

"You!" to his son, "go! and you, sir," to Alwyn, "let an old man advise you, attend to this young lady, who sorely needs your aid. As for that person I have dealt with him, and you will be troubled with him no more for ever."

In a short while Ethel recovered, leaving the house with Alwyn and the Colonel.

She never mentions now the terrible experiences of that day.

The Colonel still lives, and although he has made no definite promises, a little bird has whispered that some day Ethel's eldest son the second Alwyn will reign as master in a rehabilitated and glorified Cedars.

R. E.

Digitized by Google

FREE, FREE. NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring

Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money. Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, which-ever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5). 282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.

THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.

Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.

SOLE AGENT:

GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.

Price 2/9 post free.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,

63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE "IBIS" TOOTH POWDER

(Registered)

Is the only Dentifrice which, if regularly used, cleans discoloured teeth and dissolves away tartar. It is by this wonderful power that it permanently preserves good teeth and prevents further decay in bad teeth. In this way also it is an effectual PREVENTIVE of toothache, neuralgia, and gumboils.

Sold in 6d. and 1/- boxes, or post free for 7d. and 1/- from the ANTEXEMA COMPANY, 83 Castle Road, London, N.W.

Neuralgia Positively Cured!

Free Test Offered.

The annexed cut presents in the prominent white lines the nerves most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. Sufferers will know only too well the pain tracks, and will be glad to know of a Simple and Sure Remedy. The proprietors will send Free two sample ZOX Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped envelope to ZOX CO., 11 HATTON GARDEN, LONDON, E.C.

DO YOU KNOW

That with Every Copy of This Week's

HOME NOTES

A Complete Novelette of 16 pages, entitled "A Leap in the Dark," is GIVEN AWAY?

HOME NOTES is the Best and Daintiest of Ladies' Weeklies. You should Order a Copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,

7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home-remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lbs., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business. GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 106 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

SEND FOR

DR. EVANS'S (U.S.A.)

Pamphlet on Nervous Diseases of All Kinds. THIS PAMPHLET describes all the symptoms which arise from Diseases of the NERVOUS SYSTEM. It is up-to-date, having been compiled after years of labour and experience in the Treatment of these Maladies. It is complete, practical, and can be readily understood and acted upon. It gives pure and simple advice to Sufferers. Send stamped addressed envelope to GEORGE WRIGHT, Esq., Colne House, REMBRANDT ROAD, LEE, LONDON, S.E. (Name this Paper.)

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR

KAPUTINE

SAFE REMEDY CURES

HEADACHE and NEURALGIA

IMMEDIATELY,

And is sold by all leading Chemists in Packets of 18 Doses, 1s.

To ANYONE HAVING THE LEAST DIFFICULTY, it will be sent post free for 12 Stamps by "KAPUTINE Ltd.," Huddersfield; or, on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope, A. M. Kaputine, Huddersfield, you will receive a free sample.

The fact that "KAPUTINE" is recommended by many leading Medical Men, and is used in National Hospitals and Infirmaries proves that it is THE, THE recognised SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHES.

Refuse Substitutes and demand "KAPUTINE," the Safe Remedy. There is no substitute "LIKE IT"; nothing "AS GOOD"; nothing "SIMILAR."

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium

IN these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, October 8th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 223.

WHAT is the word which, if spelt forwards, is a measure, backwards a tree, and, transposed, a river in England?

No. 224.

I WAS before the Creation, I still exist in the depths of the earth, and yet a babe can destroy me in a moment. What am I?

No. 225.

THE following letters, when re-arranged, will form a well-known proverb:

AA BB DD EE HHHHH IIII NNN OO RR SS TTTT U WW.

No. 226.

FROM equivalents of the following, form a word-square, the diagonal of which will give the names of two famous cities in the British Isles:

Pure; full of interstices; a plant; a disease on cloth; a bird; an idea.

No. 227.

MY FIRST must surely be my WHOLE,
Although he looks so learned,
He sees not Simpkins with my NEXT,
Each time his back is turned.

And thus, though Simpkin's known to be
My WHOLE, the lazy loon
Will get a wrangler's first degree,
While I, at most, the spoon.

No. 228.

THE initials read forwards, and the finals read backwards, of equivalents of the following, will give the name of something no one can do without:

A flower; a fruit; a kind of pigeon; a reverberating sound; an American root.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 205 to 210.

THE first prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Miss Isobel Barnes, of 68 Lydford Road, Paddington, W., whose solution was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "The Hope of the Family," by Alphonse Daudet, has been sent to each of the following:

W. J. Barter, Cork.
D. Jelly, Plumstead.
J. L. Robertson, Dundee.
George Humphreys, Nottingham.
A. Gresham, South Hackney, N.E.
J. Morris, Oxford.
J. B. Crane, Bognor.
F. J. Porter, Liverpool.
Miss Jessie Whitaker, Barnsley.
H. Amdrus, Beckenham.

SOLUTIONS OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.

Nos. 211 to 216.

No. 211.

D E W E T
E D I L E
W I G A N
E L A T E
T E N E T

No. 212. Proeuberance.

No. 213. "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

No. 214. M.P.

No. 215. OTHELLO LAERTES.

O pa L
T itani A
H eb E
E lixi R
L imi T
L ov E
O asi S

No. 216. SERINGAPATAM.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " " "	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half " "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 2nd, if intended for the issue on sale Oct. 16th, and dated October 20th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

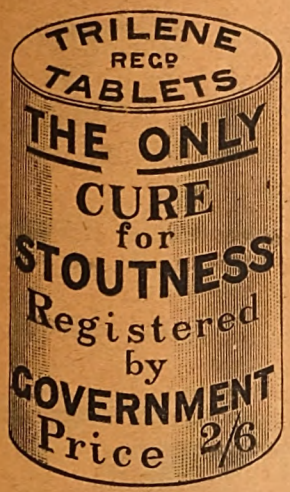
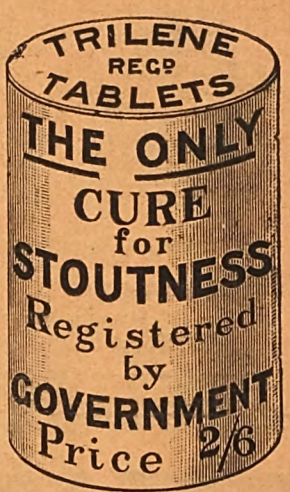
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. B. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

MISS NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver nr Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

THE "GEO. R. SIMS"

HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO"

"While you wait"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY.
1s. 6d.
Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:
"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hairdressers all over the world, 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:
The Geo. R. Sims Co., 81c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

DESCRIPTION:
New Sun Shade Eyepieces.
Telescopic Slides Ormolu Gilt
Ebonised Adjusting Screw.
Crocodile Leather Covered Body.
Nickel and Gilt Lens Mounts.
Catalogue FREE.

J. N. MASTERS LTD, will send one of these handsome FIELD and MARINE GLASSES, price value 14/6, complete with Crocodile Leather Case and Sling, to any reader who mentions Short Stories on receipt of 2/6. If you do not approve of them, we will return your 2/6 in full. If you approve of them you send us 2/- on receipt, and 2/- each month for five months; but should you prefer to send the balance at once, send only 10/6, as we allow you 1/6 discount; or you may send 13/- at once, and if you do not approve of the Glasses we will return your 13/- in full.

J. N. MASTERS LTD., RYE, SUSSEX.

EVERY RING 18 CARAT GOLD HALL MARKED, SET WITH REAL GEMS.

FOR SIZE CUT HOLE IN PIECE OF CARD BOARD.

Ring Size-card FREE.

J. N. MASTERS LTD., RYE, SUSSEX.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FRESH FACTS ABOUT THE £10 NOTE SCHEME. See page 425.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 614. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 6TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

Indigestion:

The Stomach is like "Fire" or "Water," a good friend but a bad master. As a friend it craves work to do, which is shown by good Appetite, and it sets about its work with so much energy that we have efficient Digestion, and later on perfect Assimilation—the Source of Life and Strength.

On the other hand, the Stomach as a master works fitfully and in a sulky manner. This soon spoils the Appetite and ruins the Digestion. Then the suffering begins. The partially-digested Food becomes an irritant, and we have a host of disagreeable Symptoms, such as Nausea, Flatulence, Distension, Pain, Loss of Appetite, Headache, Constipation, Sleeplessness, and a general tired feeling of weakness.

Now we can change the Stomach from a despot master into a willing friend by simply helping it with occasional doses of Guy's Tonic, until it is shortly able to carry on its work without assistance.

As a direct consequence of taking Guy's Tonic good Appetite returns, and with it the capacity to enjoy Food, to digest it, and to gain strength therefrom. General experience extended over many years proves conclusively that Guy's Tonic corrects and cures both neglect and misuse of the Stomach, and strengthens it for future work.

Flatulence Corrected by Guy's Tonic

Mr. A. J. Crabb, writes from 41 Upper Tulse Hill, London, S.W.:

"A Lady friend of mine, who has been for a long time ineffectually treated by a Physician for Indigestion and Flatulence, wishes you to know that Guy's Tonic has quite cured her. I must say that in all cases where I have recommended Guy's Tonic the effects have been simply marvellous."

Starving Amid Plenty.

Mrs. F. Thomason, of 27 Park Road, Folkestone, writes:

"I have derived wonderful benefit from Guy's Tonic. Everyone says I am looking better, and then I tell them what I am taking. They hardly believe that a simple Tonic would make such a change in me, because I was simply Starving through my Food not Digesting."

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on sale at all Chemists and Stores.

10/6 Allen Foster & Co 10/6

SOLE MAKERS OF

THE 'ALFOSCO' COSTUMES

Buy Direct by Parcel Post from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

Design No. 326. 10/6.

A Costume any Lady can wear.—Prettily and neatly trimmed with tucks of velvet and cloth. STERLING VALUE. This bodice has a tight-fitting back, with full front. The Skirt is cut to drape gracefully. Made in the Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth—two splendid wearing materials. Colours: Black, Navy, Grey, Light and Dark Fawn, Brown, Green, Royal Red, Purple, Blue-Grey, &c. Good Fit Guaranteed. Price only 10/6. Carriage paid, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d. In sending order, please give bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of Skirt in front.

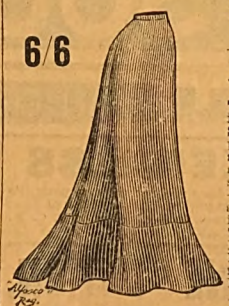
10/6

7/6

Send Postcard for PATTERNS and New Sketch Book for Autumn, and CATALOGUE of BARGAINS, Post free.

Design No. 2161. 7/6.

A Great Bargain in Jackets. Marvellous Value for 7/6. Made in good President Beaver Cloth in Black, Fawn, and Brown. The Jacket is stylishly braided, and has a Velvet collar. All Sizes in Stock. SEND FOR ONE. Price only 7/6. Carriage 6d. extra. In sending order, please give bust measurement (under arms). Money returned if not approved.



6/6

Design No. 323. 6/6.

Design No. 326. 10/6.

Design No. 323. 6/6.

The New and Fashionable Costume Skirt. This Skirt has proved an immense success. It is made in all the colours of the two splendid wearing fabrics—The Specialite Serge and the Venetian Coating. All Sizes in Stock. This Skirt is cut in the New Circular Shape, and has a 16-inch flounce round bottom, which is lined with good linenette. A Bargain for 6/6. Carriage paid, 5d. extra. Send for one.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

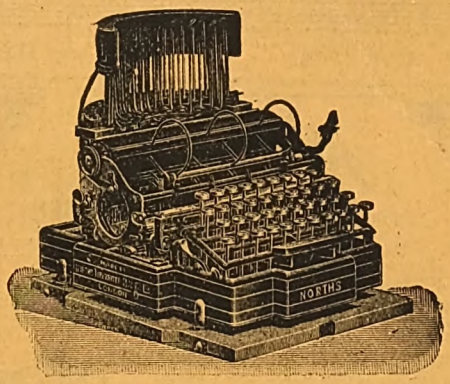
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

NORTH'S TYPEWRITER.

THE PREMIER MACHINE OF ENGLISH MAKE.



CATALOGUES—Apply

27a LEADENHALL STREET, LONDON, E.C.

35 TITHEBARN STREET, LIVERPOOL.

COSTUMES AND MANTLES FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN

Sent by Parcel Post without delay direct from

JOHN NOBLE Ltd.

☞ MODEL 256.—A Velvet-trimmed, well-cut Bodice and full wide Skirt in the latest tailor design. Price complete Costume 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage 5d. Produced in the John Noble Cheviot-Serge or Costume Coating.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of Costume Coating or Cheviot Serge (6yds.—52in. wide) for 7/6; carriage 8d.

Colours: Black, Navy, Myrtle, Brown, Fawn, Khaki, Grey, and Royal Blue.

Sizes in Stock of Ladies' Costumes are: 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms); Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other size made to measure, 1/6 extra.

SPECIAL VALUE.

MODEL 274. ☞

Tailor-designed Sac Coat made in good Fawn or Black Beaver Cloth—Velvet Collar. Price only 8/6; carriage 6d.

Please send bust (under arms) measurement when ordering.

Readers will oblige by naming Short Stories when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD.,

No. 46 BROOK STREET MILLS,

MANCHESTER.

TO THE QUEEN PURVEYORS

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA. GRAVY. JULIENNE. MULLIGATAWNY. TOMATO. HOUSEHOLD. CRESSY. &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,

63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 614.] For the Week Ending October 6th, 1900. [One Penny.

THE WIDOW'S ENTANGLEMENT.

Dear Charlie,—Come to Willow Lodge for a week or two by the next train—if you can't come then, come Monday. My wife has arranged a picnic for Tuesday, and she says she must have you. It is your dull season now, I know, so you can get away well enough, and I shall take no excuses.—Fred Winkley.

P.S.—Mrs. Winchester is here—I thought it right to tell you, because you hate widows; but she is quite harmless.

I sat there in a brown study over this characteristic epistle. I could go well enough—there was no reason in the world why I should not do so, and Winkley's was the most charming, sociable, free-and-easy place at which to visit—a perfect Liberty Hall. But——

When I had reached this stage in my reflections, Kate came in. Kate is my sister, and because she chanced to be born a year and ten days before I did, has always felt it one of her duties to exercise over me a sort of superintending care—to see that I did not suffer for want of good advice. I tossed her the letter to read.

"It promises well," said my sage monitor in pink muslin, "all but the postscript. Charlie, as sure as you go there you are a lost man; the widow will have you."

"But Mrs. Winchester is not the dangerous kind of widow. Her husband has been dead four years, and she isn't married yet. Besides, she has no need to be in a hurry—she is only twenty-three."

"You seem to know all about her!"

There was a satirical twinkle in Kate's eye which I did not like. I defended myself.

"Of course I do. She is Fred's wife's cousin. No one could see Fred Long without hearing of her—he thinks she is perfection, and he wanted to introduce me to her long ago, only I told him widows were my detestation."

"So he invites you to spend a week or two in a house with one? Very handsome of him, upon my word."

"I suppose he did not think about her until he had written the note; you see, he only mentions her in the postscript. I won't be oolish enough to give up such a pleasant trip because Mrs. Winkley is entertaining her cousin. I shall go on Monday."

"The widow will have you."

Kate shook her head solemnly.

"We shall see."

All rights reserved.]

"I'll lay you a wager—the best box of cigars I can find in London, against what?"

"A pretty set of pearls, which you shall wear at my wedding if the widow gets me. And, now, Kate, do look out for my buttons. It would be shocking to encounter my fair enemy in a state of dilapidation."

"Oh, men, with sisters dear!
Oh, men, with mothers and wives!
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives," hummed Kate's saucy voice, as she bounded upstairs to register our wager.

Monday afternoon found me at Willow Lodge. It was just after dinner—the hour at which everybody in the country goes to sleep. Not knowing when I should come, no one was at the station to meet me, and I walked up to the house, leaving my portmanteau to be sent for later.

The front door stood open, and I went quietly into the drawing-room. It was untenanted; at least, I thought so at first, but as I walked along towards the farther end of the apartments, I saw lying on a sofa a lady.

She was reclining there with the careless grace of a child. She had on a muslin dress, of a cool, fresh tint, with loose, full sleeves which revealed plump, tempting arms. One hand was crushed like a roseleaf under her glowing cheek, and the other still held a favourite volume. Her lips were bright as scarlet berries, and her hair was gold, just dashed with bronze, such hair as Page always paints for his ideal women.

I never could have a better chance for looking at Mrs. Winchester—for I made certain she was the lady. I could see everything but her eyes, and I decided that they were blue.

I was very much surprised—half disappointed, perhaps—the lady was so different from the ideal I had formed of her. Fred had never described her to me, except by such vague adjectives as "splendid," "magnificent," "stunning,"; but somehow, I had always thought of her as a regal, commanding brunette, a type of proud, stately, impassioned womanhood. She was nothing of all this. Small enough, a most, for a big fellow, like Fred Winkley, to put in his pocket, with cheeks that suggested dimples, and a coaxing, girlish expression on her face, even in sleep—surely, I was in no danger. My cigars were safe enough, and my heart likewise. But it would not do to stand there looking at her too long. She might wake up, and what a scene there would be for a bashful man!

Digitized by Google

I went away from her with the sort of regret one always feels in leaving a pretty picture, and made my next sortie into the library. Here was another sleeper—Fred, himself, this time. To him I was merciless—I overset a footstool which was in my way, and strode noisily towards him. He started up, rubbing his eyes briskly.

"What, Charlie, that you? Too bad, upon my word. I ought to have been at the station to elbow you up here. But you never wrote what train you would take."

"It's all the better as it is. My unexpected advent has procured me an unexpected pleasure. I have seen Mrs. Winchester—asleep, in the drawing-room."

Fred laughed, a good hearty laugh, full of fun and frolic.

"That is rich. What do you think of her?"

"I think you were talking nonsense when you called her magnificent. She is simply a pretty girl — very pretty."

"Very pretty," repeated Fred after me, with a whistle of consideration. "Not at all in Vi's style, but very pretty, surely."

"Vi" was Fred's wife — a superb woman of the dark type, kindly, but hasty and passionate. It had been a love-match, and Fred thought her perfection. What good critics we men are of other men's wives!

She was reclining there with the careless grace of a child.

That evening, before tea, I was formally presented to Mrs. Winchester. Her eyes were not blue, as I had fancied, but brown.

"She has eyes so soft and brown,
She gives you a side glance and looks down;
Beware, beware,
She is fooling thee,"

I muttered to myself, taking a leaf out of Kate's book.

I had to acquit her, however, of taking much pains to please me. She ate her supper quite silently, with a kind of preoccupied air. Mrs. Winkley attempted to rally her.

"Maud's thoughts are prophetic," she said teasingly. "They have gone into the country of to-morrow, with Longfellow's Indian. We are to be a merry house to-morrow, Mr. Cothwaite. Dr. Dinsmore and his sister are coming in the morning. They are Mrs. Winchester's special friends."

Even this did not provoke Mrs. Winchester to any retort. When she had finished her coffee she went out upon the terrace, and looked off where the shadows of the sunset clouds were resting phantom-like on the mountain. Naturally enough I followed her. It was a splendid sunset—June at its ripest and richest; when the world, in a dream of beauty, forgets itself for a little while and lapses into Eden.

Looking out over the mountain, neither of us spoke until Fred and his "Vi" came upon the scene. Then the conversation was lively and general. Maud Winchester began to sparkle. A pretty little pink spot burnt into each cheek, and her brown eyes kindled. I understood, now, Fred's raptures about her. I could see that she might be very winning. If she had not been a widow, I even thought I might have loved her myself.

The next morning, walking down the carriage drive after breakfast, a gay train flashed by me. Half-a-dozen ladies and gentlemen all on horseback, and, leading them, a handsome, haughty woman, in dark grey riding habit. I followed slowly, and reached the house just in time to see the gentleman of the party bow with the grace of a courtier over Mrs. Winchester's hand, and then raise it to his lips.

"Dr. Dinsmore!" I said to myself. "Mrs. Winchester's No. 2, probably," and I surveyed the stranger with a scrutinising, anxious interest, for which I should have been puzzled to account. I did not like his looks. There seemed to me something wily and cat-like in the glance of his uncertain, unresting eyes. His suave features looked to me like a mask; his very air of ceremonious politeness repelled me. Nor, when I was presented to him, did I like any better the persuasive, insinuating tones of his gently-modulated voice. The whole man seemed to me hollow and insincere.

His sister was the haughty beauty I had seen at the head of the cavalcade. I liked her looks better. At least, I thought, she was honest and fearless. She made no attempt to conciliate anyone, yet, instinctively, everyone obeyed her.

Digitized by Google

The rest of the party have nothing to do with my story. They were lay figures, merely, imported for the day in sufficient numbers to make our picnic entertaining—they went away at night, and I saw them no more. Dr. Dinsmore and his sister I soon found were to stay for some time in the house.

Time went on, and I was puzzled as to the nature of the acquaintance between Dr. Dinsmore and Mrs. Winchester. He was constantly by her side. He put on her shawl; he carried her basket or her parasol; he seemed to make it his study to anticipate her wishes. But yet, in spite of his devotion, I began to doubt, after a little while, whether she liked his attentions. Either she did not care to be alone with him, or she thought it rude, in so small a company, to confine herself exclusively to one. She evidently strove to make the conversation general. I could have fancied, even, that she preferred talking to me. I should have been better able to judge had not Miss Dinsmore, in her grand, careless way, appropriated me, and kept me constantly by her side.

A week passed on so, and at its close I made some feeble suggestion about going home. It was to Fred, and he at once over-ruled my weak intention.

"You must stay for a week or two yet—at least, until Dinsmore and his sister go away. I don't like either of them, and I am not going to be left alone to entertain them. I wonder what hold Dinsmore has on Maud Winchester? She seems to me like a poor little struggling fly, whom a great, black, ugly spider has got stranded in his net."

Before I had been ten days at Willow Lodge, I loved Mrs. Winchester with every pulse of my heart. It was a perfectly inexplicable matter to me. I really knew nothing of her, beyond the playful grace of her manners, the sweet, winning style of her beauty. I had not had one hour of serious conversation with her—I knew nothing of her principles, little, even, of her tastes, and yet I would have staked my life on her goodness; trusted, without a moment's hesitation, my whole future happiness to her keeping.

I determined to stay on at Willow Lodge until I knew something more definite of the relations between her and Dr. Dinsmore. I looked out of the window, as I made up my mind to this, and I saw them coming up the walk together.

She had never looked lovelier, more girlish and beguiling. I went out and joined them. I was not deceived, I could not be, in the eagerness with which she turned to me from her companion; or the relief she seemed to manifest at having their tête-à-tête interrupted. Still, five minutes after, when he told her, rather than asked her, to go with him to the top of the hill, where they could get the best view of the sunset, she turned to go at once.

I was just resolving to make a third to their company, at the risk of being considered an intruder, when Miss Dinsmore's compelling hand fell on my arm.

"Let us go sunset-seeing, too, Mr. Cothwaite," she said, in tones that I could not have disregarded without rudeness; and then, seeing my eyes still follow those two retreating figures, she added:

"Not with them, though. Have you not eyes enough to see that they are in that stage when two are company? They were a great deal together last winter, and I have always found they liked their own society better than mine."

I went with her, after that, unresistingly. So this singular intimacy was no new thing! Miss Dinsmore must have found me but a stupid companion, for while I walked mechanically at her side, my thoughts had followed Maud Winchester's light footsteps to the hill-top. Probably this mattered little to Anna Dinsmore, for I could see clearly enough that she took no interest in me, beyond the service she could do her brother in keeping me out of the way.

This was only a specimen of the way we went on for a week longer—Mrs. Winchester evidently, as it appeared to me, almost disliking Dr. Dinsmore, and yet constantly with him—almost servilely obedient to his commands. Once or twice I came upon them suddenly, engaged in very earnest talk. She seemed to be pleading with him for some promise which he would not give her. I loved her more every day, and my interest in the matter became so intense it was almost painful.

At length I had an opportunity to understand it all. I had stretched myself on the grass, at the foot of a clump of the pines which were scattered here and there in the grounds, and I lay there thinking silently, busied in conjectures about the doctor and Mrs. Winchester. I had no thought of hearing anything then and there which would tend to elucidate the mystery; but presently they came, walking together as usual, and sat down on the other side of the trees, where I could hear every word they said.

Strict honour would have dictated that I should at once have made known to them my presence, which clearly they had not suspected. But I was in love, and here was an opportunity to unravel the mystery which hung around the woman to whom I longed to consecrate all my future. "All's fair in love and war," says the old adage, and perhaps, most men would have lain still as I did, and—listened. (It is an ugly word, and does not look well written.) Mrs. Winchester spoke first.

"Once more, Dr. Dinsmore, I implore you to release me from our engagement. I do not love you. Is it manly to force me to be your wife?"

"I think it is,"—in those smooth, hypocritical tones of his—"at least, I think it is like a man who loves to win his prize in whatever manner he can—by fair means,

The gentleman of the party bowed with the grace of a courtier over Mrs. Winchester's hand.

Digitized by Google

Miss Dinsmore's compelling hand fell on my arm.

if possible, if not, by any which present themselves. Why do you not have some consideration for me? My happiness is worth just as much to me as yours is to you. Why did you promise to be my wife if you did not love me?—or what right have you to be so capricious?"

"None—no right," she said humbly. (Poor little frightened dove). "I know it is all wrong on my part, only that you did over-persuade me, and I promi ed you thoughtlessly. But I don't love you, Dr. Dinsmore, and I can't make you happy."

"But y u should love me, Maud"—his voice sank into low, pathetic, passionate pleading—"you should love me—I would make you. You couldn't live with me and receive the devotion of my whole life, and not love me. Once mine, and I know I can win your heart, unless—Maud, you have not dared to love anyone else?"

How eagerly I listened for her answer.

"No one else has ever asked me to love them. It is not that."

I suppose her words satisfied him, but there was no hope in them for me.

"Then, child, I can make you love me—I know it."

"Why don't you?" she said, with a sort of dreary hopelessness that was very touching, "When I promised to marry you, that was the way you persuaded me. You said you loved me as no one else would ever love me again, and you would make me love you. I have been waiting for that time to come, and it has not arrived. I do not even like you as well as I did eight months ago."

"It would be all different then. You do not understand it. I have no opportunity to make you love me now. It would be different if you were all mine—my wife, whom I had a right to love, and protect, and cherish."

Her answer came to my ear, very low, but firm.

"I think that would not make you dearer, Dr. Dinsmore. Remember, however I may seem to you, I am a woman, and no child. I have been married once to a man whom I did not love. I would rather die than go through the same ordeal again."

Her words thrilled me with a strange joy. If I could win her, then, I should have no rival, not even in the memory of her dead husband.

At this stage, Dinsmore's temper got the better of him. He said, in a low, stern, angry tone—if she had heard him speak so many times, it was no wonder she did not love him.

"Madam, if you have no consideration for me, I must have some for myself. I will not be the victim of a jilt. If you refuse to fulfil our engagement, I will inforce my claim legally. How will you like the publicity of such a trial."

"It would kill me."

There was anguish in her tone. I knew how she was wringing those helpless little hands together. I could fancy the despair in those brown eyes; the piteous quiver round the sweet mouth. How I longed to spring to her side, and offer her, then and there, the support of one true heart. But I must be prudent. She might not be prepared for such a declaration, or ready to forgive me for listening to her secret. I could not run such a risk to my own chances of success as it would be to speak then. So I was silent.

"I am resolved, Mrs. Winchester. You have, for once, a firm man to deal with. You can make of me what you will—your bitter, uncompromising enemy, or a husband who would worship you."

"Not my husband—oh, never my husband!" I heard her gasp, as he moved away. I expected then a storm of sobs; but no sound came, and soon she got up and walked after him.

Going to the house by a roundabout way, I summoned Fred to my confidence, and told him all—my love for Maud Winchester, and the conversation I had heard, which unravelled the secret of her singular relations with Dr. Dinsmore.

"The coward!" he cried, as I concluded. "I will turn him out of my house to-night; the paltry, pitiful wretch!"

"Not so fast," I said, putting my hand on his arm. "You mustn't forget how I obtained the information, and that you cannot reveal my secret without my leave. I am not at all sure that turning the medical gentleman out of doors would be the best way to deal with him.

Digitized by Google

We must contrive some way to keep him from drawing her before the public in a breach of promise suit."

Fred considered a few moments, then he said:

"He is mean enough, but he would never do that. What he wants of her is her fortune. She is a fascinating little creature, and he may have had some sort of liking for her at first, but he does not love her now—if he did, he would never bully her in this dastardly way. She is rich; and that is what Dinsmore is after. Her first match was one made by her friends, and a very unhappy one it was. Poor little thing, she ought to have a chance at happiness now. I hope you can win her, Charlie; I would ask nothing better for either of you. I don't think there's any danger of Dinsmore suing her. It would be a sure loss of his professional and social position, and any damages he could get wouldn't pay him. Besides, if he should, you could shield her from anything unpleasant—just make no attempt to contest the suit and quietly pay the damages out of her fortune, if it is large enough."

"I don't care at all for the fortune," I cried, with the enthusiasm of an honest lover. "It is only herself I want. Let him take all the money, so he will peacefully give her to me."

"I am a married man of three years' standing," said Fred drily, "and though I love my wife as dearly as anyone can, I never yet found money any inconvenience. So we won't offer the fortune to him, unless he asks for it."

I had stretched myself on the grass at the foot of a clump of pines.

The next day I contrived to meet Mrs. Winchester for an instant in the drawing-room, when Dinsmore was off duty. I begged her to talk with me a few moments, for I had something of especial importance to say to her.

She looked at me in surprise, but answered me quietly.

"I will, if you will contrive the opportunity. You may have noticed that I have not many moments to myself."

Fate, or, rather, Fred, managed it for me after all, in a simple, straightforward manner, that was very refreshing. It was after our early tea, and he said carelessly:

"I have ordered the horses for a drive. For once we'll go in couples. I shall claim Miss Dinsmore—her society is more of a rarity to me than that of either of the other ladies. Doctor, you will drive my wife, if you please; and, Charlie, Mrs. Winchester will fall to your share."

I saw Anna Dinsmore bite her scornful lips with rage, and there was a white light of anger in the doctor's eyes; but he was too much of a man of the world to insult a lady, his hostess, by offering any objections. He bowed politely, and made a speech about Mr. Winkley's generosity, which might be taken for earnest or satire, according as the hearer understood, or did not understand the state of affairs.

Fred had taken care that I should have a fast horse and a fair start, and presently we were out of sight. A mile further on, I turned into a lonely, unfrequented road, with which I thought Dinsmore was not familar, and where, at any rate I could trust to Fred's engineering to prevent me from being followed.

Then I let the reins lie loosely over the horse's back—his pace slackened, and I could talk to my companion.

"Maud," I said, "forgive me if you think what I am about to say presumptuous, on so short an acquaintance; but I cannot go away from here and leave it unsaid. I love you with all the strength and fervour of a man's heart. The only thing I long for is the power to make you happy. Could you love me? Have you seen enough of me to know your own heart?"

There was encouragement in the swift blush that dyed her cheek; but tears filled her eyes, and she said, in faltering tones:

"You would not have asked me what you have, Mr. Cothwaite, if you knew just how I am situated."

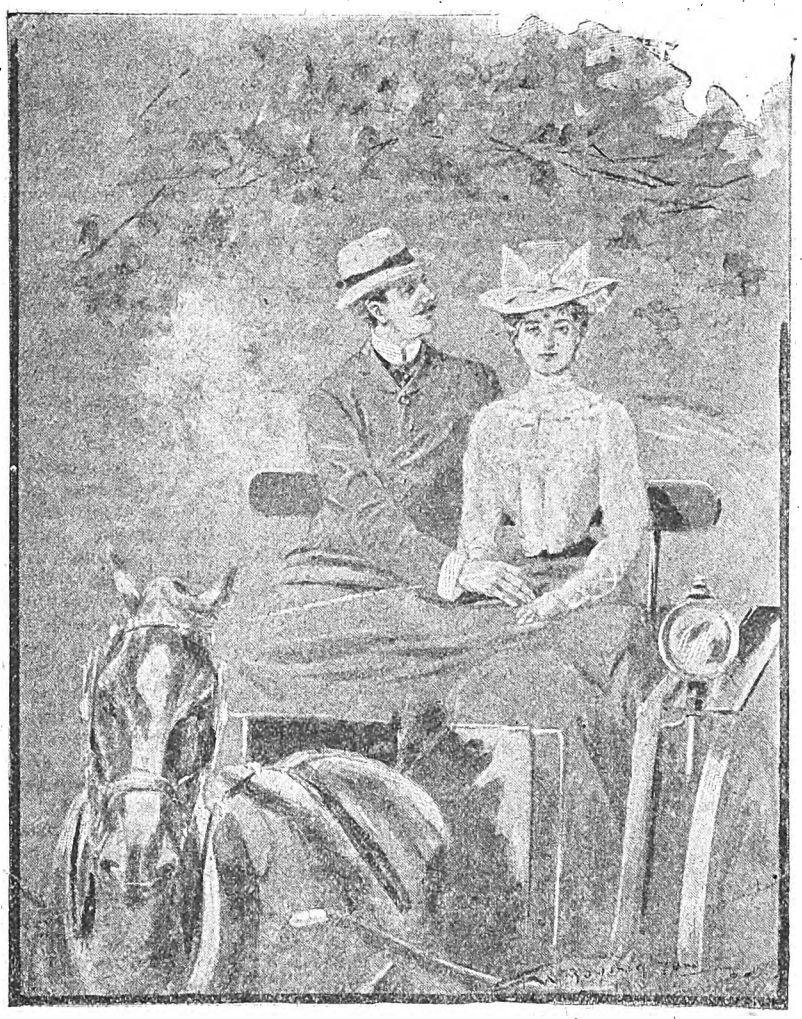
"No matter now for the situation, only tell me quickly, before anyone interrupts us, do you think you could ever love me?"

"I do love you—oh, too well!—it was because I saw you and loved you that I knew I could never marry Dr. Dinsmore. But perhaps you will not care for my love when you know all."

The dear, honourable little thing—unwilling to let herself be happy for a moment until she had told me her whole painful secret! I took both her hands in mine—it was well that Fred had given me a safe horse, for I forgot him just then—I, but what is the use of giving you a stereotyped love scene? Let every young gentleman insert here what he would have done in my place. Ladies, if they can't trust to their own imaginations, will find the programme in any novel.

When I had taken from her dear lips my first kiss, I told her that I did know all. I explained to her how I became possessed of my information, and then I told her my plan for relieving her from his persecutions. It was that we should be married the next day. Fred could easily make all the arrangements for us; and in the afternoon we could drive off by ourselves, and I would bring her home as Mrs. Cothwaite. Then, if he chose to sue her, let him bring his suit. I could manage it all for her, and in the safe shelter of a happy home, she would not so much mind it—at the worst, it would only be the loss of a few thousands, which we should never miss.

Digitized by Google



I let the reins lie loosely over the horse's back.

At first, I know, my proposition startled her by its suddenness. But I used all the eloquence of which I was master; and I think the longing to be delivered from the persecutions of Dr. Dinsmore, who had become to her a perfect nightmare, had yet more influence than my words.

At length I won her promise to be my wife before the next sunset. I thought I had never known what happiness was until then. Is there not a season in every man's life who has ever honestly and truly loved, when Elysium seems no fable?

We reached home soon after the rest of our party. It would not have done to excite any suspicion by late hours.

We found them all in the drawing-room — Dinsmore in a savage temper, as was evident in his sullen, lowering glance and restless motions; Miss Dinsmore trying to cover up his rudeness by extra brilliancy; and Fred and Vi apparently perfectly at ease. Maud avoided all conversation by saying that she believed her ride had given her a headache, and presently retiring.

I talked gaily until everyone was ready to say good-night; and then I spent half-an-hour with Fred in my own room, settling all the arrangements for the morrow.

Next morning, Mrs. Winchester made her appearance at breakfast in the sunniest of moods. A lovely bloom was on her cheek, and a bright light in her eye. She was gracious even to Dr. Dinsmore.

I longed so for a few fond words—a whisper of the love of which my heart was so full — but her look told me to have faith in her. I controlled my impatience, and waited.

After luncheon, Fred asked Dinsmore to drive. He had something which he particulary wished to discuss with him. Dinsmore could not decently refuse. A second time he was a martyr to his politeness.

A few moments afterwards another equipage came to the door, and at the same time my Maud came downstairs.

In an hour from that time she was my wife, and we drove back to Willow Lodge. I introduced Mrs. Cothwaite to Dr. Dinsmore, and then I handed him my card.

"That will be my wife's address in case you wish to send her notice of your suit in court."

His face turned crimson. Rascal as he was, I couldn't help pitying him. He said, hesitatingly:

"As a lover, Mr. Cothwaite, you should know that a man in love says many things to carry his point which he does not exactly mean. Your wife is safe from any persecutions of mine."

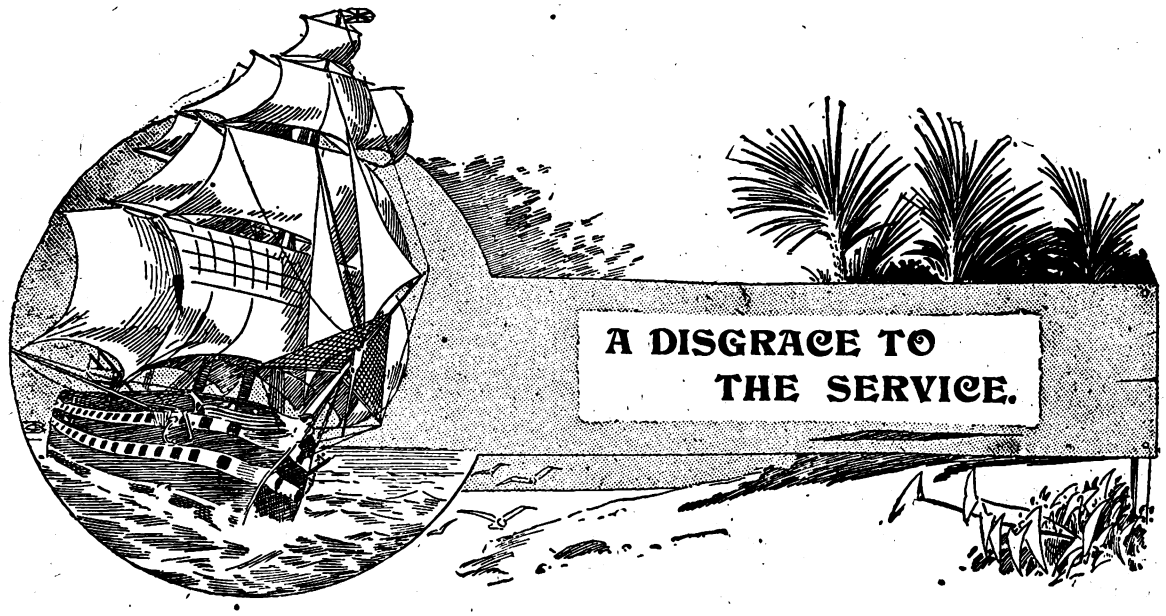
The next morning he and his sister left Willow Lodge. They left behind them two happy hearts.

It is five years since, and we have never wearied of each other, I and my Maud.

So Kate had her pearls, and the widow won me.

R. H.

Digitized by Google



A DISGRACE TO THE SERVICE.

DENNIS CLARKE stood up in the dock and faced the magistrate with a sullen, defiant air. He had been brought up three days previously in the same place charged with being a deserter.

His old comrades were so ashamed at the time of Dennis Clarke's connection with the regiment that they would not have thanked anybody for drawing attention to it. But to return to our story.

The deserter had been remanded, on his first appearance, to await an escort, or to see what was the decision of the military authorities concerning him. The commanding officer had replied to the communication from the civil authorities acquainting them with his decision respecting the deserter, and Dennis Clarke now took his place in the dock to hear that decision.

As the magistrate looked at the deserter an involuntary look of scorn crossed his face, and his lip curled with contempt.

"Private Clarke," he said, "or rather Dennis Clarke, for even the name of Private is too honourable an appellation for you, I have this morning to acquaint you with your commanding officer's decision, and unless you are utterly shameless surely his letter will raise a blush for your lost manhood. Listen what he says of you. After recounting some of your escapades and delinquencies he goes on to say that he does not consider it worth while sending an escort to take you back again, as he has come to the conclusion that you will never be anything but a disgrace to the service, and he therefore leaves you for the civil authorities to deal with."

As the disgraced soldier heard this strong condemnation of himself he gave a start of anger, which, however, immediately gave place to a contemptuous, half-triumphant smile as the magistrate again addressed him.

"If you have one spark of manhood left, if you are in the least worthy of the name of Englishman, go away, and in civil life endeavour to regain the character you have lost in military life. Had the words of your colonel's letter been used with reference to me I don't think I should have ever been able to look my fellowmen in the face again. However, you are young, and may still do something to wipe out the stain now placed upon you, though I am afraid, as far as your old comrades are concerned, you will always be remembered as the man who was dismissed as a disgrace to his regiment and the service. Now go, and for Heaven's sake rouse yourself and show some sign of manliness."

The ex-soldier stepped from the dock with an air of indifference, real or assumed. The decision of his commanding officer had come as a great surprise to him, and yet it had in a manner pleased him.

His military career, thus ignominiously terminated, had been begun badly. He had not enlisted from a love of the service, nor was it owing to the glamour of the smart uniform. In his previous civilian days Dennis Clarke had been very badly afflicted with a very common complaint, viz., laziness, and so long as he could get hold of sufficient money to buy beer, someone else could provide food and shelter.

His parents, with whom he at that time lived, had stood it as long as they could, but eventually his father had risen in anger against him, and with many bitter words had driven him out of doors, telling him that if he would not work neither should he eat, at least, not at his expense.

It was at this juncture that he fell in with a recruiting sergeant, and as he was a strong, healthy fellow, the sergeant painted his picture of the soldier's life in his most glowing colours. Plenty of food, very little work, good clothes, pocket money in abundance—this was the bait dangled before the eyes of Dennis Clarke, and as it appeared to coincide very nicely with his own views of life, he swallowed it.

He was soon disillusioned, however. It is quite true that the life of a soldier has its advantages, but those advantages are only to be gained by the workers in the ranks, not the shirkers, and so Dennis Clarke found out. With disillusion came the resolve to get out of it. There was no question of purchasing his discharge. He could never raise money enough for that. Accordingly he deserted, but was caught and taken back for punishment. After that followed a period chiefly spent in either the guard-room, the cells, or on fatigue drill, and then he cleared out again.

Digitized by Google

For the second time the truant son of Mars was restored to the fold from which he had strayed, but at the earliest opportunity he was off again. He was not clever enough, however, to escape detection, and consequently he was soon laid by the heels, but at last his object was accomplished. He was free of the Army, for they did not think him worth the trouble of fetching back.

The pint of bitter which Dennis Clarke purchased to celebrate his restoration to freedom and civilian life did not have quite the relish he expected it to have. He was tolerably thick-skinned, but the manner of his dismissal and the magistrate's words rankled somewhat. As he sat in the tap-room of the public-house to which he had adjourned on leaving the police court, he became cognisant of the fact that he was the subject of a discussion which to say the least of it was embarrassing to him, and so with the object of disarming criticism he invited his neighbour to have a drink with him.

"Nay, mate," replied the man, "I like a drop o' beer as well as any man, but aw'd rayther pay for m' own than sup wi' a chap as isn't worth fetchin' back to his barracks."

This expression of sentiment met with the approval of the remainder of those present, as was very evident from the chorus of "Hear, hear," which followed it, and this was supplemented by a further expression from another of the crowd.

"If it 'ad bin me as 'ad bin cal'ed a disgrace to t' service aw should be ashamed to show m' face among men. Keep th' drinks for th' own sooart if tha' can find any mooar on 'em."

Dennis Clarke strode out of the house with an oath. Thick-skinned as he was, this was more than he could stand. These blunt northern miners were too free in their expressions of opinion for him, and he began to wish himself back in barracks. He comforted himself with the reflection, however, that out of the town where this had occurred he would not be likely to suffer from that kind of thing.

Of course these men had been in court and heard the magistrate's remarks. In fact he remembered that the man who had spoken first had been the defendant in a "drunk and disorderly" case which had come on before his own affair. But then in the eyes of these men getting drunk was not a very heinous crime, although it sometimes entailed unpleasant consequences in the shape of fines or an occasional night in a police cell. They were accustomed to working hard and taking their lives in their hands when they went down the mine, and in their eyes laziness and cowardice were two very serious crimes.

When he got outside the house the ex-soldier decided he would make tracks for home, some forty miles away. It was hardly likely that they would know anything about the circumstances of his dismissal there. He spent that night on the road and arrived at his native place the following morning.

The news had travelled before him. When he opened the door of his father's house and walked in he was greeted with an expression which was considerably more forcible than polite. This was followed by the order to get out.

"What dost mean by comin' here to disgrace me?" roared the angry father. "Aw don't know how tha' can dare to show tha face here. Look at this," and he handed his son a copy of that morning's paper. There under the heading of "Police Intelligence" he saw an account of the affair.

When he had finished reading he threw down the paper and slunk out of the house like a whipped cur, followed by a parting injunction from his father not to come back there any more.

As he walked down the street a boy yelled "deserter." He turned round furiously and collared the offender with the intention of cuffing him; but ere he could effect his purpose he heard a loud guffaw from a group of his acquaintances at the street corner.

"See him," said one, "that's just his mark. He can tackle little lads nicely."

"Notice the charge he made," shouted another derisively. "That beat the Lancers at Omdurman."

"Have they pensioned yer off?" yelled a third. "Let's have a look at yer medals."

This was more than he could stand. He fairly turned tail and bolted down the street, followed by roars of laughter from his tormentors. Not till he was far away did he stop, and the place of his birth knew him no more.

* * * * *

It was the evening of that disastrous day at Colenso, where our men tried so gallantly to save the guns. When the request for volunteers to regain possession of the guns which had been abandoned had been made, among those who stepped forward was a gunner of the Royal Artillery, known to his comrades as "Surly." His name on the regimental records was Charles Johnson, but owing to his unsociability he had the above-mentioned name bestowed upon him.

So far as the performance of his duties was concerned he left nothing to be desired. His work was always well done, and had it not been for his tendency to give way to drink occasionally he would doubtless have had his stripe before this.

This was the man who had now volunteered to help to save the guns, and his comrades were surprised. It was not his offer that surprised them, it was his appearance. His eyes fairly sparkled with excitement, and he looked as pleased as a young girl going with the best of company to a picnic on an ideal summer's day.

Digitized by Google

"Look at Surly," they whispered. "Does he think he will stand a chance of the Cross?"

The band of volunteers started from the donga where they had been taking shelter from the enemy's fire. It was a veritable valley of death into which they were plunging, but each man set his teeth and went forward. Man after man fell, horse after horse was shot, but still they persisted in their efforts until it was absolutely necessary to retire.

Among those who were badly wounded was Surly, who had got a shot through the leg and another had penetrated his lungs. He was conveyed to a place of safety. The officer who had directed their operations approached him, and, bending over him, tried to cheer the man who was evidently mortally wounded.

"It was a splendid effort, my man."

The dying gunner's eyes lighted up on hearing these words.

"Can I 'ave a word or two with you, sir?" he asked.

"Certainly, my man. What is it?"

"I want to confess, sir."

"I'm afraid there isn't a priest of your Church available," replied the officer, mistaking the man's meaning.

"No, not that, sir. I've enlisted under a false name. I was dismissed from the Army because the colonel said I was a disgrace to the service."

"That you are not," warmly exclaimed the officer.

"Will you tell the colonel and the boys that, sir, and then I can die content."

"If I can do anything to clear your name I will most certainly do it."

Slowly and painfully the dying man told the story of his dismissal, giving the officer his real name, the name of the place he came from, and all the necessary details.

The end of the story was told with great difficulty, and very soon after its close the eventful career ended. He was buried that night with full military honours. The story had been retold by the officer, and soon went round. The much discussed Surly was the hero of the moment.

Some time after the officer was invalided home. True to his promise to the man who had given his life to clear his name, at the earliest opportunity he took steps to get the matter made public. He called upon the officers of Dennis Clarke's old regiment, and also upon the magistrate who had lectured the deserter.

This worthy was much moved by the recital, and on taking his seat on the bench the following day, before commencing the ordinary business, he addressed the representatives of the Press. Telling them the story he requested them to make it public, and when he would have gone on with the other business of the Court he was interrupted by a burst of cheering from the public, which, it must be confessed, he was not very severe in suppressing.

John Clarke is a very old man now, but he treasures very highly two newspaper cuttings. The first is the one with which we are acquainted already, and the second is a cutting from the same paper of a later date.

Thus did Dennis Clarke retrieve his character, and though once dismissed as a disgrace to the service, he finally rested among the honoured dead, and the people of his native town speak with pride of the man who died, ostensibly to save the guns at Colenso, but really to prove his manhood.

JOHN HENRY PEAT.

ALL THE LATEST PARTICULARS ABOUT THE GREAT TEN-POUND NOTE SCHEME.

18 Ten-Pound Notes Already Claimed. 50 More Still Wandering About the Country.

IN order that ladies may have an extra opportunity of sharing in this great Pearson's Weekly scheme,

FIVE TEN-POUND LADIES

have been dispatched all over the country, each of whom will deliver up the Sealed Envelope to the lady who fulfills the conditions mentioned in Pearson's Weekly. No gentlemen need apply.

For those who may be too modest, or who cannot easily leave their homes to ask men in the street the momentous question, the Editor of Pearson's Weekly has prepared a dainty little card with the words: "Have You Got that Ten-Pound Note?" printed in scarlet upon it. All you have to do is to and if one of the Ten-Pounders happens to see it he will at once call, and upon your producing a copy of the current number of Pearson's Weekly he will hand you a Sealed Envelope entitling you to the sum of £10.

PLACE THIS CARD IN YOUR WINDOW,

Address a halfpenny post-card to the Ten-Pound Card Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and you will receive one of these cards under cover and post free.

The latest song, "Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?" is being sung every night by Mr. R G. Knowles in various London music-halls with great success.

Copies of this song will be ready on October 8th, and may be obtained at 1s. 6d. each. The tune will shortly be heard on all the piano organs in the streets.

A sketch, entitled, "Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?" was produced on September 21st at the Royal Theatre of Varieties and at Collins's Music-hall with a powerful cast. Everybody interested in this Ten-Pound scheme should see this screamingly funny piece.

Full particulars of the scheme will be found each week in Pearson's Weekly, and fresh developments appear in the Daily Express every day.

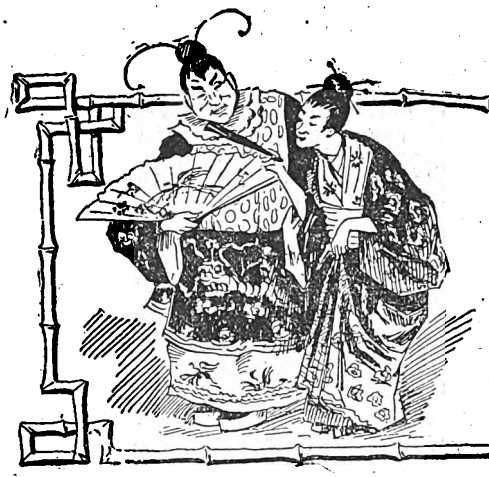
The following are the names and addresses of the winners of Ten-Pound Notes up to the time of going to press:

H. E. Baker, 4 Beaconsfield Road, Magdalen Road, Norwich; John Lotan, 23 St. Anne's Chambers, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.; Charles Lee, 1 Agnes Terrace, St. Mary's Avenue, Southend; Charles Wright, 30 Oxford Gardens, North Kensington; Robert Gautier, 132 Clarence Road, Wimbledon; W. W. Tonkin, 5 Grove Road, Brixton, S.W.; E. G. Baldock, 68 Portland Street, Lincoln; Arthur Wellings, 12 The Forgate, Worcester; A. Bowman, 413 City Road, London, E.C.; John Roe, Hatfield Road Board School, St. Albans; R J. Martyn, 4 Albert Road, Morice Town, Devonport; Mr. W. H. Hole, Stationmaster, Teignmouth; Archibald Brown, Market Place, Carluke; J. D. Southall, 38 Rosebery Gardens, Crouch End; W. Cotton, Coxbridge, West Pennard, Glastonbury; W. H. Wayne, 19 Hurstfinch Road, St. Helens; May Grammer, 154 Elgin Avenue, Maida Vale; Albert J. Page, Sawbridgeworth, Herts.

The original Sealed Envelopes by which claims have been made can be seen at the following places:

Mr. John Lotan's, Ludgate Hill Station; Mr. H. E. Baker's, offices of Eastern Daily Press, Norwich; Inspector Lee's, Cooper Brothers, Cliff Town Road, Southend; Mr. C. Wright's, Crown Hotel, Southampton; Mr. W. W. Tonkin's, Lang Sims, 437 Brixton Road, London, S.W.; Mr. E. G. Baldock's, Clifford Thomas, 202 High Street, Lincoln; Mr. Arthur Wellings', Mr. Large, The Forgate, Worcester; Mr. A. Bowman's, 413 City Road, E.C.; Mr. John Roe's, Mr. W. H. Richardson, 5 High Street, St. Albans; Miss May Grammer's, Mr. Burge, chemist, 123 Shirland Road, Paddington.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXVI.—He Turns to Root Beer as a Family Tonic.

"You may have observed," said Mr. Bowser as he left the dinner table the other evening—"you may have observed, Mrs. Bowser, that for the last three or four days I have not eaten enough to keep a chicken alive?"

"I hadn't observed any falling off in your appetite," she replied as she wondered what new fad had got hold of him.

"Probably not. There are wives who never observe anything until their husbands are ready to be buried. The fact remains, however, that I have lost my appetite and have such a weak and languid feeling that I can scarcely move about. If something is not done I shall have to keep to my bed."

"Well, why don't you go to a doctor?"

"I have lost all faith in doctors. They would feel my pulse, look at my tongue and order me to take a voyage round the world, so that I might not die on their hands. No; I shall not go to the doctor."

"Then what will you do?" asked Mrs. Bowser, with considerable solicitude.

"Doctor myself. Knowing what ails me, as I do, and having a remedy at hand, I shall be my own physician and hope to be all right in a couple of weeks. In talking my case over with Brown to-day he recommended something which he has tried himself with the grandest results."

"Five kinds of roots, and four kinds of barks."

"You—you are going to dose yourself again!" she exclaimed in despairing tones as she turned away.

"Dose! Dose! I wish you would be a little more choice in your language. I have lost my appetite. I have found something to restore it. Do you call that dose? It makes no difference whether you do or not, however. I shall prepare the remedy, and take it according to directions. Tell the cook that I shall want to use the range for half-an-hour or so."

"What is your remedy?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"Something as simple as it is efficacious. In the old days what did our grandfathers and grandmothers do when they lost their appetites?"

"I never heard that they lost them."

"There are several things you never heard of, and I am always willing to post you on what you don't know. When our progenitors lost their appetites, they turned to roots and barks and made tonics. I have followed their example. Here is a package of powdered roots and barks—five kinds of roots and four kinds of barks. I propose to make four gallons of what you may call root beer and take it as an invigorater."

"Very well," replied Mrs. Bowser as she started upstairs. "But if anything happens I want you to remember that I had nothing to do with it."

"Nothing will happen—that is, nothing will happen except that my appetite will be restored and my life move on again as before."

The cook vacated the kitchen at his approach. There were directions on the package as to how to prepare the root beer, and Mr. Bowser followed them as far as placing a cauldron over the stove with four gallons of water in it.

Then it occurred to him that the decoction ought to have a twang to it to tempt the lethargic appetite. There was mustard in the pantry, and he dropped a liberal quantity into the water. There was ginger also, and after a little thought he decided to add some of that.

"In that way I'll kill two birds with one stone," he said to himself. "I'll have root beer and ginger ale out of the same bottle."

He was watching the boiling when the cook came down for something. She was a woman of thirty, with a domestic look, and it struck Mr. Bowser that she must know more or less about the tonics of our forefathers. He told her of the mixture and asked if she could think of anything to add.

Digitized by Google

"I've seen my brother make root beer," she replied, "and I think he put in about a dozen different things. They say you can't get too much in it."

"No; I don't believe you can," he mused. "The roots and barks are all right for a foundation, but the stuff wants spicing up into an elixir. I'll make something that the kings of old would have howled for."

He found lemons and squeezed in a couple. He found nutmegs and grated up one. There was cinnamon, and he threw in a liberal quantity. The last thing he got hold of was a bottle of extract of vanilla. He didn't intend to use over half the contents, but when all went in he thought a high vanilla flavour might be the best, after all.

When the mixture had been given a good boil, it was removed and carried out into the back yard to cool. A jugful was taken out and placed in cold water for immediate use, and while it was cooling Mr. Bowser sat down and felt that he had struck a good thing.

The smell from that cauldron wasn't half bad. As he sat watching it half a dozen cats appeared on the back fences and sniffed and yowled.

"They smell it, and know a good thing."

"They smell it and know a good thing!" he chuckled. "If I have any to spare I'll leave it out here. I suppose cats lose their appetites, same as human beings, and I shan't begrudge 'em a pint or so."

Half-an-hour later he went upstairs with jug and tumbler. There was joy in his heart and a smile on his face as he sat down and said:

"My dear Mrs. Bowser, if you want the spring of youth which Ponce de Leon looked for in vain just quaff a glass of this. If it don't knock five years off your age, I'm a goat."

"Thanks, but I don't care for any," she replied.

"All right—more left for me. Ah! but that is good—that is delicious! Wine a hundred years old is not in it with root beer. I'll get up in the morning with an appetite like a horse. I suppose about three glasses is enough for a first experiment? Do you know, I believe there'd be £2,000 a year profit in making this beer and selling it by the barrel?"

Mr. Bowser went down and drove the cats away and brought in the cauldron and half-an-hour later the family went to bed. He went round patting himself on the waistcoat and telling how the tonic had gone to the right spot, and Mrs. Bowser finally got the idea that he might have struck a good thing. She had just fallen asleep, when that idea was dispelled. Mr. Bowser suddenly uttered a groan like a horse stricken down in the prime of life, and next moment he sat up in bed and exclaimed:

"Great snakes! But how I do suffer!"

"What's the matter?" asked Mrs. Bowser, as she jumped out of bed.

"My stomach! I'm awfully ill, and pains shoot through me. Phew! Ouch! I'm a dead man!"

"It's that appetite restorer. Probably it was intended to act this way. Just lie quiet and let it get a good hold."

But Mr. Bowser couldn't. In five minutes he was being twisted into a dozen strange shapes by colicky pains, and his nausea made him perspire like a 'bus-horse on a hot day. Mrs. Bowser had not said half she wanted to about appetite restorers, but she lost no time in sending for the familly physician.

When he arrived, he found a very sick man, and it was a long two hours before the pains eased a little and gave him a chance to inquire what had brought them on.

With tears in his eyes Mr. Bowser owned up to the roots and barks and vanilla and nutmeg and other things, and the doctor made no reply to him. He turned to Mrs. Bowser instead and said:

"I will try and find the fool killer's address, and the next time you have to wire get him instead of me and tell him to bring his biggest clubs along!"

M. QUAD.

Next Week: "HIS NATURAL PHILOSOPHY DIDN'T WORK TILL HE CALLED IN A TRAMP."

Digitized by Google

CLAYTON'S LOT.

It was the beginning of the short but beautiful Indian summer. The down town portion of New York City did not, however, seem much the better for it, save that it was cooler, and existence not one long gasping misery.

Up in Central Park things showed more to advantage, the lovely tints of the foliage, with all the other sure and certain signs of the "fall," making one to forget awhile the sordid money-grubbing, life-at-high-pressure of Wall Street and its neighbourhood.

But it is with this very same part of the city that we have now to do.

A big liner from Liverpool had just arrived at Pier 101, North River. The pier shed was crowded with passengers, luggage, cargo, and all the thousand-and-one odds and ends, human and otherwise, that go to make up a trans-atlantic disembarkation. Bustle, noise, and danger to life and limb reigned supreme.

The place, a long ramshackle wooden erection was dirty to filthiness, the deck rotten, and full of holes and pitfalls. This, added to its crowded condition and an all pervading odour, very far from sweet, forbade lingering, except for purely business purposes.

Evidently, the gentleman standing by a big pile of trunks, was of the same opinion. He was unmistakably an Englishman, and, as unmistakably, a military man. His well-set-up figure, carefully trimmed and trained moustache, together with his quick manner and air of command, told of the parade ground and orderly room.

It could not be said that his face was altogether a pleasant one, the knit brows, and compressed lips indicating only too plainly, a bad temper, and its twin brother, a selfish, arrogant disposition.

Ever since his landing had he been assailed by touts innumerable, but perfectly impervious to their blandishments, was seemingly waiting for some one.

"Name, Howarth?"

"Yes, that's my name," replied the newly-arrived.

"Guess this is for you, then," said the other, a man of the ordinary "Northern" type, clean-cut, keen, and quite up-to-date in appearance, handing Sydney Howarth a letter.

Hastily opening it, the latter found it to run thus:

5002 Broadway.

Dear Sir,—We have made every possible enquiry re your matter, but, we are sorry to say, without result. All we can find out is that Captain Hugh Clayton was last heard of, two years ago, at Felix City, on the extreme border of Western Texas. At that point the scent failed utterly, and we can only suggest that you should yourself follow the forest route from Felix towards the West, as it is certainly known that Captain Clayton contemplated taking up a "lot" of forest land, and clearing it. If you will call upon us we shall be pleased to give you any information that may help you. As we know that you are a stranger to New York we would recommend the Everett House, Madison Square, as a comfortable abiding-place during your stay in this city.

We are, Dear Sir,
Yours truly,
Stephen P. Maturin & Co.

To Sydney Howarth Esq.

It may be as well, perhaps, to detail here a few facts explanatory in some measure, of the presence in New York of Sydney Howarth at this time.

Three years before he had fallen madly in love with Phyllis Forbes, the queen-beauty of the London season. At balls, garden-parties, and functions innumerable had he met her and worshipped. That was all, however, for encouragement, beyond the merest and simplest friendliness, he received none.

For some time he wondered if her affections were elsewhere engaged, but could discover nothing. It was chance alone that brought about a revealing of the secret. A conversation with a brother officer, in the course of which the lady's name was mentioned, cleared up the mystery.

Hugh Clayton, one of those impulsively-transparent, open-hearted men, who, somehow, are nearly always handicapped, in one way or another, in life's race, had saved Phyllis Forbes' life on a certain occasion at the risk of his own. The girl had never forgotten, nor had he. It was a notable instance of mutual love at first sight.

Phyllis, as has been said, was very fair, a maid among maids; she was also the only child of wealthy parents, who coveted for her enhanced social distinction in the shape of a "good" marriage. But parental breath in this case was but wasted. The die was cast. Fate had spun the web, and it must be worn, if only as a shroud.

Hugh Clayton was poor, desperately poor. Moreover, he was of no "family" whatever. With a mere annual hundred or two to supplement his pay, his position, from a matrimonial point of view, was the reverse of desirable. To Phyllis this was as nothing. Was not her hero good, true and brave of soul? What more was necessary to happiness, to the ideal realisation of a love confessed?

Only that morning had the question been answered in no uncertain fashion. Clayton, incapable of deception, or underhand dealing of any kind, had asked of Sir Henry Forbes the hand of his daughter, only to be unequivocally, and even rudely refused. No reason was given. None, indeed, was needed. Clayton divined it without prompting. Still, in a manly, straightforward way he declined to accept as final his dismissal from Sir Henry's lips.

Phyllis was of age, and his duty in seeking parental consent done, he, Hugh Clayton, would immediately throw up his commission and depart for the Western hemisphere, there to seek a fortune for her who had dowered him with her love.

Guileless, simple-minded, and, as such natures usually are, a trifle indiscreet, did Clayton now pour his tale into the unreceptive ear of his "friend" Howarth.

For they had been friends, in a way, these two men, though as unlike as light and darkness. One thing only did the lover refrain from alluding to, viz.,

Digitized by Google

that act of his, which had led to the crowning of his life. The truly modest man is ever reticent with regard to self-glorification.

Every word of the other's confidence cut into Howarth's soul like a whip of steel. He could only listen in dumb despair. That this penniless plebeian should be preferred to him, Sydney Howarth, a rich man, a man akin to the bluest blood in England was beyond conceiving.

"Now, look here, Howarth, old fellow," Clayton was saying, "you and I have been the best of chums, and as this is my last opportunity I want to exact a promise from you."

"Well, what is it?" replied his companion moodily.

"Nothing very hard of performance," said Clayton, a little surprised at the other's strange manner, "I have told you my—our story; well, you know the Forbes'; visit often at the house; just promise me that you will guard my Phyllis from any danger which may threaten her. Be a brother to her, for my sake. She is prepared to accept your good offices. We have talked it over, and I shall leave England happier, and with the less regret in that I know your sterling loyalty and true friendship both for her and for me."

Howarth gave the required promise, and a few days later Clayton sailed away towards the golden Hope Land, if not light-heartedly, at least comforted.

Two letters, and two only had been received from him by Phyllis; and then, blank silence. Tortured by suspense and loving anxiety, Phyllis at length appealed to Howarth to do her the one service which could alone satisfy the longing of her spirit. To go and seek for his lost friend, for her lost love.

To Howarth, tempted almost to the verge, did this proposal come with an almost cruel force. And yet, how could he deny her?

She was visibly suffering. Her cheeks were pale, her eyes were dim. He would go; and in a way, he had his reward.

He departed, bearing with him a loving letter for the man he sought, and in his ears the echo of a woman's grateful words.

The end of the day, upon the edge of a mighty forest in the Far West. Stretching away into indefinite distance, the vast expanse of leafy shade seemed like to an enchanted domain, entrance into which was fraught with mysterious uncertainty and danger.

In this region twilight is not, night descending with an almost startling suddenness.

Halted indecisively, just where the swelling prairie melts into the forest shadow was a man mounted upon a mustang of the locally tough, workable sort.

The reins lay loose on the animal's neck, as the rider sat straining his eyes in the endeavour to pierce the apparently impenetrable darkness. He carried the bare necessaries of a traveller in the wilds; at his back being slung a Winchester.

Sydney Howarth was no coward in one sense of the term, but it must be confessed that the outlook created within him a certain feeling of apprehension.

Gathering up the reins, he urged his tired beast forward into the semi-gloom.

Two hours' riding under such difficulties as are unknown to travellers in this country, and then darkness that might be felt. No warning, in a moment almost, a thick, heavy pall was about and around him, an he were a dead man. It was horrible!—terrifying!

Scarce five minutes before he had fancied he could faintly descry a cleared space ahead through the dense growth of maples and pines. If he kept on in the same direction, moving neither to the right hand nor to the left he might perchance come to it yet.

"Steady, old chap!" for the animal suddenly swerved, becoming restive. Its ears fell back, while it trembled and sweated, as with intense fear.

Howarth, mistrusting the brute, and quite conscious that a crisis was at hand, slid him down from the saddle, making the bridle fast to a sapling, with which his feeling fingers came in contact.

"A light! Not a light for a kingdom's crown!—for Ophirs of virgin gold!" Not a match even could he find in pocket or saddle-bag. He must have left them at his last camp.

Nothing for it now but hands and knees.

Groping on the ground, wounding himself grievously with the snags and other obstructions which beset his path, he is inclined almost to give up in despair.

Half-an-hour; it seemed to him an age, and he felt sweep over him a sense of change. The air appeared warmer, while he could swear that a faint glow as of smouldering, living embers, was close to him.

He reached out his hand; it came in contact with heat!

"There must be life somewhere near!" he shouted, the feeling of hope in the midst of this appalling desolation was so wondrously inspiring.

Bringing his breath to bear upon what he now knew to be the live cinders of a but lately blazing fire, he blew and fanned with a judicious energy born of a desperate purpose.

A tiny, flickering flame wakes into life, and grows—and grows——

He leaped to his feet. This was no wood, no tree-cannopied aisle!

A shanty! A log dwelling! and there behind him the open doorway through which he must have unwittingly crept into the interior.

It was now that the great temptation of Sydney Howarth's life was to be offered him.

As the fire, fed by his trembling hand, burned brighter he saw that he was not alone.

In a deep sleep, stretched upon a blanket upon the ground the other side the fire, was a man. One arm was doubled under him, the other was thrown across his face, hiding his features.

Presently the sleeper moved, restlessly changing his position. As his face turned toward the fire Howarth knew him.

A cold sickly sweat broke out upon his already heated forehead.

"Pray Heaven he would not wake!"

But as the prayer whisperingly passed his lips, the other's eyes opened and fastened themselves upon him. Neither for the moment spoke; each just gazed at each with that same dazed, irresponsible look of fascination, that passes between so many examples of the animal world.

Then a dim perception of the truth dawned upon the awakening mind of the owner of the hut.

Raising himself upon his elbow he said quietly:

"Why, Howarth, is this a surprise visit? From whence in the name of all that is unexpected, did you spring?"

"Spring from, that's good!" returned Howarth, laughing hysterically. "Do you take me for a jack-in-the-box? I'm here on my own business—no particular object. And you?"

"Oh, when it is daylight, you will see quite a little cleared domain. Although a wild western anchorite, I am lord of this Manor. But tell me, Howarth, of Phyllis! When did you last see her? Was she well? and—and—well, there, man, you know what I would say!"

Digitized by Google

By this time Howarth had collected his thoughts, and pulled himself together. He had always detested Hugh Clayton, not alone because of his successful rivalry in the affections of Phyllis Forbes, but also because that such natures as his own cannot breathe freely in the presence of a single-minded, upright spirit. As he looked now at the other, that mean soul of his shrunk to even meaner proportions, and the last state of his envying hatred was worse than the first. He had not yet determined upon his course of action. Wild possibili ies suggested themselves to his mind, but only in a formless, disjointed way.

"Forgive me, Howarth!" again said Hugh, smiling at his own lack of attention to his visitor. "Forgive me for being so inhospitable, and so slow to welcome you to my mansion. The fact is I have had a hard day's grind, and was tired as a dog."

Outwardly courteous, Howarth deprecated any trouble on the part of his host. Then it was that the thing he had hardly dared to listen to took shape and form. He saw a clear stage; Clayton out of the way, and nothing between himself and the de-ire of his eyes.

No feeling of compunction or of pity came in any way to soften the deadliness of that which had now become a definite resolve.

Clayton had moved to procure for his unlooked-for guest some slight refreshment, and to seek a better light.

The instant he turned a report rang out, and Clayton, clutching his left elbow with his right hand, staggered back, nearly falling upon the now blazing fire. 'Spite the pain, for the bullet had shattered the bone, he faced Howarth, unable at first to speak from sheer astonishment.

Then, somehow, it all became clear to him. The man before him, not pretending even to hide the still smoking revolver, must ever have been his enemy. Little things which aforetime had no significance, now loomed large, as damnatory evidence of a sleuth-like cruel purpose.

"You scoundrel! Try to murder me under my own roof! The man I so trusted to seek my life! Ah!"

His quickness saved his life. Stooping down and seizing a blazing pine knot he hurled it with all his remaining strength at the other's hand, raised to repeat the shot. The aim was true, and the weapon fell into the flames, as it did so exploding harmlessly.

Baulked in his first attempt, Howarth, throwing all considerations to the winds, endeavoured by a dexterous ruse to get a grip of his antagonist. But he should have known from experience of Clayton as an old athlete that he would in all probability meet with more than his match.

It was a trick learnt many years before at the university in the school of a certain famous gymnastic professor. Successful then it was no less successful now.

A twist of the left leg, a casting the whole weight of the body forward, and Howarth lay upon his back, Clayton bestriding him; his eyes open, and completely at the mercy of the man he had so basely designed to murder.

"Now, listen to me," said Hugh, sternly, when his adversary, slowly opening his eyes, gave signs of returning consciousness. "I intend binding your hands and feet, and leaving you here for two days, in order that you may have leisure to chew the cud of your evil soul. At the end of that time I shall send a messenger to set you free. You will not be left to starve, richly as you deserve it; food will be placed within your reach. For me, I go to Phyllis. I should release you at once, but that I know now your treacherous heart, and that you would leave no stone unturned to wreck our lives. I forgive you for Phyllis' sake."

* * * * *

There is very little more to tell, but that little has about it the joy-chime of wedding-bells.

How Hugh sought and found his faithful love in the old Kentish garden he knew so well; how they there renewed their troth, and how they now live to make the lives of those about them happy as their own is, known to all within sight and sound of their home.

Nothing more was ever heard of Sydney Howarth. Whether he eventually perished, as is not unlikely, in some disreputable western brawl is not exactly known, but that his end would be peace, would be contrary to our experience of man's equity and of Heaven's justice.

Ralph Enderby.

AS OTHERS SEE US

"Hooker's Superior Jams," meets the gaze of all the river traffic below London Bridge. This stirring legend is inscribed on the blackened wall of Hooker's colossal factory. Its giant neighbours are soaps, syrups, patent disinfectants and sheep dips. But none rival Hooker's in number of workers or commercial success.

The success of Hooker, a young man, had been phenomenal. He had made half a million out of the factory and was still going strong. His pride was the jam works. There were two opinions regarding Hooker. Those who believed in a community in factories, denounced him as an unscrupulous capitalist. Others, whose ideal was commercial progress, glorified him as the apostle of energy.

The ladies wondered why he still remained a bachelor and could only account for it by reflecting that jam and sentiment did not go well together.

One day Hooker discovered that he had a vein of sentiment.

When making a mammoth deal there was offered him a bill for £3,000 accepted by a certain Major Devant, V.C.

The hero, he knew, was in a terribly impecunious state. Hooker sank the smart man of business in the philanthropist and took the worthless asset.

His first impulse was to send it anonymously to the Major as a present "From an Admirer," his second to make the soldier's acquaintance and hand it to him over a friendly cigar.

He acted on the second impulse. The Major lived up the river near Putney and his grounds ran down to the river. On a hot, August afternoon Hooker approached the Devant's from the water on his steam launch.

Digitized by Google

It was a large, comfortable-looking house with a gay flower-bed in front. The scenery around was almost pastoral, no factories desecrated the foreshore, the grass was a natural colour, and the trees dipped into the river. He was looking anxiously for a landing-place when a young girl stepped out from the shade of the trees.

"Is this Major Devant's residence?" asked Hooker.

She replied in the affirmative. Her tone was very sweet and her face pretty and refined. In her light summer dress she made a fair picture on the bank. Hooker gazed into her blue, lustrous eyes with a sudden, strange thrill.

"Can I land?" he asked.

She smilingly pointed to a spot and Hooker came ashore. He introduced himself to the Major by the name of Rogers. Had Hooker searched the whole world over he could not have found a man more the opposite of himself than Devant V.C.

Devant was a man to let things glide. He owned it. After a quarter of an hour's conversation, all Quixotism on the part of Hooker vanished. The Major's sole hope was his daughter.

"If she marries well," said the Major, "I'm saved. If not, the workhouse is my doom."

Hooker looked towards the window and saw the slim figure of the girl in her white gossamer attire standing by the river bank. His heart hardened. He determined not to part with that bill for the present.

"Is it any use of my calling again?" he asked.

The Major blandly intimated that he could call as often as he liked. He could come to dinner if it suited him. Something might drop from the clouds.

"Good-day," said Hooker shortly.

On his return to the launch he looked eagerly for Miss Devant, but she had disappeared. Hooker did call again. He called often. The Major had evidently acquainted his daughter with the object of the visits, for, to Hooker's intense exasperation, Susan Devant treated him with forced courtesy.

One stifling hot night, he persuaded the Major and his daughter to take a trip in the launch. They went down the river towards the jam factory. When they were abreast of Hooker's the Major indicated it with a wave of his cigar.

"Hooker!" he murmured, "the jam fiend."

Hooker looked at Susan. She was dreamily contemplating the many smoking chimney stacks. When they passed the factory the scenery opened out to the worst advantage. The tide was low and dirty river craft lay moored on either side, here and there clusters of houses burst into view, as if they had risen out of the mud or got inextricably stuck in it.

It was an appalling vista of mud. The eye strayed to paraffin reservoirs, floating hospitals, and awful "flats," from which rose the skeleton frames of guiding lights. When they reached Barking, the atmosphere grew as if everything around had reached the last stage of decomposition.

"Phoo!" cried the Major in disgust.

Hooker desperately put the launch about.

"This is the world," cried the Major, "as Hooker would have it! Morally that man is a criminal. He lives out of the life blood of his species. He is the cause of misery in many a home. Drives the workers to early graves and sends flowers for their coffins to advertise his jam. He is a curse."

"Ever met him?" he exclaimed wildly.

"Never," said the Major, "thank Heaven!"

"Do you know Hooker, Mr. Rogers?" asked Susan curiously.

"I know," cried Hooker, goaded to defence, "that he is a good son and that he respects his sisters and other men's sisters."

"The last," answered Susan gently, "is a good trait."

All were glad when they again reached the pleasant house up the river. Hooker parted from them at the landing stage. He did not feel equal to entering the house and said he would call the next day.

When he came, he had decided to make it his last visit. He would give the Major his bill and free himself from the spell of Susan Devant. Their lives had been too diverse to create sympathy between them.

He was crossing the lawn when his gaze strayed to Susan's favourite seat beneath the trees. On the seat lay the last book she had been reading. He walked over and took it up.

It was a magazine, and was open at an article headed "Interview with John Hooker, the Jam Merchant."

It was embellished with numerous illustrations. Hooker at six; Hooker at twenty-five (just when the great inspiration for making jam struck him); Hooker in a yachting cap and Hooker in his shirt-sleeves. He gazed at the leaves dazed.

He was still gazing at them when he felt a light touch on his arm. He turned and beheld Susan Devant. The rose tint of a blush was on her cheeks.

"Well, Mr. Rogers," she said, "what have you to say for yourself?"

"Nothing," he answered. Then he bitterly quoted the Major. "I live on the life-blood of my species."

Susan looked at him earnestly.

"There is an account in this magazine," she said, "of a man's early struggles and his indomitable perseverance. Is all that true?"

"I began life," Hooker said slowly, "as a factory hand."

Susan turned away her head.

He saw only her delicate profile. A profound peace was in the summer air.

The sole sound which broke the silence was the throbbing of a paddle-wheel on the river.

"Why did you come here as Rogers?" she cried passionately, "I hate false pretences."

He explained.

"Now I will go," he said, "I don't think you will care to see me here again."

"Why?" she asked lowly.

"Because," he said, "I should ask you to be my wife. I loved you the first time I saw you, and day by day my love has been strengthening. Of course," he added hurriedly, "you have been unconscious of this."

Susan gave him a quick, merry glance.

"Of course," she repeated.

Hooker looked at her bewildered. He took a hasty step to her side. In a happy dream he clasped her in his arms and kissed her lips.

"You are my life," he cried ardently.

The Major was waiting for them on the threshold of the house. Hooker handed him the magazine with his counterfeit presentment.

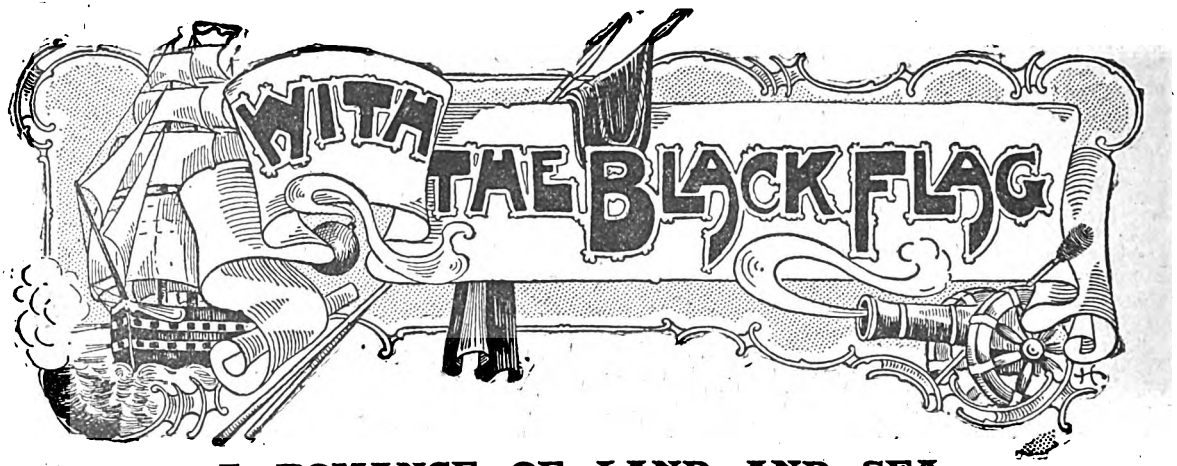
"Have you any objection to me as a son-in-law?" he asked.

The Major was quick-witted. He grasped the situation.

"Not the slightest," he answered warmly, "to-morrow I'll come and look over the jam works."

C. King.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. He is intrusted with dispatches for delivery to Bolivar, the Supreme Chief.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic. He received Wyvenhoe and Cautley on their arrival in Venezuela.

Dons Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who accompany Wyvenhoe when he takes the dispatches to Bolivar.

CHAPTER XV.

The First Fight With the Enemy.

No further reference was made—at that time—either to Urdenetta or Arismendez. Having said my say and made my complaint I let the subject drop and Don Simon was as suave and smiling as if he had dismissed it from his mind, though I suspected that he would bear me a grudge for the frankness with which I had denounced his "particular friend" and praised his political rival, for I perceived that he so regarded Arismendez, and was jealous of him.

Yet I had nothing either to regret or fear, I was not dependent on the Supreme Chief for my means of existence and I doubted either honour or reward was to be gained in his service. On the other hand I had no intention of going back, the country interested me, of adventure and sport I was likely to have more than enough, and I was desirous of seeing how these ragged, undisciplined and ill-armed Venezuelans would behave before the enemy. So I resolved that albeit I would neither toady Bolivar nor trust him I would use every fair means of keeping on good terms with him.

"You don't think much of our army," he remarked as if he had divined my thoughts. "Nobody fresh from Europe does, and mine is not a European army, but our soldiers are no less brave and devoted than your British troops, as ere long you will see. They have overcome again and again the bravest troops of Spain. On the plains the royal cavalry has not a chance with our llaneros, they either flee on the first contact or go down like corn before the reapers."

"I have heard wonderful things of General Paez and his llaneros, and I never saw troops march better or look hardier than your infantry," I returned giving them all the praise I honestly could.

"Yes, they are indeed splendid marchers," said Bolivar with a gratified smile, "and as hardy as they look. It is a hundred miles from San Fernando to Calabozo and we shall do it in four days. I mean to surprise General Morillo and if we beat him I shall march on Caraccas and finish the war by taking the capital. I suppose people in England know that this is a war of extermination?"

"I think it is generally known that neither side gives quarter, and that the victors put the enemy's wounded to death, though some are slow to believe it. I was till I arrived at Margarita."

"And it creates a bad impression, naturally. But what can you do? I have set my face against the practice from the first and besought the Spaniards again and again to agree to an exchange of prisoners. More I cannot do; they kill their prisoners, and if we were to spare ours my men would tear me in pieces. Morillo will hold no communication with us whatever; he fires on flags of truce, even when they are carried by priests or children. Yet on the first opportunity I shall make another attempt to open negotiations and if you are present, as I hope you may be, you will be able, when you write home, or return thither, to testify that the fault does not lie with us, nor ever has done. The entire responsibility rests with the royalists."

Bolivar spoke warmly and appeared to be in earnest, and I congratulated him on his resolve to make yet another effort to terminate a system of warfare which was a disgrace to civilisation.

We encamped for the night at the edge of a wood where there were water and fuel, and shortly after the halt had been sounded I received a visit from Don Antonio who brought me an invitation, which I gladly accepted, from several of the British officers who were serving in the patriot army to join them at supper and share their bivouac.

Bonanza was in high spirits. General Paez had appointed him one of his aides.

"Paez is the best general we have with us; some people say he is the only one," he observed, "and always gives his fellows their fill of fighting. You saw how the chief treated me?"

"Yes, and I felt sorry."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, it does not matter in the least. He treated me exactly as I expected. Bolivar never forgives, as you will find out if you incur his enmity."

The officers were Captains Sherwood, McMullin, and Grant, who hailed respectively from England, Ireland, and Scotland, all good fellows and eager for news from home, of which I was able to give them the latest, though it was so long since I left London.

In reply to my inquiries as to how they liked the Venezuelan service, they answered with one accord, and some very emphatic oaths, that they did not like it, and averred that they had been induced to engage under false pretences.

"I have not had a peso of pay since I joined, hang me if I have," said McMullin.

"Nor I," echoed the others.

"And when a man is dependent on his pay and has no means of getting remittances from his people owing to the disturbed state of the country, it is beastly hard lines. Gad, I am nearly as ragged as my men, and see no prospect either of replenishing my wardrobe or fingering any more cash, unless we take Caraccas and Bolivar allows us a day's plundering."

"Small chance of that," put in Sherwood. "We are more likely to be taken to Caraccas and shot on the Plaza to grace Morillo's triumph."

"Anyhow, he shall out General Morillo, that's certain."

"I doubt it. Morillo is the best general in the Spanish service, and though Don Simon is not without capacity for war, he makes frightful mistakes, and has lost more battles than he has won."

"True. But we shall out-general him all the same. We have twelve generals with the colours at this moment and I doubt whether Morillo has more than three. Just think of it. Twelve generals for a force of less than five thousand men, and every one of them with a staff as big as Boney's when he was at the head of the grand army. Cruel brutes they are, too, slaughter all their prisoners, set the Zambos at them with their machetes and think it fine sport."

"Not so bad as that, I hope, Captain McMullin; and nobody is more anxious to put an end to the system than General Bolivar," I said.

"I have no doubt he is now. All the same, it was he and the patriots who began it."

"Are you sure about that? They all protest that the Spaniards began it."

"That's what the patriots would have us believe; but Grant knows more about it than I do, he will tell you."

"Well, I would not say which were the first to murder their prisoners, because I cannot be quite sure," said the Scotsman cautiously, "but there is no question that the insurgents were the first to make it a war of extermination. In 1813, several of Bolivar's officers issued a manifesto proclaiming war to the death against all European Spaniards, not, however, without great provocation, for the royalist generals and troops had committed frightful atrocities. But I almost think they were outvied by Don Simon, who, in 1813, being then dictator, had all the European Spaniards to the number of 1,253, then residing at La Guayra, put to death, merchants, professional men and such like, not a soldier or a prisoner of war amongst them.

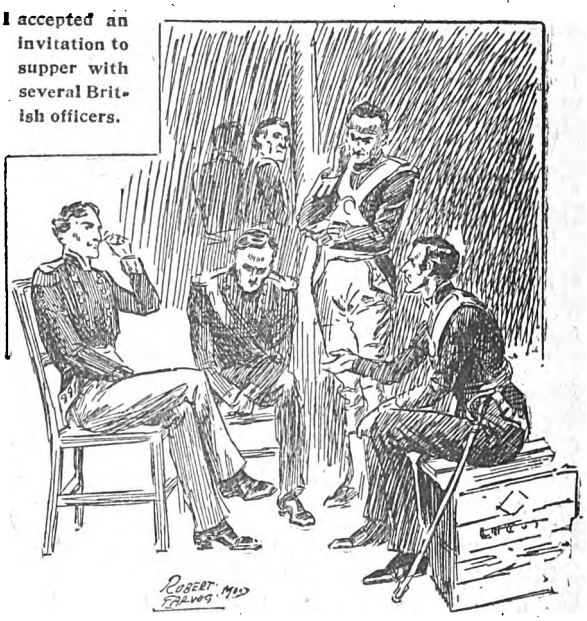
"The slaughter continued for three days, and those of the victims who were too old or too infirm to walk were carried to the place of execution in arm-chairs. In the same year the insurgent government decreed the confiscation of every sort of property belonging to Spanish royalists, and offered commissions for heads, whether of soldiers or civilians. The private who produced twenty was made ensign, a lieutenant's commission could be bought for thirty, a captain's for fifty—without regard to age or sex, mind you, a head was a head to whomsoever it had belonged. There have been awful things done in this war, perfectly awful, but I think that takes the cake."

"So it is not true that the responsibility rests solely with the Spaniards and that Bolivar would be glad to put in with the Spaniards, and has set his face against the killing of prisoners from the first."

"Of course it is not. What I have told you is historical fact and cannot be contradicted. All the same I make no doubt that he would be glad to put an end to the practice, partly because it creates a bad impression in Europe, more, perhaps, because he has found that it does not pay. Two thirds of the royalist forces being conscripted Creoles the majority of the victims on both sides are natives. The Spaniards suffer the least, and if the war goes on much longer and the system of slaughtering prisoners is continued, the Venezuelans will be like Kilkenny cats, there will be nothing left of them but their tails."

"Bolivar is a mean, mendacious ruffian," quoth McMullin bitterly. "Whenever I make application for my back pay which now amounts to more than £300, he smiles and smirks and promises an immediate settlement or a substantial sum on account, but never a copper has come my way yet."

"Why don't you send in your papers?" I asked.



"Chuck it up, you mane? I'd like to see you do it. A resignation is not valid unless formally accepted by the president, that is Bolivar, who values British officers too much to let 'em go, if they are good for anything, and if you take French leave you forfeit all your back pay and are liable to be tried by court-martial for desertion. Besides, how would you get away without money and passports, and all the ports in possession of the Spaniards? Bedad, if I had known before I 'listed as much as I do now, not all the king's horses and all the king's men would have dragged me to this terrible country."

"I think we are all with you there, McMullin; but the mischief is done and there is no good in grumbling, except now and then to relieve our feelings. We must just grin and abide, and do our duty and hope for the best," said Sherwood, "and for goodness sake let us talk about something more cheerful; you will be giving Major Wyvenhoe the jumps."

At any rate, they had given me cause for disquieting thoughts. I had reckoned on being able to leave the Venezuelan service whenever I wished, and resolved that if I could not retain my position with honour, I would resign forthwith.

But if what these gentlemen had said was true, as

Digitized by Google

I reported myself to the general and asked for his orders.

to which I had no doubt, I might not be allowed to resign, and pending the acceptance of my resignation I should be bound to obey the orders, not of Bolivar only, but of whichsoever of his cut-throat officers he might set over me, under pain of being tried by court-martial; and escape, technically desertion, would be difficult, perhaps impossible.

I should need horses, mules, supplies, boats, boatmen and an escort, which could not easily be obtained without my intention to leave becoming known. Moreover, I had not too much money and the journey to Trinidad would be costly.

When I left Angostura, General Arismendez requested me, on the plea of the treasury being empty, to defray the expenses of the journey out of my own resources and gave me an order on Don Simon for whatever sum I might have to lay out. After what I had just heard I thought it probable that I should have to lie out of it for a long while, and selling a draft on London or my agents at Port of Spain was out of the question.

In these circumstances I concluded that I could not do better than take my new friends into council, and after apologising for troubling them with my private concerns, I laid the facts before them and asked their advice.

"Grant is the best of us at giving advice, and it is a job he rather likes," said McMullin. "Besides, he has the oldest head. Speak, travelled thane."

"Well, one thing is sure, you will get nothing but promises out of the Supreme Chief, and I would not advise you to press him. It would be of no use and he hates being pestered. Above all, keep on good terms with him, which, as he seems well disposed towards you, should not be difficult. You need not tell any palpable lies, but if you could just say that he excels Washington as a statesman and Napoleon as a general he would take you to his heart, and might even settle your little bill. But say nothing about resigning, that would put his back up at once. If you decide to quit, ask for a month's leave of absence to go to Angostura and don't stop till you get to Trinidad. Not yet, though, he would maybe smell a rat and refuse your request."

"Very good advice. I could not give better myself," observed McMullin approvingly, "only Bolivar has been so often told by sycophants and flatterers that he is a sort of Washington and Bonaparte rolled into one, that something fresh would be more likely to fetch him. Could you not compare him to Alexander the Great or Julius Cæsar? The Julius Cæsar of South America would make a fine sounding phrase. You may laugh, but he would take it in. I am told the thicker you lay it on, the better he is pleased."

After the laughter provoked by this sally had subsided, I inquired what punishment the war code in Venezuela awarded to disobedience and desertion.

"Arrest, degradation or death, according to the gravity of the offence," said Sherwood. "But the code has really very little to do with it, the findings of courts-martial being dictated beforehand by Bolivar or the commanding general."

"Anyhow it was so in General Piar's case," observed Grant. "The court-martial had orders to find him guilty and sentence him to death, and the court-martial did as it was told."

"What was his crime?"

"He was accused of plotting to supplant the Supreme Chief, which meant that the Supreme Chief was jealous of him, as he is of everybody who is abler or more successful than himself, but there are some men with whom he dare not meddle. Paez, for instance, who tells Bolivar his mind very freely and never hesitates to disobey his orders when he thinks they are foolish, as they often are. The evidence against Piar was of the flimsiest description, all hearsay and malevolent gossip. I know because I heard it. Don't you fall out with Don Simon, Major Wyvenhoe. Rub him the right way, even though you have to butter him up a bit, and you seem to be middling well off. Take care to let him know it, it will increase his respect for you."

This ended our talk about Bolivar, and after a while we rolled our cobijas round us and slept until we were roused by the sounding of the reveille.

When we had breakfasted by the light of our camp fire, for it was still dark, I reported myself to the general and asked for his orders.

"I have none for you at present, but I shall be pleased if you will ride with my staff and favour me with your company during the day," he answered graciously, on which I thanked him for his courtesy and said that I felt highly honoured by his invitation. For I had resolved, as Captain Grant put it, to rub Don Simon the right way, even though I had to butter him up a bit, so far as I might be able to do so without loss of self-respect.

We rode side by side a great part of the day and I took an early opportunity of mentioning the outlay I had incurred, and produced Arismendez' order for its repayment.

"Make out your account and hand it to my second secretary, Captain Mendola, who will give it immediate attention," said the Supreme Chief with the confident air of a man of large means.

"The amount is so small that I am almost ashamed of asking for it and should not do so if I could cash a draft on my bankers at London or my agents at Port-of-Spain," quoth I as though money were no object to me.

"So you are not like some of these gentlemen, dependent on your pay?"

"Not exactly. If I were dependent on my pay I should not have made the Republic a present, through Don Luiz Mendez, of £500."

"You did that? You gave us, actually gave us, £500?"

"Yes, there was some question of my buying bonds to that amount in consideration of receiving a commission; but I said what is £500? Accept it as a gift."

"What generosity. The Republic is greatly indebted to you, Major Wyvenhoe, and I am deeply touched to know that English gentlemen in your position should not only risk their lives in the cause of liberty and independence, but help it liberally with their purses. You must be rich?"

Digitized by Google

"I suppose I may consider myself pretty well off, but people with no more than a hundred and twenty-five pesetas a year are not accounted rich in England."

"Por Dios, but they are in South America. And you are, no doubt, of a good family."

"Well, the Wyvenhoes are one of the oldest families in our part of the country. An ancestor of mine fought at Crecy, another at Poictiers; their banners and harness are still in the hall of Wyvenhoe Court, and are amongst my most cherished possessions."

"Your house of course. I should like to show you my hacienda, or rather, what was mine, for the Spaniards have confiscated it. But if we are successful in this campaign, I shall resume possession, and be delighted to place it at your disposal."

This meant that in the event in question I should receive an invitation to his place in the country, which, together with his manner, showed that my bounce (though I had said naught untrue) was producing the effect predicted to Captain Grant, and I had presently an opportunity of acting further on his advice, without telling a "lee," which I turned to good account.

"Is the cause of South American independence still viewed favourably in England? Do the papers say much about us?" asked Don Simon.

"I think most people regard it as the cause of liberty and humanity and you have many enthusiastic supporters. Shortly before leaving London I read in a leading paper an article which described the patriots as people rightly struggling to be free, and said that if General Bolivar succeeded in overcoming the Spaniards and founding a free nation in South America, he would win higher and more enduring fame than that of mere conquerors such as Napoleon Bonaparte, Cortez, or Pizzaro, and be regarded by posterity as one of the greatest soldier-patriots of this or any other age."

"And that really appeared in an English newspaper?" exclaimed Bolivar eagerly, and, for the first time, looking me full in the face.

"It really did," quoth I. "I can give you the approximate date, and if you would like to have a copy of the paper in which it appeared, I have no doubt Don Luiz Mendez would easily obtain one."

"I should indeed like to have a copy, and Don Luiz shall be written to on the subject. I am greatly beholden to you for the suggestion," said the chief as he made a note of the paper and the date. "I think you said you would like to negotiate a draft on London?"

"Or on my agent at Port-of-Spain."

"For how much?"

I named a sum which I thought would be enough for my purpose. It had been a mistake to ask for too little and a still greater to ask too much.

"So in the event of your being able to sell a draft on Port-of-Spain for a thousand dollars you would not press for an immediate settlement of your claim on the government?"

"I should not need it, Señor General, therefore should neither ask for nor expect it."

"What an obliging gentleman you are, to be sure. I wish there were more like you. Well, I think we can arrange this draft for you. We can use it as a remittance on Port-of-Spain where we have occasionally to purchase supplies, and some of the merchants there are so narrow-minded and suspicious as to insist on payment before delivery. I shall tell Captain Mendola to do what you want. But pray keep all this entirely to yourself. You have no idea how my officers, and contractors, and others, clamour for cash, and if it became known that there was anything in the chest, I should have to run away and poor Mendola would be torn in pieces."

I had no difficulty in arranging matters with this gentleman, and took the proceeds of my draft in gold as being more portable and easily concealed than silver. So I was provided, as I thought, for all contingencies and should be able, with a little management and manœuvring, to leave the country whenever it might please me, though as before long appeared, I was counting without my host.

On the fourth morning after leaving San Fernando we were within a short march of Calabozo, which lies on the edge of the great plain to which it gives its name, but the men having marched fast and far, and, as during the heat of the day, more intense on the llanos than in the forests or on the coast, rapid movement was impossible, Bolivar wisely decided to give his troops a rest and look for Morillo in the morning.

This was done, our march being so timed as to bring us by sunrise to a wood about a league from the town where we halted for breakfast, and awaited the report of the mounted scouts whom Bolivar had sent ahead to reconnoitre. These presently returned to say that a regiment of cavalry had just marched out of Calabozo and were moving towards a mission which could be descried in the distance, probably on a foraging expedition.

On this Bolivar and his staff mounted and rode out of the wood, yet neither in such fashion nor so far as to put the Spaniards on their guard or frighten them back to Calabozo.

Several generals beset the chief, attesting their right and demanding his permission to charge the Godos. Paez regarded them with a smile of contempt, as well he might, their men being no better than a badly mounted, worse armed rabble, utterly unable to cope with the enemy on anything like even terms.

"I shall lead my llaneros to the attack, Don Simon, they are quite ready," he observed quietly to the chief.

"Of course, Don Ramon, it is your right," returned Bolivar, "but wait a few minutes, I think they are going to pass to the right of those trees, and we must if possible, intercept their retreat to Calabozo."

"And that really appeared in an English newspaper?" exclaimed Bolivar, looking me full in the face.

Digitized by Google

"Sedeno's fellows will do for that, there won't be many of the Godos to intercept after we have done with them."

General Ramon Paez was a man of singularly prepossessing appearance; about five feet seven inches high, stout of body, with a plump round face, a fair skin, save where it was bronzed by the sun, dark eyes and red lips and cheeks. He wore an indigo blue jacket, short cotton breeches, and silver spurs, also a cocked hat with a silver cockade and an ordinary cavalry sword. A youth who rode by his side carried his lance, a formidable weapon fully twelve feet long.

I asked Bolivar's leave to take part in the charge.

"No," he answered graciously, albeit decisively, "I cannot let an aide-de-camp whom I value risk his life in a skirmish, as though he were a common llanero. I must put you to a better use than that, Major Wyvenhoe."

After a refusal so handsomely expressed it had been both bad policy and bad taste to repeat my request. Fortunately, I should be near enough to see whatever might pass, and the next best thing to riding in a charge is seeing one. In some respects the latter is the better part, war being essentially a game of which onlookers see the most.

"Now," said the chief when he thought the time had come.

Paez, grimly smiling, took his lance from the boy who carried it, waved the black bannerol as a signal to his guardia de honor, and dashed at their head into the open plain. With him went Don Iago who, as he passed me, gave a shout of delight and saluted with his lance.

The main body rode right through the Spaniards.

After ordering Sedeno to skirt the wood with his ragged regiment of carbineers and cut off the Spaniards' retreat, Bolivar, accompanied by his staff, followed Paez and his llaneros.

The country we were in, a part of the llanos of Caraccas, was slightly undulating, covered with short, brown grass, free from forest, yet dotted with small woods and groups of trees and bounded to the north by the Cordillera of the Caribbean Sea.

If Paez had reckoned on taking the Spaniards unawares he was soon undeceived, for several minutes before he could reach them they were drawn up in a line, with their carbines unslung and ready for use.

"The Queen's Hussars, a crack regiment," observed Bolivar, as we pulled up to watch the first action, the first I had seen between soldiers of the old world and the new.

The odds seemed to be in favour of the former, the Spaniards being well mounted and equipped, and splendid in new uniforms; and the celerity and precision with which they wheeled and formed in line on the first alarm, showed that they were well trained and led, whereas the llaneros were a horde of wild horsemen with very little discipline, and, except their lances, no weapons worth mentioning.

But these they handled with the ease and dexterity which comes only of long practice; every man had a lasso, they rode like centaurs, and were entirely unencumbered with kit.

Moreover, I thought it boded ill for the hussars that instead of boldly meeting their enemy, who did not greatly outnumber them, they were going to await his onset and trust more to their carbines than cold steel, for, in my opinion and in that of many more experienced soldiers than myself, the only weapons to which a cavalryman should look for victory are lances and swords.

Meanwhile, the llaneros were advancing in open order at a walk, no doubt to save their horses, and not until the Spanish colonel gave the order to fire, did Paez give the signal to charge. The volley emptied several saddles and killed several horses, but, unchecked even for a moment, the main body rode right through the Spaniards, then wheeling, rode through them a second time. On which they broke and scattered over the plain, only however, to be lanced or lassoed by their pursuers.

The greater part tried to gain a small clump of trees where those who had not been overtaken and slain by the llaneros were encountered and killed by the carbineers, many of them in cold blood and while praying for quarter. Of the entire regiment, numbering some six hundred men, not one was left alive.

When we of the head-quarter staff reached the spot the carbineers and some of the llaneros were despoiling the dead and exchanging their rags for the blue and white uniforms of the unfortunate Husares de la Reyna.

By this time the garrison of Calabozo having heard the firing had taken the alarm, and Morillo presently sent out three or four regiments of infantry and a regiment of cavalry with four field-pieces as if to offer battle, though it was probably no more than a feint to induce Bolivar to deploy and show his strength. Be that as it might the challenge was refused and after some futile skirmishing between the llaneros and the cavalry, who showed no disposition to engage seriously, the royalists withdrew into the town.

"I shall summon them to surrender and offer them leave to bury their dead," exclaimed the chief as though struck by a sudden thought. "Whom shall we send? Captain Bonanza, you are just the man, afraid of nothing and always fortunate."

This to Don Antonio, who had just ridden up with General Paez.

"At your disposal, Señor General," he answered saluting.

"Why do you want to summon Morillo?" demanded Paez bluntly. "You know he won't surrender—he would be a fool if he did—and that he always fires on flags of truce. Why send two men—your herald cannot go without a bugler—on an errand from which it is hardly possible they can return alive, merely that the Godos may have another opportunity of showing their contempt for us?"

"I have my reasons, Don Ramon, and as the summons to surrender will be accompanied by an offer of leave to bury his dead I hope Morillo may make an exception. However, if Captain Bonanza is afraid——"

"Be good enough to give me your orders, Señor General, and you shall see whether I am afraid," broke in Don Antonio impetuously.

Digitized by Google

"Buena, take a bugler and a white flag, ride to the gate there, ask to see General Morillo, say that the Supreme Chief summons him to surrender and gives him leave to bury his dead. That is all."

"It shall be done as you desire, Señor General. Where are the bugle and white flag?"

These were found and Bonanza rode away and went boldly up to the gate, and was engaged in conversation with somebody whom we supposed to be Morillo when several muskets were fired from the walls, on which the herald's horse went down, pinning the rider to the ground and the bugler galloped back, yet so badly hurt withal that he no sooner reached us than he fell dead, almost at Don Simon's feet.

In the meantime Bonanza had been dragged through the gate whether dead or alive it was impossible to know, but we knew that if he still lived Morillo would quickly make an end of him.

"You seem sorry, Major Wyvenhoe," observed Bolivar with one of his inscrutable side glances.

"It would make anybody sorry, aye, and more than sorry, to see the lives of two brave men uselessly sacrificed," I answered as calmly as I might.

"Not uselessly. You know now that what I have told you is true; you have seen for yourself and can assure your friends in England, of your own knowledge, that the stories they have heard of Spanish atrocities are not exaggerated."

"Excuse me, Don Simon, but I don't see how that mends the matter. There was no need to confirm statements which I did not doubt by sending to certain death one of my friends who was also one of your best and bravest officers."

I knew that as touching my own interest, perhaps even as touching my safety I had spoken unwisely, but I could not have said less and it was all I could do to refrain from giving full rein to my indignation and saying what would in all probability have insured my immediate arrest.

(To be continued.)

FROM JEST TO EARNEST.

THERE was a timid knock on the door of my office the other day, and, in response to my loud summons to come in, there entered the most forlorn-looking man I have ever set my eyes on. He had a scared, hunted look on his face, and kept glancing back over his shoulders, as if he expected to see a detective appear to arrest him at any moment. He dropped into a chair with a sigh of relief, and said:

"You're a lawyer, aren't you?"

I assented.

"Well, I just want to tell you my story, to relieve my mind, and perhaps you may be able to give me some advice.

"You see, last summer I was staying at the seaside, at one of those hotels where there is only one man to every twenty-six girls. The best of it was that the girls at this place were of the most entertaining sort, so, on the whole, I had a very agreeable time. They read to me, fanned me, sewed on my buttons, and did their best to make my time pass pleasantly; but, as you will see, I paid dearly for it in the end.

"One day I took six of the prettiest girls out for a little sail on the bay. Everything went smoothly for a time. The girls were adorably frisky, the lunch was good, and the chaperone went to sleep.

"We didn't notice how fast the hours went, and by the time we got back to the hotel the tide was so low that we stuck fast in the mud about a hundred yards from the beach. We had no small boat with us, and all our shouting brought no one to our aid. The water was too deep for the girls to wade ashore, so there seemed no way out of the difficulty except that I should carry the whole party to the beach, one by one, in my arms.

"I suggested this plan to the girls, and in fun said that in order to make such a proceeding perfectly proper I would formally propose to each girl and become engaged to her. They laughingly agreed, so I plumped down on my knees before each one in succession, chaperone included, and proposed, and was accepted in due form. Then I carried them ashore.

"Rather late in the morning, as I strolled downstairs into the hall, Brown, one of the three men staying at the hotel, came up to me and said:

"'Well, old man, I congratulate you. I know you can't be very sorry.'

"'Why, what's up?' said I in astonishment.

"'Read that, and you'll see,' said Brown, handing me a paper of the evening before.

"I took it from his hands, and read:

"'Mr. J. T. Chubb, one of the oldest and wealthiest business men of the city, died suddenly from apoplexy while at his breakfast on Thursday morning. . . The deceased has no near relatives, and his property, as there is no will, will go to his nephew, Mr. Thomas Cheever.'

"Good gracious! That was my rich old Uncle Jim. He was worth eighty thousand pounds at least. There had never been much love lost between us, and really I couldn't cry. Just think of it! I was a rich man. I wouldn't stay at that hotel another day. I would take the train straight for B——, and tell dear little Dora that we needn't wait any longer, that I was now a rich——

"'Good morning, dear. Did you sleep well after yesterday's excitement?'

"I jumped out of my chair as if shot. There was Miss B——, one of my sailing party, standing before me.

"'It was sad about your poor dear uncle, wasn't it? But then,' she said, blushing sweetly, 'I will try my best to console you.'

"I bolted for the stairs, but ran plump against little Miss L——, another of the sailing party.

"'Why, Tom,' she said—'I suppose I ought to call you Tom now'—looking bashfully down at her toes—'where are you going so fast? I was just about to hunt you up and tell you how sorry I was to hear of the death——'

"I tore away from her and fled to my room. This was horrible! Those girls had read the notice in that paper and they meant business. They were going to make me keep to my engagements. Just think of it—seven breach of promise suits on hand, including the chaperone's, and there was dear little Dora patiently waiting for me at B——.

"I thought of suicide, but was afraid to try it. I locked my door, and tried to sit down and make some plan of escape. It was useless—I couldn't think. The girls kept knocking at my door and sweetly asking after my health, suggested gruel and hot bottles. I became desperate. After nightfall I took what money I had, dropped out of the window, and walked to the station. Since then I have lived in constant terror."

Digitized by Google

Adventures in Search of Pearson's £10 Notes.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Typ writer Girl," by Olive Pratt Rayner, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. J. H. Taylor, of 47 Woodchurch Road, Birkenhead. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about THE GENERAL ELECTION, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 8th. Post-cards only, please.

Sold Again.

I HAD been thinking seriously about that £10 note. It was just what I stood sadly in need of, and, somehow, I had a presentiment I should get it; so, seeing a man walk from the London train at Lime Street, Liverpool, and stare about as though a stranger, I did not hesitate. Here was my chance.

"Excuse me," said I, "but you are a stranger, I think?" and I brought out Pearson's.

He smiled a broad smile, and I knew I was right.

"Yes," he said; "just come from London."

"Well, have you got that Ten-Pound note?" said I, showing him the "page."

"Rather!" said he, and I fairly jumped for joy, as his hand went to his pocket, and he withdrew the coveted envelope.

"See here," he said; "I met Pearson's man in the train, and I've got it. Come and have a drink."

J. H. T.

A Disappointment.

I WAS reading Short Stories in the train the other day, when I noticed that the gentleman sitting opposite me had an envelope protruding out of his pocket.

Thinking that a £10 note from Pearson's Weekly might be inside that envelope, I showed him the scheme in Short Stories and asked if it was for me.

"Yes, it is," he exclaimed, and he gave it to me.

Imagine my surprise when I opened it and found a note inside which read:—

"Admit Bearer, No. 33 Padded Room, Bridgend Asylum."

E. R. P.

Might Have Been Awkward.

I RAN through to Glasgow last week on business and had not emerged from St. Enoch Square before a man accosted me with a P.W. in his hand.

"Have you got that £10?" he asked.

Just in fun, I replied:

"Oh, yes, but I need it myself."

Before I could stop him, he appealed to the crowd.

"He's got one of Pearson's £10 notes," he shouted, "and he won't give it up."

Two men stopped, produced a P.W. and queried:

"Have you got that £10 note?"

I have seen a man lynched in America and so I explained my position in a brace of shakes.

Happily, they were Scotsmen who could see the point of a joke, and I got off with the price of three whiskies and sodas.

I am now on the hunt myself.

J. T. M.

He Had the £10.

IT was on the race-course at Totnes, by the silvery Dart, and I had gone there in the hope that the Pearson's man at Plymouth would be up for the day.

After the first race I spotted a well-dressed stranger hurrying out of the stand inclosure. I tapped him on the shoulder, and with the magic page held out, said:

"Have you got that £10?"

He turned with a startled air and whispered:

"Hush! Did you see me pinch it?—well, here you are, go halves," and leaving a £5 note in my hand, he vanished in a flash.

G. V. K.

Mr. Bowser Hunts For That Ten-Pound Note.

"HAVE you seen this, my dear?" said Mr. Bowser airily, waving a copy of Pearson's Weekly he had in his hand.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Bowser, with a foreboding of evil.

"Well, there's a £10 note to be had for the asking from a certain man in this town, and I flatter myself that with my infallible system of mind-reading I can spot the person at once. I'll go and look for him now," and off he went.

Presently he met a man strolling aimlessly along.

"Here he is," muttered Bowser to himself, as he fumbled with his copy of Pearson's Weekly.

At the sight of the familiar cover the man gave a yell and bolted, with Bowser in hot pursuit, and the latter being in the better condition eventually ran the other to earth in a blind street.

"Got you!" exclaimed our hero, triumphantly, "are you a Ten Pounder?"

"No," screamed the man, "you're the ninety-ninth idiot who has asked me the same question to-day, and I'm mad! desperate! I know nothing of £10! I've a ten pound fist you can have—take it!" and poor Bowser got a blow on the nose that sent him sprawling among the fish bones and banana shucks in the gutter.

"Well," said Mrs. Bowser, on his arriving home bruised and battered, "did you find him?"

But Bowser scowled malevolently.

"Woman," he hissed, "this is your doing again. To-morrow I shall instruct my solicitor to institute the proceedings that shall expose your outrageous conduct in the Divorce Court."

Then he kicked the cat and marched off to bed.

E. C.

Digitized by Google

A Terrible Mistake.

THE other morning my little boy came running in home, and said:

"Oh, papa, Pearson's Ten-Pound Note man is coming down our street. Put the card in the window, quick!"

I asked him how he had gained this fortunate bit of news.

"Oh, he has been calling at several houses and shops, and they all say he is Pearson's man, but they have not got a Pearson's Weekly," replied my sharp offspring.

"All right, Johnny, you are indeed a cute and clever boy, and will yet make your father rich," I shouted, and then immediately displayed that magic card—which he who runs may read—in the front window.

I had scarcely done so, when a knock came at the door.

I opened the door wide, and excitedly murmured:

"Come inside, sir; take a seat one moment," and then rushed into my sitting-room to procure that precious Pearson's Weekly.

Immediately I showed it to him he remarked:

"You mistake me, sir; I am a County Court bailiff, and am here to take possession, and——"

No need to explain further. I had kept him out for weeks, but my boy, who was to bring me fortune, had brought me ruin. F. W. F.

Not Worth Ten Pounds.

A BROKEN-DOWN swell, with top hat which was no longer glossy, went into a common coffee-house in the vicinity of Peckham, and ordered a penny bloater and two slices of bread for his dinner.

"By gum!" said the proprietor, "what a swell! I shouldn't wonder if he's not one of those Pearson's Ten-Pound men. Anyhow, I'll tackle him."

"By-the-bye," said he as he placed the bloater in front of the swell smartly, "would you like to read Pearson's new scheme?"

"Yes," said the swell gruffly.

"Ah! now I suppose you don't happen to be one of those men with the £10?"

"Do I look like a man that's got £10?" roared the swell. "If I had do you think I should dine off a bloater?"

W. L.

Not the Right Pearson's Though.

PASSING through one of the principal streets in Coventry on a recent Saturday afternoon, I observed a large crowd which had assembled round a tobaacconist's shop.

Being inquisitive as to the cause of the gathering of this motley throng, I joined the concourse, and then noticed a huge poster that was displayed in the window, bearing the now well-known catch-phrase: "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?" in large, bold type, while underneath the following amusing words were plainly written:

"'Pearson's' man is expected to call at this shop to-day. Wait for him! Watch for him! Wait inside and try our 2d. smokes."

The tobacconist was evidently doing a good trade. I entered the shop myself, made a purchase, and questioned the veracity of the announcement.

"Oh, yes, it is true," said the proprietor, "but," with a wink, "it is the man from Pearson's, the butcher opposite, who's expected." S. H.

"Have you got——"

LAST Friday afternoon I was strolling through Regent's Park perusing my Pearson's, and was most interested in the £10 note scheme. Shortly after, while musing on the possibilities of its capture and building castles in the air as to its disposal when caught, I observed a well-dressed stranger, walking some short distance away, who was eyeing me in a somewhat curious manner.

Instantly it flashed across my mind that perhaps he had the note, and, seeing the paper in my hand, felt a bit nervous that I was going to claim it.

For another quarter of an hour we walked on, and nearer together as we walked, and soon we were but a yard or two apart.

At last I plucked up courage—now or never. I put my hand into my pocket for my paper—and, look—yes—his hand had instinctively gone to his breast-pocket. My heart beat fast in eager anticipation.

At that critical moment we both simultaneously produced our respective copies, raised our respective hats, and both said in one voice:

"Have you got——" but could get no further for laughing. We had been suspecting each other all along.

Needless to say, we adjourned to drink to better luck next time. B. P.

The Man Who was Talked About.

A GENTLEMAN friend of ours has recently been away from home for about two years. During his absence he had his beard removed. On his return he paid us a visit, and met our little daughter, who was asked if she could remember him.

This she failed to do, so with a view to refreshing the child's memory I said:

"Surely you remember him! Try again. He is the gentleman of whom you have often heard us speak so much!"

With a smile of satisfaction the little one looked up and said:

"Then I think I know who it is, mamma."

Delighted to think that the ruse had been successful, I said:

"Who is the gentleman, then?"

"Pearson's Ten-Pound Note gentleman!" W. E.

IF YOU HAVE A RELATIVE—

who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. × 12in. mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. × 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

Full particulars appear in the current issue of

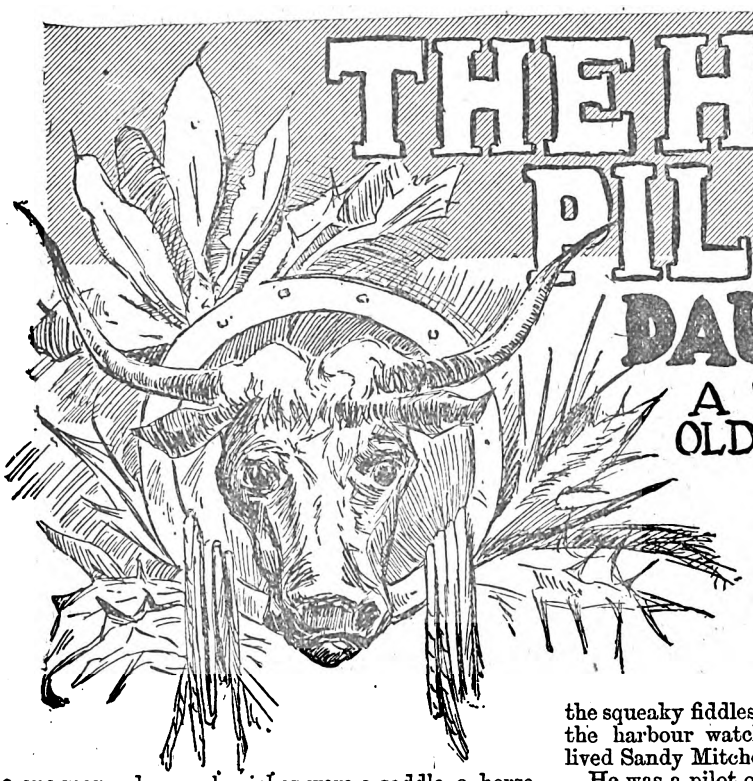
THE CURIOSITY SHOP.

A coupon from that paper must accompany each order.

A sample enlargement is on view at these offices. Below are other addresses where the enlargements may be seen:

Portsmouth.—A. B. Bennett, 408 Commercial Road, Landport.
Southsea.—L. Hillyer, 9 Green Road.
Glasgow.—William Love, 221 Argyle Street (opposite Central Station), and William Barr, 88 Sauchiehall Street.
Liverpool.—F. W. Edwards, 122 Pembroke Place, and Henry Jones (tobacconist), 184 Oakfield Road.
Blackpool.—Coppock (newsagent).
Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Messrs. T. and G. Allan, 18 and 20 Blackett Street.

Digitized by Google



THE HERD PILOT'S DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF THE OLD ABILENE TRAIL.

To one man, whose only riches were a saddle, a horse and health, was it given to revolutionise the cattle trade of half a continent.

Texas was raising its great herds almost without effort; animals were increasing by tens of thousands, and yellow-legginged cow-boys were riding across the plains, guarding and rounding up the immense droves, scarcely knowing whence their wages were to come.

For cattle were so low as to be almost a drug on the market; the only outlet for the herds of the South-west was by water from Galveston or shipping up the Mississippi, after a long drive to the river. A few herds were taken on a tedious journey across country to California, but the expense of the trip was too great to make it profitable.

The railway gangs were working westward to the Rockies. When they had gone 165 miles and were just past what was then the centre of the United States, something happened.

Joe McCoy, a young cattle-man, solved the problem of cattle-shipping. On his pony he rode south from the new station and induced a rancher to drive his herd north instead of east, and, just as the railway gang went west from Abilene, the thin, nervous faces, and long, branching horns of the first herd of Texas bulls came slowly above the southern horizon. The herd was loaded in a special train and went to Chicago.

The cattle station and the cattle trail were established. Over the dark brown ribbon of bare earth, 400 feet wide and 600 miles long, three million head of cattle plodded wearily in the next four years, and Abilene gloried in the title "the wickedest city in the world." McCoy was the Mayor, Bill Higham the City Marshal, and its street-lengths of saloons and dance halls were always awake.

Two policemen came up from St. Louis once, by order of the City Council, to "civilise the town." They marched down the street—and then marched back and took the train for home. Their experience, though short, is a story by itself.

Far out on the prairie to the south, out of sight of the glare of the saloons, and away from the sound of the squeaky fiddles, like a pilot who waits at the mouth of the harbour watching for the incoming ocean liners, lived Sandy Mitchell.

He was a pilot of the herds that came up across the long trail from the plains of Texas, and sought an entrance to the huge cattle yards that lined the railway.

The yards were connected by many gates and lanes, and it was no inconsiderable job to get a fresh herd of wild bulls into them properly.

Sandy knew what yards were occupied and how to reach those that were not, and seldom did the foreman in charge of a herd refuse to engage his services when he rode out to meet the travellers.

One day he came to town and rode home with a letter—the first he had ever received during the two years he had lived at the station. He looked at its cover curiously as he took it from the postmaster, but did not attempt to open it.

When he reached the cabin, he drank from the black bottle on the shelf, closed the one door and sat near the window. Then he tore open the envelope.

Long did he sit there after the letter had dropped from his hand to the floor. Over his ruddy cheeks spread an expression of pain and suffering. He drank from the bottle twice more and placed the letter in a little brass-nailed trunk in the corner, under the bed.

He went out to the stable.

"Well, Bess," he remarked, as if he were used to such conversations, "the end has come."

The wiry mare gazed at him as if she understood, and he patted her hip where a great W disfigured the roan hide. Other brands were burned on her shoulder—Bess was well identified.

"Sarah will be here to-morrow," he went on, "perhaps she is here now. And she says she is coming out to live with her old father—funny she should want to."

Bess said nothing and Sandy went back to the house and took another drink.

Digitized by Google

Then he took the bottle, a pack of cards with which he played solitaire, and a book on border ruffians, and went to the stable.

"These must be put out of the way, Bess. She was brought up to read the Bible, and I must not let her see these things."

He dug a hole at the corner and laid the articles therein.

"It's a sort of a corner-stone ceremony," he thought, and then, without covering the treasures, returned to the house.

That was a solemn evening for Sandy. Not a herd was in sight and there was nothing to do. He had serious thoughts of going to town and getting drunk—but he refrained, making several visits to the stable instead.

As a result he slept heavily and late. He was frightened when he rose and hurried in a scared manner as he prepared the breakfast and then set the cabin in order.

He blushed when a slender girl in a black dress alighted from the train two hours later and called him "papa." He did not know whether or no to kiss her, but she saved him the trouble of deciding by throwing her arms round his neck. The coming of the train was an important event, and the station platform was crowded. There was a little smiling at the scene.

"And we must go to the ranch," she declared. "I can ride hors back."

So they hired a pony from the livery stable and cantered away.

Sandy was taciturn; Sarah was talkative. She admired the cabin and its crude furniture, and cried a little over the faded photograph of a woman on the small shelf over Sandy's bed.

That night the father, rolled in his blanket, slept outside the cabin, and the next day he was off to meet a herd coming in.

As the cattle were rounded up near the cabin he rode over, and with him were the foreman of the Circle Bar Ranch and his chief assistant, Haddon. They sat on the ground and talked, and both young men thought they had never seen a sweeter visitor to the plains than Sandy's daughter.

Sandy was uneasy, and moved about as if he were anxious to go. But the young men stayed on. They had not seen a woman for eight months. It was worth something to them.

"And you have not seen the saloons?" said Lyman, the dandified foreman.

"No, and I do not want to," answered the girl. "There has been too much of that in our family. My brother died of——"

"The cattle's getting very uneasy," urged Sandy. He was thinking of the black bottle in the shed. He slipped away and threw some dirt in the hole.

He was a little longer than usual that morning in getting the herd to its quarters, and the loafers at the town chaffed him about it.

"Nervous about that gal out on your ranch, ain't ye, Sandy?" called one.

The pilot did not answer in words, but he leapt from his pony, and leaving Bess to her own sweet will made a lunge for the tormentor, laying him out flat on the dusty street. The crowd cheered. There were no further remarks about Sandy's nervousness.

It was dark when he reached the cabin, and after he put Bess in the shed he stood for some time looking longingly at the little hole in the corner. Then with set features he threw in a little more dirt and went into the house.

Sarah had spent her girlhood with relatives, and had seen much of the advantages of that halcyon land, "away in the East." She could sing and play the piano and paint a little. Sandy had but small store of interest to offer her. He said something of this as they ate the supper of bread and tinned meat.

"But don't you see that all this country is new to me?" was her reply. "I will ride a pony and help drive the cattle and have ever such a good time."

Sandy smiled at the picture of a being in skirts coming near a herd of Texas cattle.

There was a knock at the door, and in came Lyman.

"Thought you might be lonely," he explained with a laugh. "I'm not used to making society calls."

"Nor am I used to receiving them," said Sarah.

But Lyman got on very well. He told her of his feats of daring on the ranches and did not seem to notice the looks of incredulity that overspread Sandy's face. He arranged to go riding with her the following morning and to take her to the town, the Drovers' cottage, and all the sights.

Haddon called the next evening and was as bashful as Lyman had been loquacious. He had no deeds of daring to relate and no strange stories to tell.

Sandy watched the rivalry for several days and often went out to the shed and gazed at the "corner-stone," as he continued to call his buried treasures. Once he tried to give the girl a hint.

"Haddon's a very fine fellow," he began in a blundering way.

"But he hasn't done the brave things that the foreman has," replied Sarah.

"Well, I heard the men saying that he stayed out two days and nights to save a lot of calves from dying—didn't have a mite to eat nor nothing to drink all the time."

"Mr. Lyman says he is terribly slow."

"Don't you be too sure about what Lyman says—he has a lot of bounce."

The girl blushed as she turned away. Sandy saw the reddening cheek—and went to the shed to commune with Bess.

But the days went by without Sarah coming to a decision as to the merits of her lovers. The cowboys of town talked of the rivalry, and one even took a direct interest in the matter and came nearer being knocked down than he ever did in his life when he jokingly spoke of it to Haddon.

One day the boys of the Circle Bar rode off to the south and two waved their wide-brimmed white hats as they went past the cabin of Sandy Mitchell. A red apron was fluttering in response, but neither could tell for whom it was signalled.

Sandy had built an additional room to the cabin and lived a more civilised life than he did while alone, but he grew thinner and more nervous every day. He spent long hours with Bess in the shed and had worn a smooth and hard rim round the "corner-stone."

The winter was trying him and the spring found the old man much the worse for his new life. His daughter was faithful to him and took good care of the cabin, but there was no sympathy between them.

He feared her and her opinions without knowing why he did so. He would sit and watch her stealthily as if he were afraid that she would turn on him—and then go out and look at the little mound in the shed.

Sarah went now and then with the young people of the town to a dance or a party. She made friends by her wit and her music.

Digitized by Google

With a wave of her hand, she started for the town.

The old herder could not understand it all, but it pleased him, and he watched her with pride—the touching pride of a father who has lacked advantages himself, and sees them in his offspring with a semi-self-importance that glorifies them as being somehow a later development of his own intellect.

So the summer passed, and it was as long for the two men down among the cactus lands of Western Texas as for the girl at the end of the trail. Lyman and Haddon had little to say to each other.

One day the time came when the foreman was in danger. He was swimming a turbulent stream and his horse lost its footing.

"Help, boys," he called, "I can't swim with all this toggery."

He was weighted with spurs and lariat. Haddon was on the bank; he stripped and plunged in to the rescue—but when it was over he did not stop to talk. He did not like Lyman, but that did not forbid the courtesy of the range.

Both anxiously awaited the trip over the trail to the shipping station.

Sandy helped three herds in one autumn day. The trail was becoming a great thoroughfare, and the dark brown caravans came, one after another, up from the south with bewildering rapidity. Men talked of a break in the cattle boom, but it did not come, and the ranchers seemed hurrying all the stock they could to market.

Sandy was weary that night. He ate little and then went to the shed. He stood beside Bess for a long time, and then, as if moved by an irresistible force, edged towards the corner of the shed.

"The buildin' did na stond," he muttered. "The corner-stane is na gude," the Scottish accent coming back to him after the long years.

He knelt, and furiously, feverishly, dug with his hands at the little mound. Deeper and deeper he went until he touched something hard.

His eyes glistened.

"Oh, Bess," he whispered, "happy times are comin' again."

Faster and faster he worked, and then with a burst of delight, the old man pulled from the hole a black bottle. Anxiously he held it up to the waning light. Yes, it was all there. He could remember just how much there had been when he put it away, and a horrible fear had come over him, that in some way it had vanished during his period of teetotalism.

He polished it on his blouse, he hugged it to his breast, he kissed it reverently—and then he took out the cork and lifted it to his lips.

A few times in a man's life there come experiences that set the nerves of delight tingling, that mark high lights in the perspective of the years, that linger in the memory.

To Sandy it was the unearthing of the "corner-stone." Long did the black bottle stay at his lips, and again and again was it lifted. The famished nature glowed with the old joy, and he forgot all the months of longing. He forgot Sarah, the herds, Bess—he lay on the hay stolid, unconscious—but satisfied.

It was usual for Sandy not to come home at night, and Sarah did not worry. But when in the morning she heard Bess whinny and went to the shed she saw that terrible bundle in the corner and gave a heartrending shriek. Then strength came to her and she dragged her father to the house.

It was a dark, gusty day, and the north-west wind roared over the prairies as if it had a grudge against the settlers. At noon the girl thought of something—her father's business. She must not allow it to be lost.

"I can do it as well as he," she thought, as she went to her room.

When she came out she was transformed into a semblance of a cowboy. A yellow coat covered the slender form and a white hat rested on the crown of her brown hair. Bess started a little as she entered the stable and threw the saddle on the pony's back. The coat and the white hat did not deceive the horse.

In a moment the twain were passing the cabin, and then became a spot in the far, grey distance. They went up the slope of the bluffs, along the southern edge of the bottom lands, and then farther on, arrived between the valleys of the Smoky Hill and the Arkansas.

Sure enough, away to the south was a long, dark caravan that the rider's instinct told her was a cattle herd. As she rode towards it the branching horns of the leaders became visible, and then the detached spots that she knew were the herders, guarding the line like sentinels.

Digitized by Google

"What should I do?" she asked.

There was little time to seek an answer. The herd was approaching and the men in charge were evidently eager to get the cattle in the yards. She cantered to the front, and then, just before getting in reach of the voice of the first cowboy, turned, and with a wave of her hand started for the town.

"Wish the old gentleman would come closer," thought Lyman; "I want to find out how the pretty Sarah is."

For a mile the cattle went quietly, following the lone leader—and then something happened.

Bess did not approve of the handling she was getting, and reared and plunged. To quiet her was impossible, and the girl in a moment of thoughtlessness leapt from the saddle to the prairie, thinking that there might be something amiss with the saddle.

Wilder grew the antics of the pony, and soon there was visible to the excited cowboys a picture of a yellow-coated, white-hatted figure, standing alone and of a pony racing away to the north. In the foreground was a rapidly massing herd of brown cattle, with heads all pointed in one direction—towards the lonely figure.

The Texas bull has a profound respect for one combination—the Man on Horseback. Woe to the horse or man alone. Together they are rulers, separated they are hunted and destroyed.

The stampede forming was intensified by the day and the weather. The cattle were nervous and excitable. The wind blew damp, cold and brisk from the north-west. Scurrying clouds were drifting overhead—it was the beginning of a furious storm.

Lyman felt rather than saw another man by his side.

"Why do the cattle act so?" asked Haddon.

For an answer the foreman pointed to the lonely figure ahead.

"Who—who is it?"

Haddon thought one of the herders had been thrown.

"Old Sandy—his horse was troublesome."

"Why didn't you ride to him?"

"And take chances on being ground under the hoofs of that herd?" Lyman laughed harshly.

"Then I will," starting forward.

"Don't be a fool, Haddon——"

But Haddon was gone, riding like the wind itself for the goal that stood out before him so distinctly in the gloomy vista of plain.

The herd was in motion now. The cattle had heads down and were pounding the hard earth with a sound like thunder. Rank after rank of them the rider passed and finally reached the foremost one, which was running with tremendous leaps for the proposed victim.

Like red-hot irons his spurs burnt his pony's flanks, and the tired little beast struggled harder and harder to win. Nearer and nearer came the end and closer and closer were the cattle. Side by side the herd and Haddon raced, and then he turned and crossed the course ahead of the hurrying horns.

The lonely figure ahead was ready for him and realised that not an instant was to be lost. Far over he leant in the saddle, the cattle breathing at his pony's very flanks, and reached out his strong right arm.

"The old man is likely to be heavy," flashed through his mind. and he braced himself for a severe strain.

But as the horse swept past and he encircled the beseeching form before him he lifted not a weight but a fairy-like creature that seemed a mere trifle in his grasp.

There was no time to be startled—the cattle were too close! Scarce had Sarah's feet left the ground when the sod on which she had stood was trampled by a score of hoofs.

On and on the pony bore its double burden, and when it halted, panting, as the herd rushed by, Haddon felt his burden grow limp and passive—Sarah had fainted.

"It was a long day's work getting that herd into the corrals without old Sandy," thought Haddon, as he started home with his charge.

But Sandy was coming. The fractious Bess had roused him when she ran to the cabin, and on her back, his white hair flying, he was en route to the herd.

Late that night Haddon and the foreman met for the first time since the stampede.

Lyman laughed.

"Much obliged," he sneered, "I'll congratulate her to-morrow."

"Coward!" exclaimed Haddon fiercely. "Go near her again and I will kill you."

Lyman did not believe him, and that accounted for the event of the next day—one of the first tragedies of the shipping station.

Lyman rode out to the cabin at noon and later in the day returned to town in bad humour. He had not been able to see the pilot's daughter. Towards evening she came to the town on Bess.

As she started for home Lyman rode to her side, and, despite her evident efforts to free herself from his company, remained as her companion.

Haddon stood in the door of the "Last Chance" saloon and, looking up, saw the couple. He leapt to his horse and raced after them. Lyman turned at the sound of hoofbeats and remembered Haddon's threat.

Digging his spurs into his pony, he flew from Sarah's side in a desperate attempt to escape the vengeance of his pursuer. With set face Haddon urged his pony to top speed, but as he dashed past the girl he had saved from the herd, a voice reached his ears and caused him to pull up and allow Lyman to get away.

But Lyman migrated to another part of the continent and was never seen by either of them afterwards.

Five years later, while I was doing business in Las Vegas, I saw Sarah with Haddon by her side, and I knew that I had to address her as "Mrs. Haddon." Sandy had passed away with the cattle boom, but he died happy in the knowledge that the better man had won his daughter.

F. C. ARNOLD.

NOW ON SALE.

No. 4 of

"The Curiosity Shop."

The Illustrated Companion to "PEARSON'S WEEKLY."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP contains: Absolutely new and fresh articles. Bright and originally-conceived pictures. Strong and well-seasoned fiction. Nothing that you can get anywhere else.

Unlike all other curiosity shops, the contents of this one are changed every week, and you can buy every article and picture in the shop for one penny.

Digitized by Google

An Operation in the Dark.

ONCE, just before I entered as a medical student, I was seized with a desire to test the so-called science of astrology and see whether it could tell me much about the future.

The result did not give me any satisfaction, for it was of so little weight that I had clean forgotten the whole of the horoscope except two clauses; the one was that I was destined never to have much luck in life, for the planets were in a most unfavourable position at the time of my birth, and the other was to the effect that there would come a crisis, but exactly how that crisis was going to end was not disclosed.

The first of these clauses was remembered because it seemed very true. I had been decidedly unfortunate all through my short career; when I was born my parents were wealthy, but within two years all the money had gone and the crash had hastened the death of my mother.

Three years ago my father died and I was left to the care of an uncle who had not been on good terms with my father, and did not much like the burden placed upon him.

I will not dwell upon these troubles, but will content myself with saying that my path always seemed blocked.

As a medical student I had to struggle hard to keep myself going, and more than once I was on the point of giving up.

Then there came a great success; I thought that the tide was turning, but that success created an enemy who was destined to bar my path later on.

I was fond of medical science and studied hard when a prize was offered, and it became pretty clear that the struggle for that prize lay between James Madden and myself. As I have said, I won it.

When the result was made known I involuntarily turned towards Madden, and the sight of his face remained with me for many a day.

"I'll make you pay for this, if I have to wait years for it!"

These were the words with which he greeted me when we were alone. I was startled at first, and then smiled; I supposed that I had wounded his vanity by beating him, but that he would soon forget it. Moreover, our ways were not likely to be the same; his people were well-to-do and could afford to buy him a practice in a fashionable part of London, whereas I intended to settle down in some quiet town.

I lost sight of Madden for some time after we took our degrees. I went to a rising sea-side town, the inhabitants called it a town, although it was little more than a village—and became assistant to an elderly medical gentleman; that was the best I could do, although I tried hard to get a better start. I was disappointed at not being able to offer something better to Alice, but the brave girl was willing to accept and to look forward to my ultimate success.

At the end of three years I made an arrangement with my chief, who wished to retire, to buy his practice and pay him by instalments; this was clearly the best course for me to adopt, as it would have cost me much money to work up a practice for myself, and I hadn't got the money.

The town was increasing in size and popularity, and I began to think that I was on the high road to a moderate fortune. Then my enemy found me out, and one morning I was electrified to discover that Dr. James Madden had installed himself in the same street—which was the principal one of the town—as a rival candidate for public favour.

I do not say that Madden was unskilful, but I believe that he practised more as a method of passing the time and in order to enjoy the position in society which is accorded to a doctor. Why had he come down here? Was it to "pay me out"?

There was this difference between Madden and myself—he obtained the favour of the people by his manner, which was that of a dashing man of the world, whereas I was grave and somewhat retiring in disposition, and relied on the quality of my work. People like men of his temperament, and as his knowledge was sufficient to enable him to deal with ordinary cases, he naturally had the preference. He had not been there long before I found my connection was decreasing, slowly but in a disquieting degree. However, as the town was expanding very rapidly, there was a chance of holding my own, on the whole.

I was not the man to keep important matters from my wife, who took great interest in my progress; so I told her what I feared. But although she recognised the actual position, she encouraged me, and I sought relief in her society and in that of our little girl, which he ped me to persevere even when there could no longer be any doubt that I was steadily losing ground.

I soon came to the conclus on that Madden was purposely trying to ruin me, although I could not publicly bring such a charge against him.

I heard occasionally a remark which convinced me that he lost no opportunity of throwing out vague insinuations concerning my skill, and in public he took the opposite position to mine on every point. For instance, I am a firm believer in vaccination and this gave him an opening.

The anti-vaccination idea spread among the people of the town to such an extent that I at length deemed it my duty to utter a word of warning in public.

This was the beginning of a severe contest, and to my surprise, Madden—who had been just as much in favour of innoculation during our student days and who had never shown any other view—now publicly proclaimed himself an anti-vaccinator.

People believed that his declaration was the honest expression of his opinions, and I refrained from pointing out that he had formerly held the contrary view, because his obvious retort would have been that he had changed his mind as the result of experience.

The struggle was a bitter one and it ended in my defeat and the triumph of Madden. He opposed me in every way and I began to feel that I was discredited.

My wife's health failed and she went away to a less bracing locality—to die.

For three years longer I struggled on, but during the last of those three years I lived on the money I had saved, for my practice was virtually gone.

Digitized by Google

I could not help laying this trouble at the door of my successful enemy; I grew bitter at the thought of the misfortunes which had beset me and at the upsetting of the plans I had formed for the education of my child, and I began to brood over thought of revenge. Was it fair that I should suffer in this way? If he had done evil to me, was I not justified in trying to retaliate? Was it wrong to fight him with his own weapons?

Want of employment, as we all know, affords the best opportunity for the creation and development of evil designs, and my case was no exception to the rule. Now and then the conversation of my little girl—I cannot call it childish prattle, for she was older than her years—stemmed the tide of evil thoughts and checked my desire for revenge, but some fresh move on the part of my enemy would destroy this influence for good which flowed from my child and once more I would be plotting his downfall.

The memory of the inward struggle between good and evil will always be vivid, so intense was it. Just at the time when evil had conquered, apparently for ever, the opportunity for which I was seeking came to me in the most unexpected fashion.

It was about eleven o'clock at night; the maid and my daughter were in bed and I sitting in my consulting room, brooding over the final details of a scheme which I was now prepared to carry out at all hazards. I started from my chair at the sound of a ring from the electric door bell.

I went to the door myself and opened it, and then I had a second and far greater surprise. Before me stood Dr. Madden!

"Barnard, I want you to cut this confounded abscess for me. I can't stand it any longer!"

What could it mean? I looked at him, unable to credit my ears with having heard aright.

He stepped inside the hall and I could see that his coat was thrown over his shoulders, not put on in the proper manner, and that he held a lancet in his right hand.

"Which is your room?" he asked in a tone which indicated that he was suffering intense pain. "It's paining me awfully and I must have it lanced. I thought I could wait till the morning, but I can't."

This last sentence annoyed me; I knew that he went to a doctor in an adjoining town rather than come to me.

I was about to retort to this effect, when he spoke again.

"Don't lose any time, there's a good fellow. We haven't been the best of friends, but you must do this for me. Is this your room?"

Then, in a dreamy kind of way, I found myself entering the room with him and listening to his explanation.

"This abscess has been forming for some time under the left arm. Dr. Cox intended to lance it for me when he returned. He thought it would be about mature by then, but he won't be back for two days and it is paining dreadfully. It has been so bad this evening that I made up my mind to lance it myself, but just as I was about to do so my nerves failed me. You will see that there is great danger of cutting one of the many large and small arteries that gather in the arm-pit. It's almost certain that you will cut one, but you can staunch it and that would not be so easy for me to do myself."

By this time he was seated in the chair and had arranged himself for the operation. I took the lancet from him and a pad of wool, and then prepared for my task.

I HAVE A HORROR OF IT.

Of course, I can't say how it is with you, but, as for me, I have a horror of the sensation called faintness. I would rather suffer a good stiff pain for a whole day than feel faint for half an hour. And so would most people, I imagine. Drop in on me some day, and I'll explain the philosophy of it.

One day—it was at Bridgend, she says—Mrs. Jones, who lives at Bridge Street in a queerly-named place called Tonypandy, near Pontypridd, South Wales, was suddenly seized with a fainting spell, and thought she was going to die then and there, right out of hand.

It was like drowning, you know; settling into the deep, dark water, and being strangled. Some folks say drowning is a pleasant way to die, but I am content to take their word for it.

Well, this wasn't the first of Mrs. Jones' fainting bouts—not by many. She had them often, and lived in terror of them, as a man lives in terror of an enemy who he knows is sworn to kill him on sight.

Before these sinking spells came on her the lady had not been well. She had for some time been low and ailing—just as a lot of good women are, without understanding exactly what is the matter. She had lost her appetite, as she might have lost a shilling; it was gone somehow, and she could tell you no more.

But she couldn't eat—that is, not properly and heartily; she could merely pick and mince at things, and very small benefit came from that. Besides, there was pain in the stomach and chest to follow, and the knowledge of this scarcely tended to make food the more welcome to her.

She says her strength went out of her as damp takes the starch out of linen; and we may well believe it. For, no food no life; that is the law, and no human power can make it any different, and this woman ate only a bird's rations, most of that going stale in her stomach, and manufacturing poisons which went into her blood, causing those frightful faintings she tells us about.

Under those circumstances you would have appealed to the doctors, and reached out right and left after medicines to set you right again. This Mrs. Jones did; but bad luck attended all her anxious experiments until her husband, Mr. Thomas Jones, who is a wholesale butcher and a sensible man, told his wife he thought Mother Seigel's Syrup was the thing for her. He had tried it, and it cured him, and why not her?

Now, it was in the Spring of 1897 that the lady fell ill, and in July, 1898, she began using the Syrup—fifteen months or so between whiles. On April 11th, 1899, she wrote thus: —"After taking Mother Seigel's Syrup a few weeks I was completely cured. It was wonderful. No pain after eating, the faintness all gone, and my strength back again. And so I have kept from that day to this."

Digitized by Google

My hand was steady enough despite the excitement under which I was labouring. I asked myself whether this was some new and suddenly devised trick for throwing discredit upon my skill in surgery or whether his coming to me was really due to his sufferings.

In any case I must go on; if I refused, I should be blamed and scorned by the whole community for allowing professional jealousy to get the better of me.

I inserted the point of the lancet to make the cut, but at that psychological moment the electric light went out and we were left in utter darkness.

It may have been due to this sudden extinction of the light or to some other more ordinary cause, but in lancing the abscess at that very moment I also cut a blood vessel. I heard the blood dripping and I felt it on the fingers of my left hand.

Prompt action was necessary; I groped for the pad, but I must have knocked it off the table for I could not feel it.

I had no gas in the room, nor even a candle or matches. I have always been enthusiastic about the electric light and when the company was floated in our town I took up some shares and advocated the adoption of the new illuminant by word and deed—even to the extent of having the gas cut off.

In this critical moment I realised what that meant; I did not even know where to find a candle or a match. I am not a smoker, or I should probably have had some wax vestas in my pocket.

Then there came to me the dreadful thought that my enemy was now at my mercy and that I could remove him from my path for good and all. He would soon bleed to such an extent that it would be well-nigh, if not entirely, impossible to save his life. I could do this with every chance of my share in the work not being found out. With diabolical clearness the details flashed through my mind.

He had intended to operate upon himself; he had brought his own lancet with him. I could swear that he had begun the operation in his own house, had cut the vessel himself and, knowing that he was unable to sew up the artery himself, he had made his way to me to help him. The fact that he had brought his lancet with him would help to prove that he had left the place hurriedly and in great anxiety, and his coming to me would confirm the statement.

But few details were wanting to make the evidence complete, and these I could easily supply. His clothes were stained, and I had only to sprinkle a little blood here and there from my room out in the street and across to his own door; I could easily enter his house with his own key and complete the trail of blood marks, and also take his coat back. I could find the pad and dip it into the blood so as to be able to say that he had endeavoured to staunch the wound. At that time of night there would be nobody about to observe me. The failure of the light at the main could be proved, and this would account for the delay in assisting him.

It takes a long while to write this down, but it all occurred in a few seconds. Madden was one of those men who could operate on others without a tremor, but was a coward where he himself was concerned.

"For Heaven's sake, Barnard, make haste and get a light," he cried. And I afterwards found out that he compressed the spot with his right-hand fingers in order to lessen the flow.

"I must get some matches and a candle," I replied excitedly.

It was my intention to waste time and leave him to his fate. I pretended to grope for the pad in order to give it to him, all the while simulating the greatest anxiety. I lost quite a minute, perhaps more, in this way and then I stood erect with the intention of leaving the room.

I had made but one step forward when the door opened, admitting a streak of light, and my little Alice entered with a lighted candle.

The sight of the child's sweet face, and the thoughts which it brought to my mind, saved me from becoming a murderer.

I thought of my wife and pictured the horror she would feel—if the spirits of the departed are capable of such sentiments; and I imagined what my child would think if the facts ever came into her knowledge in after life. What would it mean to her to be burdened with the knowledge that her father had killed a fellow creature?

"Heaven bless you!" I gasped with a great sob, as I snatched the candle from her hand.

Madden was safe, for it took but a brief space to sew up the artery. Then I sent the little girl to bed and I went home with him, for he was weak.

When I returned I found my little maid still awake; what she had witnessed had been rather too much for her childish nerves and I had to give her an opiate. But before I did this, I asked her how it was that she came downstairs with a lighted candle.

It had been our custom to let her have a light in her room until we grown-ups went to bed. She had awakened from her first sleep and had heard the ring at the door and the noise of footsteps in the hall. She had watched the little electric fairy lamp and had seen it go out; and, remembering a similar occasion when the current had failed, she had connected this in her old-fashioned way with the visitor, and had at once jumped out of bed, lighted the candle in my room—which adjoined hers—and had come downstairs with it for me.

That proved to be the crisis mentioned by the astrologer.

I dreaded calling on Madden, but when I did so I found him quite changed in his manner towards me. He seemed to be impressed with the idea that I had done my very utmost for him at the critical moment when the light failed, and he was strangely moved by the anxiety which he supposed I had shown on his account.

"I tell you frankly, Barnard," he said, "that I had no right to expect it after what I have done against you. But I will do all in my power from this very moment to make up for the past."

I learnt that by wresting the prize from him, I had deprived him of the favour of an eminent medical man whose daughter he had hoped to marry. It would have been a brilliant match for him, and being of a vindictive nature, he had vented his spite upon me.

When the local paper appeared two days later, it contained an account of the operation and I was spoken of in the highest terms. I knew this was published at the instigation of Madden, for the journal had never gone out of its way to praise me. Madden had faced death and the experience was not pleasant; it had changed his mode of conduct and made him anxious to repair the evil he had wrought. My practice began to increase; Madden recommended people to me, because—so he told them—he was too busy, and fortune smiled upon me once more. She has favoured me ever since.

George Knight.

Digitized by Google

Have You Eczema?

or any form of Skin Disease? If you have, do go to your Chemist or Store, or send stamps or P.O. for 1/3 to the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., for a bottle of "ANTEXEMA." It gives immediate relief directly it is applied, and soon cures even the most obstinate cases. A Booklet on Skin Troubles is enclosed with each bottle.

All orders are sent securely packed, free from observation.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2st., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DO YOU KNOW

that with every copy of THIS WEEK'S

HOME NOTES

A Paper Pattern of a

GIRL'S PRETTY FROCK

is

GIVEN AWAY?

HOME NOTES is the best and daintiest of ladies' weeklies. Order a copy at once.

ONE PENNY.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business. GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins.

¼-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin and Postage.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE
BEST OF ALL BEVERAGES
AND THE CHEAPEST.

GOOD! IT'S

MASON'S

Extract of Herbs

8 Gallons Prime Beer for 6d.

Sample Free for 9 Stamps.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

NEWBALL & MASON,
NOTTINGHAM.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, October 15th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A penknife will be given to each reader whose attempts are used All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 229.

Form a square word from equivalents of the following:

More than one; a portion of land; a mineral; a hole.

No. 230.

What English noun, being of masculine gender and plural number, becomes, by adding an "s," singular in number and feminine in gender?

No. 231.

Re-arrange the following letters to form a well-known proverb:

A B C D EEEEEE G HH III L NNN O R SSSS TTTT W.

No. 232.

The initials and finals of equivalents of the following, when read downwards, will give the names of two distinguished British Generals:

A Boer accomplishment; above; graceful; a textile fabric; a disease; impetuous.

No. 233.

A word of FIVE letters I am;
Come, puzzle me out if you can.
My FIRST and my LAST are alike, I declare;
My SECOND and FOURTH are also a pair.
Read backwards and forwards, I'm always the same,
Behead and curtail me, and then I'm a name.
The rest I shall leave to architectural friends,
Who oft take my WHOLE to accomplish their ends.

No. 234.

I'm a comfort to infants when nursed on the knee;
A dog I become when a dog follows me.
I sometimes take wing, and a bird I'm then found;
When I come close to land, I'm a large tract of ground.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 211 to 216.

The first prize of £2 has been awarded this week to the Rev. G. P. Horne, of Newby Wispe, Northallerton, Yorks, whose solution was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "Calumnies," by E. M. Davy, has been sent to each of the following:

T. H. Howard, Holderness, E.
A. F. Cox, King's Heath, near Birmingham.
A. Roger, Cadogan Street, Glasgow.
W. E. Jackson, Chipping Norton.
F. G. Homer, Moseley near Birmingham.
H. Cammack, Everton.
G. Pescud, Fairfoot Road, Bow, E.
W. Stockwell Hillfield Avenue, Hornsey, N.
W. Weighell, Abbey Wood, Kent.
C. Stephens, Fratton, Portsmouth.

SOLUTION OF "COMPOSITE FACES" COMPETITION.

The forehead is that of ..... ALMA TADEMA.
The right eye is that of ..... LORD SALISBURY.
The left eye is that of ..... LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.
The nose is that of ..... CARDINAL VAUGHAN.
The mouth is that of ..... DR. PARKER.
The whiskers are those of SIR EDWARD CLARKE.
The ear is that of ..... LORD ROBERTS.

An Interesting Book.

CONSULT THE ORACLE;

or,

HOW TO READ THE FUTURE.

Crown 8vo. Price, 1s. Post Free, 1s. 3d.

Some of the Chapters are:

Chap. I.—The Meaning of your Dreams.
Chap. III.—Omens, Charms, and Spells for Lovers.
Chap. VII.—Judging Character by the Hands and Fingers.
Chap. XV.—Married Life Begun as it Should Be.
Chap. XXIV.—Table-Turning.
Chap. XXVIII.—Mystery and Danger of Mesmerism.
Chap. XXXIII.—Things Seen by Second-Sight.
Chap. XXXIX.—Looks showing your Character.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Henrietta Street, W.C.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	...	...					£0 10 0
Double " " "	...	...					1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	...	...	...	...			10 0 0
Half-page " " "	...	...	...	...			5 0 0
Quarter-page " " "	...	...	...	...			2 10 0
Eighth-page " " "	...	...	...	...			1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	...	...	...	...			12 10 0
" half " "	...	...	...	...			6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 9th, if intended for the issue on sale Oct. 23rd and dated October 27th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1 Cash Prize £50	£50 0
1 Cash Prize, £40	40 0
10 Handsome Pianos, in walnut, £40 each	400 0
5 Cash Prizes, £25 each ...	125 0
10 Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10 Ladies' Bicycles, Free-wheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10 Cash Prizes, £10 each ...	100 0
20 Jones's Sewing Machines, £8 each	160 0
20 Cash Prizes, £5 each ...	100 0
50 Rolled Gold Lever Watches, £2 10s. each	125 0
100 Cash Prizes, £2 each ...	200 0
50 Dinner Services (56 pieces), £2 each	100 0
50 Folding Bed Chairs, £2 each	100 0
50 Ladies' Travelling Trunks, £2 each	100 0
200 Cash Prizes, £1 each ...	200 0
200 Ladies' Leather Hatboxes, £1 each	200 0
100 Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered, £1	100 0
400 pairs Blankets, 15s. per pair	300 0
200 ½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large, 15s. per ½-doz. ...	150 0
200 ½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small, 15s. per ½-doz. ...	£150 0
500 Ladies' Umbrellas, 15/- ea.	375 0
500 Gents' Umbrellas, 15s. each	375 0
400 Best Electro-plated Teapots, 15s. each	300 0
400 Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case, 15s. set	300 0
1000 Cash Prizes, 10s. each ...	500 0
1000 pairs Bed Sheets, 10s. each	500 0
1000 White Linen Table Cloths, 10s. each	500 0
1000 Ladies' Umbrellas, 7/6 each	375 0
1000 Ladies' Leather Purses, 7/6 each	375 0
200 ½-doz. Table Knives, 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200 ½-doz. Dessert do., 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000 Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge, 7/6 each...	750 0
2000 Cash Prizes of 5s. each ...	500 0
4715 Ladies' Leather Handbags, 4s. each	943 0
4000 ½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs, 2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000 Handsome Work-boxes, 2/6 each	500 0
25,602	£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write leribly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the largest sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize.

UNDER ROYAL PATRONAGE.

OLD PEOPLE LIKE IT

for its wonderful power to invigorate decayed hair, and induce an entirely new growth when that is possible.

MIDDLE-AGED PEOPLE LIKE IT, because it prevents them from getting bald, keeps dandriff, away, and makes the hair grow thick and strong.

YOUNG LADIES LIKE IT

As a dressing, because it gives the hair a beautiful glossy lustre, ensures a luxuriant growth, and enables them to dress it and keep it in any style that may be desired.

CHILDREN LIKE IT,

Because it keeps the hair and scalp cool and clean, allays irritation, and keeps the hair in whatever position desired.

KOKO for the HAIR is a tonic, cleansing, invigorating preparation, it eradicates scurf and dandriff, prevents hair from falling or turning grey, promotes growth, contains no dye or greasy substance, is the most cleanly of all hair preparations and invariably gives satisfaction.

THEY ALL LIKE IT,

Because it is as pure as crystal, perfectly colourless, contains no poisonous substance, no sugar of lead, sulphur, nitrate of silver, or grease, and does not soil or colour the scalp, face, or the most delicate fabric in clothing.

1/-, 2/6, and 4/6, of all Chemists, Hairdressers, &c., everywhere.

NOW READY.

'BESIEGED WITH B.-P.'

A Complete Record of the Siege and Relief of Mafeking.

BY

J. EMERSON NEILLY.

War Correspondent of the "Pall Mall Gazette" in Mafeking.

Crown 8vo, price 1s. net; post free, 1s. 3d.

At all Bookstalls and Booksellers, and of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., Henrietta St., W.C.

A Magnificent Complexion Assured

BY THE FREE USE OF

LILLIE POWDER.

Its subtle MEDICINAL PROPERTIES Nourish, Heal and Soothe the delicate nerves of the skin, and bring Health and Beauty to all. Unsurpassed for all ailments of the skin. See testimonials.

Prepared from the original recipe invented by Mrs. Langtry, under the strict supervision of Her Majesty's Perruquier, Mr. W. Clarkson.

Order it of your Chemist, and be sure and refuse all substitutes, as they may be injurious. SEND FOR IT AT ONCE as you value the health of your skin.

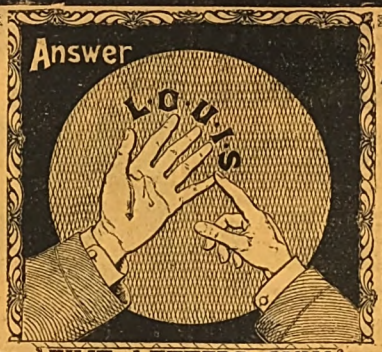
THREE TINTS: White, Flesh-colour, & Cream.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL

VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

"OROCO" TABLE MATS.

10 for ONE SHILLING Post Free.

Consisting of 6 Plate, 2 Meat Dish, and 2 Vegetable Dish Sizes.
AN ELEGANT TABLE DECORATION.
A PERFECT PROTECTION FROM HOT DISHES AND PLATES.

"OROCO" MANUFACTURING CO., WIGAN.

DON'T HAVE CORNS

BUNIONS or ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of

THOMPSON'S CELEBRATED CORN PLASTER

will cure you. It is thin as silk, and removes the pain at once. Post free, 14 stamps, from the Proprietor. Beware of imitations.

LADIES should take DR. SIMPSON'S ARSENICAL PEARLS. They secure a beautiful clear complexion, free from Blotch, Pimples and Roughness. Post free, 2/9 and 4/6 only, from M. F. THOMPSON'S Homœopathic Chemist, 17 Gordon Street, Glasgow.

Ask for Thompson's Pamphlet, "The Woman Beautiful."

THE "GEO. R. SIMS" HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO"

"While you wait"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY. 1s. 6d.

Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:

"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hairdressers all over the world, 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:
The Geo. R. Sims Co., 81c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

Digitized by Google

FRESH FACTS ABOUT THE £10 NOTE SCHEME. See page 463.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 615. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 13TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

ANOTHER SEAMAN AND

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

"There is nothing like Vi-Cocoa."

Mr. P. MORRIS, Mess 81, H.M.S. ROYAL ADELAIDE, Chatham Depot:

"I am pleased to say that I have found out for myself that Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is the best that I have yet tasted. I get Service cocoa every morning, but I prefer Vi-Cocoa. It is far more nourishing and refreshing, and I can certainly say that if anyone gives it a fair trial I am certain they will be satisfied and say that there is nothing like Vi-Cocoa.

"If you wish to make use of this letter you are at liberty to do so."

"UNDOUBTED PURITY AND STRENGTH."—Medical Magazine.
"IN THE FRONT RANK OF REALLY VALUABLE FOODS."—Lancet.

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

FAVOURED BY THE HOMES AND HOSPITALS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Dainty Sample Tin Free to any Address.

Address—Dr. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA Ltd., 60 Bunhill Row, London, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1	Cash Prize £50	£50	0
1	Cash Prize, £40	40	0
10	Handsome Pianos, in walnut, £40 each	400	0
5	Cash Prizes, £25 each ...	125	0
10	Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178	10
10	Ladies' Bicycles, Free-wheels, £17 17s.	178	10
10	Cash Prizes, £10 each ...	100	0
20	Jones's Sewing Machines, £8 each	160	0
20	Cash Prizes, £5 each ...	100	0
50	Rolled Gold Lever Watches, £2 10s. each	125	0
100	Cash Prizes, £2 each ...	200	0
50	Dinner Services (56 pieces), £2 each	100	0
50	Folding Bed Chairs, £2 each	100	0
50	Ladies' Travelling Trunks, £2 each	100	0
200	Cash Prizes, £1 each ...	200	0
200	Ladies' Leather Hatboxes, £1 each	200	0
100	Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered, £1	100	0
400	pairs Blankets, 15s. per pair	300	0
200	½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, large, 15s. per ½ doz. ...	150	0
200	½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small, 15s. per ½-doz. ...	£150	0
500	Ladies' Umbrellas, 15/- ea.	375	0
500	Gents' Umbrellas, 15s. each	375	0
400	Best Electro-plated Teapots, 15s. each	300	0
400	Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case, 15s. set	300	0
1000	Cash Prizes, 10s. each ...	500	0
1000	pairs Bed Sheets 10s. each	500	0
1000	White Linen Table Cloths, 10s. each	500	0
1000	Ladies' Umbrellas, 7/6 each	375	0
1000	Ladies' Leather Purses, 7/6 each	375	0
200	½-doz. Table Knives, 7/6 per ½-doz.	75	0
200	½-doz. Dessert do., 7/6 per ½-doz.	75	0
2000	Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge, 7/6 each...	750	0
2000	Cash Prizes of 5s each ...	500	0
4715	Ladies' Leather Handbags, 4s. each	943	0
4000	½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs, 2/6 per ½-doz.	500	0
4000	Handsome Work-boxes, 2/6 each	500	0
25,602		£10,000	0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write legibly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the largest sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize

FREE

QUAKER OATS COOKER

OUR OFFER, READ IT

2-Pint Cooker Free.	For 25 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.
2-Pint Cooker Free.	For 50 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.
3-Pint Cooker Free.	For 40 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.
3-pint Cooker Free.	For 75 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

Required number of White Squares must be sent in at one time.

On receipt by us, POSTAGE PAID, of required number of WHITE SQUARES, or price mentioned below, before Sept. 1, 1901, a Quaker Oats Cooker will be sent at once, carriage paid, to any address in Great Britain or Ireland.

If you want the Cooker at once, and have not the required number of WHITE SQUARES, send 2/- for 2-pint size, or 2/6 for 3-pint size. The amount you pay will be refunded immediately correct number of WHITE SQUARES is sent us, postage paid, if received by us before Sept. 1st, 1901. Write your address plainly and mention this Paper.

ADDRESS: DEPT W 3

QUAKER OATS, LTD., EASTCHEAP, LONDON, E.C.

QUAKER OATS, sold in 1-lb. and 2-lb. Packets only.

Beware of substitution. Quaker name and Quaker Figure on every Packet.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely, Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 97 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

FREE. FREE

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER.

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, here, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.; 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 151 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT.

PRE-EMINENT FOR 60 YEARS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 615.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending Oct. 13th, 1900.

A Horsey Woman:

OR,

Man's Honour.

"RITA, this is good of you."

"I had to go into the village, so I said I'd take in the station on the way back and pick you up. Jump in, the mare won't stand with her head turned homewards."

Hollis did so, and as they dashed off, the small tiger hung on behind, and clambered on as best he could.

"I expect you're awfully cold," the girl said, pressing her feet against the foot-board and gripping the reins hard. "It's an east wind, and that always makes Trilby unmanageable. I've had ever such work with her this afternoon. Hold on," as they swung round the corner. "Tom, see Captain Hollis's bag doesn't fall off."

"Let me take the reins," said the Captain. "Your wrists must ache, and I'm sure your hands are half frozen."

"Oh no, they're not, and she's fifty times worse with anyone else handling her. We shall just be in time to dress. How's your mother?"

"She's all right, thanks. Have you got a big party at the Hall?"

"About the same as usual. The Fiennes, Barclay-Helmonts, Major Downes and Jack Whitehead. Miss St. John comes to-morrow, so you'll be all right," and she laughed a little.

"Nonsense," she replied frankly when he demurred. "Muriel St. John's a very nice girl and she has a sensible little income. You'll have to marry some day, and you couldn't do better. I'm going to help her bring it off."

"Then I shall drink to your complete discomfiture."

"Nonsense, what's the matter with her?"

"Nothing, only I have an old-fashioned fancy for choosing my own wife, if I have one, and I fail to see the necessity."

"Better for you. Keep you straight and save you from breaking other girls' hearts. Steady, Trilby, steady," as the mare pricked up her ears and swerved, "can't you see it's only a heap of stones?"

"I consider that I deserve another five years freedom at least. I was only thirty last Sunday," remarked her companion. "Let's marry Miss St. John to the Major."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Let me take the reins," said the Captain.

"When I left, the gallant Major was worshipping Chris in the billiard room. She looked a trifle bored certainly, but he's good for five thousand a year, and a Kerr-Seton cannot afford to snap her fingers at that. Certainly a Chris Kerr-Seton can't."

"And what about a 'Rita'?"

"Rita is not extravagant. She can do with two dresses a year if she's got two decent horses and a roof to sleep under."

"How's Phil?" was the seemingly irrelevant question.

"All right. He's on the Riviera."

"Is he coming home soon?"

"In a few weeks. There's Chris and the Major looking out for us. I really believe she is in earnest this time. Perhaps she's tired of flirting."

"Very likely. Hullo, how are you?" he called, saluting the pair. "Prepare for a fervent song of thanksgiving as soon as I'm out of this. My hands are stiff with hanging on, but I didn't want to damp your Easter. Why doesn't Rita drive kangaroos if she likes excitement and vigorous, unlooked for jerks?"

"You poor thing, how you must have suffered," laughed Chris, "Trilby wasn't out yesterday so I can imagine it was pretty bad. You're awfully late. I was just going up to dress without waiting any longer. Everyone else has gone ages ago."

"Do you give the Major a class to himself already," asked Hollis chaffingly. "The rest of the world and Major Downes, eh?"

"And Jack Hollis thrown in as an after-thought," was the bright retort. "Let go my hand, I must tear off to dress. First impressions go a long way you know, and he's never seen me in evening dress yet," wickedly, "I'm going to flash upon him suddenly in all my glory, and while he's still gasping for breath, precipitate the fatal moment."

"I shall be there to see the unqualified surrender."

"You'd better not," threateningly, as she flew off.

Rita meanwhile was looking at her horse's mouth, and Hollis joined her. "What's wrong?" he said, and it was noticeable that his voice and manner changed.

"I'm not sure, but she's got something the matter. Either it's toothache or inflammation. I must see Grange after dinner."

"Let me see him for you."

"You can come with me if you like, but I always attend to anything connected with Trilby myself."

When the gentlemen joined the ladies after dinner, he looked round quickly and was not surprised to find her absent. He had hardly expected her to wait for him, and made his way at once through a conservatory and across the lawn towards the stables. He found her in the harness room, deep in an earnest colloquy with the head groom.

She wore a long dark cloak over her evening dress, but little white slippers showed below it, and Hollis wished she would take better care of herself,

She turned slightly when he joined them, but finished what she was saying to the groom before she remarked to him:

"I shan't be able to use Trilby for a day or two, isn't it a nuisance? Grange thinks her mouth is very bad."

"Really?" he said commiseratingly, but at the same time breathing an inward thanksgiving. For Hollis spent most of his time with Rita when he was at the Hall, and he had vivid recollections of how Trilby engrossed nearly all her attention when they were out with her.

"You will take cold it those thin slippers," he said as they returned. "Did you know it had been snowing?"

"No, but I never take cold. It feels almost like freezing, doesn't it? What a nuisance if it spoils the hunting."

When they reached the conservatory he contrived to detain her a little among the flowers.

It was a bright moonlight night, and her face showed clear and white against the dark background.

Hollis had his back to the light, so he could look upon her beauty unrestrainedly. For Rita had always been beautiful to Jack Hollis, whatever she had been to others. He liked her small, clear-cut features, the neat bands of dark hair bound close to her shapely head and her quiet eyes. She was not at all fashionable or stylish, but in every detail she was aristocratic to her finger-tips, and she was the one woman in the world for Jack Hollis. Yet she had been engaged to his cousin Philip Brindley for three years.

"Don't you admire our chrysanthemums?" she remarked, turning her head slightly. "We have a new gardener; it is the finest show we've ever had. It seems quite strange without old Bilson," she added, "I should think he had been here ever since you first came."

"Yes, I shall quite miss him. We always had a chat. It must be ten years this Easter since that first visit of mine." Hollis changed his tone a little, and looked hard into her face. "Ten years is a long time," he added quietly,

Rita turned her eyes to his with interest. "Is it really as much as that?" she said. "How time does fly. And you have been every Easter since," musingly.

"Every single one."

"They have been very jolly."

"They have indeed. None of my visits here during the year have quite the same charm as my anniversary Easter one. But it can't go on, that is the worst of it."

Digitized by Google

"Why not?" unguardedly, "you will always have the same welcome."

He bit his lip and contracted his forehead a little.

"There will be changes," he said.

She was silent, and a curious expression, half-regretful flitted across her eyes. A pause followed, then he said:

"Are you and Phil going to be married this year?"

"Yes. Most likely in May."

"So soon?" and his voice almost betrayed him.

"There is nothing to wait for."

He fidgeted half-nervously with his watch chain. She seemed to have grown a little paler, and to carefully hide her eyes from him.

She had always known that for some reason he did not approve of her fiancé.

"I had no idea the day was so near," he said at last, "I am sorry."

Her eyes grew a little strained.

"You don't understand, Phil," she remarked. "He always hides his best self."

"I think I do," he answered, "We were at Eton together, and afterwards at Sandhurst. I know he is a good fellow at heart, but——" he hesitated.

"Go on," she said.

"He is so weak."

"I know it but, I am strong. He has always relied very much upon me."

"That is just it. When a marriage is a really happy one, the woman relies upon the man. It is splendid for Phil to have you, but it is you I think about. I have always hoped to hear that you had changed your mind."

"You won't hear that," very quietly. "I have given him my promise. I shall stick to him now."

"But you gave it in a moment of extreme need and stress. It is not quite the same."

"A promise is always a promise."

"A true man would not have taken such an unfair advantage."

He spoke daringly, but he realised it might be the last chance, and braved her resentment. He knew so much better than she did, perhaps better than anyone, just how weak Philip Brindley was. A man of brilliant genius, spoilt by early success and adulation. He had often wanted to tell her, but a feeling of unfairness tied his tongue. If only he had not loved her himself. As it was he could only hint vaguely, and hoped that some unlooked for circumstance would break the engagement. And meanwhile he had been looking after Philip himself, and keeping him clear of bad companions at considerable cost of time and patience. But it was a long time before Rita ever heard of all he had done for her sake.

"It was not an unfair advantage," she replied to his charge, "I was a perfectly free agent."

She tried to speak firmly, but her heart seemed to rise up against her words as if to give them the lie. She remembered the darkened room and the mother's drawn, white face; the heavy atmosphere and the sick man's passionate intreaties. She had always been fond of him and looked after him; now that he was dying she could not turn from him and so his earnestness prevailed.

She had promised to be his wife if he got well.

"He did not mean it as such," Hollis continued, "I only know the news was a shock to everyone."

She made no sign, and he drew a step nearer.

"We are old friends, Rita, such old friends, you will forgive me a little plain-speaking, I know. Can you honestly assure me that your engagement has never been a disappointment to you? Are you certain you love Phil as well as you could love anyone?"

She shrank away with a half-appealing gesture, for his earnestness unnerved her.

Her face showed clear and white against the dark background.

Digitized by Google

"Look at me, Rita," he urged, "and assure me that I am wrong."

She raised her eyes bravely and opened her lips to speak. But the words died away unuttered; she looked at him helplessly for a moment and then turned with a quick movement to the door.

"I have promised to be Philip's wife," she said in a low voice. "I believe people call me horsey and masculine. I don't know whether they are right or not, but at least you can allow me a man's sense of honour."

* * * * *

On Easter Tuesday the Hall party attended a village concert, and afterwards prepared to walk home, preferring the moonlit loveliness of the night to the stuffy broughams. Jack contrived to walk with Rita, and as Chris passed them, she called, laughingly:

"Jack wants shaking or jumping on, or something, Rita. He's been a wet blanket all the evening. Give it him well, and don't let him off until he promises to propose to Muriel to-morrow."

She herself had become engaged to Major Downes the previous evening, and now that it was settled she felt very pleased and happy, and magnanimous to the world at large. Rita smiled, but said nothing, and she and Jack followed the rest of the gaily laughing throng. Only they were very quiet and very thoughtful, not at all like the others.

"I think it has been a success," Rita said at last, to break the constrained silence. "Everyone seems to have enjoyed it."

"I'm sure they have," he answered readily, "the programme did you great credit."

She laughed a little.

"You lie too easily, Jack," she said, "I know someone who looked and was insufferably bored."

"Well, I don't count myself," he replied. "I went because you asked me to, and I should do just the same again. The audience generally looked very placid and satisfied."

"You shouldn't have sat yourself down with only Mrs. Ingram for a neighbour."

"I found her rather amusing. She was very concerned because the Vicar's dear 'ead began to show so bald without his 'at on."

"There was an empty chair beside Muriel all the evening," she said, meaningly.

"I should have thought you would have been the last, Rita, to incite a man to profess for anyone what he did not feel," he said seriously.

"Do you think you could fall in love?" she asked.

"I don't think I ever shall," he replied evasively.

"I expect you haven't met the right woman yet," with a little smile.

He was silent for a few minutes, then he said in his usual calm way.

"Yes I have; I met her some years ago."

"Oh Jack," sympathetically.

"I don't know that she ever cared for me," he continued, "but she might have done later on, if not then. You see things went wrong. It does happen so, and then one has to make the best of it."

"I'm awfully sorry," in the same sympathetic voice. "Is it quite hopeless?"

"Quite. I went to her home to ask her, and the evening before I arrived she got engaged to someone else. If I had gone twenty-four hours earlier, it might have all altered the whole of her life and mine. Curious isn't it, how a trifle may make or mar anyone's life? I had intended to go two days earlier, and only waited to oblige a pal about something."

"But how strange, Jack—surely if she cared for you?"

"I don't suppose she did; she didn't really love the other man, and it would have given me a chance. Still, it might not have made any difference, and, anyhow, it's all over now. I only told you because of what you said about my marrying. She wasn't quite like other girls, you see, and I think she spoilt me for the rest."

He changed the subject then, and talked about the trip in the Mediterranean he and Will Fiennes were starting upon the next day; but Rita thought many times of what he had told her.

* * * * *

Jack was smoking in the conservatory the next morning, when Chris came upon him with rather an anxious expression.

"Have you seen Rita?" she asked, after glancing round to make sure they were alone.

"No, why? Is there anything the matter?"

"Phil has had an accident, but there's

Jack contrived to walk with Rita.

Digitized by Google

something else as well. She looks dreadfully worried."

"Where is she?"

"In the library alone. Pretend you want a book."

He found her sitting over the fire with a newspaper on her knee, but she was not even pretending to read it.

"What's wrong?" he asked.

Rita looked at him in surprise and was about to prevaricate, but something in his manner disarmed her, and she looked away to the fire, with the troubled expression deepening in her face. He waited for her to speak.

"I don't think I ought to worry you with it," she said at last, wearily.

"You would be doing me a good turn," he answered, "supposing I were able to help you in any way."

"And if not?"

"Let me try."

"It's about Phil."

He looked at her keenly.

"Yes?" he said questioningly.

"I'm afraid he's been wild again. He's had an accident, and though he doesn't exactly say so, I can guess it was through drinking. He writes very penitently and says I must give him up, because it is only what he deserves. I don't know what to do; I'm almost at my wits' end."

"Why don't you speak to your father about it?" he said, after a pause.

"Because he'd insist upon my breaking it off at once, and I'm not sure that I want to do that. Jack," suddenly, relaxing into an unusual show of warmth and earnestness, "I haven't done much in my life—it's such a poor tale at best—don't you think it would be worth something to keep Phil straight?"

"But supposing you fail?"

"I shouldn't when we were together always, I never have yet."

He got up and moved away restlessly.

"You can't possibly tell," he said. "It's a fearful risk. Personally I—I—no," hastily, "it's not for me to advise you. You must know what I think already."

She was silent.

"I will do anything I can to help you," he continued hurriedly, "if you are determined to let things go on as they are. Shall I look Phil up and see if I can make sure of anything?"

"Oh, would you?" eagerly. "It's an awful shame to let you, but I should be so glad to know definitely what is wrong."

"I can try and find out for you. Did you say he was at Monte Carlo?"

"Yes."

"Am I to give him any message?"

"Nothing special, but if he's very ill and wants me, let me know. I might be able to come out to him."

He turned to go, but his face was very white and set.

"You are a brick, Jack," she said gratefully. "I shan't worry nearly so much now."

He did not answer, but took out his watch.

"I must hurry," he said, "I haven't packed yet. I'll let you know all I can."

Half-an-hour later, a dog-cart bearing the two men to the station drove out at the park gates, but Rita was still sitting alone in the library, pretending to read.

At last she got up.

"No, I won't fail him now," she said resolutely, and went to get into her riding-habit for a solitary canter.

"I wonder who it was Jack cared for," she mused as she rode home. "I used to think it was Chris, but it couldn't have been."

Rita was sitting alone in the library.

Her eyes grew very wistful. She was thinking how she used to wish it might have been her.

* * * * *

"I am very glad. He wasn't half good enough for you," and Chris spoke with her usual decision.

There was no doubt she had quite made up her mind on the subject.

Rita said nothing, but stood looking fixedly at the letter in her hand. It stated clearly that her fiancé wished to break off their engagement.

The reasons were a trifle vague, but the purport was undeniable.

"Now you'll be able to marry Jack," Chris continued, coolly. "I know he's in love with you. I'm just as glad as ever I can be."

Rita did not heed her; she scarcely seemed to hear at all. Her face was deadly pale and a light of subdued anger burned in her eyes, but she still said nothing. Instead, she turned away.

She wanted to be alone to face the whole matter and make something of the confusion in her mind, where wounded pride struggled with a half formed sense of relief.

A week later came Jack's letter and one sentence ran:

"You were the woman I told you I had loved so hopelessly. I may tell you now, freely, thank Heaven for that, even though it may make no difference. I cannot remember the time when I knew you and did not love you, only Fate has seemed against me all along. But I have fresh hope now. I shall return home quickly, and when I get back we can perhaps start over again."

When she had read it she heaved a long sigh of gladness.

"If I had only known," she breathed, "but it will be all right now it will be all right now."

GERTRUDE PAGE.

Digitized by Google

A MIDNIGHT RIDE.

I CALLED upon Marston Moore one evening—it was in September, 1888—and quite to my surprise found him in deep dejection. He was a young physician of three or four years' practice, but without a care in the world that I had ever heard of. Certainly he had no occasion to worry about ordinary things, for his banking account was among the many thousands.

Nevertheless, he was despondent, and when I endeavoured to laugh him out of the condition he became only more morose. His manner was so brusque and his replies so monosyllabic that at last I took offence and rose to depart. It was then that he detained me.

"Pardon me, old chap," he said with more cordiality than he had yet manifested, "the fact is I'm in trouble. Somebody has got to help me out, and I don't know which way to turn. It is almost too much to ask of any friend."

I dropped back into my chair reassured, and after a moment of silence asked as gently as I could:

"How much is it, Marston?"

He looked up quickly, and there was a puzzled expression on his face; then he laughed, but it was a mirthless laugh after all.

"It isn't that," he said presently. "I wish it were. Do you think that I would have hesitated to apply to you if it were a question of money? No, that is the least of my worries. It is something of far more importance than that. It is—but I cannot put you to such a severe test of friendship, old fellow."

"Come, come," I exclaimed, my curiosity aroused, and also resenting the idea that he should consider any test of my friendship for him too great for me to stand. "If there is anything in the world that I can do for you, Marston, you well know that I will be only too glad to do it. Out with it now; what is the matter?"

"I cannot tell you all of the horrible story," he replied with marked hesitation. "If you are willing to go with me you will have to wait until we arrive before you hear all there is to tell."

"Arrive where?" I demanded.

"That also is out of my power to state," he responded, "for I do not yet know myself."

Then he sprang from his chair, and with rapid strides crossed and recrossed the room several times, at last pausing directly in front of me, with feet wide apart and hands thrust deep into his trousers' pockets. For a moment he regarded me with a gaze so intense that involuntarily I turned my eyes away. It was then that he continued:

"Look here, Ferguson," he said, "if you really mean that you will stand by me through this thing you will have to go into it blindly. It is not that I lack confidence in you that I do not tell—you know that, or should—it is because now I cannot be more explicit."

"All right, I'll go into it blindly, then," I said, trying to laugh and making a miserable failure of it. "You would do it for me if the positions were reversed."

"I am not so sure of that, knowing what I do," he half soliloquised. "It's a great deal to ask of any man, especially one's best friend. No, Ferguson, I do not think that I should accept your offer. I'll see the thing through alone, let the consequences be what they may."

"I'll be blowed if you will," I ejaculated, getting upon my feet also, and facing him where he stood. "If you are going into any danger where I can be of service, or where I can help see you through, I'm going to do it. I don't care a rap what it is. You needn't say another word, now or ever, if you don't want to, but go with you I will; and if you still refuse, so help me, I'll trump up some charge and have you arrested so that you cannot go yourself. Now, don't have any more words about it, but tell me at once what I am to do."

"You're a trump, too, Ferguson!" he exclaimed, seizing me by the hand and shaking it heartily, and I noticed that his eyes brightened perceptibly as he did so. "It is worth while having such a friend as you are in an extremity like this one, and I will take you at your word. All that I can now say is this: I must leave here to-night at midnight, and I have an appointment to keep beyond the city limits; but the exact location of the place where I am to meet the parties who expect me has not yet been fixed upon. In fact, I will not know about it until shortly before the time to start. We will have to go on horseback, and goodness alone knows when we will return, if we ever do. Are you still determined to accompany me?"

"More than ever."

"Very well. Meet me, then, at Turner's stables exactly at twelve o'clock to-night. I will have two good horses in readiness. See that you are well armed, Ferguson. A pair of 'forty-fours' may come in handy before we see the sun of another day—if we are fortunate enough ever to do so."

I clasped his hand silently, and in silence left him. I was greatly perturbed about the affair, for I could not even guess at the meaning of his strange words and manner. I had known Moore since my first year at college, and our friendship had never faltered since that time, now twelve years, nor had I ever known him to get into a serious scrape. Of the two, I was more prone to that sort of thing.

It was barely eight o'clock when I left Moore, so that I had four hours in which to make my preparations for the midnight ride. This I did, first by writing several letters and inclosing them in a big envelope, which I placed conspicuously on the mantel in my bedroom, marked: "To be opened and directions followed in case I have not returned at eight o'clock to-morrow evening." Then I dated it, so there might be no mistake. After that I dressed myself in my riding suit and boots, buckled my cartridge belt and revolvers round my body, and I was ready.

It was then only eleven o'clock, and I passed the intervening time in writing more letters, for Moore's seriousness had impressed me strongly, and although I could not even conjecture what might happen, I was thoroughly imbued with the idea that the experiences of the night were not to be child's play. In that I was correct.

Digitized by Google

When the clock struck twelve I entered the stable. Moore was awaiting me, impatiently slashing his boots with his riding whip.

"You are a quarter of an hour late, Ferguson."

"It is exactly twelve," I responded in astonishment, producing my watch in proof of the statement. "I am here to the minute."

"Are you?" ironically. "I thought I said at a quarter to twelve."

"No, you said 'exactly at twelve.' Those are your own words."

"Well, never mind, you are here now, anyway," and he swung himself into the saddle, struck his horse a smart clip with the whip, and dashed into the darkness.

I was after him in a moment, but did not overtake him for some time, when he drew rein, and waited for me.

"We turn here," he said briefly, and led the way along the thoroughfare towards the river valley. I endeavoured to get near enough to converse with him, but for some reason I could not succeed. Either his horse was unusually fractious, or surreptitiously Moore kept him excited with the spur.

All the way to the river he kept a little ahead of me, and quite to one side, so that there was no opportunity for conversation. Down at the very bottom he halted, and for the first time seemed disposed to talk.

"We turn south here, Ferguson," he said, "and we will have to pick our way. It is rather dark, but I think I can find the place."

"Then you know now where you are going?" I asked.

"Yes. There is an old house a mile or so below here. I am going there. Are your pistols all right?"

"Yes," I replied.

"There is an old railway siding somewhere here. It has been abandoned for years, but if I can locate it we can follow along the top of it. It will be easier than forcing our way through the woods. Keep your eyes open now, and look out that you are not brushed off your horse by a low hanging branch; and above all, Ferguson, don't talk. Let us move along as silently as possible."

He led the way, and I followed, although as we dived deeper into the woods it soon became difficult to see him; but I knew that my horse would follow his unerringly, so I abandoned the effort to guide him.

It seemed to me that we travelled in that manner more than an hour, though I now know it was not so long by far; then we turned down the bank of the old siding, crossed a swampy stretch where the grass grew so high that it caught in my spurs, and presently began the ascent of a steep though short hill, and at the top emerged from the woods, but found ourselves at the margin of a wilderness of bushes that were not quite so high as our heads as we sat upon our horses.

Coming from the gloom of the woods behind us, the starlit sky—there was no moon—made it seem quite light. Before us, three or four hundred feet away, dark, gloomy, and forbidding, loomed the outlines of a house, and for some reason the aspect of the whole thing sent an involuntary shudder through me.

While I was intently regarding the house, Moore dismounted, and having unbuckled one side of the bridle rein and thus made a halter of it, he tied his horse to a tree.

"We will have to leave the horses here, Ferguson," he said. "What we have to do now must be done on foot. Tie your animal and follow me."

I acted as hastily as I could, but Moore was already several paces in advance. Still, I hastened to overtake him.

"Don't you think you had better post me a little now, Marston?" I managed to whisper, but the only reply I received was a sharp "Hist!" and somewhat offended I went on after that, silently and doggedly, resolved that I would not ask another question no matter what happened.

As we drew nearer to the house I saw that we were behind it. There was no sign of life visible. Indeed, from appearances, I decided that the place had been deserted a long time, perhaps years. Moore, however, seemed to know where he was going, and he led me by a detour round the house, so that we finally approached it from the front.

Just before we stepped from the concealment of the bushes to approach the door, I felt my friend's hand upon my arm, and heard him whisper, very low: "Follow me closely, and do exactly as I say. A great deal—our safety—may depend upon it." Then he went ahead.

We stepped upon the rickety porch as silently as we could, but despite our efforts it creaked dismally beneath our combined weight. Then, to my surprise, Moore, with the butt of one of his pistols, hammered loudly upon one of the panels of the door. After the silence that had preceded his act, it seemed to my strained senses as if the noise made by the knocking might have been heard a mile away.

Notwithstanding that fact, there was no immediate response, and presently Moore hammered again, this time louder than before, and the summons had to be repeated the third time before there was anything like a response. Then, from beyond the door, a masculine voice inquired:

"Who is there?"

"Marston Moore," replied my companion in a loud tone.

"Alone?" was the second query.

"No, accompanied by a friend."

There followed a moment of silence, and then the voice beyond the door said:

"Why didn't you come alone as you were told to do? There isn't any room for strangers here; you know that."

I thought I heard Moore swear under his breath, but I was not sure; and then, in a tone which there was no mistaking, he shouted:

"Open that door, Madgley, or I'll kick it in, and it won't be a difficult thing to do, either. Open it, and open it quick!"

There was another short interval of silence, and then, rather to my surprise, the door swung slowly back on its hinges, leaving a space of impenetrable blackness in its place. There was not a sign of a human being to be seen. The man who had spoken to us from behind the door had disappeared—or, rather, he did not appear at all.

Moore immediately passed through the aperture into the darkness, and disappeared, but a second later I heard his voice.

Digitized by Google

"Come on, Ferguson," he said; "it's all right."

I followed without hesitation, but I had scarcely passed the threshold when strong arms seized and pinioned me from behind, a blanket was thrown over my head, and before I could do anything to resist the attack, I was dragged to the floor, and by many hands held helpless while others bound me. Notwithstanding the struggle in which I was engaged I was conscious that there was another one near me, and I believed that Moore had been attacked in the same manner.

"Fools that we were," I thought, "to enter that dark corridor as we had done without first taking precautions to avoid exactly the thing that had happened."

I called aloud to Moore, but received no reply. Except for the deep breathing of the men near me the silence was absolute.

As soon as I was bound so that there was no chance for me to escape, my captors raised me from the floor and bore me away. I knew that they carried me to the second floor of the building, and presently I was taken into a large room where there was a fire, and in the dim light I could see that the men who had assaulted me were garbed in the livery of a secret society known as "white caps."

I realised that there would be little or no use in asking questions, and remained silent; neither did one of my captors utter a word. I looked round as well as I could for some sign of Moore, but he was not there, and if he was I could not see him.

They placed me upon my back on the floor, and the next instant a thick handkerchief of black silk was bandaged round my head, effectually blindfolding me. A moment later I heard them leave the room, and I knew that I was alone.

Nearly an hour passed before I again heard a sound, and then it was the stealthy tread of many feet passing near me, until it seemed to my strange sense of hearing as if I was in the centre of a group that had formed round me. Then I was startled by a voice saying:

"Mr. Albert Ferguson, you may thank yourself alone for the inconvenience to which we have been compelled to put you. We had reasons for desiring the presence of your companion, but we have nothing to do with your affairs. If you are willing to return as you came, and to pledge yourself to absolute secrecy regarding all that has happened to-night, there is no reason why we should detain you."

"Where is Moore?" I demanded. "Certainly, I am willing to do all you ask, but you must remember that I came here with Marston Moore. If I returned as I came, I return with him."

"In this case you will have to return without him," was the stern reply.

"Then I'll give you no pledge of secrecy, and you know that I would not keep it if I made one."

"This is a serious matter, Mr. Ferguson. You had better think twice before you decide. Our business with Moore is our own affair and his. He knew what he had to expect before he came here, and he know also just what dangers threatened you if he brought you with him. He acted the part of a coward in doing so, and if you will heed good advice you will have nothing more to do with him."

"What have you done with him?" was all the reply I made.

"We have done with him just exactly as we now propose to do with you, for I see that you are incorrigible. Pick him up, boys. It is a waste of breath to argue with him."

If I should attempt to describe the experiences through which I passed during the ensuing hour and a half, credulity would be taxed to the utmost, but it is certain that every ruse which the ingenuity of the human mind could conceive was forced upon me to induce me in some way to desert Moore or to deny him.

As the ceremony progressed—and before the proceedings had occupied above an hour I had decided that it was a ceremony of some kind—it dawned upon me, dimly at first, and then with the force of certainty, that I was undergoing some sort of initiation. What it was I could not determine. The real truth did not once occur to me.

At last, with the bandage still over my eyes, I heard these words:

"My friend"—and the voice startled me, for I fancied that I recognised it—"it is with unmixed pleasure that I announce the completion of your trials and suffering. You have been tried in the balance and have not been found wanting in the virtues which we require of all candidates. Whoever enters here must possess all the qualities which are expressed by the word 'friend,' which is the most abused and traduced word in our language.

"Throughout all the tests that have been applied to you you have been steadfast, loyal, and true. What more can one friend ask of another? You were willing, at the request of Mr. Moore, to go blindly into unknown dangers, content to await an explanation until he chose to grant one, and you have found here many who stand ready at any moment to perform the same service for you.

"And now, after some further initiation and instruction, you will have become a member of the most secret order in the world—and the most magnificent. Even its true name is never mentioned—never uttered aloud. Mr. Moore will remove the bandage from your eyes and cut the cords that bind you. After he has craved your pardon for the imposition he has practised upon you, you will be instructed in the mysteries of this sacred order."

That is all. I wish I might tell the rest, but I cannot.

Frederic Van Rensselaer Dey.

JUST PUBLISHED. CHEAP EDITION OF

A SPLENDID NOVEL,

The Invisible Man

By H. G. WELLS.

Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," etc.

Price 6d.

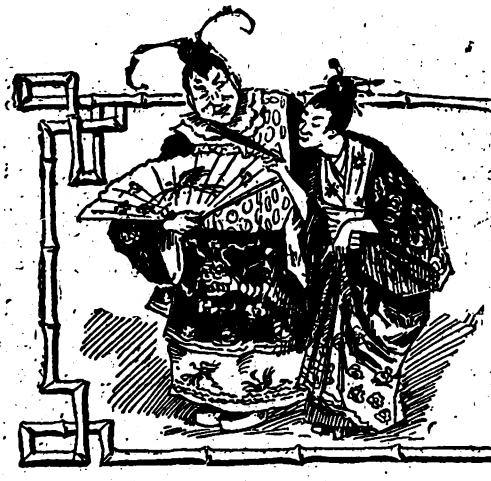
POSTAGE 2d. EXTRA.

"The humour is excellent, keen, and invigorating. . . . Mr. Wells' talent is unique of its kind."—Daily Mail.

AT ALL BOOKSTALLS AND BOOKSELLERS, and of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXVII.—HIS NATURAL PHILOSOPHY DIDN'T WORK TILL HE CALLED IN A TRAMP.

THAT Mr. Bowser had something on his mind the other evening was plainly evident to Mrs. Bowser, and for an hour she was in doubt as to whether he had bought the patent rights of a washing machine or had taken a half interest in a patent hay fork. After dinner he condescended to explain.

"Mrs. Bowser," he began in a paternal way, "a woman is never expected to know much, and you never hear me complain of your ignorance, but there are some few things I wish you would post yourself about. I presume you have never given a thought to natural philosophy, and yet you would find it a most interesting study."

"I think I know a good deal about natural philosophy," she quietly replied.

"Then I have never discovered it. The other day I saw you poke the handle of the carpet-sweeper through a pane of glass. Natural philosophy should have taught you that when a stick of hard ash comes in contact with a window the pane must be shivered. A few nights ago it was so hot that you removed the blankets from our bed. Last night we had a cold wave, and I was nearly frozen. Natural philosophy should have taught you that the weather does not always remain the same. Do you follow me?"

"Yes. You put a table napkin in your pocket the other morning for a handkerchief, and as a natural philosophical result when you pulled it out on the crowded 'bus there was a general grin at your expense. I think I understand."

"And I think you don't," he exclaimed as he flushed up. "There's a heap of difference between absence of mind and natural philosophy, and I don't suppose you will ever be able to separate them. Perhaps, however, you know why we put ice into the top of the refrigerator instead of the bottom."

"Because cold air descends," she replied.

"That is correct, Mrs. Bowser, and I give you full credit. Perhaps you also know that hot air ascends and that the warmest place in this room at present is next the ceiling."

"Certainly."

"That is well, and we will proceed further. There sits the cat under the piano. If the front door should open and a dog came trotting in here, what would be the result? What does natural philosophy teach you would happen?"

"There would be no natural philosophy about it. The natural antagonism existing between the canine and feline races would result in a fight between the dog and the cat."

"It would be natural philosophy, Mrs. Bowser."

"I think it would be natural antagonism."

"There you go! I might have known your natural obstinacy would lead you to dispute me. Suppose I found the cat on the piano and gave her a cuff. In obeying the laws of natural philosophy where would she go to?"

"In obeying the laws of gravity she would reach the floor."

"What's gravity got to do with this question?" he shouted.

"Gravity has a lot to do. If it wasn't for the laws of gravity, the cat would fly up to the ceiling when you cuffed her."

"I deny it. In your ignorance and obstinacy you are determined to ridicule the question. Very well, Mrs. Bowser. It is useless to waste further time on you. I shall be much disappointed if I find that the cook is as ignorant as you are. I am going down to the kitchen. What will natural philosophy prompt the cat to do?"

He gave her a lift.

Digitized by Google

"As she is probably hungry her natural instincts will prompt her to follow you and yeowl round until you give her some of that cold mutton."

Mr. Bowser paused in the door to glare at her and extend his right arm with dramatic gesture, but he was too cross to reply in words. The cat followed him down stairs from natural instincts, and natural philosophy should have proved to him that she was hungry for meat. It didn't, however. When he found her at his heels, he gave her a lift with the toe of his shoe, and as the law of gravitation brought her to the floor she made haste to hide under the sideboard. Proceeding to the kitchen, Mr. Bowser found the cook washing dishes, and he began:

"I desire to talk to you for a minute. You have in your hand a jug. If you knock it against the iron sink, it will be broken, but why will it be broken?"

"I lived in my last place seven years and never even broke a tea-cup," answered the girl in tones of defence.

"Very likely, but I want you to see the philosophy of things. Which is the harder, iron or crockery?"

"Is the missus complaining of my cooking, sir?"

"No, no. Your cooking is all right. Let us take another case. There is a kettle of boiling water on the stove. Let it boil for an hour, and you will find the quantity considerably less, but where has the water gone to?"

"And is this a house where a girl has to pay for boiling water?" asked the girl as she turned on him.

"No, of course not. Can't you understand that I am asking you questions in natural philosophy?"

"I never heard of it, sir."

"Well, why do you build a fire under your pots and kettles?"

"And are you going to complain that I use too much coal? I'm here on a week's trial, but if I've got to be found fault with by the man of the house I'll leave this very night. Why don't the missus come down if there is anything wrong?"

Mr. Bowser gave it up and left the kitchen. He had thought the cook would grasp his natural philosophy at once, but she appeared to be more dense than Mrs. Bowser. He didn't want to go up stairs at once and admit his failure and was hanging about the dining room for a minute, when the area bell rang, and he took it upon himself to answer it. There was a man at the door, and though taken somewhat aback, he asked for money for a night's lodging.

"Come in and I'll see about it," replied Mr. Bowser as he congratulated himself on finding someone who could understand him.

"I'm a hard-working man, sir," explained the caller as he took a seat, "but I'm out of a job and hungry and stony broke."

"In other words it's a case of natural philosophy," chuckled Mr. Bowser. "Having no work you have no money. Having no money, you cannot buy a dinner or a night's lodging."

"That's it exactly, sir. I never heard the case stated so beautifully in all my life."

"I'm glad you understand. Natural philosophy teaches us that we must consume a certain amount of food if we would maintain our health."

"It do, sir."

"You observe before you a table. It is barren of eatables just now, but what does natural philosophy teach us?"

"I'm a hard-working man, sir," explained the caller.

"That it will presently be covered with cold wittles for my benefit."

"Exactly, my man. You know more than my wife and the cook put together. You want sixpence to secure a bed. If you get sixpence——"

"I will get a bed."

"And if not?"

"I'll get the collar from a cop for wandering about the streets."

"Couldn't be better!" chuckled Mr. Bowser. "I'll go upstairs and get you a sixpence, and you shall have something to break your fast, and we will resume the conversation."

They didn't, however. When Mr. Bowser returned with the sixpence, the tramp was no longer in the dining-room, and the area door was open. Mrs. Bowser came down before his absence could be commented upon, and, pointing to the sideboard, she said:

"There are four pieces of silver gone off that board!"

"By thunder, it is so!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser.

"Where's your tramp?"

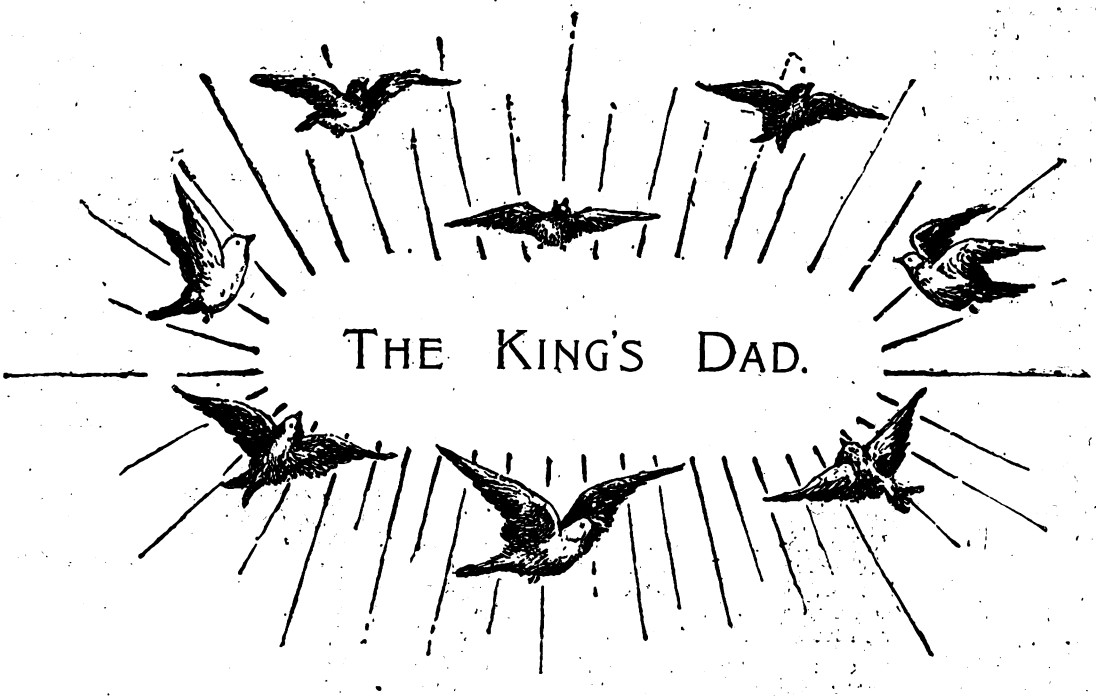
"G-gone."

"And the silver with him! I thought you wanted to teach me natural philosophy."

And all Mr. Bowser could do was to fall into a chair and stare helplessly at an old bandana handkerchief the tramp had left on the floor.

M. Quad.

Digitized by Google



THE KING'S DAD.

THE day was a fine one, and as I sat by the side of the "old man garrulous," and looked out over the sun-flecked river reach, up toward London and then down to the sea, I thought the lot of the old master mariner to be indeed cast in a pleasant place.

Belvedere, near Erith, seems an ideal spot for the day's decline of such as he. Breezy, open as it is, the silent highway is ever before him, with its moving panorama of departing and returning vessels.

This was my second visit to old Peter Mullins, ex-skipper of a trading schooner, and, in his younger days, a foremast hand on a small brig, cruising with the same object in the South Seas.

The old man was evidently nearing the end of life's voyage, and was as evidently desirous of unburdening his mind of something which appeared to trouble him.

Why he should have selected me as his father-confessor I hardly know, except, perhaps, that on the former occasion, I had constituted myself a good listener, a qualification nearly always with some people provocative of confidence.

I will, however, let him tell his story in his own way.

* * * * *

"Come closer, so as I can see ye, and so as ye can hear my voice. For sight's a-failing and breath is short with me now. But the spirit! the spirit's all right! Ay! if it wasn't for that old Pete Mullins would have foundered long ago.

"It was in the early sixties, nigh forty year ago, when I shipped as A.B. in the Fortune, brig.

"We were bound for Tahiti first, in the South Seas, and then for a general trading cruise among the Islands. It was a part of the world that was 'Greek' to me. My trips up to that time had been east; Mediterranean, through the Canal, and then to Bombay or Calcutta. But I suppose this was meant to be. Fate's a ticklish varmint, mate; she measures ye, fits ye, and whether ye like 'em or not ye've got to wear the duds.

"Well, we sailed, and all the way up Channel a dead head wind was our starting luck. But it soon changed when we got outside, and good weather was the word till we made the 'Islands.'

"We sighted the first of 'em just as the sun was setting. With the morning, the skipper decided, we being many miles from Tahiti, to commence commercial operations where we were.

"The Fortune was lying 'off and on' just outside the veriest paradise man's eyes ever were, or ever could be, set on.

"A coral-formed bulwark; inside it a waveless pool, or lagoon, completely surrounding the atoll. A fringe of cocoa-palm; a clump of the same in the centre of the island, just gave that touch of green to the picture that made it so lovely thereabouts. I was that excited to get ashore, that when the skipper ordered out a boat I managed to secure an oar.

"'Mind, boys,' shouted the old man after us, 'no sky-larking! The creatures' ways are kind'er unpleasant for them as plays a game with their heathen feelings!'

"'Aye, aye, sir!' sang out the bos'un, who was in charge of the expedition.

"But I just thought to myself that it were impossible for beings living in such a place to be anything but good descendants of old Adam at the very least.

"The nearer we got to the shore, the more I was enchanted. Fairyland it looked like, and I peered out to catch a glimpse of the fairy folk, who, I felt sure, must inhabit the island.

"And now something peculiar happened. Something I couldn't quite explain to myself powerfully attracted my attention. A pair of big, sparkling eyes it was I was certain that, with their owner, seemed to be taking stock of us from behind the low scrub. It was, I was sure, a living, breathing reality.

Digitized by Google

"The minute we grounded I makes a spring, turns a deaf ear to the bos'un's call, and with a ten-knot running stride makes for the object that had so stirred my imagination. No sooner, however, did I get within hailing distance than blest if the contrary fairy thing didn't run with a speed according, and in a jiffy was out of sight.

"Wondering how I should get back to the boat, I turned to retrace my steps, when, without warning, I received a crashing blow on the back of my head which felled me to the ground.

"How long I lay unconscious I can't say, and it doesn't much matter, but when I did come to, I saw that I was surrounded by a mob of shrieking naked brown devils.

"They grinned and gibbered at me like demons when they saw me move a bit, and indicated in unpleasantly unmistakable fashion that my last hour had come.

"I'm no coward, never was one, that I know of. Storm, squall, or fine weather have always been alike to me. But I must confess in this case to a feeling of dread suspense. Any moment the deadly blow might fall. I shut my eyes, whispered to myself a fervent 'Amen' to a not very long life and—waited.

"Then, as if by magic, the howling and wrangling about me suddenly stopped, and I heard distinctly the clear, silvery ring of a woman's voice. What she was saying I could not make out, but evidently the speaker, whoever she might be, had influence of no mean sort with the savage rabble.

"Curious to solve the riddle, I opened my eyes. Surely the fairy idea was real—a beautiful, undeniable fact!

"Kneeling in tears beside me was a woman, a girl, young and sweet. Her face, daintily small and round, was of dusky hue, her hair jet black, while her tiny brown feet were as perfectly formed as those of my Lady Vere de Vere.

"But it was her eyes that held me, held me spellbound. Large and lustrous, they seemed to have in them the whole soul of their pretty owner. First did she turn them in tender compassion upon me, and then flash them in indignant command round upon the scowling crowd. Strangest and most curious thing of all, though, the girl, every now and then, would take my hand, and impulsively kiss it.

"This action of hers appeared greatly to impress the others, for at every repetition of it the latter showed more and more a disposition to relinquish their prey.

"The lingo they jabbered was double-dutch to me, while my own talk would have been just as incomprehensible to them. It was a difficulty certainly with regard to a proper mutual understanding.

"Then, suddenly, an idea appeared to strike the girl. Rising to her feet, she went through a sort of animated and eloquent pantomime.

"Being, I think, no fool, I contrived to gather by degrees the course she was steering.

"The natives were hostile to white intruders, that was clear. Then by a series of wonderfully expressive gestures she got me to see how that it was a custom with them, when a white man's doom was sealed, to accept a maiden's intercession, signified by the kissing by her of the victim's hand.

"One condition was attached, however, to the arrangement (and as she interpreted it a beautiful blush deepened the delicate brown of her cheek and throat), viz., that within seven days the respited one must take his preserver for better and for worse.

"This was indeed a startling situation.

"Still, I was practically alone in the world. Not a soul existed to care whether I lived or died. My shipmates had not attempted a rescue, so turning it all over in my mind, I decided to accept what I couldn't really help.

"The little creature by my side (she was very small), seemed somehow to know that I had so settled it, for with a wave of her wee brown hand she impatiently dismissed the niggers.

"When we were quite alone, I took a pointed stick, and stooping down, wrote in the sandy soil the words 'My wife.'

"Then, by signs and suchlike, I endeavoured to teach her their sound and meaning.

"By-and-by she seemed to grasp it, and clapped her little hands with delight.

"All that followed is to me now, as I sit here and look out upon the quiet waters of the old Thames, as a dream, a tale told so many years ago that every incident, every character is ghostly, indistinct, almost impossible.

"Briefly, for the story in all its details would take too long in the telling, we married.

"For some days the men of the place hid me from any search that might be organised by the Fortune's people.

"But none was made, at least I heard of none.

"It was after quiet had settled down, that I found out who it really was that I had married.

"My informant was a truculent, shifty-eyed native, by name Obishama. Himself with a sneaking affection, of a kind, for my Meta (I had so named her), he bid me, in a bumptious, superior sort of way, to beware how I treated my spouse, as she was a princess; the daughter, only child in fact, of Maramaha, the King of the island.

"A princess! and that she should marry me! This was, indeed, altogether out of my reckoning, and a truly queer state of affairs.

"However, considering whence it came, I took the news coolly, and as a matter of course; succeeding in disguising my astonishment.

"Obishama, expecting that I should be profoundly impressed, was consequently alike disappointed and puzzled at my indifference.

"'Very well,' I said. 'Then, if that's so, and my Meta is heiress-apparent, I must be in some sort a royal personage myself now. Don't worry yourself, I'll look after my wife, and, too, after you, who, if I am not greatly mistaken, need it pretty considerably.'

Digitized by Google

"He didn't, of course, understand a word I said, but left me with so sulky and even threatening a manner that I looked for bad consequences for myself should opportunity arise at any time.

"To hurry on, ten years went by without disturbing influence of any kind. Ten peaceful years. Waited upon hand and foot by Meta, I fear that I developed a somewhat dependent and selfish spirit. Only every now and again would force itself upon me a passionate desire for the land of my birth; for the larger freedom of civilisation and intelligent intercourse.

"This was but a passing thought, but it strengthened with time, until when, as I have said, ten years had slipped away, the longing became painful, and more almost than I could bear.

"I think Meta saw my trouble written in my eyes. Women, be they of what hue they may, are keen to read the souls of the men they love, and she did love me. I knew that; knew it even better afterwards, to my life-long sorrow and regret, when sorrow and regret were all too late.

"One chick we had, a boy, and in build and temperament my own image. Like his mother he was brown, but of a lighter tint. He was as brave as a little lion, too, and when, as was our wont, we went down to the lagoon for a swim, and a fishing raid, he would excel even me in his diving and swimming feats and gambols.

"One day—shall I ever forget it? I can't for it is burnt into my brain. One day, in the early morning we went down to the bay, and my lad, before I could stop him, must needs start to swim right across to the coral ridge.

"He reached it in safety, and I watched him, with proud tears in my eyes, as he stood, dripping with brine, the water-drops upon him shining like diamonds in the morning sun.

"Presently I noticed him turn his face seawards, and when I too looked in the same direction I saw—I can see it now—the white sails of a ship! But that was not all.

"Making good way towards the shore and me, having passed through the gap in the reefs, was a boat, manned by half-a-dozen white men.

"Was I mad? Was it wicked to parley with such a boon, that seemed to come straight from the hand of Providence?

"Still, his face now turned towards me, my boy stood gazing, eyes-wide, at the boat near now to the strand.

"Strange that, for the moment, Meta was forgotten; my son was there too, but as a being of another world. What a wretch I feel now, felt in my inmost soul even then.

"When within a short distance of the shore, the strangers hailed me. I must have presented a strange figure, sun-burnt, naked, save for a loin cloth, and with hair and beard long and dishevelled.

"How can I describe the issue? Before I could consciously collect my thoughts I found myself in the boat and the bow oarsman preparing to put off.

"The reason for prompt action was soon clear to me.

"Flying from out the thicket of cocoa-palm down towards the boat was a woman. My heart, if not my eyes told me who it was. Meta! my wife! and behind her a yelling, furious crowd of savages.

"Swift as a roe she sped nearer, until with a last convulsive bound she clung hold of the boat's prow.

"'Love—love!' she wailed. (I had taught her that word, and for ten years it had been as music in my ears.)

"'Love—love!' Oh! how the swim in her eyes as I saw it then, mocks me and stabs me to-day!

"The man in the bow had just succeeded in shoving off into deep water, when the foremost among our pursuers (I will swear that it was Obishama) made with his club a swinging blow at my Meta's head. She fell backward with a little cry, and then—lay still as the ground itself.

"For the moment I was a madman, and but for the boat's crew would have sprung overboard, to sell my life as an atonement for hers.

"As if their object were now accomplished, the demon horde melted away into the palm-brake. The two last things I saw through the almost blinding mist of bitter self-reproach and anguish, were the still, extended form on the sand, by the water's edge, face upturned to the sky, and upon the coral reef, standing out in clear relief against the horizon, that other, the lithe, bare figure of my little nine-year-old son.

* * * * *

"Thirty years!—thirty years! It seems but as yesterday. Yes, I've had news, and that only quite of late. A missioner, a traveller in those seas, told me a month ago that the present king of the island (its name I never did know) is a man of evidently English blood. His rule is firm and wise, so much so that the savagery of former days is now battened down for ever.

"From certain, and to me, sure signs I know this king to be my son. I shall never see him here, for my course is nearly run, and port is in sight.

"Yet can I see him with the eyes of my heart, and when we do meet, as meet we shall, perhaps he will tell me that he has forgiven me. Mayhap, too, Meta, my wife will be with him, the same smile on her lips, the same tender look in her eyes as when, thirty years ago, she saved me from death, and gave me the gift of her life's great love."

RALPH ENDERBY.

NOW ON SALE.

No. 5 of

"The Curiosity Shop."

The Illustrated Companion to "PEARSON'S WEEKLY."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP contains: Absolutely new and fresh articles. Bright and originally-conceived pictures. Strong and well-seasoned fiction. Nothing that you can get anywhere else.

Unlike all other curiosity shops, the contents of this one are changed every week, and you can buy every article and picture in the shop for one penny.

Digitized by Google

The Wrong Man.

I was at Stockholm simply as a tourist and sight-seer, and I was all alone. I had no idea of meeting anyone I knew, and a surprise awaited me on the first night of my arrival when a man whom I clearly saw was a Polander edged along up to me on the verandah of the hotel as I smoked my cigar and said:

"You are discretion itself, Mr. Grelling. You have registered under another name. How were matters in London when you left?"

"I don't exactly understand you," I replied as I looked him over and made sure that we had never met before.

"I admire your caution," he said with a laugh, "but you need have no fear of me. You see I have my credentials."

He took a card from his pocket on which were inscribed three capital letters of the Greek language with a curious scrawl beneath, and as I looked without being able to make head or tail of the thing, he whispered:

"The others will be here inside of two days, and we will have a meeting. I have been here three days, and I find nothing to alarm me. I trust matters in London are all right?"

"As far as I know," I replied, as I returned his card and wondered whether he was trying to cheek me or had really mistaken me for somebody else.

"Good. We can settle all the details in an hour after the others get here. It will be as well that we are not seen together, but I will notify you when we are ready."

When he had gone I made up my mind that he had mistaken me for another man, but I could not quite understand his expressions. He was evidently in Stockholm by appointment, and others were to arrive later, and a Mr. Grelling, who was no doubt an Englishman, was mixed up in the affair, if not the leader. The matter puzzled and annoyed me for half-an-hour, and then I dismissed it from my mind.

Three hours later, as I retired to my room, the stolid-faced and wooden-headed waiter who carried my light hung about in a queer way after setting the candle down, and I finally gave him a small coin and waved him out. Instead of going he whispered to me:

"I wish to warn you. Strange men have been here for a week. I think they are waiting for you."

"But who can be looking for me?" I queried in reply.

"You know best. Good-night and Heaven preserve you. I will keep my eyes and ears open for you."

I wanted to question the man but he hurried away and left me more befogged than before. I spent an hour trying to draw some satisfactory conclusion and then fell asleep.

Next morning at breakfast the same man waited on me. I had a little table by myself, and while bringing my dishes the waiter whispered in my ear:

"The two strange men are at the fourth table. I am sure they are Russian spies and will watch you."

Now I had the key to the mystery. There was some sort of a conspiracy on foot, probably against the peace of the Czar, and the conspirators were to meet at Stockholm.

From what I had read and heard of such affairs the plans and plots generally originated in England or Switzerland, but these men had selected nearer ground. Their plot must have been suspected, or the Russian spies would not have been there. Yes. the two men were Russians, and though their idea seemed to be to pass for merchants they made a poor pretence at it.

I don't pretend to say that a spy can always be spotted offhand, but I do assert that after one of them has followed the occupation for several years there are many ways in which he betrays his calling to an observing eye. They cast many furtive glances in my direction, and when I realized that I was to be under espionage I felt a spirit of devilry take posession of me. I would carry off the rôle of conspirator with brazen cheek.

For the next two days I was closely shadowed. Whenever I wandered about the town, one of the two men followed me. No doubt it was noted down whom I addressed, when I took my meals, how many cigars I smoked and all other little details.

After the first day of this spy business the same stolid faced waiter slipped into my room with pale face and whisperingly exclaimed:

"Those spies are following you everywhere. For goodness' sake be careful. Ah, me, but who could have put them on the scent!"

"See here, Hans," I said as I put my hand on his shoulder, "you evidently know a good deal about this affair, and I wish you would tell me what the dickens it all means. Has your gang planned to rob a bank, steal a steamboat, or upset the Russian Government? I don't like to be kept in the dark like this."

He looked at me open-mouthed for half a minute, and then a broad grin stole over his face. He thought I was getting at him to test his prudence and loyalty.

"You will carry it through all right," he finally said, with many heavy nods of his head, and he went away looking very well pleased.

At the end of another twenty-four hours I got a further insight into the mystery. I had strolled into another hotel not far away to examine the register, as a globe-trotter invariably does for no reason he can explain, when a traveller entered who might have been my twin brother so far as outward appearances went. He was of my height and weight, had the same coloured eyes, hair and moustache, and I believe our own mothers would have wondered which was which. He stared at me, and I stared back, and I wandered back to my own hotel, knowing that the real man from London had arrived.

An hour later the Pole came to me in a great funk. He had confused the two of us, as well he might, and given his little affair away to a stranger. He started to say something, but I stopped him with:

"I have seen your chief and know how the mistake came about. Nothing you say to me will go farther. What you are up to I don't know and don't want to know, but don't mix me up in it. Good day."

Digitized by Google

He mumbled blessings on my head and disappeared to be seen no more, nor did the twin brother call on me or send me any word.

My waiter was also thoroughly flabbergasted when he discovered that a mistake had been made, but a few words quieted him.

The Russian spies must have had a bad time of it trying to settle on the right man, but they finally decided in my favour. The other Englishman was free from surveillance, while I was dogged closer than before.

At the end of a week and while they were still dogging me, and I was rather enjoying it, there was a fire on board a ship in the harbour.

It was about nine o'clock at night, and a great crowd gathered on the wharves to watch the conflagration. I made one of the number, and in my anxiety to secure a good view I mounted the bows of a smart looking brig lying at a wharf.

I was hardly over the rail before two men followed and seized me and hustled me down into the cabin. They were the Russians who had been spying on me.

Of course I protested and made a great noise but I was run into a stateroom and locked up, and within an hour the brig was out of the harbour. It seemed as if she had simply been waiting my arrival on board. We had been under weigh a couple of hours when my door was opened, and I was ordered to step out.

I found the captain of the brig, the two spies and a Russian government official awaiting me."

I have told you that the other man and I looked to be twins, but I had not time to look for little details. As I sat down opposite the Russian official he began comparing my description and appearance with a written description, and at the end of five minutes he rose up and thundered at the two spies:

"Dolts! Idiots! Blunderers! You have arrested the wrong man! This is not the proper man."

There was a row that would have drowned a band for the next ten minutes. The spies protested that I answered the description given them and had carried off the character in all ways, and the official shouted at them:

"Has he a mole on his chin? Does his left eyelid droop a little? Is there a scar on his right hand thumb? Oh, you blunderers and incompetents, but you will be rewarded for this!"

"If not too much trouble," I said to the official as he got through his storming, "will you kindly explain why I have been made a prisoner in this fashion? Of what am I guilty? If guilty of anything, by what authority do you take the law in your own hands?"

I was told that it was a mistake, but got no other satisfaction. The brig was put about, but as the wind fell we did not make the harbour until after daylight. Then I was bumped on the wharf without apology.

I walked straight to the British consul and told him the story, his reply was:

"Why, man, you had best thank your stars instead of looking for an apology. When the Russian officials get hold of the wrong man by mistake, he is generally sent to Siberia to cover up the blunder."

Later on I found that the other Englishman and his party left Stockholm the same evening, but where they went and what sort of conspiracy they had on hand I never ascertained.

C. B. LEWIS.

ALL THE LATEST PARTICULARS ABOUT THE GREAT TEN-POUND NOTE SCHEME.

23 Ten-Pound Notes Already Claimed. 50 More Still Wandering About the Country.

IN order that ladies may have an extra opportunity of sharing in this great Pearson's Weekly scheme,

FIVE TEN-POUND LADIES

have been dispatched all over the country, each of whom will deliver up the Sealed Envelope to the lady who fulfills the conditions mentioned in Pearson's Weekly. No gentlemen need apply.

For those who may be too modest, or who cannot easily leave their homes to ask men in the street the momentous question, the Editor of Pearson's Weekly has prepared a dainty little card with the words: "Have You Got that Ten-Pound Note?" printed in scarlet upon it. All you have to do is to

PLACE THIS CARD IN YOUR WINDOW,

and if one of the Ten-Pounders happens to see it he will at once call, and upon your producing a copy of the current number of Pearson's Weekly he will hand you a Sealed Envelope entitling you to the sum of £10.

Address a halfpenny post-card to the Ten-Pound Card Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and you will receive one of these cards under cover and post free.

The latest song, "Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?" is being sung every night by Mr. R. G. Knowles in various London music-halls with great success.

Copies of this song are now ready, and may be obtained at 1s. 6d. each. Send your order at once to Room 47, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Full particulars of the scheme will be found each week in Pearson's Weekly, and fresh developments appear in the Daily Express every day.

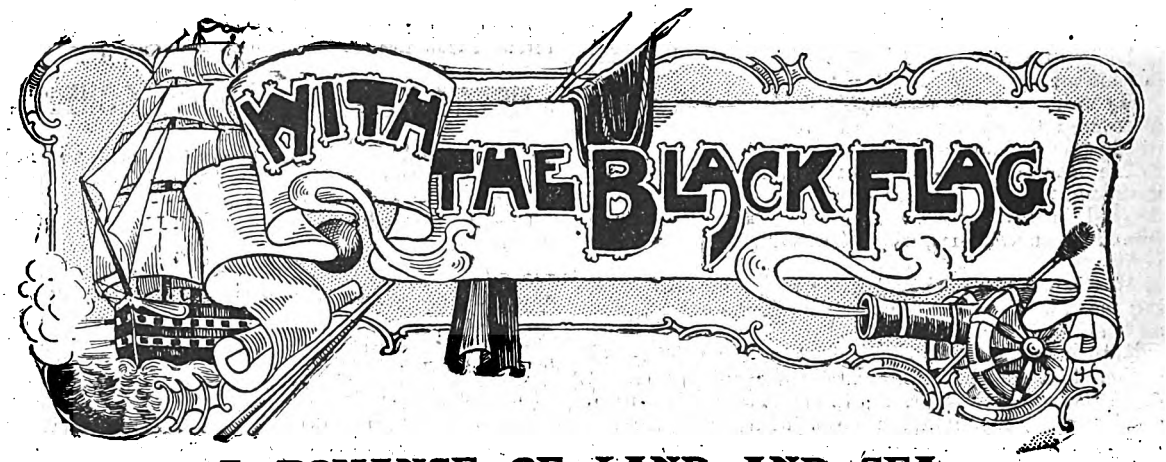
The following are the names and addresses of the winners of Ten-Pound Notes up to the time of going to press:

H. E. Baker, 4 Beaconsfield Road, Magdalen Road, Norwich; John Lotan, 23 St. Anne's Chambers, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.; Charles Lee, 1 Agnes Terrace, St. Mary's Avenue, Southend; Charles Wright, 30 Oxford Gardens, North Kensington; Robert Gautier, 132 Clarence Road, Wimbledon; W. W. Tonkin, 5 Grove Road, Brixton, S.W.; E. G. Baldock, 68 Portland Street, Lincoln; Arthur Wellings, 12 The Forgate, Worcester; A. Bowman, 413 City Road, London, E.C.; John Roe, Hatfield Road Board School, St. Albans; R. J. Martyn, 4 Albert Road, Morice Town, Devonport; Mr. W. H. Hole, Stationmaster, Teignmouth; Archibald Brown, Market Place, Carluke; J. D. Southall, 38 Rosebery Gardens, Crouch End; W. Cotton, Coxbridge, West Pennard, Glastonbury; W. H. Wayne, 19 Hurstfinch Road, St. Helens; May Grammer, 154 Elgin Avenue, Maida Vale; Albert J. Page, Sawbridgeworth, Herts; Mrs. F. Pezaro, 86 High Street, Kingsland, N.; James I. W. Ash, 34 Cricketfield Road, Hackney Downs; Mrs. S. Fitzpatrick, 13 Killarney Parade, Dublin; Miss Winifred Eldridge, 337 Seaside, Eastbourne; Charles W. Ward, 30 Milton Street, Maidstone.

The original Sealed Envelopes by which claims have been made can be seen at the following places:

Mr. John Lotan's, Ludgate Hill Station; Mr. H. E. Baker's, offices of Eastern Daily Press, Norwich; Inspector Lee's, Cooper Brothers, Cliff Town Road, Southend; Mr. C. Wright's, Crown Hotel, Southampton; Mr. W. W. Tonkin's, Lang Sims, 437 Brixton Road, London, S.W.; Mr. E. G. Baldock's, Clifford Thomas, 202 High Street, Lincoln; Mr. Arthur Wellings', Mr. Large, The Forgate, Worcester; Mr. A. Bowman's, 413 City Road, E.C.; Mr. John Roe's, Mr. W. H. Richardson, 5 High Street, St. Albans; Miss May Grammer's, Mr. Burge, chemist, 123 Shirland Road, Paddington; Mr. Southall's, Seagrief and Sons, Broadway, Crouch End.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty. He is intrusted with dispatches for delivery to Bolivar, the Supreme Chief.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic. He received Wyvenhoe and Cautley on their arrival in Venezuela.

Dona Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who accompany Wyvenhoe when he takes the dispatches to Bolivar.

CHAPTER XVI.

Don Antonio Returns.

Bolivar eyed me askance, but before he could answer a crowd of generals and colonels spurred up to him demanding vengeance for this further act of royalist treachery and urging an immediate advance on Calabozo.

"Do you think you could take it?" he asked, smiling ironically.

"Only give us the chance and you shall see," they cried, flourishing their spears and waving their bannerols.

They showed no lack of spirit these wild warriors, and in action, to give them their due, they were nearly as brave as their words.

"You shall have the chance. I promise you that, but not to-day," returned the Chief. "As yet we know little of the enemy's strength, and nothing of his intentions, and to-morrow or a little later I expect reinforcements. Till then, patience."

On this the commotion ceased, though the generals made no secret of their displeasure at not being allowed to lead their tatterdemalions against Calabozo, which, though its walls, built as a defence against "Indios brutos," were of mud, would not easily be taken so long as it was held in force by Morillo and his Spaniards.

"I am obliged to humour them occasionally," observed Bolivar in English. "The hold of a patriot chief over followers who serve without pay is not like that of the commander of an army of regulars who has the means of inforcing strict discipline. You have no idea how many difficulties I have to contend with, and will not I am sure, judge us by European standards."

This confidential aside, and the friendly, almost deprecatory tone in which it was spoken, so surprised me that I could only say:

"Of course not, Señor General."

Later in the day I met Don Iago, who had been appointed to the command of a battalion of blacks. He shared to the full my sorrow and indignation over Don Antonio's fate.

"Did anybody ever have a brighter or braver comrade?" he said. "I had got to love the fellow; and to think of his being so wantonly sacrificed makes me wild with anger and grief."

"I suppose there can be no doubt that he is dead."

"Not a shadow of a doubt. Morillo would not give him time to say a prayer, as Bolivar well knew when he sent him on his fatal errand."

"Of course he knew. Besides, Paez protested. What could be his motive?"

"Revenge, or rather dislike. He bore Bonanza a grudge and I have heard say that Don Simon never forgives an injury or forgets a grudge."

"The same idea occurred to me, but it is hard to believe he could be so base."

"He betrayed General Miranda to the Spaniards, which was even baser."

"Yet he is faithfully served by his officers, and the privates seem to be devoted to him."

"Some of them are, though if it were not for Paez he would have no following on the llanos, and they like him because he lets them plunder and does not bother them with too much discipline. Besides, Don Simon has good qualities, one is the art of winning the affections of his colleagues, when it pleases him to make the effort. Moreover, they know that he is indispensable."

"As a general?"

"As a Supreme Chief. We have better generals and better organisers, but there is nobody else whom the politicians and the army would obey. If Bolivar were to fall the rebellion would collapse. There are people who think that the departure of the Spaniards will be the signal for civil war. However, that does not concern us at present. Was anything particular said after Bonanza went down?"

"You could not well have acted otherwise or said less," continued Santleo when I had told him what had passed. "All the same, I regret that circumstances compelled you to say so much. Don Simon may resent it; on the other hand he may not, may even like you all the better for your boldness. Let us hope so, for though when he takes to a man he cannot do too much for him, he is a subtle and dangerous enemy."

Digitized by Google

"You mean that if he has taken a particular dislike to me I may expect a stab in the dark?"

"Not literally. I don't think el Tio Porsupuerto is likely to suborn anybody to murder you. There are other ways of gratifying a grudge, as Don Antonio found to his cost."

"El Tio Porsupuerto" was a nickname by which Bolivar was known among the troops, first bestowed on him by Paez because of the chief's habit of answering: "Porsupuerto" (of course) when he did not want to commit himself to an opinion.

As I was still unattached and the Chief had no present need of my services, and had given me leave to dispose of myself as I thought fit, I accompanied my compadre to his quarters, and there spent the night in a hammock, which made a pleasanter bed than the bare ground.

In the cool of the evening Santleo paraded his blacks for my inspection, and put them through a few simple evolutions. They were stout fellows enough, but indifferently armed and I did not see a shirt amongst them. However, as Don Iago observed, men who have always gone naked are not fastidious in the matter of clothes. He seemed to be a keen soldier and an efficient officer, and was doing his best with the very raw material which the Chief had placed at his disposal, getting very little help from his subalterns, who were almost as raw as the men.

As one part of the encampment was rather exposed and too near Calabozo, to be quite safe Santleo had caused several trees to be felled in such sort as to form a breastwork which might be held for a short time against a superior force; as it proved, a wise precaution, for shortly before daybreak we were roused by the rattle of musketry, on which he ordered the reveille to be sounded and the battalion to fall in, and he and I, mounting our horses, rode forward to reconnoitre.

We had not gone far when we met two officers, riding in hot haste, who reported that one of General Zedeño's infantry regiments had been surprised by the enemy and nearly cut to pieces, and that a strong body of the enemy was advancing in our direction, a statement which was immediately confirmed by the appearance of a number of fugitives, running for their lives and followed by several squadrons of Morillo's dragoons.

"Shall you fall back?" I asked Don Iago.

"No, I shall post my men behind the breastwork and among the trees and hold the position till help comes."

"And I will bring you help," I said, wheeling my horse round.

"Good! Report to the Chief, but see Paez, if you can; he is the man for prompt action."

On this I galloped off, taking the nearest cut to head-quarters, which were fully two miles away, the encampment being much scattered, partly out of carelessness and over-confidence, more perhaps out of necessity, the troops having to bivouac where there was shade from the sun and water for themselves and horses.

I was well mounted and armed, in addition to my sword and pistols, with a lance which had been presented to me by one of my brother staff officers, al uso del pais (according to the custom of the country). But I anticipated no difficulty in making my point since, though the Godos were coming on apace, all, so far as I could see, were behind me and I had a good start.

The savannah was almost level and comparatively open, albeit a few scattered palm groves and high bushes impeded my view and might enable an enemy to get ahead of me unperceived. Hence, though I rode hard, I rode cautiously, keeping a keen look out and giving "cover!" as wide a berth as possible without deviation too much from my course.

I had gone about a mile when I heard a shout to my left rear and looking thitherward saw a man running towards a thicket and followed by a brace of Spanish dragoons. He ran so fast, impelled by fear of death, that it was even betting whether the troopers would overtake him before he gained the bushes. Of me they took no notice, possibly had not yet seen me, and I could easily have ridden away from them as from a strictly military point of view, and considering my errand, I perhaps ought to have done.

But a man's life was at stake, and without considering aught else, I wheeled round, gave a shout to encourage the fugitive, couched my lance, and galloped towards his pursuers, who on seeing me pulled up and seemed uncertain what they should do next.

After a moment's hesitation one of them whipped out his sword, the other a pistol, and came on to meet me. I went for the first, keeping him to my right and going at full gallop, as much to confuse his aim as to add impetus to the shock. The bullet went wide, as I thought it would, and before the fellow could fire again my lance was through his body, where I left it, and drawing my sword, gave my attention to his companion, who, however, avoided the encounter by riding away, which I allowed him to do in peace.

"Very neatly done, Señor Wyvenhoe, and I am vastly obliged to you. You should have recovered your lance, though. However, for a beginning it was by no means so bad, and with a little more practice you will be as expert as any of us."

"You, Don Antonio; you here! Good gracious, I thought you were dead and buried!" I exclaimed, in utter and most unutterable surprise. "What—? But we must away; mount this fallen trooper's horse (which I had caught) and come along."

This he did, and we rode on together.

"How on earth did you escape?" I asked. "We all felt sure that you were killed, either by the volley from the walls or afterwards."

"Not a bullet touched me, though my horse was riddled. Yet I had been killed all the same but for a happy thought. Knowing that all foreign officers who may be taken prisoners are examined by Morillo before being executed, I

Before the fellow could fire again my lance was through his body.

Digitized by Google

His amazement and consternation on beholding Don Antonio were unspeakable.

said I was English and took your name in vain, which procured me an interview with the general, who, as I presently gathered, being alarmed at the reports he has heard of the formation of another British legion, is anxious to detach British officers from the patriot cause.

"After expressing his surprise that a man like me could bring myself to serve in so rascally an army as ours, and under such a fool of a general as Bolivar, he offered me, as the alternative of death, a commission in his own army. I had, of course, no intention of accepting his offer, but I listened to him and pretended to be almost persuaded, and in the end he gave me twenty four hours for consideration, and sent me to the main guard. Fortunately there was nobody present who knew English, and I mimicked, I think not unsuccessfully, both your accent and your manner, my dear friend.

"I was well treated, neither put in a cell nor very closely guarded, and when about two hours before dawn I heard the bugles blowing I knew there was going to be a sortie and my chance had come; so taking advantage of the confusion and the darkness, and the sentry's back being turned, I slipped out, made for the walls, which are not very high, dropped into the river, and got clear away. In order to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy a second time, I went a long way round, dodging from bush to bush, and at the very moment when I thought myself safe those confounded fellows spied me and gave chase, and had you not come up just in the nick of time would have given me my quietus."

"You are a lucky man. What people say is quite true. You have more lives than a cat; but for goodness sake don't repeat Morillo's remarks about Don Simon and his army. If they came to his ears he might think you had invented them."

I suspected that Bonanza had incurred Don Simon's enmity much more by his reckless speaking than his practical joking.

He promised to heed my warning and we presently arrived at head-quarters.

The army had no tents, but in many places the troops had built huts, or rather, sheds, roofed with palm leaves and open at the sides. In one of these Bolivar's hammocks had been slung and as we came up he turned out.

His amazement and consternation on beholding Don Antonio were unspeakable. He trembled and turned pale as though he saw before him a veritable ghost, as probably he thought he did.

"Good morning, excellency," quoth Bonanza saluting.

"Cien mil diabolos! Where have you come from?" gasped the Supreme Chief.

"From Calabozo. The Godos are beating up our quarters and I profited by the opportunity to get away."

"The dickens they are! That accounts for the firing. I thought it was merely some of the pickets exchanging shots."

"One of Zedeño's regiments has been almost destroyed," I put in, "and unless Major Santleo is speedily supported, he, too, will be overwhelmed."

"Madre de dios! Is it so bad as that?"

"Shall I inform General Paez?"

"By all means. Tell him to go to Santleo's help, and try to keep the enemy at bay until I can bring up the guns and General Zaraja's infantry. Ride with him, then return and report. You will remain here, Captain Bonanza. I want to know about the state of things in Calabozo."

Straight as a die I rode to the llaneros' camp and found them under arms, for Don Paez, having heard the firing, had mustered his men and was ready for whatever might befall.

When I had given my message, he gave a great shout and ordered his men to advance. They answered with a cheer, for these rough fellows were true soldiers, and rejoiced in the call to battle, as hunters rejoice when the blast of the horn and the bay of the hounds tell them that a fox has "gone away."

Don José, galloping ahead, tossed his lance in the air, caught it as it fell, then threw it forward and picked it up without drawing rein; and there was not a man of his guardia di honor who could not do the same.

As we rode on the rattle of musketry, at first almost inaudible, grew louder, and when we sighted the palm grove it was shrouded in smoke, out of which came flashes of fire and a din of deadly strife.

Don Iago was beset by a regiment of cazadores, two or three squadrons, and a couple of field pieces.

On seeing us the cazadores tried to form square, but before the movement could be effected the llaneros were at them with their lances, and the regiment broke up and fled, while the cannons and the cavalry fell back on the main body, which was deploying in their rear.

Santleo was delighted with his black fellows.

"They neither flinched nor showed fear," he said, "and if they were a little better trained and armed I would back them against the best infantry of Spain."

"That is in the future, and we have to deal with the present," observed Paez, sharply. "You cannot hold this wood against a whole division of Godos. Fall back at once towards headquarters, and I will cover your retreat; and you, Major Wyvenhoe, return to Don Simon, and say that unless he hurries up with the infantry and artillery we shall lose the day."

"Si, Señor General," I answered, and went off at full gallop. There was much confusion at headquarters. Bolivar had not expected that the Spaniards would make a sortie in force, and, like everybody else except Paez, was taken by surprise. Nevertheless, two or three battalions were got together, and, with four field pieces, sent to reinforce Santleo.

I was sent back a second time, with orders to tell Paez to do his utmost to keep the Spaniards in check until the chief could bring up all his strength.

Digitized by Google

This he eventually did, though none too soon, and but for Don José's military aptitude and desperate valour the day had ended in disaster.

Though the action presently became general, it was less a pitched battle than a series of isolated engagements, and ended in a draw, our irregular horse being as much superior to the enemy's cavalry as were his foot regiments to our infantry, though some of the latter showed good courage, and with stricter discipline and better leading would have done wonders. It was also greatly in Bolivar's favour that only half of Morillo's army were Spaniards, the remainder being native levies as many-hued and as ill-trained as our own.

The sun shone pitilessly in an unclouded sky, and the dust rising from the brown earth and mingling with the battle smoke was suffocating. As many men fell from exhaustion as from the enemy's fire. By noon both sides had had more than enough and the royalists retired in good order to Calabozo, unpursued even by the llaneros.

Our losses were heavy, probably heavier than the Spaniards', and had not the Supreme Chief expected reinforcements he would have been forced to retreat. Soon these began to flock in. Don José's popularity and the fame of his exploits brought him many recruits of the right sort, and a few days after the battle General Urdenetta arrived with a whole division. His appearance at the front, however gratifying to Bolivar, boded me no good, the more especially as I had made up my mind that unless he apologised I would ignore our previous acquaintance and, save on service matters, hold no converse with him whatever.

When I mentioned my resolve in this regard to Santleo he looked very serious.

"I think you are right," he said after a moment's thought. "After what has happened you could not without loss of self-respect treat Urdenetta as a friend. All the same, trouble will come of it."

"In what shape?" I asked.

"I wish I could tell you—probably in some unexpected shape. At present Bolivar may or may not be ill-disposed towards you. I rather think he is halting between two opinions, but if you cut Urdenetta you will have two enemies equally powerful and unscrupulous."

"And I shall have two friends—yourself and Bonanza, and I think I can count on both of you."

"On me you may count to the death," rejoined Santleo warmly. "Also I am sure, on Don Antonio."

"So if I get into a scrape you will help me out, and I shall take care not to let either Bolivar or Urdenetta catch me tripping."

"That is not necessary. Urdenetta did not catch you tripping at Santa Margarita However, let us hope for the best, and fore warned is forearmed."

This talk took place in Don Iago's quarters, a shed open to the winds and furnished with two makeshift chairs, a ditto table, and two hammocks—one of which was occupied by him, the other by me. A sentry, black as ebony and nearly as naked as our first parents before they went astray, stood under a tree in a statuesque attitude; the guard, all of the same colour, reposed in the shade. In the distance could be seen other sentinels and the piled arms of several outlying pickets, the recent surprise having put everybody very much on the alert.

The only discernible objects that moved were a man, a dog, and a mule.

"Who would walk on the llanos when he could ride?" queried Don Iago, turning lazily in his hammock.

"Who would do either, in the heat of such a day as this, if he could help it?" said I. "Why does not he rest in the shade till the sun goes down? The fellow must be a salamander."

"An Indian salamander, then."

"How do you know? He may be a Spanish creole, a Zambo, a black, or even a European."

"By his gait, which also tells me that he comes from far away. No native of the plains or the coast walks as that man walks," quoth Don Iago, gazing intently at the stranger, who was making straight towards us.

"If it were possible I could almost believe," he added, in a low, intense voice, as though he were unconsciously thinking aloud, "I could almost believe it was the Cazique. . . . But no, it is not possible. It cannot be—and yet . . . . Cuerpo de Dios! It is nobody else. Tamanac himself." And Santleo, slipping from his hammock, ran to meet the new comer, of whom he made much, leading him by the hand.

"The Cazique Tamanac, my oldest friend, the friend of my father, and one of the best of men," he said, making his guest sit down in his hammock, while he, himself, took one of the chairs.

The Indian, though no longer young, was a man of splendid physique. In complexion he was lighter than the generality of his race; of stature tall; his limbs were muscular and beautifully moulded, his hands and feet small. His thick, lank hair was parted in the middle and confined by a narrow red fillet, so as to show his broad forehead and shapely ears, in which he wore silver rings, and from his neck hung a golden cross, a bag of charms, and a toothpick fashioned out of a condor's quill.

Tamanac's sole garment was a woollen ruana, wrapped loosely round his waist and reaching to his knees, leaving bare his broad chest seamed with scars; his only weapon a long double-edged knife, with a white handle carved out of a cayman's bone. He wore a broad-brimmed sombrero of split palm leaves, and sandals made of the white fibres of

As many men fell from exhaustion as from the enemy's fire.

Digitized by Google

the aloe. For the rest, he had a light and springy gait, carried his head high and his shoulders well back, his face was handsome and thoughtful, and he bore himself with a dignity befitting his years and his rank.

"The Cazique has made a long journey; he comes from the mountains," added Don Iago.

"From your home?"

"Yes, from my home."

"I hope he brings good news."

"I also, but I have not heard his news yet. He has been travelling since sunrise, mostly on foot to save his mule, and before he talks must eat and drink."

Then, after a short pause, Santleo, who was more excited than I had ever seen him, added in English:

"You said a little while ago that you had two friends. Now you have three, for my friends are Tamanac's friends, his foes my foes. Is it not so, Cazique?"

"It is so. You shall be to me as a son," said Tamanac, giving me his hand which I took in silence, being unprepared with an answer, for though I had guessed that Santleo could speak English this Indian's knowledge of the language surprised me beyond expression.

"You know English then? I thought so," was for the moment all I could say.

"That, there is no denying, though I doubt whether I should have told you at present, had I not been constrained hereto by the Cazique knowing so little Spanish."

"But who is he? How does he happen to know English and where are these mysterious mountains whence he comes?"

"None of these questions I am free to answer, though I would fain do so. It seemeth unkind to repay your frankness with reserve, but verily it is not so, and I hope the time is not far distant when I shall be permitted to deal as openly with you as you have dealt with me. In the meanwhile we are as good friends as ever. Is it not so?"

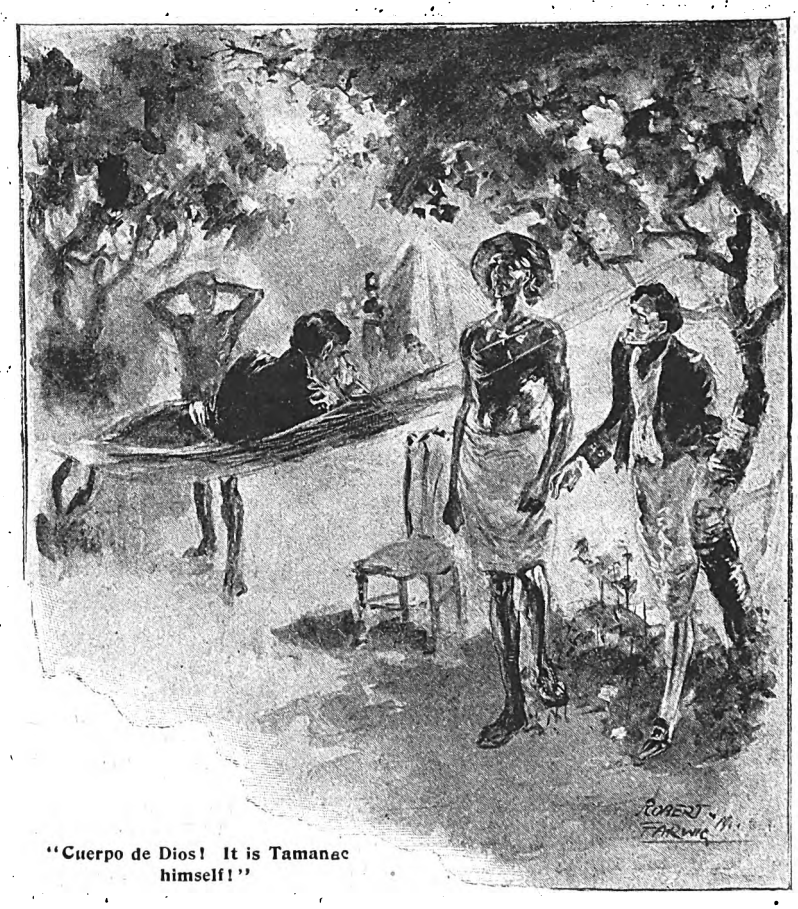
"Surely. And the Cazique being your friend I count him also as mine. But he has news for you and it is time for me to go."

"Not at all. Tarry yet a little longer. His coming is no reason why you should depart."

"It is a matter of duty. I may be wanted at headquarters. And I shall see the Cazique, who will doubtless stay with you for a day or two, again."

"For several days I hope; we have much to say to each other, and after his hard journey he will need a long rest."

On this we parted and I went away wondering and greatly tantalised. How this Indian, who knew little Spanish, had picked up English, what were his relations with Don Iago, where the mountains whence the journey was so long and hard, why Tamanac had come and Santleo's lips were sealed I asked myself, again and again, and the more I wondered the more I was puzzled.



"Cuerpo de Dios! It is Tamanac himself!"

But what perhaps puzzled me most was Santleo's English. He spoke it as fluently as I did, yet with an accent and intonation which, albeit I could not call them foreign, were strange and unfamiliar.

Moreover his phraseology was quaint and his pronunciation of certain words peculiar, reminding me at times of that of an old Quaker from the north of England who used to visit at my father's house when I was a boy, all of which suggested the probability of Don Iago having acquired the language from some old person who had left the country when he was very young.

By the time I came to this conclusion I had arrived at headquarters, so endeavoured to dismiss the subject from my mind, but strangely enough one of the first questions put to me by Bolivar was whether I had learnt aught more as to Santleo's connections and his family, a question to which I was fortunately able to give a straightforward answer.

"I thought you would have succeeded ere this in gaining his confidence," observed the chief, in a tone of disappointment. "But it must be as I said, his people are fanatical royalists, and he wants to keep them in the dark as to his whereabouts and present occupation. What I am most curious about is their name, for Santleo, you may be sure, is only a nom de guerre."

And then he spoke of his plan of campaign, which was very grandiose. His army would shortly number fifteen thousand men, and, after taking Calabozo by assault, he proposed to march over the mountains and end the war by the capture of the capital. On several points of detail he asked my opinion, which, knowing that Don Simon preferred praise to criticism, I gave with circumspection. The only suggestion I ventured to offer was that it might be well to invest the town at once, so as to prevent Morillo from falling back towards Caracas, where he would find both reinforcements and supplies, and be able to offer us battle on ground of his own choosing.

Digitized by Google

"That has been thought of and shall be done," was the answer, and the subject being exhausted I was about to retire when Urdenetta appeared on the scene.

"As you two have met before there is no need of an introduction," remarked the Chief urbanely. "Major Wyvenhoe is on my staff, general, and acquitted himself admirably when we gave Morillo such a beating."

"Oh, yes; we have met before and know each other well, don't we, Señor Major?" answered Urdenetta with a courtly smile, and making as though he would greet me in South American fashion.

"Yes, Señor General, we do know each other," I returned, giving him the military salute and stepping aside to avoid his embrace.

A scowl passed over Urdenetta's face, and his little, deep-set eyes gleamed with anger. Bolivar, who looked both surprised and annoyed, said drily, "You need not remain, Señor Major. I have matters of importance to discuss with the general. When I want you I will send for you."

On which I saluted a second time and went my way, feeling that, as I could not have acted otherwise, I had acted rightly; also with a doubt the less, for now I knew, if I did not know before, that I had finally forfeited Bolivar's favour, probably made a bitter enemy of him, as I certainly had of Urdenetta.

(To be continued.)

AN EMINENT INVENTOR.

Of the numerous citizens of Birmingham, there is none who is more deserving of respect than is Mr. Johnson. Not only is he an amiable and upright man, but he is gifted with remarkable inventive genius. At least, such is his opinion, and those who are not personally acquainted with him seldom deny that his opinion is right.

Mrs. Johnson, however, does not regard her husband as an able inventor. She admits that he means well, but she asserts with much emphasis that when one of his inventions comes in at the front door it is time for her to fly out of the nearest available window, if her life is really worth saving.

As to one of his recent inventions, which nearly led to a tragedy in his family, it must certainly be admitted that he made a disastrous mistake, though he was actuated by the best of motives.

Mrs. Johnson was in the habit of complaining that she found it extremely tiresome to manage her sewing-machine, and her affectionate husband determined to supply some power, other than the female foot, to the machine.

After experimenting with galvanic batteries until he had burnt two coats and a carpet with acids, and after having tried in vain to construct a steam-engine that would not fill more than half the space of the room in which it was placed, he fell back upon clockwork.

In course of time he made a really beautiful engine, worked exclusively by clockwork, and fitted it to the sewing-machine. When wound up it would work the machine for five consecutive hours, and after adding to the machine an improved device for holding the cloth and leading it under the needle, he felt that he was a benefactor of the female sex, and a worthy successor of Morse and of the inventor of the steam-engine.

Mrs. Johnson was delighted with the new invention when it was explained to her, and readily agreed that the neighbours should be invited to see it in operation for the first time.

The neighbours responded heartily to the invitation, and at seven-thirty on the third day of last month, Mr. Johnson's drawing-room was filled with the leading citizens of Birmingham and their wives—that is to say, those who, having spoken favourably of Mr. Johnson's inventive genius, were by him regarded in the light of leading citizens.

At eight o'clock Mrs. Johnson sat down to her sewing, and undertook to run a double gusset in a new dressing-gown designed for her husband. The clock-work was wound up, the machine was started, and the gusset was stitched with twice the rapidity usual in such cases. Unfortunately, the machine did not stop when it had finished its allotted task, but continued to stitch the dressing-gown until it fairly became quilted.

Probably it would have gone on and converted the cloth into a compact bundle, sewed and resewed a dozen times, had not Mrs. Johnson come to the rescue, and attempted to cut the thread.

She did succeed in rescuing the cloth, but at the same moment the demoniacal machine fastened upon her clothing, and proceeded to sew it with insatiable energy. Vainly did Mr. Johnson try to stop his clock-work, and vainly did he strive to pull his wife away. The machine rapidly gathered her skirts into its unholy clutches, and there was every prospect that after the skirts were finished it would proceed to hem Mrs. Johnson herself, and to put a series of gussets in portions of her frame where they were not needed.

Luckily, there was one present, a young physician, who did not lose his presence of mind. He seized his knife and cut the fastenings of Mrs. Johnson—that is to say, he cut her loose. The machine was compelled to satisfy its rapacity upon her skirts alone, while the unhappy lady was wrapped in a tablecloth and removed to her private room.

This is why Mrs. Johnson is justified in denouncing her husband's inventions, and public opinion in Birmingham is decidedly unfavourable to Mr. Johnson as an inventor.

P. Weeks.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT RAILWAY TRAINS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Rosalba," by Olive Pratt Rayner, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Cissie, c.o. 102 Hunslet Hall Road, Leeds. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about HAUNTED HOUSES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 15th. Post-cards only, please.

What a Sell!

I WAS travelling by the midnight express from Leeds to Dundee. The only passengers in the carriage besides myself were two young men and an elderly gentleman, who sat in the corner reading Pearson's Weekly.

We had just passed Errol, when suddenly the engine brake was applied, and the train made several terrific jumps.

One of the young men, evidently anticipating a serious accident, excitedly snatched the copy of Pearson's Weekly out of the old gentleman's hands.

Hardly had he got possession of it when the other young man made a grab at it. Then the light in our carriage went out, and a desperate struggle in the dark ensued between the two men, and I could hear the paper being torn into fragments.

When the carriage had been re-lit the two young men looked thoroughly ashamed of themselves, and apologised to the old gentleman as best they could for their disgraceful conduct.

"Oh, that's all right," he replied, "I had read the paper and I didn't care what became of it so long as I had the insurance page in my pocket."

Whereupon he produced the page containing the insurance coupon. C. I. S.

Cheap Pillows.

Two Hunslet women recently visiting London for the first time, had an amusing experience during the midnight return journey. On reaching a certain station, the porter walked up and down with pillows for the weary travellers who might hire them. Evidently the Hunsletian ladies were not in touch with the hiring spirit of the age.

"Wod's them, pooarter?" asked one.

"Pillows, ma'am."

"Heaw much?"

"Sixpence, ma'am."

"Sixpence? Wod's inside of 'em?"

"Feathers, ma'am."

"Eh? I'll tek two."

Two were accordingly handed to the good lady, who moralised to her companion thus:

"Eh, sither, th' covers are wo'th sixpence, tha knows! Isn'd id wonderful whod they con do i' th' South? Aw'm gooin' to hev two mooar o' them. Yo' corn'd git 'em so cheap i' Hunslet."

Needless to say, the two good ladies were disagreeably surprised to find they were not allowed to take the pillows away when Leeds was reached. J. B. C.

Then There was Silence.

RECENTLY, the occupants of a third class compartment were considerably annoyed by the silly remarks made upon objects that were passed, by a bouncing youth seated near the window.

His fellow passengers bore it without a murmur, notwithstanding a general wish that he was miles away. The climax was reached when, on nearing a lunatic asylum, he said:

"How nice the asylum looks from the train."

"Young man," solemnly replied an old gentleman, looking over the top of his paper, "before long you'll have occasion to remark how nice the train looks from the asylum." B. D.

Beware of the Train.

A RAILWAY company wanted to run a new line through a certain farmer's land against his wish.

One day the farmer was not overpleased to receive a visit from the company's representative, who described to him the direction in which the proposed line was to go. Said he, pointing with his hand:

"We want the line to run straight across there."

"Ay! oh, ah!" said the farmer, slowly nodding his head, and getting aggressive.

"Yes, we want to go right through by way of that barn yonder."

"Oh! do ye indeed?" warmly exclaimed the son of the soil, by this time quite wrath. "An what d'ye tak' me for? D'ye reckon I'm goin' to stan' by an' open an' shut yon barn door every time t'engine comes along?"

M. H.

Very Embarrassing.

A LADY riding in a railway carriage, was much annoyed by the fixed stare of a long, lank, sallow-looking woman sitting on the opposite seat. She had piercing black eyes, and kept them fixed on the lady's face.

Finally the train stopped at a little station, and the woman leant across the carriage and, laying a bony hand on the lady's arm, said:

"'Scuse me, but may I ask you a question?"

"Certainly," replied the lady.

"Well, I just wanted to know if your complexion is natural, or if it's one o' these inamelled kind I've heard of?"

"My complexion is quite natural, thank you."

"It is? Well, I'm jist sorry to hear it. I was hopin' it was one o' the inamelled kind, an' that you would tell me where I could git one like it. That's all. Thank you, ma'am." F. J. D.

Digitized by Google

How She Told the Class.

A WOMAN recently took a third-class railway ticket at Birkenhead from that place to Hooton. She entered a first-class carriage, from which she was seen to emerge by an official when she arrived at her destination. He accosted her with:

"I say, missis, what class ticket have you got?"

"A third class, sir," she replied at once.

"Then why," her interrogator continued, "were you riding in a first-class carriage?"

"Oh, get away!" said the woman, "you cannot cheat me. Did I not run to the engine, count 'one, two, three,' and get into the carriage?" A. H.

Bee-fooled.

THE village of Hatfield was in a state of wild excitement, owing to the receipt of a telegram, addressed to a local resident, reading as follows;

"Queen will arrive at 3.40 this afternoon."

The telegraphist, bursting with importance, imparted the news to the delighted villagers that the Queen of England intended to pay them a visit that day, on hearing which the inhabitants turned out en masse, and when the 3.40 train arrived there was an expectant crowd at the station to give their Sovereign an enthusiastic welcome.

Alas, the only thing that left the train at Hatfield was a small perforated box, labelled "Live Bee, with Care." Where was Her Majesty?

It was subsequently explained that the addressee of the telegram, an apiarian, had that morning wired to the nearest town for a queen bee which he was in urgent want of.

And the crowd which had assembled to meet a bee sheepishly slunk away. W. C.

The Eskdale Express.

AN amusing anecdote is told in connection with the Eskdale Railway, upon which the rate of speed seldom exceeds six miles an hour, and where it is the custom for the train to stop and take up passengers between the stations.

On one occasion a lame old woman was walking along the line with a basket of eggs, on her way to Ravensglass to catch the market train for Whitehaven.

The driver, as was usual, brought the engine to a standstill as soon as he caught up to her, and at once told her to jump in.

"Nay, nay," replied she. "Ah's in a hurry; Ah'll be thur lang afoor ye." J. P. S.

Couldn't Understand It.

IN many parts of South Africa railways are comparatively a new departure, and in consequence a large proportion of the farmers are entirely ignorant of the way the engines work.

One stalwart colonist, who thought himself cleverer than his companions, was standing on the platform of a small up-country station during shunting operations.

He had been explaining the principles of steam as a motive power to an interested crowd, when suddenly the engine began to move backwards, pushing a string of trucks.

His jaw dropped, and he gasped out:

"I can understand how the engine pulls the trucks, but I'm hanged if I know how the trucks pull the engine back again!" M. H.

Couldn't Trust the Officials.

"PAT," said the squire, "I want you to go to the railway station and find out what time the next train leaves for London?"

"Yes, sor."

After an absence of two hours the man returned.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed the squire, "what a time you've been."

"Well, ye see, yer honour," replied Pat, "I had to wait. I couldn't trust them station fellers; they'd say anything, so I stuck tight an' seed the train start wid my own eyes." J. B.

She Knew Something would Happen.

NOT long ago an old lady entered a railway carriage at a small town in Yorkshire, and it appeared that she had never been in a train before, for so she told her fellow-passengers.

The train, the carriages of which were unlighted, had not long been in motion, and had just put on speed, when it dashed into a rather long tunnel, and as it did so, the old lady was heard to exclaim in alarm:

"Oh! I've gone blind—what shall I do! I knew something would happen if I ventured on one of these things." R. L. S.

PEARSON'S
New Morning Paper.

1/2d. The 1/2d.

The Paper for Home Reading.
The Paper for the Housekeeper.
The Paper for the Busy Man.
The Paper for the City Man.
The Paper for the Sporting Man.
The Paper for EVERYBODY.

Daily

THE MOST ORIGINAL, UP-TO-DATE, ACCURATE AND BEST NEWSPAPER
Published in this Country.
Published SIX days a Week, NOT once.

1/2d. Express 1/2d.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE.
ORDER A COPY NOW.

VAMOOSE

As they say in America (meaning "Go"), to the nearest bookstall and ask for

"THE OCTOBER PEARSON'S"

if you want something really good to read. You will get seventeen magnificent stories and articles; enough literature to last you for a month.

Digitized by Google

A New Lease of Life.

SOME months ago I was introduced to a gentleman who was making San Francisco his headquarters with the expectation of meeting his son, who had set out about a year before to make the tour of the world by the eastern route. Community of tastes threw us much together, and one day it was arranged that we should make a duck shooting expedition to some convenient quarter.

Tomales Bay was the locality selected, and thither we went with the intention of taking a three days' holiday.

On the second day, however, just as we were in the act of pushing off shore—I was already in the boat—Wycherly made a spring and landed just where his left foot caught somewhere about the look of one of the guns, thus letting it off and pouring the whole charge of shot into his right leg.

He fell upon the stern seat, while the man, who was just springing after him turned his energies to dragging the boat back to land.

In a moment I was at the wounded man's side, and at length got him upon the beach.

In a few moments I had ripped open his trousers' leg. From the position of the wound and the spouting of the blood it was easy to see that the posterior tibial artery had been severed, and that, if prompt measures were not taken he would soon bleed to death.

Improvising a tourniquet out of a handkerchief and a bit of stick, I temporarily stopped the flow of blood, and the attendant and I carried my now unconscious friend to a dairy ranch near by, where the hospitable farmer put a comfortable apartment at our disposal,

Nor was it a bit too soon, for the system of compression I had been obliged to use proved too weak for the great iliac artery, and, just as we laid Wycherly on a couch, the torrent of which I had been apprehensive burst forth again.

I was now, however, in a better position to act, and by the time the man—whom I had dispatched on horseback for my instruments—returned I had the case well under control. The only cause for alarm now was extreme weakness and the risk of secondary hemorrhage.

It was while watching by Wycherly's bedside that I evolved the plot which forms the gist of my story. I determined to try transfusion, and, to tell the truth, I rather congratulated myself, from a professional point of view, that chance had thrown in my way such a splendid opportunity.

I watched the men when they came in to their noonday meal, and among the dozen or two I saw two whom I singled out as those who must serve my turn. It did not require a second glance at their ruddy cheeks to assure one less knowing than a surgeon that they possessed a practically unlimited store, so far as my purpose was concerned, of the pure life fluid of which I was in quest.

When I broached my project, they were at first very averse to it, but finally they agreed to the terms, provided it did not entail much pain.

Luckily I had some cocaine with me, and so anæsthetized the region of the median vein that they did not even feel the incision, and I accomplished a satisfactory transfusion into Wycherly's arm at the same spot, despite the fact that I had to improvise an apparatus out of a syringe and some tubing which I found in my case.

My point, however, was gained. I had succeeded in saving my friend's life, for the moment at least. I had also sent the two youths away in high spirits at having earned two months' wages in a couple of hours and with the admonition not to do any more work till I saw them again.

I had telegraphed down to San Francisco and received, by the first train, such instruments and appliances as I had ordered to be sent me.

I had left the room for a few minutes with my patient resting comfortably, but on my return, what was my horror to see that the ligature had burst, the bedclothes were drenched with blood, and the deadly pallor on my friend's unconscious face with the weak and intermittent jets of blood from the re-opened artery, told me but too plainly that he was alre dy almost past human aid.

Hastily applying a styptic and compress, I again tied up the blood vessel, meantime shouting lustily for Fritz and Wilhelm, who happened to be near by, and came running in with some other members of the family.

Before Fritz and Wilhelm had bared their arms my plan was laid. I recollected having seen that morning the carcass of a newly killed calf hanging up in the slaughter shed. I bade someone fetch me the heart and neighbouring organs.

When these arrived, finding them still warm, I selected a blood vessel somewhat larger than those I was about to cut, and speedily had four pieces of about an inch in length ready for use. I then led Fritz to the left hand side of the bed, and at once severed the cephalic branch of the median vein of his right arm at the elbow.

Raising the left arm of the dying man from the bed, I made Fritz sit down so as to bring them nearly to a level and cut the same vein at the same place. My purpose was to connect the lower extremity of Fritz's vein with the upper of Wycherly's, and vice versâ.

To do this I slipped the cut pieces of the calf's blood-vessel over the cut extremities of Wycherly's vein, and then inserted the corresponding ends of Fritz's vein into the other ends of the calf's vein, which served precisely the same purpose as the joint used in connecting two pieces of metal pipe. After completing the connection I brought the arms of both men close together, bandaging them tightly in that position, so as to obviate any risk of breaking the connection.

Then I took Wilhelm around to the right side of the bed and connected his left arm in the same manner with Wycherly's right. A complete and perfect connection had now been formed with the circulatory organs of the three men—they formed, in fact, one circulatory system.

Digitized by Google

No perceptible effect was noticeable upon Wycherly for half-an-hour. It is true he was being supplied with the life giving fluid from two sources, but they were by no means abundant ones, and besides out of thirty odd pounds of blood which a healthy man possesses I am afraid to say how much he had lost.

In the case of the youths, however, a critical observer would have detected a very appreciable diminution in the colour of their faces, and in order that they might not become alarmed at any feeling of weakness, I ordered some bottles of the best wine the establishment afforded to be brought and administered it to them freely, at the same time diverting their thoughts as much as possible.

Soon I noticed that the colour was returning to Wycherly's cheeks. It was evident that his life was saved and that the measures I had employed had been the means of doing it.

About half-an-hour afterwards Fritz and Wilhelm became restive. I explained to them that to move from the position they were in, much less to have the bandages taken from their arms, would entail the death of the sick man; that their meals would be brought to them there, and that they would even have to sleep just where they were; also that I could not tell exactly how long this condition of things would last, but that while it did they would get £4 a day apiece for their services after that day, for which they would get £20 apiece.

The sight of the gold which I counted to each of them —having received a supply that morning from Wycherly's bankers—removed the last trace of discontent.

From that day on Wycherly's recovery was steady and rapid. Within a week his appetite returned, and he was strong enough to have been up and about.

Several more days elapsed, until one morning I considered it safe for the invalid to take outdoor exercise. I did not at once sever the connection which bound him to the two young Germans, partly because of some observations I had made which suggested a peculiar train of thought.

Was it fancy that Wycherly was becoming structurally and organically affected by the new blood which was now circulating through his system? Could the mere transfusion of ordinary blood into his veins have given the freshness of look, the elasticity and buoyancy of spirits which were now his, to a man who, scarcely two weeks before, had been upon the bed of death?

And could it be possible, on the other hand, that I detected a somewhat older look in the German lads who formed part and parcel of this curious physical trinity? It was with a view to observe more closely and thoroughly both the surgical and physical aspect of the case that I decided to preserve the status quo for a time at any rate.

Up to this time, at my friend's request, I forbore to send any intimation to his friends at home regarding the serious accident that had befallen him, as he feared to cause them unnecessary alarm.

Now, however, he requested me to write them a full account of the matter, and also of his rapid convalescence. There were, he told me, only three members of his household proper, now that himself and son were absent—namely, his aged mother, his sister and a young lady, a distant relative, who was betrothed to his son.

Before this letter was dispatched the China mail brought news from his son, who wrote to say that he found Japan so interesting that he did not propose to leave it for a month to come.

From this time on a most remarkable physiological change began to take place in the three beings who were so curiously linked together by their circulatory system. They were evidently fast becoming assimilated in physical features and conditions. Wycherly was indeed growing younger, while his companions were growing proportionately older.

Once I was able to grasp and recognise this dominant fact I found myself wondering, not so much at the fact itself as at the rapidity with which the change was being accomplished.

I could only account for this last feature of the strange metamorphosis by remembering that the blood coursing in the veins of this strange partnership was, in the first instance, almost wholly that of the young Germans, as Wycherly's vessels were well-nigh drained at the commencement of the trial. He therefore took a fresh start in life, so to speak, with a large capital of new blood, and since then he had been contributing only one-third of the supply to the common stock or partnership circulation. Accordingly only one-third of the common blood was being assimilated by old organs, while two-thirds were being assimilated by young and robust ones.

In addition to this, Wycherly's assimilative organs were being fed and their waste being carried off by blood which was day by day becoming younger as the process went on.

It was therefore impossible to escape the mathematical conclusion that Wycherly would grow younger, while Fritz and Wilhelm would grow older, till a stable equilibrium in the physical condition of the trio was reached.

I confidently looked forward to the time, and that at no distant date, when I should have the satisfaction of seeing before me three robust young men of twenty-eight, at which time there would no longer be any occasion to maintain their inforced union. I further calculated that the state of equilibrium in age would be reached in about a month from then, so that by the time my friend's son arrived from Japan there would be but the slight disparity between twenty-three and twenty-eight in their respective ages.

Two days before the China steamer was due I carefully separated the three men. The altered appearance of Wycherly, though in the highest degree striking to me, excited no surprise among the dairy people, who had first seen him in a deathlike swoon and who attributed his altered looks to returning health.

As for the young men who had become prematurely matured through keeping company with an invalid, no one thought anything of it, and no one pitied them, as they had been paid liberally for their loss of vitality.

Wycherly, however, upon his return to the city, sent each of them a cheque for an amount which amply represented the earnings of the eight years of life which they had lost. We returned to the city in company, a fashionable tailor fitted out the young English gentleman, my guest, and we arranged to meet next morning to go together to the China steamer.

"Is Mr. Wycherly on board—Mr. Stephen Wycherly?" asked my friend next day of one of the stewards.

"Mr. Wycherly?" replied the man, starting. "Why —oh, yes, I remember. Please to wait, sir, till I call one of the officers."

Presently we observed one of the officers coming forward, conversing with the steward. As he came up he bowed gravely and said:

"I grieve to tell you, gentlemen, that Mr. Wycherly died on the passage here and was buried at sea. If you will accompany me to the surgeon's cabin, he will supply you with all the particulars." And he led the way aft.

Digitized by Google

Sorrowfully I followed the grief-stricken parent, whose bowed head and unsteady step showed the violence of the blow.

"I am speaking to Mr. Wycherly's brother, I presume," said the surgeon, after the officer had explained our errand, turning to my companion. "The resemblance is so striking that I do not think I can be mistaken, though I should say you were slightly his senior."

"His father," replied my friend simply.

"His father! Excuse me. If you will come inside, I will show you my books."

It turned out that poor Stephen, my friend's son—his name also—had been taken down with dysentery on the sixth day out from Yokohama and had never rallied from the attack.

"Did you remark the surgeon's expression of incredulity when you said you were the father of the Mr. Wycherly who died on the passage?" I said to my friend next day as he sat in my office. "It may turn out that you will have trouble in establishing your identity. I can, of course, vouch for it, but it is not likely that my story would gain undisputed credence, seeing that it is unparalleled in the annals of science?"

"Make yourself easy on that point," returned Wycherly, with something of heat in his tone. "As to my friends at home, is it reasonable to suppose that they would fail to recognize one who is thoroughly conversant with each detail of our family affairs?"

"I hope it may turn out as you say," I remarked dubiously.

Just then my servant entered with a card. I started on reading it and handed it to Wycherly.

"Miss Gertrude Tremaine!" he ejaculated. "But how—how——"

"The lady has come to inquire regarding Mr. Wycherly—Mr. Stephen Wycherly," said the boy.

"Show her in," said I, and immediately a tall, handsome brunette appeared in the doorway.

She looked first at one and then at the other, as if undecided how to act, then advanced to where Wycherly was sitting, too bewildered to speak, and took him by the hand.

"Why, Stephen," she said, "don't you know me? But I didn't expect to find you here. I thought I should find papa here. They told me I should get news of him here at the place I used to direct all my letters to."

"Why, Gertie," returned Wycherly, regarding her with embarrassment, "don't you know me? Don't you know Stephen's father?"

"What does this mean, sir?" she said, drawing herself up with offended dignity. "But do not flatter yourself it was to see you, sir, that I came. I came at the express desire of your grandmother and aunt to see that your father was being properly taken care of. Oh, Stephen," she continued in a softened tone, "they are so very anxious about him at home."

"But, Gertie, I am old Stephen Wycherly, whom you came to see," said my friend.

"You!" she cried with a ripple of silvery laughter, as if now entering into and enjoying the joke. "You! I suppose you think that having made the tour of the world gives you the right to assume age. And now I come to think of it, perhaps it does, for you do certainly look five years older than when you left us a year ago, if that is anything in your favour."

I had been studying all this time how to extricate my friend from his dilemma. So, rising and looking at my watch, I said in a fatherly sort of way:

"You young people can get along very well without me, I think. I have an engagement which will take me at least half-an-hour; so I am sure you will excuse me."

When I returned, they were gone, and merely a note from Wycherly remained on the table, saying that he would communicate with me shortly.

From that day to this I heard nothing of him till I received this letter:

Wychwood Hall,
Norfolk.
September 15th.

My Dear Doctor,—Forgive my abrupt departure from San Francisco. You no doubt wonder how matters have turned out with me. First of all, Gertie—Miss Gertrude Tremaine, now my wife—made a terrible noise after you so considerately, and, I will add, pusillanimously went (she is looking over my shoulder now and has made me put in that last adverb) because I persisted in telling her that I was old instead of young Mr. Wycherly. By little and little and by explaining as well as I could that the treatment I had received after the accident she read about in your letter had produced the extraordinary change in my appearance, she subsided into an apparent acquiescence with what I told her. You may call it what you please, you may attribute it to the transfusion, or to the arts and wiles of Gertie, but certain it is that before we were half over the Atlantic I was head over heels in love. Nor was it a one-sided affair, either, and by the time we reached home we were engaged.

How I dreaded going home! When we got into the carriage at the railway station, the footman while touching his hat "hoped that I had left my father well." The same thing was repeated at the hall. My mother wept over the return of her grandson, and my sister fell upon the neck of her nephew. When, two months after our return, Gertie and I were married at the village church, I am satisfied that nine-tenths of the people present believed that the Stephen Wycherly who signed the register was son to the man who stood before them. And what is the use of setting people right upon the question? I have determined to remain Stephen Wycherly, Jr., since they will have it so.

Your friend,
Stephen Wycherly.

P. S.—I enclose two cheques for £100 each for Fritz and Wilhelm.

There! What do you think of that for a denouement to my transfusion operation?

Robert Duncan Milne.

IF YOU HAVE A RELATIVE—

who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. × 12in. mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. × 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

Full particulars appear in the current issue of

THE CURIOSITY SHOP.

A coupon from that paper must accompany each order.

A sample enlargement is on view at these offices. Below are other addresses where the enlargements may be seen:

Portsmouth.—A. B. Bennett, 408 Commercial Road, Landport.
Southsea.—L. Hillyer, 9 Green Road.
Glasgow.—William Love, 221 Argyle Street (opposite Central Station), and William Barr, 88 Sauchiehall Street.
Liverpool.—F. W. Edwards, 122 Pembroke Place, and Henry Jones (tobacconist), 184 Oakfield Road.
Blackpool.—Coppock (newsagent).
Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Messrs. T. and G. Allan, 18 and 20 Blackett Street.
Sunderland.—Edward Thompson, 263 High Street West.
Manchester.—J. Matthews, 88 Oxford Street, and Messrs. M. Carr and Co., 38 Alexandra Road, Moss Side.

Digitized by Google

The Mad Cabman.

It was a closed cab I hailed—a yellow cab—and its number was 17766. I remember the number distinctly, and I will tell you how it happened that its number and colour have stuck so like burrs to my memory.

When I got out of the door of the Freemason's Tavern (on the night of February 15th, 1860) where the dinner of the "Benevolent Superannuated Night Porters' Association" had been held, and called a closed cab from the stand, as the cabman got down from his box and opened the door for me, with the natty twist and tug peculiar to the craft, I looked inside and saw that one of the cushions was torn nearly in half, and that the foot-mat was kicked up in a dirty heap in one corner.

Upon which observing the number of the cab to be 17766 and somewhat, perhaps, exhilarated by the "Benevolent Night Porters'" champagne, I remarked good-naturedly that "one might expect things to be at sixes and sevens in cab 17766." The cabman growled something in return, but he made no other answer.

One other thing, too, I noticed about the cab—having rather a sensitive eye for colour—and that was, that the vehicle was painted a bright canary colour, bright as the wings of a goldfinch; now yellow being a colour I peculiarly abhor, except in sunshine and calceolarias, I grumbled, half aloud and half to myself, that "it must have been a madman who painted a cab such a colour."

"No more mad than you, master," replied instantly an angry voice from somewhere or other; but whether it was the waterman, who now stood holding the door, and hoping "I would remember him," and whose pewter badge shone like silver in the gas-light; whether it was some street boy lurking round for pence; whether it was a drunken waiter, or even some mere impertinent passer-by, I could not in the hurry of the moment very well determine.

Wine turns some men into braggarts, others it makes cowards. Some sing, and others talk, when wine mounts up into their brain. Me it makes silent, wary, suspicious, and cautious. It quickens me, it extends my mental vision, it heightens all my senses. It seems, if I may so express it, to come to the windows of my mind, and rub a vapour from them, so that I see people clearer and deeper.

It specially had this effect on me the night in question, so before the cabman had yet shuffled up the capes of his coat, and tied a fresh knot in his whip, I had calculated how many miles it was from Long Acre to my cottage on Downham Green, east of Hammersmith, and observed that the horse was a good one and untired.

"Vere to, sir?" said the cabman, forcing the door with great difficulty into its proper place, and then with all his strength grinding down the rusty or bruised handle.

"To No. 4, De Beauvoir Terrace, Downham Green, Hammersmith."

"And how many miles do you make it?" said the sullen rogue again as he rudely thrust his rough face in at the window, speaking with a sour, hard voice.

I replied that I called it not quite five.

"Not much less," said the man bitterly, with a growl, as he put one foot on the step to mount to his coachbox. "And mind it's double fare, sir, after twelve," he added, returning again to carefully pull up both windows, and to re-open and re-slam the opposite door of the cab.

I did not like the vindictive look he gave me as he did this; but I said nothing, for I knew his number, and the wine made me reckless of all dangers, but I did not know the motive of all that care then.

"Will you go on," I cried, "with your ramshackle cab, or I'll get out and take another—a better one?"

"Ve'll go on fast enough presently," growled the ill-conditioned fellow with a peculiar emphasis, as he jumped up on his seat. The horse spluttered about for a moment on the stones, struck out a spark or two with its hoofs, and then sprang forward. The waterman flinging down his water-bucket took off his hat ironically to my driver. I heard a voice behind us calling for a "cab quick."

"Take care how you drive that there gentleman," cried out a policeman, and we were off. The lamps of Long Acre passed us in quick procession; it seemed but a minute and we were in St. Martin's Lane. At that instant the gusty wind bore across the road the "half past twelve," struck by the bell of St. Martin's Church.

The driver, thinking of his overfare, turned, and tapping at the window, with a brutal leer asked me if I heard "the clock a-striking" but I did not reply, for I had taken a strange dislike to the man, and my only wish now was to get as soon as possible to my own home, and rid myself of a fellow probably half-intoxicated, and evidently determined to be extortionate and troublesome.

By this time it had begun to rain fast; the mist, before wavering and wandering, now fell in long, lashing lines, that beat fiercely against the cab windows, covering them with a moving surface of water, that rendered it impossible to see out of either glass.

The wind too, beat against the cab, and flew howling before us up the street. Still we drove on fast and steadily up Regent Street, where now nothing could be seen but a stray policeman cowering up in a doorway.

I never saw such rain before nor since. It seemed to whiten all the pavement, and to madly dance and splash, as if each drop were a living thing. Yet all this time that the rain seemed ready to beat in the windows, the cabman, with head bent deprecatingly down, drove on singing scraps of a coarse sea-song:

> "Belay there! belay!" was all he would say,
> As we tossed in the chops of the Channel.

I struck the window angrily, to stop his ribald and insolent song; but he did not seem to hear me, and paid no attention to my signal; so throwing myself back in a corner of the cab, I began to turn over the chief events of the evening in my mind, just to while away the time.

Through a pleasant haze the past hours seemed again to defile before me.

I went through all the moments from the time the man at the door gave me the ticket for my hat, to the time that I gave it back again to the same man, and told the waiter to call me a cab from the nearest stand.

Digitized by Google

I remembered all the bows and hand-shakings of the Committee Room, and how at last, in an irregular body, we moved into the dining-hall, marshalled by the jolly-looking, portly stewards, with blue rosettes in their buttonholes.

I remembered the buzz as old Lord Foptoddle, our noble chairman, arrived and took his seat; I remembered, too, with a smile, the bursting out of "Down among the barley," from the professional singers, just as the dessert was set upon the table.

Then came the procession round the table of "the superannuated night porters," and the tremendous auctioneer's blow of the toastmaster's hammer, that heralded the first toast.

Again I seemed to hear the anile speeches, and insincere compliments, the ridiculous praise, the extravagant self-laudation on the mutual flattery system.

Again, through a din of tongues, and a clattering of plates, I heard the treasurer read those tiresome, endless items such as——

"Twenty pounds from Lord Foptoddle." (Cheers.)

"Ten pounds from the Marquis of Cheshire." (Renewed cheers.)

Again, too, for the twentieth time, I heard the treasurer thank the secretary, and the secretary thank the treasurer; and then, at last, not a little flurried, I rose myself to propose "The Ladies," who smiled upon us from the gallery. I all the time thinking only of pretty little Nelly Pledgett, my doctor's daughter, who I saw beaming and radiant in a front seat. I got quite eloquent on the subject of female beauty, and sat down amid tremendous applause.

I was replied to by the good doctor, who, thanking the meeting on behalf of the ladies, begged to propose the health of one of the best friends of the society—need he say he alluded to—"Osbert Wilkinson, Esq?" (Cheers).

But suddenly, through all these motley recollections, there flashed a painful thought—a suspicious apprehension of I scarcely knew what coming evil. It seemed, when I think of it now, almost like a presentiment of what shortly after happened.

I remembered that, as I sat down, somewhat heated by my speech and was pouring myself out a glass of that excellent sherry to wind up with, my old friend, the doctor, who by-the-bye, sat opposite to me at dinner, leant across the table and gave me a peculiarly keen and searching look from under those thick, grey eyebrows of his.

"What does that detective's look of yours mean, doctor?" said I, pleasantly enough.

"It means that you must take care of yourself," said he in a grave voice; and no more passed between us, for at that moment I rose to leave, having some business that would call me up early in the morning.

He followed me out, though, and when we shook hands in the doorway, I am not sure that he did not hold his stop watch in one hand, and feel my pulse with the other; but I was so busy helping Nelly on with her scarlet opera cloak that I did not pay much attention to the nervous old fellow, who, between ourselves, I think is getting rather past work; he worries one so with warnings and mysterious threats, as if I wasn't in the finest health, and my life insurance just advantageously settled.

Dear Nelly! what an anxious look she gave me, as I stepped into my cab! I was sure that the girl loved me.

All this evening I had been haunted with anxieties about this troublesome Chancery case of mine, "Wormwood versus Widgett," the vexation and delays of which had nearly driven me mad. I had really felt quite giddy over it that very morning, and began to get alarmed about over-working my brain, as my doctor taxed me with doing. I could not get the thought of it, even now, out of my mind, till a certain growing apprehension overpowered it.

We were still driving on at a strange, unequal rate—now at a furious gallop, now at a fierce trot; but where we were I could not very well determine—I looked out, for we had just got into a dark side street, and there was no lamp visible, up or down, so far, at least, as I could see without putting my head out, for the windows were jammed so close it was impossible to open them.

It was here that, for the first time, I began somehow or other to have some vague apprehension of the sanity or honesty of my driver.

Then came thronging into my brain stories I had heard years ago in Paris of a celebrated and dangerous gang of thieves who had for their accomplices many of the drivers of the night fiacres.

These fellows drove whatever passengers they could procure into obscure streets, and then robbed and sometimes murdered them. Was I to be the victim of such a scheme?—and if I was, what hope had I, alone and unarmed, to escape, at such an hour too, and on such a night?

Now was the time to resist, however, before it was too late. My resolution was prompt. I struck at the window as loudly as I could without breaking the glass; I kicked at the panels of the door; I shouted.

Suddenly, with a tremendous jolt on the kerb, the cab stopped. As the door opened I cried, "Let me out, you rascal—I'll not be robbed." I stepped forward to get out, but was met by a fierce blow on the chest from the cabman, whose eyes now literally glared with rage.

"That's enough of your mad tricks, Bedlam Billy," he said, as he thrust me back violently into the cab; "you vant a straight vescut, you do, and you shall have one," then slamming the door with a wrench that showed extraordinary strength, he leapt on to the box, and drove away with a fury that sent me reeling into a corner of the seat.

Hitherto I had dreamt only of robbery, now I was sure that the man who drove me was mad, stark staring mad. He was going to drive me into some river, or down some pit, or in some way or other to hurry himself and me to a horrible death. There he was now, standing up to drive, leaning forward to lash on the eager horse, that, frothing with pain, leapt at every blow of the man's whip.

I do not know why I did not instantly break both front windows, and pull the man off the box; or force open the door and throw myself out; or, breaking all the glass, shout to everyone through the openings that the man who was driving me had gone mad.

From whatever cause it happened, I know not but I I did none of these things.

It was now long past midnight, and I could see no one, not even a policeman.

We were fast getting into the suburbs. The speed rendered it almost certain death to leap out, and, moreover, no strength I could evoke could succeed in forcing open either door.

I waited, therefore, for some halt or pause that would give me an opportunity of struggling with the madman to whose care I had so unhappily intrusted myself.

Digitized by Google

On we flew, on, the horse leaping and plunging as if it would have broken from the harness. We dashed down streets, whose random lamps seemed to race past us; we tore down lanes, where houses were yet but few, except at the beginning.

Now the wheels grazed against a post, and now against a garden wall; but still the madman who drove me seemed somehow or other to struggle through all dangers, and drive on more frantically than before.

Once we dashed through a turnpike. Some voices screamed after us, and my driver screamed to them in return, but what they said or what he said I could not distinguish.

We were now racing up a long side street, where in the distance, to my horror, I could just discern through the pale light of the first daybreak, a yawning pit dug for the foundations of new houses. There was no railing on the one side, and the road was a mere deep-rutted lane, without limit or boundary.

I saw at once that our fate was inevitable; it came ere I could in any manner extricate myself from the vehicle.

The horse near the deepest place gave a plunge and reel, then dropped, spite of the redoubled lashing of the frantic driver—yes, fell, dragging the carriage with it into what seemed to me in that imperfect light, and in that whirl of my senses, a chasm of darkness at the bottom of which crouched Death waiting for his prey. There was a crash, a cry, and I fell stunned.

* * * * *

I know not how long I lay insensible; but when I recovered, it was day break, a faint red light was striping the eastern sky, and I could see surrounding objects, though in a dim, uncertain way. I was lying beside the fallen cab and its dead horse; the driver I could nowhere see.

My first impulse was to rouse myself, totter on my legs, and discover where I was hurt, or if any bone was broken.

To my great delight I found myself whole and sound, with the exception of a slight sprain in my right foot, at least so I thought at first; but as I put down my hand to touch my injured foot, a heavy red-clotted drop of blood fell on it. I lifted my hand to my forehead, and found there a deep cut, from which the blood was oozing thickly. I instantly took out my handkerchief and bound it tightly round the wound, so as, if possible to staunch the blood till I could get assistance. But where was I, and where was the driver?

"Thank goodness," I cried aloud, "that I am at last rid of that madman!"

I looked round to see what sort of place the wretch had ensnared me into.

It was an unfinished suburban street, with raw brick skeletons of houses, stretching their frail dreary walls up into the misty morning air.

Some were caged in with scaffolding, others had great heaps of mortar still piled up in front of them; unfinished iron railings, doors daubed like clowns' faces, with patches of red; windows white with circles in their panes; gateways with gaping pits where steps were to be, everywhere met my eye.

In front of me on a dead wall, "Alpha Terrace," the name of this future paradise, was written in staring whitewash letters. The only sound I could hear, far

"HOW STOUT YOU ARE GETTING!"

THERE is too often a scarcely veiled reproach in that exclamation: "How stout you are getting!" At any rate, the corpulent one is generally sensitive on that point, and perhaps feels a reproach where none is intended. Certain it is that to lose the svelte symmetry of youth, to broaden out, to "swell wisibly," as Sam Weller has it, and finally to become "fat and scant of breath," is a process at once humiliating and distressing, especially to those who possess that keen appreciation of personal appearance which is a part of what is termed good breeding. There is now, however, no excuse for those who have resigned themselves to carry to the grave the rotund proportions of a Falstaff. The perusal of a little book entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," by F. Cecil Russell, has afforded us not a little interest and instruction on a subject which has hitherto received but superficial attention from the medical profession. Mr. Russell has made the cure of obesity his life's study, and judging from the record of his achievements—over a thousand grateful letters from his patients are printed in the book—he has been singularly successful. The author's treatment is not by "wasting." There is no "sweating"; there are no restrictions as to eating and drinking: no drastic conditions of any kind. The medicine prescribed is simple and pleasant, purely vegetable, and perfectly harmless. Its action is twofold; it reduces the redundant fatty tissue at a very rapid rate—in some cases to the extent of one or two pounds in twenty-four hours—usually from 3lbs. to 4lbs. in a week (sometimes considerably more), and at the same time it acts as a refreshing and invigorating tonic, promoting a healthy appetite, and dispelling the feeling of depression and extreme malaise experienced by the majority of corpulent people. "Does the fat return after cessation of the treatment?" is a question that many will ask. No, under normal conditions it does not. Mr. Russell's treatment goes to the root of the malady, and, without having the slightest pernicious effect even on the most delicate persons, eliminates the cause of the tendency to corpulence. "Corpulency and the Cure," a dainty little book of some 256 pages, is now in its eighteenth edition. We would cordially recommend such of our readers who are troubled with what we will call, for the sake of euphony, "exaggerated embonpoint" to procure a copy by sending two penny stamps to Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London. This well-known specialist can claim the unique distinction of having successfully treated over 10,000 cases of obesity.

FREE—Special Offer—FREE.

To all Readers of "Short Stories" Suffering from Obesity.

Mr. Russell will be pleased to forward, post free, a copy of his book, CORPULENCY AND THE CURE, 256 pages, in a sealed plain envelope, to all applicants forwarding 2d. in stamps to Woburn House, 27 Store Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

and near, was the restless twitter of the wakening sparrows.

I touched the horse; he was dead, cold, and already stiffening. The cab lay on its side, rising like a wall before me, at the bottom of a newly-dug foundation, some twelve feet from the roadway. It was wonderful how I had escaped.

But the wretched maniac who would have taken my life, was he lying crushed beneath the cab? I must rouse myself and see if I can find any trace of him, though, doubtless, he believed me dead.

If unhurt, he had fled, howling and exulting to meet with that certain detection he had not cunning enough to escape; if injured, he had crawled away to obtain help.

As these thoughts passed through my mind, I stepped painfully over the dead horse, and again exclaiming:

"Thank goodness he is gone!" walked round to the other side of the cab, which had hitherto been hidden from me.

Good Heavens, what did I see? My enemy the madman, sitting between the upturned wheels, with his back against the body of the carriage, quietly cutting a leather trace into two long flexible strips. On his face, which was smeared with mud and gore, there was a hideous smile of malice as his eyes met mine.

"Vy, hallo, Lushington?" he said—not appearing in the least alarmed or surprised, and continuing his task —"this is a rum start of yours, isn't it? Vot are you a-going to give me for my fare? I'm not going away, Colney Hatch, vithout getting paid for your mad capers, so don't think it, Mr. Hanwell. So now then, Crazy Bill, stump up."

"It is you who are mad," I said, "and I shall leave you to your keeper."

"Ve'll see about that," said the villain, slowly getting on his legs and advancing towards me with the two leather straps, that he had now knotted into one long cord, dangling behind his back. "You must come off with me to Bedlam, my man; you ain't safe at large; a cold shower-bath is what you want, old Billy Bedlam. Now easy—hiss!—easy."

"Lunatic," I cried, "beware of a desperate man."

"There's two of us desperate, as far as that goes," said the wretch, leaping on me to bind my hands.

Then as the fellow advanced, and ere he could seize my throat I drew a long broad knife quickly from my trousers' pocket, and stabbed him under the left breast. He threw up his hands, screamed. "The madman's done it!" and fell dead on his face.

I stood for a moment spellbound, but the sight of a red stream of blood winding towards my feet aroused me.

* * * * *

I was a murderer; my brain was on fire; those drear gaunt houses seemed dancing round me; the earth seemed heaving into graves.

I erased the number of the cab, to escape detection, then threw down the knife, and fled I knew not where, with the speed of an escaped malefactor.

I shall never know where I ran. I passed through streets where shops were beginning to be opened in the bright morning sun, people called to me but I never stopped; I leapt over gates and chased through the rank grass of lonely meadows.

There was a dead silence at first in the air, and I thought I had escaped, but presently a sound, at first no louder than the bay of a watch-dog, seemed to gradually swell into the clamour and cry of a vast pursuing mob.

I could hear voices, and the tramp of feet; the wretches had dogs with them; they were tracking me. How strange that among them I seemed to specially distinguish the voices of Doctor Pledgett and his daughter Nelly! What had they to do there? I saw the mob breaking through a distant orchard, and thought I had beaten them off like so many wild curs; but suddenly in front of me at a turning I cannot avoid, run three men. They point to a dead, bleeding man lying on the ground. I dash at them. There are blows that fall crashing on my head, then there is a great darkness.

* * * * *

When I awoke it was a soft spring morning, and I was in bed in a room I had never seen before. Oh, so neat and trim! A goldfinch was singing pleasantly at the window, and there were bouquets of violets on the white cloth of the dressing-table.

A bright, rosy cloud rippled over the sky; a cheery fire sent quivering up the chimney its little yellow flames, and made a cosy, murmuring sound with its puffing jets of gas.

I rose in bed by a great effort, for I was very weak, and looked at myself in the great toilet glass that faced the bed. I saw not myself, but a pale, hollow-faced, old man, whose shaven head was bound in wet bandages. It looked like Lazarus when he ascended those steps that led from the inner darkness.

Suddenly the door opened, and who should enter but my good friend, Dr. Pledgett? It was his house I was in.

He smiled when he saw me once more conscious; but shook his finger when he observed that I was trying to speak.

* * * * *

The rest may be told in a few words. The long and the short of it was, that I had had a brain fever. The disease had broken out the night of the charity dinner, as my doctor had long expected.

The severe mental labour of that case of "Wormwood v. Widgett had been too much for my brain. Pledgett had, indeed, as he sat opposite to me at dinner, that eventful night, seen premonitory symptoms of the disorder, and had tried to follow my cab. By my friend's wish I had been sent to his house, for the sake of greater attention.

Of my crazy doings that night, the less said the better. They ended, however, I may mention, in my upsetting the cab myself (for I had insisted on driving), in a dangerous place, and then stabbing the cabman, whom I had mistaken for an escaped madman.

Luckily the wound, though it bled severely, had not proved dangerous. As for myself, I had then escaped from the cabman, who had tried to take me safely home seeing I was delirious, and being found in a field near Chiswick, was driven to a hospital, from whence Dr. Pledgett, hearing of my detention there, took me to his own house.

I soon recovered thanks to my kind doctor, but, alas! having before lost my senses, I now lost my heart. I spent my long days of convalescence in wandering in the garden with Nelly, in practising duets, and reading Tennyson. I soon found it impossible to be happy without her.

To-morrow week, Nelly Pledgett, I am proud and happy to say, becomes Mrs. Osbert Wilkinson, thanks to my imaginary mad cabman and the yellow cab No. 17766.

Walter Thornbury.

Digitized by Google

ORCHESTRAL

ORGANETTE

A £4 4s ORGANETTE for 35/-

The most remarkable musical instrument ever made. An Organ in Miniature. Is built just like a full-sized organ, with proper reeds (2 sets) and 3 stops. No teaching required. A child can play it at sight and produce as good music as the most accomplished pianist.

A VALUABLE BOOK FREE.

Our splendidly illustrated catalogue of Household Requisites, Jewellery, Plate, &c. Get it, even if you don't buy from us. Sent post free on application.

J. M. DRAPER, Dept. 336, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

OUR NEW

CATALOGUE

THE "IBIS" TOOTH POWDER

(Registered)

Is the only Dentifrice which, if regularly used, cleans discoloured teeth and dissolves away tartar. It is by this wonderful power that it permanently preserves good teeth and prevents further decay in bad teeth. In this way also it is an effectual PREVENTIVE of toothache, neuralgia, and gumboils.

Sold in 6d. and 1/- boxes, or post free for 7d. and 1/- from the ANTEXEMA COMPANY, 83 Castle Road, London, N.W.

Neuralgia Positively Cured!

Free Test Offered.

The annexed cut presents in the prominent white lines the nerves most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. Sufferers will know only too well the pain tracks, and will be glad to know of a Simple and Sure Remedy. The proprietors will send Free two sample Zox Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped envelope to ZOX CO., 11 HATTON GARDEN, LONDON, E.C.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.

THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.

Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.

SOLE AGENT:

GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.

Price 2/9 post free.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lbs., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO., 59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS, Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE BEST OF ALL BEVERAGES AND THE CHEAPEST.

GOOD! IT'S MASON'S Extract of Herbs

8 Gallons Prime Beer for 6d.

Sample Free for 9 Stamps.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, October 22nd, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A penknife will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 235.

The following letters, when re-arranged, will form a double-word square, the connecting word of which is a Continental city:

AAAAA EEEEEE II M NN O PPP RRRRRR S TT W Y.

No. 236.

My initials and finals will give the names of an English poet and author respectively:

A term in physical geography; a fabulous monster; a tool; complete; a logical term; a historic island; a heraldic term.

No. 237.

Six hundred and sixty so ordered may be
That if you divide the whole number by three,
The quotient will exactly in numbers express
The half of six hundred and sixty, not less.

No. 238.

The first and third letters of equivalents of the following, when re-arranged, will give the name of a town in the Orange River Colony:

A musical instrument; to entangle; a prayer; an eastern cosmetic.

No. 239.

I am a well-known proverb:

My 20, 10, 26, 31, 19, 29, is a legal term.
My 16, 9, 12, 14, is a fish.
My 7, 1, 30, 18, 2, is an Indian title.
My 6, 30, 15, 32, is a bird.
My 11, 18, 19, 13, 29, 22, is an insect.

No. 240.

My FIRST'S my SECOND'S counterpart
In matter, form, and name;
Reverse me, and divide each part,
The likeness is the same.

My WHOLE is to all children dear,
But mostly so in France;
I always in that land appear
At youngsters' rout or dance.

RESULT OF "COMPOSITE FACES" COMPETITION.

The first prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Miss Emma Jordan, 21 Providence Street, Plymouth, whose attempt was first dealt with, and showed the least number of mistakes.

A copy of "The Raid of the 'Detrimental,'" by the Earl of Desart, has been sent to each of the following:

R. Jenkins, South Darenth, Kent.
Miss A. Clark, Cambridge.
H. R. Redman, Hastings.
E. Chalton, Spa Road, Bolton.
Miss E. E. Joyce, Taghmon, S.O., co. Wexford.
Mrs. E. Rees, Undercliffe Lane, Bradford.
Miss N. Adamson, Choppington, Morpeth.
A. Crafter, Orpington, Kent.
J. W. Shaw, Hitchin.
A. Williams, Courtney Road, Holloway, N.

SOLUTION OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 217 to 222.

No. 217. Pterichthys (rich, thy, pest).

No. 218. Rebate.

No. 219.

A cl E
M aco N
E lbin G
R eve L
I ow A
CarnarvoN
A lmon D ENGLAND—AMERICA.

No. 220. HEMLOCK.

No. 221.

P L U M
L Y R E
U R N S
M E S S A G E
A N A L
G A P S
E L S E

No. 222. £126, £84, £42, £58, £21, £29, £14, 10s., £25, 10s.

There are many other ways of working out this last puzzle, and competitors who send in other correct solutions will stand an equal chance of winning the prize with these who send in the solution here published.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " " ...	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half " "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 16th, if intended for the issue on sale Oct. 20th, and dated November 3rd. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

CHIVERS'

DELICIOUS! WHOLESOME! REFRESHING!

FLAVOURED WITH RIPE FRUIT JUICES.

DR. A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., F.R.S.E. (Edin.): "I have no hesitation in stating that Chivers' Jellies are the best I have ever examined."

WOMAN'S SIGNAL: "Absolutely clear and pleasant to look at on the table, and the flavour simply perfect."

A FAMILY GROCER: "We think them superior to any others, consequently have given up selling any other makes."

FREE SAMPLE on receipt of post-card. S. CHIVERS and SONS, Histon, Cambridge.

JELLIES.

1,000 CYCLES FREE.

Our Lady's or Gent's Link will be sent free of any charge for delivery on receipt of 1/6. These are not American or Foreign trash, but are made in England. This is our first advertisement, and by it we are determined to bring our name before the public. This offer will only hold good to the readers of this paper for the next 14 days. We will send with the bicycle a nickel silver lamp and pump, and the whole will be packed in a wood crate and sent to your address free immediately you take advantage of this advertisement and the offer we will send. A written guarantee given with each bicycle. We give these machines away to encourage you to become agents for us. If the bicycles are all given away your 1/6 will be returned. Send 1/6 and stamped addressed envelope for receipt. Address the London Direct Supply Company (Dept. E), 4, Duke St, Strand, London, W.C.

NOSE

MACHINES, LEES RAY, S. S. Dept., South Castle St, Liverpool, is a specialist on Ugly and Red Noses. Send stamp for particulars of his patent scientific Nose Improvers. Red Nose Cure, medically approved, 3/9. Outstanding Ear Machines 11/6.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,
63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.
Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR

KAPUTINE

SAFE REMEDY CURES

HEADACHE and NEURALGIA

IMMEDIATELY,

And is sold by all leading Chemists in Packets of 18 Doses, 1s.

To ANYONE HAVING THE LEAST DIFFICULTY, it will be sent post free for 12 Stamps by "KAPUTINE Ltd.," Huddersfield; or, on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope, A. M. Kaputine, Huddersfield, you will receive a free sample.

The fact that "KAPUTINE" is recommended by many leading Medical Men, and is used in National Hospitals and Infirmaries proves that it is THE, THE recognised SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHES.

Refuse Substitutes and demand "KAPUTINE," the Safe Remedy. There is no substitute "LIKE IT"; nothing "AS GOOD"; nothing "SIMILAR."

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR

Digitized by Google

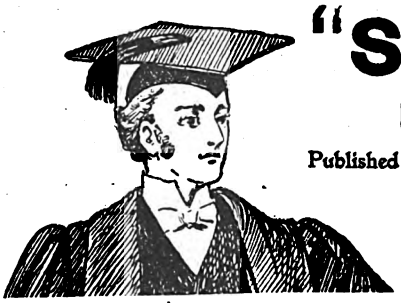
A BOOK WORTH MANY POUNDS!

Professor Boyd Laynard's Great Work:



"SECRETS of BEAUTY, HEALTH, and LONG LIFE."

Published by HAMMOND, HAMMOND, and CO., 19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London.

The publishers have much pleasure in announcing the issue of the popular edition of Professor BOYD LAYNARD'S great work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE."

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the author—being, in fact, the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in TWO BOOKS, FIFTEEN PARTS, and 127 CHAPTERS, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in ONE VOLUME.

The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the publishers, be forwarded, carriage paid, to all readers of this paper at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

This is to secure for it a place in every home, by bringing it within the reach of all.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Boyd Laynard's Work, the following are but a few (a complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 chapters, enumerating upwards of 500 subjects and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers) :—

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs—Wrinkles, and how to treat them—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose may be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influence upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health— aughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—Some perilous articles of food Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—Baths and bathing; their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its culture and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their nature, prevention and treatment—Indigestion—Constipation—Neuralgia, Rheumatism—Nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—The mental, moral, physical, and external influences that are conducive to long life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

WHAT THE PAPERS ARE SAYING.

The Christian Globe says: "Professor Laynard writes well on a subject he has evidently studied deeply. As a guide to good looks, health, and longevity this book differs entirely from ordinary works on the same subjects. It is more thorough and at the same time more practical. It is safe to say that anyone who ordered his or her life on the rules laid down in this book would certainly profit both physically and materially."

Success says: "Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life," is no misnomer respecting the title of this remarkable work. The author has unfolded to the world many secrets regarding these subjects, the importance of which it is impossible to over estimate. The work, however, has not been written for the purpose of startling the reader with extraordinary theories, but as a practical hand-book for all those desiring beauty, health and long life. Nevertheless it is, perhaps, the most remarkable work of the present century, as a study of the syllabus of its 127 chapters will fully verify."

The London Journal (Aug. 4th) says: "Throughout the whole 127 chapters it is practical and sensible. It contains an immense amount of valuable advice, and, moreover, it is written in such a bright style that it is as interesting as a novel. Apart from the general usefulness of the work as a complete handbook to beauty, health, and longevity, it possesses an additional value to those requiring reliable advice upon specific subjects. For example, the chapters treating upon the skin, the complexion, the hair, the teeth, the eyesight, the voice, deafness, sleeplessness, nervousness, memory, stammering, diet, indigestion, and other important matters too numerous to mention, are each worth a physician's fee to particular readers, as they are based upon the pathologies of the highest medical and scientific authorities."

ORDER FORM. TO BE CUT OUT.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & Co.,
19, 21 & 23 LUDGATE HILL LONDON, E.C.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE

Name _____

Address _____

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

£100 A WEEK IN FOOTBALL PRIZES. See PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 616. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 20TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

GIGANTIC BANKRUPTCY SALE CATALOGUE.

Re BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO., late of Old St., London.

F. HODGSON & SONS, of LEEDS, have purchased for Cash the whole of the business, goodwill, and effects from Official Trustee in Bankruptcy. Illustrated Sale Catalogue of Brussels, Axminster, Velvet, and Foreign Carpets and Hearthrugs can be had Post Free, if mentioning SHORT STORIES, 20/10/1900.

4/6

To readers of SHORT STORIES, 20/10/1900. On receipt of Postal Order or stamps value (Regd.) we will send you the Largest Genuine Reversible Carpet in Brussels Finish, with Rug, ever sold at the Price, direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, &c., bordered and woven in Brussels Patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember, these are woven and are made of a material almost equal to wool.

Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.
SPECIAL OFFER.—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 8/-.
Prodigious sale of the "PRUDENTIAL"

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS

Admittedly The Marvel of the Age.

Woven and Reversible, rich Brussels and Turkey Patterns and Colourings, superior quality, with handsome Border to match. A Marvel of Excellence and Beauty. These Carpets are superb imitations of real Brussels, and except by the closest scrutiny, the difference cannot be detected.

6 ft. by 6 ft.	2/11	REDUCED SALE PRICE.		6 ft. by 7½ft.	3/11
6 ft. by 9 ft.	4/9	7½ft. by 9 ft.	5/11	9 ft. by 9 ft.	7/6
9 ft. by 12 ft.	9/6	10½ft. by 12 ft.	11/6	9 ft. by 15 ft.	12/6
12 ft. by 13½ft.	14/6	12 ft. by 15 ft.	15/9	12 ft. by 18 ft.	19/6
				9 ft. by 10½ft.	8/6
				12 ft. by 12 ft.	12/9
				12 ft. by 21 ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible Hearthrug (Reg.) to match, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd 1yd. A Stock of 10,000 Patent Wadded Quilts, Toraliums, or Bed Covers, Reversible (as illustration). Covered with Oriental Soft Sateen, and on reverse side another beautiful floral design. Size 56in. by 60in.

These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.

AT AN ENORMOUS REDUCTION TO CLEAR OUT.

Sale Price
3/6
each, postage 6d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER: 3 Quilts for 10s., or 6 for 19s. 6d., or 12 for 38s.
Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

F. HODGSON & SONS, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Allen Foster & Co.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

Design No. 326. 10/6.

A Costume any Lady can wear.—Prettily and neatly trimmed with tucks of velvet and cloth. Sterling Value. This bodice has a tight-fitting back with full front. The Skirt is cut to drape gracefully. Made in the Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth—two splendid wearing materials. Colours: Black, Navy, Grey, Light and Dark Fawn, Brown, Green, Royal Red, Purple, Blue Grey, &c. Good Fit Guaranteed. Price only 10/6. Carriage paid, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 6d. In sending order, please give bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of Skirt in front.

Design No. 326.
10/6

Patterns and Self-Measurement Forms Post Free.

Design No. 2194.
10/6

Send Post-card at once.

GRAND VALUE FOR MONEY.

Write at once for Catalogue of Bargains, Patterns, Order and Measurement Forms. Post Free.

Regular Stock Sizes of Costumes are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms), the Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Larger and Special Sizes to Customers' own measurements, 1/6 extra.

Design No. 2194. 10/6.

The FASHIONABLE THREE-QUARTER SACQUE JACKET, 30in. long. Made in the renowned "Alfosco" Beaver Cloth in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a double-breasted front, with smoke pearl buttons. Price only 10/6. Carriage, 6d. The GREATEST VALUE ON THE MARKET. Send for one. All sizes in stock. In sending order, give bust measurement (under arms). Money returned if not approved.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO. hold a large stock of Ladies' Jackets, Coats, and Capes. All Styles and Prices. ILLUSTRATIONS POST FREE.

Design No. 323.
6/6

Design No. 323. 6/6.

The New and Fashionable Costume Skirt. This Skirt has proved an immense success. It is made in all the colours of the two splendid wearing fabrics—The Specialite Serge and the Venetian Coating. All Sizes in Stock. This Skirt is cut in the New Circular Shape, and has a 16-inch flounce round bottom, which is lined with good linenette.

A Bargain for 6/6.
Carr. paid, 6d. extra.
Send for one.
PATTERNS FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,
47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1	Cash Prize £50	£50 0
1	Cash Prize £40	40 0
10	Handsome Pianos, in walnut, £40 each	400 0
5	Cash Prizes, £25 each	125 0
10	Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10	Ladies' Bicycles, Free-wheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10	Cash Prizes, £10 each	100 0
20	Jones's Sewing Machines, £8 each	160 0
20	Cash Prizes, £5 each	100 0
50	Rolled Gold Lever Watches, £2 10s. each	125 0
100	Cash Prizes, £2 each	200 0
50	Dinner Services (56 pieces), £2 each	100 0
50	Folding Bed Chairs, £2 each	100 0
50	Ladies' Travelling Trunks, £2 each	100 0
200	Cash Prizes, £1 each	200 0
200	Ladies' Leather Hatboxes, £1 each	200 0
100	Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered, £1	100 0
400	pairs Blankets, 15s. per pair	300 0
200	½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large, 15s. per ½-doz.	150 0
200	½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small, 15s. per ½-doz.	£150 0
500	Ladies' Umbrellas, 15/- ea.	375 0
500	Gents' Umbrellas, 15s. each	375 0
400	Best Electro-plated Teapots, 15s. each	300 0
400	Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case, 15s. set	300 0
1000	Cash Prizes, 10s. each	500 0
1000	pairs Bed Sheets 10s. each	500 0
1000	White Linen Table Cloths, 10s. each	500 0
1000	Ladies' Umbrellas, 7/6 each	375 0
1000	Ladies' Leather Purses, 7/6 each	375 0
200	½-doz. Table Knives, 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200	½-doz. Dessert do., 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000	Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge, 7/6 each	750 0
2000	Cash Prizes of 5s. each	500 0
4715	Ladies' Leather Handbags, 4s. each	943 0
4000	½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs, 2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000	Handsome Work-boxes, 2/6 each	500 0
25,602		£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write legibly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

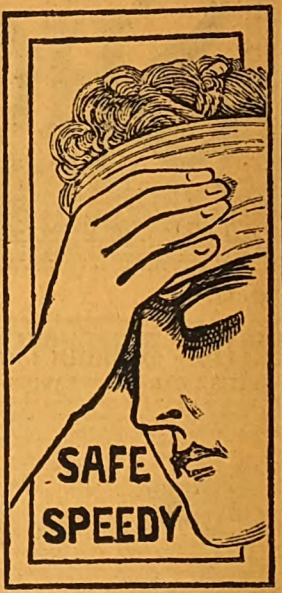
WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the lar-est sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize.

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.



NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to

KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD,

and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

TO THE QUEEN PURVEYORS

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA. GRAVY. JULIENNE. MULLIGATAWNY. TOMATO. HOUSEHOLD. CRESSY. &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

COMPLEXION

A woman's complexion is what she makes it, but "Cricine" is the finest aid to a good one. It removes all Blotches, Eruptions, leaving the skin soft and smooth. One trial will convince. "Cricine" Cream is unrivalled.

In two sizes, 2/6 and 5/-.

Of all Chemists, or post free on receipt of postal order from

The CRICINE Co.,

Regent House, Regent Street, LONDON.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 616.] For the Week Ending October 20th, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

THE HAND THAT FIRED THE SHOT.

"SIT still!" cried a man's imperative voice close to my ear. And then, before I had time to move or to realise what was about to happen, a hand, clutching a revolver, was thrust over my shoulder from behind.

Almost instantly there was a flash, a loud report, and a bullet whizzed between the heads of the diners in the crowded café, and at the other side of the room a man pitched forward upon the table—dead!

Blinded and deafened by the shot, it was some seconds before I recovered myself enough to turn upon the murderous unknown, who had so coolly used my shoulder as a rest. The café was in an uproar. Men rushed hither and thither in confusion, or sought shelter beneath tables. But there was one man who struggled in the grasp of half-a-dozen waiters and guests, who succeeded in forcing him into a chair and wresting the smoking weapon from his hand. As our eyes met I felt my heart knock loudly at my ribs, for I knew him, and I saw that he knew me.

Unexpected and thrilling as the meeting was, much as he had changed since I last saw him in the uniform of a Spanish officer, I knew I was not mistaken. I had too much reason to remember his dark, cruel face.

Then, like a flash, I remembered something else, and I looked for his companion. There she sat, on the opposite side of his table, a blaze of red from head to foot—hat, dress, gloves, shoes—and her handsome, dark, impassive face looked out of its crimson setting with the seeming indifference of a sphinx. But the little red-gloved hand was clenched, and the little red-shod foot tapped the floor nervously.

I was almost stunned to see her here, in New York, and, above all, with him. But when I would have gone to her side I was forced back by the arrival of the police, and in another moment they had been hurried into a carriage and were driven rapidly away.

For some time no one was allowed to leave the café. The police were arresting witnesses. In virtue of my well-known position as a newspaper man (although I had been unattached since my return from Cuba, with shattered health) I was dismissed with a question.

"Do you know anything of this, Mr. Burton?" asked Sergeant Murphy.

"I saw the man fall. The other was behind me."

"Very good. You'll be on hand if you're wanted, of course. Too bad you're not on the Telephone now. There's a good story in this."

"Looks like it," said I, as I strolled carelessly over to where the victim lay, stretched upon two chairs.

I have said I was a reporter. I have the news instinct strongly developed, and having seen those others together, I had small doubt whose body lay upon the chairs.

As I elbowed my way through the

There was one man who struggled in the grasp of half-a-dozen waiters and guests.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

crowd of phlegmatic officers and excited spectators his face was before my eyes, his name upon my lips. And I was right. All that was mortal of Manuel Garcia lay before me.

Knowing what I did of the past history of these three Cubans, who had so tragically thrust themselves once more into my life, I formed, very readily, a general idea of the causes which led up to this crime, and, as I sauntered homeward through the brisk November air, my mind was busy with thoughts of them, particularly of Colonel José Muchado, whom I hated with an intense ardour worthy of his own fiery race.

The papers next morning fairly bristled with "scare heads," and all manner of theories were advanced. I longed to be again in the thick of it, but months of fever and a Cuban prison had made all that impossible for the time.

Strange to say, no one had actually seen the shot fired, the table at which Muchado sat being in a corner, and partially concealed by a large palm, which formed part of the café decoration.

The police had already established the identity of Garcia, who was known to be in New York organising a filibustering expedition for the relief of the Cuban insurgents. Out of the mass of conflicting statements and futile guesses, I gathered the few facts which were of interest to me. Colonel Muchado refused to talk, and Señorita Blanco, equally silent, was under respectful police surveillance at the home of her aunt, Señora Maria de Soto de Alvarado.

I decided to call upon the señorita forthwith. I wished to recall the memory of certain languorous, Cuban days; to state certain facts which were lying heavy upon my heart. Do not mistake me, I was not in love with Señorita Blanco. She was quite indifferent to me.

But I held Colonel Muchado beneath my heel, and—blame me if you will, when you have learnt all—I was about to crush him as I would a worm. I had not sought mine enemy. He had been delivered into my hands, and I would but mete out to him his just deserts.

I found the señorita, as I had hoped, alone, her aunt being prostrated by the shock of the tragedy. As I entered the room, the señorita, still clad in that striking, red costume, rose from her chair to greet me.

The excitement of the previous night was gone, and in its place she showed a lassitude no less becoming in one of her youth and beauty.

"So," she said, extending a small, white hand. "You have come. I hoped for this. You were in the café when—when——"

She paused and shuddered, ending faintly:

"You were in the café."

"It is because of that I am here, señorita," I answered. "I do not forget the old days at Las Cascas, nor the friendship of your father, whose memory I revere."

Tears filled her eyes, and her head drooped.

"So, you knew that he is dead?"

"I knew it, señorita."

There are those who, by virtue of certain acts of mine (trivial enough, as it seems to me), have called me brave. But as she raised her head there came into the eyes of this slight girl a look which I was glad to know was not for me. She was the personification of revenge as she stood there in a blaze of hate and beauty.

"Señor, he was murdered. Shot down in cold blood. Did they tell you that? Can you believe it? He, as kind as a mother, as gentle as a priest. Yet it is so, señor. He was murdered, but," and her voice fell to a whisper, "he is avenged."

It seemed a thousand pities to break down the weak fabric of her seeming vengeance. But I had sought her with a stern purpose, which I meant to fulfil. In the face, however, of her tragic triumph I could not find it in my heart to be abrupt.

"Is he avenged," I asked, "by last night's work?"

"How else?" she answered. "It was he, Garcia, who gave information to the Spaniards that my father was in secret sympathy with the patriots and spent his fortune for the cause of Cuba libre. It was he who caused my father's death. And why? Because he was refused my hand. In his anger he became a dastard and betrayed him. But he forgot me. He forgot——"

"Señorita," said I, interrupting her, "may I ask how you know it was Garcia who informed?"

"From Señor Muchado, who, though a Spanish officer, rode fifty miles through the night to warn my father. But he came too late. My people told me he wept with anger when he found the arrest already made, and in his wrath he let fall the name of Garcia. That was enough for me, and although Señor Muchado refused at first to tell me what he knew, why—I am a woman, señor, and he told me, you may be sure. It was from him I learnt that Señor Garcia had fled to New York, fearing the vengeance of my father's friends, who were many. Together we followed and—we found him."

"You will pardon the question from an old friend. Are you Señor Muchado's wife?"

She flushed hotly at my words, but she replied:

"That is yet to be. No man might call me wife while Garcia lived. But I am the affianced of Señor Muchado."

There was an embarrassed pause. It was evident she meant to tell me no more. It was now my turn to speak, but when I thought of how much anguish it would cost her, I had almost held my peace. But I could not see her enter the fool's paradise of an alliance with Muchado. I had that to say which must find voice, and I steeled myself for the ordeal.

"Señorita," I said, "your story is incomplete. There are details which should be filled in. If you will listen to me, I will supply them."

She was on the alert in an instant, as if she scented some danger.

"I do not understand you, señor," she said coldly.

"I will make myself plain," I went on; and what with pity for her, and the strain I was under to keep calm, my voice sounded hard and unsympathetic. "You are not possessed, señorita, of all the facts relating to your father's death, and pardon me, much that you believe is false."

That same dangerous look flashed into her eyes on the instant, and it became her well; so well, that I, knowing it must give place to more pitiful glances, could scarce proceed upon the task I had set myself to do. I paused a little to give her anger sway.

"You insult me, señor," she cried. "You insult Señor Muchado. I must beg you to leave the house."

"One moment, señorita. You can hardly believe I would be wantonly unkind to a woman in your unhappy position. By the memory of your father, I ask you to hear me. He would have desired it, I can assure you."

There was little enough of softening in her troubled face, but she made me a sign that I might proceed.

"It is a tragic story," I began, "and while I would not drag it out to unnecessary length, I will, if you please, touch upon some matters which are not new to you, but which lead up, with less unpleasant abruptness, to that which you do not know. I wish to soften——"

Digitized by Google

"Spare yourself, señor," she said. "I have borne much. I can bear even this forced communication. But no unnecessary details, if you please."

"When I was sent to Cuba by the Daily Telephone," I went on in my own way, for I knew better than she the shock she had to bear, "among my letters of introduction that to your father was considered of the greatest importance. By what secret agency I know not, his attitude was well-known to the paper. It was to Las Casas, therefore, that I at once proceeded, and it was there I made my headquarters for months. Your father, indeed all the household, were most kind to me, and when I fell ill of a fever, it was yourself, señorita, who nursed me."

She moved impatiently.

"It is not to compliment me that you force this interview upon me," she said.

"When you were called to Havana," I proceeded, unmoved, "by a note which afterwards proved to be false, I was so far recovered from my fever that I could move about the house. Your father was, at that time, in a state of great anxiety. Spanish spies were very active, denunciations frequent. He grew cautious, even to timidity—a weakness not strange in one of his age—and dangerous affiliations. Not knowing whom to trust even among his intimates, he trusted me, and from his lips I learnt much of the affairs both of his country and his family. It was in this way I learnt, señorita, of the two men who aspired to your hand—Manuel Garcia, patriot of patriots, and Colonel Muchado, of the Spanish force."

She fairly ground her teeth in anger, and plucked at the folds of her crimson gown.

"But in those troubled times, even love must wait on duty. Garcia, too well-known as an active insurgent to be desirable as an open friend, was bidden to wait until the liberation of the island. Muchado, with whose cruelties the country rang, and whose zeal for Spain outstripped the bounds of common humanity, was dismissed without hope of favour."

"I have heard enough, señor, I have heard enough!" cried the señorita, rising. "Why do you force upon me these criticisms of men, of whose qualities and motives you know nothing? Why do you torture me with useless reminiscence? Go! I beg—I command you, go!"

"Here me out, señorita. The tale will justify me in the end. Neither of these young suitors took his dismissal calmly. There were angry words with both, but your father was firm in this, gentle as was his nature, and his decision was final. So matters stood when you were lured to Havana, that you might not witness your father's arrest. They came upon us in the night, and we awoke to find the house surrounded, and, to give colour to a story of resistance, some of the servants were slain. Neither your father's age nor my sickness protected us from the inhumanity of these ruffians. Hurried from our rooms, half-dressed, our arms were pinioned, and we were forced to walk, with lariats about our necks, through the long night, and in the choking dust of our mounted captors.

"His name! The officer's name!" she demanded fiercely.

"In vain did your father demand the respect due to his years; in vain I announced my nationality and threatened the vengeance of the United States. We were driven forward with coarse jeers and brutal laughter, urged on by blows of lariats and the flat of swords. I will not dwell upon the horrors of that journey, but when, after three days of misery, we were thrown into prison, your father was prostrated under the weight of fatigue and insult, while I raved in the delirium of fever."

The señorita leant a little forward as I went on. I had begun to interest her.

"During the dreadful days that followed, penned in a stifling room with a score of other prisoners, ill-treated, ill-fed, insulted by ribald guards, your father tended me as a mother would have done. I can never forget his gentle ministration, his calm bearing under the worst indignities, his quiet courage and cheering hope.

"Upon a day when I had lain for hours in a kind of lethargy, a Spanish officer entered our filthy cell and approached your father, who had just risen from his knees beside my pallet. I saw the good man stiffen into a stern dignity of bearing, and heard his cold greeting of the smart newcomer. The latter, ordering the other prisoners to fall back to the limit of the crowded room, and judging no doubt from my appearance that the end was near, addressed your father in low tones, which were yet loud enough for me to hear each word.

Digitized by Google

"'I find you fallen upon evil times, Señor Blanco,' he said with a sneer. 'I must tell you, señor, the case is desperate. Information has been lodged. Information which smells of death. You are denounced as a traitor, Señor Blanco. Do you know the danger in which you stand?'

"'Señor,' replied your father, gravely, 'I am an old man. I can meet death with a smile. But these are ill words you give me. They are an insult alike to grey hairs and an honourable name.'

"'Caramba! my friend, you take it coolly. But it is this way. You see, I am something of a power here. Do not underestimate it. At my word you are free, or—you die. I would like you to choose quickly, for the odour of this cell offends me.'"

At this juncture the señorita sprang to her feet and confronted me.

"His name! The officer's name!" she demanded fiercely.

"Señorita, be calm. The officer was none other than Señor Muchado."

"You lie!" she cried. "You lie! What is the meaning of this trickery? Are you an agent of police? A spy upon my emotions? I will have you driven from the house."

Jove! what a crimson embodiment of fury was she now. Her red dress seemed but the outer sign and emblem of the fire within. She rushed to the door to order my ejectment, but I had my back against it in a twinkling and raised a warning hand.

"Señorita, I swear that I tell the truth. Hear me to the end. If you loved your father, hear me."

She paused at that, then fell to pacing the floor in a whirlwind of rage.

"Go on!" she cried. "I will hear you to the end. But I shall know if it be the truth you tell me. I will not be fed with lies."

"I thank you, señorita. I will waste no time. Your father wasted none on his decision.

"'Señor,' he answered, 'I will die in honour rather than live disgraced. You can offer me, I think, no terms which would not be too dear a price for my remaining fragment of life!'

"'You are a fool,' cried the other roughly. 'Your honour is but a thing of straw, easily fired, soon destroyed. I do not ask of you the worthless secrets of your ragged following. You may well be honoured by my terms. Give me Isabel and you may go to your home and to your futile plots. If not, I shall order the firing-squad for six o'clock to-morrow morning.'

"Your father was not shaken by these threats.

"'My daughter,' he said, 'is not for sale, even at the price of life, nor would I be party to any agreement which should bind her to one who has shown himself a scoundrel.'

"Muchado, in a white heat of rage, menaced the old man with his clenched fist.

"'I will give you,' he cried, 'until to-morrow at six.'

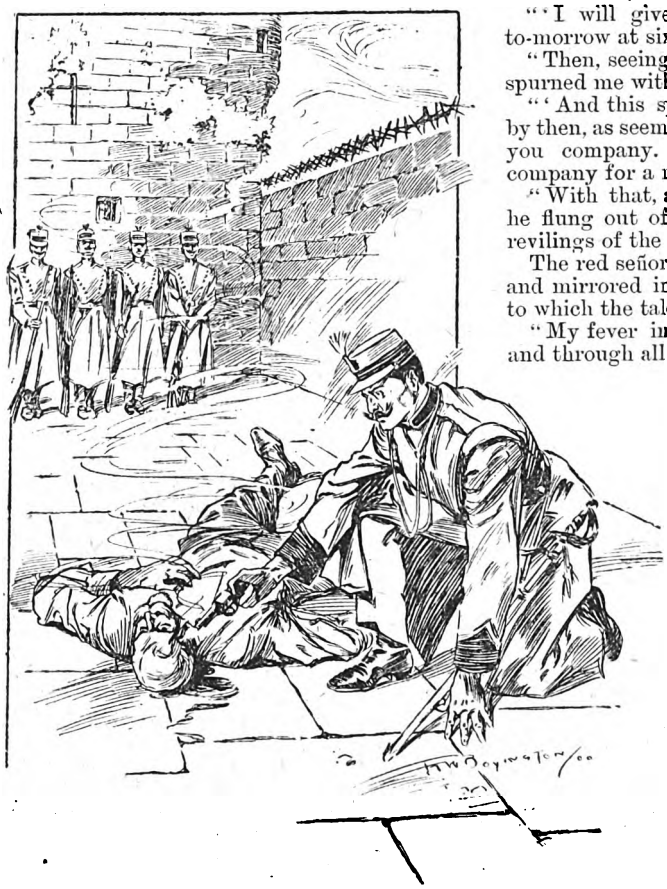
"Then, seeing that I watched him, he spurned me with his foot, saying:

"'And this spy, if he be not carrion by then, as seems most likely, shall keep you company. A Gringo dog is fit company for a renegade ass.'

"With that, and a mouthful of oaths he flung out of the room, amid the revilings of the prisoners."

The red señorita hung upon my words and mirrored in her face every emotion to which the tale gave rise.

"My fever increased with the night, and through all the long, sad hours your father never left my side. Never have I seen such strength of character. Forgetful of himself, he tried to ease what were not unlikely to have proved my last moments. For myself I was too weak to care what happened, and when day broke I lay barely conscious of life. True to his word Colonel Muchado entered the cell a little before six. What was said I could not hear, but suddenly I was dragged roughly from my pallet, only to fall limp and inert upon the floor. Aroused to consciousness by the rough handling I had received, I was aware of your father speaking with grave distinctness.



"He placed his pistol close to that grey head and fired."

"'I have nothing more to say, señor. You have my answer.'

"'To the yard then. We will soon end this folly. As for the Gringo, let him die as he lies. He is not worth a bullet.'

"I heard the tramp of the departing guard, the rattle of their accoutrements, the clang of the cell door. Then, after what seemed an interminable time, there came through the grated window the tramp of those marching feet, the thud of rifle butts upon the pavement, the sound of orders sharply given. By a supreme effort of the will I turned upon my hands and knees, and crept towards the window, which, as I knew, overlooked the prison yard. But the window was high and I could not rise to my feet.

Digitized by Google

"My fellow prisoners were, moreover, crowding about the grating and struggling for a sight of the tragedy without. But, noticing my futile efforts, they drew back, ashamed of their idle curiosity in the face of one whose close connection with the sorrows of that grand old man, gave him rights above their own. Two of them raised me to my feet and supported me while I looked out through the grated slit, nor did the others seek to disturb me, being touched, I doubt not, by my weakness and the cruelty of the deed at which I gazed."

The señorita sat, a huddled mass of red drapery, from which her dark eyes stared, fixed and tearless.

"The firing party stood beneath the window, so near that I could almost have put forth a hand and touched them. Over against the dead wall at the other side of the yard your father faced them, erect and fearless, with bared head and shirt thrown open at the breast—a gallant sight, señorita. I shall see it while I live. Between the soldiers and their victim, Colonel Muchado paced to and fro, white as the plume of his shako. He held his watch in his hand and glanced at it nervously and often. Your father stood like a rock, in sharp contrast to the other's feverish mood.

"'You have two minutes more, señor,' Muchado called out sternly.

"Your father disdained to answer, but catching sight of my pale face behind the bars he smiled and waved his hand. Muchado did not look up. His agitation was intense. The tiger and the cur fought within him. Again he called:

"'One minute more.'

"Still no answer. Only a moving of the lips in prayer. That last terrible minute seemed an age, but at length the colonel spoke again:

"'The time is up, Señor Blanco. Do you still refuse? Then here you die, a traitor to your country and your sovereign.'

"Following this came the short, sharp words of command, and as the order 'Fire!' fell from Muchado's lips the levelled rifles cracked and a brave man met ignoble death. While the smoke yet hung heavily in the yard Muchado walked over to the prostrate form. Whether he saw some sign of life I cannot say, but he placed his pistol close to that grey head and fired. Then with a braggart's oath, cried out:

"'So perish all the enemies of Spain!'

"I saw no more. The strain had been too great, and I fell back into the arms of my fellow-prisoners, unconscious."

The señorita, no longer an incarnate vengeance, cowered, weeping, in her chair. I went to her and touched her gently on the shoulder.

"Señorita," I said, "you once accepted the unsupported word of Colonel José Muchado in a matter of life and death. I do not ask you to accept mine on those terms. Some time during his last sad night on earth your father found means to write this brief statement, this last farewell, hoping that by some means it might come at last into your hands. Had I died, my fellow-prisoners were sworn to see it delivered, if fate permitted.

"But when, through the influence of the American consul I was set free, I bore the letter in my breast. Too ill to remain in Cuba I came to the United States, resolved to seek you again, when my health should be restored. Having found you here I have nothing left to do but give you this little scrap of paper on which are written your father's last words."

She took the paper mechanically, but did not open it.

"You have given me a cruel blow, señor," she said, "but I thank you. It is better so. I cannot but believe you, and I will not insult your honour by reading this paper before I tell you so. I beg of you to leave me now. I wish to be alone."

And so I left her, nor did I ever see her again, save once, and then not face to face. Receiving an offer from the Telephone to serve as special correspondent at Queen Victoria's Golden Jubilee, and the police considering my testimony in the Garcia murder case as of no importance, I accepted, in the hope that new scenes might expedite my cure.

After completing this assignment I made a tour of the continent, and at Madrid made one of the crowd that gathered to witness the return of General Weyler.

As I stood in the street among the throng, a carriage drove briskly by, and in it I caught one glimpse of a face I could never forget. It was Señorita Blanco, the wreck of her former self, clad now in deepest black, and with all the old fire departed from her face. It made me inexpressibly sad, for I knew, as no one else could know, the fire that still burned within.

When I returned to New York, Muchado had paid the penalty which the law exacts from murderers. Into the details of his trial, in which Señorita Blanco was the chief incriminating witness, I shall not enter. That he was a murderer my own eyes had shown me.

Not, let me confess it, in that New York café, but in that earlier time when he had done to death that gallant gentleman, Señor Juan Blanco. Of the murder of Garcia he was innocent, but the silence of two persons sent him to the gallows. Señorita Blanco and I sat in judgment upon him, and rendered the silent verdict, "Death."

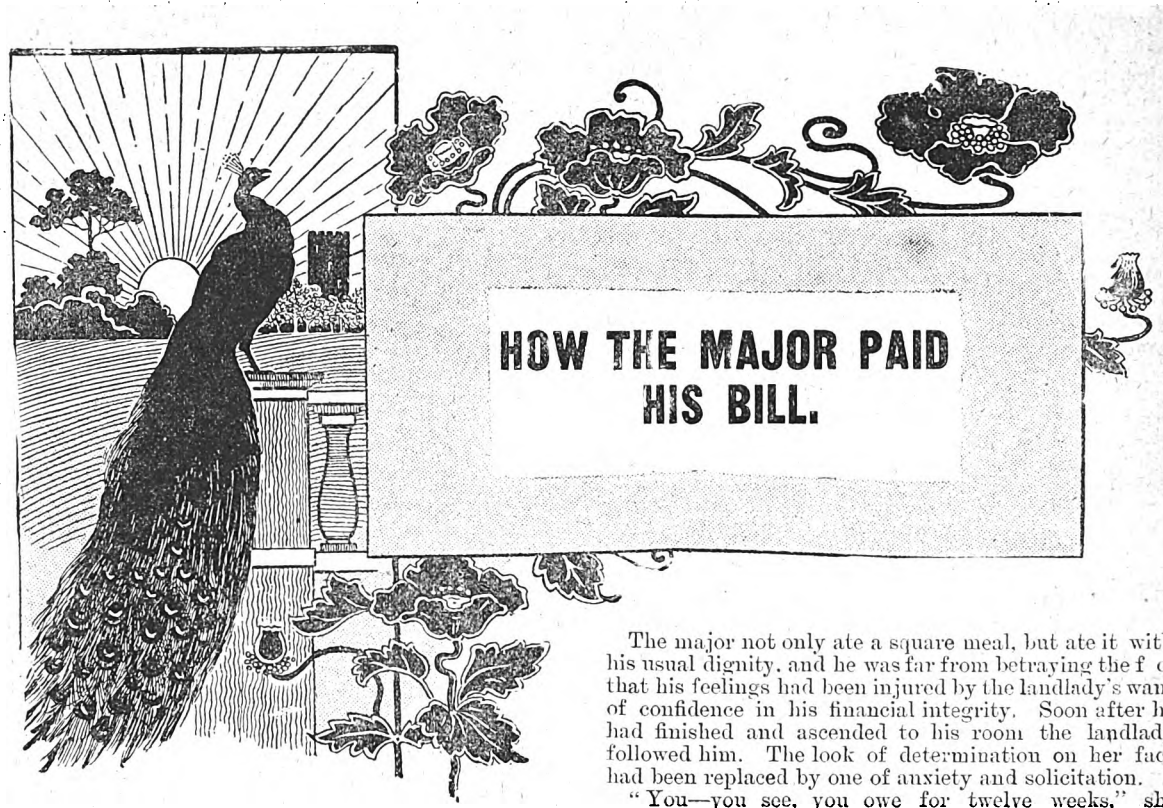
For the voice that cried out in the café, "Sit still," was addressed, not to me, but to the Señorita Blanco, and the hand which was thrust over my shoulder for the fatal shot was small and feminine, and trimly gloved in red.

FREDERIC L. WHEELER.

Mr. Bowser has suddenly decided to complete the holiday which came to such an untimely end when he took a house in the country.

WATCH FOR HIS RETURN.

Digitized by Google



HOW THE MAJOR PAID HIS BILL.

When Major Crofoot reached his boarding-house the other evening there were surface indications of trouble. There was a policeman hanging about the front steps; the major's trunk was down in the front hall; several boarders were lounging about with expectant looks, and the landlady had evidently made up her mind to do or die.

It took the major just thirty seconds to realise the situation. The landlady was about to address him when he held up his hand to interrupt her and blandly observed:

"My dear Mrs. Roberts, I have a favour to ask."

"It won't do no good to talk to me," she replied.

"Will you do me the favour to hand me a statement of my indebtedness? I believe I owe you for five or six weeks' board. If not too much trouble——"

"You owe for twelve weeks, and it won't do any good to talk."

"If not too much trouble," continued the major with dignity, "I should like a statement. It may be twelve weeks, as you say. I pay but little attention to these trifles. Indeed, you may make it out for twelve weeks, and then I will draw you a cheque for the amount. I have been very busy, as you know, and if I have caused you any inconvenience I am sorry for it."

"You—you will pay," gasped the landlady, as she stood and stared at him.

"Should you want three months in advance you can have it as well. So long as I'm drawing a cheque I might as well make it for £40 or £50 as £10 or £20. It might be well, while I am eating my dinner, for you to return my trunk to my room and give the policeman a hint to move on. Come to my room half-an-hour hence"

The major not only ate a square meal, but ate it with his usual dignity, and he was far from betraying the fact that his feelings had been injured by the landlady's want of confidence in his financial integrity. Soon after he had finished and ascended to his room the landlady followed him. The look of determination on her face had been replaced by one of anxiety and solicitation.

"You—you see, you owe for twelve weeks," she explained as she handed him the bill.

"Exactly—I see," he replied, as he received it. "Twelve weeks at thirty shillings a week is £18. Sorry if you have been inconvenienced. Don't you want £30?"

"Oh, major. I am sorry if I hurt your feelings," she protested.

"I must say that my feelings have been lacerated to an extent, but I am to blame for it. I will write you a cheque for £18. Should you want a loan during the month—£50, £100, £200—please let me know. There you are, my dear woman—there you are. It is your due, and I am glad to hand it to you, but I must confess that your want of confidence in my financial integrity is something of a shock to me. One should pay for his room and board of course, but where one is originating, evolving, promoting, and organising to the extent of millions——"

"I know, major—I know," interrupted the landlady, "but I'm no business woman. I couldn't tell about your schemes. You took me in on two of them, and I was to make millions, but I haven't seen a shilling yet."

"But you didn't secure any stock. You delayed until it was too late. I gave you first chance, but you didn't come to time."

"Was that it?" she asked, as she nervously played with the cheque. "I asked some of the boarders about it, and they said your schemes were all wind."

The major looked at her in a pitying way for a couple of minutes, and then got up and walked to and fro for a time before he said:

"My dear woman, you have common sense. If you hadn't you couldn't run a boarding-house. You must let common sense guide you in all things. On two occasions, owing to your confidence in my financial integrity, I have tried to make you a millionaire. Your timidity has been the stumbling block. Let me present you a few facts. You have heard of Egypt, of course?"

Digitized by Google

"I—I think I have," she faltered.

"One of the oldest countries on earth. In connection with Egypt you must have heard of mummies?"

"Yes."

"Very well. Egyptian kings, queens, princes and great men and women were dying ten thousand years ago. Their bodies were preserved in spices. To-day they are simply relics—souvenirs—curiosities. Every museum must have its mummies. Same with all side shows and private collectors. If mummies were easier to be got and cheaper in price, almost every family would have one in place of a piano. Do I make myself plain?"

"Yes."

"You have a piano here, for instance. It is tuned about once in fifteen years. You have fourteen boarders. Every evening they gather to hear someone drum on the old tin pan. If you had a £5 mummy in the parlour don't you see how much more educational and entertaining it would be? No drumming—no squalling—no complaints to the police, but the fourteen would gather round the mummy while someone reads Egyptian history.

"You must follow me—you can't help but follow me. Can't you realise that if every public school had its mummy the general interest would be enhanced a hundred per cent.? Can't you understand that if a restaurant had a mummy on exhibition, it would beat any sort of music or free lunch?"

"Yes—but—but——"

"Then there is nothing more to say. The demand for mummies is firm and steady. There is always a scarcity in the market. They are simply picked up here and there in Egypt, with nothing like system in buying and selling. To-day—this evening—now, we organise: 'The Mammoth Mummy Export Company.' We capitalise at £500,000. We make a business of buying and selling mummies. We deal only in the genuine article, and we tackle nothing which hasn't been dead at least 10,000 years. Every mummy warranted to have been of royal blood. No common people bought or sold. We buy for £2 apiece and sell for £20. There's a profit of £18 on every one handled, and we'll handle 100,000 per year easily. Do you want anything better than that?"

"It seems all right," doubtfully replied the landlady, "but——"

"And there you are, and there you are," replied the major, as he reached for the cheque. "I have paid you my bill; you turn round and use this cheque to secure £10,000 of stock at low figures. Dividends will go up 100 per cent. at the very least, and if I can work you in as secretary I'll do it. Woman, permit me to congratulate you. To-morrow you can go and order your first bushel of diamonds."

"But you've taken the cheque away from me!" she protested.

"Certainly. You must protect your stock or it can't be held for you. It must be plain to you; it can't help but be plain. We incorporate to-morrow, and the certificates will be ready in two weeks. Meanwhile read up on mummies, as we may decide to send you to Egypt to do the buying. You've got to be posted up, or those fellows over there will work off ordinary mummies on you for kings and queens. My dear woman——"

"But, major, I don't——"

"But you do—you must—you can't help it, and now as I shall be busy the rest of the evening I'll say good-night and go to work. Not a word—not a word. You have my influence behind you, and all will be right and again I congratulate you and ask your pardon for overlooking my little indebtedness. Going? Gone? But keep quiet about it—keep quiet."

"Major Crofoot, I—I——"

But the major was on the other side of the door and the door was locked.

C. B. Lewis.

SECOND LARGE EDITION.

"BESIEGED WITH B.-P."

A complete record of the Siege of Mafeking.

By J. EMERSON NEILLY.

War Correspondent of the "Pall Mall Gazette" in Mafeking.

Crown 8vo, Price 1s. net.
Post Free, 1s. 3d.

"Mr. Neilly tells admirably the thrilling story of the siege."—Scotsman.

"As a realistic picture of how things actually happen, no less than a worthy record of one of the most splendid incidents of our history, 'Besieged with B.-P.' is a notable book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

At all Railway Bookstalls and Booksellers.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

NOW ON SALE.

No. 6 of

"The Curiosity Shop."

The Illustrated Companion to "PEARSON'S WEEKLY."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP contains: Absolutely new and fresh articles. Bright and originally-conceived pictures. Strong and well-seasoned fiction. Nothing that you can get anywhere else.

Unlike all other curiosity shops, the contents of this one are changed every week, and you can buy every article and picture in the shop for one penny.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIES.

THE ADVENTURES OF THREE ACTORS.

I.—A Night at the Booth.

HALKETT, Boddreys, and myself were temporarily engaged in that interesting occupation, "The inspection of pavements and public buildings," in other words we were "out of a shop," dragging through the ofttimes tedious weeks between one engagement and another.

"What shall we do to-night?" asked Boddreys.

"Oh, stand on our heads and sing 'God save the Queen,' anything for a change from this monotony," said Halkett.

At the end of our summer tour we found ourselves near the pretty town of Kanisborough; in preference to going down to London, parading the Strand and helping to support the Bodega, Marble Halls, and other liquid institutions, we decided, as we had fixed our autumn tour, to spend our four weeks' in what vacation Halkett called "sylvan and rural rusticity."

In a fortnight we had done everything. Fished and bathed in the river, rowed on the canal, walked and bicycled in every possible direction for miles round. The evenings hung heavily, there was nowhere to go to, and evening was just the time we began to look for the accustomed excitement and get restless.

"Call in the landlady and ask her where the nearest theatre is; if it's fifty miles away I'll ride to it," said I.

The worthy dame came in at Boddrey's call, rubbed her nose with her apron, sniffed loudly, stuck her fat arms akimbo and said:

"Well, young gentlemen, and what do you want?"

"We want to know where's the nearest theatre, hall, or schoolroom, where any kind of entertainment is being held from Shakespeare down to a penny concert or a temperance lecture," said Halkett.

"Or a magic lantern show will do."

"Or a Pepper's Ghost show," I chimed in.

"You won't get nothing o' that sort about here," said she.

We all groaned in chorus.

"There's not no theatre nearer nor Northampton, where you come from to me, and I don't know as it's hopen this 'ere 'ot weather, leastways, my sister, as you've been staying with there, says it often isn't, this 'ere 'ot weather."

We groaned again.

"Not even a concert, or a lantern entertainment?" asked Halkett again.

"Not as I knows on, Mr. Halkett," she replied, "but I 'ave heard as 'ow a booth 'as set up at Great Kanis, three miles away."

"A booth," we all shouted together, "why didn't you tell us so at once?" added Boddreys.

"Well, you see sir, you didn't ask me. You didn't say nothing about a booth, now did you?"

We owned we didn't to get rid of her, and bundled her out of the room with a blessing, and started at once.

It was a delightful walk to Great Kanis across the fields, but I fear we did not thoroughly appreciate the cool and calm hush of the evening, the song of the birds, the babble of the brook, and the fragrance and gay colours of the many flowers.

Just then we had a severe attack of footlight fever and would have exchanged it all for the artificial splendours of the front of a theatre.

At the door of the wooden portable we espied the bibulous-looking acting-manager yelling:

"This way to the reserved seats."

He recognised us as brothers in affliction, or as he termed it, "members of his perfession," and gave us three reserved seats at threepence per head.

There was no mistaking the artiste in him. Grease paint strayed all over his face in small patches, taking up permanent abode in odd corners.

He was palpably dressed in his "props," which consisted of a pair of tight white trousers of some forty years ago fashion, a double-breasted coloured waistcoat, which might possess some fifteen years, and a light alpaca frock coaching coat, which might date back perhaps fifty or sixty years.

These were surmounted by a white beaver hat; and we must not forget the huge, coloured tie, the bows of which stuck out like two ears. A comical figure he looked, but what cared he, he was there to attract attention and lure the yokels to part with their coppers.

He had the air of a man who knew his intrinsic value to a nicety and that assurance histrionic experience so often begets.

We took him over the way to the "Red Lion" after the first act (he had already been killed once, and was not to be slain again until the third act) and there he told us how many times he had played Richard III., his favourite part, Hamlet and Macbeth, and what a huge success he had been in several places we had never heard of.

Digitized by Google

I think they must have been in the Rhondda Valley, or somewhere in Wales by the sound of their names, but we were duly impressed, and he, in consequence, was very pleased and very thirsty.

We took our seats in the building and sat listening to the orchestra, which consisted of a harmonium and a cornet—not a bad mixture, by the way, if your nervous system is in fairly good order.

We had not been there long when up bustled the fat proprietress of the building and manageress of the company, who had been taking money at the penny and twopenny doors.

She leant over the rows of chairs immediately in front of us and peering closely into our faces, said in a voice loud enough to be heard all over the theatre:

"You be 'pros,' ain't you?"

We admitted the soft impeachment.

"I don't take no money from 'pros,'" said she, "you is as free to come in here, as you is to go into the best theatres in the kingdom. My acting manager had no right to take your money. There's your threepence. there's yours, and there's yours," and she dumped our coppers back into our hands. We protested, but she answered:

"You can stand me a drink afterwards, if you like, but I shall always be pleased to welcome you here as often as you like to come."

So much for those worthy people.

"The play's the thing——" and what we came to see.

The title of the play was The Wooden-legged Murderer, and the plot revolved round a double-dyed villain, who in common with scoundrels generally, possessed two legs, only in this case one was made of wood. This wooden leg was hollow, and in the cavity was secreted a small rifle. All who thwarted the old vil ain's wicked designs and those whom he imagined he hated, fell victims to this unique firearm, or rather fire-leg. A reason for slaughter, however, was not always necessary, he liked it presumably because it was exciting and his nature to do so.

It was a thrilling moment when the first murder occurred. A rich man sits in his beautiful mansion (its beauties we had to imagine) talking to himself about his enormous wealth—as rich men always do in melodramas—when he is startled by someone with a dot-and-go-one tread, making off with that £40,000 in notes and gold he has left in the bureau in the next room. The thief passes through the room and is making for the French windows to get away. The rich man being brave as well as wealthy, attacks him and drags him down the stage. Then a fearful struggle ensues. Finally, however, the plutocrat is thrown down in one corner and off hobbles the villain as quickly as his wooden leg will allow him, but he hardly reaches the window when his antagonist rise to follow him.

It is a supreme moment, for up goes the wooden leg, the trigger is pulled in the trouser pocket and the first victim falls.

Two servants, hearing the noise, enter the room hurriedly and also fall victims to the fatal leg. Three deaths being a fair number for the first act, the curtain comes down on a dramatic exit by the villain.

In the second act we have detectives and policemen galore.

The villain shoots a detective in this act, and the deed is scarce done when two policemen rush on from either side and collar him simultaneously. After thoroughly searching him—this is a comedy scene, for policeman No. 476 is a comedian—and finding no weapon upon him they think it as well to arrest him on suspicion.

However, they relinquish this idea upon the old man telling them that it was the hero who did the deed, which, of course, they immediately believe, knowing the young man in question to be a most exemplary person of most gentle habits.

They proceed to trot after the hero, bearing the corpse between them (so like policemen who are in a hurry), when Bobbie No. 476 drops his half of the dead man (a laugh here) and declares he has an idea. No. 674 seems surprised at this and warns him not to hurt the defunct with his mental activity.

At which 476 becomes alarmed and anxiously questions his comrade as to the possibility of killing a "dead man twice." Whereupon 674, sitting on the corpse's chest, tells him how his dead grandmother drank a bottle of whiskey the night after she died—at least the bottle was empty in the morning, and there was a strong smell of spirits in the room. It would be hard, indeed, if a little fun could not be had at the expense of corpses, seeing that there are so many in the piece.

No. 476's idea, which he finally heroically delivers to the gods, is to the effect that he cannot believe the hero to be guilty because he knew him as a youngster in petticoats, toddling at his mother's side. The value this evidence of his innocence has, would of course be incalculable in a court of law.

The third act is ushered in with yet more murders, the list by this time has become simply appalling. We have noticed that several unmistakable persons are dying twice and thrice over. (Who will say the dead return not?) In fact one man amuses us considerably by falling every time like a tin soldier. An effective stop is put to this, however, by the villain at last being accused and arrested. The circumstances which lead to his apprehension are these:

A man is found shot, quite dead as usual, but this time with his eyes wide open. It occurs to one bright detective that if they scoop out the eye of the murdered man, the picture of the murderer will be found upon the re ina. Nor are th y wrong, for they all upon examination of the eye declare they see there a portrait of the wooden-legged man with his leg lifted.

The next act opens with a court scene.

After the comedy man had set the whole court by the ears with his overpowering wit, made rude remarks to the judge about his appearance, wife, family, and other personal matters, the turn of the villain comes to appear in the dock.

The dock is placed immediately on the judge's left, so near that judge and prisoner could shake hands if they were so minded.

Upon the left of the desk stands a glass of water containing the accusing eye.

The examination proceeds quietly for some time until the comedian, no longer able to repress himself, rushes into the dock, turns the villain out and addresses the judge and court:

"Shure, sir, it's a whole pack of lies he's afther telling ye, so that he can bring our poor, innocent boy, Master Harry there, to the gallows. But don't be afther taking any notice of the spalpeen, Misther Judge."

"Constable, remove this witness," commanded the judge sternly.

"Ah, there's a dear kind gintleman, sure ye haven't

Digitized by Google

the heart to turn me out of this nice, comfortable cow stall."

"Stand down, sir, immediately," shouted the judge.

"Shure, Mr. Judge, I niver learnt how to sthand down, I only learnt how to sthand up. But I'll sit down to plase ye, and that by your own illigant self," and he climbed over the dock, and sat himself down beside his lordship.

"How dare you, sir; leave me immediately," said the judge, now hoarse with rage.

"I'll niver lave ye, sir. I'll sthay wid yez for the rest av me life and one year longer if ye loike and there's me hand on it, and ye're a fine, handsome, kind-hearted jewel of a gintleman yez are."

The judge thrust the proffered hand away and called again to the constable to remove him, whereupon the comedian and the policeman struggled lustily.

"Oh, you dirty, ugly divil, wid a heart as hard as a sthone," shouted the comedian to the judge as he was being dragged away. "Shure, I would as soon talk to the divil himself as to yourself. Oh, I'll bate the face off yez. Let me get at him."

He struggled free again and made a dash for the judge, who beat him off with bundles of legal documents. The police soon had him again, but not before the glass of water containing the eye had been knocked over. The audience enjoyed this horse-play comedy hugely, and still louder did they laugh when the whole court, police and witnesses, went down on their hands and knees to look for the lost eye. But they did not think to search the villain, who had been very busy during the comedy scene.

"My lord," said the clerk of the court, "the eye is lost."

"It was the only conclusive evidence we possessed," said the judge, "and much as I believe him to be guilty I must declare the prisoner a free man."

"No, not free, for I have the other eye."

It was the detective who spoke. He entered in the nick of time, holding aloft in his hand another glass of water containing the other eye. The audience applauded loudly, the villain cursed and scowled, and those on the stage rejoiced exceedingly and were glad.

The examination of the prisoner continued and, notwithstanding the still irrepressible comedian, finally worked up to this point.

Said the prisoner, seizing the glass containing the eye from off the judge's table:

"So this is the only evidence you have against me?"

"And such overwhelming evidence that it will doom you to the criminal's death you so richly deserve," replied the judge amid applause.

With a loving glance at the liquid as heheld it against the light, admiring it as he might a glass of old and rare wine, the prisoner uttered these words:

"Then this is how I dispose of it," and suiting the action to the words he swallowed the water and eye in one dramatic gulp.

The court was dumfounded, the case dismissed, and the prisoner discharged there and then, looking none the worse for his impromptu lunch.

The next and last act concerned itself with the triumph of virtue and confusion to the wicked ones, especially to the wooden-legged villain. His end was sudden.

He was at his old tricks again, and was about to aim his wooden leg at the hero, escape for whom seemed impossible, when something goes wrong with the rifle; it bursts, there is a fiss of red fire, a loud explosion, and the old villain disappears over the bridge, blown to little pieces, at least so the hero told us. We take his word for it. So ended the drama of "The Wooden-Legged Murderer."

We were very silent as we went home across the fields in the moonlight. I think we better appreciated the charms of the walk or perhaps we were listening to the little white throat singing his night song in the hedgerow.

Be that as it may, one thing was certain, we were completely cured of our footlight fever for quite a week.

Douglas Vigors.

[Next week: A Panto-Sidelight.]

Digitized by Google

THE LOVE OF LENORE.

In the shady garden of an old-fashioned, shabby-genteel-looking house not far from the cathedral town of Wilchester, a girl was making remarkably good revolver practice. A curious pastime for one of her age and sex, but Lenore Stanley had passed the first seventeen years of her life in New Zealand, her father having been a professor at the university of Dunedin.

He had taught her to shoot and had brought her up on lines of his own.

"That's all right, I think," she said to herself after breaking her third ginger-beer bottle in succession. "My hand has not lost its cunning. I wonder where he is? He surely won't fail me again to-night!"

The girl's dark eyes, inherited from her Italian mother, flashed with a dangerous light and her mobile lips worked with a mutinous expression.

"If I thought he was with her!" she muttered between her little white teeth, "I would——" and her fingers closed convulsively on the miniature weapon in her hand. She threw herself down in a deck chair and thought—not pleasant thoughts, not altogether fair thoughts—for when was jealousy ever just?

Life had been hard for Lenore since her father's death which had occurred soon after their arrival in the old country three years ago. She was then left with no near relations and few friends, with forty pounds a year and an education that compared favourably with that of any Newnham or Girton graduate,

She was teaching history and literature at a ladies' college in Wilchester and was spending her holidays in rooms within reach of Harold Courtenay, her lover and the light of her lonely heart.

Last night he had disappointed her and to work off her restlessness she had brought out the little revolver which her father had given her to carry on their long rides up country in Maori-land. At last her quick ear caught the whizz of cycle wheels. She knew it was Harold and half rose from her chair in expectation.

"At last I escaped!" he said, bending down and taking Lenore's hand in his. "The mater had a tennis party and I was on duty. I only got away by offering to ride home with Kathleen Bryce."

"No wonder you are late! It was hardly worth your while to come. Were you taking her home last night, too?"

"No, she was taking me. At least, we went over to their place and she drove us home in her cart. It was a ripping night for a spin. I only wished it had been you, little one."

Lenore's lip curled and she brought her brows a trifle closer together.

"Such an afterthought as that was not worth keeping for twenty-four hours," she retorted. "There is a far cry from Miss Bryce, the aristocratic belle of Wilchester, to an unknown school-teacher who is not in any 'set' and can only be recognised as a mere acquaintance when Society's eye is upon us."

"A far cry indeed, like ginger-beer to champagne! The one easy to get, and cheap and nasty when you've got it, the other stored out of sight like a priceless treasure," said Harold throwing himself on the grass at her side and taking possession of her other hand.

Something touched her sense of humour and she laughed. It was no use trying to be angry with Harold.

"What a brilliant attempt to idealise a very prosaic smile! But I must be the ginger-beer, cheap and easy to get. Governesses have long been a drug in the market, while Miss Bryce——"

"Oh, shut up, there's a dear girl! I didn't come to talk about that dressed-up doll. I came to be with you, to have you all to myself. Hullo! What in the world's this! A dainty thing, too!"

He had put his hand upon the revolver which Lenore had dropped on the grass when she heard him coming. She now made a quick movement to possess herself of the weapon and in the scuffle the remaining loaded chamber went off. In an agony of terror she saw the blood stains on her lover's white coat sleeve and ran to the house for help.

Her landlady came running out and they soon found that the injury was of a slight nature, merely a flesh wound below the elbow.

Lenore bathed and bandaged it with loving care, and in those few minutes Harold Courtenay saw what a wealth of love was his. Hitherto his advances had been met with a tantalising reserve, and now in the deepening evening shades she atoned for her past unresponsiveness by a tenderness that was new and bewilderingly sweet.

"It was all my fault, and I would not have hurt you for worlds!" she whispered, trembling in spite of herself.

"My darling, it was the best thing that could have happened to me. Supposing you had got the bullet instead of me! That would have been too horrible," he said, drawing her to im with his uninjured arm. "It is worth far more than this scratch to have you like this," and he kissed her quivering lips till the smiles had returned to her eyes.

The course of their love made great strides after this. Harold found Lenore more and more enthralling. She was full of the winning grace of a woman who loves and knows she is loved in return; no longer tormented by jealousy she gave rein to the warm, loving nature that had so long been stifled within her. The summer days sped by in uncounted joys.

With the end of the holidays came the inevitable return to work and the realms of conventionality. Lenore pulled herself together with mingled feelings. She felt she could not go on living at the high emotional pressure of the past fortnight without letting the work suffer by which she made her way in the world, and so far the lovers had only talked of love, there had been no question of marriage. Harold had surrendered himself to the charm of her society with the readiness of his pleasure-loving nature, but he was not yet prepared to face parental displeasure by marrying in opposition to his father's wishes. Mr. Courtenay senior had made his money quickly, the coat of arms was of recent purchase and Harold was to marry a wife whose lineage should be even longer than the parental purse. The young man was in no hurry to fetter himself, his main ambition was to make a name in the world of sport.

He had started a small racing stud and was training as a gentleman jockey, with the full consent of Mr. Courtenay, who grudged no expense so long as his son's hobbies threw him into smart society.

Harold was somewhat relieved when Lenore propounded the return to practical life, yet, manlike, the first time they met in Wilchester and she kept her side of the bargain, he was ready to throw prudence to the winds for the sake of a kiss or a caress.

Digitized by Google

Lenore lived with one of the other teachers at the College and was pretty free to come and go as she pleased, so through the glorious autumn weather, Saturday afternoon found her and Harold taking long country walks or revelling in the seclusion of the garden where the accident had occurred.

Kathleen Bryce of Brydon Court, upon whom Mr. Courtenay had fixed as his future daughter-in-law, was considerably mystified and not a little piqued at Harold's frequent refusals to join her bicycle and tennis parties. She began to suspect the existence of a rival and set her wits to work to discover the truth.

She had a young cousin at the College, upon whose love of romance she worked successfully till she had unravelled the threads of the mystery. On a fine October afternoon she decided to make practical application of the knowledge she had gained.

Mounting her cycle she rode slowly along the road leading to Needham station, which she believed to be the usual trysting-place of the lovers. Presently she saw Harold Courtenay bowling along on his machine. She dismounted and began to get out her pump.

"Good afternoon!" he called out, making as though he would go on.

"Oh, Mr. Courtenay, would you mind helping me? I can't pump up this tyre."

She looked very pretty and there was no help for it. But even Harold's good nature was not proof against a suppressed "Confound it!"

He soon pumped the tyre up and was wondering how he should give her the slip, when she sprang into the saddle, saying:

"It's such a glorious day for a ride. I'm going to Needham to get some blackberry trails for my snuggery. I love the red and brown tints, and the wood is carpeted with them just now."

He reviled his fate and sought in vain for a way of escape. He could not ride to Needham with Kathleen when Lenore was waiting there for him, nor could he break faith by persuading Kathleen to go elsewhere. He racked his brains in vain and quickened his pace in the hope of his companion giving in.

But Miss Bryce was not thus to be shaken off. She felt she was on the right track and kept up the speed manfully for a good spurt. Then she told him laughingly that she was afraid he wanted to get rid of her. He stammered an apology and resigned himself to his fate, hoping that some happy chance might keep Kathleen and Lenore apart.

Miss Bryce noted his embarrassment and sought to distract him by her most approved wiles. She was a very lively companion and he had regained something of his good humour when they reached the station, beyond which lay the woods.

"I just want to see a man about a horse," said Harold, dismounting, "so I'll say good-bye. I hope you'll find the blackberry trails all right."

"I'm not in hurry. I'll wait till you've seen your man and then you can help me pick the trails. It will be much more fun if there are two of us."

He hurried on to the platform and looked eagerly for Lenore. There was not a trace of her to be seen. She had evidently missed the train. Thank the kind Fates, the storm was averted!

He was quite his usual, sunny self when he came back to where Kathleen was waiting for him. They had a very good time in the woods, and any occasional qualms as to Lenore's whereabouts were soon dissipated by the bright sallies and ready repartee of his companion.

She had dressed herself with studied simplicity for this woodland ramble, and Harold came to the conclusion that he had never seen her look so nice or found her so free from affectation.

"Oh, I must have that spray!" she exclaimed, darting from his side into a tangled glen below where they were standing. The next moment she lay moaning among the bracken, unable to move.

"I can't walk, it's my knee," she said piteously to Harold who had promptly gone to pick her up.

"By jove! That's bad! Then I must carry you, if you don't mind. Tell me if I hurt you. Is that all right?" he asked kindly as he raised her in his arms.

"Yes, quite. You've not hurt me much," she answered with a pretty show of patient resignation, at the same time putting her arms round his neck and settling down with a sigh of content which he took to be pain.

Lenore had started directly after school taking some lunch with her so as to make the most of the glorious weather. She had gone to a cottage near Needham station to get some milk and out of sheer lightheartedness had decided to watch Harold's arrival and let him have a little hunt for her.

When she saw him ride up with Kathleen Bryce a perfect tumult of perplexing emotions possessed her. Every solution of the problem except the right one suggested itself to her in rapid succession. Conquering her first impulse to make her presence known she resolved to watch the game from her coign of vantage, and as she did so many a chance remark she had heard lately in College about the coming engagement of Miss Bryce and Harold Courtenay came to her mind.

Hardened and embittered she waited and watched, like a tigress she was ready to spring, all the evil in her nature was inflamed by the sense of having been tricked, duped, betrayed into false hopes. She saw the pair go gaily off, and saw them return.

She noted the care with which Harold put her rival into the train and only with great difficulty did she suppress the cry of passion that rose to her lips.

She crept into another carriage of the train which conveyed them, and on their arrival waited till Harold had placed Kathleen in the carriage he had ordered to take her to the Court from Wilchester Station.

He cycled away in search of a doctor and the moment his back was turned, Lenore ran to the side of the carriage and poured forth a torrent of accusations:

"Ah! Coward! You want to steal my lover! You must needs plot and scheme to win him from me! You have have been acting a part to feel his arms round you!"

Kathleen was startled out of all self-possession and cowered in her seat as if in physical fear. She was on the verge of hysterics when a burly porter intervened:

"Cabby, you'd better drive her 'ome. And you'd better move on quietly, or there'll be a bigger row than there is," he added, drawing Lenore from the carriage door.

* * * * *

In a few weeks' time Lenore Stanley had been requested to resign her post at the College, owing to the scandalous, cleverly concocted tales which Kathleen Bryce had set about in Wilchester in revenge for the scene at the station, and as a further blow to her intercourse with Harold.

Much to her disgust young Courtenay had not followed up the advantage she gave him at Needham, she strongly suspected that Lenore had still a strong hold on his affections, so she worked the wires with skill and cunning. It was an utterly uneven contest and Lenore was worsted.

Digitized by Google

Peace had been restored between the lovers after that unlucky Saturday afternoon and Harold had sought to make up for the pain Lenore had suffered by unremitting tenderness and a thousand pretty attentions; but when scandal became busy with her name he could think of no better course than to persuade her to leave the town.

This she refused to do, and as the weary weeks went by she had to learn the bitter lesson that Harold Courtenay was not the man to risk the loss of pleasure and profit for the sake of the girl he had taught to love him.

They met but seldom and when they did his mind was full of his racing stud and his chance of winning a race at the spring meeting. He talked a great deal of horses, very little of love, and spoke not a word of marriage.

The day of the Crawford races came round and it found Lenore a heart-broken woman. All the youth, gaiety, and warmth of her nature had been crushed out of her in those bitter winter days of neglect, calumny and solitude.

She had seen Harold several times lately in the town with Kathleen Bryce and for some weeks even his letters had been discontinued. She had a fancy to see him ride and with some difficulty secured a place near the winning-post.

She was in the act of starting for the course when a smart dog-cart rattled down the street. Attracted by a strong impulse she looked up as it passed. The occupants were Harold Courtenay and Kathleen Bryce, the latter wearing his racing colours, and he let his eyes rest on Lenore without a sign of recognition.

She turned back quickly and ran up to her room. Her face was a shade paler and her lips more tightly compressed when she finally set out to take her place betimes.

The Courtenay-Bryce party were on a coach and Lenore hardly took her eyes off them. She noted jealously every look and smile that passed between Harold and Kathleen, with the morbid seeking for suffering that some natures cannot resist.

The great race of the day began, and public enthusiasm ran high in favour of young Courtenay, whose horse, bearing the gruesome name of "Sudden Death" romped in after an exciting contest. The winner was acclaimed from all sides, and for a second Lenore felt his eye rest upon her, but with no loving glance, rather a look of annoyance.

He turned his head quickly and was just in time to catch a rose that Kathleen threw from the box seat of the coach. As he pressed it to his lips Lenore rose to her feet, whipped her revolver from her side and took a rapid but accurate aim.

The sharp report was followed by a cry of horror from the by-standers as the hero of the hour flung up his hands and dropped, shot through the heart.

In the momentary confusion that ensued Lenore dashed to the side of the murdered man and flung herself on his body. The police removed her by force, her reason had given away at last, and she babbled wildly as she went, pointing to the riderless horse that stood as it were watching his dead master:

"Ah, Sudden Death! Sudden Death! The best thing! She won't have him now! He is mine! Sudden death! He is mine!"

MARY FERMOR.

TWENTY-SEVEN SEALED ENVELOPES CLAIMED.

£270 ALREADY PAID.

THE Editor of Pearson's Weekly has sent out fifty men, each with a sealed envelope containing a letter entitling the recipient to the sum of £10. To secure one of these envelopes it is only necessary to ask one of the Ten-Pound Men the question, "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?" and at the same time to show a current copy of Pearson's Weekly. Full details of the scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

In order that ladies may have an extra opportunity of sharing in this great Pearson's Weekly scheme,

TEN TEN-POUND LADIES

have been dispatched all over the country, each of whom will deliver up the Sealed Envelope to the lady who fulfills the conditions mentioned in Pearson's Weekly. No gentlemen need apply.

The latest song, "Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?" is being sung every night by Mr. R. G. Knowles in various London music-halls with great success.

HOW TO GET A COPY OF THE SONG.

Copies of the song are now ready, and may be obtained from all music-sellers and newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the Song Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free. If your newsagent or music-seller has no copies he can get one for you if he likes. Already hundreds of orders have been received, and these will, of course, be dealt with in rotation.

Full particulars of the scheme will be found each week in Pearson's Weekly, and fresh developments appear in the Daily Express every day.

The following are the names and addresses of the winners of Ten-Pound Notes up to the time of going to press:

H. E. Baker, 4 Beaconsfield Road, Magdalen Road, Norwich; John Lotan, 23 St. Anne's Chambers, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.; Charles Lee, 1 Agnes Terrace, St. Mary's Avenue, Southend; Charles Wright, 30 Oxford Gardens, North Kensington; Robert Gautier, 132 Clarence Road, Wimbledon; W. W. Tonkin, 5 Grove Road, Brixton, S.W.; E. G. Baldock, 68 Portland Street, Lincoln; Arthur Wellings, 12 The Forgate, Worcester; A. Bowman, 413 City Road, London, E.C.; John Roe, Hatfield Road Board School, St. Albans; R. J. Martyn, 4 Albert Road, Morice Town, Devonport; Mr. W. H. Hole, Stationmaster, Teignmouth; Archibald Brown, Market Place, Carluke; J. D. Southall, 38 Rosebery Gardens, Crouch End; W. Cotton, Coxbridge, West Pennard, Glastonbury; W. H. Wayne, 19 Hurstfinch Road, St. Helens; May Grammer, 154 Elgin Avenue, Maida Vale; Albert J. Page, Sawbridgeworth, Herts; Mrs. F. Pezaro, 86 High Street, Kingsland, N.; James I. W. Ash, 34 Cricketfield Road, Hackney Downs; Mrs. S. Fitzpatrick, 13 Killarney Parade, Dublin; Miss Winifred Eldridge, 337 Seaside, Eastbourne; Charles W. Ward, 30 Milton Street, Maidstone; Albert House, 8 Lansdowne Terrace, Holloway Street, Exeter; George Tyler, 35 Cattle Market, Loughborough; Miss Annie Hamilton, 12 Blythswood Drive, Glasgow; Mrs. Redgrave, 14 Burnley Road, Stockwell.

The original Sealed Envelopes by which claims have been made can be seen at the following places:

Mr. John Lotan's, Ludgate Hill Station; Mr. H. E. Baker's, offices of Eastern Daily Press, Norwich; Inspector Lee's, Cooper Brothers, Cliff Town Road, Southend; Mr. C. Wright's, Crown Hotel, Southampton; Mr. W. W. Tonkin's, Lang Sims, 437 Brixton Road, London, S.W.; Mr. E. G. Baldock's, Clifford Thomas, 202 High Street, Lincoln; Mr. Arthur Wellings', Mr. Large, The Forgate, Worcester; Mr. A. Bowman's, 413 City Road, E.C.; Mr. John Roe's, Mr. W. H. Richardson, 5 High Street, St. Albans; Miss May Grammer's, Mr. Burge, chemist, 123 Shirland Road, Paddington; Mr. Southall's, Seagrief and Sons, Broadway, Crouch End; Mr. Brown's, John Young, bookseller, High Street, Carluke; Mrs. Pezaro's, 86 High Street, Kingsland; Mrs. Page's, Truswell and Sons, Sawbridgeworth; Mr. Ash's, "Three Sisters," Queensdown Road, Hackney Downs; Mrs. Fitzpatrick's, 81 Lower Dorset Street, Dublin; Miss Eldridge, 337 Seaside, Eastbourne; Mr. Ward's, Walter Ruck, stationer, High Street, Maidstone.

Digitized by Google

THE CLOCK.

THERE was at Epinal in 1600 or 1700 and something—it is so long ago that I do not remember the exact date—a clock with chimes, music and moving figures that excited the admiration of all the neighbouring towns.

From Vesoul, Chaumont, Nancy, and even Strasburg, from the four cardinal points, in fact, flocked inquisitive men and women, who, at the approach of midday, crowded into the back shop of old Master Tiphaine, the ingenious constructor of this complicated machine.

Master Tiphaine had never consented to part with his masterpiece; to the offers of honours and money, a hundred times repeated, he gave formal refusals, saying:

"My native town will inherit it after my death. If you took away my clock now you would kill me, you see, for it is a part of my life."

Master Tiphaine did not exaggerate; for long years, absorbed in the most impossible calculations, he had conceived and thought out his plan of mechanism; in fact, it took ten years before his project was realised.

He made all the pieces himself, and fitted them together patiently after a thousand fruitless trials—oh, how many sleepless nights, how many hidden discouragements!—until he attained finally the certainty of triumph. Indeed, Master Tiphaine did not exaggerate in claiming that this clock was a part of his life.

One day, then, the inhabitants of Epinal learnt that the old clockmaker had solved his problem, and that they were summoned to assure themselves of the perfect working of the apparatus.

They took care not to miss the appointment. They admired very much the construction of the machine, but when at the stroke of twelve the mechanism set in motion the figures, men-at-arms, heralds, apostles, etc.; when the chimes rang, mysterious bells played a popular air, the cock crowed, the ox bellowed, the ass began to bray, and the fat goose to utter his hoarse cry—due, as everyone knows, to a cold contracted by an ancestor on Christmas night—there was a wild admiration, an irresistible enthusiasm among the spectators.

"Once more!" they called out.

"I cannot oblige you," replied Master Tiphaine, "the machinery is arranged to work only every twenty-four hours. If I disturb the least thing the whole is deranged, and I am too old to recommence such labours. Come back to-morrow!"

On the next day the sightseers came in still greater numbers. Then the news spread, reached the country and the neighbouring towns. Every day the back shop was filled with admirers who were untiring in applauding the masterpiece of Severien Tiphaine.

But for some years Master Tiphaine had remained indifferent to the sincerest and the loudest praises. In the confused din of exclamations he listened only to the laugh of a child, a clear laugh, joyous and fresh as the chant of a mountain cascade, purer and more melodious than the mysterious bells that sang in the clock. Among all the faces that bent towards him gaping with surprise, Tiphaine observed only the pink and white cheeks of Guillemine, a pretty little child of five years of age, his grand-daughter.

Guillemine did not miss one of the midday representations. Master Tiphaine installed her in the first row, then he raised the curtain that protected his clock. From this moment all his attention was directed to his grand-daughter.

With as much impatience as the child he counted the tickings, he awaited the preliminary clicks. Immovable, in a state of ecstacy, Guillemine fixed her wide-opened, blue eyes on the clock.

Click! click! f-r-r-r-ou!

Gearings, springs, cogwheels began to move with a noise like the flapping of wings.

Master Tiphaine read on Guillemine's face the emotions that pervaded it, and he felt a childish joy.

Coo-coo-ricoo! the cock arose on the top of the belfry.

Guillemine clasped her hands. The bells tingled, and the infant Saviour, lying in the manger, appeared. There was the ox, the ass, and the fat goose. Higher up angels hovered in the clouds, which the dove, carrying the olive branch, flew across. The magi, the shepherds, followed by their bleating flocks, filed by in procession.

Guillemine began to fidget on her stool; she bit her lips, pulled her fingers; Master Tiphaine himself is restless; like the little girl he is he awaited the surprise.

There it is! The temptation of St. Anthony! The imps which dance about the friend that gambols, cavorts unceasingly. That was the surprise that Guillemine was waiting for. Wild with joy she jumped about, clapped her hands and laughed. Ah, this laugh! That was the surprise that Master Tiphaine waited for.

The old grandfather laughed in his turn; he laughed until he was ready to weep, and the procession ended as the cock rising again closed the entertainment with a crowning coo-coo-ricoo!

Master Tiphaine seized the little girl, shaking with laughter, clasped her in his arms, and mingled his snowy locks with the blonde ringlets of Guillemine.

One cold day in December, the sightseers of Epinal, who, in spite of the cold, came to the shop of the master clockmaker as punctually as certain citizens of Paris, not long ago, used to go to the Palais Royal to regulate their watches by the report of the cannon, found the door obstructed by old Severien Tiphaine.

"No one can come in to-day," said he, sadly.

"Why?" they asked. "Is the clock broken?"

"The clock is not broken," replied Tiphaine in a still sadder tone; "but Guillemine is ill, poor little one, and we are expecting the doctor, who ought to be here soon; so then I ask you please to go away without noise."

Digitized by Google

They acceded to his request, made their excuses and withdrew. Master Tiphaine then entered a room with closed shutters, lit up by a few burning faggots. At the end of this room in an alcove, where the fantastic shadows danced about, there was a white bed, and in that white bed, quite pale and delicate, Guillemine was lying.

At the foot of the bed a young man and a young woman were standing, looking sadly at the little girl. Master Tiphaine advanced with soft steps, trying to prevent the floor from creaking under his weight, and when he was quite near the bed he said, addressing the young man:

"Well, my son, has she spoken?"

"No; she has not. She does not seem to hear when she is spoken to, and yet she looks at us with her beautiful blue eyes."

"Father," said the young woman, "I am frightened, for our Guillemine is like a dead person, lying with the eyes wide open."

Master Tiphaine bent over the couch, and trying to smile.

"Guillemine," said he, "little Guillemine."

The prostrate child fixed on him eyes that seemed to see no longer. She did not stir.

"Heaven have pity on us!" sighed Master Tiphaine, drawing aside.

Poor, gentle Guillemine!

On the previous day, a little after the midday representation, a high fever had seized her. During a part of the night she had been delirious, crying out and struggling against invisible beings and since morning she had remained in this state of alarming torpor, her limbs stiffened, her eyes staring.

Master Tiphaine looked at the lips of Guillemine, those poor, pale lips, from which only yesterday the melody of laughter escaped.

There was a knock at the door. Tiphaine went to lift the latch.

An old man entered.

"Guillemine," said Master Tiphaine, "here is the doctor, who has come to pay you a visit."

The doctor examined the child and meditated a long time.

"Well," said Master Tiphaine.

The doctor shook his head with an anxious air.

"It is serious, very serious," he said.

The young man hearing these words made a sign to the young woman, and went out.

"What is to be done?" asked Tiphaine.

"Above all, she must be roused from this fatal torpor. It is this prostration that makes me uneasy. Now, then, try to divert her, rouse her up, otherwise, I can answer for nothing."

Thereupon the doctor went away. Then the young woman sat down near Guillemine and, repressing her sobs, sang an old roundelay that used to please the child; but Guillemine's eyes showed that she did not hear.

"What is to be done? What is to be done?" sobbed the young woman, and she began her song again.

Hours passed, Guillemine became more and more pale on the white pillows. Afflicted, hopeless, Tiphaine, the young man and the young woman became silent now, and all was still in the room. Suddenly a rythmical noise was heard.

Tick, tock, tick, tock!

Master Tiphaine knit his eyebrows, and relapsed into a profound meditation. Abruptly he arose and went towards his son.

"Help me to roll Guillemine's bed up in front of the clock," said he.

"What do you want to do?" asked the young man.

"You will see."

They rolled the bed into the back shop, and placed it before the clock. Master Tiphaine raised the curtain that covered the masterpiece. The clock appeared. Guillemine's eyes seemed to move.

"Look closely now, Guillemine! You are going to see the manger and the wise kings and St. Anthony. How you are going to laugh!"

"But, father," said the young man, "it is eleven o'clock at night, and the figures will not appear until noon to-morrow. Can Guillemine wait until then?"

"She shall not wait," replied Master Tiphaine, in a low tone, "and the figures are going to appear."

"But," said the young man, turning pale, "you can only bring about such a result by breaking up the mechanism."

"Yes, that is true."

"Father, this is your life work——"

Master Tiphaine motioned to his son to be silent.

"Bring me a light," he said.

He then drew out nails, screws, plates, laying bare the systems of wheels, and springs. Tiphaine worked slowly, for his hands trembled a little.

"Give me the hammer," he said suddenly.

Armed with the hammer he was about to strike a blow, then stopped. Was he hesitating? He looked at Guillemine, who was staring fixedly at the clock.

"Pay attention, my Guillemine. Now you are going to laugh. You will laugh, won't you?"

He struck a sharp blow. The machine seemed to groan. The spring unbent with a formidable humming, the gearing rolled round. Master Tiphaine threw the hammer far from him, and staggering, had to lean against the wall.

"Light up the clock now," said he to his son, "and look, my Guillemine!"

The hands turned wildly. There came the cock, the men-at-arms, there was the ox, the hoarse, fat goose, and the bells tingled and the chimes rang out.

Guillemine had raised her head, her lips partly opened as if in hesitating prelude to laughter.

Ah, there is St. Anthony, who, quicker than ever, runs along, dragged by his friend with extraordinary gambolings, and the imps, and St. Anthony and the wise men and the shepherds danced a frantic round to the hurrying sounds of the chimes and the bells.

At last the hesitating laugh of Guillemine rose by degrees, ascending like a song of reviving life, and finally breaking forth clear and radiant.

But while she, the gentle, little girl, was thus reviving to new life the poor clock was in its last agony. Sinister cracking, like a death rattle, from which Master Tiphaine suffered horribly, shook its frame.

In order not to hear these final moans Tiphaine listened to the laughter of the child. Once more a prolonged cracking, a last effort of the machinery, and then all was over; the clock lived no longer; but Guillemine was laughing still.

And so, when this famous clock was shown some years ago at Epinal, it was said—on the authority of competent persons who had studied the mutilated mechanism—that the masterpiece of Severien Tiphaine was a failure and had never worked.

ANNA SHORT.

Digitized by Google

A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic.

Don Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who are friends of Wyvenhoe.

General Urdenetta, Governor of Pampatar, a bitter enemy of Wyvenhoe.

Bolivar, Supreme Chief of the Venezuelan Republic.

Tamanac, an Indian Cazique, and great friend of Santleo.

CHAPTER XVII.

Calabozo is Taken.

On the day after my interview with Bolivar and Urdenetta intelligence reached headquarters that the Spaniards were making ready to evacuate Calabozo, on which the Chief decided to storm the town at midnight, and preparations to that end were straightway made.

The plan of attack was simple and seemed feasible. While a picked body of infantry attacked the south, east, and west sides, General Paez and his llaneros were to ride round to the north and hinder the enemy from retreating in that direction, if they should attempt to retreat.

As the walls were low and the barriers weak, and the Spaniards, besides having no other artillery than a few light field-pieces, were numerically inferior, no great difficulty was anticipated in scaling the ramparts and forcing the gates. Moreover, as they were not expecting an attack they would be taken by surprise and probably offer only a feeble resistance.

So at least the Chief thought and his officers hoped. To me, personally, he was as courteous as usual, and seemed not to have taken offence at my refusal of Urdenetta's embrace, perhaps because he had need of my services. Be that as it might, he kept me so fully occupied that I had no opportunity of speaking to Don Iago (whose battalion formed part of the attacking force) until late in the day, and even then we were able to exchange only a few words.

In order to avoid alarming the enemy, great efforts were made to preserve silence, officers being forbidden to shout and privates to speak, and there was, of course, to be neither bugle sounding nor drum beating.

We had no moon, but the stars, shining brilliantly in a clear sky, did nearly as well.

At eleven o'clock, the three columns of attack being under arms and ready to advance, Paez and his horsemen started for the north gate But until he sent word that he had taken up the position assigned to him we were not to move.

Everything appeared to be going well; so far there had been no hitch and officers who had been sent to reconnoitre reported that a quietness as of death reigned in Calabozo.

"Caramba! I believe they are asleep," quoth one of them. "Don Simon has Morillo in the hollow of his hand."

"Yes, I think we have caught him napping this time, and if we destroy his army to-night there will be nothing to prevent our marching in triumph to Caracas," said Bolivar complacently.

"And a grateful people will crown their liberator with laurels," added the courtly officer.

"And also, I hope, my brave army which has deserved so well of the country, and then I shall sheathe my sword, resign my offices and retire into private life, happy in the thought that Venezuela is independent and free. But it is time we heard from General Paez. Ah, here comes a horseman, one of his aides, probably."

It was Bonanza who presently pulled up in front of Bolivar.

"What news, Captain?" he asked.

"Bad news, Señor General. Morillo has anticipated us, slipped away with the main body of his command, but Don José has attacked his rear-guard and will no doubt drive it back into Calabozo."

On this there followed the most startling outburst of oaths and exclamations I had ever heard. The names of all the saints in the calendar were taken in vain, millions of devils were invoked, and Morillo and the Gods were reviled from the crowns of their heads to the soles of their feet.

It was certainly very provoking and I shared in the general disappointment. Two hours, perhaps one hour, would have made all the difference. Had the head of the Spanish column been attacked as it emerged from the north gate nothing could have prevented the entire force from being dispersed or destroyed. Bolivar, with whom the fault lay, seemed vexed and mortified past speaking, but presently recovering his equanimity, stilled the storm by ordering an immediate advance.

Digitized by Google

It was not necessary to scale the walls, the gates were opened from within, and after a short, albeit sharp struggle, the Spanish rear-guard, composed chiefly of Creoles and half-breeds, laid down their arms and sued for mercy. Some were bayonetted, and had not the Chief ordered the survivors, numbering about eight hundred, to be spared, and imprisoned in the churches, all would have been summarily dispatched.

Then the town was sacked, as a matter of course, though fewer excesses were committed than might have been expected, considering the character and composition of the patriot army, and the Chief having determined to follow Morillo and bring him to an engagement, we marched northwards on the following afternoon leaving in the town a strong guard under the command of Captain Sherwood. When we were en route Bolivar mentioned that he was making yet another attempt to induce the Spanish general to consent to an exchange of prisoners.

"It would be very well if you could, but won't your envoy be treated as Bonanza was treated?" said I, fearing that he was going to send Don Antonio a second time.

"I shall send no more flags of truce, Señor Wyvenhoe. Early this morning I released twelve of the officers and twenty of the privates whom we took last night, and sent them to Morillo with a letter requesting him for the last time, in the name of civilisation and humanity, to agree to an exchange."

"You released these people without conditions?"

"Without conditions, just in order to show Morillo that I am in earnest, and shall faithfully carry out any agreement to which we may come."

"You have acted nobly, Señor General, and I cannot think that Morillo will refuse a proposal so well meant and so handsomely made," I said warmly, for I felt that he had done the right thing.

"We shall see. Urdenetta and the other generals were all against it, and I have promised, if it fails, to let them for the future deal with captured Godos as they think fit. Had I not been very determined, they would have killed every prisoner in Calabozo before we left."

I confess that Don Simon puzzled me. I knew that he had been, and could be, both wantonly cruel and basely treacherous; yet here he was doing his utmost, in spite of his generals, to put an end to the system of reprisals which had so long prevailed, at a moment, too, when, having more prisoners than the enemy, he would lose by the exchange. He was so strange a compound of good and bad qualities that I could not be sure whether he was acting out of policy or humanity, but I thought then, and I think still, that humanity and a desire to stand well in the opinion of the civilised world, were his predominant motives.

Moreover, his manner to me was so friendly and sympathetic that I began to think I had wronged him in my mind, that he had either forgotten or forgiven my feud with Urdenetta and cherished no evil designs against me. Nevertheless I had my doubts, for I had been warned by one who knew him better than I did that those whom Bolivar disliked had most to fear when he was the most kind.

Tovas dismounted, and using a drumhead as a desk, prepared to write.

Towards evening, when we were within a league of Rastro, whither the royalists had retreated, the advanced guard came to a sudden halt, on which the Chief and his staff rode to the front to ascertain the cause of the stoppage.

"What is it, what has happened?" he demanded of General Zaraza, who commanded the advanced guard.

"Look!" answered Zaraza sternly.

Across the road, before the head of the column, were lying, stiff and stark, twelve patriot officers and twenty privates, prisoners taken from us by the Spaniards, all with their skulls split or their throats cut.

It was Morillo's answer to Bolivar's overtures. The only exchange to which he would consent was an exchange of dead rebels for living royalists.

"What do you think of this, Major Wyvenhoe?" exclaimed Don Simon indignantly. "I have known, ever since we first conversed on the subject, I have inferred it from your manner, read it in your face, that you deem us no less cruel than the Spaniards, that if we renounced reprisals so would they, and as you think, so think our enemies and, I daresay, some of our friends in Europe and the United States. Well, I have tried, not for the first time, honestly and generously, to make a beginning, and this is the way in which I am met. I shall try no more, and in murdering these thirty-two poor fellows, Morillo has sealed the fate of the eight hundred prisoners we took last night. You have writing materials, Captain Tovas" (one of his aides.) Tovas, knowing what was expected of him, dismounted, and using a drum head as a desk, prepared to write and the Chief dictated a peremptory order to Captain Sherwood for the immediate execution of every royalist prisoner in Calabozo.

Digitized by Google

After being told to report myself to Urdenetta and join my regiment I took my leave.

"Now," said he, when he had signed it, "shift your saddle to one of the led horses, ride back to Calabozo, and see for yourself that the order is obeyed. The scouts report that the Godos are continuing their retreat. You will find us at Rastro, where we shall halt for the night."

This incident made a deep impression on the troops. Before time the Spaniards had returned evil for evil, now they returned evil for good; accommodation or truce with enemies so truculent and ferocious was hopeless and would never again be attempted. More than ever it was war to the knife, all vowed vengeance and so incensed were the men that after a short rest they wanted to go on.

Bolivar being nothing loth we followed on the tracks of the flying royalists throughout the long night and the next day's heat with scarce a halt, except where we came to water, when the men would rest a few minutes, quench their thirst, take a bite of something, and then of their own accord rise and resume their usual swinging pace with all the fierce resolution of Indians on the war path, and most of them were more or less Indians.

We found Morillo's army posted in a wood near Sombrero, and there followed a short, yet sanguinary and indecisive engagement; for, though our fellows fought resolutely, there is a limit to human endurance; and when the Spaniards, who had been resting while we were marching, again fell back, we had to forego pursuit, the foot-soldiers being worn out and the cavalry horses so used up that they could hardly move, much less carry their riders into action.

A rapid pursuit is only a degree less demoralising than a retreat. Many of the men, overcome by the heat, had fallen out, all were footsore, many of the horses lame, and the pack mules, the reserve ammunition, and other supplies toiling miles in the rear. A long rest was absolutely necessary, and, despite the Chief's desire to push on, two days passed before we were able to make another move.

During the halt two things happened, one of which augured ill for the army, the other for myself.

On the ground that his cavalry would be of no use in the hill country, whither Bolivar proposed to follow Morillo, General Paez declined to go further; also, he gave the Chief some good advice, which it would have been well if he had followed, saying that in the level country the superiority of the patriot cavalry generally decided the day, whereas among the mountains, where horsemen were helpless, the numbers and better discipline of the royalist infantry would give them the advantage and insure them the victory.

"That is why Morillo keeps retreating," added Don José, "and instead of following and fighting him on ground of his own choosing you would do better to fall back and bring him to a decisive engagement on ground of your choosing. Anyhow, my fellows won't leave the llanos, where they are invincible, to be massacred in some mountain pass."

But to this sage counsel Bolivar would not listen, and when he asked my advice and I sided with Paez he seemed very angry, and it was probably the reason why he chose that particular time for dismissing me from his staff and appointing me to the command of the Cazadores of the Apure, a regiment of Urdenetta's division, though I have no doubt the measure had already been decided on and would have taken place in any case.

True, I got a step in rank, but as I told the Chief I would rather serve under him as major than under Urdenetta as colonel.

"You think the general will annoy you, but he won't, and you have only to apologise for your rudeness to be on the best of terms with him," was the answer.

"When General Urdenetta apologises for putting me under arrest at Margarita I will make the amende honorable by accepting his embrace," I rejoined.

"I might order you to apologise. However I won't do that, the apology would not be sincere. All the same you will be expected to obey the general's orders, and do your duty as if you and he were the best of friends."

"So long as I remain in the service, general, you may be assured that I shall do my duty."

"So long as you remain in the service! Allow me to remind you, Señor Colonel, that your remaining in the service depends on my pleasure, not on yours."

This meant, of course, that my resignation, if I tendered it, would not be accepted.

"Unless you are released from it by death, for I am sure you would not desert to the enemy," added Bolivar after a moment's pause, at the same time giving me one of his suspicious side glances.

"Desert to the enemy," I exclaimed hotly. "Do you really suppose——"

"Oh, don't be angry. Of course you are quite incapable of entertaining any such idea, and I should be very sorry if from any cause whatever, we were to lose your services, which are highly appreciated, as well by Urdenetta as myself."

"I thank you for your good opinion, Señor General, and you would add to the obligation by informing me who has dared to suggest that I am capable of such infamy as desertion to the enemy."

"It has not been suggested, only as you know, Morillo is offering inducements to the foreign officers in my army to take service in his, and all I meant to say was that whatever anybody else might do you would never betray the cause to which you have sworn allegiance. Perhaps I did not lay sufficient emphasis on the 'you.'"

He had laid no emphasis on it at all, and I felt sure that, believing I might desert to the Spaniards out of revenge for the way in which he was treating me, and to avoid serving under my enemy, he had made the remark as a feeler.

The warmth with which I took it probably surprised him and to make amends he remarked with a smile:

"I thought I was paying you a compliment."

Digitized by Google

"As you are good enough to say so I accept it in that sense, nevertheless it is a compliment which I had rather been spared," I replied, and after being told to report myself to Urdenetta and join my regiment took my leave.

The rupture with Bolivar was complete. I had served him faithfully, often at the hazard of my life, without pay or expectation of reward, yet he had deliberately and of malice aforethought inflicted on me the greatest humiliation in his power, for I know of none greater than being compelled to serve a man whom you hate and despise. So keenly, indeed, did I feel it that I was only restrained from refusing the so-called promotion and offering my resignation by the certainty that the doing so would render my second condition worse than my first.

I should not better myself by being tried by court-martial on a charge of insubordination, separated from my friends, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in some noisome prison, there, in all probability, to perish of privation and disease.

So I pocketed the affront and waited on Urdenetta, who received me with formal politeness; but his eyes bespoke enmity, and I knew as well as though he had said it in so many words that he would do me an ill turn if he could. His speech on introducing me to my regiment was brief and to the point: "Your new colonel, Don Ruperto Wyvenhoe."

The Cazadores of the Apure were of various breeds, sizes, and colours, altogether a very mixed lot and only half clad, yet a fair sample of the bulk of the army; but since I had seen how they could march and fight, my respect for the patriot levies had increased, and better disciplined, armed, and led, they would have been a match for Morillo's choicest troops. Even to their lack of garments, grotesque though it made them look, I had become reconciled. In countries where it is always warm, clothing is superfluous and other things being equal, an army that requires neither shirts nor shoes has a distinct advantage over armies that require both.

Don Iago's battalion of blacks formed part of Urdenetta's division, and it was a great satisfaction to have my old friend for a comrade; in certain eventualities it might be a great help. But Bonanza remained with General Paez. We parted with regret and many expressions of mutual esteem, as also of hopes that we might meet again, though for my part, I doubted whether they would be realised.

Bonanza, like Santleo, took a serious view of my breach with Bolivar and my strained relations with Urdenetta.

"It is bad enough to lose the Chief's favour and protection, but it is a great deal worse to be handed over to the tender mercies of your enemy, and such an enemy as Urdenetta. Not that he is likely to worry you in small matters. Men of his stamp don't tease their victims, they destroy them, and nothing is more certain than that he has resolved on your destruction. In what shape the stroke will come, nobody knows, I don't suppose he knows himself, and against an unknown danger it is impossible to guard. However, you seem, like myself, to have a good many lives," added Bonanza, with one of his merry laughs, "and I have not the least doubt that with the help of Don Iago and your patron saint, you will escape this peril as you have escaped many others. Keep up your spirits, and if by any chance you get the ruffian in your power, don't spare him."

This, albeit well meant, was not comforting, yet I did not let Don Antonio's forebodings disquiet me, preferring rather to follow his advice by keeping up my spirits.

I made the best d'spositions I could, and led my men on.

Tamanac remained with Don Iago, who continued to treat him as an honoured guest, found him a horse and gave him a lance, both of which the Cazique knew how to use. He was also a fine archer, and an unerring rifle shot, and could throw the lasso as well as a llanero.

When I asked Santleo again whether Tamanac had brought good news he said, "Yes," but in a tone which signified that it was not quite so good as he had expected, and I inferred from one or two rather enigmatical remarks which he let drop that he had some intention either of resigning his commission or applying for leave of absence, with what object he did not say, though it could only be that he might return to his own people. But as we were beginning what was virtually a new campaign Bolivar would grant leave of absence to none of his officers, much less accept resignations.

Since leaving Sombrero we had not come in contact with the enemy, but it was known that between us and Caracas were two armies, one led by Morillo, the other by his second in command, General La Torre. Bolivar's plan was to get between them and, while La Torre was held in check by the cavalry under Zaraza and Zedeño, fall on Morillo with his infantry. The better and more rapidly to carry out this scheme, our division was ordered to proceed by another road and rejoin the main body at a point further north, which had been agreed upon by Bolivar and Urdenetta, with whom, of course, went Don Iago and myself.

We set out after siesta—the heat of the day being always passed in sleep, bivouacked on the banks of a meandering stream, and resumed our march an hour before sunrise on the following morning. So far we had met with no opposition, every village we passed was deserted, either because for their lives, or in obedience to orders from Caracas. This, and seeing nothing of the enemy, made our leaders, who always trusted a good deal to Providence, more careless than was their wont, the most obvious precautions were neglected, and we went on as confidently and as little apprehensive of danger as though there was not a Spaniard in the land.

Digitized by Google

After marching some three hours we entered a quebrada, neither very narrow nor very steep, yet still in military parlance a defile, whose sloping sides were partly under cultivation, partly timbered. On the bluff at the north end of this defile was a large village overlooking the road, parallel to which ran the bed of a wide though almost dry river.

Here General Urdenetta decided to halt for breakfast,

Urdenetta's orderly entered the patio and handed me a letter.

without, however, sending a single horseman to reconnoitre or attempting in any way to ascertain whether the place was occupied or deserted, the inhabitants friendly or hostile. The advanced guard, a squadron of cavalry, went on laughing and singing, closely followed by a battalion whose unloaded muskets were slung across their shoulders, and were entering the village when a hot fire was opened on them by invisible foes.

Many of the dragoons were killed and their horses wounded, and the panic-stricken survivors wheeling round, dashed among the infantry in the rear, thereby throwing the entire column into confusion. Had the Spaniards charged, there would have been a regular sauve qui peut. Fortunately, they did not; in a few minutes the fugitives were rallied and order restored, and Urdenetta ordered the Cazadores to take the village at the point of the bayonet, which was more easily said than done, the Spaniards being posted in the houses and behind the bushes and trees.

However, I made the best dispositions I could and led my men on.

They responded to my call and showed a good deal of courage, but it was too much of a passive order. Though they were exposed to a murderous fire to which they could make no effective reply I could not induce them to make a rush for it. How I escaped Heaven only knows. Two horses were shot under me within ten minutes, one bullet carried away a spur, another grazed my cheek, a third my sword arm.

It was too hot to last, the men began to waver, retreating step by step, and finally broke and fled, though if we had been properly supported I think we should have won, and so I told the general when he reproached me with what he was pleased to call my failure.

His face bespoke both anger and disappointment, and I thought that his annoyance was due in a great measure to my not having been killed.

Urdenetta had neither received a military training nor possessed military aptitude, but he well knew that unless the village were taken we should be unable to rejoin Bolivar, in which event Bolivar's plan of campaign would be ruined and, probably, his army destroyed.

"The position must be carried, cost what it may. You have seen more of it than anybody else. What would you advise?" he asked me.

"Attack in front as before, and at the same time threaten the enemy's rear by sending a strong detachment along the bed of the river. The Spaniards are in no great strength, and the chances are that when they see the position is going to be turned they will retreat."

"Why did you not suggest that before?"

"Because when his general gives a peremptory order it is an officer's duty to obey it without either making remarks or offering suggestions, and if I had done otherwise I should rightly have incurred your displeasure."

Urdenetta replied with a scowl and a muttered curse, yet condescended to act on my advice, with the result I had anticipated. So soon as the Spaniards saw they were in danger of being outflanked they cleared out, but our weakness in cavalry both in quality and numbers forbade pursuit.

Most of the young men belonging to the village went off with the troops; all who remained, both old and young, were, by Urdenetta's orders, imprisoned in the church. Very little information could be got out of them, only that a regiment had come the night before from the direction of Maracay and taken possession of the village.

As we were well up to time and for some reason best known to himself the general wanted to make a long march on the following day it was decided that we should pass the night where we were, and together with Santleo and several other officers I was quartered in a house with a spacious patio and verandah.

Here we lunched, for it was long past breakfast time, and John Ready, who was an admirable caterer, provided us with the best meal we had enjoyed for a long while. We had coffee, arepas (hot maize cakes) chicken broth, roast monkey and several bottles of wine which John had found hidden under a pile of rubbish in the cellar.

After luncheon we prepared to indulge in a siesta and I had just lighted a cigar and betaken myself to a hammock when Urdenetta's orderly entered the patio and handed me a letter which I opened with languid curiosity, little thinking that it would alter the course of my whole life.

Thus the letter ran:

The general has decided that all the prisoners are to be shot. The execution is to take place in an hour, and the firing party, a detachment of the Cazadores of the Apure, will be commanded by Colonel Wyvenhoe.

URDENETTA.

"I think there is some mistake. I shall go with you to headquarters and have it rectified," I remarked to the orderly who was waiting for an answer.

Then I showed the letter to Don Iago, saying sotto voce, in English, "I shall refuse, of course, and if I do not return you will know that I have been put under arrest."

"And if you are put under arrest you will be condemned to death; but die you shall not, rather will I kill Urdenetta with my own hand," replied Santleo in a fierce whisper.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT DUSTMEN.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Tandra," by Andrew Quantock, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. J. D. Watts, "Kildare," Lower Edmonton. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about BABIES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 22nd. Post-cards only, please.

Good Wine Needs No Bush.

Two dustmen, who had been lucky enough to discover a sovereign in their load of dust, decided to wet the find, and accordingly repaired to the nearest pub.

They decided to have something good to celebrate such an auspicious occasion, so Bill called the barmaid, and asked for "a bottle o' that stuff, like wot the swells drink. Port, ain't it?"

She served them with a bottle, which they proceeded to empty, with very wry faces.

"Rum tastin' stuff, ain't it?" said one.

"Yes; an' wot a funny colour! S'pose we try another," said Bill.

"'Ere, guv'ner!" to the proprietor, who had just come into the bar, "let's 'ave another o' them bottles o' port."

"Who served you with the first one?" asked the boss.

"Why, the barmaid," said Bill.

"Where did you get that bottle of port you served just now?" asked the proprietor of the girl.

"At the end of the first shelf," answered the girl.

"Why," said the boss, "that was ketchup!"

J. D. W.

All She Wanted.

A DUSTMAN was one day passing by a block of flats with his cart. On one of the highest storeys he saw a woman gesticulating to him.

He wearily plodded up the intervening four storeys and at length reached the landing where the woman was standing, with a yelling urchin by her side.

To his disgust he was greeted with the following:

"I say, Mr. Dustman, isn't it right, that, if my little boy don't stop crying, you'll take him away with you in your cart?"

H. R.

Not Equal to the Occasion.

THERE is a dustman in London whose knowledge and use of strong language is the wonder of all who know him.

One day he was driving a waggon of refuse up a steep hill when the tailboard came out, and the rubbish rolled out down the slope.

The neighbours assembled, expecting to hear something more than usually choice.

After a brief interval of silence, the dustman mopped his forehead with his handkerchief and remarked:

"My friends, this is an occasion to which I am quite unequal."

W. J. B.

He Didn't Say "Thank You."

I WAS passing through a street near my home when my attention was drawn to two sweepers who were holding a strong argument with a gentleman whom they had accidentally bespattered with mud.

"What do you mean, you two dirty scoundrels, by sticking me up with mud?" said the gentleman, brandishing his umbrella in their faces.

"Beg yer pardin, sur, it was an accident," said one.

"Accident, be hanged," said the gentleman, "I can't go about like this with no brush to brush it off."

"If that's all yer want we'll oblige yer," and in less than two seconds the gentleman was being brushed down with the sweepers' brushes.

The gentleman struck out with his umbrella and went off up the street saying unkind things.

"Well, there's gratitoode for yer," said one sweeper.

"Ay, Bill," said the other, "he's forgotten to say 'Thank you, gentlemen.'"

J. W. V. H.

A Lesson in Carefulness.

SHUVLITUP, the dustman, called as usual one morning at the house of Mrs. Carefulone, and also, as usual, Mrs. C., who never tipped him, followed Shuvlitup out to the dust-bin in the backyard and watched every shovelful of ashes as he dug it out of the bin and threw it into his big bucket, to Shuvlitup's great indignation.

"You dustmen often find valuable articles in the dust-bins, don't you?" inquired Mrs. Carefulone, suspiciously.

"Well, mum," said Shuvlitup, "servants an' 'ouse-keepers is orful keerless, not to say 'stravagant, an' we do find vallyble things in the ashes sometimes. Frinstance, larst time I was 'ere I found two cinders, three rags, an' a 'am bone wiv a bit o' meat on it. The cinders could 'ave bin burnt, the rags sold, an' the bone might 'ave bin boiled an' made a nice little basin of soop. You reely must be more keerful, mum."

W. J. O.

"Dusto."

AN Irishman was clearing the dustbin of a reverend gentleman the other day, when the cleric thought fit to address some remarks to him on his spiritual welfare.

"Do you ever think of the time when you must die, Pat?" asked the clergyman.

"Sure, and I do that," replied Pat, "for I often say to myself, 'Pat, my boy, you'll feel at home when you hear the parson say, 'Dust thou art, to dust thou must return.'"

A. E. K.

Digitized by Google

A Natural Weakness.

The dustman was on his daily rounds and happened to have got a new horse in his cart.

The lady of No. 9 was passing in, and noticed it; also that it frequently wagged its tail.

Full of curiosity—as ladies generally are—she asked the dustman for an explanation of this curious habit of his horse.

He didn't appear to be in an explanatory mood, and silently emptied the contents of the "bin" of No. 9 into his cart, and was passing on to the next house, when she repeated her query, remarking it was "so funny."

Looking back over his shoulder, the dustman said, with, maybe, a touch of sarcasm in his voice:

"Well, I dunno, mum, 'cept it's fur the same reason as ladies' tongues wag—a kind o' nat'ral weakness."

D. P. R.

Misplaced Sympathy.

Walking up a suburban road recently, I saw a dustman take up a small photograph from the refuse in the cart, gaze at it intently, and then draw his arm across his eyes.

"Poor fellow!" I thought, and approached him. "Ah, my friend, beneath your rough exterior lies a noble nature. No doubt that photo has touched a tender chord in your heart to make you weep."

"Cord, guv'nor? I ain't got no cord in my 'eart or rope neither, an' I reckon you'd adverbially weep if an adjectival bit of ash got in your eye. As for this 'ere picture," indicating the photograph, which was of a small boy, "it ud take summat more 'n this ugly little kid to start me a snivelling."

E. C. L.

The Benefit of Education.

Donald Morrison was the only dustman employed by a village in the north of Scotland, and was generally reckoned as being somewhat "soft."

Early one morning he found a horse's shoe among some rubbish he was removing, and was examining it very closely, when the parish minister's son, a very conceited and forward youth, came sauntering along. Seeing the dustman examining the shoe, he said to him:

"What are you looking at that for, you silly?"

"I'm no' very sure what it is," answered Donald.

"Do you not know that that is a horse's shoe?"

"Eh, what?" said Donald; "it's guid tae hae learnin'; for I didna ken whether it cam' off a horse or a mare!"

J. C.

Why He Had the Wheelbarrow.

One Sunday morning recently a dustman, going up a street in Wigan, met another dustman dressed in his "Sunday suit" of black cloth; but pushing in front of him a heavy wheelbarrow, though it contained nothing in the shape of a cargo.

"Hello, Jack," said the first, "what are ta doing wi' t' barrow now?"

"Well," was the reply, "I've lost t' dog, and my chum Bill's away, and a chap looks such a fool walking out by hissel'."

He had taken the wheelbarrow for company.

H. C. G. S.

PEARSON'S
New Morning Paper.
1d. 2 The 1d. 2
The Paper for Home Reading.
The Paper for the Housekeeper.
The Paper for the Busy Man.
The Paper for the City Man.
The Paper for the Sporting Man.
The Paper for EVERYBODY.
Daily
THE MOST ORIGINAL, UP-TO-DATE, ACCURATE AND BEST NEWSPAPER
Published in this Country.
Published SIX days a Week, NOT once.
1d. 2 Express 1d. 2
ON SALE EVERYWHERE.
ORDER A COPY NOW.

A SPLENDID NOVEL. SIXPENNY EDITION.
The Invisible Man
By H. G. WELLS.
Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," etc.

Price 6d.
POST FREE 8d.
C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C.

An Interesting Book.
CONSULT THE ORACLE;
or,
HOW TO READ THE FUTURE.
Crown 8vo. Price, 1s. Post Free, 1s. 3d.
Some of the Chapters are:
Chap. I.—The Meaning of your Dreams.
Chap. III.—Omens, Charms, and Spells for Lovers.
Chap. VII.—Judging Character by the Hands and Fingers.
Chap. XV.—Married Life Begun as it Should Be.
Chap. XXIV.—Table-Turning.
Chap. XXVIII.—Mystery and Danger of Mesmerism.
Chap. XXXIII.—Things Seen by Second-Sight.
Chap. XXXIX.—Looks showing your Character.
C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION.

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, October 20th. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct. In the event of more than one competitor sending in the same result, the prize will be divided.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 2. Matches to be played on Saturday, October 20th.

Matches to be Played on Saturday, Oct. 20th.	Free	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
1 Derby County v. 2 Sheffield United
1 Notts County v. 2 Liverpool
1 Sunderland v. 2 Manchester City
1 Preston North End v. 2 Aston Villa
1 Stoke v. 2 Blackburn Rovers
1 West Bromwich Alb. v. 2 Notts Forest
1 Small Heath v. 2 Woolwich Arsenal
1 Newton Heath v. 2 Walsall
1 Queen's Park Rang. v. 2 Tottenham Hotspur
1 Hibernians v. 2 Queen's Park

The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly," the "Curiosity Shop," or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, October 19th, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "FOOTBALL, No. 2," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Digitized by Google

THE ✣ IRON ✣ IDOL.

THE nose of the big troopship was turned towards Old England as the mighty engines propelled her swiftly and powerfully through the water of the Arabian Sea. The brown-faced Fusiliers lay about the decks, chatting with their comrades or wives, playing with the children, or dozing away the hot afternoon.

Suddenly a commotion was heard below, men shouting in alarm.

"What the dickens is that?" exclaimed the ship's captain.

"Whatever is going on below there, Hamilton?" simultaneously cried the colonel of the Fusiliers to the adjutant. The answer came in an alarming manner.

Up from below rushed the sentry who had been posted at the door of the magazine. Round the waist he ran, eyes furious with baffled rage, thrusting with his fixed bayonet at some imaginary or invisible enemy which seemed to elude all his angry efforts to stab it. Round the waist he ran, back and forth, up the ladder on to the forecastle, down on to the waist again, up on to the quarter-deck, here, there, round and round, thrusting savagely with his bayonet, while the women and children ran shrieking hither and thither out of his way, and soldiers leapt aside as he came rushing towards them in pursuit of the invisible foe.

"He's mad!"

"No, he's drunk!"

"Who is it?"

"It's Jack Fann! Look out!"

"Trip him up! Knock him down! He'll kill somebody!"

"Chase him! Chase him!"

And now the infuriated sentry was once more rushing across the waist up on to the forecastle. Reaching the bows, he thrust his bayonet furiously at his invisible quarry, seemed, as ever, to miss it, dropped his rifle, and springing on the bows, clutched wildly at the eerie enemy, and before the foremost of the soldiers who in their turn were now pursuing him could grasp his ankle, leapt down into the sea and vanished for ever. All stood petrified, but only for an instant. Engines were reversed, buoys flung overboard, and boats lowered. But all to no purpose.

Private Fann had gone for ever from the roll of the Fusiliers.

"Mad, poor fellow!" was the universal verdict.

"And yet he was never in hospital for sunstroke, was he, Wilson?" asked the colonel.

"Never, colonel," replied the surgeon-major.

"It was like this, sir," said Sergeant Smith, in reply to the colonel's investigations into the strange affair. "Private Fann was sentry at the door of the magazine. He was posted at two o'clock and had been at his post an hour when he suddenly rushed into No. 7 Mess, seeming to be chasing something just like you saw him up here, sir. He ran about the mess for a minute or so and then rushed up on deck, and you saw the rest yourself, sir."

"Poor chap," said the colonel.

"Bob!" whispered Private Brodribb to Private Satan that night as they lay in adjoining hammocks.

"Yes, Sam."

"D'ye knew what he was chasin'?"

"What who was chasin'?" asked Private Satan.

"Why, poor Jack, of course. Who else would I mean?"

"Well, who was he chasin' then? I didn't see nothin' to chase, any more'n anybody else. He was mad, wasn't he?"

"You fool! He was chasin' that beastly idol!"

"What!" cried Satan, springing up in his hammock.

"The iron idol!" repeated Brodribb, hoarsely.

"What d'ye mean?" gasped Satan, the darkness hiding his ashen face.

"What I say," replied Brodribb. "I knowed what it was as soon as I saw poor Jack rush into the mess, stabbin' at the air with his bay'net. Somethin' tole me what he was chasin'. I turned cold all over when I saw him lookin' so mad, stabbin' and thrustin' and runnin' and when I saw him rush up the ladder, I knowed what was goin' to happen. I knowed it was leadin' him to his death. I knowed it was drawin him overboard. And, mark me, Bob, it'll do the same to me yet, I feels it in my blood. I'm a doomed man, Bob, and so are you. D'ye remember what the yeller priest said about runnin' us to death? Oh—oh! why did I meddle with the beastly thing?" And Private Brodribb groaned aloud.

"Oh 'Eavens!" gasped Private Satan, fearfully. "I never thought of the idol. And now it'll be runnin' me to my death, too. Oh, dear! dear! I wish I never touched it!" And Private Satan wrung his hands and snivelled in his hammock.

The Fusiliers were back in the old home quarters at Southshot.

"Hey! hey!" shrieked the messenger boy who had for ten minutes been watching admiringly the sentry on the barrack gate pace his short beat. "Soger runnin' away! Soger desertin'! Guards turn out! Guards turn out!"

The sergeant of the guard came to the door of the guard room.

"Soger runnin' away!" screamed the boy, excitedly.

The sergeant rushed to the gate and looked up the street. The sent y who had been posted at the barrack gate was running up the street.

"Well I'm jiggered!" ejaculated the sergeant, "deserting in broad daylight and in full kit!"

Back he rushed to the guard room.

"Private Stairs, mount guard at the gate! Corporal Hughes, take Dare and Williams and chase Private Brodribb. He's deserting! Sharp!"

Out ran the corporal and his two men. But even as they reached the gate, in rushed the sentry Private Brodribb. With his fixed bayonet at the charge and eyes glaring angrily he ran across the barrack square towards the officers' quarters, thrusting his weapon repea edly in front of him as though trying to transfix some invisib'e, escaping thing.

Digitized by Google

Straight into the officers' quarters he dashed, into the mess-room where the officers sat at lunch. Round the long table he ran twice, stabbing the air in front of him and grinding his teeth in baffled fury; then out, along the corridor; into the quartermaster's room and out again; up the stone staircase into B Company's room; back again and out on to the verandah, followed now by the whole of the officers and a mob of the men.

"Sam Brodribb's gone mad!" was the cry.

To the furthest end of the narrow balcony ran the sentry in his baffled chase of the invisible quarry, making a terrific lunge which sent his bayonet against the stone wall, snapping the steel like matchwood. With a cry Brodribb dropped his rifle and leaping on the edge of the balcony rail in a wild endeavour to grasp the unseen foe, fell twenty feet on to the stone flags in the square below. A score of men rushed to him, but his neck was broken.

"Carry him to the mortuary," ordered the colonel, and the body was conveyed thence to await the surgeon's examination.

The officers and men stood about in groups, discussing the affair, for everyone was struck by the singular similarity which it bore to the circumstances attending the death of Private Fann a few weeks previously.

Suddenly Private Satan emerged from one of the barrack rooms on to the parade ground and staggered, rather than walked, towards the group of officers. He was a young fellow of eighteen and had joined the Army as a bandsboy four years before. His face was white as death and a wild fear was in his eyes as he looked all about him. Going up to the colonel he said, hoarsely:

"I w-w-want my discharge, sir."

The colonel stared. The idea of a man asking for his discharge in such an informal manner! Then the wild terror in Satan's appearance struck him.

"Why do you make that request here?" he asked.

"'Cos I'm afraid of my life!" cried Satan, wildly. "I'm afraid of everything. I wish I was locked up in a lunatic asylum where I'd be safe. Oh, dear! I wish I didn't go with Fann and Brodribb that day. Oh, that orful idol! He'll be runnin' me to my death next!" And Private Satan flung himself down on the dusty parade ground and burst into moans and sobs.

The officers flashed looks of sudden intelligence at each other.

"Private Satan!" said the colonel, sternly, "get up, man! Get up instantly!"

Satan obeyed, moaning and looking about with hunted, terror-stricken eyes.

Round he ran, thrusting savagely with his bayonet.

"Do you know anything about the deaths of Privates Fann and Brodribb?" asked the colonel.

"I knows what they died of," snivelled Satan, "they was—"

"Come to my room," interrupted the colonel.

"Hamilton and D'Arcy, please come, too." And the colonel strode to his room, followed by the major and adjutant, with Private Satan in the rear.

"Sit down, Private Satan," said the colonel. "Now, what do you know about Fann and Brodribb?"

Private Satan drew his handkerchief from his left coat sleeve, wiped his eyes, and replacing the handkerchief, began:

"You remember the iron idol behind the bars of the fakir's tomb in the jungle at Thayetmayo, sir? The one you was always warnin' us not to meddle with?"

"Yes, I remember it perfectly. It was built into the wall of the tomb and protected by an iron grating," said the colonel.

"Well, sir, a month before we left Thayetmayo, me and Sam Brodribb and Jack Fann was strollin' about near the tomb. We'd 'ad a drop of toddy, just enuf to make us lark about reckless like, and when we came to the tomb Jack Fann said:

"'Tell you what, chummies. Three shies a penny at ole physic.'

"And he up with a stone and shied it at the idol. Me and Sam Brodribb joined in, although we knowed you'd punish us if you heard of it, sir, on 'count of the natives thinkin' it a saint. A devil I think it was, now. I wish I'd left it alone," and Satan began to weep afresh.

"Come, come, be a man. Go on with your story," said the colonel.

"Well, sir," continued Satan, "we pelted the idol with stones, the three of us, but not a blessed stone could we throw through the bars, 'though they was three inches apart. Something seemed to turn 'em all aside, and made us fair mad at last.

"'Hang your grinnin' mug!' said Jack Fann, 'you won't be hit, won't you? Have him out, lads. Down with the bars!'

"We was so mad at not bein' able to shy through the bars that we pulled down branches and forced the bars out. Jack Fann put his hand in and grabbed the idol.

"'Come here, you ugly brute,' said he, shakin' it by the throat.

"He was just goin' to dash it down on the ground when we heard a orful screech behind us, and the old yeller priest what lived in the hut near the tomb—you remember him, sir?"

Digitized by Google

"He grabbed it as if it was a life-line chucked to him."

"Perfectly," said the colonel.

"Well, he comes rushing up, screamin' like mad.

"'What ho! Yeller Jack!' sez Fann, 'you wants it, do you? Will you 'ave it now or wait till you gets it?' And he dodges round the tomb with the priest after him, tryin' to grab him and get the idol back.

"'Now! Bob!' sez Jack, and he chucks the idol to me and the priest chases me. Well, we kep' the game up till the ole priest was fair winded and fell in a heap by the side of the tomb. I was holdin' the idol then.

"'Let the pore ole beggar 'ave it now, Bob,' sez Sam, and I chucked the idol at him.

"He grabbed it as if it was a life-line chucked to him and him drownin'. Then he gets up, and clawin' his right hand towards us he pushed the grinnin' iron idol into our faces.

"'As you have treated me,' sez he, 'so shall he treat you.' And he pointed to the idol. 'But you,' sez he, 'shall be run to death.' And then he folds the idol in his gown and goes off to his hut.

"We laffs and goes back to barracks and thinks no more about the bizness excep' as a good joke among ourselves, for we was afraid to tell of it 'cos we knowed we'd get it hot from you, sir, for interfering with the natives' religion. We was afraid, too, of the ole priest comin' and tellin' you, sir. But it seems he did'nt.

"The night after Jack Fann died"—Private Satan shuddered and looked fearfully about the room—"Sam Brodribb sez to me:

"'Bob, it was the idol he was chasin'!'

"'Oh, horrors!' sez I, and I turned cold to the marrer at the thought.

"'I knows it,' sez Sam, 'I feels it in my bones. You remember what the yeller priest said about our bein' run to death? Well that's what happened to Jack. And it's what'll happen to me. And it's what'll happen to you, Bob Satan. We're doomed men, Bob,' sez Sam.

"And since then I've lived in 'ell," said Private Satan, wringing his hands. "Wherever I am I expect to see that awful idol beck'nin' me to chase him. He ran Sam to death to-day, and now I'll be next." And Private Satan buried his face in his hands and groaned in utter despair.

The three officers looked at each other gravely. They had each spent years in India and knew enough of that land of mystery to treat Satan's story seriously.

"And you wish to purchase your discharge, Satan?" said the colonel.

"Yes, sir. No, sir. I doan' know what to do," groaned poor Satan despairingly.

"Well, return to your quarters now, and I'll think matters over," said the colonel, and Private Satan rose, saluted, and retired dejectedly.

"Queer story, major," said the colonel.

"Heard queerer ones," returned the major, "and they were true."

"Wish they'd left the thing alone," said the colonel. "I always hated that idol somehow. It looked so human."

"What is to be done about Satan, sir?" asked the adjutant.

"Upon my word I hardly know," said the colonel. "What can we do? We can't tie him up with ropes to prevent an invisible Burmese idol leading him on a chase to his death. Better let him buy out, I suppose. However, we'll see what frame of mind he's in to-morrow."

But next day the subject of Private Satan, although uppermost in the minds of the three officers, had to be held over owing to a sudden call for the regiment to furnish a strong draft for South Africa.

* * * * *

A group of colliers sat on the hillside a couple of miles outside of Southshot in the cool of the summer evening.

"Well, now," remarked one, "that soldier down there is enjoying himself all alone and no mistake."

"Ketchin' butterflies, ain't he?" said another.

"Looks like it. But my gosh, how excited he's gettin' over it. Look how they're dodgin' him! And yet I can't see a sign of a blessed butterfly!"

"I say," put in an older man, rising to his feet, "he's pritty reckless where he's going! He's runnin' full pelt for the old shaft. Hoy!" he roared.

But the scarlet-coated figure rushed on unheeding towards a disused old pit shaft, level with the ground and covered with a deceitful bramble growth.

"Good gracious!" shrieked the collier, "he's gone!"

And followed by his companions, he rushed to the shaft-head. But the soldier had fallen three hundred yards into the cold, black waters that filled the old workings and flowed swiftly for miles underground.

And such was the death of Private Satan.

W. J. Ormiston.

Digitized by Google

A WOMAN'S PRIVILEGE.

AWAY up in the north countree, under the shadow of a long range of purple-brown hills, lies the pretty rural village of Shelsdon.

Not a hundred yards from the finger-post at the four cross roads, and immediately facing the village pump, stands the old toll-house, in which lived Widow Clark and her niece, Phœbe Turner.

Phœbe had lived at Shelsdon with her Aunt Clark since she was thirteen, and nine years had transformed the awkward, colty-looking girl into a lithe, supple, and decidedly pretty young woman. March had gone out with a roar, and April had come in with a smile.

Phœbe was sunning herself on the doorstep. From time to time she cast a hasty, inquisitive glance up the road. On Monday the last "Cinderella" of the season had taken place at the Market Hall, Bessborough. Bessborough was the county town, and from the High Cross at Shelsdon to the Market Hall at Bessborough was reckoned two miles.

Some anonymous admirer had sent Phœbe Turner a ticket for the dance, and asked her to wear cherry-coloured ribbons in her hair.

Phœbe had gone to the ball and worn the ribbons. This morning, as she gazed up the road towards Bessborough, her pretty face wore a discontented and somewhat peevish expression.

"Toosday, Wednesday, Thursday," she muttered, walking down to the edge of the footway. "'Twas Thursday as he said."

The miller's team from Hillingham were slaking their thirst at the water trough. It was the black team which had gained a prize at the county show, and a little knot of admirers were gathered round it. She stood watching the animals with a listless pre-occupied air till the waggoner set them in motion and scattered the crowd. Then she turned back towards the house.

"I'm gatten main tired, O' Shelsdon, I am," she murmured, lips pouting and eyes glistening. "'Tis nobbut blither an' blether wi' all of 'em. Job's allus goin' to do summat gran', but hoo's done nowt yet: an' course I maun sit mum till he likes t' whistle an' heed to nobbody's chirpin' but his'n. Aye! 'tis the men will put on you, abooye a bit—if yo' lat 'em. But I did think as Mr. ——"

Suddenly the girl stopped. She had caught sight of a well-known figure emerging from the big iron gates of Shelston Manor. It was the postman. An eager, expectant look leapt into her eyes. She walked forward a few yards to meet him. The man handed her a letter.

Phœbe glanced at the envelope, and the light in her eyes went out.

* * * * *

Phœbe was standing at the little table in the parlour with the letter in her hand. Once or twice she glanced at it in a half-contemptuous sort of way, finally throwing it down with a gesture of scornful impatience. It was the unexpected which had happened.

Phœbe had been counting the days since Monday. "Somebody" had promised her a letter on Thursday; but Thursday had come without bringing the letter. Fate, indeed, had played a trick on her.

"'Tis nobbut th' owd song fro' Job," she whined fretfully. "'Tis allus the same toon as he plays, an' I'm fair sick o' list'nin' to ut!"

She flung herself into the big armchair. Her eyes were misty with tears, her lips quivered with vexation.

"He canna have forgotten, sure-lie," she said, playing with the corner of her apron.

Five minutes passed. Her eyes wandered to the table. She leant forward, stretched out her hand, and picked up the neglected letter. Still she delayed to open it. Twice she let it fall while she sat absorbed in herself, seeing nothing about her, but following some will-o'-the-wisp fancy which had started across the waste spaces of her mind.

"Hey, dear!" she said presently, shaking herself together, "I be gatten the blues I do think," and tearing open the envelope with a petulant little movement she began to read the letter. The next minute she was calling up the stairs:

"Auntie! Auntie! 'Tis come. Job's sent for me, sure 'nuff. I'm to start o' the nineteenth! Dost hear? Be sharp down. I've suthin to show 'ee—suthin as'll mak thee stare till tha winna b'leeve thee can see straight!" And, running back to he parlour, the girl picked up a slip of pink-coloured paper which had been folded inside the letter.

"Well, naa, that's real nice of him," she murmured. "Hey! but Job's none such a bad lot, after all; an'—I really—do—luv—him," she added, her eyes still fixed on the bit of pink paper.

Suddenly she lost sight of it. She was in Bessborough Market Hall. It was the night of the Cinderella Ball. She was sitting out a dance with Mr. Frank Eversley, and certain words which had been whispered in her ear while she leisurely consumed the ice-pudding and other trifles which her cavalier had brought her recurred to her so vividly that she blushed at the recollection, even, as she had blushed when she had felt the warm breath of the speaker hot upon her cheek.

Digitized by Google

"Job's been yawin' about so long," she said to herself in justificatory tones; "sure, he canna' blame me if a gentleman as meets me in th' lane, wi' nobbutt mysel' to speak to, akses if he may walk wi' me to th' end on't. 'There'll be dozens of 'em,' said he, 'ready to snap 'ee up, when I'm not to-forrard to keep un aff.' He know'd it then, he did. He shu'd ha' sent sooner. How many years, I won'er, does a man expect a woman to sit mum at the stile a-waitin' for him?

"Would he be mad now if that wench o' Maybury's towd him that somebody sent me a ticket for the ball, and that I danced fower times with somebody? Well, 'tis nobbody but Job's ownsel's to blame. He shu'd ha' sent sooner, he shu'd."

She glanced again at the slip of coloured paper held between her fingers, and as her eye rested on it her heart melted towards the old love, who was divided from her by the whole width of the Atlantic.

"Poor old Job!" she murmured regretfully; "poor old Job!"

At this moment Widow Clark came into the room.

"Well, child, what hast gatten? Is Job foun' a fortin?" And the old lady laughed dubiously.

"When tha's done laughin', auntie, I'll show thee suthin' as'll mak thee begin agen," said Phœbe, who had hidden her hands behind her back.

"There!" she cried, suddenly spreading out the bank-draft on the little table; "look at that! That's what I've gatten: 'On demand pay to Phœbe Turner, or order'—I doan know what that's putten for—'the sum of Twenty Pounds.' Read it, aunt; read it thasel'."

She thrust the slip of pink paper into the old lady's hand, and went skipping about the room.

"Well," said Widow Clark, looking at her niece, "I allus did say yo'd better be born lucky than rich."

"An' I'm to go in the Sardinian, on the nineteenth," cried Phœbe, clapping her hands. "Sit down, auntie, sit thee down, while I finish th' letter."

A sheet of paper was lying on the floor. Phœbe had brushed it off the table in whirling round the room. She picked it up and began reading. By the time she got to the signature, the Bessborough Ball had faded from her mind; and her heart had gone back to the honest laddie who had left Shelsdon two years ago, to make a home for her 3,000 miles nearer the sunset.

"Well, well! won'ers 'll never cease. To think o' Job Tharn makin' his fortin'," was Widow Clark's comment as she left the room.

In the ill-written, ill-spelt letter of the old love, with its handsome inclosure for outfit and passage, the mercurial Phœbe found present compensation for her disappointment in not hearing from the new. She dutifully determined straightway to forget Mr. Frank Eversley, only son of the wealthy miller at Hillingham, and forthwith began to set about making preparations for the journey.

When the Bessborough postman handed in a letter in the evening addressed in a smart, neat hand, to "Miss Turner," Phœbe took it diffidently, slipped in into her pocket stealthily, and determined to destroy it at the first opportunity.

"I'll put un in the fire, I will. That's what I'll do wi' un."

But the letter was tumbled out of her pocket a few hours later when searching for some trifle before going to bed.

"Well, naa!" she exclaimed in tones of wonderment, a conscious blush overspreading her features at sight of it. She regarded the envelope with curious attention.

"I won'er what's in it?" she murmured, turning it over in meditative fashion. There was a monogram on the back. Phœbe had never received such an aristocratic-looking missive in her life before. The embossed letters in blue and gold seemed to fascinate her. Her resolution was obviously wavering. She sat down to think.

Over the washstand she had pinned a motto: "Do nothing rashly," she repeated, as the words caught her eye.

"'Tis plain as day I maun read the letter. It wur doin' rashly to take up with Job, an' prumise him all as he liked t' ask for. Of course," she ran on, "I needn' answer it—and then——"

Phœbe sighed. The prospect did not seem to offer much that was consoling. All this time the letter lay in her lap, her fingers fumbling it nervously. She was still casting about for an excuse to silence her scruples.

"Sure-lie a fren' can write to me if he wants to," she continued, toying with the letter, "and after him asking permission, too; 'twould be a sin not to read it. Job never said as I was to read no letters but his. Of course, I maun read it. 'Tis my letter, an' how'll I know what to do wi' him else?"

Phœbe read the letter—read it twice over—and for half-an-hour, by the little watch which hung on the wall, sat with it open in her hands. Then she got up, replaced it carefully in the envelope, and put it—back in her pocket.

* * * * *

At the lumber mills on White Oak River, Province of Quebec, Canada, the chips were flying, the saws whirring, and the air pungent with the aroma of fresh-cut pine. A man in a short jacket and long boots strode into the sawing shed, whistling a stave of "Annie Laurie."

The man driving the big "circular" looked up.

"Wal, Job, lad," he inquired, while his rugged features shaped themselves into a smile, "hast got th' cage 'bout fixed for that purty singin' bird what yo' catched owr yonner?"

"Owd Zac's putten the las' coat on this mornin'. The fixin's'll be up termorrer, an' by Sad'day, bless yo', she'll be fit for a princess. Ev'rything spick an' span, right an' reddy—bootiful as paint an' fit's a fiddle."

"Wal, mate, her pictur's that of a sonsie lass, an' she's wuth workin' for if she's waited two years for her man. There's many 'ud a sprung to the saddle an' ridden away. Lasses be kittle cattle. Yo' con never mak' sure of 'em when thee bain't fulin' roun' wi' 'em."

Jem Garrett and Job Thorn were partners running the lumber mill at White Oak. Garrett was a tall, bronzed, and bearded man of five and fifty "fur Lancasheer," who seven years before had buried his wife at the foot of the Rockies, and lost nearly all he possessed in an Indian raid on the Bow River. At Maple Creek he had stumbled across Job Thorn, took a liking to the lad, and the pair had chummed together ever since.

The men had occupied their leisure in building a pretty log house. There was a flower bed in front of the door, and a trellised veranda, which was continued round the sides, added a further attraction to the modest little dwelling. A panel inserted in the topmost bar of the white painted gate bore the word "Shelsdon" written in letters of brightest blue.

Digitized by Google

This was to be the home of Phœbe Turner, when that much-expected young person should assume the name and responsibilites of Mrs. Job Thorn.

And now at last the hour had struck, the "cage" was ready, and the "bird" was on the wing.

"Good-bye, lad, good-bye, an' joy be wi' thee," said Garrett as he shook Job by the hand on that eventful Saturday morning. "Yo'll hear th' cow-horn's min' soon's you turn Clem's Corner. The boys ha' been practising for a week."

* * * * *

In the wee sma' hours of Saturday, April 25th, the R.M.S. Sardinian was steaming up the St. Lawrence. She had made a phenomenal passage. At breakfast everybody was congratulating the commander on breaking the record. The passengers began mustering on deck.

By the round-house a young man and woman were engaged in animated conversation.

"Oh! Franky dear," she was saying, "of course, I b'lieve ut. But promise me again—promise never, never to lea' me. If he shud be at the wharf I think I shud die. Oh! 'twas madness dear, as prompted yo' to come—I owt never to have towd thee, I s'pose; but ——"

She gave a deep sigh and looked absently towards the strange new Canadian shores.

"Frank," she said suddenly, turning her eyes full on him. "I'm trustin' all to yo' dear. Yo'll——"

"Of course I will, darling. There, don't worry," interrupted the young man.

"Yo' canna' think what a dre'ful bad fright I got the mornin' as we left Liverpool. When I saw yo' standin' there by the smoke-room door I was just ready to sink thro' the deck. Oh, dear!" with another long sigh, "I thowt 'twas all 'flam' what tha' said. I thowt tha' did'n really mean it——an' I doan know now whether I be mos' glad or sorry.

"I s'pose 'tis hard on Job; but," looking at him fondly, "I'm fain to tak' thee, dearie, sin' tha's crossed th' water to be wi' me."

"And quarrelled with the governor, upset the mater, and—why dost ta knaw, my lass," he dropped into dialect now and then to humour her, "that my folk wunnot guess where I am till they get a cable."

"Frank, dear," she murmured, gazing passionately into his face, "I know yo' luv me—luv me; yes, more than yo' can tell. I knew ut weeks before yon happy night i' Bessboro'. Dost remember a walk thro' Hillingham Lane when th' snadraps wur a comin' oot?"

He put his arm about her and cooed softly in her ear. She let her head fall upon his breast, smiling up at him with ineffable content.

"We was happy then, Frank," she said shyly.

"And you're happy now, dear, eh?"

A slight shiver convulsed her frame.

"Job," she stammered, "doan 'lat me see him. I doan want t' see him," then her voice broke and the tears began to fall.

"Was ever such a silly little goose! In an hour

For any occasion

that requires a sustaining and nourishing food in the smallest compass, one readily taken and easily digested and assimilated by even the most feeble constitution, Bovril is without a peer.

For travellers deprived of regular meals, Bovril is an invaluable standby; it strengthens and fortifies the system against attacks of disease; it invigorates and builds up in convalescence.

BOVRIL

Digitized by Google

dear, we shall be at Quebec—nearly twenty-four hours before we're expected."

"What shall we do, Frank?" she asked timidly.

"Do? Get married as soon as we land. I know a dozen places where we can get the job done in five minutes for a dollar."

She glanced at him anxiously.

"Tied up, fair and square, Phœbe—tight as Book and bishop can bind us."

"An' then, dear?" the slightest suspicion of a quiver agitating her voice.

"Just you leave that to me, my pretty."

"Job won't be able to——"

"Don't bother this charming little head about Job." He was stroking the rich brown tresses which hung thickly about the little head. "You're my property now."

She huddled closer to him.

"I've written a letter for Mr. Thorn. There's a bank draft inclosed for that money, and I've told him that you've simply exercised a woman's privilege, and changed your mind."

* * * * *

Two days after the phenomenal run of the Sardinian had been cabled to England there was a big blaze at White Oak, and next morn ng Job Thorn was missing, while the pretty log-house which had stood in the clearing was discovered to be in ashes.

* * * * *

Mr. Frank Eversley yawned, stretched himself, and throwing back the well-poised, carefully-brushed head he was so proud of, stared blankly up at the boarding-house ceiling. In front of him lay a letter received that morning from England. It bore the Bessboro' postmark, and was directed in a familiar hand, that of Mr. Eversley senior. It was the second communication of a similar kind which the post had brought within a month.

The writer intimated that, while willing to make reasonable excuse for a young man's folly, it would be a gross neglect of duty on the part of a father not to put his foot down firmly when he found his son "plunging," in a mad attempt to recover gambling losses on the turf. "To go off in a 'pet,'" the writer went on, "with only half-a-dozen lines left behind, to say that they would hear from him later on, was both cruel to his mother and disrespectful to his father; but, after fifteen weeks, it was surely time the breach was healed. His debts had now been paid, and there was no reason why he should not return home. Squire Fotherby, up at the Hall, was always wanting to know whether the lad would be back in time for the pheasants."

"It's a beastly nuisance!" ejaculated Frank Eversley, watching a fly progressing slowly across the yellow plaster. "A beastly nuisance. I must get that attorney fellow, Hueffler, to put it through for me. Of course, I always knew it would come to this. But I don't find the job so easy now the hour's struck."

He mused awhile, drawing down his brows.

"I ain't half sorry now that she fired up like a furze-bush the other day, about staying on at the boarding-house. It'll make the road a bit smoother—for me.

"When was I going to make a home for her, eh? Job, she said, had got the house ready before ever he sent for her; but she'd been married now over thirteen weeks, and still wanted a home. H'm!

"Married? Well, it's convenient for me that she thinks so! Yes, Hueffler's the man for this job. I'll leave a bit of paper for her, and get 'Dukey' to break it gently."

* * * * *

"No occasion, Mr. Eversley, for you to be troubled in the matter at all," said "Dukey" (Marmaduke) Hueffler, the boss attorney of Watersville, State of Indiana. "Just sign these papers and make an affidavit, and we can get a nullity pronounced in the Third Court on the ground of informality. The lady, I presume, will not contest it. You can slip away quietly, and after you're gone we'll serve her with the papers. There'll be no time lost in getting a decision; and by next mail we'll communicate the result."

* * * * *

"Phœbe, dear," said Frank Eversley, hurriedly. The bell was ringing for dinner, and the boarders were hastening to their places. "I had a letter this mor ing which makes it imperative for me to return to England for awhile—a business letter," he added shamefacedly. She looked at him steadily.

"You won't mind ——"

"You don't mean to come back to me," she interrupted sharply; her woman's instinct reading something in his face, which her keen eye saw there. The bell stopped ringing.

"Come down to dinner now, and I'll explain afterwards," he urged.

But Phœbe had gone back into the room and closed the door with a bang.

* * * * *

Twelve months later a weary-looking man, in a coarse serge suit, was passing down the Bowery in New York City. A woman, meeting him, suddenly rushed off the sidewalk and threw herself in front of an approaching tramcar. In an instant the man had dashed after her. Covering her face with her hands, the woman sobbed hysterically. The man, trembling in every limb, bore her to a place of safety. Not a word was spoken, but the "touch-electric" revealed to Job that he held Phœbe clasped within his arms.

* * * * *

"Ha! thee heerd th' noos?" asked one gossip of another meeting one morning in early June under the shadow of the High Cross opposite the toll-house at Shelsdon.

"Job Tharn an' Phœbe Turner be gotten married."

"Never!"

"Aye! 'tis jes' true. 'Tis Job hissel' who sends th' letter."

"Well! after that, I'll nobbut say as sky woan fall."

"Aye, they've takken ther time to fin' ther tongues."

The brief paragraph which had appeared in the Watersville Sentinel had never given Mr. Frank Eversley a moment's uneasiness. The obscure western print was never likely to be seen by English eyes.

The paragraph ran:

"Mr. Frank Eversley, of this town, has obtained a divorce from his wife. The knot seems to have been tied very loosely by some person not properly qualified to perform the ceremony."

For a few weeks Job Thorn and Phœbe Turner filled every mouth in Shelsdon; but before harvest-end fresh food for gossip had been found in the announcement that a marriage had been arranged between Frank Eversley, esquire, of Harleyford Mills, and Emma Fotherby, only daughter of Squire Fotherby, of Hillingham Hall.

Hupert Bartlett.

Digitized by Google

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

TOO STOUT

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

Free

From the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., if this paper is named, a booklet on the Skin and a FREE SAMPLE of

"Antexema."

It is absolutely the most wonderful Skin Cure that has ever been discovered. It gives immediate relief from itching and burning and cures all skin diseases and every form of Eczema.

1/1½ BOTTLES, post free for 1/3.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,
63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.
THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once; they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s½d. tins.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

NOSE

MACHINES. LEES RAY, S. S. Dept., South Castle St. Liverpool, is a specialist on Ugly and Red Noses. Send stamp for particulars of his patent scientific Nose Improvers. Red Nose Cure, medically approved, 3/9. Outstanding Ear Machines 11/6.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 105 Oxford Street, London, W.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Lendscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

THE BEST OF ALL BEVERAGES
AND THE CHEAPEST.

GOOD!
IT'S MASON'S
Extract of Herbs

8 Gallons Prime Beer for 6d.

Sample Free for 9 Stamps.
AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

NEWBALL & MASON,
NOTTINGHAM.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIDUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award in addition to the above, either ten of our silver-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, October 29th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A penknife will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 241.

A DOCUMENT: a personal pronoun; a verb; a vowel; an excrescence; joyful; a building material.

The equivalents of these name a great statesman.

No. 242.

RE-ARRANGE the following letters, so as to form a double-word square, the connecting word of which is a means of travelling:

A B EEEEEE II L MM NN OOOO RR SSSS TTTTTT.

No. 243.

A FLOWER; an imitation of gold; an actor; what children dislike; a comfort; to irritate; a task.

My initials and finals express respectively what the reader of this page does, and what he likes to do.

No. 244.

My 8, 4, 9, 3, grows in every garden.
My 2, 10, 11, 7, 8, is to permit.
My 5, 2, 6, is a game of cards.
My 1, 4, 11, 10, is what most cyclists carry.

I am a word of eleven letters, and give the name of a well-known man.

No. 245.

THE equivalents of the following each contain three consecutive letters, which, put together in the same order, give a well-known proverb:

A foreign coin; bearing; a Surrey town; a stride; snakes; forwarded; an English health resort; spare time; immaculate.

No. 246.

THE social scale is of no avail,
To all my FIRST is a dower,
And the female, likewise the male,
Are in FIRST of equal power.

In physical skill my SECOND will Make proficient all who essay,
And the ladies, again, of nought complain,
As in SECOND they have their day.

But to come to the test, my WHOLE is the best,
Especially when a prize it may render,
And the answer you'll find is the work of the mind
Of the masculine or feminine gender.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 217 to 222.

THE first prize of £2 has been awarded to Mr. Charles Stephens, of 28 Sandringham Road Fratton, Portsmouth, whose solution was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "The Legacy of Hate," by Theo Douglas, has been sent to the following:

W. J. Barter, Douglas Street, Cork.
Miss M. Smith, Alma Road, Sheerness.
H. B. Thompson, Bracknell, Berks.
Miss L. Kellehar, Bannockburn Road, Plumstead.
S. Harrall, Station Road, Plumstead.
H. Cammack, Radcliffe Street, Liverpool.
Mrs. Bailles, Kingsland Road, N.E.
J. M. Child, Clarence Street, Derby.
E. G. Luck, Hazlebury Road, Fulham.
Miss May Seccombe, Balmoral Road, New Brompton.

SOLUTION OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 223 to 228.

No. 223. Wey, yew, Wye.

No. 224. Silence.

No. 225. "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

No. 226.

```
L impl D
b O ro U s he N e it mi LD ew
p ige O n
N otio N
```

No. 227. DONKEY.

No. 228.

```
M a Y
O rang E
N u N
E ch O
Y a M
```

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " "	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half " "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.
Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 23rd, if intended for the issue on sale Nov. 6th, and dated November 10th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

JOHN NOBLE'S CUSTOMERS

Are sending letters by every post to say that "The Costumes and Manties now being sent out from Brook Street Mills, Manchester, are BETTER VALUE THAN EVER."

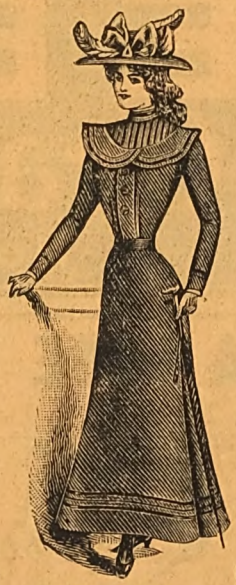
All orders despatched by Parcel Post without delay. Mourning Orders sent off at One Day's Notice.

JOHN NOBLE HAS A SPECIAL STAFF OF SKILLED MILLINERS.

THE NEW FASHION CATALOGUE
Post Free.

AUTUMN & WINTER DRESS FABRICS.

A Large Box of Patterns of the Latest Novelties and of Standard Fabrics lent to select from, and sent Carriage Paid to any "Short Stories" reader.



Model 255.
FASHIONABLE COAT AND SKIRT.

Consists of double-breasted Tailor-fashioned Coat, stitched round collar, cuffs and edge 10/6 with White or Black as desired. Skirt of latest shape with box-pleat back. Produced in John Noble Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating. Price 10/6 complete; carriage, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d. extra. HAT trimmed as sketch, 8/6; carriage 6d.

Model 256.

Made in John Noble Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating, consisting of Blouse Bodice, with velvet revers, prettily trimmed black and white. Plain fashionable Skirt, with one box-pleat 10/6 Price complete, only 10/6; carriage, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d. extra. HAT, as sketch, 7/6; carriage, 6d. extra.

Model 296.

Smartly made Dress in Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating. Bodice trimmed Ribbon Velvet and well lined.

Lengths and Prices:

36	39	42	46	50 ins.
9/9	10/6	11/6	12/6	13/6 each

Carriage, 6d. extra.

Model 339.
LADY'S CAPE. SPECIAL VALUE.

Well-made Cape, in good black cloth, trimmed on collar and down fronts black fur. A comfortable garment of 8/6 good appearance and the best value on the market. Price only 8/6; carriage, 6d.

Well trimmed Toque, 6/11; carriage, 6d.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE
of the two good durable cloths in which costumes are made.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of Costume Coating or Cheviot Serge (6yds. 52ins. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d.

Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Fawn, Khaki, Grey, and Royal Blue.

Sizes in stock of Ladies' Costumes are 34, 36, 38 ins. round bust (under arms); Waist, 24, 26, 28 ins.; Skirts being 38, 40, 42 ins. long in front. Any other size made to measure, 1/6 extra.

Readers will oblige by kindly naming "SHORT STORIES" when writing to

JOHN NOBLE LTD.,
Dept. No. 16,
Brook Street Mills, MANCHESTER.

THE JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS

Thoroughly well-made in strong Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket.

Lengths and Prices:

21	24	27	30	33 in.
1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6 ea.
36	39	42	45 in.
4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Carriage, 4d. extra.

Cap, as sketch, 1/- Postage, 2d.

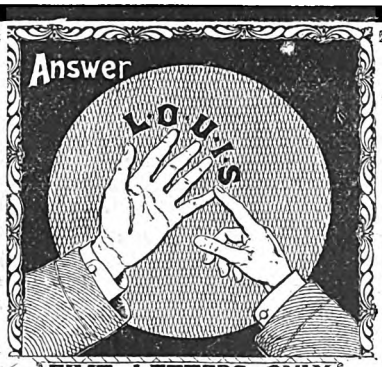
Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when you buy.

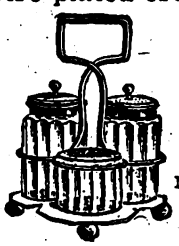
EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

ZEBRA Grate Polish

No Hard Work.

MASTERS' Electro-plated Cruets.



No. 32W

BREAKFAST CRUET.
Electro-plated on Nickel Silver, Price 1 /-.

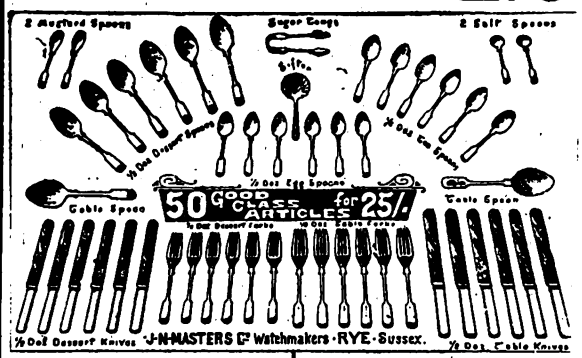
No 3: W

BREAKFAST CRUET.
Cut Glass Bottles, Electro-plated Stand, Price 10/6.

"4 Albany Place, Montpelier, Bristol.
"9 1/1900.

"Dear Sirs,—I herewith acknowledge receipt of cutlery received last evening, which gives entire satisfaction. I am, indeed, pleased with same, and shall do all I can to recommend you to my friends.
"Yours truly, A. SAVAGE."

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6



WE will send post paid, to any reader of Short Stories one of these monster 25/- parcels containing 50 articles on receipt of 2/6.

IF you do not approve of them we will return your 2/6 in full.

IF you approve of them, you send us 2/6 on receipt, and 5/- each month for four months=25/-.

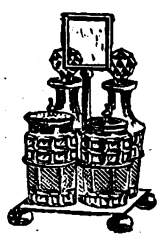
BUT when you see the parcel, should you prefer to send the balance at once, send only 10/6 more, as we allow 3/- discount to those who pay cash.

OR you may send 22/- at once, and if you do not approve of the parcel we will refund the money if returned within seven days.

LIST OF CONTENTS.

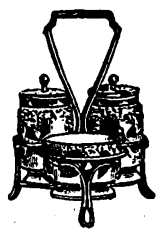
	Prices separate. s.	d.
6 Good Quality White Bone-Handled Table Knives	3	6
6 ditto Dessert Knives	3	0
6 Good Quality White Metal Table Forks	5	3
6 ditto Dessert Forks	3	9
2 ditto Table Spoons	1	9
6 ditto Dessert Spoons	3	0
6 ditto Tea Spoons	2	0
1 pair ditto Sugar Tongs	1	0
1 only Sugar Sifter	1	6
6 ditto Egg Spoons	1	6
1 pair ditto Salt Spoons	1	0
1 pair ditto Mustard Spoons	1	0
50 Table Articles, value	29	0

MASTERS' High-Class Cruets.



No. 50W

LUNCHEON CRUET.
4 Bottles, Cut Glass, Electro-plated Stand. Price £1 1s.



No. 2W

BREAKFAST CRUET.
China Bottles, Electro-plated Stand, Price 7/-.

CATALOGUE containing 1208 illustrations of Watches, Clocks, Rings, Chains, and all kinds of Jewellery, Gladstone Bags, Walking Sticks, &c., &c.
POST FREE.

J. N. MASTERS LTD., WATCHMAKERS, JEWELLERS, &c., RYE, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

£100 A WEEK IN FOOTBALL PRIZES. See PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 617. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 27TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

JUST LOOK HERE!

6,000,000

Boxes Yearly.

Which means Every Time the Clock Ticks ELEVEN BEECHAM'S PILLS have reached their destination.

FOR HALF A CENTURY

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Have been "Globe-Trotting" and have worked their way into the innermost parts.

It's well to know a GOOD THING when you see it.
It's better to have a GOOD THING when you can. BEECHAM'S PILLS should always be handy, and handed down to posterity as

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"HAIR LIKE AN ENGLISH WOMAN."

That is the generally expressed desire of a foreigner. To have hair like an English woman. Hair is a woman's chief adornment, but hair to be nice must have nice treatment. Hair must be stimulated to live.

Continual brushing does this, and nothing else does it as effectually. Our grandmothers, and even our mothers, knew this so well that hair brushing was one of the most important features of their toilet. Half an hour at night and half an hour in the morning were thought none too long a time to devote to this. If this attention cannot be given, recourse must be had to a stimulant, and as a stimulant for the hair there is none so safe and so effective as the discovery of Mr. Geo. R. Sims, called by him "TATCHO," which is the Romany word for "genuine."

Geo. R. Sims' Hair Renewer "Tatcho."

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous liquor, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair, but more especially with those that have not received their quantum of care.

If you value your appearance—and who does not?—get a bottle of "TATCHO" to-day. The result will surprise you and be intensely gratifying.

"TATCHO" will stop the hair falling, and will make it beautiful in texture and double in volume.

"TATCHO" gives vitality to the hair at once, and after a few days of treatment its youthful brightness; and what is more, this vitality and brightness may be retained.

Mrs. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, uses nothing but "TATCHO."

Geo. R. Sims' Hair Renewer, "Tatcho," is obtainable of all perfumers, 2/9 & 5/- per Bottle; or can be had direct in plain wrapper on sending 2/11 or 5/3.

ADDRESS

The Geo. R. Sims Co.,

81c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

SAMPLE TRIAL BOTTLES 1/6 TO-DAY.

Sent post free in plain package, twenty-one stamps.

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY.

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD, will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,

7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED

Permanently by using my Depilatory, the only effectual remedy known. Painless to the skin and painless in operation. Those ladies who have been disappointed with worthless preparations should give it a trial. By its use no one need suffer from the annoyance any longer. Easy to apply and guaranteed to—with one application—remove every Hair, and in a short time absolutely Destroy the Roots. Hundreds of Testimonials. Full particulars sent free on receipt of stamped envelope.—Address, Mrs. J. E. TERRY, 46 Sternhold Avenue, Streatham Hill.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lbs., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 617.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending Oct. 27th, 1900.

A FEAST OF FICTION

HIS MYSTERIOUS CORRESPONDENT.

"MISS MARSHFIELD," said the junior partner of the great firm of Vaughn, Cleveland, and Vaughn, "I want you to do me a favour."

He was sitting on a corner of his desk, hands in pockets, and swinging one foot, rather impatiently his secretary thought.

"Well, I shall be pleased to. What is it?"

"Have you read any of those letters signed Nevada in the 'Metropolitan?'"

"Nevada?" Miss Marshfield considered for a moment, then replied: "Yes I have. Why do you ask?"

"Well, you have excellent taste in literature. Don't you consider them remarkable?"

"Why, I don't know that I do, though they are fairly good, I believe."

"Ah, you are penurious with adjectives, I recollect. Now, I think they are far above the average, and I should like to discover the identity of this Nevada. She interests me intensely."

"You think Nevada is a woman, then?"

"Why, yes, I should judge so. Shouldn't you?"

"I haven't given the subject much thought."

"Oh, I'm reasonably sure it's a woman, and what I want of you is to discover her for me."

Miss Marshfield looked her astonishment, and asked:

"Why not try it yourself?"

"I have tried, and failed ignominiously. The unspeakableness of the sphinx is garrulity beside the silence those publishers have chosen to wrap about Nevada, and there seems no way of breaking it."

"But the silence is probably according to the instructions of Nevada herself. so how can I hope to break it?"

"Why, that's what I can't exactly see. I thought perhaps your woman's wit would suggest a way. You seem to be on a friendly footing with literary people; you might get some information from that source."

"You are wrong about my footing with literary people. I know very few, and am afraid I cannot be of the least use to you in this matter."

"What a wet blanket you can be on occasion. Miss Marshfield, I insist on being shown the respect due to the tail of this firm. Won't you please turn round again for a moment?"

"There's a large grist of letters to-day," she reminded him, turning partially about.

"Yes, yes, I daresay, there generally is; but, Miss Marshfield, I'm not joking about this thing. I want to know the author of those letters—man or woman."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"The question of sex does not influence your desire for acquaintance, then?"

The secretary's penetrating gaze was fixed on her typewriter, and she asked the question with apparent carelessness.

"Not at all; though, as I told you, I feel reasonably sure it is a woman."

"But granting that, you cannot feel reasonably sure

"HAVE YOU READ ANY OF THOSE LETTERS SIGNED NEVADA IN THE "METROPOLITAN"

she is a person you would wish to know. She may be a nobody notwithstanding those articles."

"Not likely, I should say. Such talents as hers don't go a-begging. You know there is no caste in genius."

"No? I am glad of that."

"You speak as though you had been doubtful on the subject."

"Not in my own mind; but I don't know what might be your opinion."

"I see you are not inclined to be enthusiastic with me over this new writer. The simple truth is that he or she, whichever it may be, has cast a spell upon me. I never saw such imagery, such magic with words."

For a member of a firm dealing in machinery and requiring a practical knowledge of business, Russell Vaughn was about as unpractical a man as could have been found; that is to say, he would have been if he had given his imagination free rein and followed after the things which most allured him.

But the mind of Vaughn, the elder, was fervently set on seeing his favourite son in his own place at the head of the firm, and Russell was pre-eminently a dutiful son. He had sat at the desk on which he now reclined for ten years, and the constant effort to discipline his faculties down to the basis of machinery had worn indelible little grooves between his eyebrows.

He had been a deep student, was still a deep student, so far as his duties would permit. The powers alone knew in what firmament he might have shone had he not sprung from a commercial race, with whom precedent was immutable law. His grandfather had dealt in machinery, likewise his father, so he, too, dealt in machinery, though under silent protest.

Previous to being taken into the firm he had spent several years in foreign travel, and these had been the happiest years of his life. He had recorded their experiences in a small volume, written in a whimsical style, which publishers seemed to find "not available," for after two or three trials of them he had concluded to "climb up some other way," as he laughingly expressed it to his secretary. The book was brought out at his own expense, and, though it had not become famous, had received many favourable press notices and been warmly welcomed by people not too much sated with travel to look at it through his fanciful eyes.

Miss Marshfield had read it and given it an honoured place in her library. She had spoken warmly of many things it contained as agreeing with impressions of her own formed amid the same scenes, and this served to strengthen the friendship which had grown up between them during the three years in which she had been with the firm, a friendship platonic to all appearances.

Of the two, the stenographer had the greater adaptability. In the three years she had mastered the details of their immense trade, and her keen insight and quick memory were relied on by all three partners.

"Talk about a woman being illogical," said the elder Vaughn, "that young woman in the office is worth a dozen rattle-pated dudes," and in proof of his appreciation her surroundings were comfortable to a degree bordering on luxury.

"Such magic with words," echoed Miss Marshfield thoughtfully. "Have you considered that there is apt to be a wide breach between the personality of an author and his writings?"

"No, I had not thought of it—not particularly."

"I could point you to many notable examples."

"Oh, yes, I daresay there are examples, but you must admit that in a world the size of this there are examples of almost everything."

"I did not mean to imply a rule, of course, but I think genius is often like a bright-winged spirit confined in a house of very common clay. Your Nevada might prove a disappointment if you succeeded in finding her. Better be content with the articles and not seek to know the author. You might otherwise be poorer by the loss of an illusion."

She looked at him with a laugh in her eyes, and resolutely struck the keys of her typewriter.

"You mustn't bother me any more," she asserted. "I am behind with my work as it is."

"I ask for assistance and you give me axioms," he retorted. "Nevertheless, I am not discouraged. Your opinions are usually worth looking into, but this is too gauzy."

"Go on," she said over her shoulder; "never mind my opinions, but when you find yourself disenchanted don't forget that I warned you."

This ended the discussion for that day, and during many following days Vaughn never mentioned Nevada. Then one morning he came into the office looking unusually cheerful, threw off his coat, and began tossing about the mail on his desk in an absent-minded fashion. His secretary said nothing, rightly opining that he would soon disclose the cause of his satisfaction. Presently he paused in the act of opening a letter, and said:

Digitized by Google

"I feel greatly elated this morning. Can you guess why?"

"I am not good at guessing."

"Well, then, I shall have to tell you. I've found Nevada—or rather, I've been able to communicate with her through her publishers, and the result is that she has consented to correspond with me as the boys trade jack-knives, 'out o' sight an' unseen.'"

"Indeed. How did you manage it?"

"By means of my prestige as the author of 'From Sea to Sea,' which is the first intimation I ever received that I had any such prestige. I played the card in desperation and it won. Quite romantic, don't you think?"

"Well, rather, if Nevada is a woman. Have you ascertained that?"

"No, I don't know yet, but I shall soon learn. It won't be possible to keep me mystified long. But all thought of that aside, I am promising myself untold pleasure from this correspondence. An interchange of ideas with a writer so versatile as Nevada is one of the keenest pleasures in life."

"I don't know anything about that, never having had a regular correspondent."

"H'm."

Vaughn went on with his work after this careless comment. He was not more than ordinarily selfish, but it never occurred to him that his secretary might possibly have a personal feeling with regard to this correspondent. If she had, however, it would not have been suspected from her manner.

Some days after this conversation he pulled a letter out of his pocket, and handing it over to her, said:

"Now tell me what you think about Nevada being a woman."

Miss Marshfield took the letter, smoothed it with her long slender fingers, and asked:

"Do you think this perfectly fair?"

"Certainly—why not? It would be a sin to keep such a letter as that to myself."

"Why do you adopt the pseudonym of Darwin?" she asked presently.

"Oh, for no reason, only it was the first that occurred to me. You see I was to use one and not to seek to penetrate hers."

"Hers? You are sure it is a woman, then, at last?"

"Can you doubt it after reading that letter? I think she is certainly a woman, and a young one at that."

"Oh," said the secretary drily, "and beautiful, too, no doubt. You seemed to have gathered a large amount of information from this letter, while I see absolutely nothing in it which betrays either age or gender. In this day of vigorous writing it is impossible to tell who is behind an article, whether man or woman, but if I were to judge by one or two expressions here I should say that the writer ought to be a big-bearded man."

"Oh, Miss Marshfield, positively you are the last person I should have accused of jealousy."

* * * * *

For a year this romantic correspondence went on, growing constantly more absorbing to Russell Vaughn, and it appeared, from the frequency of her letters, the same to Nevada.

On the days Vaughn received one of these letters he was absent-minded to a marked degree, and the burden of responsibility for that day rested on the stenographer, but she uttered no complaint, merely reminding him occasionally of neglected duties.

Sometimes he would spring suddenly to his feet in an abstracted mood and pace the office floor, sometimes stand before a window and gaze long out over the adjoining vacant lots where were piled a few pieces of old machinery. His secretary watched him narrowly at these times, and one day when she called his attention to something which needed it he turned abruptly and said:

"Miss Marshfield, there's no doubt about your being a treasure. You are the one who should be junior partner here. Upon my word, I'm good for nothing."

Then the slight, black-gowned figure had turned towards him.

"Let me advise you," she said. "I think you had better give up this correspondence of yours; it is doing you no good. Better drop it and forget it, and attend to business."

"Drop it! You don't know what you are saying. Have you any idea what part this friendship has come to play in my daily life? Now don't, please, set me down for a drivelling idiot. I am not going about with my heart on my sleeve telling everyone what Nevada is to me, but there's something about you which invites my confidence notwithstanding that your criticisms have been rather acrid. I would give ten years of my life for the privilege of seeing Nevada's face, of hearing her talk as she writes. Why, did I show you her letters on Egyptology? I thought I knew a few things, but

"HE HAD SPENT SEVERAL YEARS ON FOREIGN TRAVEL."

Digitized by Google

she makes me blush for my ignorance. Egypt! The very name is a mine of mystic delights under her facile pen. Scoff at me if you will, Miss Marshfield, you with your cool wit and calm judgment, but I would willingly exchange my best prospects in machinery for a voyage down the N le with Nevada as a companion."

Miss Marshfield was rather paler than usual, but she only said quietly:

"And she eludes you persistently?"

"Yes, and I can't see why. I have done my best. I have brought all the power there is in the world to the siege, and unfortunately words are my only available weapons. She promises an interview sometime in the future, but continually puts me off. She has seen me, too, which doesn't seem all round fair."

Miss Marshfield looked at him with mirth in her eyes.

"What now?" he exclaimed in a vexed tone. "Look here, Miss Marshfield, you're getting far too much fun out of me. I see my garrulity needs muzzling. It doesn't seem like you, though; I thought you'd have some sympathy."

"And so I have, but I can't help contemplating the possibility of your correspondent being some leathery old woman whose romance is all in the past, and who is amusing herself by warming it over the flame of your young passion. Of course she couldn't show herself, because that would mean—curtain."

"You are talking most unheard-of nonsense for you. No leathery old woman would write with such fire and eloquence. She is young and enthusiastic. You have not seen all her letters."

"No? You might have shown them to me."

She looked hard at him as she spoke, and he actually blushed under her scrutiny.

"Ah, I see," she went on mercilessly, "Nevada has been making love to you."

He neither acknowledged nor denied, but turned abruptly away for the first time in their acquaintance angry with her.

"Supposing," she went on as if she had not noticed, "that you meet your Nevada, and find her, though attractive to the eye, unlovely in character, would her genius obliterate the effect?"

"Utterly impossible for a person who writes like that to be spiritually unlovely."

"There you are in error. Neither bad nor good qualities are absolute in real people. Nature has its moods and tenses, and I have been told that writers as a class are especially susceptible to them; in fact, that it's a very good rule to know your pet author at a respectful distance."

"Well," said Vaughn, trying to throw off his sullenness, "you may be perfectly right—I daresay you are, but all this is too complex for me. I am not an adept in analysing character, and to tell the truth, don't think I care to be. Not, however, that I mean to disparage the habit. Probably it is a very good one, only not congenial to my tastes."

"No," said Miss Marshfield, thoughtfully, "it is not congenial to your tastes. You care so much more for ideals than for actualities."

Vaughn had been standing with his back towards her looking out of the window. Suddenly he wheeled about and stood beside her desk.

"Miss Marshfield, I should like to know why you couldn't have been Nevada."

"Why do you say that?" she ejaculated in surprise.

"Because a passion for you would be the very safest thing I can imagine."

"We must do our best in the calling whereunto we are called," she answered. "It is not always given us to choose, and really, Mr. Vaughn, I can't think that I should have been any more worthy of your respect if I had written those letters."

"Respect? No, certainly not, but there is a world-wide difference between the feeling of respect and——"

"Infatuation with a myth. Yes, you are right. You see I understand these things for I have been something of a hero-worshipper myself. I can remember ever so many gods I had in my childhood, and with one or possibly two exceptions they all proved of the earth—earthy. They made me miserable, too, until I came under the care of the best woman who ever lived. She taught me that all humanity is human, and ideals seldom or never attained."

"You are speaking of your foster-mother, are you not?"

"Yes, she was the wisest woman I ever knew. She taught me how to conquer the ills of life."

"Miss Marshfield, it occurs to me that I must seem very puerile and silly to you."

"No, indeed. If I have said anything to imply that, forgive me—I never meant it. I do think, though, that it's best to have no enthusiasms; they leave such heart-aches in their wake. Hardly anything in life comes up to the expectations of an impulsive person, while if we expect little or nothing the good that comes to us seems a full measure. Have you not found it so sometimes?"

"Now that you mention it I believe I have frequently; but where, let me ask, did you get all this wisdom? One does not learn these things by being told them."

"I have lived a great deal of it, and the rest I have seen others live."

"You say your friend taught you to conquer the ills of life. Now, how for instance would you overcome the fate which held you bound to duties of a prosaic sort when you were continually longing to shake them off and fly to the other end of the earth?"

"I should patiently bide the shaking-off time. You know 'all things come to him who waits,' though my experience proves that they are not always satisfactorily attained."

"Not always, no; but how can a fellow tell that they won't be till he tries?"

"I have often thought," said the secretary, musingly, "that it is a great pity to spend the best years of one's life in accumulating the means of subsistence. If the needs of civilisation were fewer it would materially decrease the miseries of the world."

"For my part," said Vaughn quickly, "I could be content with the Indian's blanket, or a yellow robe and begging bowl. There are infinite possibilities in the latter. Give me the freedom of the globe and civilisation may have its fol-de-rols."

Six weeks after this conversation found Vaughn with still no clue to the identity of his correspondent. All her letters reached him through her publishers, but they were gradually growing less frequent and colder in tone. It was very strange, he thought, for it had not been long since in one of those thrilling epistles which so elated him she had exclaimed:

"Almost thou persuadest me, Darwin, that the only things desirable in this world are you, a moonlight night, and the Nile; but yet wait a little longer. You shall see my face—I swear it."

Now it seemed she was trying to get rid of him without fulfilling this promise.

Miss Marshfield watched his growing disinclination

Digitized by Google

for business with annoyance, and finally she said to him:

"Mr. Vaughn, you are not well."

"I?" he returned in surprise. "Oh, yes, I am always well." A moment after he added: "Queer my father said something about that, too, but I have never been ill in my life, and certainly am not now."

She said no more, but watched him furtively as he sat over his work, the two little wrinkles in his forehead drawn into a positive scowl. She noticed that he was sallow, thinner in flesh than usual, and that his eyes bore evidence of insomnia. The afternoon light fell across him, and for the first time his secretary was fully conscious of the change in him. Involuntarily she let her hands slip from the keys as she uttered an exclamation of alarm.

Vaughn looked up and met her gaze. There was something in it besides alarm, too—something that astonished him. It seemed like a look of tender pity, but he thought it hardly possible that he could have read it aright.

Supposing he had. He felt almost suffocated for a moment, and as Miss Marshfield dropped her eyes and coloured slightly, he sprang to his feet and asked if the room wasn't uncomfortably warm. She made some unintelligible reply, and he lowered a window; then, instead of resuming his chair came and stood beside her while her nimble fingers played rather nervously over the keys. At length he spoke.

"Your eyes would entice the truth out of a confirmed liar, Miss Marshfield. I may as well tell you the whole sickening story, though of course you'll say it was to be expected. She's given me the sack—without even the common decency of saying good-bye. She's been trying it for a long time, and now she's done it. Very shabby of her, don't you think?"

"It undoubtedly seems shabby treatment from your point of view, but it was the most merciful thing she could do."

"Because why?"

"Because that correspondence was unfitting you for business and making you more visionary and idealistic than ever, which wasn't at all necessary."

"You speak with your accustomed plainness."

"Yes I am in earnest, but I hope you are not offended."

"How should I be—with you? When you have not been giving me good advice—which, by the way, I wish I had taken—you have been doing my neglected work. I have no reason for complaining of you, at all events. Things have turned out about as you predicted. She can't be a person of good principles—she must be a flirt. She—she must have found somebody else."

"Oh, let us cover her with the mantle of charity, and suppose her nothing bad but only wrinkled and ugly. She couldn't help that, you know. The transcendent love you offered her would have tempted any woman——"

"How do you know I offered her transcendent love?"

"I have heard you talk of her several times."

"Come, Miss Marshfield, spare me. I'm ready now to assent to all the spiteful things you've said about her. I do hereby solemnly swear that to the best of my knowledge and belief she's a big-bearded man; that in addition to, and notwithstanding that, she's a leathery old woman who has been amusing herself with my feeble-mindedness, and warming over her stale romance at the expense of my idiotic passion."

"Did I really mention feeble-mindedness?"

"Oh, you might as well. But this isn't wading through that pile of letters. Some one has got to take a trip, and owing to my father's fancy that I have been confined too closely of late, it's been decided that I am the one. My father, you see, doesn't know about Nevada."

CAME AND STOOD BESIDE HER WHILE HER NIMBLE FINGERS PLAYED RATHER NERVOUSLY OVER THE KEYS.

"No," said Miss Marshfield, scarcely heeding the latter part of his remark. "Shall you be gone long?"

"Two or three weeks, I think," he replied, and became absorbed in his reading.

At six o'clock they had finished, and then, as she was donning her street clothes, Vaughan remembered certain things it was necessary to talk over in view of the intended trip. So they lingered by the fire without lighting up because it was pleasanter to talk in the twilight.

The business affairs they discussed were not of vital importance, but the secretary seemed not to notice that, and the junior partner talked on leisurely, rocking his office chair. The firelight played over their faces, and through the uncurtained window shone the first refulgence of a full moon.

This was the window which commanded a view of the lots with their lumber of old machinery. There was no snow, and over the motley array the moon poured a silvery flood, lending it a weird interest it was far from possessing by daylight. The sharp angles and ugly protuberances of the pile were softened by the hazy glow that made the shadows seem to hide strange things—mystical things—things which belonged to the land of dreams.

Digitized by Google

The spell of the hour was upon these two as they sat there by the fire, and neither was willing to break it. They talked in low tones, with throbbing pauses between their inconsequent sentences.

Presently Vaughn leant forward to poke the fire, and when he settled back again he was nearer to Miss Marshfield than before—so near that his left hand easily reached and clasped her right, which lay on the arm of her chair. She did not attempt to withdraw it, but made some irrelevant remark to which he returned a vague reply. She looked at the coals, but his eyes were on her face.

"Miss Marshfield." The name was uttered very softly, and he bent closer still. "Could you ever—would it be possible——"

Her look stopped him. She had turned on him those speaking eyes which sometimes seemed to belie the calmness of her demeanour, and there was no mistaking their expression this time. He had understood as well as if she had put it into words.

Thoroughly agitated, he rose, and standing behind her chair laid his hand on her shoulder as he said unsteadily:

"Miss Marshfield, you force me to believe in the luck of fools. In a natural course of events you would despise me. Thank Heaven for the unnatural. Don't speak, please. I'm afraid of your speech; it might contradict what your eyes have told me, and it's too good to be contradicted."

He had bent lower until his dark locks mingled with hers.

Miss Marshfield did not speak, she was shaking with silent laughter.

"What is it?" he asked. "More fun at my expense? My dear girl, I can't blame you, but I have a strange feeling that it is your image I have had in my heart all the time, and never a dream of a myth. Explain that, will you?"

Then Miss Marshfield spoke, and this was what she said:

"Darwin, almost thou persuadest me that the only things desirable in this world are you, a moonlight night, and the Nile."

"What!" exclaimed Vaughn, straightening up, well-nigh paralysed. "How do you know she said that?"

"Because she and I are one."

Impetuously he whirled her chair about until she faced him.

"You are Nevada!"

"Yes. Is it incredible?"

"Only in the light of your outrageous equivocation."

"Oh, I didn't equivocate much, it wasn't necessary. You were very easy prey, Darwin."

"Was I indeed? But this minute I recollect a dozen awful fibs you told me about Nevada. For instance, you said——"

"Yes, I know. I'll admit my course was a little irregular, but you see I was all the time easing my conscience with the promise of an explanation. It was very exciting, and I admit that temptation made me carry it too far. Forgive me, pray. I have never romanced before, but you wrote such letters—ah, such letters, Darwin. You are a past master in love-making. I don't think I could have concluded to give up the correspondence so soon but for the effect it was having on you."

"I was something undone, that's a fact. And to think it was you all the time. Do you remember when I asked why you couldn't have been Nevada? You might have told me then."

"But I was somewhat piqued to see you so coolly setting me down as inferior to your correspondent. It was evident your plain secretary had not the ghost of a chance."

"So then you wanted me to fall in love with my secretary?"

"Perhaps I did. The possibility never presented itself to you, however."

"Oh, Miss Marshfield, I have always adored you, as you well know, but somehow it seemed to me that you were not the sort of woman to respond. Many a time I have said to myself, 'Miss Marshfield is a delightful chum, but she wouldn't listen to a love story.'"

"I think the very gods would listen and capitulate to such a story as you have to tell. What then could be expected of me whose wild desire was with you in Egypt, even when you thought me most prosaic?"

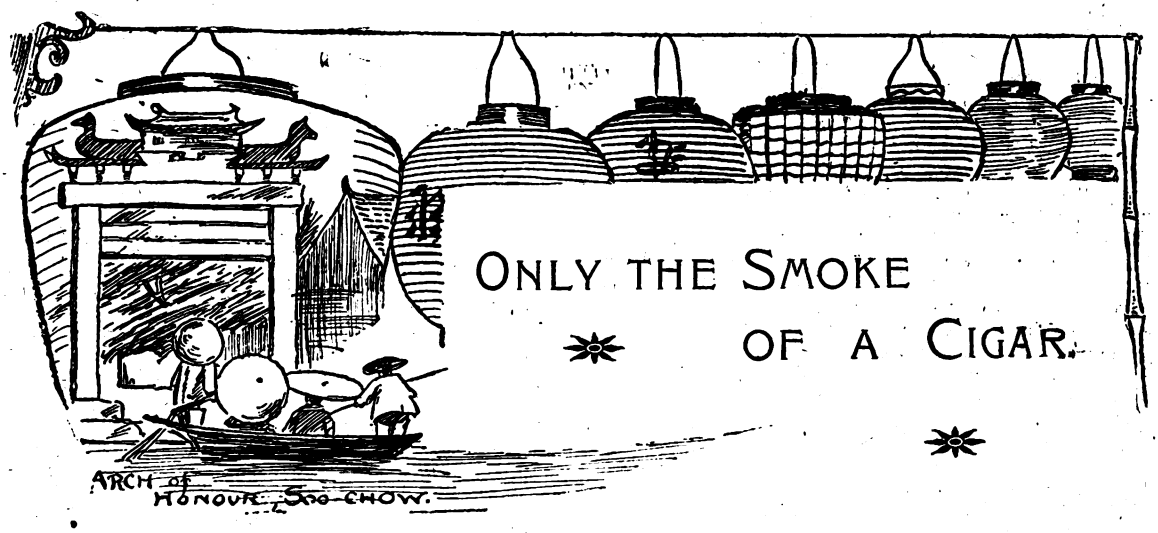
The two chairs were close together now in the shadows which the firelight was throwing into fantastic shapes.

"The wonder of it!" said Vaughn. "Miss Marshfield, invaluable Miss Marshfield, who will keep me sober and sensible whether I will or no, and Nevada, the mate of my soul. Oh, Nevada, we shall float down the Nile together. In fancy I see already the dark-gliding waters and the glint of the moonlight on the pyramids."

PARMA GENTRY.

I THINK THE VERY GODS WOULD LISTEN AND CAPITULATE TO SUCH A STORY AS YOU HAVE TO TELL.

Digitized by Google



ONLY THE SMOKE OF A CIGAR.

Ay de mi! We call ourselves free and independent beings, and yet the faintest scent or sound, or fleeting glance of places long unseen, has power to bear us on waves of memory, whether we would go or not. The cigar I am smoking this evening is one of a kind I have not smoked for years. Memories lie rolled in its fragrant leaf: its curling smoke wafts back my thoughts to the time when I was living in a far off country; to the days when I and my wife were young, and the children who have grown up and gone out into the world, were only "the dearest little things" that ever we set eyes on.

Our big cattle farm lay in a wild and lonely part of Natal. Fine grass-land undulated into the misty distance of the horizon, or was broken by the grand wall of the Cathamba mountain range. At our feet ran the river, placid at times, at times tumultuous, as beseems a river fed by sudden thunder storms and excitable mountain streams. "And like the river ran the life"; bright pictures float upwards in the air to-night, soft lights and shadows fill their canvas.

There was one storm that, breaking over our family life and into its quiet days, made a great impression on my mind. I write of it after the lapse of many years. My wife had at the time a good trustworthy nurse, and this girl's father was desirous that she should leave service and come home, where a rich suitor awaited her. Between dislike for this individual and love for our children, Annie was reluctant to leave us. She lingered on from week to week, and put off her parent with various excuses. I sometimes wondered whether behind them all there was not a real heartfelt reason for remaining in service. I had seen Annie talking to some young fellow, one of my farm labourers, in the moonlight, when the little ones were asleep, and it was possible that she preferred him to the moneyed man. Some women will not consider life prospects from a sensible point of view. My wife at last told Annie that she must leave us.

"You know that you are wanted at home," she said, "and I have suited myself with another nurse; and I think she is a good girl, although my children do not take a fancy to her."

"I'm going, ma'am, I know I must leave," answered Annie; and a few days after this, without a word, she went.

Shall I ever forget that day? It was a perfect morning, meeting-time between spring and summer. The white syringa blossom strewed the garden path; the great wild roses that had lately been threading their milky way in the hedge, and hung wreathed among high branches where nature's hand had flung them, all had faded, and the country was richer in colouring and less fairylike than it had been in the first bright advent of spring, crowned with her peach-blossom and feathery buds. We went out that morning into the garden to see Annie off, and wish her well. She walked along the path under the shadow of the orange trees, and out into the brilliant sunshine, turned at the gate for a last look at us, and then started into a fast run, having some miles to go before reaching home, and thinking nothing of the baking heat of the sun. So passed away Annie the nurse from our sight.

The new nurse had a terrible time all that day long. Nothing could persuade the children that she had not supplanted Annie wilfully and maliciously. First they scolded the girl, then attacked her with fat little doubled-up fists, and finally "sent her to Coventry," and became deaf and dumb to all matters that concerned her. The mutiny was at its worst, and we were about to meet their naughtiness with strong home-rule measures, when there came a knock at the door. I opened it myself, not being given to much ceremony in those days, and found some boys waiting on the step.

"Sir," said the biggest, "we've come for Annie; father sent us."

"For Annie? Why she left this morning."

"No, sir," said the spokesman, with a startled look.

"But she did, indeed. Your sister left us this morning."

"She never came home; we have come straight from there," answered the boy; and, after saying this, he looked down and raised his eyes no more from the ground.

"Run back, boys, and see if she has not come by now. No doubt she looked in at her friends on the way."

At my words the party ran off, leaving me perplexed at Annie's conduct. I strolled down alone to a favourite haunt of mine, the garden by the river, and overlooked the men at their task. Only one of them laboured on in silence. He was a little way from the others, digging up a piece of ground in preparation for seed sowing. He started at my approach, and answered questions on garden matters very vaguely, and with a far off, unfathomable look in his eyes.

"You are making a crooked thing of that bed, Tom,"

Digitized by Google

I said. "Leave it alone, now, and I will come down early in the morning and help you with it."

"Very well, sir," he replied, in the low constrained tone of a person anxious not to lose a word of some interesting conversation; and yet his comrades were merely joking together, and giving each other a word now and then.

"Do you hear thunder? Is rain coming?" I said looking at his anxious face.

"No, there will come no rain for some days," he answered low; and then shouldered his spade, and went with the others to the tool-house. The hill-tops were rosy in the sunshine when I went down to the garden, next morning, and a glorious freshness was in the air. Of the men, Tom was the only one down, and he was waiting for me, line in hand. How strange he looked, standing as quiet and still as the tree near him, yet with yesterday's strange attraction to some invisible thing strong upon him, and with yesterday's expression intensified in his face. It might have been taken as a study of the face of a Sibyl listening absorbed to the words of her oracle.

"Are you ill, Tom?" I inquired, looking closely at him.

"No, sir."

"Then take the string over yonder, and look sharp about it. I want to ride over and see if Annie the nurse has turned up yet."

He looked up at me with a strange wild glance, and then in silence obeyed. We were just finishing the work when he sprang from his knees, and called out in a loud voice:

"There, I knew it! They've found the body."

Then indeed it was my turn to grow pale and look anxious in the ghastly light of a sudden suspicion that flashed across my brain.

"What," I asked, "in Heaven's name do you mean?"

"Do you not hear the death-cry? They've found her—they've found her!"

It slowly, painfully was borne into my mind that I was in the presence of a murderer. I could not doubt it as I looked at Tom, but surely he was no common specimen. There he stood opposite me, not noticing me, careless of danger, and calling upon his victim by all the passionate love-names that could rise to the lips of a broken-hearted man.

As I stood gazing on him in silence, the awful sound of the death-wail, faint and distant, fell on my ear, the sound that Tom's sense of hearing had received with such suspicious acuteness.

"Tom," I faltered, "foul work has been going on, and you have been concerned in it."

"Ay, sir, I killed her," he said aloud, and, as it seemed, defiantly.

"Great Heavens! And you can stand there and so heartlessly confess the crime?"

"There's nought more to do or say. All's done, sir. I killed her. This hand shed her blood. I——"

"Hush, Tom!" I exclaimed hurriedly, for the cheery voices of the other men could now be heard over the hill, and I feared Tom would commit himself before them. After all, he might be innocent, and the cause of his wild words be grief. His manner was very strange. Had sorrow turned his brain, or was he really a criminal? He must be protected from himself until I knew more of the circumstances of the dreadful events, so I hastily sent him away from the garden.

"Take that basket up to my workroom, and wait there for me," I said, raising my voice and speaking as though displeased.

A quarter of an hour later I joined him, and shut the door on our two selves.

"Now, Tom, tell me what all this means, and try and control yourself, and speak the truth," I said.

He stood silent for a while, and then began his tale, and poured into my ears a tragedy of love, jealousy, and passion. Annie had given him reason, as he thought, to believe that she would marry him. He had imagined that she meant to run away from home and the rich suitor provided for her, and marry the man of her choice.

"And so she did intend to do, as I believe; but not—not with me. Yet she was so kind and soft to me, sir, that I cannot tell. Even now, when her body lies deprived of life by this most hateful hand, I cannot answer the question. Did she love me or that other person? She had given me no promise—it hardly seemed that we needed that. To be with her was enough for me; I did not look on to the future."

Tom paused, for a moment his excited mind seemed to forget the horror of the present in the dream of remembered joy.

"Tom," I said gently; and, with a start, he resumed:

"That day she quitted your service, I watched her leave with her little bundle on her head. Singing through the fields she went, and I left my work and ran to join her by the path that would meet hers. I saw her cross the brook, but—not alone. A man had been before me, and had already met her, and the two sat down and stayed a long time on the bank of the brook."

"Strange, and she seemed so anxious to reach home," I muttered.

"Ay, strange, sir; and it seemed so to me. Mad jealousy filled my veins, each moment made me wilder. I flew down upon the two as if I were a tiger, not a man; and he the coward, fled. And she, my innocence, my love, faced me, we had words, and they only fired me more and more. How can I speak of it? Before I left the spot her life-blood dyed the waters of the stream."

The next day Tom went to the magistrate, and gave himself up as Annie's murderer. He was committed to take his trial at the next assizes; but when the time came for the next assizes the prisoner was far away. He died one evening as the sun went down—of love and a broken heart; but then (O shade of Rosalind) this poor lover was not one of this tough and calm-hearted nation—for Tom and his love, Annie the nurse, were Zulus.

K. G.

NOW ON SALE.

No. 7 of

"The Curiosity Shop."

The Illustrated Companion to "PEARSON'S WEEKLY."

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

THE CURIOSITY SHOP contains: Absolutely new and fresh articles. Bright and originally-conceived pictures. Strong and well-seasoned fiction. Nothing that you can get anywhere else.

Unlike all other curiosity shops, the contents of this one are changed every week, and you can buy every article and picture in the shop for one penny.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, October 27th. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct. In the event of more than one competitor sending in the same result, the prize will be divided.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 3. Matches to be played on Saturday, October 27th.

Matches to be Played on Saturday, Oct. 27th.	Free	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
1 Bury v. 2 Sunderland
1 Notts Forest v. 2 Everton
1 Stoke v. 2 Sheffield Wednesday
1 Manchester City v. 2 Derby County
1 New Brighton Tower v. 2 Burnley
1 Woolwich Arsenal v. 2 Grimsby Town
1 Blackpool v. 2 Small Heath
1 Tottenham Hotspur v. 2 West Ham United
1 Reading v. 2 Bristol City
1 Queen's Park Rang. v. 2 Millwall

The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly," the "Curiosity Shop," or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, October 26th, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "COUPON, No. 3," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. In the event of a tie the prize will be divided.
7. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIES.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTOR.

II.—A Pantomime Side Light.

"STANLEY, are you quite sure you love me?"

"Quite, quite sure. But, Dolly, why are you always asking me that question?"

"Because you men are so unreliable. You think you are in love and are quite honest when you say so, but you wake up one day to find that you only dreamt of love, that it was infatuation."

"But you women are just as bad. You think you're in love when you are not."

"No, a woman loves differently, Stan; man's love is a seed that has to be sown every year, but a woman's love once sown lasts for ever."

"I say, Dolly, you are very hard on us men."

"I try not to be, but it is hard work, Stan. Of course, there are many exceptions."

"And we are going to be exceptions, eh, Dolly?"

"I hope so, dear."

The speakers were Dolly Bainton, from the Gaiety Theatre pantomime, and Stanley Allercroft, a bright fair-haired, fresh faced youth, who had just left college. He was silent for a moment, gazing with smiling eyes down at the picture before him.

A picture indeed was Dolly Bainton, with her soft black curly hair, her pale face, and eyes as black as sloes. She reminded one of a Dresden china figure, she was so beautifully and delicately moulded, so neat and pretty. With him it had been love at first sight. When he first witnessed the pantomime, the moment she appeared before the footlights he had lost his head.

Since then he had been a nightly attendant at the Gaiety Theatre. He had made friends with the comedians, and an introduction to his heart's idol was soon forthcoming. Eight weeks passed and found them engaged.

"But why this learned lecture on man's failing and women's virtues," he asked at length.

"Because I love you so much," she said putting her arms round his neck, "and because I fear to lose you. I want you to be quite sure. I could bear to lose you now perhaps, but I could not later. If you regret, Stanley, I give you back your word."

"Don't talk rot, little one, are we not engaged?" he replied, kissing the emerald ring on her finger. "And to-morrow I am going to take you and introduce you to my mother, but you must not be serious like this, it does not suit you, you must be your old merry self."

"Oh, I'll be merry enough to-morrow, if you like. I'll turn cartwheels on the lawn, if it so please your highness. I had better give your mother a taste of my tom-boy airs, then she will know what to expect in the future."

Stanley laughed, and as Lil, Dolly's friend, who shared her rooms now came in, the conversation changed. They sat down and began to talk excitedly about a prank they were going to play on one of the girls who was overburdened with vanity.

Dolly was a very imp of mischief and dearly loved a practical joke.

The next day found Stanley and Dolly in the train on their way to Beachampton, a pretty house in the country, where Mrs. Allercroft lived.

The first sight that caught Mrs. Allercroft's gaze, as she stood at the window, expecting them, was Stanley and Dolly having a race up the drive. She clasped her hands in horror, and looked nervously round to see if any of her guests were looking on.

Her greeting to Dolly was very pleasant and quiet. She hoped she would spend a pleasant day with them.

"Oh, you bet," said Dolly with candour. "Whenever I go out I always make up my mind to have a high old time, don't I, Stan?"

"I am afraid you will find us rather quiet here."

"Not a bit! I should soon wake you up if I were here long."

Stanley looked on and smiled, he admired her easy ways and sometimes alarming directness.

Dolly found everything delightful in the old house, from the late Captain Allercroft's room of war trophies to the family portraits and the cases of old china. The big St. Bernard, Carlo, was soon a great friend of hers, as was its owner, Colonel Baker, Mrs. Allercroft's brother. At dinner she kept the men amused and the ladies shocked, by tales of professional life.

"It seems a terribly depraved life," said one old spinster,

Who the—? What the—? If you please, sir,
What d'ye mean by TWENTY TEAZER?

Digitized by Google

who had been bottled up and on the shelf for many a year, "I really think I would rather be a gipsy or a common tramp."

This annoyed Dolly, and, without thinking, she said:

"Rats, we call a spade a spade, and as long as people are good-hearted and true we mix with them, and are friends as long as they want us to be."

"Perhaps you prefer to associate with bad people," said the old lady, ruffled and letting her temper get the best of her.

"No, but I prefer honesty to hypocrisy," said Dolly with indignation. "It's tommy rot to talk like that."

Dolly's expressions caused consternation among the ladies, and Mrs. Allercroft tried to smooth matters, by saying:

"But of course you will leave the stage now?"

"Never," replied Dolly. "I wouldn't leave it for a hundred men. I should feel like a lark with its wings clipped."

"But, my dear child, I cannot allow you to remain on the stage when you marry my son."

"Oh, you will soon get used to it, and he does not mind. Do you, Stan?"

Stanley, with some hesitation, said he did not.

Just then the big St. Bernard dog pushed his heavy head against Dolly's arm and her knife fell clattering to the ground.

"Confound it," she said on the impulse of the moment, and seeing her mistake, blushed and added, "oh, I beg pardon."

The look of horror on the ladies' faces amused her so much that she had to cram her handkerchief into her mouth to keep from laughing.

It was always a joke against Dolly that a glass of wine loosened her tongue, and she had had two. She told them all about the pantomine's last big supper and the funny speech made by the principal comedian, when he was half seas over.

"What did you say he was?" asked a dame.

"Squiffy," said Dolly.

"And what may that be?"

"Now no 'hank.' You know."

"Indeed I do not."

"Well, tipsy, in plain English."

"Oh, how horrible."

"Oh, that was nothing to what they were at three in the morning."

"My dear child," said Mrs. Allercroft, "you don't mean to say that you stayed out till three in the morning."

"Stanley was there, and I daresay all of you have gone home later from a ball, many a time in your lives."

Shock upon shock Mrs. Allercroft experienced during dinner—she was glad when the meal was over.

In the afternoon Dolly came rushing up to Stanley with her hat on.

"Colonel Baker is going to show me the greenhouse, won't you come?"

"I will directly, only mother wishes to speak to me, you go on, I will join you. I say, Dolly!"

"Yes, dear."

"Why did you tell them so much at dinner?"

"Why there was no harm in it, was there?"

"No, only I wish you hadn't."

"Doesn't your mother know how we live? Haven't you told her what our life is?"

"You see, Dolly, mother does not understand things as we do."

"Well it's never too late to learn. You know I can't sail under a false flag, Stan. There cheer up, solemn face, you look as if you had swallowed half-a-crown. Meet you on the Rialto. Don't be long," and so saying she flew off.

"I say, Colonel Baker, were you very shocked at what I said at dinner?"

"No, I enjoyed your prattle immensely."

"No, I mean the swear word."

"Um, it did come into our midst a bit like a cannon ball," said the Colonel laughing again at the memory of it.

"It was funny to see their faces, wasn't it? You know I don't think there is any more harm in saying 'confound it,' than in saying 'bother,' they both mean the same thing, and you bet they've all said it some time in their lives."

"That's not the point, little one, the sin is saying it in public."

"Can't see the difference myself."

"But those old ladies cannot understand your open-mindedness."

"You don't think any the worse of me for it, do you?"

"Not a bit, my child, you are a fresh little flower I have not met for many a long day."

After their visit to the greenhouse, Dolly lured the stately old Colonel on to a game of "hide and seek." Under her bright influence he was like a big schoolboy. Carlo was used as a bloodhound to track the fugitive down. It was Dolly's turn to hide.

I will puzzle them now, she thought, as she slipped into the conservatory and hid behind the door. The sound of voices reached her, but she was looking intently through the glass panes watching the Colonel and Carlo hunt round the shrubs for her, and did not pay heed to them until she heard her own name mentioned.

"Youth and high spirits are no excuse, my son, for insulting my old friend, Miss Mitchell, shocking us all at table, and swearing like a common street girl," Mrs. Allercroft was saying.

"Mother, this is too much, you shall not speak of her like this. You don't understand her."

"No, Stanley, I don't want to if this is the way she behaves, and I never shall. Stanley, I am an old woman and know many things you do not, I ask you, can I invite our friends to meet her here to be outraged and insulted."

"Mother, you speak too strongly."

"No, my boy, I do not. On this I am determined; you choose between me and Miss Bainton."

"Mother, you don't know what you are saying," said Stanley now angry and thoroughly roused.

"Yes, Stanley, I do. Oh, my boy, I am only thinking of you and your happiness. You are young and youthful eyes cannot see that this woman has plotted to secure you. It is a fine thing, indeed, for a girl of no family to marry you, wealthy and well-connected. My boy, if you do this you will break my heart. Does this girl, whom you have only known for eight weeks, drive me for ever from you? Stanley, you must choose between us. Is it she or I?"

"Mother, you are cruel and unjust, I cannot and will not give her up."

"Is that your final answer?" asked Mrs. Allercroft sobbing.

Some smart joke or witty wheeze—er
Hangs around this TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google

"My final answer."

Stanley left the room, banging the door as he went, leaving his mother weeping bitterly. Dolly stood like one stunned. She had not wanted to hear their conversation, but the horror of it had rooted her to the spot. Half dazed, she crept out of the conservatory and made her way to the summer house, her face pale and drawn and her heart full of pain. When the Colonel and Carlo found her there he was surprised to see big tears rolling down her face.

"Found you at last, you little imp. Why, my dear child, what is the matter, have you hurt yourself?"

Dolly tried hard to brush away her tears and be cheerful, but miserably failed. She burst into sobs, and laying her head on the good old Colonel's shoulder clung to him, and poured out her piteous tale.

"Am I such a very wicked woman?" she asked, when he had to a certain extent pacified her.

"No, no, my child," said the old fellow, nearly crying himself. "My sister is perfectly ignorant of the world, she has lived in a narrow groove, overawed by the Church and Clergy all her life. She has very wrongfully misjudged you, but she shall not continue to do so, I promise you. I will bring my influence to bear upon her."

"No, Colonel, don't do anything please. I will give Stanley his promise back and never trouble her again."

"Now, my child, you must not do anything rash."

"Please don't try and persuade me for my mind is made up. You must not ask me to part mother and son."

When she left that evening she put up her face to be kissed by the Colonel, and whispered:

"It is good-bye."

He protested vehemently, and said he would bring everything right, but she shook her head sadly, and in a minute they had disappeared down the drive.

Lil was out when they arrived at her rooms, so Dolly said at once:

"Stanley, your mother does not like me."

"Nonsense, Dolly, whatever——"

"Now, you know you cannot look into my eyes and tell me she does. Stanley, I ask you for the truth, and only the truth."

Stanley hesitated for a moment, and then said very quietly and sadly:

"No, she does not."

"Then, dear, we must say good-bye."

"Dolly, what are you——"

"Hush! You are her only child, are you not?"

"Yes."

"I cannot part a mother and son."

"It would not be that."

"Yes, it would, Stanley. Your mother is a resolute woman."

But Stanley would not hear of their parting he vowed and declared he would bring his mother round and that all would be well.

A fortnight passed since the date of these events. It was the last night of the pantomine. Dolly was jubilant for Stanley was sure to come down to-night. Since that evening he had brought her from his home he had been up in London, passing his examinations, and had been too busy to write her more than a couple of short notes the whole time.

Dolly was sitting in her dressing-room, waiting for the overture to finish, when Lil rushed in with a letter. "Here, Doll, here's a 'billy duck's' for 'oo," and was gone again like a flash of light.

The letter was a long one from Stanley and led gradually up to these lines:

"Of all the e things I have been thinking and I fear we cannot hope for happiness with so much against us. I remember some words of yours the day before I took you to Beachampton. You said, 'You men honestly think you love when you say so, but wake up to find you dreamt it, that it was only infatuation.' Dare I tell you I have dreamed and am now awake. You gave me back my promise, do you still do so? Don't you think it will be for the best that——"

Dolly could read no more, the words ran into each other, the room swam round her, and with a moan she fell senseless to the ground. What irony is in the fact that at this moment Stanley was hurrying to the station. He had just left the post office where he had been sending off a wire which ran thus: "Forgive my letter. I did not mean it. I was driven to it. Will arrive at Theatre 9.15 p.m."

When Dolly opened her eyes she saw Lil bending tenderly over her bathing her face.

"It's nothing, dear," she answered to Lil's anxious questions. "Don't be frightened, it is one of my old heart attacks. Only weakness, and I must be strong, strong."

As Dolly went on the stage with a bound a mighty cheer arose from the house and it was long before she could utter a sound. Everyone vowed there was no merrier, brighter figure in the pantomime that night than Dolly Bainton. Everything was excitement and Lil rushed about like a madcap. She had flashed into Dolly's room with a telegram, but Dolly was not there and the excited Lil soon covered that wealth of heartease with bouquets of lilies and passion flowers, fairer flowers, perhaps, but bearing no balm to a wounded heart.

It was nearly ten o'clock when Dolly went on to sing the choicest item of the evening, her pretty "coon" song. Only one verse had she sung when her eyes caught sight of a pale face up in the dress circle.

Could it be true? Was she dreaming? She caught her breath painfully, and clutched her heart, in which it seemed a cold knife had entered. Everything went black, the lights of the house and the sea of heads went out, only one pale face could she see staring down at her with frightened eyes.

The double shock proved too much, and with a loud cry she fell forward on her face. Women screamed, the music stopped, the curtain was lowered and she was carried into the green-room where everyone crowded round her.

They made way for the doctor, who was luckily in the theatre. He shook his head when he examined her, and said:

"Failure of the heart, I fear there is no hope. You tell me she was subject to these attacks."

They made way again when Stanley came rushing in with a horror-stricken face.

"Dolly, Dolly, my love, speak to me, speak to me," he cried frantically, taking her in his arms.

The doctor laid his hand on Stanley's shoulder, and said gently:

"She will never speak again, her lips are sealed for ever."

DOUGLAS VIGORS.

[Next Week: "AT THE NAG'S HEAD."]

Great Scott! Likewise Julius Cæsar!
Who the dickens is TWENTY TEAZER?

Digitized by Google

HOW SNOOKS GOT OUT OF IT.

"If you will take my advice," said Mr. Wilding, making a last noble but futile effort to balance the ivory paper-knife on the tip of his first finger, "you won't go to the Brownrigs' ball."

"And why not?" asked his companion irritably.

"Well, I really wouldn't, you know," said Mr. Wilding, giving up his struggle with the impossible and laying the refractory paper-knife upon the table, "for a variety of reasons. Girls play the very mischief with you, and you know what trouble it gave me to get you out of your last scrape. There are four Brownrig girls, aren't there? And they are all pretty?"

"I don't see what that's got to do with it," said Snooks sulkily. "There's safety in a multitude. I can't marry them all, can I?"

"Happily, no! Though, if the laws of your land did not forbid it, I am inclined to think you might try to accomplish even that. Still, be advised, Snooks, and be conspicuous by your absence at the Brownrigs' 'small and early.' Papa Brownrig, when incensed is not nice, and you know you are decidedly smitten with Miss Katie."

"No, I am not," said Snooks, with decision. "Not a bit of it! Though, I allow she is a handsome girl, and has lovely eyes. Hasn't she, now?"

"I don't know. As a rule I never look into a woman's eyes. I consider it a rudeness as well as stupidity," said Wilding earnestly, telling his lie without a blush. "Never mind her eyes. If," warningly, "you must go to this ball, at least try to forget she has eyes at all. If you don't, you will propose to her, to a moral."

"One would think I was a raw schoolboy," said young Snooks wrathfully. "Do you think I can't look at a woman without committing myself? Do I look like a fool?"

Whatever Mr. Wilding thought at that moment, he kept it to himself. Before he spoke next, he and his conscience had agreed to dissemble.

"My dear fellow, do not let us even hint at such a thing," he said amiably. "I only meant you were slightly—very slightly—susceptible, and that Miss Katie has a certain amount of pleasing power, and that I positively would give up this ball if I——"

"Are you going?" broke in Snooks impatiently.

"Well yes, I daresay I shall look in about twelve."

"Fact is, the fellow wants to spoon her himself, and don't see the force of being cut out," said he to himself, complacently, as he ran down the steps of Wilding's stairs.

Beyond all question the Brownrigs' ball was a decided success. The rooms were filled to overflowing, the staircases were choked, the heat was intolerable. Sir Thomas and Lady Higgins had actually put in an appearance after all, and the supper, if uneatable, was, I assure you, very expensive. No pains or money had been spared; everything was what the mistress of the house called "rug regal;" and all the Miss Brownrigs looked as charming as any one could desire.

There were four of them. There was Katie, the second daughter—Snooks' friend, and the possessor of the lovely eyes. And they were lovely, large, and dark, and true and tender, like the North, according to the Laureate! "black as sloes," said her fond if slightly oppressive mother, and of the languid melting order.

Then there was Hetty, the eldest girl, who, if her eyes were not so dark as midnight, had at least the dearest little nose in the world. A pure Greek feature, perfect in every respect, ignorant of colds in the head, that made one long to tell her (only she would have blushed, they were all nicely brought up) about Dudu, and her Phidian appendage.

Then came Georgie—"George the third," as she was playfully termed in the bosom of her family—who, if she had neither nose nor eyes like her sisters, had certainly a prettier mouth than either. A sweet little kissable mouth, that pouted and laughed alternately, and did considerable execution.

And finally there was Lily. A tall pale girl, with blue eyes, a finely cut chin, and a good deal of determination all round.

Katie's eyes were larger, darker, and (when she looked at Snooks and thought of his thousands) more melting than ever that night. Her dress, if slightly bizarre, was intensely becoming.

Snooks, for the first half hour, kept himself bravely aloof from her fascinations, declined to notice her reproachful glances and languishing oglings for reward, and was wretched.

Finally being driven into a corner during a fatal set of Lancers, he met her eyes, saw and was conquered. She would dance the next with him? Yes (coldly). And the next? Yes (more gently). And the ninth—he can see she is disengaged for it? Yes (this time quite warmly).

An hour later the deed was done. Some capital champagne, a dark avenue (I believe there were some Chinese lanterns there originally, but a kind wind had blown them out), and a soft little hand slipped into his, did the work; and Miss Katie had promised bashfully, but with unmistakable willingness, to be the future Mrs. Snooks. Whether it was Snooks or the property pertaining to Snooks she most affected, deponent sayeth not.

When, however, her betrothed found what he had done, and remembered his former words, and all the awfulness of parental wrath, his heart failed him. He went, as he usually did when in sorry case, in search of Wilding; and having discovered him, took him into a side-room, and shutting the door confronted him with a rather pale face.

"Those eyes were too many for you," said Mr. Wilding calmly, after a deliberate examination of the disturbed face before him. "I told you how it would be."

"That's the sort of thing any fellow might say," returned Snooks pathetically. "I didn't think you would have been so aggravating. And just when you see I'm down on my luck too. Yes; I've been and gone and done it."

"'Mother will be pleased!'" quoted his friend and law adviser, with a shrug. "So, by-the-bye, will be your father. They both regard nothing so highly as birth. I suppose Miss Brownrig can lay claim to some decent breeding?"

Digitized by Google

"The old chap is a cornchandler, you know that; at least, he used to be," said Snooks, with a heavy groan.

"Oh, indeed! And a very charming business too, I have no doubt. Leads up to quite a train of ideas. Corn wheat, staff of life, quaint old mill, and rustic bridge in the distance; miller sitting on it. I wonder," dreamily, "if Brownrig ever wore a white hat? And if so—why? Don't all speak at once. Well, well, she is a very pretty girl. Such eyes, you know! I really congratulate you my dear fellow."

"Wilding," desperately, "can't you do something? I—I don't know how it happened. It was the champagne, I suppose, and of course you know she is pretty: but I don't want to marry anyone, and I know the governor wouldn't hear of it."

"He will have to hear of it now, won't he?" asked Wilding unfeelingly.

"He would go out of his mind if such a thing were even hinted to him," declared Snooks wildly. "Try to help me out of it, Wilding, can't you?"

"I don't see what there is to do, except marry her, I only hope Lady Snooks and Miss Cornchandler will get on. And you should think of her beauty, you know; doubtless it will console you when Sir Peter cuts you off with the customary shilling."

"I suppose I had better cut my throat and put an end to it," said Snooks dismally, and then—overcome, no doubt, by the melancholy of this suggestion—he breaks down and gives way to tears.

"I say, don't do that you know," exclaimed Wilding indignantly. "Weeping all over the place won't improve matters, and will only make you look a worse fool than Nature intended, when you go out of the room. If you have put your foot in it, at least bear misfortune like a man. Look here," angrily, "if you are going to keep up this hideous boohooing I'll leave the room, and you too, to your fate. It's downright indecent. They will hear you in the next house if you don't moderate your grief."

As the nearest house was a quarter of a mile off, this was severe.

"I shouldn't care if they heard me in the next town," said Mr. Snooks, who was quite too far gone for shame.

"There is just one chance for you, and only one," said Wilding slowly. "I have an idea, and you must either follow it, or—go to the altar."

"I'll follow anything," eagerly. "What is it?"

"You have proposed to Miss Katie," solemnly. "Now go, and propose to the other three!"

As Wilding gave vent to his idea he turned abruptly on his heel and left the room.

"I'll do it," said Snooks valiantly, drying his eyes and giving his breast a tragic tap, "whatever comes of it."

Going into the hall, he saw Hetty standing near an entrance; a little way beyond her was Katie, conversing with a tall and lanky youth. Not daring to glance in the direction of the latter, who plainly expected him to come straight to her on the wings of love, he turned and asked Hetty to dance.

They danced, and then (it was a custom with the ball-goers in that mild suburban neighbourhood) he drew her out under the gleaming stars and up the dark avenue that a few minutes since was the scene of her sister's happiness.

There he proposed in due form, and was again accepted. Hetty's conduct, indeed, was a degree more pronounced than Katie's, because she laid her head on his shoulder, and he felt he was by all the laws of sentiment bound to kiss her. Her nose looked lovely in the pale moonlight; so I daresay he did not find the fulfilling of this law difficult.

After that he had some more, a good deal more—champagne; and then he proposed to Miss Georgie, who also consented to be his.

There now remained but one other step to be taken. He crossed the room, and asked the youngest Miss Brownrig to dance. He was getting rather mixed by this time, and was on the very point of asking her to marry him instead, so customary had the question grown to him now.

Miss Lily, however, declined to dance, on the plea that she was tired, and could exert herself no more that night.

With questionable taste he pressed the matter, and begged her to give him one, just one. At this she told him frankly she did not admire his style of dancing, which ended the conversation. So he asked her to come for a stroll instead; and having arrived at the momentous spot, delivered himself of the ornate speech that had already done duty three times that night. I forget what it was, but I know it wound up with the declaration that he adored her and wanted to marry her.

"It's extremely good of you, I'm sure," said the youngest Miss Brownrig calmly. "But, uncivil as I fear it must sound, I don't want to marry you."

"Don't you, by Jove!" said Snooks hastily. "Well, that's awfully ki— No, no!" pulling himself up with a start; "I don't mean that, you know; I mean it's awfully horrid, you know. In fact," warming to his work through sheer gratitude, "you have made me miserable for ever; you've broken my heart."

"Dear me, how shocking!" said Miss Lily frivolously. "Let us hope Time will mend it. I'm not very sure you did not speak the truth at first. I really believe it is kind, my refusing you. And now, Mr. Snooks, if I were you I should go in and say good-night to mamma, because you have been having a good deal of papa's champagne, and it is trying to the constitution."

Snooks took the hint, bade farewell to Mrs. Brownrig who, to his heated imagination, appeared to regard him with a moist and motherly eye, and, taking Wilding's arm drew him out of the house.

"Well?" said the latter interrogatively.

"I don't know whether it is well or ill," returned he gloomily. "But I followed your advice, and proposed to them all."

"And they accepted you?"

"The most of 'em. But Lily, the youngest, she——"

"I always said she was a sensible girl," put in Mr. Wilding sotto voce.

"Did you?" with much surprise. "Well, she refused me; sort of said she wouldn't have me at any price. So you see you were wrong!"

"I always knew she was one of the most intelligent girls I ever met," Mr. Wilding repeated, in a tone so difficult that his companion for once had sufficient sense to refrain from demanding an explanation.

Halt! Attention! Stand at ease, sir,
Make way, please, for TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google

The next morning, as Katie Brownrig turned the angle of the hall that led to her father's sanctum (whither a sense of filial duty beckoned her) she almost ran into the arms of her three sisters, all converging towards the same spot from different directions.

Simultaneously they entered Mr. Brownrig's study. (He called it a library; but that word is too often profaned for me to use it, so I shall draw the line at study.) But to return. Miss Lily, being the youngest, was of course the first to raise her voice.

"I had a proposal last night, papa, and I have come to tell you about it," she said, in a tone replete with triumph.

It is so sweet to the mind of youth to outdo its elders. But, "on this occasion only," the elders refused to be outdone. They each and all betrayed a smile of inward satisfaction, and then they gave way to speech.

"No!" they said, in a breath. They did not mean to doubt or be impolite; they only meant surprise.

"The curate," said Hetty in a composed but plainly contemptuous whisper. It was a stage whisper.

"Old Major Sterne," said Miss Georgie, promptly.

"Perhaps Henry Simms," suggested Katie, with some sympathy.

Then turning to her father she said, with a conscious blush. "It is very strange but I too had a proposal last night."

"And so had I!" exclaimed Georgie and Hetty in a breath.

"Eh?" said papa, pushing up his spectacles. He was fat and podgy, with sandy hair and a flabby nose.

He was a powerful man too, and one unpleasant to come to open quarrel with.

Proposals in the Brownrig family were few and far between—in fact, curiosities—and so much luck, as the girls described, falling into one day overpowered him.

"One at a time, my breath is not what it used to be," he said, addressing Katie. (If he had said breadth, it would have been equally true, as his mother—if she was to be believed—always declared he was a lean baby.) "May I ask the name of your lover?"

"Mr. Snooks," said she, with downcast eyes and a timid smile.

She took up the corner of a cherry-coloured bow that adorned her gown, and fell to admiring it, through what she fondly believed was bashfulness.

"Impossible!" exclaimed Georgie angrily.

"What a disgraceful untruth!" cried Hetty rudely. "Mr Snooks proposed to me, to me, last night, and I accepted him."

"What is it you say? Oh, I am going out of my mind; my senses are deserting me," said Georgie, putting her hands to her head with a dramatic gesture. "Or is it a dream that he asked me to marry him, and that I too said 'yes.'"

"I seldom visit the clouds," said Lily, with a short but bitter laugh. "And I certainly know he made me a noble offer of his hand and heart; both which treasures I declined."

"Where?" demanded the other three, as though with one mouth.

"In the laurel avenue!"

At this they all groaned aloud.

"Perfidious monster!" said Hetty from her heart.

"Am I to understand," began Mr. Brownrig, with suppressed but evident fury, "that this—this—unmitigated scoundrel asked you all to marry him last night?"

"If we speak the truth, yes," replied the girls dismally.

"He was drunk," said papa savagely.

"I can't believe it," said Katie, who was dissolved in tears—in fact, 'like Niobe, all tears'—by this time. "Nothing could be nicer than the way he did it. His language was perfect and so thoroughly from the—heart."

"He addressed me in a most honourable, upright, and Christian fashion," said Hetty. "I am sure he meant every word he said."

She was thinking uneasily of that kiss in the moonlight.

Could any one have seen her? Was old Major Sterne anywhere about at the moment?

"I certainly considered his manner strange, not a bit like what one reads," said Georgie honestly; "but I thought of the title and the property, and I said yes directly."

"I thought him the greatest muff I ever spoke to," broke in Miss Lily, with decision. "I refused him without a moment's hesitation, and told him to go home. I'm sure it was well I did. I dar say if he had stayed here much longer, he would have proposed to mamma next, and afterwards to the upper housemaid. I agree with you, papa, the champagne was too much for him."

"I—I think he is fond of me," said Katie in a low and trembling tone.

Her fingers are not playing with the cherry coloured bow now, but her eyelids have borrowed largely of its tint.

"Don't be a goose, Katie," said the youngest Miss Brownrig kindly but scornfully; "you don't suppose any of us would marry him now, after the way he has behaved. Do have some little pride."

"Perhaps he is mad," said Hetty vaguely.

Just at this moment as a salve to her wounded vanity, she would have been glad to believe him so.

"No, my dear," declared Lily calmly, "he has no brains worth turning."

"He said something, papa, about calling to-day at four o'clock," said Katie very faintly.

"Then I shall sit here till four," returned Mr. Brownrig in an awful tone. "I shall sit here until five; and then I shall get up, and go out and find that young man, and give him such a horse-whipping as I warrant you he never got before in all his life."

"Don't be too hard on him, papa," intreated Katie.

"I shan't, my dear, but my whip will," said papa grimly.

* * * * *

So he waited until five; he waited till half-past five; and then he took up a certain heavy gold-knobbed whip that lay stretched on the table as though in readiness, and sallied forth in search of Snooks' rooms. And he found them, and Snooks too—in bed, suffering from a severe catarrh, caught, I presume, in the laurel avenue.

And no man knows what he did to Snooks. But at least it gave him an increased desire for his bed, because for a fortnight afterwards he never stirred out of it.

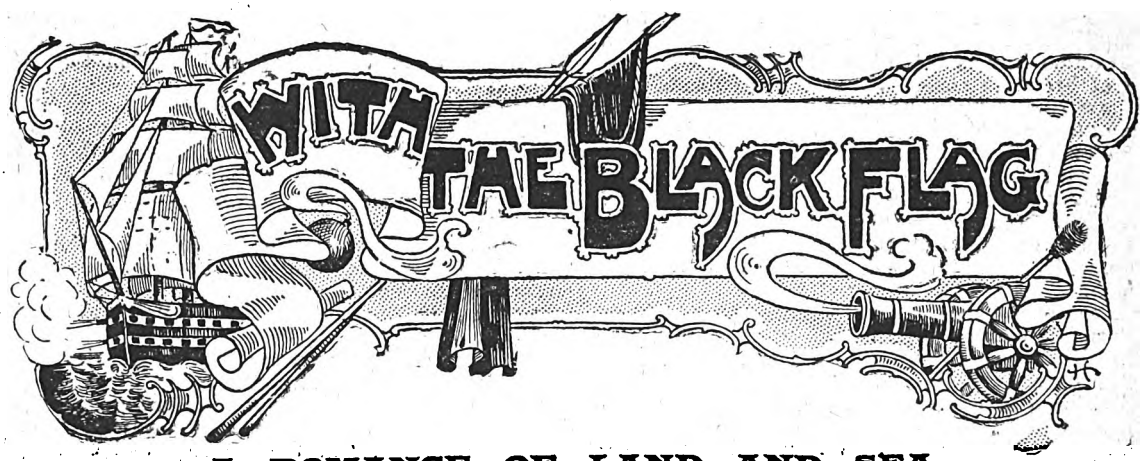
* * * * *

When Mr. Wilding heard of all this, I regret to say he gave way to noisy mirth in the privacy of his chambers; and was actually caught by his washerwoman—who peeped through the keyhole—performing a wild dance in the middle of the floor.

MRS. HUNGERFORD.

What oh, she bumps! Well, why not seize her?
It's good—you bet—this TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic.

Dons Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who are friends of Wyvenhoe.

General Urdenetta, Governor of Pampatar, a bitter enemy of Wyvenhoe.

Bolivar, Supreme Chief of the Venezuelan Republic.

Tamanac, an Indian Cazique, and great friend of Santleo.

CHAPTER XVIII.

I am Imprisoned, but Escape.

As I saluted General Urdenetta he gave me a stare of insolent inquiry.

"Excuse me for interrupting you, Señor General; but I have just received this," I said, producing the letter.

"I meant you to receive it, and I mean the order to be obeyed," he answered harshly and peremptorily, but as (though I suspected my fate to be sealed) I had resolved not to throw away a chance by unnecessarily provoking him, I replied quietly:

"But do you mean that I must personally command the firing party?"

"Of course I do. Why not?"

"It is unusual for the colonel of a regiment to command a firing party."

"Unusual it may be, yet not against regulations, and I think I heard somebody say not long ago that when his general gives an order it is an officer's duty to obey it without making remarks."

"If it be a possible order, certainly."

"I do not understand you, Señor Colonel."

"These prisoners are civilians, some old and infirm, others mere boys, and being neither an assassin nor an executioner it is impossible for me to take any part in putting them to death."

"I call you to witness, gentlemen, (turning to his aides) that Colonel Wyvenhoe not only refuses to obey my order, but says I am a murderer."

"Pardon me, Señor General, I did not say what you are, I merely said what I am not."

"But if I have these treacherous peasants executed, you will regard me as a murderer."

"I have not said so; but if I commanded the firing party I should unquestionably regard myself as one."

"So you absolutely refuse to obey my order?"

"Si, señor. I absolutely refuse to imbrue my hands in the blood of these poor people, who, so far as I know, are innocent of offence."

"Cuerpo de Dios! Innocent of offence! Are they not sympathisers with the Godos? Their young men, after firing on my troops, have fled, and as I cannot lay my hands on them I shall make an example of their relatives. Nothing you can do will make the slightest difference in my resolve or their fate. Do you still persist in your refusal? I ask for the last time."

"I still persist in my refusal."

"Then you must take the consequences. Consider yourself under arrest."

"As you please. At my quarters?"

"No, sir; here. I shall have you tried by court-martial on a charge of rank insubordination, and insulting your general by imputing to him an intention to commit murder."

A fierce reply rose to my lips; but remembering that he might have me executed instanter, and being disposed to live as long as I might, I said again, "As you please, sir," and remained standing until Captain Comacho, one of the aides who, as I could see, was disgusted with Urdenetta's brutality, invited me to sit down, and gave me a cigar, which I accepted with a "Gracis, Señor Capitan," and a smile of affected unconcern.

Meantime the general convoked a court-martial before which I was shortly arraigned. The provost-martial prosecuted and the witnesses against me were the general and the members of his staff who had been present at the interview. As I could not deny their statements I asked them no questions and clenched the matter by repeating my resolve not to obey the order.

How doth the little busy bee, sir?
That's nought to do with TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google

On the other hand, I made an energetic defence, protesting that there was no law whereby a foreign officer who had merely undertaken to serve the Republic in a military capacity could be required to act as an executioner, also that the order was not only illegal, but outrageous.

To which the president answered that my observations, being insulting alike to the country and the general, aggravated my offence, and after a few minutes consideration, the court found me guilty and passed sentence of death, which Urdenetta at once confirmed.

"You have brought this on yourself," he said in my ear with a smile of malicious triumph. "I offered you my friendship, but you preferred my enmity. You know now that I am not to be insulted and defied with impunity. But to show you that I can be magnanimous, I will let you live until we leave this place, which will be at three o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there a carcel (dungeon) here (to one of the officers)?"

"Si, Señor General, a small one."

"The smaller the better, provided it is strong enough to hold the prisoner. Take him there, give him something to lie on. See that he is well guarded, there must be two sentries, one to stand by the door, the other to patrol the building, both to be relieved every two hours; and nobody must be admitted to the prisoner without a written order signed by myself. See to this, Captain Comacho."

And then he turned away and I was escorted by a corporal and four of Urdenetta's guard to the carcel—a little single-roomed building with thick walls and a thatched roof; a dark, filthy hole, swarming with cockroaches and other abominations, which had evidently not been occupied for a long time. Comacho, a good fellow, who made no secret of his sympathy, and promised to tell Don Iago what had happened, had the place cleaned out; and it was well he did, for under a pile of rubbish in one corner a couple of rattlesnakes were found and promptly killed. Then, after seeing that I was provided with a cobija, a chair, and a pitcher of water, and giving me a bundle of cigars, he left me to myself.

Time dragged with me.

How other people feel when they are cast into prison I don't know. My first impulse was to consider whether it would be possible to get out. Windows there were none, only three round holes, through which, albeit I might get my head, I could not possibly get my shoulders, and, as I have said, the walls were thick.

There remained only the door, which, though originally strong, was considerably decayed, and the hinges were deeply pitted with rust. If it had opened from the inside instead of the outside, and there had been no sentries, I might have tried to force it—of course, after dark; but the sentries were there, the door did not open from the inside, and I soon came to the conclusion that escaping by my own unaided efforts was impossible.

I knew that Santleo, John Ready and the Cazique would leave no stone unturned to help me, but how they could do so was not obvious. It were useless to appeal to Urdenetta, and as nobody could see me without his written permission, which neither Don Iago nor John Ready was likely to obtain, they would be unable to communicate with me. This, however, was of less importance as I saw no way, even if I got out, of evading my guards and running the gauntlet of the pickets and outposts.

There seemed to be nothing for it but resigning myself to my fate—if I could. To be killed in action is the fortune of war; and when I entered the Venezuelan service I took the risk of being captured and executed by the enemy. But being butchered by a Venezuelan general for refusing to murder civilian peasants was a chance which I had not taken into account, and a fate to which I found it hard to reconcile myself. My predominant feeling was of rage against Urdenetta, and I almost hoped that Don Iago would execute his threat of making an end of him—if he could do so without making an end of himself, which was not likely.

I have heard say that, for the victim, the time between the sentence of death and its execution passes on the wings of swiftness, that the seconds become minutes, the minutes hours. I did not find it so. Time dragged with me. My mind was in a turmoil, for albeit my courage did not fail me, I recoiled from the death to which I had been so wickedly doomed. Moreover, I had not quite succeeded in giving up hope, and the resulting suspense was so maddening that there were moments when I regretted not having provoked Urdenetta into ordering my immediate execution.

My musings were interrupted by a fusillade, followed by piercing shrieks, the wailings of women and the moans of wounded men.

Three more shots, and silence.

Urdenetta's infamous order had been executed and more than twenty boys and old men, some on crutches, one blind, put to death.

I stamped and swore in impotent rage. If the murderer had been within reach of my arm he had died. But I could do nothing, and overcome with horror and the sense of my own helplessness, I threw myself on the cobija and covered my face with my hands.

Night fell. It was six o'clock, and there were left to me only nine hours of life. I should never see the sun, never see dear old England again, for at length I had abandoned hope and made up my mind to the worst,

In padded cell! Ha! Ha! You see, sir!
What you've done with your TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google

resolving to die bravely as became a christian and a soldier.

I was in this mood when the door opened and one whose features I could not distinguish entered the carcel, carrying in one hand a lantern, in the other a basket.

"The Señor Colonel's supper," announced the sentry, then shut the door.

"Your supper and something else, sir," said the man in English.

"John Ready! Thank Heaven!" I exclaimed, springing to my feet. "The man of all others I wanted to see before I die. But I want no supper, what have you brought me else, John?"

"Hope, and these."

And with that he took from under his jacket a double-barrelled pistol and one of those long two edged Spanish knives, known as cuchillos cachiblancos.

"This may be useful," I said, "but a crowbar had been more to the purpose."

"None could be got without exciting suspicion, and, while those two fellows are there, forcing the door from within is out of the question. What sort of door is it?"

"The wood is rotten and the hinges rusty. You and another might force it in with a push of your feet or a thrust of your shoulders."

"Good! That is what we thought."

"You have a plan, then?"

"We have thought of two. One is to burst the door in after disposing of the sentries."

"By killing them?"

"No, by stunning them with the butt ends of our pistols. But unless they were both struck down together, which in the dark might be difficult, there would be cries and a struggle, and smashing the door would make too much noise. Don Iago thinks the other plan is more likely to succeed."

"And that is?"

"To wait till all is quiet, then stampede the commissariat cattle, which are corded at this end of the village, cut the tethers of some of the horses, fire a musket and sing out 'the Godos, the Godos,' which would make the dickens of a row, the fall in would be sounded, and we should profit by the confusion to let you out and slip away."

"Don Iago is right. That is the more hopeful plan. But how will you manage to loose the cattle and cut the tethers?"

"I can do that easy enough, it is only a few slashes with a sharp knife and the Cazique and his dog will answer for the cattle, he can crawl like a snake and make no more noise, and the night is dark."

"How about the sentries?"

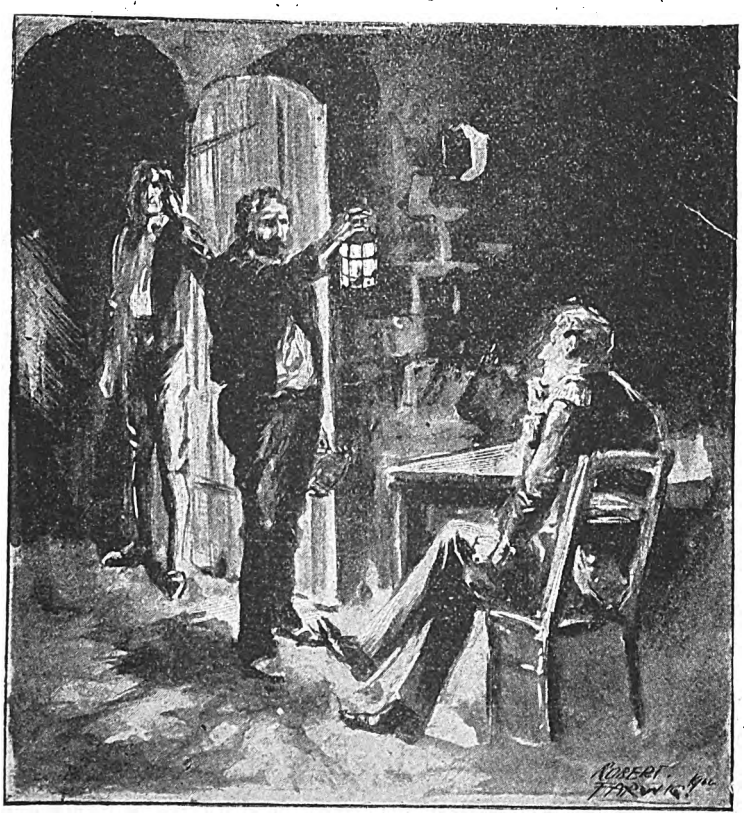
"Don Iago will order them to leave their posts and fall in with the others. If they refuse they must take the consequences."

"But won't that be bad for Don Iago afterwards?"

"He is going with us."

"Going with us?"

"Yes, he and the Cazique. Don Iago says there is nothing to choose between the patriots and the Spaniards, and that he won't serve under such a murderous ruffian as Urdenetta another day. But I must not stay any longer, sir, or the sentries will be smelling a rat. Only be sure to keep awake, and when you hear the row make ready to rush out."



One whose features I could not distinguish entered, carrying in one hand a lantern, in the other a basket.

"Oh, I shall keep awake, never fear. But just one question more. How did you get in?"

"Don Iago and Captain Comacho managed that. The captain, who is very friendly, got an order for Corporal Tambo to bring the prisoner's supper, and I am Corporal Tambo."

"Good! Now go, and may we meet again soon," quoth I, as we shook hands.

"Buena noche, Señor Colonel," said John, as the sentry let him out; and I answered: "Buena noche, Corporal, many thanks for bringing me so good a supper."

And with the supper he had brought news that gave me an appetite. I had thought never to eat, or care to eat, again; now I felt hungry, and knowing that I should need all my strength and, possibly, have to go on short commons for twenty-four hours, I made a hearty meal. Then I lighted a cigar at the lantern which Ready had left me, and waited for further developments. But I was too excited to be inactive, and after pacing about for a while it struck me that I might do something with my knife to weaken the door.

The screws were too rusty to be drawn, but I dug and cut round the hinges until they became so loose that a push from without or a wrench from within would burst their fastenings. Then it occurred to me that I had perhaps gone too far, that the mere opening of the door might cause it to fall by its own weight, and if anybody came into the carcel I should be found out and my escape prevented, a possibility which, though remote, made me very uneasy, and time dragged more than ever.

Still it passed, the noises in the village, the goings to and fro, the shouts and songs of the soldiers, the challenging of the sentries as officers went their rounds, gradually ceased and by nine o'clock all was quiet, save among the cocks and dogs which in tropical South America crow and bark all night long.

Digitized by Google

An hour went by, then another, and I was beginning to fear some hitch had occurred when a gun went off, followed at a short interval by the trampling of horses, the bellowing of cattle, the bray of asses, the blowing of bugles, cries of: "The Godos, the Godos!" and general uproar.

"Are you there?" asked in English a voice at the door.

"Yes, give a push, but not too hard. The hinges are cut away."

Which Santleo did, and as the door yielded I contrived to let it down without much din.

"How about the sentries?" I asked.

"One went, as I bade him, the other would not budge, so I had to take strong measures. But we have no time to waste in words. Let us hence."

"Whither? The road in both directions is thronged with troops."

"Over the river."

"Without the Cazique and John Ready?"

"They know the trysting place and will follow, are perhaps there already. Come."

Don Iago led the way, though I don't know how he found it, so dark was the night.

Luckily the water was shallow and scant, and after some scrambling and splashing we reached the opposite bank, and taking a track with which my companion seemed familiar presently came to a maize field, and there made a halt.

"Now for the call," said Santleo, and then gave a perfect imitation of the strangely human cry of the goatsucker. This was thrice repeated at intervals, and after a while answered, on which we and those whom we sought, guided by the sounds, drew near to each other.

To make assurance doubly sure Santleo now imitated the song of the gallineta de monte or forest hen, to which a reply came in the voice of the arco, a bird whose drum-like notes are often heard in the stillness of the night.

"Is it well with you?" he asked as a rustling among the maize announced the approach of our friends.

"It is well," responded Tamanac.

"Where are the horses?"

"Not far off; but hereabouts tracks are so many and the darkness is so thick that we shall do better to trust to Chocoto's nose than my leading."

The Cazique spoke to the dog, stroking its head, whereupon the sagacious animal, after questing round for a minute or two, gave tongue and set off at a slow run, closely followed by his master and the rest of us. When this strange chase had gone on some fifteen minutes we heard the neigh of a horse, and shortly afterwards came to a hollow begirt with bushes, and there found a black fellow sitting before a fire smoking a churumbela (a curved pipe much used in Venezuela).

"Are the horses all here, Pablo?" inquired Don Iago.

"Si, señor, grazing among the trees."

In Pablo I recognised Santleo's servant, a Zambo of the llanos, who was greatly attached to him.

"I did not know Pablo was to go with us," I remarked to Santleo, as we sat down by the fire.

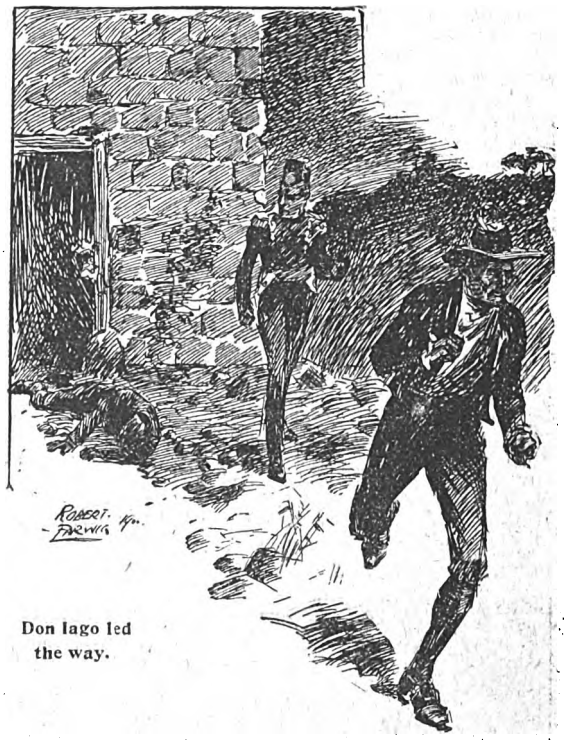
"We needed help, and he is as true as steel. Without him we could not have got the horses and kit over, and without horses we should be badly off."

"I am greatly beholden to you all. You have saved my life at the hazard of your own. What can I say more?"

"I can if you cannot. Your life being at stake because you refused to commit murder, it was the duty of all who call themselves your friends, especially of your compadre, to hazard and, if needful, sacrifice their lives to save yours. We have come off well, my only regret is that I was not able to deal with Urdenetta as he deserves."

"To do that effectually would have been to commit murder first and suicide afterwards. Urdenetta is always surrounded by his staff and his guard. Your life is worth more than his."

"That may be, yet he is in the way of doing more harm in the world than I shall do good, and he has not even the redeeming qualities of high courage and good generalship. It would be well for his country if he could be well hanged."



Don Iago led the way.

"Undoubtedly. Do you think we shall be followed?"

"No; they cannot track us by night, and the division must march, if not at three o'clock, not later than sunrise, for on Thursday they have to rejoin Bolivar, and Urdenetta though he will rage at being baulked of his revenge, is not such a fool as to wreck his leader's plans on the off-chance of recapturing you."

"We shall have to stay here till dawn?"

"Yes, and then recross the river. There is no road on this side."

"Which is your way?"

"Towards the setting sun."

"And mine towards the mouth of the Orinoco."

"For you a way of difficulty and danger. Should news of your flight reach San Fernando or Angostura before you get thither you will be in evil case. If you are in no hurry to return to England why not come with me?"

"Are you in earnest?"

"Of a surety, and I shall be glad of your company."

"But you don't say whither? To your home?"

"To my home and my people; but not having authority I cannot promise you a welcome, yet when they hear my tidings I have no more doubt that a fatted calf will be killed for you than that one will be killed for me."

"A fatted calf! But you are not a prodigal."

"I hope not, only a wanderer, and my time is finished. Besides, I want to go home. There is no child of Manoa who does not yearn to return to his native mountains, how far soever he may roam. Ever since the coming of the Cazique I have been terribly homesick"

Digitized by Google

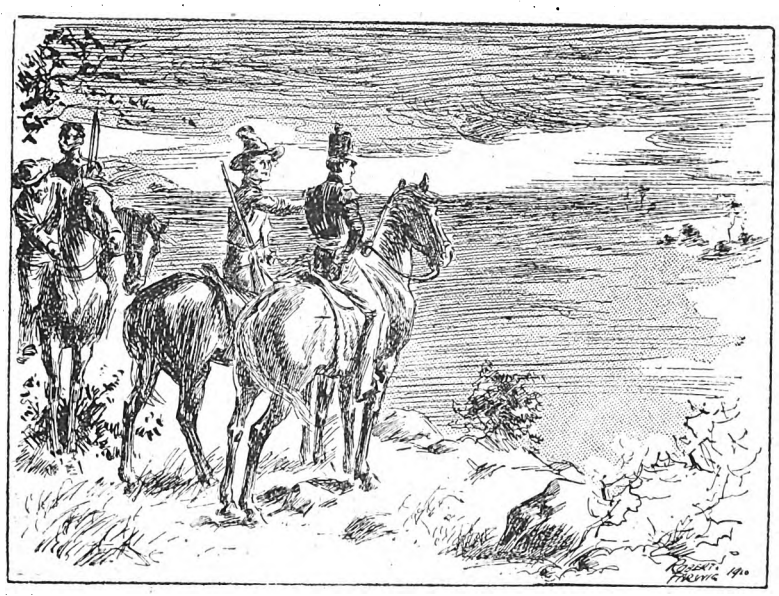
When I asked Santleo what he meant by these mysterious allusions he shook his head and answered:

"Not yet, I have said too much. Will you go?"

"With all my heart."

"It is a far and toilsome journey. We shall have to cross great plains without roads, broad rivers without bridges or ferries, traverse pathless forests, climb lofty mountains and undergo hardships. We shall travel by unfrequented ways, avoiding cities and civilised settlements, which will be all the easier as there are few of them. Once we are clear of these sierras we shall be out of danger except from the elements and wild animals, and wherever there are Indians Tamanac has friends who will render us all the help in their power."

This, though mysterious, was satisfactory; Don Iago not being a man who spoke at random.



"We are on the edge of what is probably the greatest plain in the world," said Santleo.

Three hours before dawn the blowing of bugles and the beating of drums apprised us that the troops were preparing for a move, but not being sure that all were gone we did not follow their example till peep of day, when Pablo went down to the river to reconnoitre.

"Not a man to be seen," he reported on his return. "Only women, who are fighting the turkey buzzards and burying their dead."

Urdenetta had not even interred his victims.

"Let us mount and be gone," said Santleo. "If these poor women see us they will take us for patriots and flee, while if we tarry till their men come back we shall either have to kill some of them or be killed ourselves, for they would be sure to attack us, and of killing there has been more than enough."

So recrossing the river we took once more to the road and turned our faces southward.

"There is another reason for not tarrying, which is also a good reason for hastening on," observed Don Iago, when we were well started. "We have villages to pass where the patriots are not greatly beloved, and if the news of the massacre were to precede us we might have to fight for our lives and, perhaps, fail therein. Until we reach the llanos we must be very circumspect, and give no occasion for offence."

On this we fell to discussing our itinerary, and the provision it would be necessary to make for a journey in the course of which we should have to travel for days in succession through countries without human habitation, and without meeting a human being. Finding, as I suspected, that Santleo's means consisted mainly of claims on the Republic, I placed at his disposal all the cash in my possession, which, as I had not yet touched the proceeds of my last draft, was more than enough for the purpose. The greater part of it was in gold, divided in two portions, one of which was carried in my belt, the other in Ready's, in such sort that nobody could take it from us without first taking our lives.

"You have relieved my mind of an anxiety," said Don Iago, "for, though I did not like to hint as much, we cannot travel expeditiously, or in anything like comfort, without making a considerable outlay. We need horses and attendants, also sumpter mules, and if the rains begin before we are clear of the llanos we may be weather-bound at some hut or hamlet for weeks, where, of course, we should have to pay for our entertainment."

This point settled, and a hasty and very scanty breakfast consumed, we went on, and towards noon came to a village through which the troops had passed, helping themselves to whatever they could lay hands on. The inhabitants had returned, and our arrival caused a good deal of commotion; but on being assured that we were peaceful travellers, willing to pay liberally for whatever we needed and they could supply, we were kindly treated, enjoyed a good meal, replenished our kits and bought hammocks, cobijas, food, and a few other things.

For the reason already mentioned we did not halt for siesta, going on till dark, bivouacking in a palm forest, and doing "sentry go" in turn.

Thus we travelled for several days, avoiding beaten tracks, calling at villages and farmhouses only when we desired to supplement the game, on which we chiefly subsisted, with other food.

At length, after traversing a beautiful mountain region, we came in sight of the llanos. A vast and apparently interminable plain stretched out before us, brown, barren, and desolate. It looked like some vast sea which had been turned into a dry and thirsty land, and a few tall and solitary trees, that might have been mistaken for masts, made the resemblance all the more striking.

"We are on the edge of what is probably the greatest plain in the world," said Santleo. "It extends to the foot of the Bolivian Andes, nearly a thousand miles."

"And about this mysterious mountain whither we are going. Is that a thousand miles away?"

"Would that be too far for you?"

"Not at all. I would go twice as far to learn the secret."

"What secret?"

"The secret you have so closely guarded. Who are your people, whose speech is English—for that English is your second, if not your first, mother tongue, I have no doubt whatever—and why you call yourself a child of Manoa."

"You must have patience, dear compadre. No common stranger should I dare take to the mountain. To no common stranger would the secret be imparted, but I am sure that when our chief men learn who you are they will agree with me that you have a right to know all we can tell you."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT THE ELECTION.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humourous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Ghosts," by K. and Hesk th Prichard, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. G. A. Brown, of 19 Bristo Place, Edinburgh. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about GHOSTS, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 29th. Post-cards only, please.

Lost by One.

IN a certain Northern burgh the contest had been very keen and resulted in a win by a single vote.

On the day following the election the unsuccessful candidate met one of his constituents who had voted for the first time.

"Well, John, we have given them a hard tussle."

"Don't mention it, sir; it has fairly upset me. Just fancy—beaten by one vote. It must have been very annoying to you, I know."

"Oh, a little; but better luck next time, John."

"It makes me angry to think of it. Some people don't know who they'll vote for, and others won't tell. That's not my style, though. After voting for you yesterday I put my card in my pocket, and can let anyone see who I voted for. I'm not ashamed to tell. Here it is."

He produced his voting card, but found that he was talking to empty space, as the disappointed one had fled to soliloquize regarding the possible effect of that lost vote. G. A. B.

Improved On.

MRS. M. was reading the newspaper to her unlettered husband

"'It is expected,' she droned, 'that the organ of the opposite party will make a great noise now that Lord X. has consented to take the chair at this afternoon's mass meeting.'"

"Is it?" cried Mr. M., getting up with decision and reaching for his hat. "Then I shall go. I've often said 'at these 'ere political meetings would be all the better for a bit of lively music." R. A. H. G.

A Tory Sheep's Head.

A PROMINENT Conservative in Mansfield during the recent election called on a Radical butcher, who had a number of sheep's heads for sale, and said!

"Mr. Butcher, I presume those sheep's heads are Radicals?"

"Yes," replied the butcher.

"Well," says the Conservative, "I want a Conservative sheep's head."

"Oh, indeed," answered the butcher, "I can soon oblige you."

He took one head and cut it in halves, and, taking out the brains, said,

"Here is a Conservative sheep's head."

The Tory walked away, sorry he had spoken.

W. H.

A Man of Peace.

AT a political meeting in one of our country villages the other evening, a well-known farmer was called upon to preside. Having taken the chair, he proceeded thus:

"Gentlemen, I'm a man o' peace, an' I want the meeting conducted in a quiet and orderly manner. Hauns up those in favour of oor candidate."

Instantly, a shower of hands were raised.

"Noo, then, hauns up for Mr. S—," naming the candidate for the other side.

Very few hands were shown.

Addressing some of the supporters of his own side, the chairman said:

"Chuck those other beggars oot, an' let us get on wi' the meeting."

T. F.

A Novel Economy.

A FARM labourer who had a very vague idea about voting (this being the first time he had been entitled to do so), was questioned by several of his neighbours as to how he was going to vote at the forthcoming election. But he always gave them the same answer.

"I tell thee I baint a-goin to give anybody my vote."

After a while two very energetic canvassers came along and asked him if he would kindly give his vote for Mr. So-and-So.

He gave a fierce glare at them and shouted:

"Now, thee look yer, mister, it ain't no good for thee to come here trying to get my vote off me. I never had one afore, and now I got it I'se a-going to stick to it." W. J.

How Did He Vote?

I OVERHEARD a party of miners one night last week in animated discussion outside a public-house as to the respective merits of the two candidates contesting the division.

One of the gentlemen is a notorious Pro-Boer, and, as a consequence, has become very unpopular with his constituents.

"Well, I don't know what to do," said one fellow. "I can't vote for that Pro-Boer, and I don't feel like voting Tory."

"I'll tell yo chaps what yo mun all do," said a man who had just quitted the polling-booth, joining the group. "Yo mun vote neutral, like me!"

J. W.

Digitized by Google

Wetter and Better.

After listening to a political address, in which the speaker set forth the benefits conferred by his party on the community, a shrewd old Yorkshire farmer was asked what he thought of the speech.

"Well," was his laconic reply. "I doant know, but I think sax hours' rain would ha dun us a deal mair good." R. P.

A Widow's Vote.

It is always difficult to persuade the woman ratepayer that she has no vote; but a lady in widow's weeds, who presented herself recently at one of the polling-booths in a borough election, had a very ingenious reason for claiming the suffrage, and was particularly reluctant to relinquish her claim.

"I know I can't vote for myself," she said indignantly, "but I am here to vote for my late husband."

C. R. F.

Only Mr. at Election Times.

The Newcastle-on-Tyne fight is not so old yet that it will fail to serve as a peg for an anecdote of a very polite canvasser.

"Well, Mr. Duffy, how are you to-night," he asked an Elswick labourer. "We've come to ask you for your vote."

"Indade, that's what I'm thinking, for Jack Duffy only gets Misther at election toimes," the voter replied with an amused smile. He had been canvassed before.

C. F.

Moral Support.

"Sir, a thousand congratulations!" gushed a toadying builder to a newly-elected M.P. "The town could not possibly have a better representative than you. You are all that the most exacting could desire."

The new member received these courtesies somewhat coldly, for he had good reason to doubt the builder's sincerity.

"May I ask you, sir," he inquired bluntly, "if you gave me your vote?"

"No, sir, I confess I did not," responded the builder not one whit abashed. "But I rode to the poll in one of your conveyances, and the moral effect of that was tremendous." R. A. G.

A Determined Voter.

At the Barnsley election, in 1895, a horse appeared in the polling-booth. The place was Ryhill National School, where Mr. Robert Ogle, relieving officer, presided.

There were not many voters polling, and the hours were hanging heavily on the official's hands, when the door was quietly pushed open, and there appeared—a horse's head!

Mr. Ogle ran to the door to drive the intruder away, but when he got there he found the horse was mounted, and in a second the animal was in the school, with his rider on his back.

Mr. Ogle demanded to know what was meant by this proceeding, and learnt that the rider-elector had lost the use of his legs some time previously; but being determined to record his vote on the present occasion, had got himself lifted on horseback, and had thus come to the poll, horse and all.

He accomplished his purpose, for the vote was duly recorded. A. L.

A Hard Task.

It is wonderful how well an election canvasser knows everybody, even if he has never seen or heard of them before. One had a take-down the other day. Calling at a house in Islington he said:

"Is Mr. Smith in?"

"No," said Mrs. S., who had answered the door.

"Well," said the canvasser, "I have called on behalf of Mr. Brown, Conservative candidate for this part. I——"

"Oh," said Mrs. S., "Mr. Smith does not take any interest in such things now."

"Well he ought to, I think I can talk him over."

"I don't think you can."

"Oh, yes I can; when will he be in? I see no reason why I should not get him to vote."

"I do, then," said Mrs. S.

"Why?" he demanded.

"Because he has been dead over two months."

J. W. L.

The State of the Poll.

It was election day in a little village, and, being the parliamentary election, all the natives had a holiday and were enjoying themselves at booths and merry-go-rounds.

Jack Saunders, the farmer's handy man, had made many unsuccessful attempts to climb the greasy pole and annex the substantial leg of mutton.

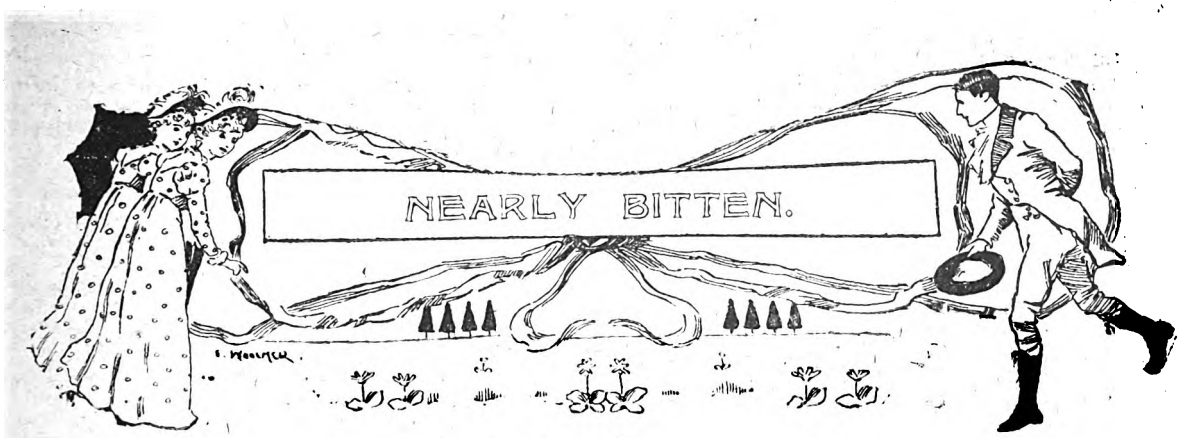
At length, his patience exhausted and his money all spent, he wended his way homewards in a somewhat muddled condition. He chanced on the road to meet his employer, who, anxious as to the election, inquired:

"What is the state of the poll, John?" Judge of the good man's astonishment when Jack, whose thoughts were still harping on the envied leg of mutton, replied in an earnest tone:

"Gad, zir, I 'ooden vise 'ee to try it, vur I never zeed 'un greasier in all my life." W. C.

PEARSON'S
New Morning Paper.
1d. 1/2 The 1d. 1/2
The Paper for Home Reading.
The Paper for the Housekeeper.
The Paper for the Busy Man.
The Paper for the City Man.
The Paper for the Sporting Man.
The Paper for EVERYBODY.
Daily
THE MOST ORIGINAL, UP-TO-DATE, ACCURATE AND BEST NEWSPAPER
Published in this Country.
Published SIX days a Week, NOT once.
1d. 1/2 Express 1d. 1/2

Digitized by Google



THERE is no doubt about it, it was time I had a holiday—i.e., a real holiday in which I could leave business absolutely behind, no letters to follow, one in fact where I should become the merest unit in the world, and forget for the brief period all ties.

My parents were alive and I had brothers and sisters. Of course usually I spent my holidays with them, but this time I was going to try what a complete change from all familiar surroundings would do for my health, which was not, at the present, good. For another thing, which for my departure was distinctly convenient, I was perfectly heart-whole—so rare a thing for a young man.

So it was that one broiling day towards the end of July, I found myself in the heart of the Swiss Mountains after an extremely hot and uncomfortably dirty journey from Paris.

For my pocket's sake it was with a trip that I was taking the mere skeleton of my holiday. I was taking the two out and in journeys at the beck of the tourist agent, leaving the intermediate portion of the holiday to be spent according to my impromptu ideas.

On my outward journey I found to my satisfaction that I was the only member of the company travelling alone. When I arrived at Lucerne, and was preparing to enter my name in the books of the Hotel Isberg, I saw just in front of me a girl of about twenty and a woman apparently much older who had booked themselves. I had to wait for a little while before getting to the book, and had time to recognise them as two whose faces I had noticed on the boat before reaching Dieppe, and again on leaving Paris.

Though I was in such a lazy, nonchalant condition of mind, determined to forget my fellow creatures, I found the girl's features rather attractive, and the interest thus aroused was increased by the glance of slight interest which she gave me as she turned round. I busied myself entering my name underneath those of Miss Purcher and Miss Ella Purcher, and when I had finished they had gone.

My interest had certainly been awakened though I doubted whether it would last, but for the present I was really anxious to make acquaintance with the fair unknown. I did not, however, care for the look of the elder sister, and rather anticipated no chance could be found by which the desired introduction would be obtained. I was mistaken. As I came out of my room to go down to dinner that evening, a figure was standing in the doorway of a room in the same corridor nearer the head of the stairs. As I advanced both the sisters came out of this room and went down stairs in front of me. The dropping of her fan by the elder sister struck me afterwards as a curious chance, but, as I hastened to pick it up, I was only too glad to have the opportunity of making the acquaintance of the younger. A few commonplace remarks at the door made all three feel quite at home, and before I knew it I was seated at the table d'hôte between the two sisters, having been shown straight to this seat through the attendant's conviction that we were of one party.

That evening was sufficient to make me fast friends of the two—for the sake of the younger. The elder, and apparently the chaperone, though to a certain extent neglected, seemingly did not mind so long as her younger sister was contented. This the latter certainly was, and in an hour we were talking as if we had been life-long friends. The majority of the party were on the tour for a fortnight, but I intended to stay an extra week, and was delighted to find, on telling them, that my new friends were going to do the same.

Excursions were planned, up the heights and across the lake and to the thousand and one interesting spots. It took very few days for me to be hopelessly in love with the younger girl, and I could not help feeling my wishes were reciprocated. The elder sister was particularly obliging, pleading that she often liked to be alone in the midst of such magnificent scenery. Accordingly Ella and I were much alone together. Already I thought of her as Ella as her sister called her.

And so the days went on, till I got to dread the end coming before I had spoken of these vital matters to the girl.

I knew in my cool moments I was rash, for I knew nothing of them, and yet the "all together" seemed only too satisfactory. As the time grew shorter Ella grew more and more openly attracted by my company.

Two days were left of the holiday, and though not yet quite brave enough for the final venture, I had managed to tell the girl I wanted her to go back with me alone to our favourite spot the next day. She could not fail to be aware of my intention from my very looks and manner, and I flattered myself the biggest part of the battle was over. That evening I went up to bed earlier than usual after the girls had retired. I generally spent an hour or two smoking after they had gone, but this evening I was too excited.

The evening was very close, and before lighting up I spent some minutes with my elbows on my window-sill gazing out into the night. There was no moon and I could scarcely distinguish the rest of the building. Most of the tourists had left and there were few lights in the bedrooms.

Digitized by Google

All at once my attention was aroused by the sound of voices. They were little above a whisper, but in the stillness of the night little strain was required to distinguish them. Ella's voice rivetted my attention and there was no mistaking the very manly voice of her sister.

My first instinct was to retire, but then my wish to hear good of myself prevailed and I listened.

"To-morrow will do it all right, eh, Ella?"

"Yes, I think I've got him up to the scratch. He has not been a very hard nut, though."

My idol was in danger of being broken if that was how she talked. I listened eagerly.

"No! you've had an easier job than usual this time. He ought to be good for a couple of hundred, anyhow."

What did it mean? Easier job than usual! Couple of hundred! I puzzled to no purpose.

"Yes, he's an easier game than old Fradney, though the old chap did come off second best."

A light began to dawn on me.

There was a sound of subdued laughter.

Then Ella again spoke. "Well, anyhow, we'll go up to the top again. You get on that other peak—you know—and if you see me come forward then's your time. You can easily get round by that stony path at the back, and you can reach us in five minutes or so."

I had heard quite enough, and as the talking ceased I went to bed, but not to sleep. Night time was to give me some help.

As we had arranged, next morning after breakfast we started comparatively early. Before doing so, however, I had a long talk with an Englishman, in charge of the tour to a large extent, and whose casual acquaintance with me had shown me he was to be confided in.

We sat down—Ella and I—at the top of the Rigi.

All around us was magnificent mountain and lake scenery well conducive to love-making which I showed my fair companion I was very ready for.

Gradually leading up to what she expected me to say I had almost put the question when suddenly, with a startled air, she got up from my side and asked to be left alone for a minute "to think" the little jade said.

She walked to the edge of the small plateau and stood there with her head bent and her back to me for two or three minutes. Then, with eyes demurely lowered, she sauntered back to me with her hands behind her back. She certainly was a pretty girl and her appearance made me wish my dream was not to be so ignominiously dispelled. Then, sinking down by my side, she half raised her eyes to mine.

I had not finished. I was going to carry the matter through. And so, looking up to her and with my arms about her, I declared my love.

She was silent for fully a minute, though little actions showed her acceptance of my love. Then suddenly she sprang up with a little shriek and confronted me, at the same time I was astonished to see a man standing behind us.

"So, sir, this is your game."

The appearance was that of a man, the voice was the voice of the elder Miss Purcher.

Giving me no time to speak, he or she persisted—

"Of course this cannot stop here. You understand you cannot compromise my wife like this with impunity."

"Your wife!" I exclaimed, "whatever do you mean? And what do you mean by masquerading in men's clothes?"

"Mean, my good man," said he—"I mean that that lady is my wife. "For convenience sake"—with a grin—"we have come here in disguise, and will expose you unless you give me immediately some compensation. You probably carry your cheque book with you, sir?"

But the gods were not with him.

As he finished speaking my friend the manager and a Swiss policeman appeared upon the scene, and, amid shrieks from Ella and oaths from her husband, they were handcuffed to prevent trouble.

My friends had bided their time till the conspirators had made their intention very plain.

And so the tour to Lucerne ended in an exciting way for three of the party, and I returned to town well pleased with the result, though not altogether proud of my reminiscences, and a notorious pair of continental criminals—man and wife—spent their holidays for the next year or two amid less poetical surroundings.

Stuart Blofeld.

Soldiers' Faces Enlarged for 6s. each.

If you have a relative who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. × 12in., mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. × 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

Full particulars appear in the current issue of The Curiosity Shop.

A coupon from that paper must accompany each order.

A sample enlargement is on view at these offices. Below are other addresses where the enlargements may be seen:

Portsmouth.—A. B. Bennett, 408 Commercial Road, Landport.
Southsea.—L. Hillyer, 9 Green Road.
Glasgow.—William Love, 221 Argyle Street (opposite Central Station), and William Barr, 88 Sauchiehall Street.
Liverpool.—F. W. Edwards, 122 Pembroke Place, and Henry Jones (tobacconist), 184 Oakfield Road.
Blackpool.—Coppock (newsagent).
Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Messrs. T. and G. Allan, 18 and 20 Blackett Street.
Sunderland.—Edward Thompson, 263 High Street West.
Manchester.—J. Matthews, 88 Oxford Street, and Messrs. M. Carr and Co., 38 Alexandra Road, Moss Side.

A SPLENDID NOVEL. SIXPENNY EDITION.

The Invisible Man

By H. G. WELLS.

Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," etc.

Price 6d.

POST FREE 8d.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE LEOPARD'S SPOTS.

THE old saying that a leopard cannot change its spots, meaning that you must not expect a radical change in a man's nature, has been exemplified in many ways; the case of John Buckland is not the least peculiar of those examples.

Buckland was the son of a hunter and trapper of wide reputation who was killed in a stampede of cattle when his boy was only ten years old. As Jack's mother had died three or four years previously, the boy was left alone in the world to shift for himself.

Those were rough times and Jack found himself buffeted from pillar to post, receiving more cuffs and kicks than kind words, so he grew up into a young man with rather crude notions of justice and with the feeling that the hands of most people were against him and that when an ill turn was done against him he must use every effort to repay it with interest.

This warped mental condition caused him to see adverse actions where no ill was meant, and his face always bore a defiant expression, while his restless eyes seemed to be for ever on the watch for an attack from one quarter or the other.

He had just completed his twentieth year when an event occurred which proved a turning point in his life. He had conceived a liking for the daughter of a hunter, a young woman about three years his senior, and this liking quickly developed into passionate, unreasoning love.

He had not spoken to Bertha Hayes on the subject; he had worshipped her from afar until his love grew too strong for further restraint. Then he boldly approached her and asked her to marry him.

The offer of marriage was so unexpected that Bertha looked incredulous for a moment or two; then she laughed at him and asked if he had gone mad.

Angered at this, Jack responded hotly, this was too much for Bertha, who shared the common opinion that Jack Buckland was "of no account" and had certainly never imagined that he would care to make such a proposal, and with a contemptuous curl of her lips she bade him be gone, adding that she was already engaged to a man. Jack, stung both by her manner and her words, went from her presence, scarcely able to contain his rage.

What Bertha may have said to her father and her lover is unknown, but Jack Buckland found himself in still worse odour than he had ever been before in the little community, and he was glad to escape the smiles and sneers of the inhabitants by joining an expedition into the territory of a branch of the Cherokee Indians. It was a risky undertaking, but what of that?

There was a fight with the Indians, and the expedition returned without Buckland, who had been wounded and carried off by the redskins; men shuddered as they thought of the fate that undoubtedly had befallen the young fellow, and he was looked upon as dead.

But quite a different fate had been reserved for Jack. The chief of the tribe had an idea that the young man might prove useful to them in the struggle against the whites, and by his command Jack was nursed and restored to health, every kindness being lavished upon him.

The contrast between the treatment he had received from his own people and that meted out to him by the Indians was so glaring to his perverted imagination that he willingly decided to throw in his lot with them. From that day he did his best to change his spots, so to speak, and to sink the white man's nature in that of the redskins.

More than six years had elapsed and, to judge by appearances, the spots had almost if not entirely faded away. Buckland appeared to have become a Cherokee; he hunted with them and fought with them against other tribes and against the white hunters—fighting with as much energy as if he had been born with a red skin.

In his determination to alter his nature he had schooled himself to look on at some of the instances of torture inflicted upon captured enemies, but there was just this reservation—that the prisoners had not been white men.

Digitized by Google

Then came the test of the genuineness of the change. If it be possible to effect a radical alteration in one's nature, then Jack Buckland had changed. The alteration in him was seemingly far more thorough than in those savage or half-savage men who have been converted by missionary effort from the ways of savagery to the manners and religion of Great Britain; he was just as capable of withstanding the test as they are. How did he come out of the ordeal?

Returning from a hunting expedition one afternoon, he found that a white man had been captured. Three of the warriors had come unexpectedly upon a hunter reposing on the ground; he must have been possessed by an extravagant sense of security, amazing in a man of experience, for his weapons lay beyond his reach and he did not know that the Indians were upon him until they stood before him.

The warriors themselves were utterly surprised to find that the man who had fallen such an easy victim was one who had acquired a reputation for the manners in which he tracked and fought with the redskins.

The man attempted to rise as soon as he became aware that the Indians were upon him, and the latter, quic ly recovering from their astonishment, seized and bound him.

Ben Harvey was a man just over thirty, although he looked somewhat older. He had spent the greater part of his life on the plains and knew the Indian nature better than that of his own people. He reviled himself for his stupidity, but walked stolidly with his captors, for he knew that it was useless to make any attempt at escape or to appeal for anything in the shape of mercy.

He had assumed some of the stoic nature of the Indians as a result of his mode of living, and his face usually betrayed as little of his feelings as did those of the redskins. In the course of his career he had never seen an Indian express so much surprise, and the fact flattered and amused him, although he was annoyed at his own stupidity.

But suddenly his bronzed cheeks lost some of their tan and a wild, anxious look shone in his eyes. Heavens, what about Bertha and the little girl!

They were to cross the plai s to their new home with an escort of two men only, and Harvey had arranged to meet them. It had never occurred to anyone to suppose that Indians had ventured so far from their usual haunts; the savages had a wholesome recollection of the fact that they had been severely dealt with and for the past three or four years they had kept within well-defined limits.

This accounted for Harvey's sense of security in some measure, but a man of experience—a man hated as much as he was—ought never to relax his vigilance.

The Indians were growing bold again, and Harvey now awoke to the fact that there might be grave danger for his wife and child. He could on'y hope that the Indians had not gone so far in that direction.

As for himself, he was in a tight place, but he did not despair, for he had on two previous occasions escaped from the clutches of his foes when the chances seemed just as much against him. It was rather different now, for he was a married man, for his death meant grief and probable privation for two other beings.

Buckland's curiosity was aroused, he wished to see who this white man was and find out whether he knew the prisoner or not. He did not stop to ask for particulars, but made his way to where the captive was bound to the trunk of a tree and guarded by two young warriors.

"Does Angry Eye wish to see the captive?" asked one of the minor chiefs, as he saw Jack making his way towards the tree.

"Yes, Red Wolf," answered Buckland in the native dialect. They were all brief of speech.

The captive had his eyes closed and his head was bent; he was thinking of his wife and child and hoping that they would escape. The cords had been drawn tightly round his arms and body and were causing him pain and much discomfort; he was therefore too preoccupied to notice who might come or go.

Buckland looked at him with a cynical smile for a second or so; then an exclamation came from his lips, and the sound caused the captive to look up. Harvey noted that the face differed from the ordinary type of Indian, but the head-dress and clothing were similar to those of the savages round him.

"So it is you?" said Buckland sarcastically. "You have fallen into our hands at last, Harvey. We have seen very little of you lately!"

"By Heaven!" ejaculated Harvey. "It is——"

"Angry Eye, the Indian!" interrupted Buckland.

"Bah! You mean John Buckland, the renegade!" returned Harvey contemptuously. "I suppose you and your friends intend to murder me?"

"You will be treated as all our captives are treated," replied Angry Eye coldly. "The white man takes years to kill men of his own colour, and tortures them all the time, as I know by experience. We do not take long about it—as you will soon learn by experience!"

"Can a man change from a civilised creature to a savage?" asks Harvey, addressing no one in particular. Then, losing his usual calm, he burst forth: "You villain! Set me free and give me a knife or a hatchet, and I will fight you or any of your crew!"

Some of the Indians had drawn near, attracted by the talk between the two men, and there were murmurs of anger from several pairs of lips. Angry Eye, who had some influence with his fellow braves, motioned them back and addres ed Harvey.

"We have met twice in battle, soon after I left the haunts of white men and became a brave among these noble beings whom you and your degraded race call savages," he replied. "I have a grudge to p y; you are the man who married Bertha! You are the creature she called a man, by which she meant that I was not a man. You sided with those who jeered at me. We have you now, without running any risk; why should we set you free so that we may have to run some risk in killing you?" and Buckland laughed derisively.

Harvey remained silent. It was useless to appeal to this man, who had so changed that he had become a savage—with the few good qualities of the savage, probably, but with all his bad qualities in an intensified form, and one of those bad qualities was the fiercest kind of revengefulness. The leopard's spots had vanished!

The elder chiefs chuckled in a satisfied manner when they learnt what had taken place, for many of the braves understood enough English to follow the conversation. The white men had tried to win over the Indians to their ideas, and had succeeded in several instances; it gratified them to know that they also had made a convert. They might hope to make others!

But Buckland's ordeal was not over; it was only just beginning, and the real test was to come.

The Indians were becoming venturesome and were extending their excursions farther and farther across the plains. It was intended to torture and kill Harvey that evening, but the entertainment was delayed. News had arrived that there was a chance of making other captives and the festivities were deferred in the hope that other victims might be placed by his side.

Digitized by Google

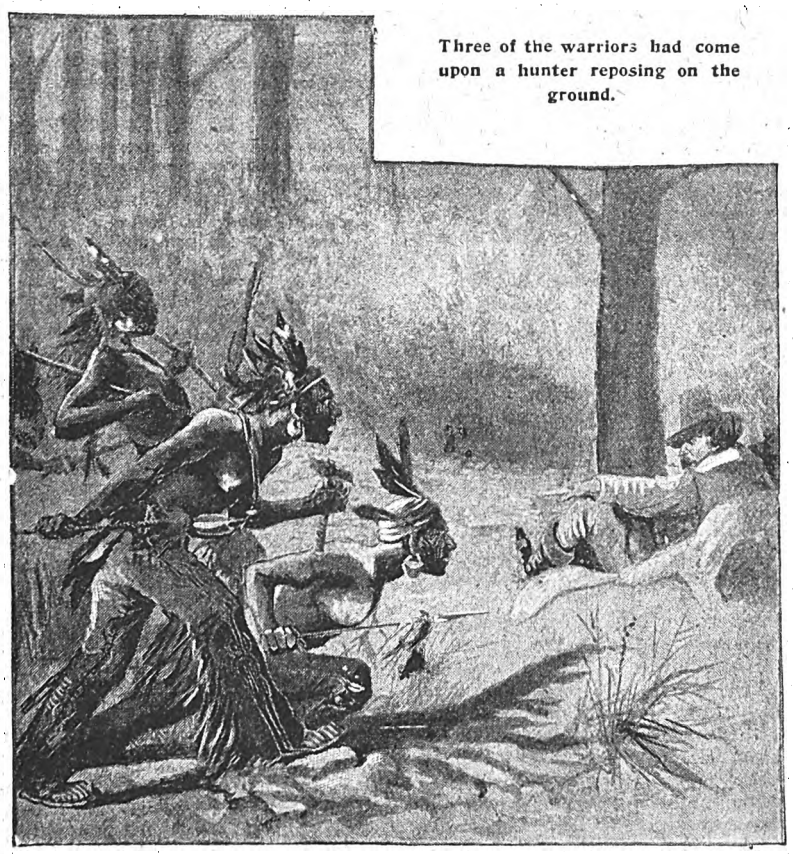
On the following morning a party of braves set out for a journey across the plains. Angry Eye was not one of the party; he and his companions had not been successful in their search for game on the previous day and they had started again on the same errand in order to retrieve their reputation.

That day passed and the next day was half spent before either party returned to camp. The first sight that met the eyes of Buckland was a white woman and child being led captive by the triumphant Indians, and he soon heard that a small caravan had been stopped, the two white men killed after a sharp fight in which three of the braves had been sent to the happy hunting ground, and the white woman and girl had been brought to the camp to be killed or saved for a worse fate.



Three of the warriors had come upon a hunter reposing on the ground.

One glance at the captives was enough for Buckland; it was Bertha and a girl whose resemblance to the woman proved her to be Bertha's daughter.

At that moment there was a scream and a cry of "My husband!" from Bertha, who had caught sight of Ben tied to the tree; she made an attempt to get free from her captors and run to his side, but she was forcibly prevented.

A murmur of delight arose from the Indians; they had not only secured a hated enemy, but his family also. Truly, the medicine man had spoken well when he said that fortune was to favour them.

The mother and child were taken close to Ben Harvey so that the savages might gloat over their misery. Bertha looked round despairingly for a face that might show some slight expression of sympathy or mercy, and her eyes met those of Buckland. She stared at him and then gasped his name.

The white chief remained motionless, Bertha stretched out her hands in supplication.

"Jack Buckland, you are one of us, though you wear the dress of an Indian; help me, save my husband and my child!"

"I am not a man!" was the cold reply.

"Don't ask for pity for me from that savage!" cried Harvey to his wife. "He is the worst Indian of them all!"

"I can't believe that a man can change his nature," cried Bertha, realising more and more how desperate their position was.

Her despair at the fate which awaited her husband and child, to say nothing of her own, made her resolve to try the apparently impossible.

"Jack Buckland," she continued, still holding her hands towards him, "I was unfair towards you, that may be, but is such a small thing to make you turn from your own people and allow them to suffer inhuman tortures?"

"You are not the only one who ill-treated me," was the cold reply.

Bertha moved towards him. The braves looked on in wonder; they did not understand this thing, but some indefinable feeling prevented them from interrupting.

Bertha knelt down in front of Buckland, her child holding her dress and staring with frightened eyes at the warriors, and took the hands of the white chief in hers. He allowed her to do so passively; he betrayed not the least sign of emotion of any kind.

Bertha Harvey felt that she had a double task to perform; she must save her husband and daughter at any cost, but it also seemed to her that she owed it as a duty to civilisation and as some reparation for the past to draw this man away from savagedom.

"Buckland," she said in a low, pleading voice, while her eyes were fixed just as pleadingly on his, "your place is not here. You are not one of these savages; you cannot look into your own heart—search its depths—and say that you uphold their ways, their lives. You cannot stand by and see the three of us sacrificed by these people! You cannot do it! Your heart would torment you all your days with the thought that you had been guilty of a crime against your nature! Prove yourself a man—prove to me and to everybody your claim to be regarded as a man—by throwing off the guise of a savage and assuming your real place!"

Digitized by Google

Despair made her eloquent. She paused for breath and watched for an indication that he was relenting. Then, as if afraid that she might lose ground if she did not press home at once, she continued:

"For the sake of your manhood, help us! Look at this innocent child and ask your heart whether you are really a savage—you know what it means for us! Ask ——"

"Bertha—Mrs. Harvey, I give in!" he gasped.

Her words had touched him, in spite of the remembrance of long ago. No! He was not a savage; he could not change his whole nature. It had been a hideous dream, brought about by brooding over the wrong done to him.

But now that he had swiftly searched his heart, he was awake. His companions were so different from him, he could not become one of them body and soul. The crucial moment had arrived and the leopard's spots showed themselves again.

Buckland now set so work to devise some method of securing the release of the captives. His garb and everything pertaining to the life he had led for the past few years were already becoming distasteful to him. But he must be careful not to show it. He must deal with the Indians after their own cunning methods.

Leading Bertha and her child to the chief of the tribe, he declared in a low, respectful, but firm voice that she had presented a vision to him, and that according to this vision, if the three whites were harmed or held captive, evil fortune would befall the tribe, as a large host of white soldiers would infallibly surround them and kill them all.

This was not in accordance with the saying of the medicine man, but Buckland stuck to his theme, pointing out that he had originally been one of that race which had worked such wonders and that the woman was one of his people who had visions which never lied. There was much bickering and disputation, and it was finally decided to wait till the morrow.

But when the morrow dawned, the captives and Angry Eye, with three horses, were gone and the two guards were found bound and gagged. These guards—one watching Harvey and the other on duty outside the hut in which Bertha and her daughter were confined—both told the same story; they had been stunned by a blow on the back of the head.

There was a hue and cry and the braves set out in pursuit of the fugitives, but they were not overtaken and none of them were ever seen again by the Cherokees.

Buckland left the plains and went to one of the big cities where he became a prosperous merchant; and none of those who knew him in after life would have dreamt that the leopard's spots had even so much as paled in colour.

GEO. KNIGHT.

TOMMY: "I say, Jimmie, wot is classical music?"

JIMMIE: "It's the kind you can't understand unless you wear long hair."

MISTRESS: "Why, Bridget, you have your fingers in the soup."

BRIDGET (reassuringly): "Oh, don't worry mum: it's not hot."

TWENTY-NINE SEALED ENVELOPES CLAIMED.

£290 ALREADY PAID.

THE Editor of Pearson's Weekly has sent out fifty men, each with a sealed envelope containing a letter entitling the recipient to the sum of £10. To secure one of these envelopes it is only necessary to ask one of the Ten-Pound Men the question, "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?" and at the same time to show a current copy of Pearson's Weekly. Full details of the scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

In order that ladies may have an extra opportunity of sharing in this great Pearson's Weekly scheme,

TEN TEN-POUND LADIES

have been dispatched all over the country, each of whom will deliver up the Sealed Envelope to the lady who fulfills the conditions mentioned in Pearson's Weekly. No gentlemen need apply.

The latest song, "Have You Got That Ten-Pound Note?" is being sung every night by Mr. R. G. Knowles in various London music-halls with great success.

HOW TO GET A COPY OF THE SONG.

Copies of the song are now ready, and may be obtained from all music-sellers and newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the Song Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free. If your newsagent or music-seller has no copies he can get one for you if he likes. Already hundreds of orders have been received, and these will, of course, be dealt with in rotation.

Full particulars of the scheme will be found each week in Pearson's Weekly, and fresh developments appear in the Daily Express every day.

The following are the names and addresses of the winners of Ten-Pound Notes up to the time of going to press:

H. E. BAKER, 4 Beaconsfield Road, Magdalen Road, Norwich; JOHN LOTAN, 23 St. Anne's Chambers, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.; CHARLES LEE, 1 Agnes Terrace, St. Mary's Avenue, Southend; CHARLES WRIGHT, 30 Oxford Gardens, North Kensington; ROBERT GAUTIER, 132 Clarence Road, Wimbledon; W. W. TONKIN, 5 Grove Road, Brixton, S.W.; E. G. BALDOCK, 68 Portland Street, Lincoln; ARTHUR WELLINGS, 12 The Foregate, Worcester; A. BOWMAN, 413 City Road, London, E.C.; JOHN ROE, Hatfield Road Board School, St. Albans; R. J. MARTIN, 4 Albert Road, Morice Town, Devonport; Mr. W. H. HOLE, Stationmaster, Teignmouth; ARCHIBALD BROWN, Market Place, Carluke; J. D. SOUTHALL, 38 Rosebery Gardens, Crouch End; W. COTTON, Coxbridge, West Pennard, Glastonbury; W. H. WAYNE, 19 Hurstfinch Road, St. Helens; MAY GRAMMER, 15 Elgin Avenue, Maida Vale; ALBERT J. PAGE, Sawbridgeworth, Herts; Mrs. F. PEZARO, 86 High Street, Kingsland, N.; JAMES I. W. ASH, 34 Cricketfield Road, Hackney Downs; Mrs. S. FITZPATRICK, 13 Killarney Parade, Dublin; MISS WINIFRED ELDRIDGE, 337 Seaside, Eastbourne; CHARLES W. WARD, 30 Milton Street, Maidstone; ALBERT HOUSE, 8 Lansdowne Terrace, Holloway Street, Exeter; GEORGE TYLER, 35 Cattle Market, Loughborough; MISS ANNIE HAMILTON, 12 Blythswood Drive, Glasgow; MRS. REDGRAVE, 14 Burnley Road, Stockwell; MISS KATHLEEN ORMSBY, Tower House, Greenway Road, Runcorn; MR. JOHN NEARY O'HARA, Grand Metropole Hotel, Belfast.

The original Sealed Envelopes by which claims have been made can be seen at the following places:

Mr. John Lotan's, Ludgate Hill Station; Mr. H. E. Baker's, offices of Eastern Daily Press, Norwich; Inspector Lee's, Cooper Brothers, Cliff Town Road, Southend; Mr. C. Wright's, Crown Hotel, Southampton; Mr. W. W. Tonkin's, Lang Sims, 437 Brixton Road, London, S.W.; Mr. E. G. Baldock's, Clifford Thomas, 202 High Street, Lincoln; Mr. Arthur Wellings', Mr. W. Spalding, 2 Lowermore, Worcester; Mr. A. Bowman's, 413 City Road, E.C.; Mr. John Roe's, Mr. W. H. Richardson, 5 High Street, St. Albans; Miss May Grammer's, Mr. Burge, chemist, 123 Shirland Road, Paddington; Mr. Southall's, Seagrief and Sons, Broadway, Crouch End; Mr. Brown's, John Young bookseller, High Street, Carluke; Mrs. Pezaro's, 86 High Street, Kingsland; Mr. Page's, Truswell and Sons, Sawbridgeworth; Mr. Ash's, "Three Sisters," Queen's Down Road, Hackney Downs; Mrs. Fitzpatrick's, 81 Lower Dorset Street, Dublin; Miss Eldridge, 337 Seaside, Eastbourne; Mr. Ward's, Walter Ruck, stationer, High Street, Maidstone.

Digitized by Google

A French Diamond Robbery.

A TRUE STORY.

It was in the palmiest days of the ill-fated Second Empire. The triumphs of the Crimea were not yet forgotten; the laurels won at Magenta were still verdant and fresh, Sedan, with all its bitter humiliation and disastrous train of tragic consequences, loomed in the misty future, undreamt of amidst the almost fabulous luxury and incredible frivolity which paved the way for the final terrible fiasco.

It was an evening in mid-winter. The Parisian season was at its height, and a brilliant audience had assembled at the Theatre Français to witness the performance of Jules Sandeau's delightful play, Mademoiselle de la Seiglière, in which the rôle of Destournelles was filled by the great Regnier, and that of Hélène by Madeleine Brohan, then in the zenith of her fame, radiant with youth, beauty, and those fascinations, the outcome of innate talent and refinement which rendered this gifted lady one of the most charming and perfect actresses of modern days.

The Empress was present, graceful and beautiful: the Emperor at her side wrapped in his favourite air of gloomy abstraction, which, like Lord Burleigh's celebrated nod, was supposed to mean so much, yet which, viewed by the impartial light of subsequent veracious history, seems to have signified so little. Several officers in glittering uniforms were in attendance, sparkling with decorations showered upon them by a grateful sovereign; and, among these gallant warriors, conspicuous by reason of the sombreness of his attire, was a solitary, humble, black-coated civilian, in ordinary evening dress, with the inevitable speck of red at his button-hole.

In a box almost immediately opposite that occupied by their imperial majesties, was a young and exceedingly handsome Russian lady, the Countess Ivanhoff, concerning whose manifold graces and fascinations the great world of Paris elected to interest itself considerably at this period.

The beauty and the wit of this fair northern enchantress were the theme of every masculine tongue, and her magnificent diamonds the envy and admiration of all feminine beholders.

The Countess was accompanied by her husband, a fine man of distinguished prepossessing appearance, who looked an embodied refutation of the celebrated Napoleonic aphorism, as though no amount of "scratching" could ever unearth the Cossack element underneath his refined, polished exterior.

The curtain fell after the first act. The Emperor and Empress withdrew during the entr'acte. Many humbler mortals followed their example; among them Count Ivanhoff, apparently in nowise disturbed by the fact that the golden youth in the stalls were bringing a small battery of opera glasses to bear upon the dazzling charms of his beautiful wife, with a brazen persistence which we chivalrous Britishers like to flatter ourselves is the monopoly of foreigners.

The Countess leant back in her luxurious fauteuil, fanning herself dreamily, serenely indifferent to the interest she was exciting. In the dim light of the curtain-shaded box, the glitter of her splendid diamonds seemed to form a sort of luminous halo round her graceful head: a myriad of starry brilliants gleamed among the masses of her gold-brown hair; and two priceless stones, popularly reported to be worth that unknown quantity, a king's ransom, flashed and twinkled like twin planets in her little shell-tinted ears.

The Count had not been gone five minutes, when there was a gentle knock at the door; and, in answer to the Countess's "Entrez," the attendant appeared, and said deferentially:

"Pardon, Madame la Comtesse; a gentleman charged with a message from her Majesty the Empress waits in the corridor, and desires to know if madame will have the goodness to receive him."

"Certainly! Enter, I beg of you, monsieur," replied the Countess, in the low suave voice, which was not the least of her many attractions, bowing graciously as she recognised the distinguished-looking civilian she had already noticed in close proximity to the Emperor in the imperial box.

The visitor advanced a few steps, and, still standing in deep shadow, said with grave dignity:

"I trust my intrusion may be pardoned. I am desired by her Majesty to ask a favour of Madame la Comtesse, and, at the same time, to beg that she will have the goodness to excuse a somewhat unusual request."

"The obligation will be mine if I can fulfil even the least of her Majesty's wishes," answered the Countess gracefully.

"The case is this," explained the gentleman in a tone of well-oiled ease. "An argument has arisen concerning the size of the diamonds in your earrings and those of the Countess W. The Empress begs that you will intrust one of your pendants to her care for a few moments, as the only satisfactory method of disposing of the vexed question. I will myself return it the instant her Majesty gives it back into my keeping."

"With the greatest pleasure," agreed the Countess, with amiable alacrity, detaching the precious jewel forthwith, and depositing it, without misgiving, in the outstretched palm of the imperial messenger; for, indeed, diamonds were almost as plentiful in the existence of this fortunate lady as in the pages of Lothair, and she attached no more importance to them than did the jewel-laden heroines of our late great and lamented Premier.

The Countess bestowed a smile and a gracious bow of dismissal upon her Majesty's distinguished ambassador who responded by a profoundly respectful inclination as he made his exit.

Once safely outside the box, the aristocratic features of this high-bred imperial emissary suddenly lost their serene expression of dignified gravity, and relaxed into a triumphant Mephistophelean grin.

Shortly afterwards Count Ivanoff returned.

"I have been talking to Danvers," he remarked, as he seated himself. "Clever fellow, D——. I am not surprised at the Emperor's partiality for him; he must find him so useful when he is in want of an idea."

"Who is Danvers?" inquired the Countess, with languid interest.

"That is rather a difficult question," replied the Count, smiling; "there are several editions of his biography—all different, probably none of them true.

Digitized by Google

He is successful, which is the chief point; moreover, he is entertaining, and, at any rate, looks and speaks like a gentleman, which in these evil days is something—even much. Look, he has just entered the Emperor's box—the man in the black coat."

"Is that Monsieur Danvers?" exclaimed the Countess, waking up to a mild interest in the subject; "if so, he has been here while you were away. He came on the part of the Empress, and carried off one of my earrings, which her Majesty wished to compare with one of the Comtess Wahn's."

"Danvers! Impossible! I was talking to him the whole time I was absent, and he only left me at the top of the staircase two seconds before I returned."

"Nevertheless, mon ami, he has been here, and has taken my earring. See! it is gone."

"Effectively," agreed the Count, with a grim smile; "but Danvers has not taken it. It is to the last degree unlikely that the Empress would make such a request. Depend upon it you have been the victim of a thief, got up as an accurate copy of the distinguished-looking Danvers."

"Impossible!" cried the Countess in her turn. "The affair is absolutely as I tell you. It was Monsieur Danvers the veritable Monsieur Danvers I see opposite, who came into this box and took away my diamond. Only wait a little, and he will bring it back intact."

"To wait a little is to lessen the chance of its recovery. In any case, I will go and inquire of Danvers, if I can get at him, whether he has been seized with a sudden attack of kleptomania; because the idea of the Empress having sent him roaming about the theatre, borrowing a lady's jewels, I regard as preposterous. Ah, these Parisian sharpers! You do not know what scientific geniuses they are in their way."

With this the Count departed, and the second act was nearly at an end before he returned.

In the meantime, the Countess perceived that she was an object of interest to the occupants of the imperial box, and notably to the "double" of her late aristocratic-looking visitor who, she could still solemnly declare, had stood before her in the flesh.

"I was right," whispered the Count, re-entering and bending over his wife's chair; "Danvers knows nothing of your earring, and, needless to say, the Empress never sent him or anyone else upon such an errand. I have put the matter into the hands of the police, and they will do all that is possible to recover it."

"Really! How very droll!" remarked the Countess with calm nonchalance—for she belonged to that order of impassive statuesque women, who remains mistress of themselves through any quantity of "china fall;" "I will take out the other earring, or people may fancy I am trying to set the fashion of wearing an odd one," and she handed the fellow to the purloined jewel to her husband.

The play came to an end, as even that most excellent feast of reason, a good French play, well acted, must do, sooner or later, in common with all things mundane.

The Countess was duly commiserated by sympathising friends, who one and all declared, behind her back, that they would never have been guilty of the imbecility of trusting so valuable a possession to the tender mercies of however fascinating a stranger; but nothing more was heard of the stolen jewel until the following day at noon, when Count Ivanoff received a note from Danvers to the effect that, as he could not help considering himself partly responsible for the loss of the diamond which had disappeared through the agency of his counterpart he had taken an early opportunity of interviewing the Chief of the Police, who assured him he had good reason to believe the thief had already been traced as far as Brussels.

Early in the afternoon the Countess was about to start for her daily drive in the Bois. The frozen snow lay deep upon the ground, and her sledge, with its two jet-black Russian horses jingling their bells merrily in the frosty air, stood waiting in the courtyard while the Countess donned her furs.

A servant entering announced that an officer of police in plain clothes asked permission to speak with Madame la Comtesse concerning the lost diamond.

"But certainly," agreed madame graciously; "let the officer be shown into the boudoir."

Into the boudoir presently came the Countess, stately, beautiful, fur-clad, buttoning her little gloves. Near the door stood a short wiry-looking man, with keen black eyes, closely-cropped hair, and compact, erect, military figure. The small man clicked his heels together and bowed profoundly in the presence of so much high-born loveliness, while he said with the utmost respect, at the same time laying a letter upon the table:

"I am sent by order of the Chef de Police to inform Madame la Comtesse that the stolen diamond has been satisfactorily traced, but there is unfortunately some little difficulty connected with its identification. I am charged, therefore, to beg that Madame la Comtesse will have the goodness to intrust the fellow earring to the police for a short period, in order that it may be compared with the one found in the possession of the suspected thief. Madame will find that the letter I bring corroborates my statement."

The Countess glanced hastily through the letter, and ringing the bell desired that her maid might be told to bring the remaining earring immediately; this was done, and the dapper little man, bowing deferentially, departed with the precious duplicate safely in his possession.

The Countess descended to her sledge and drove to the club, to call for her husband en route for the Bois. Crossing the Place de la Concorde, she related to him the latest incident in the story of the diamond earring.

"You never were induced to give up the other!" cried Count Ivanoff incredulously.

"But I tell you, mon ami, an officer of police came himself to fetch it, bringing a letter from his superior vouching for the truth of his statement."

"If the Prefect himself had come, I don't think I should have been cajoled into letting him have it after last night's experience," laughed her husband. "However, for the second time of asking, we will go and inquire."

The coachman turned and drove as directed to the Bureau of Police, at which the Count had lodged his complaint the night before. After a somewhat protracted delay the Count rejoined his wife with a semi-grim look of amusement upon his handsome hirsute face.

"The police know nothing of your detective or his epistolary efforts," he said, drawing the fur rug up to his chin as the impatient horses sped away merrily over the frozen snow; "it was the wrong man they had got hold of at Brussels. Your second earring has been netted by another member of the light-fingered fraternity, and upon my honour I think he was the more accomplished artist of the two!"

And from that unlucky day to this the Countess Ivanoff's celebrated diamond earrings knew her pretty ears no more.

Alaric Carr.

Digitized by Google

THE FAMOUS
GEM AIR RIFLE.
13/6

Kills at a longer range than any other air rifle. Most accurate sight. Shoots darts, shot, and slugs. Ammunition and targets free.

H. & S. Co., 73 FARRINGDON STREET, E.C.

INCREASE YOUR STRENGTH
ONE HALF by using our
GRIP EXERCISERS.
Five minutes' practice twice a day will wonderfully develop strength and size of hand, wrist, forearm, and upper arm. Invaluable to athletes, clerks, mechanics and professional men. Everyone improved in health and strength by using them. With life photo, chart of exercises, prices 2/3 and 4/3 per pair, 3d. postage.
H. & S. Co., 73 Farringdon St. E.C.

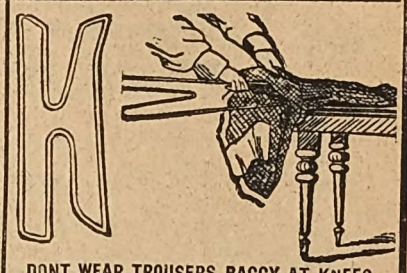
WRIST AND WIDE GRIP DUMB-BELLS.
Combines advantages of Dumb-bells and Grip Exercisers and you grip wood, not nerve-annoying cold metal. Beautifully polished, enamelled, and nickelled. Price 6/6 pair, with Life Photo Chart.
H. & S. Co., 73 FARRINGDON STREET, E.C.

A BEAUTIFUL SKIN
There's nothing better than our MASSAGE ROLLER for making a clear and firm skin. Also tones up the nerves and appetite better than any tonic, cures and prevents nervous depression, dyspepsia, cramp, rheumatics, and neuralgia, by stimulating natural circulation. With 128 page illustrated Instruction Book, prices 6/6, 8/6, and 10/6 (on approval).
H. & S. Co. 73 Farringdon St., E.C.

TRAIN YOUR MOUSTACHE.
Wear this at night, you can train your moustache to any desired style. THE EMPEROR MOUSTACHE FRAMES, invented by the German Emperial Barber, and used by German Emperor, post free with instructions for 2/6. — LONDO NOVELTY CO. 1 Abbot's Road, Upton Park, E.

THE MAGIC FORTUNE TELLER.

Answers Questions and Reveals the Secrets of the Future. Causes great Fun. Interesting to young and old.
LONDON NOVELTY CO., 1 Abbot's Road, Upton Park, E.



DONT WEAR TROUSERS BAGGY AT KNEES.
Use of our Stretchers makes trousers always fit and look like new. Price 2/- pair; postage 6d. extra.
London Novelty Co., 1 Abbot's Road, Upton Park, E.

A SCIENTIFIC WONDER.

PRICE 1/-. Post free.
With this scientific instrument you can see bones whilst moving as well as still.
LONDON NOVELTY Co., 1 Abbot's Road, Upton Park, E.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:
Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,
63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Neuralgia Positively Cured!
Free Test Offered.
The annexed cut presents in the prominent white lines the nerves most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. Sufferers will know only too well the pain tracks, and will be glad to know of a Simple and Sure Remedy. The proprietors will send Free two sample Zox Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped envelope to ZOX CO., 11 HATTON GARDEN, LONDON E.C.

Don't Cough-use
They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.
The Unrivalled
One Lozenge alone relieves.
Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.
Keating's Lozenges

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HAIR DESTROYED.
Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NOSE
MACHINES. LEES RAY S. S. Dept., South Castle St. Liverpool, is a specialist on Ugly and Red Noses. Send stamp for particulars of his patent scientific Nose Improvers. Red Nose Cure, medically approved, 3/9. Outstanding Ear Machines 11/6.

DRUNKENNESS
CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street London, W.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.
THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.
Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.
SOLE AGENT:
GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.
Price 2/9 post free.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS
A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.
Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.
THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

DRUNKENNESS
CURED. On receipt of stamped envelope a lady will gladly send free particulars of a simple remedy, which cured her husband (without his knowledge) of the craving for alcohol, to which he had been for many years a victim. Address, in confidence, MRS. TERRY, 46 Sternhold Avenue, Streatham Hill.

FREE FREE
Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain),
or
A Real Gold Ring
Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.
SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.
We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).
We do not want your money.
Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.
When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.
A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.
You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.
Send no money. Write to-day.
BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5),
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

Digitized by Google

Transposed Letter Competition.

First Prize	£5.
Second Prize	£2.
Third Prize	£1.

LIST No. 1.

ART; CEL; OMW; GIN; BUS.

Here are five sets of letters, and prizes will be awarded to the competitors who send in the longest words containing the letters in each of their combinations.

For example, the following words contain the letters IST in their different combinations: fIST, ITSelf, SIT, STIpend, ouTSIde, adverTISe.

CONDITIONS.

1. Write your attempts on one side of the paper only, and keep until three other lists have appeared.

2. All words must appear in Nuttall's Standard Dictionary.

3. The letters of the combinations must either be underlined or put in capitals in the words in which they occur.

4. In the event of a tie, the prize will be divided.

5. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must enter on that understanding.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 223 to 228.

The prize of £2 has been awarded to Mr. R. Wigley, of The Ferns, Olton, Warwickshire, whose solution was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "Pharaoh's Broker," by Ellsworth Douglas, has been sent to each of the following:

C. Smith, Red House, Westleton, Saxmundham.
P. E. Tavender, 182 Bruntsfield Place, Edinburgh.
Miss. J. Whitaker, Savile House, Worsborough Bridge, Barnsley.
A. Ruddle, 118 Greenwich Road, Greenwich.
Miss H. Warner, "Australind," Crawley, Sussex.
Miss Inglis, Brockhurst, Oaklands Road, Bedford.
F. G. Homer, Richmond Villa, Anderton Park Road, Moseley, near Birmingham.
Miss K. Cooke, 21 Hamilton Road, Ealing, W.
E. Goodall, 61 Beaconsfield Street, Liverpool.
E. McIntyre, 68 Crofton Road, Camberwell, S.E.

SOLUTION OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 229 to 234.

No. 229.
P A I R
A C R E
I R O N
R E N T

No. 230. PRINCES—PRINCESS.

No. 231. "As the twig bends, so the tree inclines."

No. 232.
B luf F
U ppe R
L ith E
L ine N
E nteri C
R as H

No. 233. L—EVE—L LEVEL.

No. 234. Lap; lap-dog; lap-wing; Lap-land.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,, ...	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,, ...	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate. Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Oct. 30th, if intended for the issue on sale Nov. 13th, and dated November 17th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

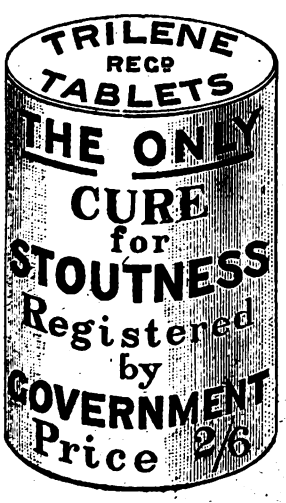
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 6lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 4lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 11st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 15st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 6lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1897 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 39 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 6lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATTERT, of Woodberry, Talgarth Road, writes: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2 st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"NO BETTER FOOD."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 Gold Medals, &c.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt tops.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

RESULT OF FIRST £100 A WEEK FOOTBALL COMPETITION.

SHORT STORIES
A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 618. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 3RD, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

A STOKER AND

DR TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

"I FIND IT DOES ME GOOD."

MR. H. HART, 7 Upper Green Street, Friar Street, Blackfriars, S.E., writes :—

"I am a stoker at a glass-blower's, and I am in intense heat all day. I take a tin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa with me at intervals, and I find it does me good. I sometimes feel a dizziness come over me through the sulphur in the burning of the coke. I make my usual pint of Vi-Cocoa, and after drinking same I feel much relieved. I have been using your Vi-Cocoa for over three months, and now I do not think I could go to work all day without it. You may use this letter as you please."

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE

ON MENTIONING "SHORT STORIES."

Address : Dr. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA, Ltd., 60 BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to

KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD,

and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

JOHN NOBLE.

COSTUMES AND MANTLES.

Sent without delay by Parcel Post safely packed.

GUARANTEED TO GIVE SATISFACTION.

PATTERNS POST FREE

of Costume Coating and Cheviot Serge, the good durable cloths in which this Costume is made.

Colours: Black, Navy, Myrtle, Fawn, Royal Blue, and Grey.

Sizes in Stock of Ladies' Costumes are: 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms); Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other size made to measure, 1/6 extra.

☞ MODEL 256.—Well-cut Bodice, velvet revers, trimmed black and white. Full Tailor Skirt. Price 10/6 complete Costume; 10/6 carriage 6d. or the Skirt alone, 5/6. Carriage, 5d.

SPECIAL VALUE.

Smart Sac Jacket. ☞

MODEL 274.

Well-cut comfortable garment, in good Black or Fawn Beaver, Velvet Collar. Price only 8/6; carriage 6d. Please send bust (under arms) measurement when ordering. 8/6

Please name Short Stories when writing to

JOHN NOBLE Ltd.,

Dept. No. 46 BROOK STREET MILLS,

MANCHESTER.

TO THE QUEEN PURVEYORS

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA. GRAVY. JULIENNE. MULLIGATAWNY. TOMATO. HOUSEHOLD, CRESSY, &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NOSE

MACHINES. LEES RAY, S.S. Dept., South Castle St, Liverpool, is a specialist on Ugly and Red Noses. Send stamp for particulars of his patent scientific Nose Improvers. Red Nose Cure, medically approved, 3/9. Outstanding Ear Machines 11/6.

TOO STOUT

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER.

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 98 Union St., Glasgow: 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 618.] For the Week Ending November 3rd, 1900. [One Penny.

THE LITTLE HARLEQUIN.

A few evenings ago I was sitting in my room, together with a few friends. We had been reading aloud a drama written by one of us, and were amusing ourselves with a discussion as to what constituted the most tragic circumstances that can possibly arise in life, that would be a fitting setting for a hero of a drama. My friend B., an unusually keen observer, who waited, as was his wont in a discussion, until everyone else had had his say, to put the question in a new light, by the aid of a few words, at last remarked, that in dwelling upon the complicated and tragic conflicts of the mind, we had forgotten the most simple and tragic ones of all.

The most tragic human being is the one who, in spite of unusual mental attainments, is brought low by the consciousness of great physical ugliness. Then, when we all protested against this "idealising of a most inferior sort of tragedy," based upon bodily peculiarities, he said he was sure we had again misunderstood him, and so he told us the following little Italian story, for the truth of which he vouched:

"In a tiny tower in the vicinity of Modena once lived a curious young man. The inhabitants at first avoided him but later grew to look upon him as a sort of official clown, whose duty it was to make them laugh. No one in the town knew exactly who or what he was. His real name was unpronounceable. He had appeared suddenly on the scene, had rented two rooms and lived quietly in retirement.

"The old woman with whom he lodged said that he had a quantity of books, and that he spent the entire day reading or writing. She had a funny story about him, too, that she was fond of telling. When he first came to her and saw the large mirror in his bedroom, he fell into a sudden rage, and, seizing the wash-basin, hurled it at the mirror so that it broke and the pieces fell all about the room. But what did that matter? Of course, he had paid her for both mirrror and basin (by which she had incidentally made a good bargain), and had only stipulated that there must never be a mirror in his room again.

"Every time this story was told in the town, someone, particularly among the young girls, began to giggle. It was so plain why he could not stand a mirror—he was so terribly ugly! His figure was very small and lank, but he had a huge hump on his back which seemed to contract his chest by its weight and to make an upright position in walking impossible, as it was incredible that the long, thin legs, that the children declared clattered at every step, as if they were wooden, could carry such a body. His arms were almost as bad as his legs, reaching nearly to his knees, which gave his whole body an ape-like appearance. There was no trace of a neck to be found. His gigantic head sat directly between his shoulders. This was perhaps the most peculiar feature of all. It was very large at the top and very small at the bottom, so that it looked as if a wedge had been driven down between the shoulders.

"This likeness was probably increased by the fact that the face was drawn to one side and distorted by pain. To be sure, the large, thin, hooked nose was directly in the middle, but that only made the whole worse, for it divided the face into two entirely different halves. The mouth was much too far to the left, and the forehead slanted upwards from left to right, which was made all the more conspicuous by reason of its being particularly high and arched. Naturally a bristly confusion of ragged hair and a preposterous number of unusually deep wrinkles did not tend to make the face more attractive. The large, dark eyes might have done so; but they were really the most uncanny part of the man. Sometimes very sad, sometimes very fierce, and often there emanated from them such unrestrained glances, that had they come from another body, would have made every girl's heart beat; but with his appearance that was, of course, impossible. For let him do what he would, walk, sit, stand, recline, speak, keep silence, be sad, angry, resigned or full of enthusiasm, it was impossible to help laughing at him. When he walked he looked like an inverted pendulum. When he stood still, with his arms hanging limp at his side, as was generally the case, he looked, seen from a distance, like a colossal cropper pigeon, it being impossible to distinguish his breast any way off.

"And one can easily understand that the emotions of his soul, which mirrored themselves so closely and sensibly on his countenance, produced the most ridiculous impression of all, for in such an uneven mirror the most glorious thing must appear frightfully distorted, as everyone knows who has ever looked in a convex or concave glass, and laughed himself half to death at the disgusting contortion of his own body, or still more at those of his acquaintances.

"I should like to know, however, if you would still laugh if one of these same contortions should stick to you? At all events, the inhabitants of the little town in which our story is laid did laugh. Although he had been there two months, no one but his landlady had ever heard him speak; and she said that he had such a wonderfully beautiful, soft voice that people who listened to him could scarcely help crying, and were forced to keep their eyes closed. They would have liked to know what sort of a man he really was, especially the young people, and so they tried in every way to get information in regard to him. Soon they succeeded.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Seizing the wash-basin he hurled it at the mirror.

"One afternoon, when he was walking through the street, carrying a small package to the post-office, a piece of paper with writing on it, stuck out of his coat pocket. A small boy, noted for his boldness, succeeded in stealing the paper from the pocket, and handed it over to his elder brothers and sisters. The elders were charmed at the chance to satisfy their curiosity, for the paper was written all over, and without doubt by himself.

"At the top was the date, September 15, just a week before. Then it continued:

"'Is it fate that makes man always regard that which is for ever closed to him as the most desirable of all things? That he must always love and admire most that which he lacks altogether? Or am I in this also an exception, as I am bodily?

"'Oh, when will there be an end to this terrible flight from the world and my own ugliness? When shall I learn to be content with the treasures which I have, and to forget my own miserable unimportant limitations? Am I the only one who has no mercy on himself? All other people forget their afflictions and are proud of their good points, and I do the opposite. Why then? Why?

"'And has my flight been of any good? Oh, these horrible two years of flight from one neighbourhood to another! And during them always again and again the awaking to this horrible reality of the body that drives me back into my misery—the misery of a man who throws his treasures to the winds and tries to conquer by means of his defects. Is there then not enough irony in the world?

"'Asceticism, asceticism! Death of things of the body—a wonderful principle! I only know that asceticism and the breeding of unrestrained ideas are one and the same. And why can I not love something more than a mere spiritual love? Oh, but I can; but not be loved in return. Can the "beautiful great soul" which I possess, take the place of the glorious body that I desire? How would a sketch do of Thersites as Don Juan, an attempt at a self-vivisection, by a person made insane by bodily defects?

"'I believe one is finally too cowardly to take leave of life, because he would still like to enjoy that which is impossible. For example, I have in mind a man who will never die of hunger, because he would first like to write another Faust. It is the same story with me. I cannot be beautiful, and would yet celebrate the triumph of the body—for what else is love? And I cannot die until then.'

"The good people could not understand much of this diary; but one thing they were able to read in it—he was in love! That was killingly ridiculous. Now they knew it, and everyone whispered to everyone else: 'He is in love.' A band of rude schoolchildren called after him down the street: 'There he goes; he is in love!' at which he fell into such a rage that everyone who saw him screamed with laughter.

"For three weeks the Teatro Classico had been in town, and had had great success. To be sure the performances were not very classic, and people were surprised that 'he' went every evening, being himself so much funnier than the plays. He never laughed in the theatre, not even when the rest of the audience were convulsed with amusement.

"The Harlequin was so comical, enormously tall and thin, who impressed people mostly (though, of course, without intending it) by his never knowing what to do with his arms and legs. If he were walking on the level he tripped over his own feet; if he went up the stairs, he slipped on his hands. The only fat thing about the entire man was his red nose (he was a great drinker), and the only thing connected with him on which you might waste pity was his audience. The whole town was soon saying that Harlequin's acting was perfectly tasteless, repeating the words of Maestro Poccini, who now played the dance music, but who had once been in the orchestra of the Milan Opera for a month.

"The female portion of the town had a regular hatred for the little leading lady of the theatre, who was a sweet little creature, called Lala, sixteen years old, small and dainty, with charming little feet, a slender throat, large childish eyes, full of wonder, and black hair. As she laughed often, for every one exerted himself to be witty before her, her delicious, little, shining, sharp teeth were also visible. She was always in a good humour; it was only seldom that she sat still, with her hands in her lap, dreaming of sad things, perhaps of her parents' early deaths and her loneliness among strangers, which even her gay profession was not quite able to drive away.

"Lala was so attractive that she soon had the entrée to many of the houses in the town, particularly after people had learnt from the director of her sad lot, and knew that she was a thoroughly good girl in spite of many temptations. The conversation often turned upon him. No one knew his name, and she laughed with the others at the ridiculous creature who appeared at the theatre every evening, who never applauded, and who wrote whole nights through.

"Lala knew this, for living on the opposite side of the street she could see into his room when she went to bed at night, thanks to a beautiful lamp, which had no equal in the town, a lamp with a woman for a pedestal. She had seen it plainly, and this lamp often burned all night through, for she often saw it when she awoke. But he was terribly comical. She could never help laughing when she saw him. He should have been Harlequin—the other smelt so of brandy.

Digitized by Google

"Aye, that would have been just the thing. He should have been the Harlequin, and then the theatre would have been twice as popular. Such a curious man he was! He often wrote all night long! And the pedestal of his lamp was a girl. He was in love, too. What interesting things do happen! It is after all worth while living.

"'He' was scarcely ever to be seen now, except in the theatre, leaving the house only after dark. Something in him seemed to have changed. He walked so much more slowly and haltingly than before, as if he were tired or continually thinking of something that gave him no rest.

"The audience at the theatre paid almost as much attention to him as to the actors on the stage, and they noticed that he turned first red and then white, and that he breathed heavily and trembled when Lala was playing; and his eyes rested on her with such an appealing and glowing expression that all who saw him had trouble to smother their laughter. How amusing the theatre was!

"One fine day the tall Harlequin, reeking still of brandy, was found dead in his bed. The doctor said that he had died of heart failure. He was no great loss to the company, but the director was obliged to engage another Harlequin and the theatre was closed for three days out of respect to the dead.

"On the afternoon after the old Harlequin's death, another event of great interest took place in the town. 'He' went crazy! At least so his landlady declared. She said he had behaved most curiously of late. He often wept aloud, and stamped his feet; again he swore and threw heavy books about the room. He had not been to bed for three days in succession, but had spent the entire night writing, and then early in the morning he had sent a small package to the post, which she believed contained paper. She had been quite worried about him once.

"For two days and nights he had written continuously, covering a great mass of paper, then had tossed about on his bed for a few hours sobbing, and at last, laughing horribly, he had burned a whole pile of the paper on which he had written.

"Things must have come to a pretty pass with him. He had ordered a long mirror in which he could see himself at full length, and he had laughed and sprung about, talked and sung the greatest nonsense, and gesticulated in such a manner that seemed a physical impossibility to such a body.

"She had been terribly frightened, but it had been so funny after all that she could not help watching him, and he had asked her if she were pleased with it all.

"But curious things do happen. The director of the theatre announced that he would give no more performances, but would move to another town.

"He told no one his reasons for doing this, not even Lala. He only said to her that it was on account of the new Harlequin, who was the most wonderful Harlequin possible and that she would be able to play with him better even than before.

"So the entire troupe moved to another town, but it seemed strange to Lala that the new Harlequin had not yet put in his appearance.

"At the same time he had paid the rent for his rooms six months in advance, and leaving all his things behind him, he went away.

"The last and principal number on the programme was a love scene between Lala and Harlequin; but neither Lala nor any other member of the troupe had seen the new Harlequin, and Lala did not even know what she was to say in this new rôle. The director grinned as he remarked that this was not at all necessary, that it would go off all the better.

"The last number came. Lala, with a slight tinge of embarrassment, very becoming to her, stepped on to the stage and looked anxiously about her. The new Harlequin rushed at her from the opposite wing of the stage, and threw himself at her feet. It was 'he.' She screamed aloud from astonishment and fear, and trembled all over. The audience burst into applause.

"And now an improvised love scene unfolded itself on the stage, that convulsed the audience with laughter. After Lala had recovered from her terror her natural cleverness aided her to play her part of the beauty who refused so terrible a lover. He, too, made it easy for her. How wonderfully she was playing! She was delighted with herself, and, for the first time in her life, was greatly interested in her own acting, and felt really inspired.

"He acted and spoke so naturally that her words and gestures came of themselves. It was glorious! How he wept and implored and laughed and swore! All would have been so touching in a tragedy, and yet with what art he turned every emotion, no matter how fervent or grave it might be, into something comic, so that each moment the crowded house fell into a fresh paroxysm of laughter.

"The play was over. He had been rejected, and had hurried away in desperation to hang himself. The applause was tremendous.

"Sweets, flowers, parasols, bouquets, gold pieces, and wreaths fell in a heap on the stage. Lala and Harle-

A band of rude school-children called after him down the street.

Digitized by Google

The new Harlequin threw himself at her feet.

quin had to bow again and again until the director excused them on the plea of fatigue.

"It was easy to see that both were pretty well exhausted, but what else could be expected after such fatiguing acting? They were both so tired that they did not attend the unusually liberal supper which the director gave in their honour that evening. He could easily afford to do so, since the theatre was already sold out for a fortnight ahead.

"Lala and Harlequin still sat in the green-room, each on a box. He seemed greatly excited and trembled, and kept looking before him with an indescribable expression, half-sad, half-glad, which, however, on account of the metamorphosis which every emotion of his face was subject to, would have caused great merriment to any one who might have seen it.

"But Lala saw nothing. She held her handkerchief before her face, and sobbed and wept bitterly for a long while. At last he rose and stroked her hair, saying in a wonderfully soft voice, and in a quivering, low tone:

"'Lala, my poor child, go to bed, won't you? or you'll be ill. You are so worked up.'

"Then he walked slowly to his room, which was quite near. Curious must have been the thoughts that filled his brain, for he did not hear the applause of the audience that stood in the street waiting to see him go home with the expectation of another amusing performance. The manner with which he crossed the street, the fanciful, earnest expression and the tired movements were wonderfully done, and the applause followed him as far as his house.

"He sat at the window, weeping long and softly. Above in the heavens the moon and countless stars were shining, and he felt within himself the same horrible loneliness which separates one star from another. Between him and the other star, for which he longed, there was a frightful icy space that nothing could bridge over.

"He wept, and below in the street the gallery gods shouted up to him, the king of all merrymakers. It was some time before they became quiet. Then he rose, lit the lamp and took a locked book out of a drawer and wrote in it with a firm hand:

"'November 17th. To-day I have thrown my soul to the rabble that it might devour it, and in its death-struggle it awoke another soul. How long will Lala have a soul?'

"This was another leaf from his diary that the citizens of the town would not have understood, but as Lala's name occurred in it, they might have inferred from that that he was in love with her.

"And Lala? She could not tell what had happened to her. She wept half the night through, and prayed that she might be endowed with this great talent and wonderful power that made her now so sad and so full of longing. And then again, when she pictured him to herself she shook with laughter, but curiously enough, her laughter was no longer the same as of old, and she was ashamed of it as soon as it was over. She slept very badly.

"The next morning she found about two dozen magnificent bouquets awaiting her when she awoke. They all came from gentlemen in the town who expressed their admiration for her on the visiting cards which accompanied the flowers. They gave her great pleasure, and she was happy all day, chatting with her fellow-actors and actresses, who were all jealous of her, but appeared exceedingly affectionate, and made jokes about Harlequin, who was nowhere to be seen; and naturally she laughed with the others, and told them everything she knew about him.

"Now began a delightful life for her. She received flowers and jewellery daily, and was invited to entertainments which she was delighted to attend in company with the director. Harlequin had refused every invitation from the first, and was never seen outside of the theatre.

"Lala often sat alone now in her room doing nothing. She did not like to go out alone, and she had no need to learn her rôles by heart or rehearse. Harlequin improvised everything, and so wonderfully that she was able to play just as well as if she had studied every word and gesture carefully.

"When she sat thus, her charming, wondering, childish eyes staring before her into vacancy, thinking how she would play this or that, as she was fond of doing, being inspired with the idea of sometime becoming a great actress, she would ask herself how it happened that every time after she had acted with Harlequin she felt so sad and yet so happy, though she might have been amusing herself all the day until then with silly jokes, and though these improvised pieces were really the most comic things one could imagine. But she did not find out what the cause of it all really was.

"Only one thing was clear. That Harlequin must have something to do with it, and that he himself was not nearly so ridiculous as he always appeared. At first she talked very little with him.

"He did not seem to care for it, and she, too, was better pleased when she could enjoy listening to his voice without looking at him, for he was so comical that the most earnest word which he might utter could not but seem funny. She had told him this once innocently and without embarrassment, and had begged his pardon in case she ever laughed when he had no intention of being ridiculous. She had said this to him without glancing at him, one evening after the play, when she had been talking gaily for quite a while with some fine gentlemen, and he had advised her to be careful of such people. Her words had made him very sad, and he had asked her in a low tone:

Digitized by Google

"'So to you, too, then, I am only a sort of amusement machine? And can you not realize either that I am a man with a heart and not merely a Harlequin? Is it true that you cannot stand a few hours with me any more than the others?'

"She marvelled at his words at first, scarcely understanding them. Then she glanced up at him. He was sitting in the dim lamplight, his legs in the shadow, his face too indistinctly visible, and it suddenly flashed across her mind that he looked like a large black egg standing on end, and this ridiculous idea was so overpowering that she laughed right in his face.

"He grew crimson, and began to sob with anger, and sprang up, his arms hanging loosely down by his side, and clinched his hands convulsively. After standing thus a while, a picture of desperate rage, such as might be exhibited by a murderer who was listening to his death sentence, he said softly, with choking voice:

"'And it was for you alone that I became a Harlequin.'

"Then he left, not waiting for an answer.

"All night long Lala tried to make up her mind whether she ought to be amused or ashamed.

"The following day she begged his pardon—with averted face—and after that she talked oftener with him. Her fellow actors and actresses, and more particularly the gentlemen who frequented the side scenes, began to make jokes about 'her good taste,' and to tease her about Harlequin, so that she was often on the point of crying with anger, and it grew worse day by day.

"She could not defend him; it would have been silly, and how could she help his being so ridiculous? And then all their jokes fitted him so perfectly! Why should she not make fun of him as the others did?

"She did so, and amused herself royally with her girl friends and some gentlemen who seemed greatly interested in her, and who gave her all sorts of costly things. It was only after she had played with 'him' that none could make her enjoy the rest of the evening.

"Indeed, Harlequin seemed to know all the details of her life, and to be always watching her. He now took for his subject in the theatre the jealousy and impotent rage of a deceived and rejected lover, and he was almost funnier in this than in his earlier scenes.

"She was standing one evening before the beginning of the performance, behind the wings with a gentleman who was endeavouring to persuade her, by all means in his power, to take supper with him that evening, promising her that she would be sure to enjoy it. She had certainly no intention of accepting, for it would not do for her to take supper alone with a man, so she said to him, with a saucy smile, which he naturally took for an acceptance: 'Perhaps.'

"Then for the first time she noticed that Harlequin was standing beside her and had overheard it all. But what did that matter? She did not explain. She only wondered why he looked so pale, as pale almost as a corpse, she thought, and a cold shudder ran down her back.

"That day, for the first time in her life, she really feared the scene, and yet there was no reason for doing so. To the audience it seemed as if they both played better than ever before. The deadly pallor of the deceived lover was simply grand, and the secret anxiety pictured on her face was truly beautiful, and the way she avoided looking at him was delicious.

"She could not stand this deathly paleness, could not look at him. If she had only explained matters to him! And now, whenever she was not looking directly at him, it seemed to her again and again, and more and more surely every second, that every word he uttered was thoroughly in earnest.

"'Must I then die on account of thee?' he said to her with touching softness.

"The audience applauded loudly, but Lala suddenly began to tremble, and uttering a terrible cry she sprang from the stage into the wings as if pursued.

"At midnight, after talking over an hour with Lala, Harlequin went to his room. All she had said was:

"'Now I am only the more afraid of you.'

"The lamp in his room burned all night long. His neighbour in the next room, the director, heard him sobbing for a long while, and then heard him say some words in a foreign tongue, slowly and with wonderful expression. Then everything was quiet.

"But the lamp still burned when the bright morning sun laughed in at the window. His diary lay open on the table in his room. The last words he had written in it were:

"'Now the soul to which I awakened is dead. I follow it.'

"By the side of it lay a thick, sealed letter to Lala, a package of papers and an empty bottle. On the bed lay Harlequin—dead! He no longer looked ridiculous. An exceedingly touching expression rested on the pale features of a martyr.

Lala threw herself on dear little Harlequin's body, sobbing piteously.

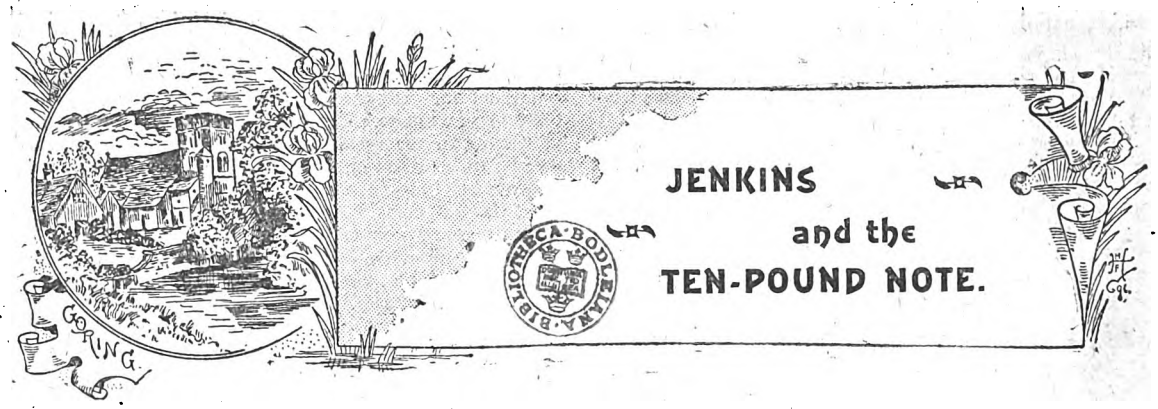
"When Lala was led to the bed she threw herself on dear little Harlequin's body, sobbing piteously, and murmured hopelessly:

"'And, after all, I did love him!'

"The package of papers was taken to the police, so that the cause of his death might be known, and Lala learnt that she had driven the greatest Italian poet of the present day to his death."

ALEXANDER MAR.

Digitized by Google



I WAS sitting quietly in my room after a hard day's work, smoking and glancing at an evening paper.

There was a roaring fire and the howl of the wind outside intensified the very soothing feeling of comfort and ease which was creeping over me.

Mrs. Gum had cleared away the tea things, fiddled a bit about the fire and then left me.

I was in fact just beginning to enjoy a nice quiet evening when I heard a rap at the door and in walked Jenkins.

I didn't move, I didn't welcome him and I sincerely hoped he would take no notice of me, but just settle himself down comfortably with a book and leave me in peace.

I hoped all this, but as he entered I could see that there was a wild look of excitement in his eye which I knew of old.

Jenkins, I told myself, had got hold of some project, some wild scheme or other, and my quiet evening would be trampled down, jumped upon, torn asunder. I could see it in his eye.

He approached me kind of stealthily. He then tapped me on the shoulder in a way which positively made me shudder, for it had the Scotland Yard touch about it.

Then after looking carefully round, he drew a copy of Pearson's Weekly from his pocket, and looking at me as if he would read my very inmost thoughts, said in a sepulchral voice, "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?"

I was fully alarmed at this. True, I owed Jenkins a trifle or so; but a ten-pound note, why a ten-pound note is quite another matter.

"It's all right, old chap," I said, thinking to soothe him. "It is all right; just you lie down on the sofa for five minutes or so and it will pass off." But Jenkins took no notice of my advice.

"Then you have not got the Ten-Pound Note?" he said, with a sigh which verily seemed to come from the bottom of his boots.

I quite thought now that Jenkins was either drunk or delirious.

"Oh, yes," I said, wishing to humour him. "Oh, yes, I've got it all right. But sit down, there's a good chap, and you'll be better presently."

"You've got it!" Jenkins shrieked. "You say you have really and truly got it!" he yelled.

"Poor Jenkins, it is worse with him than I thought," I said to myself.

But Jenkins had caught me by the collar of the coat, and waving a copy of Pearson's Weekly high in the air, he shouted:

"Then hand it over and let us make a night of it. You are just the best man I have met to-day."

I got up quietly from my chair, for Jenkins seemed quite far enough gone to need a straight waistcoat, and I was debating whether to make a bolt for the door or to ring the bell for Mrs. Gum.

So I patted him on the back, and said: "Don't mind me, old chap! Just you sit down. You will feel much better—ever so much better—if you will only sit down quietly for a few minutes."

The wild look in Jenkins' eye positively frightened me, and I edged for the door, thinking to run for it and summon a policeman before worse happened.

But Jenkins was too quick for me. He seemed to have the lunatic's instinct, and before I had got a yard from him he rushed to the door and put his back against it.

"No you don't!" he said with a glare that made my knees tremble. "I'll have it out of you before I've done with you," he continued. "You had best give it up, for it belongs to me, and I'm not going to stand any hanky-panky."

A cold perspiration began to break out upon my forehead. Poor Jenkins, I thought. Poor, old, quiet, sedate, easy-going Jenkins! What an end to our friendship. An absolutely raving, murderous lunatic.

I had better humour him, though, I thought.

"It is all right, old chap," I said, "make yourself quite easy about it. If you will just wait here half-a-minute, I will go and fetch it. I have left it upstairs."

Jenkins looked at me doubtfully. "All right," he then said, "go upstairs and get it; I will come with you." I dodged Jenkins in the hall; or, to speak accurately I quickly put my leg behind him, gave him a push, and then made for the street like greased lightning.

I didn't wait for a hat, I wanted the nearest policeman, badly.

Jenkins recovered himself in no time.

"Stop him! Stop him!" he shouted as I sped down the street.

"He's raving mad; look out for yourselves," I said hurriedly to the people, who came rushing from every quarter at the sound of Jenkins' wild shouts.

Soon I espied a policeman and fairly rushed into his arms.

"He's mad, absolutely mad!" I shouted.

Jenkins was close upon my heels and by this time a crowd had collected.

"Hold him tight, Bobby!" Jenkins shouted, "Don't let him go whatever you do and I will give you a sovereign of it."

Digitized by Google

The policeman, upon hearing this, made a sudden grab for me, and held me like a vice.

"He's got the Ten-Pound Note!" gasped Jenkins.

"What!" shouted the bobby, "What! What!" shrieked the crowd rushing at me.

If Jenkins had told them I was a pro-Boer, or even Kruger himself, I could not have received more attention.

Then there was a regular flutter of Pearson's Weeklies in the air and with a regular whoop of "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?" they came for me like one man.

"It is my Note, I saw him first!" shouted Jenkins, trying to force his way through the crowd.

"Rats!" said a burly coalheaver giving Jenkins a dig in the ribs with his elbow, "first come, first served," he continued, making a way for himself through the crowd with an ease which seemed to come naturally.

Something seemed to be troubling the policeman. He held me with a grip of iron with one hand, but there was an agonised expression upon his face, as if he had colic, and he was searching in his tunic for something most diligently.

I was glad to perceive that the crowd were fighting, happily, amongst themselves. Everyone seemed most anxious, for some unknown reason, to get at me, but equally anxious that no one else should touch me.

The coalheaver was laying about him manfully, and I would have enjoyed it all immensely but for the fact that I felt something would soon happen to me. I tried to wriggle from the policeman's grip.

"Half-a-minute," he said; "I have nearly got it." Then a most beautiful and bewitching smile stole across the weather-beaten face of that guardian of the law, and as he drew forth a copy of Pearson's Weekly from his breast he said, in dulcet and sweet tones, as if he were proposing to a cook: "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?"

I could have stood and gazed upon the peaceful, happy, loving, and tender expression of that policeman's face for an hour, and would have thanked him at the end with tears of gratitude in my eyes.

Oh! the sweetness, the unutterable tenderness and yearning, the whole-souled gladness that was expressed in that one look.

As I looked upon his face it was as if I saw a land of hope, of joy; a land full of all that was good and noble stretched out before me.

But a rough shake of the shoulder disturbed me, and the whole expression of the policeman changed.

"Now then, mister, turn it out—that Ten-Pound Note! Be quick, now!" he said threateningly, as the coalheaver also laid a hand on my other shoulder.

"Everyone seems to think I am a millionaire," I said, "unless it is that Colney Hatch is let loose."

"Don't you take no notice of 'im, mister," said the coalheaver.

He then sidled most lovingly up to me, and in a voice that was as tender and soothing as that of a mother to her first child, he said:

"Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?"

Who could have resisted his winning little ways? But I gently patted the coalheaver on the head and said, as kindly as I could:

"Never mind me, old chap; just you go home and sleep it off."

"What-d'yer-mean! Now then, none of yer gimes wi' me. Don't yer try to come none of yer monkey on me, Mister bloomin' whatsyername, so I'm telling yer! D'y'ere?" said the coalheaver, shaking his copy of Pearson's Weekly in my face and looking most ferocious.

It was just about here that I lost my temper and began to say things.

"Just shut up your row and let me speak," I said.

"You hand over that Tenpun' Note," said the coalheaver.

"You had better do it quietly, Mister," said the policeman.

"Hand you a rope to go and hang yourselves with, would suit you better," I said, getting cross.

"What is the matter with you all?" I continued. "You silly idiots, do you think the millenium has come, or do you take me for a millionaire? Here am I, a peaceable man, driven out of my house by a raving lunatic called Jenkins, and then surrounded by a varied assortment of howling madmen, all shrieking and fighting for Ten-Pound Notes as if I were cram-jam full of them to the brim.

"You silly, addlepated asses, you doubly-distilled——"

But the coalheaver interrupted me just as I was warming to the subject.

"Ain't you one of them Pearson chaps?" said he.

"My name is Theophilus Biggs," I shouted, "and if there are any Ten-Pound Notes flying around just put me on the track."

That coalheaver was not a bad chap after all. He said he would have a drink at my expense and tell me all about it. He did, and that was the first I had heard of it.

When I got back to my rooms that night I found Jenkins very much the worse for wear, sitting in my armchair drinking my whiskey, whilst Mrs. Gum was patching him up with sticking-plaister.

"Hello!" I said.

But Jenkins never answered a word; he just sighed, and poured himself out another glass of whiskey.

"Buck up, old chap," I said encouragingly. "I quite forgive you; I am going to hunt Ten-Pound Notes myself."

"You forgive me, do you?" said Jenkins. "And that is the man I called 'friend!'" he continued, sighing deeply. "Theophilus, I thought better of you."

"Jenkins," I said, "you look hurt."

"I feel it," said Jenkins; "that fool of a coalheaver was like an Indian on the war-path. But I mean to get it, if it kills me. Why, man, I have already spent half of it. I gave my tailor an order for a new suit yesterday, I feel so sure of getting it."

"Well, look here, Jenkins," I said; "I'll help you, and if I get it I'll stand you a supper."

So we shook hands on the matter, and, after finishing my whiskey, Jenkins left.

I met Jenkins early next morning. We had agreed to take the day off and return richer by ten pounds, which we did not think bad pay for a day's work.

I left everything in Jenkins' hands as regards our movements, and followed him like a lamb. Anyone noticing Jenkins' furtive glances from right to left, his cat-like crawl, his whole sleuth-hound appearance, in fact, would have set him down either for a Sioux Indian on the warpath or a criminal of the deepest dye. I kept at a respectful distance from him—he looked too desperate, too weird-like.

Digitized by Google

The first man Jenkins tackled gave one look at him, and then bolted for his life.

I told Jenkins that he would have to assume a very much milder demeanour and accompany his question with a kind of sylph-like smile.

He said he would and he did; but his smile was too sylph-like, it was absolutely idiotic.

One old gentleman gave him a penny and another man gave him an envelope which seemed to send an electric thrill through Jenkins.

But upon opening it he discovered an advertisement for So and So's tea; and then he sighed.

So we strolled along and then an idea occurred to Jenkins.

"Look here, Biggs old man," he said, "I'm thinking we are on the wrong tack. So far we have been asking the most likely looking persons and I think now it is the unlikely looking ones we should ask."

So he stopped a 'bus and put the vital question to the conductor.

That conductor told Jenkins many things in many words, which rather discouraged him; in fact, he told me the things that conductor said really hurt him.

What possessed Jenkins to try and knock a cab-horse over I don't know. He says he didn't try to knock the cab-horse over; he didn't see any confounded cab-horse.

It was like this. We were walking quietly along, when suddenly Jenkins darted across the street, and the next thing I saw was a kind of mixture, half Jenkins, half cab-horse. However, they put Jenkins together, so to say, and, whilst sipping some brandy and water, he explained.

"I'm sure, he was one of them. He had Ten Pounds written all over him, so to speak, and but for that silly cab-driver, I should have got it. Of course, he has gone now, and here am I, hat smashed, coat torn, and one mass of bruises from head to foot."

"You are certainly enjoying yourself, Jenkins," I said.

Whilst I thus spake, Jenkins suddenly dropped his glass, and, leaving me to pay, rushed out.

I followed, and was just in time to see him almost throw himself upon a well-dressed looking man.

I saw Jenkins pull out his copy of Pearson's Weekly, and that was all, for the man beckoned Jenkins to go up a side street, and so I waited.

Jenkins came back in a little over five minutes.

"I thought I had him," he said sadly, "but it was no go. He was only fooling me!"

I asked Jenkins to tell me all about it, and he did.

"When I went up to him and asked him the vital question, he kind of smiled, and said, 'Come up this street, and let me see the date of the paper; it will be quieter up here.'

"So I, of course, followed him and held my copy of Pearson's Weekly up, pointing to the date.

"He seemed to study it for a minute or two, and then saying:

"'I'm only fooling you, old chap; good-day, wish you luck,' he left me."

"Rather curious," I remarked, and then I happened to notice that Jenkins' watch-chain was missing.

"Where's your watch, Jenkins?" I said.

Jenkin's face when he next looked at me was a study. Jenkins said very little but what he did say was to the point.

Poor old Jenkins! All the spirit seemed knocked out of him, and it was a weary man I helped into the Twopenny Tube.

We were going straight home and not caring how soon we got there.

Ours is a quiet out-of-the-way looking street and for a stranger to pass down it is a rare event. In fact I prided myself upon being able to give a full account of the business of everyone who passed my sitting-room windows from sunrise to sunset; so did Jenkins.

But I thought Jenkins was too limp, too thoroughly done up to know even where he was.

But there was life in the old dog yet. For without a word of warning he rushed across the street and I saw he had got hold of a stranger, the first I had seen in that street for many a day.

Jenkins kissed that man and I don't think the man liked it.

He then hugged him and proceeded to dance round him. But the man refused even to have a drink at Jenkins's expense. He just handed him an envelope, about which there was certainly no mistake, and then, after congratulating Jenkins, he left him.

Jenkins was another man. He even put his arms round my landlady, Mrs. Gum, and kissed her.

"This makes up for everything," he shouted, holding the Envelope aloft, and the smile that shone upon Jenkins's face was the smile he used to wear in childhood's happy days.

If you ever happen to meet Jenkins he will tell you all about it. Since getting that £10 Note he has missed trains, gone past his destination, gone without his lunch, and even missed appointments, all through trying to tell everyone all about it.

As Jenkins left me that night he said:

"That's number one I have got; I want you to keep count of them as I get them, old chap."

W. St. G. Drennan.

PEARSON'S
New Morning Paper.
1d. 2 The 1d. 2
The Paper for Home Reading.
The Paper for the Housekeeper.
The Paper for the Busy Man.
The Paper for the City Man.
The Paper for the Sporting Man.
The Paper for EVERYBODY.
Daily
THE MOST ORIGINAL, UP-TO-DATE, ACCURATE AND BEST NEWSPAPER
Published in this Country.
Published SIX days a Week, NOT once.
1d. 2 Express 1d. 2
ON SALE EVERYWHERE.
ORDER A COPY NOW.

Some of these days we shall tell you about
TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

Result of Competition No. 1.

As no one got all the results absolutely correct, the £100 has been divided among the following competitors: J. F. THORNHILL, 9 Brierley Avenue, Ardwick, Manchester; JAS. TAYLOR, 27 Stevens Road, West Ham; GEO. HUNT, 90 Arodene Road, Brixton Hill; T. LEA, 18 Morlton Street, West Kensington; W. BARKER, 41 Frostoms Road, Workington; H. JOHNSON, Dyehouse, Woodchester, Stroud; E. A. WORLAND, 5 Noel Street, Islington, N.; JAS. PARKER, 254 Hanover Buildings, Tooley Street, S.E.; F. S. GOODALL, 12 Nottingham Street, Cardiff; MISS FEY, 89 St. Albans Buildings, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.; F. NEWTON, 381 Commercial Road, Portsmouth; F. W. HOCKADAY, 2 Belmont Terrace, Bideford, Devon; P. O. MCINTIRE, 64 Richards Terrace, Roath, Cardiff; CHAS. E. WACOGNE, 50 Meanley Road, Manor Park, Essex (two shares); JAS. POTTER, 13 Alma Cottages, Wealdstone, Harrow; F. E. LADD, 3 Brighton Square, Rathgar, Dublin; J. LLOYD, 20 Allens Road, Ponders End.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, November 3rd. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 4. Matches to be played on Saturday, November 3rd.

MATCHES TO BE PLAYED ON SATURDAY, NOV. 3RD.	Free	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
1 NOTTS COUNTY v. 2 SHEFFIELD UNITED
1 WOLVERHAMPTON W. v. 2 LIVERPOOL
1 SHEFFIELD WEDNES. v. 2 ASTON VILLA
1 SUNDERLAND v. 2 NOTTS FOREST
1 DERBY COUNTY v. 2 BURY
1 PRESTON NORTH END v. 2 NEWCASTLE UNITED
1 BOLTON WANDERERS v. 2 MANCHESTER CITY
1 BURSLEM PORT VALE v. 2 GRIMSBY TOWN
1 SOUTHAMPTON v. 2 MILLWALL
1 SWINDON v. 2 READING

The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, November 2nd, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "COUPON No. 4," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. In the event of a tie the prize will be divided.
7. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains valuable information and statistics showing the previous records of the various clubs, and the particulars of the points of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in determining the chances of the teams engaged. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIES.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTOR.

III.—At the Nag's Head.

YES, we were in a pickle. The little fit-up company we had gone out with had "dried up," and we were left "stranded" in a small town on the north border of Lincolnshire. For weeks we had been dragging on somehow, listening to the promises of our unprincipled manager with all the gullibility of human nature, and looking upon his hopefulness with something more than admiration.

In the next town we were sure to make money; our luck was bound to turn; they must see the merits of our London comedy. So we parted with our jewels, watches, and musical instruments in different towns. The hall-keeper of the present town had legally or illegally put a restraining hand upon our baggage until he should have l is rent paid.

The company had diminished considerably. We were twelve originally but now we were seven, counting the manager. Latterly, nearly everyone doubled, and we prided ourselves that the audience did not discover the fact. Happy actors! Always ready to deceive themselves.

The manager had flown with the last receipts—a few pounds—the ladies had gone to London. We were too proud to write home and ask for money, at least we said so; Boddreys really was I believe, or afraid of being laughed at.

Halkett's family did not approve of his being on the stage; he was probably expectant of a rebuff and a lecture.

I, well, no doubt I should have got it if there happened to be any to spare there, but on that point I was doubtful.

"By Jove, I am hungry—and thirsty," said Halkett, who always was ready to eat.

Still, there was some excuse for him this time, as we had eaten nothing since breakfast, when we left our humble lodgings and our very handbags in them in lieu of payment.

"Well, there's a nice Jubilee fountain over the way, and heaps of turnips in the fields," suggested Boddreys.

Somehow we did not think he was a bit funny, though he tried to be.

We were standing in the market-place of the picturesque little town of Towton, gazing with hungry eyes at the shops. We were hungry; I doubt if we had ever been more so.

"I suppose there's nothing for it but the workhouse to-night," I said.

Their faces dropped.

"By Jove, is it as bad as that?" muttered Halkett.

"Will they take us in? We are rather decently dressed for casuals, are we not?" asked Boddreys.

"I think they would have to if we like to work."

"Work before supper, eh? Oh, then I am going for the turnips, honest I am. Come on, you chaps, it's not a bit of good standing here."

We had seen the turnips the day before when out for a walk, and laughed about them, but we little thought our hopeful manager would bolt with our next day's dinner and our jests become realities.

"Have we really nothing else to pawn?" asked Boddreys.

"Well, there are these handcuffs and this revolver put in my pocket by mistake last night after the last act, instead of, as I usually do, handing them to our late and worthy boss," I said. "But they wouldn't fetch anything, would they? Besides, there's no pawnshop in the town."

"Oh, happy town, or rather village!" said Halkett, mockingly spreading his hands towards Towton, in the approved dramatic gesture of bestowing a blessing.

"If I only had my mandoline, and you your banjo, we should soon pick up a few coppers in a pub," I said to Boddreys.

"We could try a song and a recitation or two without them, couldn't we?" suggested Boddreys.

We thought it over and felt we lacked courage without the banjo and the trifling sum with which to first pay our way into the place. For we wanted to do things in style and tickle the eyes of the company with our instruments first, and then accede to a request to tickle their ears.

"I have it," said Halkett, stopping us in the road, facing us and speaking hurriedly. "It's risky, but it can be done. The pub and the handcuffs put it into my head. We are two detectives, Brownson and I, and you, Boddreys, are the captured criminal, because you do look a bit of a scoundrel, you know, and you are dark. I was out here yesterday alone and went into a small inn about half-a-mile further on. A nice, simple-minded old man, just the very thing."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, yes, but I don't understand," said Boddreys, "what good will that do?".

"Wait, and I'll explain, only come on quickly. Brownson give me the revolver. Good, I see it has a few blank cartridges yet unfired."

As Halkett unfolded his plan we became quite excited and pressed on quickly. It did seem feasible. Boddreys had qualms of conscience, but we explained to him hungry men could not deal in conscience, besides which we could make it all right afterwards.

Having rolled Boddreys in the road, battered in his hat and pulled him about a bit, he bore evidence of a struggle. The handcuffs completed the criminal to the life, plus a sulky and truculent expression. It was getting dark now, so thus prepared we entered the passage of the "Nag's Head" and asked to see the landlord privately.

Halkett was spokesman; he was a parson's son, and had plenty of cheek. The fat old innkeeper came out of the kitchen. The clatter of mugs and glasses, and the laughter of the yokels, made us determined, if we previously wavered, to share these luxuries with them.

"Mr. Laybourne, a word with you," said Halkett in a grandly precise manner. Then he spoke low and mysteriously. "I am detective Cooper, from Scotland Yard, and this my brother officer, Mr. Robinson. Oh, don't be alarmed, we are not on business here, we have only come to ask you for a little supper. We have just captured this dangerous criminal in the district and are now taking him to London."

"Well, sir," replied the landlord, now a little flurried, "I 'arldy like to 'ave a criminal in my 'ouse, it don't seem right, some'ow."

"Oh, perfectly safe, I assure you, any trouble you see and—" he produced the revolver by way of finishing the sentence.

This seemed to upset the landlord still more, and Halkett had to use all his tact to bring him round. He finally appealed to his humanity.

"Would you believe it, Mr. Laybourne, we have been so hard on the prisoner's track that we have had nothing since a hasty breakfast early this morning. Can you turn starving men from your door?"

"Well, sir, if you put it that way, what am I to say? But there is no fire in the parlour."

"Oh, never mind, we will go in the kitchen, I am sure no one will mind in there. Good evening, gentlemen," said Halkett, entering the room with all the assurance in the world, "and, Mr. Laybourne, let us have whatever you have got in the house as quickly as possible, for we shall have to be away soon."

One or two of the occupants of the kitchen muttered a good evening, but most of them were too astonished to speak, and continued to stare at us for a good quarter of an hour after, until they found their tongues.

I followed Halkett, having a firm hold of Boddreys by the collar. We took up our positions at a table between the fire and the door, Boddreys sullenly crouching at that end of the settle which was nearest the door.

We made short work of the cold meat, bread, cheese, and a gallon of beer the landlord placed in front of us; it was a godsend and no mistake.

Boddreys had to have his food cut up for him, on account of his pinioned hands; to do him justice, Boddreys ate like a savage, discarding all polite means of conveying his food to his mouth, and made noise enough for two pigs. The business went well, but we were terribly tempted to laugh, for it was so unlike the polite Boddreys.

Then we had a consultation as to whether the criminal should be allowed beer, and finally came to the conclusion that as he was not likely to ever see much more we would extend the favour. He drank a pint of it at a draught; this created a profound impression.

At length, one rubicund farmer bolder than the rest, being a man of means I suppose, broke the silence of the audience by saying:

"And who may you happen to be?"

"Do you refer to me, sir?" asked Halkett, "I am detective Cooper from Scotland Yard, and this is Mr. Robinson, my brother officer. We have just had the good fortune to capture that dangerous criminal in this district."

"Ah, I haven't seen him aboot," said the rubicund one.

"Possibly not, he was in hiding and disguised, but we found him out, and are now going to take him to London by the next train. Time-table please, Mr. Laybourne."

And Halkett with a sidelong and meaning glance at Boddreys put the revolver on the table with a bang and began to study the trains. The revolver created another impression, and set them all thinking again.

Old Rotundity was again the first to recover from the shock and said:

"I can't mak oot what he wanted up here. Wheer does he cum fra?"

"Why, surely you heard," said Halkett, stopping short.

"What, the chap as escaped?"

"Why of course."

"What, not Fosdike, the escaped murderer?"

"Who else?"

We knew nothing about Fosdike, we had not been able to afford a paper for weeks.

"Eh, but he's cum a lang way. And why be you fur takking him to Lunnon?"

"Those are my orders, sir, my orders, a man can but obey orders!"

"Aye, that's right enough, but for my part I should ha' took him back fra wheer he cum."

"And let him escape again," I suggested.

This raised a big laugh, and I think the farmer marked me for revenge, he was evidently an important person in the Nag's Head.

"He's like to be a dangerous sort," suggested a tall, raw-boned man.

Boddreys looked up from his plate and gave them all a scowl to verify the remark.

"Not th' sort o' chap as you'd like to meet alone on a dark night, Mr. Bawtree?" suggested another.

The remark was considered humorous.

The criminal objected to being laughed at, and lifted his plate with a growl as if to throw it, but quieted down as Halkett fingered the revolver.

"Now, gentlemen," said Halkett, "will someone sing us a song?"

"Eh, young Thompson here is a rare singer," said the raw-boned Bawtree, "ax him, he will. Cum, young Thompson."

"Yes, Mr. Thompson, now do oblige us," I requested.

"But I should like to hear one o' th' Lunnon gents sing first," said Thompson, with a perfectly regal condescension.

He was a young man with a very receding chin. He evidently knew his power as a vocalist, and did not deal much in modesty.

Digitized by Google

"I've heerd say," put in old Rotundity, with intent, looking hard at me, "as Lunnon chaps can't sing fur nuts."

"It's not true, sir," said Halkett, before I could reply, "I will sing any man in this room for half-a-sovereign, and the company shall be the judge."

This was received with acclamation, and Rotundity offered to back Thompson against Halkett, half-a-sovereign a side. Halkett took the bet.

"Drinks round to the company, Mr. Laybourne," shouted Halkett. "Have you change for a sovereign?" he said, putting his hand in his pocket, then not giving the landlord time to reply, he went on, "but there, don't trouble, put it down on the bill and we will make one job of it, eh?"

Thompson commenced the contest with "The song that reached my heart," ladled out in gusts and barks, with an expression on his face as of ducks that die in storms. It was received amid the thunder of mugs and sticks upon the tables.

Then Halkett, who really had an excellent voice, gave us "The Diver." The applause was moderate and I heard a voice here and there say, "Not half bad," "He frames well." But the song was evidently too classic for them. As the contest was for three songs each side Thompson now barked "Kathleen Mavourneen," at times becoming drearily sentimental in the back of his throat. He chose too high a key and failed on one or two high notes, and although the song was a favourite his success was not so great as formerly.

Seeing the taste of our audience I told Halkett to sing "Rocked in the cradle of the deep," in which he scored well. The favour of the last two songs, "In old Madrid," from Thompson, and "The Vagabond" from Halkett was very equal.

Then came the vote and I sat in fear and trembling. I was greatly relieved when the result was equal. Many stuck to their local favourite, and it was surprising that Halkett had so many admirers who possessed the courage of their opinions.

The judgment of the singing was very humorous. One liked Thompson because his notes "kind o' hit him in the eye like." Another, because "he seemed to have three or fower voices all different;" one liked Halkett, because "he looked so grand and worked his hands so nice," another, because "he didn't seem 'fraid o' nowt."

The question was the casting vote. The landlord was appealed to, but he said:

"It's my place to please you all, gentlemen, and I can't afford to show no favour, nor make no enemies, nohow."

We suggested the prisoner, but that was objected to on the ground that a criminal has no taste.

Suddenly, Halkett espied a dart board against the wall.

"Look here, gentlemen, what do you all say if Mr. Thompson and I settle it with a throw or two of the darts, 151 up."

After some discussion this was agreed upon. Both competitors having declared they could neither of them play at all, they commenced with a few trial shots, and found themselves very equal, at least, so it seemed.

"Back me for all you're worth," said Halkett to me aside.

I knew Halkett enough to rely upon him. He evidently knew the game well so I promptly made a few small bets.

It was an exciting contest towards the end, for both men were equally matched, but finally Halkett made a lucky throw and won by a few points amid the cheers of his partisans. The money promptly changed hands and we felt elated with our success.

How delightful it was to feel rich again, we now possessed about a sovereign between us.

Thompson was very much annoyed, so also was old Rotundity, who clamoured for a renewal of the contest in a way that could not be refused.

"Noo be sportsmen if you Lunnon chaps can be, and I've heard you can't," said he, looking hard at me again. "Let him hev his revenge, Mr. Cooper, I double the stakes, an' if you're a man you'll take it."

They played again at double stakes and of course I had to renew my bets. But what was the matter with Halkett?

He began to play horribly; the anxiety of the whole night began to tell upon his nerves and his hand shook visibly.

I looked meaningly at Boddreys who was pretending to be asleep in the corner of the settle, with one eye half open.

We crowded round the players all intensely interested in the game which was nearing its close, and going badly for us.

At any moment Thompson might win, while Halkett had very little chance. Rotundity was radiant, and his vulgar sarcasm did anything but raise our spirits.

Thompson was preparing to throw the winning shot. I looked round, Boddreys was gone.

"Cooper, Cooper." I gasped with horror, as the arrow fled to its mark, "our prisoner has escaped," and then I stood there like one paralysed.

"What?" exclaimed Halkett with a shout.

Everyone forgot the game and turned to where Boddreys was supposed to be asleep. Their faces fell in blank dismay.

"My goodness, we are ruined!" exclaimed Halkett tragically. "Come, don't stand here like a pack of fools! After him, boys!"

We all rushed or tumbled out, Halkett firing two shots into the darkness and everyone shouting his best.

"A hundred pounds to anyone who catches him!" I shouted as we went. "Come he's gone this way across the fields to Towton."

We raced forward at our topmost speed and when we had out-distanced our beer-logged companions we doubled and made for the next station down the line where as had been arranged Boddreys waited for us.

Going into the station the last minute we took the first train north to the town where our musical instruments had been left in "Uncle's" care.

With the help of these we worked our way to London, doing so well that we were soon able to satisfy our qualms of conscience and settle our supper and betting accounts at the Nag's Head. DOUGLAS VIGORS.

Next Week: VIRTUE'S CHAMPION.

REMEMBER, REMEMBER, the 1st of NOVEMBER is the day when
PEARSON'S MAGAZINE
is published. The November number is superb. Keep a sixpence ready for it.

Digitized by Google

CORPORAL CHRIS.

"CHRIS," said Tom's mother, "you'll look after him, won't you? He's all I have, you know; and he's so daring that I fear for him; Heaven alone knows how I fear for him!"

"Right you are, Mrs. Keene. I'll keep an eye on him. And don't you fret now, Tom will come home to you, a perfect hero, with medals, and glory, and a whole haversack of loot."

"I only want him to bring back himself. You're stronger minded, Chris, than my Tom, and if you'll only keep your word you'll have my prayers, and a mother's prayers are worth something, Chris."

Tom Keene and Chris Underhay were the David and Jonathan of Gwynne Street, Chelsea. Schoolmates, playmates, and later on always good chums, where one led the other was sure to follow; so it was not surprising that upon the breaking out of the war in South Africa, when Chris, in a fit of enthusiastic patriotism, enlisted, Tom should needs do the same.

Chris' position as one of a large family, made his action of no especial moment to his friends, he being the "ugly duckling" of the domestic brood, but Tom, the only son, the only child of his mother, a widow, ought to have thought twice before taking such a step.

It was a stirring time, as everyone will remember, this send-off of a great army to the Dark Continent, to vindicate British honour, and maintain the national credit, and in spite of mother-tears, and tremblingly whispered "farewells" from rosy lips, the two friends went joyously to the fray.

True, Tom every now and again felt sobered as his mother's face, anxious, sorrowful, rose up before him, but it was not in his nature to indulge in such thoughts for long. He lived in the light of other men's companionship.

Gregarious to a degree, he never cared to remain much with himself. He bored himself. He needed the noise, the glass-clink, and the laughter, to be found in the company of his kind.

It was this disposition which made his friendship with Chris the more remarkable. For Chris was by no means a roysterer, a mere empty chatterer and boon-comrade. Rather was he a reserved man, one who kept his opinions to himself, and one, too, upon whom you might surely rely at any time in stress or emergency.

Still Tom loved him, although often vexing him by his utter want of backbone and self-control, by a shilli-shalliness which more than once had landed him in undesirable situation.

One secret, and only one, had they between them, otherwise, there was perfect mutual trust and openness.

It is generally a love affair that occasions, in the case of men, at least, a certain amount of reserve as between intimates. In this particular instance there was, on the one side at any rate, good reason for it.

Kitty Laidlaw had much to answer for in the matter, as all such pretty mischievous coquettes ever have, or should have.

She loved Chris Underhay, there was little doubt about that, but when behind her sweetheart's back she though it good to carry on a desperate flirtation with Tom, the value of her affection, to any right thinking mind, was sensibly discounted.

The worst of it was that Kitty, up to the moment of the embarkation of the troops, succeeded only too well in persuading Tom that she really cared for him, giving him, at a final stolen interview in the gardens of the old College, her portrait, and a vague, though to him very real promise of reward on his return from the campaign.

Chris, too, had his "farewell" experiences, and, in his happy ignorance, they were very sweet.

Yet even his generally unsuspicious nature fancied an absence of something he could not altogether define. The rift in the lute always adversely influences its tunefulness, be the rift ever so small or so apparently unimportant.

So matters stood upon the day of departure, and although the big transport carried, in the persons of the two friends, two such diverse natures, yet it had on board no two finer examples of Britain's fighting sons.

* * * * *

The day of Colenso, that terrible Friday, the effect of which was to cloud for awhile our prospects in South Africa.

It was at early dawn that the British made their attack in full force, and all through the day the struggle went on, to the murderous accompaniment of an unprecedented cannonade.

"Tom," Chris said that morning before daylight, (the regiment was luxuriating in a brief "stand-easy," for the advance of the Ladysmith relief column had been severe to the point of punishment.) "Tom! this isn't going to be child's play to-day; we shall need all our pluck, lad, I'm thinking, to carry us through."

"Why, Chris, old man, it isn't like you to be despondent. Take it from me, the Boer's aren't made yet that will lick us! Besides, you oughtn't to talk like that, you who got your stripes at Elandslaagte!"

"Ah! I don't care so much about that," said Chris musingly, "after all, I very much doubt if the game's worth the candle."

Digitized by Google

"There's something wrong with you, that's certain," said Tom, seriously for him, "what is it, old chap?"

"Oh! nothing! and yet it is something, something I can't shake off, or make clear to myself," replied the other.

"Well, we shall be falling-in in a minute or two, but if you'd care to tell me, as near as you can get at it, what it is that's worrying you, it might ease your mind."

"Tom, I'm not, as you know, a believer in dreams, but I had one last night which shakes my scepticism a bit."

"A dream! you! I shouldn't think that a vision of the night would have much weight with you."

"Nor would it in ordinary case; but this dream, Tom, was so real, so—so convincing, that faith in its actuality and warning is somehow forced upon me."

"Well."

"I saw then in my dream that I, myself, was lying dead out on the veld yonder; and that you, riding a white horse, leapt across my prostrate body towards a white-robed female figure, that stood outlined in the moonlight against a belt of dark scrub, a hundred yards or so away. That's all!"

"Is that all!" cried Tom; but as he uttered the words his heart sank within him.

An indefinite sense of coming peril to one or other, or both of them, smote his soul. For the life of him he could not look Chris squarely in the face. Even the dull red glow of the hastily lit fire of a few sticks, would have revealed his agitation.

Then Chris spoke again.

"Perhaps, after all, it may only be the outcome of a morbid brooding. Well, there! I'll try and throw it off, Tom, old boy! Let us hope that Richard will be himself again by this time to-morrow!"

"Heaven grant it!" said Tom, fervently, grasping convulsively almost his friend's hand.

The word was now given to march, and in a few moments the relief force was in rapid motion again.

When, an hour later, the faint signs of approaching dawn were visible, the water of the Tugela lap'd a welcome to man and beast.

It was Friday evening. The Boers swimming, some of them, the river in their shirts, swarmed to the pursuit. They seemed infected with the spirit of vengeful malice, threatening even the bearers of the dead and wounded, and in more than one instance, deliberately shooting down the doers of the charitable office.

The enemy's fiercest fire had come from a Hotchkiss Automatic Gun, planted upon Hlangwane Hill. The execution done in the British ranks by this means had been fearful; but in the rush to reap the reward for victory, the gun on the hill was left practically undefended.

Half-a-dozen Boers at the most kept by it, and even these few seemed to be more interested in watching the action of their comrades than in the safe keeping of their formidable charge.

The regiment in which served Chris and his friend was the last to leave the field. It had borne the brunt of the last deadly Boer onslaught, but at the expense of many lives.

Save for a spent bullet tap on his left forearm, Tom was unhurt, while Chris had never a scratch.

It was during the retreat, that Tom, casting back a glance at the scene, saw the comparatively unprotected state of the big gun on Hlangwane Hill.

Without a second thought or without even a word to Chris by whose side he had kept throughout the day, he whispered to three or four men nearest to him, hurriedly sketching his scheme.

Suddenly the little party broke away from the main body, darting back to where stood an ammunition waggon, with its team still attached.

Unhitching the horses, and then each man springing into the driver's saddle, they made at breakneck speed for the hill.

Tom cannot to-day tell how he reached it, or what exactly happened.

All he does know for certain is that every one of his little band was shot out of the saddle before the hill was gained.

He remembers, too, his own hand-to-hand encounter with a gigantic Boer, whose clubbed Mauser brought him crashing to the ground.

Chris, usually so watchful of Tom's movements, had his hands full at this time, owing to the lack, through casualties, of non-commissioned officers; thus it was quite ten minutes before he missed his friend.

Then, intuitively almost, he guessed the truth, which a look behind him verified to the full.

He did not hesitate. Tom's mother seemed present, and urging him to a fulfilment of his promise.

Not staying to gather help, he turned and ran for dear life in the direction of what now was a little battle on the hill.

Tom saw him, just as his adversary's rifle was descending upon him for the second time.

But the Corporal was also seen by other eyes.

Two shots rang simultaneously out. As the big Boer threw up his arms, his mauser dropping heavily out of his hand, Chris staggering towards Tom a step or two, fell forward upon his face.

* * * * *

Tom, who remained a prisoner until the general release after Botha's resignment of the struggle, now lives with his mother in the old house at Chelsea.

Kitty Laidlaw is nurse in one of the great metropolitan hospitals. She says she will never marry.

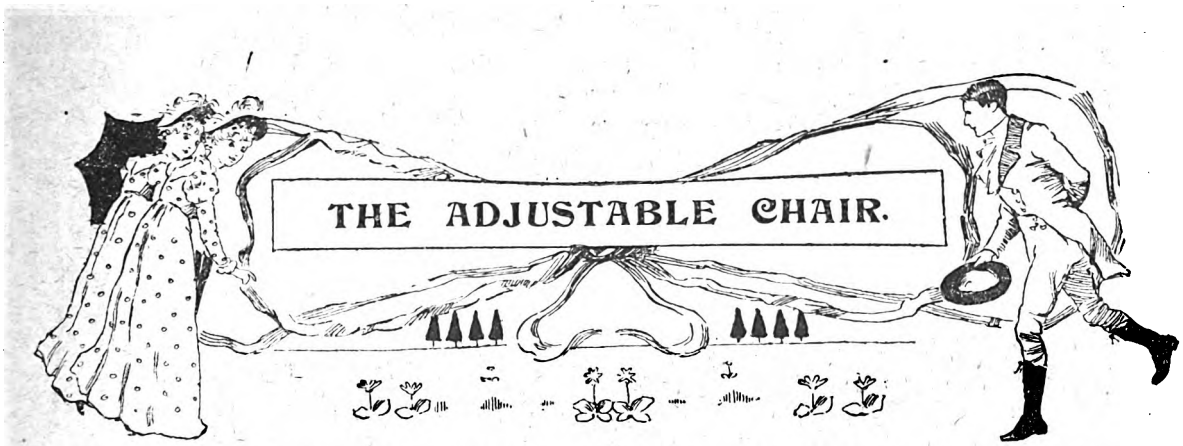
Tom has returned to her the portrait of herself that she gave him in the "College" garden a year before.

The memory of him who lies buried in the far-away veld is very green in both their hearts; but it is mingled with, in large proportion, a feeling closely akin to conscious shame.

As for his regiment, there is no brighter record on its roll of honour than that associated with the name of Corporal Christopher Underhay.

RALPH ENDERBY.

Digitized by Google



THERE are eccentric men in Tooting. The same is true of all parts of the country, but Tooting eccentricity develops itself in ways that are peculiarly ingenious and pleasing. Mr. James W. Beale furnishes a conspicuous and characteristic illustration of this great truth, and his name deserves to be remembered among those who can appreciate eccentricity of a truly original type.

Mr. Beale has a daughter. She is a good girl, weighing one hundred and thirty-three pounds. She is greatly respected by all who know her, and is undoubtedly a most estimable person, of whom her father might be honestly proud. It is, however, a part of Mr. Beale's eccentricity to assume that when a young man comes to spend the evening with a young lady, the two usually occupy only a single chair.

This theory, which is doubtless founded on the unsubstantial basis of the comic papers, is, of course, utterly untenable by any man of sound judgment, but the eccentric Mr. Beale firmly believes it. He cherishes, moreover, views of the strictest nature as to the way in which a young lady should conduct herself, and he has often informed Miss Beale that a community of chair is one of the most wicked of the ideas of modern Socialism, and that no young lady should permit any man to sit within ten feet of her chair. His daughter has invariably replied: "Yes, pa, I think you are quite right."

Although he thus failed to discover any evidence that his daughter had departed from his instructions, Mr. Beale was far from being convinced that all was right, and accordingly he designed his now celebrated patent adjustable chair, a mechanical invention intended to restrain young people from any tendency to overtax the strength of any one chair.

The patent adjustable chair does not present any novel peculiarities to the eye, but it is so constructed that when an excess of weight is placed upon it the seat sinks to the floor, and a whistle, worked by compressed air, gives forth a weird and piercing shriek. It can be adjusted so as to sink with almost any desired weight, and a judicious father can regulate it according to the weight of his daughter and of her various visitors.

For example, Miss Beale weighed one hundred and thirty-three pounds, and Mr. Barlow, the local chemist's assistant, weighed one hundred and fifty-five. If, therefore, Mr. Beale adjusted his patent chair so that it would sink under a weight of two hundred pounds, it is evident that the weight of the young lady or the young man alone could not cause the whistle to sound, but that their combined weight could not be placed on the chair without setting the peculiar machinery in action.

There was also a Mr. Carpenter, weighing two hundred and four pounds, who occasionally called on Miss Beale, and on nights when he was expected it would be necessary to fix the sinking point of the chair at three hundred pounds. The merit of the invention is obvious, and Mr. Beale felt, when he placed his patent adjustable chair in his back parlour one Sunday evening, just before Mr. Barlow's arrival, that he was now certain to learn whether his daughter was in the habit of implicitly following his counsels.

About nine o'clock the ingenious father, who was in the dining-room waiting earnestly for the whistle, heard the peculiar and unmistakable sound of that treacherous device, and instantly rushed into the back parlour. He found Mr. Barlow lying across the collapsed chair and Miss Beale standing at a respectful distance from him, anxiously inquiring if he was hurt. He said he had accidentally caught his foot in the hearthrug and had fallen over the chair.

This explanation could not be rejected, for it was quite possible that the chair might have been collapsed by just such an incident. The disappointed father withdrew, taking the chair with him, and admitting to himself that his daughter was not to be caught with any ordinary trap.

But in spite of this failure the adjustable chair has recently been brought prominently before the public. When the church committee met last month, and there was a scarcity of chairs, Mr. Beale sent the sexton to his house with instructions to bring all the chairs he could find.

The adjustable chair was among them, and Mr. Beale, forgetting its peculiarities, made haste to personally offer it to the chairman. The chair, as a subsequent examination proved, had been adjusted, and it so happened that the chairman weighed just three hundred and one pounds.

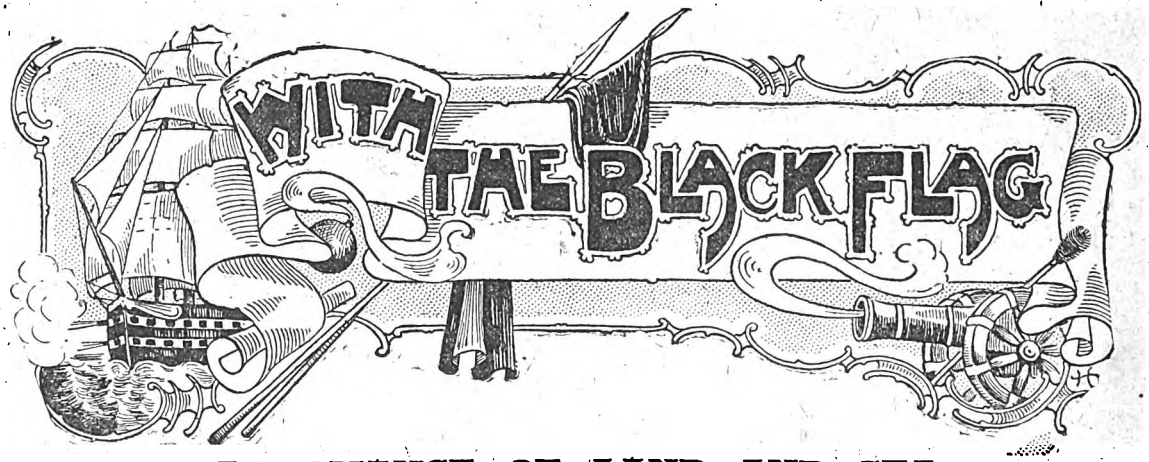
When, therefore, after having delivered an impressive speech, the reverend gentleman sat down, the assembly was horrified to see him sink rapidly to the floor, while the shriek of the whistle was supposed to be a cry of pain wrung from the unhappy man.

The subsequent trial and expulsion of Mr. Beale for sacrilegiously playing a dangerous practical joke on the chairman, with the design of bringing religion into contempt in the eyes of the world, has made the peculiarities of the chair familiar to almost everyone.

At the same time there can be no question that this chair is an excellent one from a father's point of view, and the time will come when every young man will eye the average chair with misgivings, and share with his sweetheart the convenient, if grimy, coal-scuttle.

W. E. SPEAR.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty.

Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.

John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.

General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic.

Dons Iago Santleo, and Antonio Bonanza, two Venezuelans who are friends of Wyvenhoe.

General Urdenetta, Governor of Pampatar, a bitter enemy of Wyvenhoe.

Bolivar, Supreme Chief of the Venezuelan Republic.

Tamanac, an Indian Cazique, and great friend of Santleo.

CHAPTER XIX.

Arrival at Manoa.

"At to-morrow's dawn you will get your first view of Mount Manoa," observed Santleo as we dismounted from our mules before a rude Indian habitation where we were going to pass the night.

"We shall have to rise before the sun then. From this valley there is no prospect," I said.

"Two hours ere the sun, or we shall not gain the foot of the mountain before he sets. From hence thither is nearly a day's journey and my home sickness is greater than ever. We have been a weary while on the way. Did not the darkness of the night and the difficulties of the descent forbid, I would fain push on a few leagues further."

We had indeed been a weary while on the way. It was three months since we parted company with the patriots, and even yet we had not reached our destination. We had met with more delays and undergone more hardships than we anticipated; the "ordinary dangers of travel" had proved as great as the ordinary dangers of a campaign. For days together we had ridden over arid plains where no water was, and through snake infested swamps, and dark and dismal forests. We had been laid up with fever and forced to make long halts in wretched quarters. Once, while returning alone from an abortive shooting excursion I had been attacked by a pack of savage dogs and narrowly escaped with my life. Not common prairie dogs, but descendants of the ferocious hounds of Cumana, used by the Spaniards for hunting fugitive slaves, which, having been let loose owing to the war, had betaken themselves to the llanos, and reverting to their original wildness became more dangerous than jaguars or pumas. The pack chased me, full cry, for several miles and had not Santleo and the others heard their baying and come to my help there had been a kill and I should have been in at the death. It was the first time I had ridden from hounds, and I found it vastly more exciting than riding to them.

Before long the weather broke, beginning with terrible thunder storms, preceded and accompanied by lightning so vivid and continuous that for hours together the whole firmament was in a blaze of white fire. Then the windows of heaven opened and the rain descended for many days, making the rivers overflow their banks and converting the llanos into vast lagoons, out of which, here and there, rose a hamlet or a hato (cattle farm) which, being built on an eminence, escaped the deluge.

To one of these we betook ourselves, and there for a long time tarried, under compulsion, since going on before the floods abated had been to court destruction.

So soon as it was possible and before it was prudent we went on. The earth was so soft that our horses sank up to their fetlocks at every step, which so tired them that we could make only short marches, and camping out on the saturated ground was neither comfortable nor safe. We all suffered more or less from fever. When the sun came out a great smoke rose up from the plain, so that we were in a continual vapour bath. Our clothes were never dry. But crossing the swollen rivers was our greatest difficulty and our greatest danger. They were too wide to be passed by swimming, and we had baggage. When boats could not be obtained, we had to make rafts of bulls' hides, to which the animals were roped; hazardous undertakings that several times brought us into great peril. Two of the horses were drowned, and one of the llaneros, whom we had engaged as helpers and guides, was so mauled by a cayman that he died.

But everything comes to an end, so did the llanos, and when we came to the hills we had to make different arrangements. The horses were changed for mules, the llaneros dismissed and replaced by Indian mountaineers.

From this point the journey, though less monotonous, was quite as trying and progress even slower. We crossed ravines and rivers by rope suspension bridges under which we were slung, getting over partly by our own impetus, partly with the help of drag ropes; crawled along the face of precipices by tracks not more than two feet wide, and traversed rocky passages so narrow that we had to dismount and go afoot, there being no room for our legs.

Digitized by Google

Of ordinary ascents and descents we thought nothing, albeit many of them were desperate scrambles; and the days were intolerably hot and nights often as intolerably cold. But we had the advantages of superb scenery and bracing air, and one still greater, relief from the onslaughts of ticks, jiggers and mosquitoes.

After many days this part of our journey drew also to a close. On the morrow I was to see Manoa and, as I hoped, learn Santleo's secret. During the journey he had told me no more than I have set down, and seeing that he desired to avoid the subject I made no further attempt to draw him.

At four o'clock we were once more on the move, leading our mules; for the trail out of the quebrada was steep and stony and ran between sheer rocks and a raging torrent.

We were once more on the move, leading our mules.

At first we were in inky darkness, but as the gorge opened out and we reached higher ground our old friend Lucifer favoured us with his friendly light, which was a great help.

Santleo was silent and seemingly absorbed in thought, and being myself in no mood for talk, also somewhat anxious, for it was just possible that his people might give me the cold shoulder, I asked him no questions.

When we had gained a ridge, which so far as I could make out, was the summit of the pass, he called a halt, speaking for the first time since we left the Indian hut.

"We shall wait here until the sun rises, unless you are cold and would rather go on," he said.

"Not at all, I am warm with expectation," quoth I, making an effort to keep my teeth from chattering, the cold just then being intense.

"It won't be long, only a few minutes. See, the stars are beginning to pale already," added Don Iago.

I looked east. The sky was suffused with a crimson glow which gradually broadened and soon the red disc of the sun rose above a chain of serried peaks which bounded the horizon.

"Manoa is not out there," said Santleo.

I looked westward, and saw what seemed to be a great, white wall reaching from the earth to the sky. As the sun rose higher I perceived that the wall was a chain of mighty snow mountains, the first I had seen, and the most stupendous sight I had yet beheld.

"Manoa is not out there," repeated Santleo. "Look down."

I looked down and saw a vast and verdant plain stretching further than the eye could reach. In the middle of this plain rose a mountain of great extent with sides absolutely sheer, as perpendicular as the walls of a house, and as Santleo told me nearly two thousand feet high. Hence it was as broad at the summit as at the base, peak there were none, and in the distance looked as flat as the plain from which the mountain sprung. How far it extended westward I could not make out, nearly as far, it seemed to me, as the white mountains.

"And that is Manoa?" I exclaimed.

"That is Manoa," answered Santleo.

"And where do your people live, on the plain, I suppose?"

"On the mountain, of course."

"But how the dickens do they get there? Have they wings?"

"Not yet. Those are to come," quoth Santleo with a laugh. "You will know all about it in a few hours."

"Well, if it is not wings it must be balloons. Scaling that mountain is no more possible than swimming up the falls of Niagara."

Then we began the descent which was so abrupt that the mules were often on their haunches, occasionally on their beam ends, mine taking up so much of my attention, that, until we reached the bottom I had none to bestow on Manoa, though it was continually in my mind. But when I had leisure to look about me, I scrutinised it more closely, and the more I looked the more my wonder grew.

Regarded from the plain it was far more imposing both in bulk and height than it had seemed from the ridge. It was the difference between looking up and looking down.

Yet we were still twenty miles away, a distance at which you can distinguish only the general contour of the mountain, and there might be some way of getting to the top obvious only on closer inspection.

We rode on, and the mules, pleased with the change from stony tracks to a fair road, took to pacing without being pressed, and we went over the ground at good speed. The plain was fertile and well cultivated, the climate, as I judged from the products of the soil, sub-tropical. The peons (peasants) were all Indians, and lived in little houses built of wood and mud, which, when hard-dried by the sun, becomes as hard as bricks.

The Indians whom we met greeted Tamanac with great deference, some rendered Santleo similar honour, though they appeared to have a difficulty in recognising him, from which I inferred that he had altered considerably during his absence.

But I had eyes for little else than Manoa, and presently perceived something so passing strange that I thought I was bewitched. The mountain appeared to have no base; it rested on nothing. The lower half—but that was the point, or rather, the illusion or my delusion—so far as I could see there was no lower half.

I shut and opened my eyes repeatedly, turned my head

Digitized by Google

The number of columns was bewildering; no two were alike.

and looked again and again. It was always the same. Manoa still hung between heaven and earth. But the thing was so impossible, the idea so preposterous that I could not bring myself to ask Santleo whether I saw right.

Finally, however, I put the question, though diffidently and in expectation of a laughing reply.

"Either my eyes deceive me, or there is something peculiar about that mountain," I said. "On what is it supported?"

"On pillars. But as yet they don't show. It looks as though there were nothing."

"Pillars! But how can pillars support a weight so immense? And how did they get there?"

"The Indians say that the work was done by the genii of the Andes, with the devil for architect. That is the Cazique's opinion, and he shakes his head dubiously when I tell him that Nature is a greater wonder worker than Satan. When you have had a closer view you must give me your opinion."

Soon I had a closer view, and I saw that my eyes had deceived me, though not a great deal.

Owing to a slight diaphanous mist that hovered over the plain, or to some peculiar effect of light and shade, the void had appeared greater than it really was. Yet none the less did the body of the mountain seem to be without support, and it was only when we drew nearer that I descried the pillars of which Santleo had spoken. These were white and round, measuring, from base to summit, two to three hundred feet; and through a vast archway of the same material flowed a broad river, which meandered eastward across the plain.

I was so lost in wonder at these marvels that until Santleo roused me by an abrupt exclamation I had not noticed a party of horsemen who were coming towards us.

"Some of your people?" I asked.

"Yes! Yes!" he exclaimed excitedly, spurring his mule, but, as the creature was doing its best already, without increasing its speed.

Soon we met them, a party of four young men of about the same age as Santleo, one as light complexioned, two darker, with flashing, black eyes; the fourth seemed to have a touch of Indian in his composition. But all were fine, good-looking fellows, and all spoke English. Their greetings were warm and rather effusive, yet there was none of that effeminate embracing and kissing to which Venezuelan creoles are so much given.

Then Santleo introduced me to his friends, whose names —Preston, Porter, Hewes, and Wells—sounded so familiar and home-like as to make me feel that despite my strange surroundings I was amongst friends.

"As we are about it I may as well tell you my name," said he.

"It is not Santleo, then?"

"That is the Hispaniolised version. I was christened James Santley."

"And you prefer the English version?"

"Here, certainly."

"Good! Now for another little rectification. You introduced me as Colonel Wyvenhoe. I am no longer in the Venezuelan service, and if you will henceforth call me Captain Wyvenhoe I shall be greatly obliged."

"I understand. You set more store by your captain's rank in the army of King George than your colonel's rank in the army of Don Simon, and you are quite right. So remember, brothers, our guest is Captain, not Colonel, Wyvenhoe."

After conferring with his friends, Santley told me that until they obtained permission from the authorities they would be unable to take me up the mountain.

"But Wells and I are going thither immediately," he added, "and during our absence the others will keep you company. I don't suppose we shall be away more than three or four hours, and there is a rest house where you can eat, and drink, and take your ease."

"You are very kind and I am greatly obliged to these gentlemen for bearing me company," quoth I. "Would you add to the obligation by letting me see you go up!"

On which they laughed, and answered, "Surely, why not?" And with that we went on once more, for while we talked we had pulled up.

So far I had seen only one side of the mountain, the shape of which was oblong, and a part of the front, as in my mind, I termed its south end, from which issued the stream. This we crossed by a bridge of canoes and after going two miles further came to a place where, at some time long past, a great piece had fallen from the mountain top leaving a huge gap above and forming a considerable mound below.

From the edge of the gap a flight of steps led up to the summit, while on the rocks was built a substantial platform to which access was gained by another flight of steps. These two points were connected by a series of rope ladders every length of which was secured to a bar of iron-wood, driven into a crevice of the rock, or a hole drilled for the purpose.

But none faint of heart, short of wind, or weak of limb, might attempt to climb that giddy staircase, and I almost trembled when the two men went lightly up the ladders, their apparent size diminishing until they looked like flies creeping up a wall, and in a short time became almost invisible to the naked eye.

Then a flag was waved from the gap at the top to inform us of their safe arrival, and we who were left behind descended from the mound and betook ourselves to the rest house, which stood hard by. Quite a large place it was, with several rooms, and a large garden, and servants who brought us meat, maize cakes and fruit, and palm wine of the finest vintage of Manoa, to all of which we did justice.

Digitized by Google

I took care not to ask my entertainers no questions which I thought they might not like to answer, but when we had done eating I proposed a walk under the mountain, to which they readily assented, and in a few minutes we were there, entering the mighty cave between two gigantic pillars with bases so perfectly shaped that it was hard to believe that they were not the work of human hands. The number of columns was bewildering; no two were alike, some were round, some oval, some twisted, some straight, some so large that it took several minutes to walk round them, others comparatively slender, all white and smooth. The upper parts were shrouded in perpetual darkness, and the sun being over our heads the light below was ghostly and dim. The grandeur and gloom and awesomeness of the place were intensified by the din and roar of the unseen river and once there came a mighty crash like a thunder clap, which echoed and reverberated for several minutes in a way that made my flesh creep.

"A stone falling from the top," said Hewes. "They are always falling, and the man who is hit is seen no more. He is killed and buried at the same time. I think we had better be going out."

I thought so too. It was not a desirable place for an afternoon ramble.

Hewes told me that the river came out of the ground some way west of Manoa, and it was supposed to have its source in a large lake at the foot of Mount Lofty, the great white peak in the far distance. In winter, when it rained on the plains and snowed on the Andes, the river often rose to an immense height, thundering under the mountain and foaming and swirling among the columns as though it were possessed of legions of devils. Which I could well believe.

We now took a walk in another direction and then returned to the rest house where presently came Santley and Wells, accompanied by a fine looking old gentleman with a white moustache and beard, the latter pointed, a nondescript complexion and skin something between light red and reddish brown, a long face, an aquiline nose, high cheek-bones and kindly grey eyes.

"Master Walter Wyvenhoe, our honoured judge," said Santley, and then withdrew, followed by the others.

"Did I hear aright? Is your name indeed Wyvenhoe?" I cried, so soon as I could speak. "Or was Santley joking?" I was going to add, but as the old gentleman looked far too dignified to be jocular I refrained.

"My name is indeed Wyvenhoe, good sir. I am a descendant of the Walter Wyvenhoe who sailed from Bristol in the ship Bold Venture——"

"In which also sailed his cousin and my forefather Gilbert Wyvenhoe," I, now greatly excited, struck in. "But by what strange chances or series of events has it come to pass——"

"That shall in due time be imparted to you," interrupted the judge. "My errand now is to say on what condition the council and people of Manoa will receive you as a welcome and highly honoured guest——"

"Any condition you may like to impose?"

"Nay, listen ere you decide. It is but one condition, the taking of an oath thus conceived. 'So long as I live and Manoa exists I will impart neither to man, woman nor child aught whatsoever I know of Manoa and its people, or may hereafter learn.'"

"I accept the condition," said I, though with a sense of disappointment, for it would compel me to keep secret what I thought was likely to prove the most interesting part of my travels and adventures.

"And your servant?"

"John Ready will also accept the condition."

"Then all we have to do is to call him in, also James Santley and the others, for the oath should be taken before witnesses. All this may seem strange and ungracious, Master Wyvenhoe, yet in truth it is not so, as ere long you shall know. But explanation must wait on opportunity. The day is far spent, and I fear you would find mounting the ladders after dark rather trying."

"And you, sir!"

"For one who has been used to that way of going home from his youth upwards, night has no terrors, but it hath its dangers, and in good sooth I would rather go up by daylight."

So Santley and the others were summoned, and in their presence Ready and I took the oath.

"Is there any way of getting our kits up?" I asked my compadre, as we made for the mound.

"Some of the peons will bring them."

"How? On their backs?"

"No, on their heads."

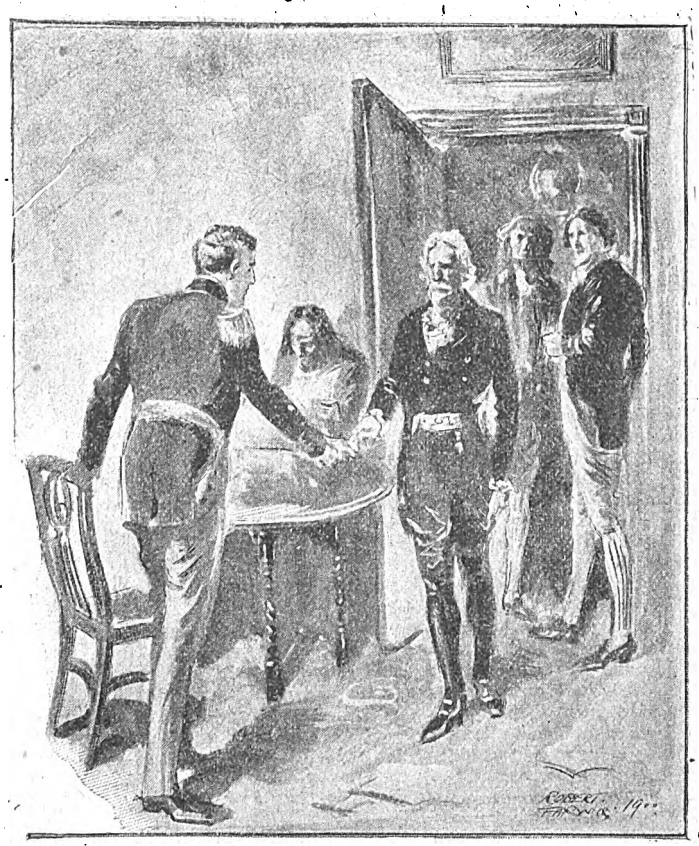
There was some question as to who should start first. It was the judge's right, but he waived it.

"You young men begin," said he, "you will go faster with us behind you than before. I shall follow with my good cousin, Captain Wyvenhoe, if he will let me so call him."

"I shall esteem it an honour to be so called, dear sir, and though as cousins we are many times removed, as friends I hope we shall be near," I returned.

"And near friends are good friends," added the old gentleman with a pleased smile.

Meanwhile the others were beginning the ascent, as to which certain rules were observed; no more than two were allowed to be on the same ladder at the same time, nor near together, and the second man was not to keep step with the first.



"Master Walter Wyvenhoe, our honoured judge," said Santley.

Digitized by Google

John Ready did not like it at all.

"I would rather risk my life in a brush with the Spaniards or the French," he said. "Even if you get hit, the odds are against your being killed, but a fall from one of those ladders would be sudden death and no mistake."

"You won't fall, John, you will be too frightened. I know I shall," said I, as I prepared to follow my leader. "All you have to do is to step steadily and hold tight."

The mounting proved less formidable than I had anticipated, and after the first feeling of nervousness had passed away, I could look down, and even backward, without a tremor. The ladders were taut and strong. The staves, made of bulls' hide, light and tough, and the nearness of the mountain gave a sense of security which, however, was more apparent than real, since the rocks being for the most part smooth and sheer, there was nothing to lay hold of.

On the other hand, it was trying work for the wind, as well as for legs and arms, and I was glad when the judge called out:

"Here we will rest awhile."

Looking up, I saw him step from the ladder into a crevice, where Ready and I presently joined him. It was large enough to hold half-a-dozen; furnished with seats and shaded with bushes, and made a pleasant half-way house.

The prospect was grand. All round, so far as the eye could reach, were mountains piled on mountains. Manoa was the centre of a vast amphitheatre, a fortress whose furthest ramparts pierced the clouds, and where a handful of resolute men might hold their own against countless foes.

"Welcome to Manoa, kinsman," answered the girl.

The plain, as I now saw, was by no means level—few plains are—it rose gradually, as well towards the north as towards the west, and sloped to the east and south, a peculiarity to which I was one day to owe my escape from death.

"Is this the only way of getting to the top, Master Wyvenhoe?" I asked the judge.

"There is another thitherward"—pointing to the west—"practicable both for man and beast. But long ago it was blocked by a landslip, so that until it could be made good, a work of many years, there was no means of getting up or down. It was then that, driven by necessity, our fathers first made these rope ladders. But the journey that way is far more toilsome and five times as long, and we are used to the ropes."

"From which I conclude that the town is at this end of the mountain."

"The principal township and village are. We have no town. Shall we go?"

"If it please, you, Master Wyvenhoe."

On which we resumed our climb, the judge treading as nimbly and lightly as ever, Ready and I plodding wearily with heavy feet. I could hear John growl and groan, and mutter:

"Next time I'll go by that old road."

But as I have had occasion to observe before, everything comes to an end, and eventually we reached terra firma.

Santley and the others were waiting for us. There were also three mules.

"I thought you might be tired, so I ordered mules," said he.

"Which was very thoughtful of you. I am tired, and Ready can hardly get one foot before the other.

"Coming up the ladders is rather tiring at first, but you soon get used to it. How far have we still to go?"

"Not more than a mile when we are out of the hollow."

The hollow had been made by the great fall of rock which formed the mound. The sides were steep and covered with bushes and trees, through which a winding track led upwards.

My legs and arms were so stiff and sore that I had a difficulty in mounting my mule, but when we gained the summit I forgot my aches and was amply rewarded for my pains.

In grandeur and beauty the view surpassed the view from the resting-place as much as that surpassed the view from the plain, and the whole range of Andean peaks, for once uncapped by a single cloud, was bathed in the red glow of the setting sun.

The mountain-top was an undulating plateau, a great part of it under cultivation, interspersed with fine shrubs and noble trees, and had the appearance of a vast and lordly park.

The village lay something more than a mile away, a collection of white, single-storied houses, half-hidden among trees and surrounded by gardens.

Most of the villagers seemed to be out of doors.

"They are making ready to welcome you," said the judge, "and those in the road are coming to meet you."

"Those" were a number of young men and maidens, as might seem, in gala attire; the girls in flowing, white drapery and straw hats, adorned with bright flowers.

One of them came on faster than the others, a tall girl with rather square shoulders and as upright as a young palm tree, her well-poised head slightly backward, carrying herself like a queen, and walking with the light elastic tread, which denotes health and high spirits.

"Come hither, child," said the judge reining in his mule. "Come hither, child, and give thy kinsman welcome. Here is Captain Wyvenhoe from England, and this, Captain Wyvenhoe, is my daughter, Rosalind."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT HAUNTED HOUSES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Optimist," by Herbert Morrah, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. R. Jenkins, of Little Boys' Press, South Darenth, Kent. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about TELEGRAMS, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 5th. Post-cards only, please.

Ghosts?

A WALK of seven miles at midnight in a torrent of rain is not very inviting, but as I had missed my last train home this was necessary if I wished to reach my destination before daylight.

I started on my way, but had not got very far before I came to an empty house, set on a lonely common, which had the reputation of being haunted.

Feeling very brave, I determined to spend the night in this house, so as to save the long walk in the rain. Accordingly I climbed in through a window and prepared myself for the worst.

I had been there some time when I heard a noise outside in the passage and a loud bang at the door. My bravery suddenly departed. I trembled and went hot and cold by turns.

The noise continued, and after a time I found courage enough to go to the door armed with my umbrella. As I opened the door I heard a patter of feet. Cold perspiration was running down my back. What could it be? I stepped into the passage trembling in every limb, only to see half-a-dozen rabbits scampering down the stairs.

R. J.

Not a Ghost at all.

AN old Irishwoman who lives alone in a two-roomed cottage, went to the priest recently in a very perturbed state of mind.

"Sure me house is haunted, fadher!" she declared.

"Haunted? By what?" asked the priest.

"By a sperrit wid a wooden leg on him," answered the old woman. "Ivery noight for the lasht two wakes, whin Oi've bin in bed, Oi've heered him come shtumpin' along the road. He shtops at me dure, lifts the latch, shuts the dure behoind him, an' crosses the front room into the back wan. In the mornin' the dure is as Oi locked it the noight before. Oi want you to dhrive him off wid the howly wather, fadher."

"Very well," said the priest indulgently, for he knew the old woman was in her dotage.

That night as he sat in her house, he as well as she heard a wooden-legged person come along the road, open the door, and cross the outer room to the inner one, where the father and old lady sat. A big man with a wooden leg stood before them.

"Patsy!" shrieked the old woman. "Me bhoy! Where have yez been this fifteen year?"

"Soldierin', mother!" replied the ghost, clasping the old woman to him, "Oi lost me lig at Colenso."

W. J. O.

What a Relief.

JIMKINS had a habit of keeping late hours, and although his better-half made it uncomfortable for him at times, she failed to cure him of his nocturnal home-comings.

At last she hit upon a plan to frighten him, and so when he staggered in one night at his usual hour, he saw a white shrouded figure gliding towards him along the passage in the moonlight.

"Wh—wh—w—w—what's that?" gasped Jimkins.

"I am the family ghost," a sepulchral voice replied.

Jimkins heaved a sigh of relief.

"Great Scott!" he said; "how you frightened me! I thought 'twas the missus."

Then the storm broke.

H. E. L.

The Shade of Trouble.

AT a Christmas gathering in a country house we were all sorry that Mr. Gill, a popular young curate, could not join us for a few days. His fiancée, Lily Sweet, was especially disappointed.

However, at the last moment he wired to say he could come, after all; and as another guest had been given his room, there was no choice but to put him in the haunted room—the only one available.

He arrived at five o'clock, and during the evening was the life of the party, and laughed at Lily's fears respecting the uncanny nature of his apartment.

Next morning he did not appear at the breakfast-table, and we went to his room; but, finding the door locked, we finally broke it open—to find the room empty and looking as though no one had slept there.

Naturally, we were much mystified and alarmed at this strange occurrence, especially when nothing of his whereabouts could be ascertained; and great was our horror when news came a few hours later from his home saying that the poor young fellow had been found dead in his bed on the previous morning!

We then realised that our guest of the night before had been none other than our friend's spirit.

CISSIE.

A False Alarm.

I AM a traveller, and one winter evening I put up for the night at an old inn at Leek, in Staffordshire. I sat by the fire, and, in order to keep out the cold, I am afraid I drank a good deal of my landlady's old ale. However, I fell asleep.

When I awoke, the room was pitch dark. The wind howled outside. I rose shivering, and looked out of the window. Great Kruger! what a sight met my eyes. There, dancing about, first assuming one shape and then another, was a perfect army of spectres representing different parts of the human body.

Digitized by Google

Here was a long, white, headless body frantically waving its long, skinny arms; there a pair of legs, minus the feet, dancing as if crazed. Farther on was a smaller body like that of a child. The air seemed full of them. Presently there came a wild gust of wind. One of the bodies seemed to detach itself from the rest and fly straight at the window. I gave a fearful shriek. The landlady rushed in.

"Look, look!" I gasped, pointing to the window.

She looked, then turned to me with a pitying smile.

"Well," she said, "what's the matter? That's only the washing out to dry."

J. C.

Only a Cat.

A WEEK or two ago there was a ghost scare in a small village in the North of England. Strange noises had been heard for two or three days and nights in an old disused cottage.

One night the villagers determined to hunt the ghost down. They nearly all turned out. Some had pitchforks, others spades, hammers, knives, or anything they could use as a weapon. But when they reached the cottage and heard the rattling inside, none of them dare enter until the village constable came on the scene.

He burst the doors open, and ran the ghost into a corner of the cottage, when he found that it was not a ghost, but a cat. It had got its head fast in an old salmon tin, and in trying to extricate itself had dragged the can over the stone floor, making the strange noises that had frightened all the village.

The cottage is now always known as the "Haunted House."

W. J. B.

No Longer a Sceptic.

UP to a few years ago I was a disbeliever in the so-called ghost story, and put no faith in the tales. I often heard of meetings with shadowy forms, death warnings, second-sight visions, and such like. That there is something in these, however, I must now admit, reluctantly, perhaps, yet having had a personal experience, I can no longer claim to belong to the ranks of the sceptical.

What I am now about to relate is no mere creation of my brain, but actual fact.

I ought to say that my wife, with whom this story is more immediately connected, has all her life been more or less superstitious.

In the summer of 1889 I was spending a short holiday at Anstruther, Easter, in Fifeshire. I was accompanied by my wife and two children, and we had a comfortable room rented from an elderly couple, who appeared to have been at one time in better circumstances. They had a little granddaughter staying with them, a girl of fourteen or so.

One night towards the end of our holiday we retired to rest about eleven o'clock, and I very soon fell asleep. I was awakened by my wife some two hours afterwards asking me to get up and strike a light, as she fancied someone was in the room. I lay for a moment and listened, and hearing the little granddaughter cough in the adjoining room, the door of which was slightly open, I called out:

"Are you sleeping, Jeannie?"

"No," she replied, "but I wish you would light the lamp, as I think there is something in my room."

I sprang out of my bed at once and put my hand on the box of matches on the mantel-shelf.

As I did so a man brushed past me in the direction of the window. His face was towards me, and I recognised the features of my wife's father. My wife must also have seen him, for she called out:

"Oh, that's my father."

The sweat broke out on my forehead and ran in streams down my face. I replied:

"It's nothing; you've been dreaming, dear," but she was not to be put off, and there was no more sleep for either of us that night.

Next morning we had the following telegram from my wife's sister:

"Father died last night about twelve."

E. C. C.

"Robert" as a Ghost.

I SLEPT in a room over a shop, and was the sole occupant of the premises during the night. I had sunk, as was my wont, into a deep, refreshing sleep. Suddenly I awoke, to find that my hair was going up, and my courage going down.

For a moment, I was spell-bound with fear, for a strange, unearthly light pervaded the room, proceeding, as I quickly perceived, from a ball of blinding light, about the size of a cricket-ball, suspended in mid-air at the further end of the room.

I sprang up, quivering with horror, gazing at the eerie, staring eye of light. It moved—it was coming nearer! My blood ran cold, and I was gasping for breath, when a hoarse voice grunted out:

"It's all right, guv'nor; only you've forgotten to lock the shop-door!"

It was the policeman with his bull's-eye lantern! I believe I put my arms round his neck and embraced him when I discovered it wasn't a ghost after all.

A. H.

A Startling Visitor.

THERE is a castle in Gloucestershire where a strange thing happened some years ago, and in broad daylight, too, which makes it the more interesting.

Two ladies were sitting in the morning room after breakfast, one on each side of the window, facing each other. They were engaged on their embroidery, and not talking or thinking of ghosts.

All at once the lady of the house saw a strange sight, which startled her beyond measure. Being possessed of great self-control, she restrained herself and glanced at her companion. This lady was pale as death, and evidently greatly alarmed.

"What is the matter?" asked the hostess.

"What! Did you not see the head and shoulders of that black man come up through the floor?" came the reply.

This was exactly what the hostess had seen.

Subsequent investigation revealed the existence of a walled-up cellar below, in which was a skeleton evincing all the peculiarities of the negro type.

J. B. C.

Digitized by Google

CHEE-WING-SU, MANDARIN.

BEGINNING at Shangtung, in the Yellow Sea, the coast line of China is dotted with Islands clear down to Hongkong, a distance of over 2,000 miles.

If the islands were counted I believe they would number 10,000, great and small. While some are uninhabited there is not an honest community on one of them. The people are wreckers and pirates to a man, and woe betide the ship which meets with disasters on any of the island shores.

From Yang-tse-Kiang to the entrance of the Straits of Formosa the islands are under the jurisdiction of a mandarin at the above port.

In the year 1868 this mandarin was one Chee-Wing-Su, who had held office for years, and his reputation was that of a devil. There was no question but that he encouraged piracy and got his share in the spoils and his orders all along the coast line were to kill every white person who might fall into the hands of his subjects.

The fellow was subordinate to the Government at Shanghai, but whenever he was brought up on the complaint of a European consul he managed to get the best of it.

He was fairly well educated, a finished liar and hypocrite, and there was no catching him.

In the year I have mentioned above certain Englishmen in Hongkong decided to fit out an opium clipper to supply the port of Shanghai.

Opium smuggling was against the law, of course, and any person found engaged in the trade was beheaded at once, but you might as well try to keep rice as opium out of China.

The profits in smuggling have always been enormous, and it has always been part of the business to bribe the custom officials. As Shanghai was to be supplied from Yang-tse-Kiang I was sent up to arrange matters with Chee-Wing-Su.

There was no beating about the bush. I told him what we wanted, and he lost no time in giving me his figures.

For so much per cent. he would guarantee us safety. He was smooth and suave, but under the polish I saw the hypocrite and tiger.

I accepted his terms for the company, but I also warned them that he would not hesitate to play any sort of game for his own benefit. He gave us a flag to protect us from piratical junks, but we did not trust to it.

The clipper was fitted out with four guns and well provided with small arms, and the crew of eighteen was made up entirely of Europeans.

On our very first voyage, despite the old scoundrel's flag, we were twice attacked by junks which he probably sent out. We sent both of them to the bottom with their crews, and, although Chee-Wing-Su must have heard of the tragedies, he passed them by without a word.

We had run three cargoes when the old fellow prepared a surprise party for us. He sent for our captain and changed the place of landing to an island about fifteen miles further south. He claimed that the officials at Shanghai had got wind of our business and had set a watch, though he and the captain did not believe the story, agreed to make the landing-place on the next voyage. We made the bay at night as we returned, but the guns were double-shotted, the muskets and pistols loaded and every man was at his post.

The first thing we knew we were surrounded by five junks, and then a fight began which lasted forty minutes. We sunk four of the junks and drove the fifth ashore, with the loss of but three men on our side.

Next day Chee-Wing-Su appeared on board and pretended to be very excited and indignant that we had been molested against his orders.

In the fight we had exterminated at least a hundred of the vermin, but had captured unhurt and were holding ten others.

To try to smooth things over with us the wily old scoundrel had the ten brought before us, read them a lesson on morality and then had their heads struck off by his own executioner.

Our landing-place was to be Yang-tse-Kiang again, and Chee-Wing-Su put up another job. To restore our confidence in him again he offered to put £500 into our next venture and draw out only a fair percentage.

This seemed like a fair thing, and it was accepted He handed over the money with promptness, and we sailed away, but when our captain had had time to turn the matter over in his mind he began to wonder and theorize.

Old Chee-Wing-Su would never have put in his money without some stronger motive than a per cent. profit.

Few Chinese ever trust a European a shilling's worth, and a man of his class must have handed over his little fortune to throw dust in our eyes. A good deal of time was given to the puzzle, but just what his scheme was could not be satisfactorily solved. We could only watch and wait and be prepared for whatever might happen.

On our return we always made port at night. When we had displayed an agreed signal, sampans came off to us and unloaded and took away the cargo, and an agent was on the spot to pay for it.

Chee-Wing-Su's agent was also there to collect his blackmail.

There would be thirty Chinamen aboard of us when discharging cargo; but, though they were a villainous lot, we felt no fear of them and did not keep the crew even under arms.

We were within a day's sail of port on our return when the captain was struck by an idea. Chee-Wing-Su knew that our cargo would be a heavy one. Suppose he should have planned to capture the clipper in harbour.

All he had to do was to put men enough aboard, and when he had exterminated the crew and taken possession who was to betray him? He had men who could sail the craft, and by giving her a new coat of paint, a new name and making some changes in her rig she could not be recognised. Even if she were, what would her owners dare do about it? To have set up a claim would have been to convict themselves of smuggling. As for wiping out a score of Europeans, he would consider that as a sort of duty under any circumstances.

Before we made harbour everything was prepared and every man instructed.

In response to our signal a dozen sampans appeared, and the first man on our decks was the rascally old Chee-

Digitized by Google

Wing-Su. He was effusive, good-natured and as obsequious as possible. He said there was cause for haste in unloading, as the custom officials had suddenly become active, and he was permitted to order about fifty men on board to discharge the cargo. So soon as our anchor was down all but two or three of our crew disappeared, and the captain and agents sat down to a luncheon in the cabin.

Not a box had yet gone over the rail when the Chinese on deck broke loose.

In thirty seconds every man but the captain was sailing into them. They were armed with knives only, while we had cutlasses.

No firearms were used.

The fellows made a good stand for about five minutes, and then we began driving them. No quarter was given.

When the last living yellow devil went overboard, there were thirty dead ones on our decks. Of course, the row was heard in the cabin.

At the first sound Captain Walters laid his revolver on the table before him and said to Chee-Wing-Su:

"There seems to be some skylarking going on above, but we will not interfere with it."

"If my men are creating any trouble, I must go up and stop it," replied the old pirate.

"Your men are all right, and you will remain here."

They heard the sounds of battle and knew that the Chinamen were being driven overboard, but the captain talked about the voyage and the profits and pretended ignorance of the real state of affairs.

When the fight had ended, the anchor was lifted and the clipper sailed away out of the harbour. Chee-Wing-Su played the hypocrite at first. Then he blustered and threatened, and in the end he broke down, and became disgustingly abject.

The agent on board with him was in the plot. He refused to give it away at first, but when he knew that death was the alternative he talked fast enough. The game was to seize the clipper and cargo and murder us all, and if we had not been on our guard it would have been carried out to the letter.

We made a run for another port.

Chee-Wing-Su made a big offer for his life, and as a matter of law we had no right to punish him. I must tell you however, that law or no law, he was hung by the neck to the yardarm, while the agent was landed on an uninhabited island.

It was a high-handed thing to do, you will say, and yet the governor of Shanghai, who could have been bribed any time for five pounds and who hadn't an honest hair in his head, issued a proclamation and publicly thanked Providence for removing a bad man from earth.

A few months later he somehow got knowledge as to who owned the clipper, and he seemed inclined to make a fuss, but with my own hands I carried him fifty pounds, and he laughed and grinned and rubbed his hands together and let the affair drop there and then.

C. B. LEWIS.

CREATION AND DESTRUCTION.

ELENA BORONI stood before her mirror, her face and eyes betraying the greatest excitement. It was a great scheme, one which it pleased her fancy to carry out, and she determined to do it. But would he agree?

Could he refuse? The idea was absurd! No man would refuse to marry Elena Boroni, the accomplished prima donna, concerning whose exquisite singing all Italy was raving; to suppose, therefore, that Giacomo Vitala, the struggling artiste, would form an exception to the rule was ridiculous.

Elena was doubly gifted by nature; she was beautiful in face and figure, and her voice was declared by the critics to be superior to any other that had been heard in Europe during the past century. She had made her début one short year previously, and she was the idol of the music-loving people of sunny Italy. But she had a defect which is not uncommon among the highly gifted; she was nervous to the last degree, always wanting something fresh. Moreover, she was of a passionate temperament, quick to change from one sentiment to another, capable of loving intensely and hating fervently.

The scheme which she had imagined was this: Giacomo was a young man about her own age—twenty-four—and possessed of a voice which was capable of being made equal to her own; but he had not received proper training and this barred his chance of success. He had had a few small engagements, and she had heard him sing at a private entertainment, when she had recognised the quality of his voice. She proposed that he should marry her, that she should train his voice and then secure for him, with the aid of her undoubted influence, engagements at the best theatres and concert halls.

It was the kind of plan that would only originate in the brain of, and commend itself to, such a wilful, nervous, imperious woman as Elena Boroni; but, having conceived it, she was not likely to allow anything to prevent her from carrying it out. What a couple they would make!

With such a woman the old proverb about the will and the way holds good to the fullest extent, and she was aided in the development of her scheme by the fact that Giacomo Vitala had worshipped her in secret. In a little while the world was startled by the announcement of the marriage, and then began the preparation for the act, when they should figure as the supreme stars of the musical firmament.

Giacomo's training proceeded apace. Elena taught him with unabated zeal and watched his progress as a painter watches the evolution of the portrait which he is creating, or the sculptor watches the divine figure into which he is transforming a block of marble. Giacomo was an apt pupil—had he been otherwise the whole plan would have fallen to the ground, for Elena was not a patient woman and ill-fitted for the position of teacher: as it was, her joy and admiration—we may, perhaps, say her love—increased in accordance with his progress. He was her creation, she was bringing into existence a grand singer, just as the sculptor creates and loves the beautiful image which is gradually formed under his chisel.

"You will be great, you will be divine, my Giacomo!" she would exclaim ever and anon. "There will be none to compare with us; we shall stand apart from all the world, above all the world, worshipped and envied!"

Digitized by Google

Giacomo's heart swelled with pride; he would be on a level with the one whom he had worshipped—and envied! His ambition, the one desire of his life, would be gratified, and he would be one of the very few to whom it is granted to excel.

Slowly, but surely, the inevitable was approaching; Elena, in the enjoyment of her task, never imagined that she might be preparing for herself a whip that would scourge her own back. Giacomo, actuated by his all-absorbing ambition, studied and worked hard to perfect his voice for the sake of the position it would give him rather than for the pleasure it would afford to his wife. And as he approached perfection, so his worship of her, his admiration for her, dwindled away, and he began to feel that he was on a level with her.

Elena perceived nothing of this; she was as delighted as a child with the success of her experiment, and when at length the time arrived when she could obtain an engagement for him with the certainty that he would be immediately successful, her joy was unbounded. Her creation was complete; she had made a great singer and she was happy.

On the night of his first appearance—for she ignored his earlier efforts—she was not content to remain on the side of the stage; she must have a box, so that she might witness the triumph to the full. Her triumph! Giacomo had no personality for her; he was her toy, and any triumph that resulted from a display of his ability was hers.

Giacomo's singing created a sensation, and his reputation was assured. From all parts of Italy came offers of high fees for his appearance at concerts and equally advantageous proposals to take various leading parts in well-known operas. Elena and he played together and sang together, and became the leading lights of the musical world, as they had anticipated. For four months this continued, and then there came a change.

Elena perceived with growing dissatisfaction that her husband's reputation and popularity were exceeding her own. She could not realise this at first, and smiled at the absurdity of the idea that had crossed her mind; but, as time went on, the suspicion became a certainty, and she turned pale and cold with anger and jealousy. Giacomo himself furnished proof of the truth of her conviction, for, feeling that he had attained his ambition, his sentiments towards her underwent a change, and he wished that he were free. She was always with him, depriving him of the full extent of the glory that should come to him; he wanted to appear alone so that he might overshadow all. How can the full light of a star be seen when another star of equal—nay, almost equal—magnitude is shining near it?

Giacomo was surpassing her! This was a condition that she had never imagined, and once she was sure of it Elena set to work to undo what she had done. Fierce jealousy and hatred consumed her until it was with difficulty that she restrained herself from putting an end to this competition by violence. The dagger or poison would have been easy methods of regaining her supremacy, but there were two objections—Giacomo would never know that his light had failed, and the consequences to herself would be serious. Some other method must be adopted.

She must ruin him by destroying the fulness and richness of his voice, pretending all the time to be stricken with grief at the deterioration, and encouraging him to persevere and to fulfil the engagements which she would assist in obtaining for him. She would allow him to sing apart from her, in order that she might from a private box enjoy the full measure of his humiliation and misery. As she had raised, so she would degrade him.

She employed every insidious artifice which her cunning brain could originate; she mixed drugs in his drinks and in his food, contrived that he should be exposed to unfavourable weather and draughts, and incited him by artfully-uttered taunts to strain his voice in practise at the very time when he should have nursed it. In this way also she made him fulfil engagements when his voice was not in a fit condition, and thus began her task of humiliating him and ruining his reputation.

Giacomo was so filled with pride about his own accomplishments that he could not imagine a fall from his high estate; he therefore fell readily into the traps set for him by Elena, and shut his eyes to signs of disapproval that were obvious to everyone else.

Step by step the descent was made; offers came less quickly, and Elena had to exert all her influence to obtain them. When she judged the time ripe for so doing, she changed her tactics, and began to make stinging remarks to Giacomo concerning the decline of his popularity and the failure of his voice; but this was not done in too pronounced a manner. Secretly enraged by these taunts, Giacomo sang in public at every opportunity, giving his services in aid of charitable institutions and singing at church, so that he might keep himself well to the front. All this merely aided the development of Elena's scheme.

He was engaged for a grand evening concert at Milan, and Elena seized this opportunity to compass his final overthrow. She had declined to sing herself on some pretext, and occupied a prominent position in the theatre. Anyone observing her closely would have noticed that her face betrayed considerable anxiety, and that she cast many and frequent glances at all parts of the auditorium.

Giacomo appeared and sang; his voice was in a distinctly bad condition and those among the audience who had admired him at his best were pained at the change and murmured to themselves, or to one another, their regret that he had not declined to appear. Elena's face changed continually in expression, when she looked at Giacomo there was triumph in it, but when she turned to the audience there was anxiety.

At last the song was finished. Giacomo's few friends heaved sighs of relief as the last notes were uttered. But suddenly, as Giacomo was about to bow before retiring a volume of hisses burst upon his ears. They came from all parts of the house, and seemed to lash him like so many whips; he started, turned deathly pale and glared about him. Then his wild eyes rested on the triumphant face of Elena and he seemed to comprehend it all. With one hand clutching his forehead he staggered from the stage.

On the following day the newspapers contained a report of an outrage on Elena Boroni—she was still known in the profession by her maiden name; she had been discovered senseless on the floor of her room at the hotel, her face disfigured by a terrible wound, which would prevent her from ever again appearing on the stage. She could not say positively who her assailant was, but she did not hesitate to give expression to her suspicion. Giacomo disappeared after the concert, and was never heard of again.

GEORGE KNIGHT.

Digitized by Google

FORE-ARMED.

SARA FORESTER, rising from the writing-table in the oriel window and giving an admiring glance at the stately proportions of "Sir Walter's Room," wondered for the second time as she crossed its breadth to go downstairs for tea, that the nerves of Lord and Lady Selhurst should be weaker than their appreciation of the beauties of so fine an "interior," was strong. They had arrived at Carmel Abbey, she had learnt, before luncheon, to increase and perfect one of the house parties Lady Lucy Gascoigne was fond of collecting together from Monday till Saturday in the country, but within an hour of their arrival had heard through the gossip of a maid that the room they had been installed in, was reported to be haunted, and had transferred themselves to a modest room in the west corridor destined for Sara herself. Sara, arriving later, found herself in succession to their retreat, possessed of the importance attaching to the tenant of the state-room on the central staircase, next to that of her host and hostess, a position, as false ones often are, essentially, if ephemerally, desirable.

The laughter and gossip of a mixed party greeted her as she entered the oak parlour. The house party completed by the recent return of the hunting contingent, was broken up into knots.

More than one group of men lounged about the room where a side-table, supplied with liqueurs, spirits, and potash, supplemented the tea and cakes that were calculated to last the ladies long beyond any legitimate dinner-hour. To the two or three in attendance at the tea-table, was added at the hostess's summons, a fair man, the perfect fit of whose cords and tops detracted indirectly from his undeniable good looks, by necessarily dividing any appreciative observer's attention with them.

"Come and tell Miss Forester about to-day's sport and to-morrow's fixture, Captain Gower," called out Lady Lucy, "she is our riding lady."

Captain Gower, between draughts of whiskey and seltzer, plunged at once into descriptive detail, while, with the double action of which bright wits are capable, he criticised Sara's expressive face, deciding half-a-dozen times, in less minutes, for and against her claims to beauty. On his own possession of it, every woman he had ever met had decided as she bowed to him, but he had the indifference to abstract beauty not uncommon with men possessed of it in an unusual degree, and Miss Forester's piquant face, with its wide mouth, short nose, and square little chin, took his fancy strongly.

"It's a big country," he said, "and you will like it. Does Gascoigne mount you? Ah, then you will be sure to go. Lady Lucy, what does Miss Forester ride to-morrow?"

"Don't ask me!" answered his hostess in her high-pitched, merry voice. "I know nothing, ask Frank. By the way, isn't he in?"

They found him at the bottom of the gravel pit, side by side with his horse.

"We left him at the 'Coach and Horses,'" laughed Captain Gower in return. "He says there is only one thing he can't get in his own house—a decent glass of beer."

"Was Charles Benham out to-day?" asked a new arrival.

"Out and got a crashing fall; no bones broken, though. It ought to frank him for the rest of the season, I suppose?"

"Should do," said Fred Somers. "By the way, who is his heir when he comes to his inevitable end? does anyone know? He has no near relation."

"I am willing to run for it," observed Captain Gower, glancing at Sara by an impulse for which he would have been puzzled to account. "Who'll back me for the prize? I've never seen the man, understand."

"Ten thousand to one against it," said Fred Somers.

"Not a sovereign more than fifty," corrected Mrs. Mercer, a lively habituee of country houses. "All the world knows Captain Gower's luck, and that the only certainty is what is unexpected."

"My chance should be better," said Lewis Gascoigne, a younger brother of the squire. "We were all one two hundred years ago; more by token Benham grows more like our mutual great-grandfather every day."

Digitized by Google

"The likeness to Sir Walter is very striking," added Lady Lucy. "They were all talking of it last time he dined here."

Miss Forester, though a little puzzled, listened to these furtive remarks with interest. The subject of them was known to her by name through a family feud, which had hitherto made any mention of it sound like a fog horn through the dense moral atmosphere bound to prevail at the time.

Her father and the Benhams had been cousins, but she was entirely ignorant of the cause of an estrangement so complete that in the second generation Charles' ownership of an estate in North Midshire had been a reason for Mr. Forester objecting to his daughter's visit in the same county. It is not necessary to particularize it here.

The origin of a family feud is wont to be insignificant and have its root in some spirit of greed or vanity that has spread from its root to a size that alone gives it importance.

Whether a question of game preserving, legacy hunting, or trespass, the feud has thriven and spread, and for years the Foresters and Benhams had only had that kind of interest in each other that a Servian may have in Bulgar, or some pious theologian in the devil. It is necessary to know the enemy's position.

Youth being at its best perverse, Charles Benham and his bruising form of horsemanship was still occupying a place in her thoughts when, after the distractions of comic songs, dressing, and a parade across two intervening reception-rooms, Sara found herself at eight o'clock seated next to Captain Gower before a pile of moss, ferns, and flowers, called conventionally the dinner-table.

An old acquaintance sat on her left hand, and it was not until the meal was half over that her new friend succeeded in attracting her attention. Then, with his eyes lifted to a painting on the opposite panel, he called her attention to it by the trivial-sounding remark:

"I have never made up my mind as to the taste that hangs one's ancestors as permanent witnesses of one's greediness."

"You wouldn't have family portraits in a dining-room, you mean," asked Sara.

"Yes; wasn't it put well?"

"Very," she answered, laughing, "in the form of a problem. But why should they be out of place?"

"Don't let us argue; but doesn't that handsome fellow opposite look supercilious, as if, having known the table loaded with sirloins and nut brown ale, he despised made dishes and hot-house flowers? I thought so last night."

"It is a beautiful face. Who is it?"

"Some ancestor of the Gascoignes, I know, and that's all. It's a face that sticks by one somehow, but you prefer blue eyes to brown?"

"Yes," she said simply, and then catching sight of the flash in his own, saw she had fallen into a trap. Nevertheless, for a few minutes the impression of his face drove from her mind the stronger one the portrait had produced.

The pictured cavalier regained his ascendancy later, however, and though the talk drifted down an easy current to the field and the chase, the grave eyes surmounting the straight lines of nose and moustache rested upon Sara throughout the meal, consciously to herself,

THIRTY SEALED ENVELOPES CLAIMED.

£300 ALREADY PAID.

THE Editor of Pearson's Weekly has sent out fifty men, each with a Sealed Envelope containing a letter entitling the recipient to the sum of £10. To secure one of these Envelopes it is only necessary to ask one of the Ten-Pound Men the question, "Have you got that Ten-Pound Note?" and at the same time to show a current copy of Pearson's Weekly. Full details of the scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

TEN TEN-POUND LADIES

have also been dispatched all over the country, each of whom will deliver up the Sealed Envelope to the lady who fulfills the conditions mentioned in Pearson's Weekly. No gentlemen need apply.

Copies of the song, "Have You Got that Ten-Pound Note?" are now ready, and may be obtained from all music-sellers and newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the Song Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free.

A prize of £10 is offered to the person from whom we receive the best anecdote relating to the Ten-Pound scheme. All attempts should be sent in envelopes addressed: TEN-POUND STORY EDITOR, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., before Monday, November 19th.

The following are the names and addresses of the winners of Ten-Pound Notes up to the time of going to press:

READING (No. 46).—In Market Square after football match, by Mr. R. Willoughby, Grove House, Vicarage Road, Teddington.
NORWICH (No. 1).—By Mr. H. E. Baker, 4 Beaconsfield Road.
LUDGATE HILL STATION (No. 33).—By Mr. John Lotan, 22 St. Anne's Chambers, E.C.
SOUTHEND (No. 27).—On the cliffs, by Mr. Charles Lee, 1 Agnes Terrace, St. Mary's Avenue.
WIMBLEDON (No. 36).—By Mr. R. Gautier, 132 Clarence Road.
BRIXTON, LONDON (No. 30).—In a private house, by Mr. W. W. Tonkin, 5 Grove Road, S.W.
SOUTHAMPTON (No. 12).—In a hotel smoking-room, by Mr. Charles Wright, 30 Oxford Gardens, N. Kensington.
LINCOLN (No. 9).—On a motor, by E. C. Baldock, 68 Portland St.
WORCESTER (No. 3).—By Mr. A. Welling, 12 The Foregate.
CITY ROAD, E.C. (No. 10).—By Mr. A. Bowman, 413 City Road.
PRESTON (No. 23).—In the street, by Mr. William H. Wayne, 19 Hurstfinch Road, St. Helens.
ST. ALBAN'S (No. 11).—By Mr. John Roe, Hatfield Road School.
SHEPTON MALLET (No. 40).—In the George Hotel, by Mr. W. Cotton, Coxbridge Street, Pennard, Glastonbury.
PLYMOUTH (No. 18).—In Union Street, by Mr. R. J. Martyn, 4 Albert Road, Morice Town, Devonport.
TEIGNMOUTH (No. 8).—By Mr. W. G. Hole, Teignmouth.
MOTHERWELL, N.B. (No. 44).—In the street, by Mr. Archibald Brown, Market Place, Carluke.
SAWBRIDGEWORTH (No. 21).—On a 'bus, by Mr. Albert T. Page, Sawbridgeworth, Herts.
MUSWELL HILL (No. 28).—In the street, by Mr. James L. W. Ash, 34 Cricketfield Road, Hackney Downs.
MAIDSTONE (No. 15).—In the post-office, by Mr. Charles W. Ward, 30 Milton Street, Maidstone.
EXETER (No. 19).—On station platform, by Mr. Albert House, 8 Lansdowne Terrace, Holloway Street.
TRAFALGAR SQUARE, LONDON (No. 5).—In Trafalgar Square, by Miss May Grammer, 154 Elgin Avenue, Maida Vale.
CROUCH END, LONDON (No. 37).—£10 card, in a private house by Mr. J. D. Southall, 38 Rosebery Gardens, Crouch End.
DUBLIN (No. 38).—At Nelson's Pillar, by Mrs. S. Fitzpatrick, 13 Killarney Parade, Dublin.
KINGSLAND, LONDON (No. 6).—£10 card, in a tobacconist's shop by Mrs. Pezaro, 86 High Street, Kingsland.
EASTBOURNE (No. 42).—£10 card, in a grocer's shop, by Miss Winifred Eldridge, 337 Seaside, Eastbourne.
GLASGOW (No. 43).—In the Central Station, by Miss Annie Hamilton, 12 Blythswood Drive, Glasgow.
LOUGHBOROUGH (No. 2).—£10 card, in a tobacconist's shop, by Mr. George Tyler, 35 Cattle Market, Loughborough.
TRAFALGAR SQUARE, LONDON (No. 20).—In Trafalgar Square, by Mrs. K. Redgrave, 14 Burnley Road, Stockwell.
BELFAST (No. 47).—At Oval football match, by Mr. John N. O'Hara, Grand Hotel Metropole, Belfast.
RUNCORN (No. 29).—£10 card in house, by Miss Kathleen Ormsby, Tower House, Greenway Road.

Digitized by Google

and followed her from the room with lingering watchfulness.

Lady Lucy, from the head of the table, was unconscious of Sara's divided interests. "That won't do at all," she thought, with a nod of her clever head that fortunately accentuated a political formula her neighbour was at the moment propounding.

"A younger son, and Sara without the ghost of a fortune except what she can get by marrying." Nevertheless, she was regretting the rigidity of the social necessities that frowned upon what she conceived was a mutual liking; though she was not going to yield her present scheme, now brought to its inital stage, without trouble, which was nothing less than the healing of a family feud and the marriage of a penniless girl to her wealthy cousin. Just now Rupert Gower looked like standing in Charles Benham's light.

Sara, unconscious of the game in which she was being played, went up to her room that night after an evening merry enough to have made her forget its character, and prepared for sleep with no more serious reflection than that suggested by the sight of the hunting kit set out for her use next morning.

She lay down in the canopied bed without noticing the waving of the tapestry that the draught from the chimney occasioned, and fell asleep at once.

The hall clock was striking three on a deep toned bell when she awoke, suddenly and completely. The firelight gleaming red and dull, only half lighted the moulded ceiling and heavily hung walls, but as she turned on her elbow away from it, a cavern of coals fell in and flamed up from the hollow with a glare as bright as day.

The figure of a man stood in the full light, his eyes fixed on her own. It was a steady, unemotional gaze, that precluded any suggestion of fear or surprise, and she returned it with a vague feeling of expecting him to speak. His face, with its dark eyes, seemed familiar, and as she looked she saw that he was the cavalier of the dining-room portrait,—but dressed and with the same perfection of detail—as Captain Gower had been when she met him a few hours earlier in the tea-room. His hunting crop was in his hand and his head was bare; a red line crossed one temple, and he raised his hand to it as he spoke: "The pace is tremendous," he said in a level and somewhat harsh voice. "Lie well away to my right."

"When?" Sara asked, and could neither have accounted for the question or its form.

"You hear the time," answered the young man. "His point Markdean. You will remember."

There was a long pause, during which his gaze seemed to sadden to the intensity of Vandyke's portrait, following Sara's as she dropped back at last on her pillow with the same wistful expression with which the pictured eyes had seemed to watch her from the dining-room.

She raised herself again. "You are hurt?" she asked involuntarily, for she did not feel as if he needed help.

"It is a mere nothing," he answered, "and the end is near."

There was such an intensity of expression in the harsh tones that Sara covered her face in her hands and shivered. When she looked up again, the place where he had stood was empty.

She was fully awake, and she set herself to consider whom she had seen and why he came. Real and yet unreal, alive and yet a figure of the past, his presence had been a fact and no dream. How had he entered the room, how left it, and who was he? No inhabitant of the Abbey, certainly no visitor; a modern sportsman as to his dress, an ancestor of the house by his features. Sara's conjectures became confusion, and she fell asleep.

The ideal hunting morning of song is not necessarily productive of good scent; nevertheless, proverbial sayings have weight, and the bitterness of a whistling north-easter is intensified by its direct opposition to accepted perfection in winds. A north-east wind with a rising glass was, it is true, approved of Huntsman Goodall, but when the Carmel party mounted on January 13th, the glass was, as it chanced, falling, and the biting wind was ferretting for its victims in every corner of the cloistered quadrangle. Rupert Gower lifted Sara on to her horse with an expression that was less orthodox than forcible, and during the short ride to covert divided his remarks between abuse of the blast and equivocal encomiums on his hunter.

"Grand water-jumper, but won't face timber; as fast as the mail, but pulls like anything; capital in dirt but money thrown away if you get on the hills," all of which pullings-off from the horse's value would have remained unrecorded in another mood.

Fred Somers, on Sara's other side, rode with his hat crammed down upon his head and the lids of his eyes lowered, so that their unfailing twinkle was invisible; but now and then a word of chaff, directed to Gower, escaped him, showing his cheerful spirit was undaunted; and, indeed, as one of that noble army of martyrs, "a one-horse," he was inevitably keen upon even the off-chance of sport.

The day was so opposed to social amenities that the Master put his hounds into Lower Shaw with exceptional punctuality, and the Carmel party, coming up ten minutes late, found the field scattered to likely positions for getting away.

Half-a-dozen foxes were on foot at once, but none seemed inclined to face the open, and the first hour and a half was spent in the woodlands with nothing more satisfactory to show for it than spasmodic, ringing runs along and across the rides, with a chopped fox as the result.

The master then made a move for a small wood at a distance of three miles, which lay in a promising hollow, was unexceptional in its harbour of a stout fox, and offered the best chance he could give his hounds of sport for the day.

Pipe's Spinney was, however, for once drawn blank, and a neighbouring gorse proved as unsatisfactory, while another draw roused a fox that took them straight back to Lower Shaw and was lost.

The fifteen minutes served to warm the blood of horses and men, and though there were some defections on the part of those who thought to save their horses for a better day, a strong field took the chance of an improvement in the afternoon, and followed the Master as he led them at a sharp pace towards a covert lying on the edge of his country known as "The Wilderness."

"The day seems changing," said Fred Somers, riding up to Miss Forester's side as they reached it, "and I suspect we've got one chance. This is the stiffest side, and if you like timber and we get away you'll be in luck. Your horse likes it I know."

Sara was just beginning a remark about the sudden dropping of the wind, and what was to follow, when a fox stole out of the covert a hundred yards in front of them, and with a sudden crash of music half the pack were at his brush.

Digitized by Google

"In luck, and no mistake!" said cheery Fred, ramming his hunting-flask into its case, while his companion sat down and let her horse go. For ten minutes the pace was fast enough to tell on the worst mounted, and when they checked on the plough and the first flight got a pull at their horses, Sara found herself one of half-a-dozen where fifty had been. Her host, Frank Gascoigne, was up, as were the Master and his wife, Gower, Fred Somers, and a powerfully built young man on a white-legged bay, for which Sara recalled having seen him, in the distance, exchange a clever cob he had been riding in the morning.

He was in front of her, and she was contrasting the ease of his seat with his breadth and apparent weight when Gertrude made certain of Bajazets' challenge, and the hounds swinging unexpectedly towards her drew a remark from the Master that gave her a shock of recognition.

"Markdean, as I'm alive!" he said to his wife.

"Never knew a wilderness fox make that point before," and then, with "Markdean!" in her ears, Sara found herself riding at a high thorn fence that was awkwardly broken by hedgerow timber.

Her perfectly-bitted horse flew it between two closely planted oaks, landing her in a grass field that was divided along its breadth by a stiff post and rails, over which she followed Fred Somers, all unconscious that Gower's anticipated failure at timber was to be localised by a heavy roll over behind her at the spot where she had had it.

She was on good terms with hounds, and had the quasi-satisfaction of seeing three riders drop back to her, while she and the Master, who was fifty yards in advance of her, followed the line at a pace that, good as it was, was unavailing to prevent the distance increasing between them and the flying hounds.

The "pace was tremendous." The phrase occurred to her just as the thundering of coming hoofs in the hard turf of the hillside they were breasting made her look round.

The white-legged weight carrier plunged past her, and as he did so the rider turned in his saddle and looked at her.

He had lost his hat as his horse crashed through the tree boughs at the thorn fence, and the broken cord was dangling at his back; his head was uncovered, and as he rode by, his forehead showed a sharp line across one side, where a branch had cut it.

He raised his hand to it, and as he did so Sara saw he was the horseman of her vision, even to the details of the low-growing hair and the expression of his eyes. At the same time his was the face of the dining-room portrait alive before her

Her horse sprang jealously after his, and for some seconds they were riding side by side, stretching up the sharp pitch that led to the sheep-grazed table-land across which the hounds were streaming. Her companion never turned his head, and yet as they galloped the words of the night before came to her as plainly as if he had spoken them. "Lie well away to my right. Remember."

The hounds were inclining to the left, when, far away down the opposite slope of the hill and blue with distance—an open, well-fenced country lying between—lay the dark line of Markdean Wood.

The Master was out of sight. Sure of his point, he had slipped down the hillside, and was riding to nick in with his hounds, while in the plain below a little knot of skirters were bent on overtaking him for the sake of his lead.

HE DIDN'T EAT THE DONKEY.

Ah, there's where it is, you see. It's not the work so much as the worry that knocks us out and sends us prowling about after drugs and doctors.

But how are we going to stave off the worry? You'll have to ask that question of a wiser chap than I am; it beats me.

"It was worry," Mr. Salsbury says, "that told on my health—worry and anxiety over my business. I got into a very low and depressed condition; the energy and snap seemed clean gone out of me. I was worried about this too—one worry on top of another.

"So I did what anybody would, in that shape; I went to see a doctor. He appeared bothered to tell what ailed me, and finally said he thought I was suffering from a weak heart, and gave me medicine on that theory.

"It did me no good, however, and I only grew weaker and more nervous than I was before. I was very constipated and my appetite kept dwindling away until there was hardly a rag of it left. I have heard of people starving from lack of victuals, and here I was—starving from lack of desire for food and power to digest it. In the end it's all the same.

"At last the doctor gave me some medicine to salivate me. It made my head, from the crown to below the eyes, quite black; and also my hands as far as the wrists. I can assure you I was a sight to look at."

Mercury, probably. A dangerous thing to put inside the human body. A man who knew what he was talking about once wrote a piece of poetry on this medicine. Here are the last four lines:

"And when I must resign my breath,
Pray let me die a natural death,
And bid the world a long farewell
Without one dose of calomel."

So say we all of us.

"I got so weak I could hardly lift my hands," adds Mr. Salsbury. "Then something helpful happened. A man threw into my house a pamphlet telling of Mother Seigel's Syrup. I read the book and sent for the Syrup, and on going to bed I took a big dose—away beyond the directions—a teaspoonful and a half. In the early morning my bowels were opened for the first time in a week.

"Then I felt hungry and told my wife I could eat a donkey and half his breakfast, but I contented myself with a meal easier of digestion. After that I got my strength and spirits back like hauling in a line.

"When the doctor called again he said: 'My word! but you are picking up.' I was, but the remedy was Mother Seigel's Syrup. After two bottles I was all right, and tackled by business with a light heart. All this came to pass when I lived in Grimsby."—W. G. Salsbury, Upgate, Louth, Lincs., December 19th, 1899.

Mr. Salsbury is now manager of Bellamy Brothers, Mineral Waters Manufactory, Upgate, Louth, and is well known there.

Digitized by Google

Sara and her companion were alone on the line, which led straight over the plateau, and down the further slope of the hill. He glanced back at her once as he topped a stone wall, though the plunging movement of his horse he could neither check nor guide called for all his attention. At the same moment a church clock in the valley struck three, and turning away from him, Sara was soon well away to his right, and on the right of the line of hounds.

She saw him no more.

Down the hill again, she was able to improve her position and ultimately, after another forty minutes of steady riding, in which the skirters had the best of it, she came up with the fast converging field, just as the hounds ran their fox into Markdean Wood in the South Midshire country. There he went to earth, and as it was impossible to dig and the horses had had enough, the Master, mindful of the time and of the fifteen miles that lay between him and his kennels, gave the word for home. As he did so, he glanced round.

"Where's Benham?" he said to Fred Somers, who was mounting again for the ride back.

"He followed the line up the hill, I fancy," returned Fred. "I have not seen him since the young one bolted with him, just after the hounds picked up the scent again."

"He's mad to ride that horse, I told him so," observed a member of the hunt. "He'll bring him to grief inevitably."

"I should shoot him at once," said another.

"Or send him up to Tattersall's 'to carry a lady,'" grinned Fred.

Rupert Gower looked at Sara.

"Was that your bruising cousin, then?" he asked. "You saw him last, I suppose?"

"He was riding the line to a yard, straight over the hill," said Sara. "I was on his right."

The Master turned in his saddle.

"Hounds skirted the gravel-pits," he said quickly. "I wish I had a horse to send back. With that young one he might be killed."

"He was quite out of hand," returned Sara, changing colour. "Captain Gower, can't we go back? My horse can do it, I am sure."

"Of course, if you wish it," Rupert returned. "We are miles from home, and Benham, I should fancy, is the sort of man to be able to look after himself; but——"

"Come," she said, and swung off at a trot.

* * * * *

They found him at the bottom of the gravel pit, side by side with his horse. He lay quietly on his back, with no appearance of injury, but his neck was broken; the horse, with a fractured shoulder, was a few feet from him, as if the violence of the shock on landing had crippled him, and the half roll-over unseating his rider, Benham had been pitched on the head, never to move again.

It seemed to Sara, as she sat by him with his head on her lap, while Rupert rode off through the falling rain for assistance, as if the only duty she could now do him softened the remembrance of the feud with which he was associated, and as she closed the eyes that had looked so strangely at her, the tears that fell from her own, if partly the result of physical fatigue and excitement, came chiefly at the thought that the pluck of the dead man before her must certainly have won for him her obstinate father's liking, if circumstances had not stood all his life in the way of their meeting. She was too kind-hearted not to regret the past ill-feeling, which looked as ill-feeling does when viewed by the strong light of eternity, small and pitiful to a retrospective eye.

So Charles Benham died and was buried, and Rupert Gower reigned in his stead. The will, upon which the Carmel guests had speculated idly, proved to be made absolutely in favour of the young cousin Charles had never wittingly seen and Sara found herself, as his heir, a rich woman and owner of the best appointed hunting-box in North Midshire.

Mrs. Mercer hugged herself on her acute reduction of the odds against Rupert, but Lady Lucy, who was speculative, puzzled herself untiringly over the appearance of Sir Walter Gascoigne, in the form of Charles Benham, to Sara in the room he had always been traditionally said to haunt.

Sara herself did not care to talk of it. The story was a tragic one to her, despite its happy ending, and for years she carefully avoided the hill where, one January afternoon, the sharp report of a gun had seemed to divide her life into two parts, as its charge sent the half-broken hunter to follow the Master whose death he had occasioned, into the unknown land.

AMES SAVILE.

MRS. SNIFFWELL: "Why, Bridget, you have been eating onions!"

Bridget: "Shure, mum, you're a moind reader!"

"SHE's a woman for people to rave over."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; she lives in a flat and practises singing six hours a day."

FOOTBALL WHO'S WHO.

Cloth, price 1s. net.

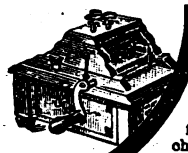
Post Free 1s. 3d.

Contains the biographies of nearly 1,000 of the best-known players, together with statistics and much general information relating to all the prominent Association Clubs. It gives information as to the various leagues, cups, and other trophies, rules, fixtures, etc., etc., and will be found invaluable to all followers of football.

Copies may be had from any Bookseller or from the Publisher,

17 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

Digitized by Google



THERE is not a musical instrument made that can approach the "Orchestral" for beauty of tone, cheapness, and ease of manipulation.

DRAPER'S

ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE

is a real organ in miniature, containing two full sets of reeds and three stops. Productive of wonderful variations of tone and effect. Can be played at sight.

A CHILD CAN PLAY IT.

PRICE 35/- A Marvel of Cheapness. Cash returned if unsatisfactory. Also supplied for Easy Payments. WORTH £4:4:0

THIS IS FREE!

Everyone can have a copy of our handsome new Catalogue of Organs, Jewellery, Watches, &c., FREE on application.

J. M. DRAPER,
Dept. 366,
Organette Works,
BLACKBURN.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once; they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s½d. tins.

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1	Cash Prize £50	£50 0
1	Cash Prize, £40	40 0
10	Handsome Pianos, in walnut, £40 each	400 0
5	Cash Prizes, £25 each ...	125 0
10	Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10	Ladies' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10	Cash Prizes, £10 each ...	100 0
20	Jones's Sewing Machines, £8 each	160 0
20	Cash Prizes, £5 each ...	100 0
50	Rolled Gold Lever Watches, £2 10s. each	125 0
100	Cash Prizes, £2 each ...	200 0
50	Dinner Services (56 pieces), £2 each	100 0
50	Folding Bed Chairs, £2 each	100 0
50	Ladies' Travelling Trunks, £2 each	100 0
200	Cash Prizes, £1 each ...	200 0
200	Ladies' Leather Hatboxes, £1 each	200 0
100	Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered, £1	100 0
400	pairs Blankets, 15s. per pair	300 0
200	½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large, 15s. per ½ doz. ...	150 0
200	½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small, 15s. per ½-doz. ...	£150 0
500	Ladies' Umbrellas, 15/- ea.	375 0
500	Gents' Umbrellas, 15s. each	375 0
400	Best Electro-plated Teapots, 15s. each	300 0
400	Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case, 15s. set	300 0
1000	Cash Prizes, 10s. each ...	500 0
1000	pairs Bed Sheets 10s. each	500 0
1000	White Linen Table Cloths, 10s. each	500 0
1000	Ladies' Umbrellas, 7/6 each	375 0
1000	Ladies' Leather Purses, 7/6 each	375 0
200	½-doz. Table Knives, 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200	½-doz. Dessert do., 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000	Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge, 7/6 each...	750 0
2000	Cash Prizes of 5s. each ...	500 0
4715	Ladies' Leather Handbags, 4s. each	943 0
4000	½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs, 2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000	Handsome Work-boxes, 2/6 each	500 0
25,602		£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write legibly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employees of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the largest sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize.

THE "GEO R. SIMS" HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO"

"While you wait"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY. 1s. 6d.

Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:

"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hairdressers all over the world, 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:
The Geo. R. Sims Co., 81b Great Queen St., London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Transposed Letter Competition.

First Prize	£5.
Second Prize	£2.
Third Prize	£1.

LIST No. 2.

AENP; GRLO; HSTU; EILV.

Here are four sets of letters, and prizes will be awarded to the competitors who send in the longest words containing the letters in each of their combinations.

For example, the following words contain the letters IST in their different combinations: fIST, ITSelf, SIT, STIpend, ouTSIde, adverTISe.

CONDITIONS.

1. Write your attempts on one side of the paper only, and keep until two other lists have appeared.

2. All words must appear in Nuttall's Standard Dictionary.

3. The letters of the combinations must either be underlined or put in capitals in the words in which they occur.

4. In the event of a tie, the prize will be divided.

5. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must enter on that understanding.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 229 to 234.

THE prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Mr. Percy Longhurst, of The Nook, Sutton, Surrey, his attempt being the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "Hagar of Homerton," by Mrs. H. E. Dudeney, has been sent to each of the following:

C. D. Stephens, Fratton, Portsmouth.
J. M. Child, Clarence Street, Derby.
D. G. Jelley, Cantwell Road, Plumstead.
Miss Emma Cheil, Gillingham Road, Gillingham.
A. Gresham, Bradstock Road, South Hackney.
C. H. Poynter, Exmoor Road, Southampton.
W. Gyde, Warley, Essex.
H. F. Birch, Boleyn Road, Stoke Newington, N.
F. Lucas, Paynes Road, Freemantle, Hants.
W. H. Glover, Brundrett's Road, Chorlton-cum-Hardy.

SOLUTION OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 235 to 240.

No. 235.

A R E A
R O A N
E A S T
A N T W E R P
E M I R
R I P E
P R E Y

No. 236.

C has M
H ydr A
A nge R
U tte R
C orollar Y
E lb A
R ampan T

No. 237. 660 inverted becomes 990, which, being divided by 3 fives 330, i.e., the half of 660.

No. 238.

L y R e
E m B roil
O r I son
H e N na Heilbron.

No. 239. "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

No. 240. Bon-bon.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ,, ...	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,, ...	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate. Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 6th, if intended for the issue on sale Nov. 20th, and dated November 24th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine 39/-

To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.
188B High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.,
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,
63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.
THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins.
½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin and Postage.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

A SUM

OF

from 12s. to 25s. per week.

can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere. Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, London.

Royal Magazine 4d.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

Photo. from Life. The original, with other fine heads of hair, may be seen at 113 Regent Street, London

KOKO
FOR THE HAIR

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

Is a tonic, cleansing, invigorating preparation, causes the hair to grow, keeps it soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, eradicates dandriff, prevents hair from falling, is the most cleanly of all hair preparations, and is perfectly harmless.

OLD PEOPLE LIKE IT

for its wonderful power to invigorate decayed hair, and induce an entirely new growth when that is possible.

MIDDLE-AGED PEOPLE LIKE IT, because it keeps dandriff away, and makes the hair grow thick and strong.

YOUNG LADIES LIKE IT

As a dressing, because it gives the hair a beautiful glossy lustre, and enables them to dress it in whatever form they wish, where it will remain.

CHILDREN LIKE IT,

Because it keeps the hair and scalp cool and clean, allays irritation, and keeps the hair in whatever position desired.

THEY ALL LIKE IT,

Because it is as pure as crystal, perfectly colourless, contains no poisonous substance, no sugar of lead, sulphur, nitrate of silver, or grease, and does not soil or colour the scalp, face, or the most delicate fabric in clothing, produces a wonderfully pleasant and cooling effect on the head, and no other dressing is needed to give the hair the most elegant appearance possible. Try it once, and you will use no other.

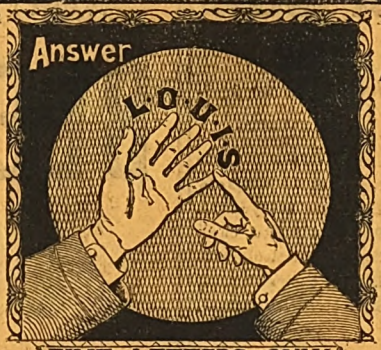
IT CONTAINS NO COLOURING MATTER OR DYE.

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL

VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

Height 11½in. Width 7in. Depth 5in.

THE "RYE" ALARUM 18/-

Brass Flag.

Carved Oak Battlement.

Enamel Dial.

"Seconds," "Hour," "Minute," "Alarum" Hands.

Polished Brass Mounts

Solid Oak Case.

OUR CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE IS ONLY 16/-

OR

FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

J. N. Masters Ltd. will send to any reader of Short Stories this 18/- Alarum on receipt of 2/6.

If you approve of it you send 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months.

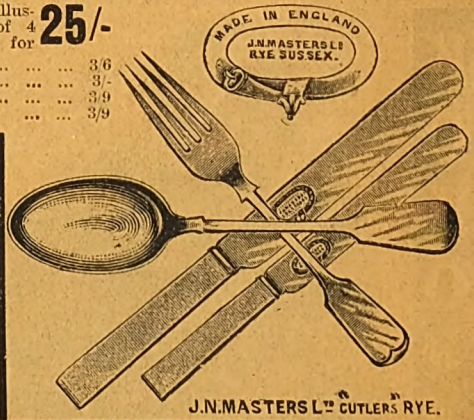
If you do not approve of it, we will refund the cash sent if Alarum is returned at once.

50 Articles (Illustrations of 4 of them) for 25/-

6	Table Knives	3/6
6	Dessert ,, ...	3/-
6	,, Forks	3/9
6	,, Spoons	3/9

OUR WHOLESALE CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE

For this 25/- parcel of cutlery is 22/- only.



J.N.MASTERS Ltd CUTLERS RYE.

OR

J. N. MASTERS Ltd. will supply any reader of Short Stories with this 25/- parcel of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:

You send us 2/6 deposit, and we will send you this 25/- Parcel on approval.

If you approve of it, you send 2/6 on receipt, and 5/- each month for 4 months.

If the Parcel is not approved of, we will refund your money if the Parcel is returned to us within 7 days.

EACH PARCEL CONTAINS

		Prices separate.
6	white Bone Table Knives...	3/6
6	,, ,, Dessert ,, ...	3/-
6	good quality Table Forks...	5/3
6	,, ,, Dessert ,, ...	3/9
2	,, ,, Table Spoons..	1/9
6	,, ,, Dessert ,, ...	3/9
6	,, ,, Tea Spoons ...	2/-
1	pair Sugar Tongs	1/-
1	only Sugar Sifter...	1/6
6	good quality Egg Spoons .	1/6
2	,, ,, Salt Spoons ...	1/-
2	,, ,, Mustard Spoons	1/-
50		29/-

J. N. MASTERS LTD., WATCHMAKERS, JEWELLERS, ETC., RYE, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

6 WINNERS IN FOOTBALL COMPETITION GET £16 13s. 4d. EACH.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 619. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 10TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

GIGANTIC BANKRUPTCY SALE CATALOGUE.

Re BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO., late of Old St., London.

F. HODGSON & SONS, of LEEDS, have purchased for Cash the whole of the business goodwill, and effects from Official Trustee in Bankruptcy. Illustrated Sale Catalogue of Brussels, Axminster, Velvet, and Foreign Carpets and Hearthrugs can be had Post Free, if mentioning SHORT STORIES, 10/11/1900.

4/6

To readers of SHORT STORIES, 10/11/1900. On receipt of Postal Order or stamps value (Regd.) we will send you the Largest Genuine Reversible Carpet in Brussels Finish, with Rug, ever sold at the Price direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, &c., bordered and woven in Brussels Patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember, these are woven, and are made of a material almost equal to wool.

Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.

SPECIAL OFFER.—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 8/-.

Prodigious sale of the "PRUDENTIAL"

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS

Admittedly The Marvel of the Age.

Woven and Reversible, rich Brussels and Turkey Patterns and Colourings, superior quality, with handsome Border to match. A Marvel of Excellence and Beauty. These Carpets are superb Imitations of real Brussels, and except by the closest scrutiny, the difference cannot be detected.

6 ft. by 6 ft.	2/11	REDUCED SALE PRICE.		6 ft. by 7½ft.	3/11
6 ft. by 9 ft.	4/5	7½ft. by 9 ft.	5/11	9 ft. by 9 ft.	7/6	9 ft. by 10½ft.	8/6
9 ft. by 12 ft.	8/6	10½ft. by 12 ft.	11/6	9 ft. by 15 ft.	12/6	12 ft. by 12 ft.	12/9
12 ft. by 13½ft.	14/6	12 ft. by 15 ft.	15/9	12 ft. by 18 ft.	19/6	12 ft. by 21 ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible Hearthrug (Reg.) to match, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd 1yd. A Stock of 10,000 Patent Wadded Quilts, Toraliums, or Bed Covers, Reversible (as illustration). Covered with Oriental Soft Sateen, and on reverse side another beautiful floral design. Size 56in. by 60in.

These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.

AT AN ENORMOUS REDUCTION TO CLEAR OUT.

Sale Price

3/6

each, postage 6d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER: 3 Quilts for 10s., or 6 for 19s. 6d., or 12 for 38s. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

F. HODGSON & SONS, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Allen Foster & Co.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

DESIGN No. 2130.

TEN-AND-SIXPENCE.

The Famous Sacque Back Coat and Skirt Costume can be ordered with the coat made double or single-breasted, produced in the Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth, all colours. It has a velvet collar, and the skirt is cut full with the box-pleated back—grand value for Half-a-Guinea. Testimonials from all parts. Securely packed, and sent carriage paid 6d. extra. This Coat and Skirt also makes up exceedingly well in the Pretoria Tweed or Melton Coating. Price only 17/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

10/6.

Design No. 2130.

PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 2131. 10/6

Write for NEW WINTER SKETCH BOOK AND CATALOGUE OF BARGAINS.

PATTERNS & ORDER FORMS POST FREE.

Ladies are invited to call and inspect goods at our new Showrooms,

47 Golden Lane, E.C.

Business hours 9 a.m. to 7 p.m., Saturdays 9 a.m. to 1 p.m.

DESIGN No. 2131.

HALF-A-GUINEA.

The Fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 30-in. long. Made in a superior Beaver Cloth in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a Chesterfield front with the new side pockets. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. The greatest value on the Market. Send for one. All sizes in stock. In sending order, give bust measurement under arms. Money returned if not approved.

DESIGN No. 356.

SEVEN-and-SIXPENCE.

The Latest Fashion in Skirts. The new pleated flounce skirts made in good Black and Navy Serge. Six rows of stitching down each seam—a very smart Skirt. Price only 7/6. Carriage 5d. extra. All sizes in stock. Send for one.

PATTERNS FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ASTHMA

WHY is it generally thought that there is no cure for Asthma, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, Shortness of Breath, BLOOD SPITTING, &c.?

BECAUSE the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive, Post Free, FREE OF CHARGE, particulars of the Famous WEIDHAAS' HOME TREATMENT, when applying to Paul Weidhaas, Hygienic Institute, 16 T.A., Buckingham Road, Brighton.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by his treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

No interference with daily occupation. Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET.

Read the following Testimonial, one out of scores received:—

BRONCHIAL ASTHMA (7 Years' Standing) CURED.

I am only a working man (bricklayer by trade), and out of eight years I had only been able to work a few weeks altogether. I feel that you have made my fortune, for it seemed as if I were never to be able to work in comfort again. For weeks and weeks before I came under your treatment I could not go to bed. When I did I could not think of lying down, but had to be propped up almost in a sitting posture. I can lie down now in perfect ease and comfort, and wake up refreshed and strengthened for my day's work. Hitherto I never woke up without a feeling of misery. Before the treatment to walk on level ground was sometimes hard work; now hills do not come amiss to me in the least. I used to feel as if I should drop with suffocation, and the slightest exertion or worry would make the attack worse.

Norwich. BENJ. E. GOWEN. (Full address on application.)

Mr. B. E. GOWEN. (From a photo.)

THE DIRECTOR is prepared to pay £1,000 to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patient's own letter. The original may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas' Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide inquirers.

CURABLE

COMPLEXION

Those who desire a nice white Skin, free from Blemish, should use CRICINE TOILET CREAM. It improves the Complexion wonderfully, and acts as a tonic to the skin. In two sizes, 2/6 and 5/-, post free. A sample 2/6 jar will be sent on receipt of 1/3 in stamps.

The CRICINE Company,
REGENT HOUSE, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years, by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lbs., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.

THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.

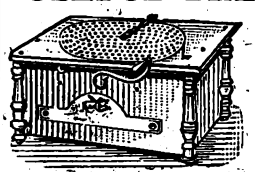
Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.

SOLE AGENT:
GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.
Price 2/9 post free.

HOME NOTES

1D. WEEKLY.

USEFUL PRESENTS.



HAND ORGANS from cash. Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 5s. P.O., if desired, balance 5s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS, CO, 1823 High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn. 20/-

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT.

PRE-EMINENT FOR 60 YEARS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 619.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending Nov. 10th, 1900.

GRANDFATHER'S WILL.

"There's nothing very much you can do, Miss Judith. Keep him quiet, and don't worry him about taking nourishment; as to the medicine, well, I don't think I'd urge it against his will. Likely to be a long affair? Well—no, my dear young lady, I fear not. We could hardly hope for a recovery at Mr. Warrington's time of life; eighty-two, did you say? Dear me, I hardly thought he was so old. Well, goodbye, my dear, goodbye, sure you wouldn't like anyone sent to help you? No—well, then, I'll look in again to-morrow."

Judith Warrington stood, and watched the doctor's phaeton out of sight. Far as the eye could reach, his was the only figure to be seen; along the wide expanse of moorland stretching beyond the fields ripe for the harvest, the heather, swayed in lazy undulating waves, filling the air with the sharp pungent odour inseparable from the breezy uplands of a moor-side farm.

The girl stretched out her arms, and took a long, deep breath, as though she could never get her fill of the spice-laden air. Presently, she moved towards the farmyard gate, stopping to pick a red carnation and a sweet-scented clove.

She was a well-made woman, tall, with long lithe arms, a supple figure, and a grace of movement, which, with the warmth, and depth of her rich colouring, were foreign to the fashion of beauty round Moorstables; the women of the district being for the most part, like their cattle, lean and brown.

She raised her face, to meet the full glow of the sun, curving her warm ripe lips into a smile, as the rays fell, hot as lover's kisses on her round white throat, and finely moulded cheek.

"I could almost fancy it was Dick," she muttered: then with a sudden frown, and change of attitude, she fell to plucking the petals of the flowers she carried, strewing them on the sun baked-path, with swift, relentless fingers.

"That's how I would like to serve Madge Bartlett though for all her pinky cheeks, and yellow hair, Dick thinks no more of her than thistledown," and she laughed in a defiant, mirthless sort of fashion.

The flowers destroyed, she went back slowly to the house. "Mollie," she cried, to a weary looking woman by the fire, "the Doctor says grandfather won't last longer than a while, he may go off at any minute."

All rights reserved.]

"Lord save us, you don't say so, Miss Judith, and you cousin Richard not at home, and master's will, and al beside, dearie me, it's sudden."

"What do you mean Mollie? I thought grandfather made his will last Christmas."

"It ain't a bit of good for you to look so fierce, Miss Judith, master tore up that 'one 'cos Richard angered him; I did hear tell, that the old man had left the farm to his cousin, Robert Stichell, master allus did cotton to him a bit,—being so near himself, he liked Bob's mean, close-fisted sort o' ways."

"You're not telling me the truth, Mollie, it's no good pretending you 'heard say,' you're keeping something back—something I mean to know. It's no use, Mollie, I'll make you speak before I've done; now, will you answer me or—" Judith's long fingers tightened on the woman's arm, gradually sliding down, until they clasped the thin, and withered wrist, turning and twisting, till the wretched creature screamed, though more in apprehension, than from actual pain.

"Will you answer?"

"Lord forgive me, you're a wicked woman, Judith," cried the poor old thing, "I promised master, and I'm skeered to break my word."

Judith leant forward once again, but with a shrill cry the woman seized her hand.

"I'll speak," she said, "Miss Judith—oh don't—don't; master sent for Lawyer Heydon one day when you and Dick were out. He left the farm to Robert Stichells, because he said 'Dick was a fool and you were worse,' and 'nary a one of you should have a penny,' and he made me sign my name—Margaret Hall—at foot of it, as plain as print. That's all, Miss Judith," she added as the girl stood sullenly before her, "you've a bad, black heart and if it wasn't for fear of what you'd do to master, I'd leave you all alone this blessed night, to see him die."

"You'd best take care, Mollie, grandfather's not dead yet, and if I tell him you've been talking of his secrets, he'd turn you out, as soon as look at you."

The woman shivered as if the girl's speech recalled some awesome memory, and watched the tall slight figure up the stairs, with a cowed expression in her faded, year-dimmed eyes.

Grandfather Warrington lay in a stupor, in the old

Digitized by Google

"It's no use, Mollie, I'll make you speak before I've done."

oak bed; lost to every other sense, he still retained desire for warmth, and even with the glorious August sun flooding the room, a small wood fire burnt brightly in the grate. Judith flung back the lattice window, and crouching on the floor, studied her face in the small glass which hung upon the wall. She picked a spray of clematis through the open window, and arranged it in her hair, and turning in the collar of her gown, tried to fancy she was dressing for a ball.

In the flush of youth and beauty, her health and strength seemed almost insolent in contrast with the old man on the bed—feeble, palsied, and yellow as a sun-dried pea. She turned her head and smiled at the comely face that even the cheap bit of mirror could not utterly distort, cast down her eyes, showed her white, even teeth, as the play actress had done, on one never-to-be-forgotten day, when she and Dick had stolen off to the fair, thereby incurring her grandfather's wrath.

"Get out, you good for nothing, idle hussy, get out I say."

The glass fell from Judith's hand, the flower tumbled from her hair, grandfather Warrington galvanised into life was watching her with his bright, beady eyes, keen as a ferret's.

"You're ill, grandfather," she retorted, "and ill people don't understand what they say, so I'll forgive you this time. Lie down," she added, threateningly, "or I'll make you."

The old man glared like a trapped fox. For years he had ruled Judith, and his whole household with a rod of iron. She was the daughter of a recreant son of his who had married "a foreign woman," and got served rightly—in the local opinion—for his pains; foreign, in this case, not meaning the native of another country, but merely of a distant Shire.

Probably the cold looks, and colder words with which she had been greeted, had something to do with the "foreign woman's" early death, for she died when Judith was but two years old, and her husband, having, apparently, exhausted all his strength in the one act of rebellion he had ever dared to perpetrate, deprived of his partner in revolt, died shortly after; and Judith was given, grudgingly enough, food and shelter, by the old man, together with Richard, the only child of his eldest son, who, with his wife, had died of a malignant fever, some years previously.

"Give me my stick," the old man muttered threateningly, but the girl moved it even farther from his side.

"You can't hurt me now," she said, "it's my turn this time, grandfather."

A light breeze had sprung up, and the fresh air, while it merely cooled the hot blood in the young woman's veins, chilled the sluggish current of the old man's life, until he shivered, and tried to draw the clothes up tighter round him.

Judith noticed the movement, and left her writing at the table, to pull the window to.

"Judith, I'm dying," the voice sounded hoarse and strained. "Give me some drink, some drink, I say."

She came leisurely to the bed side, and placed a document in front of the old man, then, quickly returning to the table, she held out to him a pen with one hand, and a glass of water in the other.

"Drink first," she said, "and then sign this, at the bottom. It's your will," she added, "leaving the farm to Richard. There's nothing mentioned in it about me. I want Dick to have it all. Sign grandfather," and she tried to force the pen into his trembling fingers.

He shook his head and motioned her away.

"You don't think you're going to better me, do you?" she said, "you shall sign, I say you shall."

With a sudden effort the old man sat up, his long gaunt arms stretched out, his face alight with ineffectual rage, and baffled anger. Suddenly, his lips parted in the ghastly mockery of a smile, a cunning leer clouded the brightness of his small black eyes, and a hoarse chuckle contracted the muscles of his throat.

"You were allus a smart girl, Judith," he croaked, "you've got the better of gran'father haven't you? You're a bonnie lass, my dear, a bonnie lass, but gold is better than good looks, my lass, better than good looks."

He peered at her from under the shawl, that was wrapped round his head, and chuckling in a hoarse, mirthless sort of fashion signed his name, in somewhat faint, but quite distinguishable characters.

"Gold buys love, my dear," he said "all the world over; and never a Warrington yet, except your father, simple fool, who didn't look at the setting of a pretty face, afore he took it."

For the first time, Judith grew frightened at her own daring, was it possible that Mollie had lied to her about the previous will, could grandfather mean that Richard would not marry her unless she had money? Visions of Madge Bartlett with her dowry of £200 flitted through her mind. "Grandfather," she said, "what do you mean, tell me, here—drink this," and she held the glass once more up to his lips. But with a strange accession of fury the old man dashed the tumbler to the ground.

Digitized by Google

"Get out," he screamed, "get out, or else I'll revile you,"

He raised his hand, his lips opened,—terrified at his gleaming eyes, and shaking head, the girl rushed to the door, and called for "Mollie."

He was still sitting up when the old woman came, and pointed to the document for her to sign. She obeyed his gesture unquestioningly, and then he pointed to Judith, watching her with a malignant grin, as she wrote in her clear firm hand upon the paper. Then once more the look of dulness settled on his face, covering it like a mask; he fell back rigid, and immovable, and so remained, until next night he died.

"I didn't think your grandfather would have gone off quite so suddenly," said Lawyer Heydon, to young Richard Warrington, as they drove over to the farm. "He was such a hearty looking man, that one forgot he was over eighty, I suppose."

Dick nodded, but not being at any time given to loquacity, made no other sign of comprehension. "It's a fine property," the lawyer went on, "a fine property and no mistake. The old man was bad to beat at a bargain, that I must say."

Dick smiled, and glanced round contentedly at the acres, and acres of cornfields, the hay stacks that filled the air with their faint sweet scent, the barns, and granaries groaning with plenty, against the background of the old farmhouse overgrown with clematis and honeysuckle.

She placed a document in front of the old man.

A tall figure was standing watching for them in the road, with eager eyes, and hot flushed cheeks, for hours Judith had been waiting there to catch the first sight of her cousin Dick.

The dog cart stopped at the rickety gate, and slowly and deliberately, the young man got out to meet her.

"Well Judith, my lass, and how are you?"

He was a tall loose-limbed man, with sleepy eyes, and a stolid face, which rarely changed its habitual expression of satisfied good humour. For the rest, his blood coursed somewhat sluggishly through his veins, which accounted for the torpidity of his emotions. Such as he was, however, Judith nourished for him an all-absorbing passion; Dick was to her another sun, giving forth even greater warmth and happiness than the god of the summer heavens himself.

The lawyer glanced at the pair of them, with his shrewd grey eyes. Like most men of middle age, he was even more susceptible to the influence of a pretty face than those who were less mature, and, while appreciating the force of beauty, could yet be tolerant to the faults of its possessor, even when they clashed with individual comforts. Throughout the country side Judith had no more sincere admirer than Lawyer Heydon, who was popularly supposed, to own no god but money bags, of which he had a goodly store.

Together they went into the old oak parlour, where Robert Stichells and Mollie were already waiting, the latter firmly clutching the will which Judith had forced her grandfather to sign the night before he died, and which no threats would induce the old woman to give up.

Lawyer Heydon opened the will in his possession and in his pleasant voice announced the disposition of the property.

"Margaret Hall," he stated, "had been already provided for, and to Robert Stichells was left his cousin's kindly wishes for increased prosperity. To Richard Warrington was bequeathed the farm, the money in the bank, and all the personal property; with a charge of £300 a year on the estate to be paid to Judith Warrington, in the event of the two cousins not marrying each other."

Dick stared abstractedly at the ceiling; had he been left to make his choice, Madge Bartlett would have been his selection for a wife, for as far as his slow brain ever decided anything, he had made up his mind some time ago, that when the old man died he'd "marry Madge." But even Madge could not be worth a sacrifice of £300 a year, and so he dismissed all thought of her, and accepted Judith's rapturous whisper, "Oh, Dick I love you so," with immovable serenity; after all Judith was a fine woman, and £300 was an awful lot of money.

For a moment the girl had forgotten the other will, but Mollie's shrill though feeble voice brought back the recollection with a quick, sharp pang—of course Mollie had deceived her, and told her about Bob Stichells in revenge for her unkind treatment; and her grandfather, wroth at her conduct, had let her have her own wicked wilful way to punish her, and at her own wish had signed away her—no, not her happiness, it should not be.

With a quick movement, she clasped old Mollie round the waist, and, in a low voice besought her to keep silent—she felt a sudden dread that Dick, if he once heard of the other will, would not wish to marry her—and she would die without him.

"Mollie, dear Mollie, listen, give it to me, I beg you."

But with a shrill cry the old woman pushed her back.

"Here's another will," she said, "that master made the night afore he died."

Digitized by Google

"All my property I leave absolutely and unconditionally to Richard Warrington."

"It's not in form," said the lawyer, with a pitying glance at Judith, "but I am bound to say it's perfectly legal." Dick brought his eyes down from the ceiling and smiled brightly. Decidedly Judith was a fine figure of a woman, but blue eyes, pink cheeks, and yellow hair were far more to his taste, and then Madge Bartlett had £200!

"I told you, that evil would come to you, Miss Judith," said Mollie in the high-pitched quavering voice of old age, "you've a bad heart and you'll have a bad end."

But Lawyer Heydon cut her short, and beckoning to Robert Stichells hurried from the room, leaving the cousins by themselves.

"Dick, you won't let it make a difference will you, dear? You do love me, don't you?"

"I can't say as to love, Judith, I allus thought you a fine figure of a girl, but £200 is a lot of money now-a-days—a lot of money, and a tidy fair-haired little body for a wife is something more to my taste than a woman over tall."

"Dick"—she panted, "you don't mean what you say—that girl—with her milk and water face and silly smile—to put her before me. Ah! don't punish me so sorely for my love. Mollie told me a black lie about grandfather's will, that he had left everything to Robert Stichells and so I made him sign another, leaving it all to you—because I loved you, loved you, Dick."

But that was more than Dick could comprehend; all he could grasp, was that his cousin Judith had forced his grandfather into doing something that he didn't like. That was sufficiently alarming to make him fear her for a wife, nay, she might compel—as by superior force of mind she had before compelled him to a course contrary to his liking—to marry her at once.

He edged away from her.

He edged away from her, and laid his hand upon the door.

"I'm just a bit knocked over, Judith; I'll see you by-and-bye, I'm going over to Madge Bartlett now."

And the tall, loose-jointed figure went stolidly out, and Lawyer Heydon, venturing at last, to look for Judith, found her white-faced, and despairing, huddled on the floor.

"I'm a wicked woman," she moaned, "a wicked woman, and I have been punished."

* * * * *

Moorstables had a deal to talk about that winter; first, grandfather Warrington's death, followed by his strange will, next, Judith's sudden journey to London, and Dick's marriage with Madge Bartlett; and as soon as that sensation had blown over, Lawyer Heydon astonished everyone by selling his practice, and disappearing from the county, leaving no clue as to his whereabouts.

Then, when that topic was exhausted also, the fact that Dick's wife was a shrew, and that Dick, himself, more often than not, sought refuge from her nagging tongue in the bar parlour of the "The Crown and Arms" furnished ample food for gossip, year in and year out.

But even that—engrossing, as it was, paled into nothingness beside the fact, that some one had bought the old manor house up the hill, a number of workmen being engaged pretty well all night and day to get it ready.

The new tenants arrived one summer evening, exactly four years after the death of grandfather Warrington, and all the world, his wife, and children, flocked to church the following Sunday to catch a glimpse of them.

"Who would have thought it, my word, but she's a beauty, looks like 'my lady' don't she? and as pleasant as possible, and so is he. Certainly Judith's done well and no mistake."

And if there was any lingering trace of doubt, or misgivings, in Judith's mind, as to whether she had "done well" or not, in marrying Lawyer Heydon—or rather Sir Alton Heydon, to give him his full title—(bestowed for distinguished political services)—if there was any lingering doubt, it was for ever dispelled at the sight of her girlish idol, Richard Warrington, who with a lagging step, sheepish and henpecked, followed his shrill-voiced red-faced wife. As he passed her, with a shamefaced sort of nod, she looked up at her husband—tall and dignified, the touch of snow among his crisp dark hair adding distinction to his presence. And as she met his eyes, all that was left of the old Judith, hard, cruel, and unforgiving, passed away for ever, leaving her heart simple, and trusting as a little child's.

"Alton," she said, "how could you marry such a wicked, wicked, wicked woman?"

He glanced at her fondly, her tall stately figure, her deep dark eyes, and clear cut face, always beautiful to him, but doubly so under the softening influences of her winsome womanly grace.

"My dear," he answered, tenderly, "I always loved you, even when you grieved me most; the Judith of long ago, an untrained and misguided girl, long since is dead, buried, forgotten, but, in her stead, is Judith, the woman I adore, my loving, tender-hearted wife."

J. K. PROTHERO.

Digitized by Google

A Thought-Reading Experience.

"Do I believe in thought-reading?" The detective repeated the question in his usual quiet and decided tone. "Certainly. I have done a little of it myself. Do I believe that it has any practical utility in the detection of crime? Well"—after a pause—"I think that the best way to answer that question is to narrate a personal experience, if you are willing to hear it."

We were quite willing to hear it; the suggestion pleased us greatly, for the evening was getting slow. The manner in which we expressed our desire was a plain indication to the detective to go ahead at once. He did so somewhat after the following fashion:

Mr. John Dixon was a commission agent in the City; he had what was termed a small suite of offices at the back of the first floor of a large building, but as a matter of fact it was really one large room divided into three by means of match-boarding. There was his own private room, the partitions of which were double and the door covered with green baize; then a kind of waiting-room, and beyond that was the largest apartment of the three, which was occupied by three clerks and a specimen of the indispensable office boy.

Mr. Dixon was one of the many men who prefer some other occupation than that in which they find themselves. He by no means neglected his business, but he was fond of machinery and spent a good deal of time in trying to devise some machine which would revolutionise something or other, he was not particular what. That was his ambition, and he worked away for the love of the thing, money being a secondary consideration.

One day Mr. Dixon made application for the services of a detective and I was told off for the job. Mr. Dixon thought it best that I should go to his office in order to be posted in the details of the robbery, and at my suggestion he let me into his private office through a private door, and then locked both the doors of the little room in order to avoid interruption.

The commission agent told me that he had devised a very valuable machine; he had just completed the drawings, and they had been stolen. He said at least three firms would give a lot of money to get hold of such drawings, and went into rhapsody about his invention. I took it all quietly; all inventors are like that, and think that the child of their brain has never been equalled and never will be.

"It was done late last night or early this morning," said Mr. Dixon. "I often stay here after business hours so that I may have a little quiet time to work out my ideas. It is very seldom that my clerks have to stay after time. Last night I stayed here just to put a few improvements into the plans. I thought my clerks were gone, and I opened that door into the middle room in order to have more air. I had the plans laid out on this desk and was quite engrossed in my work, but all at once a slight cough caused me to jump from my seat and I saw one of my men, Arthur Symes, looking at me.

"I do not remember exactly what he said, but it was something about having stayed to finish some work; he wanted to know if I wished the outer door to be locked, and he seemed very confused. Yes, I suspect Symes. I took that fellow out of the gutter; he applied for the post and looked very shabby, but he was very straightforward as to the reason of his shabbiness. He had been weak enough to be led into betting; had 'borrowed' a small sum from his employer, and had been found out before he could replace it; he had been dismissed, and had been out of work for some time.

"Something about him attracted me. I am rather soft-hearted and I decided to give him another chance in life. He would not have the handling of money here. He has served me well for three months, but I have lately found that he is always short of money, which is an inducement to steal."

"Not a good record," I observed. "The plans were taken from your drawer without the lock being forced, so the thief must have had a key. Have you mentioned the loss to your clerks?"

"Yes. I was so staggered that I went straight into their room and said that some plans had been stolen from my drawer. Symes turned red."

"That's rather a pity, as it puts them on their guard. Now, I take it that you wish to recover the drawings, and that the punishment of the criminal is a minor consideration with you?"

I had judged aright; Dixon was anxious that no one should know of his invention just yet. However, if the plans had been disposed of, the detection of the thief would lead to the discovery of the purchaser and the restitution. Dixon would at once patent the invention so as to forestall any copying. But at present he was powerless to protect himself, as all his data had been destroyed and he only had the details that were on the finished drawing.

I left Mr. Dixon and decided to shadow Symes. I had hinted to the agent that if we called Symes into the private room and charged him point-blank with the theft, he might confess; but his employer said that such a course was unfair and against his principles.

A scrutiny of Symes told me that he was weak and likely to be led away. I shadowed him for the rest of the day. The next day, at my suggestion, he was sent out several times on various errands, but he went straight about his business and I could gather no evidence. After leaving the office, he went straight to his lodgings. An hour later he came out and I followed.

Digitized by Google

He went to a hall not far off where some social entertainment was to be given. My heart gave a little jump of delight as I remembered that I knew the gentleman who got up these entertainments, and that I had on one occasion, at another place, given a thought-reading séance at his request. A scheme flashed through my mind, and I at once resolved to carry it out.

I entered the hall, and almost the first person I saw was my friend; he welcomed me heartily, and I had no difficulty in persuading him to let me give a short thought-reading entertainment. The soirée was a free and easy affair, the object being to keep young people from frequenting entertainments of a less healthy character. I did not tell him exactly what I was driving at, but induced him to help me to the extent of getting Symes to test my skill.

The idea of a thought-reading séance was welcomed with acclamation by those present, and I was soon at work. I remember that it struck me as peculiar that Symes should go to a place of this kind if he were bad, but I concluded that he was not wicked at heart—he was weak and easily fell into temptation.

Symes was third on the list for having his thoughts read. As I began on the first candidate, a young man, I remarked, in a tone of pretended gravity, that if he had committed any crime—theft or murder—he must try to conceal his thoughts, as I should assuredly find him out. There was a laugh at this, but I had an object in view and I pursued it.

"Suppose I am a detective, and you are a man who has stolen something from your employer—say, some documents or plans," I continued. "Now, I will show you what would result. You would think about those plans; you couldn't help yourself, and you would give away your secret to me. The same remark applies to evil thoughts of all kinds; hence the necessity for young people to do and think only what is right."

This little homily pleased my friend and the young people, but I could see that Symes was becoming uneasy. Just what I wanted. If he had taken the plans he could not help thinking of them.

Of course, my first customer did not interest me; I succeeded fairly well with him, although he tried to fog me. The second was a young girl who gave me no trouble. The result in these two cases earned for me a certain reputation. Then it was Symes's turn; he tried to draw back, and I seized the opportunity.

"No, no!" I cried cheerily. "There's no getting away! If you've stolen the plans, you must put up with it; you may try to hide your thoughts, but I shall read them."

There was a general laugh at this reference to my homily; my remarks were taken by the others as a huge joke, which was quite natural. Symes's countenance, however, indicated that he regarded it as a grim reality.

I went through the usual performance, and I had difficulty in restraining my delight at the result. Symes was simply giving himself away. His thoughts were confused, but the prominent idea was "Mr. Dixon's plans."

"I am accused of stealing the plans," was one thought which I deciphered, and around this were parts of sentences, all confirming me in the belief that he was the culprit. There was also a reflection of his previous fall, and the words "sold—possum bill."

I knew that the last two words could not be correct, and it suddenly flashed upon me that it was a corruption, or a misreading, of the name of the firm to which the plans had been sold.

"Do you know the name of the firm which sounds like 'possum bill'?" I asked.

"Pawson and Beal!" gasped Symes, and his face was a study.

"Exactly!" I cried. Then, turning to those present, I said: "You see, ladies and gentlemen, he is thinking of something that has been sold to Messrs. Pawson and Beal!"

Symes nodded; he could not speak. I dismissed him and tried another, after which I said that the séance must close, as it exhausted me.

I left the hall and went to the railway station, where I took a ticket for Wimbledon. I was elated with my success and determined to see Mr. Dixon at once at his private address.

It did not take me long to relate what had passed. Mr. Dixon was alternately furious and despondent. Of course, Pawson and Beal would be only too glad to get hold of the plans, and as we even now had no legal evidence it would be impossible to get those drawings out of their clutches. We discussed the matter, and ultimately decided that Symes should be called into the private office the following morning and bluntly told that he was the thief. I was certain that on seeing me, he would confess, and then our coast would be clear.

"The scoundrel!" cried Mr. Dixon vehemently. "To rob me of my plans after what I have done for him!"

"What is that, father?" It was the voice of his daughter, who had just entered the room.

Dixon, it seemed, had not mentioned the affair to her, so he now briefly told her that his much-prized drawings had been stolen.

"Drawings?" queried his daughter. "I suppose they are the drawings of a machine, like those which are in your coat upstairs?"

"What!" roared Dixon. Then he tore from the room.

When he reappeared he held some drawings in his hand, and he looked crestfallen.

"Here they are, safe enough," he admitted. "I see it all now. In my absorbed frame of mind I must have put them into my pocket instead of locking them up in my drawer. I wore that coat only on that day, because this one had got wet. I have not worn it since, or even looked at it."

I felt inclined to say uncomplimentary things about inventors and the preoccupied frame of mind common to them; and what I said to myself about thought-reading need not be repeated. There was a point that required clearing up—How did Symes play into my hands? This was cleared up satisfactorily.

Symes had heard, on the important evening, some remarks unconsciously made aloud by his employer while absorbed in altering his drawings. These mutterings told him that the plans were valuable and that Pawson and Beal would give a lot for them. Symes was a nervous man and, having regard to his past career and to what had occurred on the previous evening, he had jumped to the conclusion that he was suspected of the robbery. This preyed on his mind and made him continually think about it. My homily had worked upon his nerves; he was so scared at the idea of being accused that he could not keep from thinking of the robbery, and so had helped me to make a blunder. Yet I could not blame him, for it was quite natural. I had played on his nerves and reaped the reward. I have never since resorted to thought-reading in the detection of crime.

GEO. KNIGHT.

Digitized by Google

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTOR.

IV.—Virtue's Champion.

We were playing The Midnight Murderer at a black hole of a mining town called Slaghill. I revelled in the title-rôle, and gloried mightily in the hisses and howls that greeted my realistic delineation of this double-dyed villain—a veritable king of heavy parts—Nathan Darkwater by name.

The local papers called me uncompromising and truculent, and my landladies, after seeing the play, did they happen to be of an emotional nature, at times would scarcely re-admit me into their houses.

Such was my first taste of fame, and I enjoyed it thoroughly, but I little imagined it would ever cost me so dear.

The inhabitants of Slaghill, being an unusually rough set of colliers, howled more than ever at my want of morality.

In the scene where I thrash a little collier's boy and then throw him into the river with intent to drown him, they let go the flood gates of their indignation with a vengeance.

Had it not been for the rescue of the child by the ever timely comedian I might well nigh have expected a rush upon the stage.

I have never before seen an audience look more like crossing the sacred line of the footlights. They showed their temper again when I tortured the leading man, having got him into my power through his own chronic stupidity. It might be argued that the ill-treatment would have a beneficial effect upon him, for he was blinded and dulled by an unnecessary excess of truthfulness and honesty, but that was not the way they looked at it.

Having gone through my list of murders, at the end of the last act I was caught red-handed committing the final deed. Then came the triumph of virtue and the capture of Mr. Darkwater by the police. Cries of "Shoot him," "Kill the brute," followed my exit between two weak-kneed policeman.

It was evidently a great grief to the audience that I did not suffer death before their eyes, preferring, no doubt, that the darling of their eyes, the comedian, or the second favourite, the leading man, should be the avenging angel; forgetting that according to all laws of probability such an act would seriously compromise the commi'ter.

However, the author of this classic drama saw fit to depart in this one particular from precedent, so we had to abide by his decree.

The performance was over, and having removed my war paint I prepared to leave the theatre and seek our usual house of refreshment. I got as far as the stage door when I met Cavendish, our leading man, who held the door with one hand waving me back with the other.

"Go back! go back!" he cried.

"What for? What is the matter?"

"Get out by the front, look sharp, for they have come to mob you, kick you to death perhaps."

"What rot you are talking," said I, advancing, "What game is this you are playing? For if you take me for a 'mug,' you are mistaken, and I should advise you to try elsewhere."

"Don't be an idiot; I'm not 'kidding.' There is a big fool of a collier outside who has taken the play in earnest and has come to kill you, so he says, for he is certain the two bobbies he saw take you off would never be able to hold you."

"He is about right there."

"Jimmy (the comedian) is talking to him outside, trying to explain, but it is not much use."

I listened and could hear the murmur of many voices outside, Jimmy's above the rest, making a street corner speech, trying to enlighten the savages of Slaghill—a hopeless task. So it was really true. I felt it implied a compliment to me.

"Well, this is the funniest thing I have heard for a long time. The man must be mad. Why did you not send for the police?"

"The police! Why, you know in this place they would sooner kill a bobby than not. Besides, he has a whole crowd of them with him, the roughest in the place, who have come to see the fun and help a bit too, if needs be."

Jimmy's voice suddenly ceased, there came a heavy hammering upon the stage door, and a deep, gruff voice said: "Open the door. Dost thee hear, or I'll jolly well breck it daan."

I burst out laughing at the humour of the situation. This infuriated the collier outside, who thumped at the old stage-door more vigorously than ever,

Digitized by Google

"If you's the bloke what's laffin'," he cried again, savouring his words with nearly as many oaths, "send him aat, and I'll kick his head off in a fair feyght. I knows thy laff, Mr. Darkwater."

"Now don't be a ninny," said Cavendish, "come on, follow me while there is yet time. For I'm not going to stand here for the door to fall on me."

I ran up the steps after Cavendish, had hardly reached the stage, when with a crash the door burst in and in a trice a score of roughs were on our track. Cavendish dived down a passage to a side door leading to the front of the house. I, knowing myself to be the quarry, hardly liked to trust to the side door being open, so I jumped the footlights and the orchestra rail, landing on my hands and knees in the pit. The curtain as usual was up for the night, but the headlights were still burning. On my way across the pit I unfortunately looked back to see what my pursuers were doing, this gave them a sight of my face, and with a yell they were after me leaping from the stage in among the forms and benches of the pit, tumbling one on top of another. A few severe injuries, I afterwards learned, were the result of that leap. The foremost among them was a big collier who, I had no doubt, was virtue's champion. I soon skipped over the benches and following Cavendish's shout found him feverishly undoing the front door.

"Heavens, it's a near thing," he said, as we banged the door after us, "you will have to run for your life. I'll run with you to the top of the street and then we will separate, and perhaps they will follow me."

As we hoped, they had some difficulty in finding their way out of the theatre, so we had half a street start and looking back we saw now only about a dozen emerge from the front of the house.

Being a bright, moonlight night they espied us immediately and shouting like fiends followed hotly upon our heels, the big collier again leading.

A man hunt was just the thing to please them mightily, better sport almost than football, and woe betide me if I were caught, I should be treated about as mercifully as a welsher.

They would take their cue from the usual blood and thunder melodramas they were accustomed to see and deal rough justice accordingly. The big collier, I had no doubt, was the only one in earnest, the remainder would look upon it as a joke to see a good fight, or saving that, to mob a man upon the slightest pretext.

At the top of the street Cavendish and I parted; he went towards the police-station to get aid to stop this farce if possible.

Our stratagem did not work however, they knew me and remained hotly in pursuit. I dived in and out small streets, and made for the outskirts of the town; once in the country I could easily hide in some ditch.

Never in my life had I run so, I hardly thought myself capable of such fleetness of foot. Thank goodness I was distancing them, and if I could judge by their cries, having lost sight of me, they had spread.

Once in the country, scrambling over hedge and ditch, I made a bee-line across the fields to a cemetery in the distance and climbing the rail was soon safe among the tomb-stones.

I lay on the grass exhausted, this at any rate would give me breathing space.

I had had scarcely ten minutes respite when I heard voices behind me and could hear them climbing the high iron railing; they had seen me climb those rails. I crept on hands and knees among the tombs until I had the little chapel between us, and then I ran to the opposite railings and scrambled over.

Across the fields I went in the shadow of a hedge, and up a hill, upon the top of which stood a colliery. I was half way up the hill when they again caught sight of me, so my hope of shelter in the buildings of the colliery was frustrated.

Over the top of the hill I went and down the other side.

Then I doubled like a coursed hare, round to the left, and sat in a ditch to watch their next move. After laboriously climbing the hill, the four now remaining scanned the country round.

Boots were evidently better to run in than clogs, and I now felt fairly secure so long as the country was open, rather beginning to enjoy the chase; it was not half bad fun when one felt in some degree safe.

Their council of war on the top of the hill was brief.

Two went to the colliery and the other two with unerring judgment came straight towards me.

If I moved I was sure to be seen, still there was no help for it, so I decamped. Yes, they saw me and the scamper soon began again. I was getting rather tired and very much blown, so I planned a lengthy detour with intent to return to the town and seek the shelter of my rooms. I went straight out into the country again, this time doubling to the right, and the ruse was quite successful for I saw them all run to the left. As I rounded the colliery hill on my way back I could see no sign of them, and fondly hoped they were still crossing the fields in the distance.

I passed the cemetery at a walk and quietly made my way into the town. For the moment I was nonplussed as to where I was, I had lost my bearings completely. I went first to the right and then to the left until at last I reached an open space which I knew to be near my own dwelling-place. Carefully I looked round the corner of the street before venturing into the open. There were workmen's sheds in the centre, and as I was obliged to cross I made for these as an intermediary cover. I had hardly reached them when from the opposite side of the waste ground who should appear from out a street than the big collier, all alone.

It seems we had each completed a half-circle, entering the town at different points, and meeting here. I slipped behind the sheds, but all too late—he had seen me, and I heard his clogs patter on the hard ground as he ran towards them. Should I bolt back the way I had come, or dodge round the sheds? I hesitated, and the next moment it was too late—he had reached the sheds. Then began the game afresh, cat and mouse this time.

"Come aat and feyght me, thoo dirty divil," he roared, hurling a brick at my disappearing feet as we slipped in and out between the sheds.

"Go home to bed, you mad fool!" shouted I back, throwing a big stone at him as he came round again.

"Mad? I'm not mad, thoo black fiend!" and another stone just missed me.

"Idiot, do you know what you are doing?"

"Aye, and thoo will an' all when I gets a-ho'd o' thee," came the reply.

We careered around those sheds exchanging stones, threats, and abuse until the pace slowed from weariness. I could hear his clattering clogs upon the stony ground while he could not hear the fall of my leather-shod feet, so I had a distinct advantage. Oh, if help would only come from Cavendish, or some of our fellows! What were they doing? I was fast losing my temper, a thing I do about once in five years. Why should I, I asked myself, be so undignifiedly harried about by a mad brute of a collier? Why not go out and fight him and take the consequences? I should have done so long before had he been an ordinary man, for I was not altogether a stranger to the art of boxing, but I had seen those clogged colliers fight; kicking each other senseless was their idea of the game; a ghastly sight enough to unnerve anyone. At the next pause I sought a parley.

Digitized by Google

"I'll come out and fight you," I shouted, "if you will promise me you won't use your clogs. No kicking! That's not my style of fighting."

"I won't promise you nowt," was the answer.

"Then you will have to run round here all night, that's all!"

With an oath he was on me and round we went again. I parleyed again with the same success.

"All right, all night," I yelled, and flung another stone at him. After a time there came a long pause. I supposed he was thinking or meditated some new stratagem.

Was he creeping round either side? No. Was he climbing a shed? No. Yes, he was thinking—a painful process to one of his mental calibre.

"Drat thy style," said he at last.

"Thanks," I replied.

"Why for can't thoo kick?" he asked.

"Haven't any clogs on."

"Well—that being so—I'll promise."

"Swear it!" I shouted.

And he swore a mighty oath in a thoroughly unprintable form.

It sounded safe enough, so pulling off my hat and coat I ran out into the open, he was after me in a moment and for a minute we stood facing each other.

"I'll give thee what for for beatin' yon little lad as thoo did, burnin' th' hero wi' hot iron bars, and murdering yon uther chaps," he said, with a savage glee.

"Don't be an ass," I retorted. "It was all pretence."

"None o' thy lies," he shouted, and we closed. My policy was to dance round him, avoid his blows, and get one in when I could. My tactics were successful, for I could clearly see I was not getting the worst of it. But my style of boxing was new to him and irritated him exceedingly.

"None o' thy prize feyghting; stand still," he gasped.

"Rats," I replied, and landed him one just above the belt.

It was a lucky shot for me, and I was making the running for some time after. Then he lost his temper, forgot his fearful oath and began his own peculiar style of fighting, viz., kicking. I remonstrated, but it was of no avail. Still, I found I could easily dodge his flying feet, but that necessitated more movement, and I was painfully conscious that my opponent had twice the staying power I had. I could not last very long and then it would be all over with me. Once by a feint I was lucky enough to catch his elevated leg and with all my strength hurled him backwards to the ground. But nothing seemed to hurt him. He got up a raging fiend and fought madly. It was then I had to use all the care I could exercise to prevent him closing. Had he done so my light weight would have been useless against his ponderous bulk.

The game was nearing a close for me, blows were falling more and more frequently to my share, when I suddenly heard a shout, my name called, and the tramp of several feet. I had no breath to answer, but for one half-second I turned my head to see whether friends or foes approached. It was an unlucky move for me. I looked back at my foe just in time to ward off a blow. I parried it so awkwardly that my feet slipped and I measured my length upon the ground.

Unable to check his rush the collier fell on the top of me, knocking the last remaining breath out of my body.

When I recovered consciousness I was being carried home by Cavendish and Jimmy.

My late adversary was struggling with two policemen.

Ever since we parted Cavendish had sought high and low for me, and was just on his way home, having given up the search.

I was not much the worse for my adventure next day, but I shall never forget Slaghill.

The tale soon spread through the town and business went up with leaps and bounds.

For my safety virtues representative was kept close that week.

Some time after these events a well known fifth-rate star came to play Hamlet at Slaghill, the performance so affected the mind of my late adversary that he took up his permanent abode in a lunatic asylum.

Just a parting word to melodramatic authors—please kill your villains at the end of the piece.

DOUGLAS VIGORS.

[Next Week: LEFT IN THE LURCH.]

WHO WILL BE THE FIRST TO CAPTURE A TEN-POUND LADY?

Since last week two more Sealed Envelopes have been claimed, the lucky capturers being:

Mr. Thomas Kidman, 5 Brook Street, Bedminster, Bristol, who captured No. 45 at a football match at Bristol, and

Mrs. J. Menzies, 85 Seymour Buildings, Seymour Place, London, W., who captured No. 24 at the Crystal Palace.

£320 HAS NOW BEEN PAID AWAY, and there are still fifty Sealed Envelopes awaiting claimants.

Up to the present no one has been able to capture a Ten-Pound Lady. There are ten of them about the country anxious to get rid of their Sealed Envelopes. No gentleman need apply, as these Envelopes are for ladies only.

The celebrated song

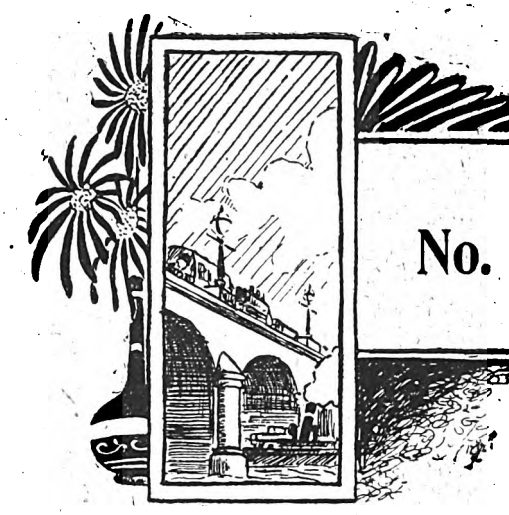
"HAVE YOU GOT THAT £10 NOTE?"

is now on sale, and can be obtained from all newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the SONG DEPARTMENT, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free.

A prize of £10 is offered to the person from whom we receive the best anecdote relating to the Ten-Pound Scheme. All attempts should be sent at once in envelopes addressed: TEN-POUND STORY EDITOR, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., not later than Monday, Nov. 19th.

Full particulars of the Scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



No. 3 PELICAN PLACE.

ALTOGETHER an unmistakable bit of old-world London. You might very well have missed it, the entrance to it from the main road being alike narrow and unnoticeable. Few, even town-bred people, knew of its existence, while its inhabitants had (and, so far as can be known, still have) about them that pleasantly curious air of other-day life; that quiet, peaceful, almost dreamy personality, redolent of faded rose leaves, spindled-legged furniture, sampler-work, and the tambour frame.

The houses in Pelican Place are, outwardly speaking, in every respect akin to their tenants.

Plain dwellings they are, of dark, weather-stained brick, the quaintest feature of their whole quaint appearance being the doorways. Overhanging each of these is a semi-circular wood canopy, beautifully carved, while in some instances the side posts are exquisitely wrought fluted pilasters of the same material.

The "Place" is a cul-de-sac, the four houses at the extreme end being slightly elevated upon a sort of platform, access to which is by four flights of steep stone steps.

Each small flagged courtyard is screened by an iron railing.

It is with the dwelling in the right hand corner of this block—No. 3—that we have now more particularly to do.

Thurza Dean lived here with her father, the blind organist of the neighbouring church of St. Ethelburga. They occupied the upper portion of the house, in the lower part living Hannah Stanesby, an elderly widow.

John Stanesby, her husband, had been dead nearly six months now, leaving her a legacy of loneliness and sorrow. Childless she was not, in the strict sense of the word, although so to all intents and purposes. A son, an only son she had, but whether he were now alive or dead, she knew not.

Six years before, he, then a lad of twenty, had quarrelled with his father, the result being that he left the house, completely disappearing out of his parents' life. From that day up to the time of his mother's widowhood, no word or sign had he made, until Hannah had come to mourn him as only a mother can mourn for the son of her love.

As boy and girl, Ned Stanesby and Thurza Dean, had grown up almost side by side. Together had they studied, played and wrangled, no man forbidding them. Many a battle had doughty Ned fought for the protection and honour of his little friend.

As years went by, and the so-called discretionary ones were well in sight, they became more reserved and constrained in their relations one with another. At any rate, Thurza did.

This state of things lasted until one day, under the leafy shade of one of the great trees in Kensington Gardens, Ned told the old, old story. Both young, they yet deemed themselves old enough to know their own minds, popular opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

Possibly, the course of true love might have elected to run smoothly, but for two unfortunately opposing reasons.

One Bartley Hunt, a nephew of Hannah's, and by no means a good friend of Ned's, had also designs of his own upon Thurza's heart and hand. It was, therefore, with feelings of intense chagrin, ill-disguised, that he saw Ned so unmistakably preferred to himself. By nature an unscrupulous schemer, he cast about him how he might, Jacob-wise, supplant his cousin.

With his aunt and uncle he stood fairly well, with the latter especially, old John openly admiring his successful business plodding. In this respect was Bartley in marked contrast to Ned, who loved to saunter through life upon the sunny side, taking the good as it came, and good-humouredly hanging his responsibilities upon the nearest and most convenient shoulder.

Still, for all this, was Ned was a lovable chap—more than could be truthfully said of his rival. Fair-haired, tall and broad he was, with his ready smile and happy disposition, a lad formed to win the average maiden's heart. And Thurza was far above the average maiden, both in body and soul. Like her lover she was fair, but with the large dark eyes which, so they say, go to make perfect beauty.

Unlike Ned, however, she was small, daintily so, and still more unlike him, in that she had an innate and firm sense of duty. Blind she was not to Ned's undeniable faults, but she was gently kind to them, in the hope that some day she would be able to win him to steadfastness of purpose, all for love of herself.

The other disturbing element in their little love drama was the attitude of old John Stanesby towards Thurza's father. He was possessed of an unreasoning dislike for the blind organist.

To himself he could not explain it, further than that he "despised" (so he said) "a man who earned his living by grinding tunes for other fools to listen to." This dislike, while it did not actually include Thurza, unconsciously had its natural effect in causing John to regard the girl with no more than the ordinary feelings of neighbourliness. It was with Hannah that Thurza, herself motherless almost from her birth, made common cause, the two being fast friends.

Digitized by Google

Maybe it was their love for this same scapegrace Ned that so bound them together, although in any case it is easy to imagine an affectionate interchange between the younger and the elder woman.

Briefly then, Bartley Hunt determined upon treachery, a course of action not altogether unfamiliar to him. Aware of old John's prejudices, he sought to turn them to his own purposes by a crafty insinuation as to the true position of affairs between Thurza and Ned.

Obstinate at all times, and stiff-necked to a degree, the old man was roused by Bartley's insidious suggestions to tax Ned with the fact of the engagement, winding up his tirade with the bitter expression of his determination to prevent by every means in his power the marriage of his son to Eli Dean's daughter.

His arguments were illogical, his manner intemperate, and Ned, whose filial affection went largely into the "mother scale," first of all hotly repudiated his father's right to coerce him in any way, and then, the quarrel reaching a point where a peaceable settlement was impossible, went away in a rage.

All this was soon known to Bartley Hunt, the string-puller, who forthwith proceeded, though with judicious caution, and a politic waiting that did credit, at least, to his knowledge of human nature, to make himself an almost necessary figure in the daily life at No. 3.

There was no blustering persecution of the object of his love. Thurza would immediately have resented that. Rather did he by a patient, untiring devotion, seek to break down the barriers of her disinclinations for his society. Ned's departure without a word of farewell of any kind, he diplomatically employed as a strong argument in his own favour.

This inexplicable neglect of Ned's to give her his confidence before taking the irrevocable step, had hurt her. The clay of the idol had peeped out from beneath the robe her own love had woven round it.

To Hannah alone could she look for any real support in the struggle. His mother must believe in him, selfish, headstrong though he might have been.

By Hannah's side Thurza felt strong in her resolve to leave her heart in Ned's keeping whatever might happen or wherever he might be. But, oh! that ceaseless dropping of the water of persistence upon the stone of mind and will. The latter must wear away; it is a law of our nature, as unalterable as that of the Medes and Persians.

As time went on Bartley became more and more assured in his manner towards his victim.

He assumed in her presence a protective air, and that as by right. Like a bird under the fascinating gaze of its would-be captor, Thurza felt bit by bit her resolution giving way, her loyalty to Ned becoming, even against her will, weaker every hour.

Then came John Stanesby's death, hastened, so Bartley Hunt did not hesitate to whisper, by his son's disobedience and desertion.

The loss of his ally quickened the schemer's movements.

"Thurza," he said one day, "don't you think I deserve my reward?"

He had met her by accident, alone, in the "Gardens," near the old tree, so full of memories for her.

"Reward—what reward?" she wearily answered him. "I've nothing to give; you know I've nothing to give."

"Thurza, haven't I been patient, these six years nearly now? Can there be any doubt in your mind as to what I want to repay me for the long waiting? Won't you marry me, dear, and soon?"

She shivered, although the day was warm and sunny.

"What do you want of me—love? I haven't got that to give. If you want this," holding out her hand, "perhaps you ought to have it, now that you have pleaded so long for it."

"Is that all, Thurza! only the hand? isn't your heart to come with it?"

For an instant he feared he had made a mistake, as in her eyes a momentary gleam of strange, unwonted fierceness flashed and disappeared.

"All! if I were to promise you more I should be telling an untruth. Go away now; don't follow me; I want to be alone."

He had to be content; anyway it was victory; it would be his own fault could he not improve it, and in the end reap the full reward.

* * * * *

At this time the war in South Africa was working to a close. Men had lately heard of the gradual drawing in of the net which should enmesh the straggling guerilla chiefs and their followings, and so end the protracted struggle.

It was on the day when Lord Roberts' dispatch, announcing the annexation of the Transvaal, reached England, that a sober little wedding party stood before the altar of St. Ethelburga's. The man and the woman come there to plight their troth looked, both of them, as unlike happy bride and groom as could well be.

Bartley Hunt has taken his wife from her father's hand; the blind man has groped his way to the organ-loft, to break out a while later into the glorious Wedding March, when the clink of spurs, together with a swinging, military tread is heard coming up the centre aisle.

The ceremony is over and all heads are turned to see a tall, stalwart figure in the undress uniform of a troop sergeant-major of a regiment of Hussars making his way towards the little party at the east end of the church.

It is Thurza who first recognises him. Deathly pale she withdraws her hand from that of her husband. Hannah, who now, too, knows her son, who stands silent, his eyes fixed on Thurza, goes over to him, and places two trembling, withered hands upon his arm.

Gently, very gently he removes them, and moves a step nearer to the central pair.

The face, bronzed almost out of knowledge, is not the face of old, inasmuch as it is now contemptuously and grimly stern. Then for a second his features relax somewhat, and take on a tender, wistful look, his eyes never wandering from the face of his lost love.

The attempted word-picture has been infinitely longer in the painting than was the incident itself in the enacting.

The look given. Ned!—Sergeant Ned!—Scapegrace Ned! brought himself smartly to attention; firmly placed his mother's arm within his own.

"They told me in the 'Place,'" he said quietly, "when I could make no one hear at No. 3. I wish you joy. Come, mother."

Turning upon his heel he departed the way he came.

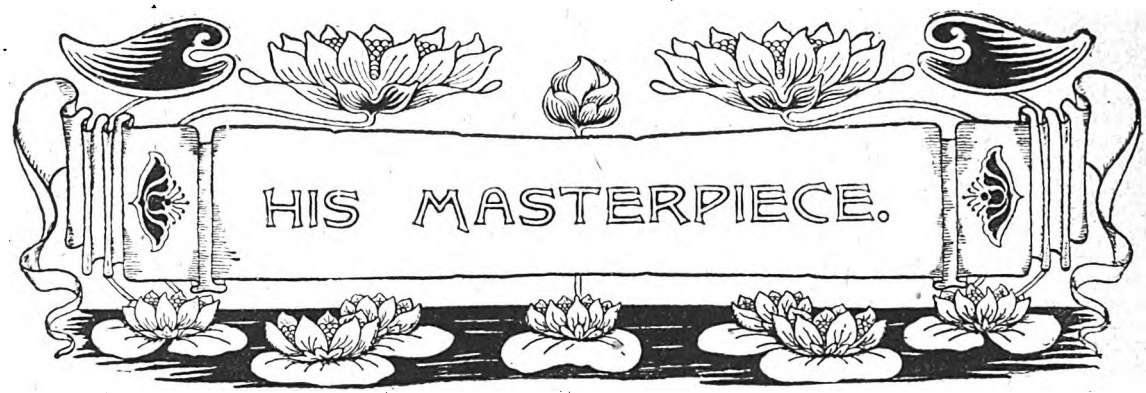
* * * * *

Upon September 6th, 1900, the following appointment was gazetted:

"Troop Sergeant-Major Edward Stanesby, late 11th Hussars, invalided from South Africa, to be barrack master at Winchester."

RALPH ENDERBY.

Digitized by Google



"ANOTHER failure?"

The words were uttered in a tone denoting inquiry, sarcasm and disappointment. The speaker was pretty, we might say beautiful; a woman of twenty-five and in the full enjoyment of health.

Those who can read character in the face would have said that she was capable of deep feelings, whereas the casual observer would have regarded her as vain and capricious, with which qualities more or less selfishness is combined.

In reality, both judgments were correct; it required some crisis to provoke the profound emotions.

The words had been addressed to her husband, a man about twelve months her senior. He was one of those men who are generally described as "of good address;" he was attractive enough in appearance to win the smiles of the fair sex, but possibly the most noticeable feature of Arnold Brassey was his great confidence in his ultimate success. He would make a fortune and a name—at some future time; of that he was quite certain, and the belief made him speak on the subject with such assurance that other people were led to believe the same. Yet this was not a mere boastfulness; he was a capable man as a journalist, and his expressions of confidence in final success were innocent of all intention to deceive.

In his hand he held a letter, just arrived, telling him that a certain firm of publishers regretted that they were unable to see their way to bring out a certain novel which he had submitted to them and informing him that the manuscript was at his disposal. Arnold did not care to remember the exact number of similar disappointments that had fallen to his lot during the three years of his married life; he had tried his hand at plays, novels and collections of essays, but all to no purpose. He had nearly broken down in health through overwork, but it seemed as if fate had decreed that he must remain in his present obscure position.

But he had a double disappointment to bear, for the attitude of his wife cut him to the quick. She had been waiting for the success of which he had so confidently spoken during their courtship—waiting for it because of the increased pleasures and comfort it would bring to her; and now it seemed farther off than ever, she was getting tired and was reproaching him instead of sympathizing with and encouraging him.

"I shall try again," returned Arnold, trying to show no resentment at the tone in which his wife had spoken. "I shall succeed, and then these productions of mine which have been refused will be sought after and lauded to the skies. Don't be vexed, Nellie; we shall forget these troubles in the bright future."

But he spoke with less enthusiam, less confidence, than ever before.

Mrs. Brassey shrugged her shoulders with as much expressiveness as any French woman could have done.

"I am tired of this waiting for what doesn't come," she replied pettishly. "If I had known, I should not have——"

She stopped abruptly.

An almost imperceptible shiver passed through Arnold's frame; the significance of this unfinished sentence was clear to him.

She had married him quite as much for the position which she hoped he would give her as for love of him—perhaps more so.

He loved this woman with all his heart and would have been content with the proverbial cottage and crusts, provided that he had her love; but she was looking for gaiety and pleasures which he had not given to her.

"It must come soon, dear," he said appealingly.

But she was vexed too deeply to think of the effect of her words upon him. During the past few days her pride and her vanity had been sorely wounded by what she had read and heard of the doings of society, and her heart was full of bitterness.

"It will never come," she cried bitterly. "You do not possess talent to produce a masterpiece. You will never make a name!"

She quitted the room, and Arnold was left to reflect on the past and the present. His mind wandered back to the time of their engagement; the happy hours they had passed together in rural lanes and bye-ways, by the sea and at home; then the happiness of the first month of their married life came to him with startling and almost painful vividness.

How they had looked forward to the bright times when he should have made a name! And how different everything seemed now! He groaned aloud, for he felt that there was at least a grain of truth in Nellie's last words; if he really had talent, would it not have shown itself by this time—would he not have forced his way to the front?

Well, she wanted more pleasure; she wished to go about and see life; he would try and gratify her wishes.

His present resources would not warrant such expenditure, but he could borrow—his credit was good—and he would give her what she desired, trusting to good luck to enable him to meet his liabilities later on. He did not stop to reflect on the honesty of this course; he did not wish to think about it.

Summer was beginning and Arnold, changing his tactics by degrees in order not to arouse suspicion in the minds of his wife and other people, gradually "launched out," as he termed it. He took his wife to one of the most fashionable watering places and put up at the best hotel, leaving her for a day or so at a time in order to return to town for work. From there they went to another similar sea-side resort, and so on all through the summer Nellie was gratified by a constant round of gaiety.

Digitized by Google

Returning to town, he succeeded in obtaining access to some of the principal society functions, thanks to the good offices of a wealthy gentleman engaged in company promoting and other lucrative businesses, and this in return for having obtained the publication of that gentleman's portrait and career in a society paper.

Mrs. Blair, the wife of the company promoter, took a fancy to Nellie, so that the latter was often included in invitations while her husband remained at home or at work.

"You're not such a bad sort of a husband, after all!" said Mrs. Brassey playfully to Arnold on one occasion. "I have had a splendid time lately."

"I am glad that you are happy, dear," was Arnold's quiet reply. But his face clouded as he turned from her; the weight of debt was pressing upon him and as yet he had found no means of freeing himself.

A disquieting rumour came to Arnold; his wife was more often out without him than with him, and he heard that marked attention was being paid to her by a man of position.

This was not disquieting to him from one point of view, for he had implicit faith in Nellie's inherent goodness, but it caused him a bitter pang to know that the society of some other man was more attractive than his own to his wife.

He thought of going to some function without her knowledge and watching her to see if rumour had spoken truly, but he found Nellie frequently mentioning this man in her chatter after her return or whenever she recounted her doings.

It was true, then! She was drifting away from him; only the bond of marriage kept her from forgetting him.

She came home from a theatre late one night and settled herself in an easy chair in order to give him an idea of the play; she was very tired and she dropped asleep.

Her talk had been more about Mr. and Mrs. Blair and Mr. Anthony than about the drama, and as Arnold looked at the sleeping figure he remembered that she had not expressed the least regret at his not being present.

He buried his face in his hands, and, in spite of himself, the tears came into his eyes—tears of vexation and bitterness at his failure to write something really good as well as at his failure to retain the love of his wife.

He could not endure this mortification; he felt that he must take up his pen and write something—anything! Why was it that he could not produce a novel or a play good enough even to be accepted? A kind of rage seized him; he pushed back his chair, brought the ink and some sheets of paper to the table, sat down and began to write feverishly, scarcely knowing what he did. The paroxysm passed away after a few minutes' work; he read in a calmer mood what he had written, and found that he had begun a play based on his own life. He took up the pen again and continued; his whole soul now seemed to be flowing out with the ink from his pen.

"Oh, dear!" exclaimed Nellie, opening her eyes and looking about her. "If I haven't been asleep in this chair ever so long! You are up and at work very early, Arnold, aren't you?"

"Yes; I have some work to do which must be done," was the brief answer vouchsafed by her husband as he put the sheets together and locked them in the drawer.

Two or three times during the next few days Nellie found that her husband had been up early in the morning in order to work; this excited very little curiosity on her part, for she was enjoying the pleasures of the winter season, and when in the company of Mr. and Mrs. Blair and the ever present Mr. Anthony she scarcely gave a thought to what her husband might be doing.

Time passed on and Mrs. Brassey arranged to accompany her friends to the theatre to witness the first performance of a new drama, which, according to certain paragraphs in the newspapers, was likely to draw crowded houses.

It was a study of life, a drama of the emotions, and promised to be thrilling. The author's name was also new to the public; nobody had ever heard of Mr. H. Shiner.

Across Nellie's mind there flashed a thought that her husband's masterpiece still remained unwritten, yet here was a man—a novice—able to write a play that was good enough for one of the best theatres; but she dismissed the thought quickly, as she had no complaint to make now that he was enabling her to go about as she desired.

The house was crowded and the audience waited impatiently for the play of the evening to begin. Nellie Brassey was an occupier of a box with her friends the Blairs and Mr. Anthony.

She had not betrayed any particular interest in the forthcoming drama, and almost yawned as the curtain went up; but after the first few words a curious expression appeared on her face and she became all attention. What were the words to which she was listening?

They carried her back to the time when Arnold and she were lovers; it seemed that the speeches uttered by the two chief characters were those of Arnold and herself. Yes, this was her own life which was being unrolled before her!

As the play proceeded, all doubt on that point vanished. In a dazed fashion she followed the drama; first the courtship—how happy it had been, she thought; then the married life and the growing discontent of the wife at the non-production of the great work that was to bring fortune to them, and the final taunt about her husband's incapacity. So much was familiar to her, but the rest was new.

The author touched but lightly on the further doings of the wife; but dwelt on the effects of that taunt upon the husband. He painted in thrilling words the agony of the journalist in the inward struggle between two courses—that of utter abandonment and that of gallant endeavour; he made the husband cry for the love and sympathy and help which were denied to him, but which he had a right to expect. Then came the design of writing his own career. The audience were told the inmost thoughts of the tortured husband and his final triumph. Nellie did not know how the play ended, for by this time her thoughts rendered it impossible for her to follow the dialogue.

She heard, as at a distance, the plaudits of the audience and the calls for the author; she knew that he came timidly before the curtain, keeping near the side, but she did not look. She knew who the author was, and she dared not meet his eyes.

Digitized by Google

It was a revelation to her; she knew now how Arnold had suffered while she had been enjoying "life." Life! The word seemed a mockery in the light of her present knowledge. How did her existence during the past year compare with what it might have been had she acted the wife's part and stood by her husband's side? Yet she had nearly driven him to destruction.

She was aroused by the rising of her friends as they prepared to depart.

Mr. Anthony offered his arm as a matter of course, but she politely declined.

"I am sorry that I cannot accept your escort to-night, Mr. Anthony," she said firmly. "My husband will escort me home."

"Your husband!"

The tone of surprise and sarcasm with which the words were uttered stung her deeply; she flushed a little as she remembered that she had brought this upon herself, but she replied in the same firm voice.

"Yes. Mr. Shiner is the assumed name under which my husband has written this play. I shall meet him at the stage-door unless he meets me before I can get there."

When she saw Arnold, her courage failed and she stood before him as one awaiting a verdict.

In spite of the presence of others, he went up to her and kissed her, for the look on her face told him the truth.

"Forgive me, Arnold," she intreated in whisper. "I have been—"

But he interrupted the sentence with another kiss and she was happy.

E. LINGEN.

The Windows Opposite.

I HAD been knocked down by a cab in the streets of Paris and taken to a hospital. I was hurt about the head and shoulders, and, though I had no broken bones to mend, I was so badly bruised that the doctor told me I wouldn't get out for a month. Hard up though I was in a financial sense, I had enough money in my pocket to get me into a pay ward, and they gave me one of the fourteen cots on the third floor front. It was summer, and I was close to the seventh window counting from the left.

The routine of a hospital for an injured man is a monotonous one. After the first three or four days they put me on full diet and gave me books to read, but I could not leave my bed, and it was against the rules to converse with the other patients. It was read, sleep, think and plan, with one visit a day from the doctor. I could not see the street from my window as I sat propped up in my cot. The only sight to greet my vision was a quaint old house opposite. The structure was two storeys high, and I could see the upper halves of four windows. The house looked very old and was in a sad state of neglect and untenanted. I don't know why I should have been interested in that house except that a sick man will turn to the veriest trifle to make a diversion, I saw by the state of the windows that the house was tenantless, and yet I had the curiosity to question the nurse about it.

"That house has been empty for years," she replied, "and as the estate is in Chancery it will probably fall down before the heirs come into possession. You cannot see so far down, but the lower doors and windows are boarded up to keep tramps out. I have often wondered if the place has not a ghost."

I fell into the habit of watching those four windows as closely as if I had been employed as a watchman. It seemed that if I waited long enough I should see a face at one of them. When evening came, there was an electric light somewhere which caught the front of the old house, and I would watch those windows until the nurse enjoined me to turn away and go to sleep.

It got so at last that I felt certain of making a discovery, and one evening, when I had been in the hospital nine or ten days, the face I had looked for appeared at one of the middle windows. It was that of a man.

The window was a hundred and fifty feet from me, but by the assistance of the electric light I made out the face very clearly. It came into view gradually, as if the man slowly advanced across the room, and it remained at the paneless sash for a full minute. It was the face of an evil man. It was dark and bearded and the eyes travelled up and down and across the street as if looking for danger. Whoever the man was he was no tramp, nor had he a lawful right in the house. As he left the window I called to the nurse and told her of his presence, but she laughed and replied:

Digitized by Google

"Ah, but we are not to concern ourselves about what goes on over there. If it is some prowler who has broken in, the police must take care of him."

I now had something to occupy my full attention, and I gave up everything to watch the windows opposite. Nothing appeared next day, but at about half-past eight o'clock in the evening I saw the same face again. There was more boldness in the way the man approached the window, and he seemed to feel himself more secure as he surveyed the street. If he were not a fugitive in hiding, why should he be taking peeps at the neighbourhood? A vagabond, having entered to obtain shelter for the night, would keep clear of the windows. On this second night the man seemed to be looking intently at the footpath running in front of the hospital, and by-and-bye he started and turned away as if he had received some signal. When the nurse came, I told her of the incident. She was as much amused as before.

"You certainly have a mind for mysteries," she laughed, "but if you become too interested you will develop a fever and have a relapse. When you are able to leave us, you can tell the police about the man, who will probably turn out to be a shadow."

I gave the windows but little attention in the daytime after that. The face appeared on the third evening at the same hour, and I felt so sure that a confederate made signals from the pavement that I took a convalescent into my confidence. He was an old soldier who was being treated for an old wound and was allowed the run of the place. I told him of the face and the confederate, and he was interested at once. It was arranged that he should be in front of the hospital at half-past eight and watch for the confederate, and luck attended him. He saw a well-dressed but evil-looking man make signals to the man at the window. The signals were made with a folded newspaper and would not have been noticed by any one not on the watch for them.

"Now then," said the old soldier as he returned and reported, "we have a mystery. Luck has thrown it in our way that we may make a few goldpieces. Let us work it out together and share the reward."

None of us in the ward had seen a newspaper for a week. They were not forbidden, but none of the patients seemed to care for outside news. Next morning the soldier went out and purchased the papers for the previous five or six days, and as we looked them over we found a sensation. A boy ten years old, the son of a rich iron founder, had been kidnapped and spirited away, and it was stated that the whole police force of Paris was on the qui vive. The kidnapping had taken place three days before I saw the face at the window, and I was arguing that our mystery could have nothing to do with it when the soldier said:

"It is at least twelve miles from here where the lad was picked up. He was probably hidden somewhere else for a day or two, but the scent got so hot that he was moved. Don't you fear that he is not in the old house opposite at this very moment."

"Then we should inform the police."

"Pooh! We must wait for a reward to be announced. Never slap luck in the face."

On the fourth night and the fifth night the face appeared at the window at the usual hour, and the same man made the usual signals. As the police were yet at fault, those signals must have meant that things were all right for the kidnappers. It was now eight days since the boy had been taken, and as no trace could be had of him it was believed that he had been killed or taken out of the country. The papers gave it to the police pretty hot, and it was intimated that the father was ready to pay almost any sum to have his child restored.

"Now we are coming nearer to it," said the old veteran. "What the kidnappers have been waiting for is the reward, but we must be ahead of them. You have some money, but I have none. You must give me enough to take me across Paris to the father."

It had come to be understood in our corridor that we had some scheme, but we refused to answer any questions. The soldier started off one morning, and before noon he was holding an interview with the father of the abducted boy. The distracted man was willing to give his last franc, but the soldier stopped at 20,000.

He got a promise in writing that he should be paid that sum when the boy was delivered up, and then he went to the police to find if there was a reward for any particularly desperate character. There was. It was believed in police circles that the kidnappers were two escaped convicts, and there was a reward of 10,000 francs on the head of either. When it had been agreed to give him half the reward, the veteran gave our mystery away. The police waited until evening and then caught the confederate in the street after he had signalled his "All right." Half-an-hour later they surrounded the old house, broke their way in and not only found the other convict, but found the kidnapped boy a prisoner in one of the rooms. The lad had been fairly well treated, but had been closely guarded every hour since he had come into the man's hands. He had seen only that one man and had been told that he would be set at liberty when his father had paid 250,000 francs as a reward.

The old soldier divided fairly with me, and we were not only enriched by the double reward, but were the means of returning to custody two as desperate criminals as ever broke bars. It was considered an incomprehensible thing in the hospital, and the doctor, nurse and fellow patients were never tired of saying:

"How strange! You lie in your bed and look at the windows of an old house over the way, and lo, there come 15,000 francs rolling in to you."

C. B. LEWIS.

COOK (to policeman): "How neatly you carve that leg of mutton!" Then with a sudden outburst of jealousy: "I believe you have deceived me! I am not your first love."

"I SAY, Pat, did you count all those pigs?"

"Every mother's son of them except one."

"And why did you not count him?"

"Arrah, then, sir, but he was so frisky and ran so much about I couldn't do it at all, at all."

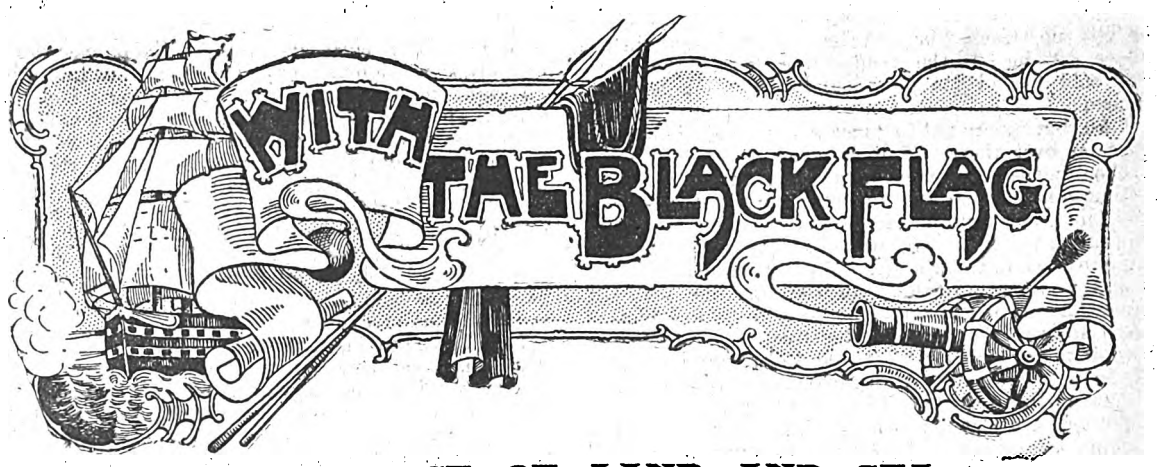
TEACHER: "Johnny, how many different kinds of force are there?"

Johnny: "Three kinds."

Teacher: "Name them."

Johnny: "Bodily force, mental force, and the police force."

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty.
Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.
John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.
General Ariamendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic.
Don Iago Santleo, a friend of Wyvenhoe.
General Urdenetta, Governor of Pampatar, a bitter enemy of Wyvenhoe.
Bolivar, Supreme Chief of the Venezuelan Republic.
Tamanac, an Indian Cazique, and great friend of Santleo.
Master Wyvenhoe, the leading man at Manoa.

CHAPTER XX.

At Manoa.

The Manoeros were evidently of mixed blood, European and Indian, yet though many had the lank hair, and other characteristic features of the aborigines of the land, the complexions even of the most coppery were comparatively light, and not a few were as white as Rosalind, Santley and myself.

Some combined the characteristics of the two races, all were well-proportioned and none ill-looking; the men muscular and powerful, the girls agile and graceful with beautifully rounded arms, and exquisitely moulded hands, ankles, and feet to match.

On the other hand, some of them had rather large mouths and thin lips, but these defects were amply atoned for by the abundance of their hair and the pearly whiteness of their teeth, which, as the young ladies were rather given to mirth, were often displayed.

But the company who came to meet me and the people whom I saw in the village might be the pick of the basket. I had still to see the common folk.

The houses were scattered about in picturesque irregularity, without regard to present or future streets and roads, and as all were single-storied and each had its own garden, the village occupied a good deal of ground.

Wood and sun-dried mud, or bricks, were the building materials of Manoa, the smaller dwellings were oblong or square, the larger arranged round a patio or court, Venezuelan fashion, but the place was far cleaner and more orderly than any Venezuelan village or town I had seen, and the people had an air of prosperity and gaiety which greatly pleased me.

They were of a kindly nature, too, and hospitable. I had to shake hands with everybody, and was introduced to all the chief men, whose names struck me as being in strange contrast with the circumstances and the locality. Among them were Gifford, Thynne, Clark, Cross, Faey, Farrar, Upton and Connock with all of which I had been familiar from my earliest youth, for were they not the names of Gilbert Wyvenhoe's companions as set down in the relation of his travels and adventures? I could almost believe they still lived, and that the next surprise in store for me would be meeting them in the flesh.

The judge invited me to his house, observing that it was his right to entertain me, and that he claimed it both as his duty and a privilege. I accepted the invitation, as the saying goes, with both hands, for he had been very kind and Rosalind's eyes were very bright.

Master Wyvenhoe's house was one of the largest in the village, a house of many rooms, with a patio, a verandah and a spacious garden. His wife, still a fine woman, was obviously of Spanish descent, though how any lady of that race had found her way to Manoa passed my comprehension.

She had two other daughters, Diana and Beatrice, only a shade less fair than Rosalind, and a stalwart son. All spoke English, my hostess with a slight accent, and somehow or somewhere the young people had picked up a few modern phrases, and their manner of speech was less quaint than their father's.

I had no sooner made myself as presentable as the absence of my kit permitted than supper was served in the verandah, to which an appetite, sharpened by that tremendous climb, enabled me to do ample justice; a very good supper, soup, boiled fowl, venison, yams, plantains, bananas, maize cakes and palm wine. For plates we had trenchers, the spoons and forks were made of wood, the drinking vessels of the rinds of gourds, cutlery seemed scarce.

Nevertheless we had an enjoyable meal, and it had been more so, save for one circumstance. The girls waited, which did not comport with my idea of the fitness of things.

It was, of course, very pleasant to have Rosalind standing behind my chair and helping me to this or that, and I think she divined how highly I appreciated her ministrations, and how much rather I would have ministered to her.

Supper over, the ladies withdrew and we three men prepared to smoke, but as this was not exactly what I wanted. I remarked that it was the custom in England for gentlemen to join the ladies, or be joined by them, after the evening meal.

Digitized by Google

"We have the same custom here when only members of the family are present," replied the judge gravely as he filled his pipe.

"Do me the favour to consider me a member of the family, as in a sense I am, being in some sort your kinsman," I said.

On which Master Wyvenhoe laughed genially and bade a servant call the ladies, who came, smiling pleasantly, and when the old man told them that I insisted on being treated as a member of the family they smiled all the more and drew their low wicker chairs up to the hammock in which the judge and I were sitting. But for a while the lasses, though they looked bright and alert, said little or nothing, not out of shyness or diffidence, but because, as I learnt afterwards, it was the custom in Manoa for young people, especially young girls, to refrain from offering remarks until their elders had had their say.

Moreover, all were more eager to listen than to talk, and Master Wyvenhoe set the ball rolling by asking me as many questions as would have taken a whole day fully to answer. He wanted, first of all, to know why I had come to America, next a detailed narration of my voyage thither and subsequent adventures, then a full, true and particular account of the Wyvenhoes from the earliest period of their history to the present time, and a few other things.

This was both alarming and disconcerting, the more so as my curiosity touching Manoa and the Manoeros had increased rather than diminished, and I was eager to learn their history. So I proposed a compromise, saying that after I had given an account of the English Wyvenhoes I hoped he would kindly reciprocate by giving me an account of the American branch of the family, and how his ancestor Walter Wyvenhoe, and the other adventurers had discovered Manoa. Then I added:

"Don't you think that would be fair, Mistress Rosalind?"

They all seemed rather surprised at this appeal, but the young lady answered readily:

"Quite fair, kinsman, but if it pleases you I would liefer hear your answers than your questions."

"Well said," exclaimed her father, "only fair is fair——"

"And I shall be more than fair; I will answer two questions to your one," quoth I, and on this condition the bargain was made.

What I said I need not repeat, I shall set down merely the gist of what I gathered from Master Wyvenhoe then and afterwards, as touching the various things about which I most desired information; and being the custodian of the record wherein the first colonist had given an account of themselves and their adventures he could tell the tale better than anybody else.

After parting with Gilbert Wyvenhoe they continued their quest, being sustained in the hope of finding El Dorado as much by the stories heard from the Indians, many of whom believed in the existence of some such place, as by their own infatuation, wandering hither and thither, scaling mountains, struggling through forests and morasses making long detours to avoid enemies, and often in conflict with Spaniards and unfriendly natives.

Luckily, however, the latter were few, for the wanderers, knowing that their only chance of saving their lives and reaching their goal was to conciliate the Indians, spared no pains to this end, on several occasions making common cause with them against their oppressors.

Whenever the adventurers tarried long in a place the Spaniards were sure to get wind of them; more than once they were hotly pursued and escaped destruction only by the goodness of Providence. So they kept moving on—either by chance or the overlooking of Providence, ever westward—until, at length, they found themselves in the very heart of the Continent, and within sight of the Cordillera of the Andes.

It was very pleasant to have Rosalind standing helping me to this or that.

By this time they had quite lost their reckoning and abandoned all hope of finding Manoa. Their only thought was of returning to England. But how? Those whom they had left in charge of their three ships, hidden in a creek of the Orinoco, the Bold Venture, the Good Intent and the Virgin Queen, had doubtless (despairing of their return) either sailed away or been taken by the Spaniards.

Moreover, to regain the coast by retracing their steps seemed impossible, the distance, by their computation, being not much less than two thousand miles; half their number had perished by the way, and the survivors, weary, footsore, sick and discouraged, desiring nothing so much as a long rest in some region where the natives were kind and the Spaniards unknown. Afterwards, they would try to gain the Pacific coast where, with Heaven's help they might peradventure find a means of returning to England.

So with this intent they pushed on, and finally lighted on the place which eventually became their home.

The Indians in possession were of a higher type than any whom they had previously encountered, better looking, of a lighter hue, some being almost white, also more intelligent. At the outset the Huacos, as they called themselves, were hostile and suspicious, but on finding that the strangers desired to be friendly and did not belong to the hated race they laid aside their distrust and gave them of their best.

The Huacos came from the other side of the Andes, whence they fled to escape from the Spaniards, who had conquered their country and enslaved their people. Their great fear was that the Spaniards might discover their refuge and treat them in like manner, for which reason their Cazique besought the Englishmen to settle in the valley and help them to defend it against their enemies, offering as an inducement, land, wives, and cattle.

For a while the Englishmen hesitated. It was hard to renounce all hope of returning to their native land, but seeing that the countries through which they would have to travel, as also the entire Pacific coast, were in the hands of the enemy, getting back to England was well nigh, if not altogether, impossible.

Digitized by Google

In front and rear, and on both flanks, they were assailed by unseen foes.

Hence there seemed to be no choice; moreover, the valley was fertile, the climate delightful, and last, though perhaps not least, the Huaco women were comely, being even better looking than the men. So, moved by these considerations and thinking that if they went further they were likely to fare worse, the wanderers closed with the Cazique's offer, and as the place had no name they called it Manoa, since though it possessed neither cities of silver nor mountains of gold, it gave them what was far more precious, peace, plenty and freedom from care.

Yet the exiles could not forget their old home, and resolved from the first to remain as English as they might and take such measures as, they trusted, would prevent their descendants from becoming heathens or falling into savagery.

To this end they taught their wives and children English, refusing to hold converse with them in any other tongue. When the children grew up it was laid upon them as a command to teach their descendants in like manner, and as some of the Englishmen lived to be nearly a hundred years old, and were held in great honour, the learning of English became almost a sacred duty.

The settlers had brought with them a Bible and a Book of Common Prayer and three or four other books, out of which they used to read aloud for the instruction of their little ones by many of whom the art was acquired, as also a knowledge of writing. In this way English was kept up as the second mother tongue of the Manoeros, though it was spoken fluently only by the better educated, who were of course the better off, for even in this primitive community there were social distinctions.

Some men had prospered more than others, and these, being the abler, naturally took the lead, and the position which they won was maintained by their descendants.

Nevertheless, there was nothing like tyranny. The population was too limited for representative institutions, and office had become the appanage of certain families, among whom, as I gathered, there was occasionally no little rivalry.

My host was practically a dictator, solely however, by virtue of his personal and moral qualities. His decisions were accepted without demur. But "criminal business" he had none. Theft was unknown; in the absence both of poverty and money, there was no temptation to steal, and the people were besides too unsophisticated to be dishonest. It was all very simple and very patriarchal.

One of the colonists' first proceedings was to explore the mountain. The Cazique protested that it was impossible to get to the top, but some of their number were sailors, all were enterprising, and after divers abortive attempts they succeeded, and by right of first occupation and the Cazique's consent became the owners of the mountain where they took up their abode, greatly preferring it to the plain, for it was both a fortress and a fine estate.

They made the track described by the judge as being practicable for cattle, the Indians helped them to build huts, fell trees and sow crops, but they still kept and turned to good account the pastures in the plain which the Cazique had given them.

Their flocks and herds multiplied, they learnt the uses of the palm tree, and other contrivances; the Huacos, among whom were weavers and other artificers, made them garments, and so it came to pass that the Englishmen had everything they needed, though not all they desired; their greatest want being perhaps tools and iron, which were very scarce.

Yet they were never quite at ease, fearing that the Spaniards might hear of their presence in the country and come on them unawares; for though the mountain was impregnable, they had horses and cattle in the plain and were under a pledge to make common cause with the Huacos in the event of their being attacked.

The danger was undeniable and it behoved the settlers to make such preparations to meet it as they might. Firearms they possessed, but no gunpowder, and none was to be had; so, all having learnt archery in their youth, they made them long-bows and cloth-yard shafts tipped with iron wood, built butts and practised assiduously.

The Indians were also archers, archers, however, who poisoned their arrows, yet the Englishmen, much as they hated the Spaniards, refused to adopt so unmanly a device, for those wounded by these cruel missiles were seldom killed outright but died hours or, it might be, days, afterwards in great torment.

Three years after the wanderers' arrival in the valley what they had feared came to pass.

One day a Huaco, who had been hunting in the mountains, brought word that a strong force of Spaniards had been seen to the north.

This was enough.

Whether the news were true or not they must make ready, and as they had chosen a captain and decided beforehand on a plan of campaign, no time was lost in vain talk.

Digitized by Google

The only opening into the valley from the north was through a pass so narrow that it could be traversed only in single file.

This the Englishmen and their Indian allies, Huacos and others, seized, blocked the mouth of it, loosened the rocks on either side, and lay in ambush along the heights and among the bushes.

When the last of the Spaniards had entered the trap the attack began.

In front and rear, and on both their flanks they were assailed by unseen foes. Arrows pierced them, rocks fell on them. They bore themselves bravely, but it was like fighting against Fate. All died except a poor remnant of the rear-guard, who escaped only to be killed by other enemies as they recrossed the Andes.

Whether the force was an ordinary exploring and surveying expedition, or directed especially against the Huacos and the Englishmen the latter never knew. Be that as it might, they had no further trouble of the sort, and only once were their descendants threatened with a similar danger, which they met as the first had been met and with a like result.

This immunity they no doubt owed to the jealousy with which they kept from the outside world the fact of their existence and the whereabouts of their dwelling place. They could trust their Indian friends not to betray them, and when any of their young men, tiring of the sameness of their existence, wandered forth to see other lands they were required to take a solemn oath never to say or do aught, directly or indirectly, which might cause anybody to suspect that there existed such a place as Manoa or such a people as the Manoeros.

"You are not keeping your word, kinsman," interposed Rosalind.

Some who went never came back, others returned with news, new ideas and books, by which better educated Manoeros set great store. Several brought Creole wives. It was in this way the judge had brought his wife.

Until Santley's return, he was the most travelled man in the community, having been to nearly every city on the Pacific coast, voyaged as far north as California and there fallen in with some "English" Americans, from whom he had learnt things that vastly surprised him, and who, I have no doubt, were equally surprised by his knowledge of their language, the quaintness of his speech and his ignorance of recent history. They gave him several English books, which were highly prized, and had been read in public meeting again and again.

Santley had gone forth with a companion, Edward Cross, visited Cartagena, Caracas, Jamaica, Trinidad and other places. When Santley joined the patriots Cross returned to Manoa. Some time afterwards Santley's father, who was well stricken in years, fearing he had not long to live, and desiring to see his son, sent his compadre, Tamanac, to seek him and bring him home, an undertaking in which, as we know, Tamanac succeeded.

"How about the sinews of war, in these cases?" I inquired. "Travel is costly and as I understand you have no money."

"But we have what answers the same purpose—gold," answered Master Wyvenhoe. "It is found in divers streams that run from these mountains eastward. Indians bring it to us in the shape of dust, for which we give them such articles as we produce and they lack. Some of our people are skilled in weaving, tanning, carving and turning and make many things which the Indians are glad to buy for gold, and of the gold we make rings and other trinkets with which we please our young women and some of our old ones do adorn themselves. Other use for the precious metal have we none, save to pay our wherewithal when we go abroad."

"So here nobody covets gold."

"At any rate, nobody has need of gold; iron is far more useful and almost as scarce. But we have found some ore and are beginning to smelt it. The English Americans I met in Mexico showed me how it was done. They were mining people."

I put it to the judge whether in the event of the patriots expelling the Spaniards it might not be well for the Manoeros to renounce their isolation and enter into friendly relations with the people of Columbia and Peru.

"No, no, that would not do at all. To my thinking 'twere better for Manoa to perish utterly than to pass under the yoke of priests and politicians. If we cannot live our own lives in our own way let us die."

"Well, you are perhaps right. It would be a great risk. But I don't quite understand what the priests have to do with it."

"We are not religious. They would try to convert us and that would breed trouble."

"Do you mean you have no religion?"

"Only the simple religion handed down to us by our forefathers; and what was good enough for them is good enough for us. We observe Sunday, and one or other of us reads passages from the Bible to all who are willing to hear, and exhorts them to fear God, and explains that fearing God means being honest, truthful and industrious, loving one another, and keeping the commandments."

"You have no rites and ceremonies, then?"

"None. I fear you will think us heathens. But it is possible to be very religious without being good. The Spaniards and Creoles are very religious. They go to mass every day. When I was at Lima I went every day, for nothing gives me so much pleasure as sacred music. It was glorious. When I heard the organ pealing and the choir chanting, and the gorgeously arrayed priests intoning,

Digitized by Google

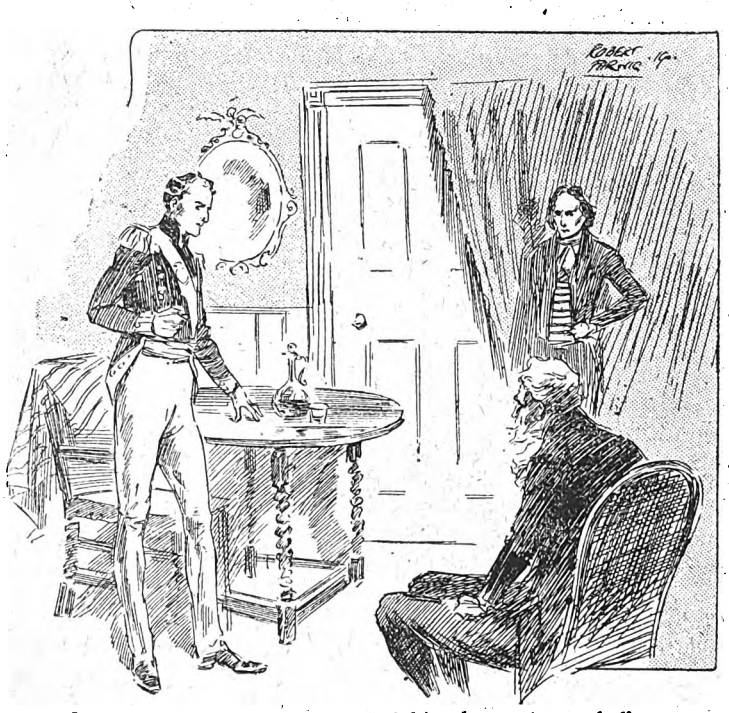
I felt as though I were in Heaven; but when I saw gangs of prisoners chained together in the streets, and heretics burnt at the stake, and political offenders garotted on the Plaza, I thought I was in Hades. Never in my life was I so rejoiced as when I got back to Manoa."

"I don't wonder, all the same——"

"You are not keeping your word kinsman," interposed Rosalind, to whom her mother had just made a whispered communication.

"Not keeping my word. That is a grave charge, Mistress Rosalind," quoth I in surprise.

"Nevertheless, true. You said that if my father answered you once you would answer him twice, yet you are asking continually and answering nothing."



I was about to bid my host good-night, when a strange feeling came over me.

"The charge is true, and I am afraid I have nothing to urge in my defence. All I can do is to plead guilty, and throw myself on the mercy of the court."

My compliment missed fire; the ladies had never heard of the graces, so I had to explain again, rather lamely, for I had forgotten their names, whereat the young ladies seemed somewhat disappointed, but by way of illustrating my explanation, and as I hoped, propitiating them, I quoted a line of Prior's which I happened to remember:

"The loves delighted and the graces played."

I had done better to let poetry alone.

"What are the loves?" queried Beatrice, a bright-eyed maiden of fourteen or fifteen summers.

"Why were they delighted?" demanded Diana.

"What did the graces play at?" asked Rosalind.

It would have been easier to say that I could not tell them for my attempted further explanation proved so disastrous a failure that I besought them to put me out of my misery by passing sentence forthwith.

On this the sisters put their pretty heads together, and after a whispered conference Rosalind announced my doom. For the remainder of the evening I was to answer questions and ask none.

"Very well," I said. "Who will begin?"

"My father, of course."

"Nay, you lassies must settle that among yourselves. I am not going to meddle," put in the judge.

"Diana is the eldest, let her begin."

"Oh, but I cannot, there are so many things I want to ask that I don't know what to ask first," exclaimed Diana helplessly.

"Beatrice, then."

"Give me one minute to think," said Beatrice.

"Never mind about thinking. Ask whatever may occur to you," quoth I.

"How old are you?"

It was now my turn to be taken aback, but I answered promptly, amid general laughter:

"Twenty-seven."

"Only twenty-seven! You look years older than that. Rosalind was the nearest, she guessed twenty-nine. I guessed thirty-three, Diana thirty-six."

"Don't let thy tongue run so fast, child," put in Rosalind chidingly—she was barely two years her sister's senior. "After so hard a journey our kinsman may well look older than his age. Moreover, thy question was unseemly."

"Thee ask him one then."

"May I, kinsman?"

"Of course. Am I not undergoing my punishment?"

"I hope you will not consider it a punishment to give us an account of your home. You said a little while ago that you had a place in the country. It would be very pleasant to hear more about it, how old it is, how large, what like, and whether it was built by one of your forefathers, who was perhaps one of ours, and whatever else you may like to tell us, for all of which we should be greatly beholden to you, should we not, father?"

"Thou art right, lass, we should," said the judge, and I responded to Rosalind's request with good will, for the way in which it was put pleased me even more than the theme she had chosen, and Wyvenhoe Court was the dearest spot to me in all the world.

When I had finished my description and answered several incidental questions, Mistress Wyvenhoe suggested that I must feel very tired and the judge declared it was bedtime. On which the ladies retired, and I was about to bid my host good night, when a strange uncanny feeling came over me, as though the ground under my feet were shivering.

"What is that?" I exclaimed.

"So you felt it, too! A sort of quiver, was it not?"

"Yes."

"It happens sometimes, though being so slight it is not perceived by everybody."

"What is it?"

"Nobody knows exactly. I believe it is occasioned by the river. When there has been heavy snow on Mount Lofty and, may be, heavy rain lower down, the river rises to a great height and the sudden rush of water——"

"Causes a vibration?"

"Yes, a slight vibration."

"Not a slight earthquake, you think?"

"We have no earthquakes here. Only that slight vibration caused by the river, which not one person in ten observes," said the judge rather sharply as though he were resenting an imputation on the fair fame of his beloved mountain. And, then we exchanged good-nights and betook ourselves to bed.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

Result of Competition No. 2.

THE following six competitors sent in the correct results, and the prize of £100 has therefore been divided between them, each competitor receiving £16 13s. 4d:

W. Owens, 4 Pindar Street, Everton, Liverpool.
Mrs. J. W. Page, Ivy Bank, Wroxham, Norwich.
J. Auckland, 10 Beacon Street, Lichfield, Staffs.
David Gillespie, 12 Keir Street, Pollockshields, Glasgow.
D. Pope, 5 Vernon Place, Birkenhead.
T. W. Scurrell, 34 Brunswick Avenue, Beverley Road, Hull.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, November 10th. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 5. Matches to be played on Saturday, November 10th.

MATCHES TO BE PLAYED ON SATURDAY, NOV. 10TH.	Free	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
1 NOTTS FOREST v. 2 DERBY COUNTY
1 LIVERPOOL v. 2 ASTON VILLA
1 BLACKBURN ROVERS v. 2 SUNDERLAND
1 WEST BROMWICH ALB. v. 2 SHEFFIELD WEDNESDAY
1 MANCHESTER CITY v. 2 NOTTS COUNTY
1 WALSALL v. 2 BURNLEY
1 SMALL HEATH v. 2 CHESTERFIELD
1 NEW BRIGHTON v. 2 LEICESTER FOSSE
1 WOOLWICH ARSENAL v. 2 NEWTON HEATH
1 QUEEN'S PARK RANG. v. 2 SOUTHAMPTON

The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, November 9th, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "COUPON No. 5," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. In the event of a tie the prize will be divided.
7. Competitors may send in any number of attempts.
8. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains valuable information and statistics showing the previous records of the various clubs, and the particulars of the points of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in determining the chances of the teams engaged. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT BABIES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Impudent Comedian," by F. Frankfort Moore, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. George Daniels, of 20 Princess Street, Accrington. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about SNAKES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 12th. Post-cards only, please.

Baby's First Tooth.

A FEW months after the birth of a friend's baby the whole town was aroused one night by a terrible commotion at his house. He was leaning out of the window, shouting at the top of his voice and then he would brandish a revolver and fire it.

The police thought that burglars had entered his dwelling, and while they were bursting open the back door, a rumour spread that the house was on fire. The engine soon arrived, ladders were raised, and they commenced to play on it.

The policemen broke open the front door and rushed in, the owner of the house meeting them on the stairs.

"Come in—come right upstairs, gentlemen, and see it."

"See what?" inquired the Chief of the Police.

"Why, the baby's tooth. It's just cut one."

"But I thought burglars were in, or the house was on fire."

"I never said so," he replied. But that baby's tooth cost him a good round sum for damages and repairs.

G. D.

Wanted to Remedy the Mistake.

BOBBIE had long and earnestly desired a baby brother and a pair of white rabbits.

The answer to both wishes came on the same morning, but not in a manner satisfactory to Bobbie, for there were two baby brothers and only one white rabbit. Bobbie was greatly disgusted at the mistake.

The next day his father found the following notice tacked on the gatepost:

FOR SAIL
ONE NICE FAT BABY
OR I WILL SWOP HIM FOR A WHITE RAB-BET.

A. B.

Improving the Landscape.

"PLEASE, mum, if the twins is asleep, will you let ma borrow your perambulator?"

"But you haven't any baby."

"No, mum; but there's a man comin' to photograph our house, and ma thinks the perambulator would look awful nice standin' in the front garden."

H. B. T.

"If I Were a Mother."

IT was washing-day, and Johnny, aged two, had been allowed to wander a little.

At dinner-time he returned, with his pockets dripping with pitch.

"Oh, you naughty boy!" said his mother, "I shall have to tell father of you."

Johnny eyed her tearfully and replied:

"Well, muvver, if I was a muvver and you were a naughty boy, I shouldn't tell father."

S. A.

Securing an Encore.

IT was Fido's first bath, and with eyes bluer and rounder than the saucers in her doll's tea-service Baby Doris rapturously watched the process of soaping and laving, from which the pup emerged as white and spotless as driven snow.

Then, with her own tiny fingers she rubbed Fido down and wrapped him up in warm flannels, after which, with a pretty pretence of weariness she fell asleep by his side.

But not for long were her sweet baby eyes closed in slumber.

Happening to look out of the window a few minutes later, mother was horrified to see baby rolling Fido in a half-dried pool of rain-water, while she screamed, in a voice of mock distress:

"Muvver, muvver, det de tub out aden. Naughty Fido's been an' dot unwashed!"

R. A. H. G.

After the Explosion.

THERE is a little mother in Wales who has a sixteen-months' infant son who is the apple of her eye, and whom she evidently regards as something of a heavy-weight.

She resides a few hundred yards from the scene of a recent colliery explosion, and her house was one that felt the shock.

A friend afterwards expressed his sympathy.

"And did you really feel the explosion?" he asked.

"Yes, indeed," she replied; "it shook the house from garret to cellar."

"What did you think was the matter?" he curiously questioned.

"I thought baby had fallen out of bed," was the unexpected answer.

E. E.

Digitized by Google

Not an Uncle.

GRANDPA: "Well, Fred, you're an uncle now; you ought to be proud over it."

Little Fred: "No, I oughtn't to; I ain't no uncle."

Grandpa: "Why not?"

Little Fred: "'Cause I'm an aunt. The new baby's a girl."

J. M.

Mr. Bowser's Baby Elixir.

MRS. BOWSER, on returning from a visit to her mother the other evening, found her lord in the midst of an evil smell in the kitchen, bottling a villainous looking compound of his own manufacture.

"I have here," exclaimed Mr. Bowser grandiloquently, "a concoction of roots, herbs, gums, and bark, which I guarantee——"

"What is it?" interrupted Mrs. Bowser; "dog poison?"

Mr. Bowser glared.

"It is an elixir," he snapped, "for fractious infants, and I am about to put it to a practical test," and seizing his bottle he left the house.

Just down the street a woman stood gossiping with her back to a perambulator, in which an infant wailed and screamed like a second-hand set of bagpipes.

Bowser crept up and applied the bottle to the lips of the performer.

The fumes partially asphyxiated the child, and the mother, alarmed at the sudden cessation of the melody, turned round.

"You willan!" she gasped, "would you poison my kid? You——!!!"

When Bowser emerged from the dust-up, his own dog would not have known him, and no prizefighter was ever in sorrier plight.

Mrs. Bowser let him in at the front door.

"Wouldn't it have been wiser to have tried the elixir on the mother first?" she said soothingly; but for once Bowser had no retort ready.

E. C.

Sceptic and Believer.

A YOUNG man, who looked as if he might be about twenty-five years old, was sitting in the waiting room of the station. On his knee was a year old baby.

Presently the baby began to cry, and the awkwardness and helplessness of the young man was so marked as to attract general attention.

At this point one of the waiting passengers, a fat and amiable-looking man, crossed the room and said to the distressed baby-tender:

"A young woman gave you that baby to hold while she went to see about her luggage, didn't she?"

"Yes."

"Well, now, I knew it as soon as I saw you. You expect her back, I suppose?"

"Of course."

"Ha! ha! Excuse me, but I can't help laughing. A woman once played the same trick on me. I was in Leeds. You're caught, young man. She took you for a soft 'un."

"Oh, she'll come back," answered the young man as he looked anxiously round.

"She will, eh! Ha! ha! ha! What makes you think so?"

"Why, because she's my wife, and this is our first baby."

"Oh—um—I see," muttered the fat man, and he was in such haste to get back to the other side of the room that he nearly fell over a passing pug dog.

G. E. G.

What's the Matter?

"WHY, Tommy, what's the matter?" asked the indulgent mamma of her four-year-old son.

"Nurse won't div me a pretty fing in the pail of water," said Tommy, sobbing.

"Tell her if she doesn't give it to you this minute, I will tell papa," replied his mamma.

Tommy soon returned, saying, "She won't div it to me."

"Nurse, how dare you refuse to give dear little Tommy what he wants!" said mamma, appearing on the scene. "Here is your master; perhaps you will obey him."

"What is it my Tommy wants? Give it to him instantly, nurse, or depart from the house!" said papa.

"I am very sorry, sir," said the nurse coolly, "to have annoyed you, but I cannot give him what he wants, for how can I give him the moon that is shining in the pail?"

Papa and mamma return to the house dejectedly.

F. W.

A BOOK FOR LADIES.

The Art of Beauty.

By A TOILET SPECIALIST.

Crown 8vo, cloth. Post free, 1s. 2d.

Some of the Chapters are:

THE CURE OF STOUTNESS	Chap. I.
THE CURE OF LEANNESS	,, II.
THE FIGURE	,, IV.
BAD COMPLEXIONS: HOW TO CURE THEM	,, V.
THE COMPLEXION	,, VI.
THE HAIR IN HEALTH	,, VII.
THE HAIR IN ILL-HEALTH	,, VIII.
MOLES, WARTS, AND SUPERFLUOUS HAIR	,, XIII.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C.

WHO WANTS KRUGER'S HAT?

DON'T you think it would look nice on your drawing-room table, or under a glass case on your mantel-piece? Well, there is no reason whatever why you should not get it. As you probably know, the Editor of Pearson's Weekly has bought it, and is offering it as a prize in a simple competition. All you have to do is to send in what you consider the funniest joke you ever heard. It may be either cut from a paper or written up by yourself. In either case you must affix to it a coupon which will be found in the current number of Pearson's Weekly.

Kruger's Hat would be a splendid thing to show your friends on Christmas Day.

Digitized by Google

AN UNCONSCIOUS PRIZE.

"NED, I've a serious proposal to make."

"What is it, Jack?"

But Jack was slow in responding and it was clear that the subject was a very serious one.

His brows were knitted and his forehead wrinkled. He wished to speak, yet was diffident about giving expression to his thoughts.

Ned watched him narrowly, and his own face assumed in sympathy an appearance that was as serious as that upon the countenance of his friend.

"Out with it, old chap!" exclaimed Ned at length.

"It's like this," began Jack with just a show of nervousness, and placing his cigarette on the ash tray. "We've been good friends for years, haven't we? And we don't want to begin to be otherwise after all this time, do we?"

"Now what's the matter?" asked Ned, following the other's example by placing his cigarette on the ash tray. "Let's have it and never mind the palaver."

Jack Myers looked round the club room to see that they were alone and began.

"Look here, we are both sweet on Emily Inglis—" He stopped short as if he had said too much, but an affirmative nod from Ned settled that point. "Well, that's agreed."

"And we have reason to believe, from the nice way in which she treats us, that she—that she—."

"Yes," assented his companion, who was more inclined to go straight to the point. "She thinks a good deal of us; whenever we see her at a cycle meet, or a soirée, or anyw here else, which is pretty often, it seems to me that she shows more favour to us than to anyone else."

"That's what I was coming to, Ned, and I think we may admit that she has shown no preference for either of us. In short, our chances are about equal."

Ned nodded.

He began to have some idea of what his friend was driving at.

"We are both sensible fellows," resumed Jack, now more at ease, "and we know very well that we can't both have her. On the other hand, I believe that her feelings towards us must be just at that stage when she would fall in love—violently in love—with either of us if the other fellow were not there to divide and distract her attention. It's a sort of 'how happy could I be with either,' you know."

"You don't think that it is our fate to marry a certain person—our counterpart, the one destined for us, and all that sort of thing?" Ned sighed.

"No, I don't; it's all bosh!" was the emphatic rejoiner. "If that were so, you would find a man marrying a woman who is out in Australia or some other country more often than is the case at present. So the case stands like this: We are both fond of the girl, and she would be fond of one of us, if there were only one of us. That's clear, isn't it?"

It was not put quite so clearly as Jack imagined, but Ned knew what was meant.

"The question is, then, which one of us shall retire," pursued Jack. "How shall we decide it?"

It was a difficult matter to decide. Both young fellows were fair specimens of manhood, and their social positions and prospects were equal. Naturally, neither cared to give way; and they could not ask the girl herself to decide, because she had hitherto shown no preference, and it would be unfair to force her on the spur of the moment to make a choice—unfair alike to her and to them.

Various suggestions were made—that they should abide by the result of a toss, that the one who first saw the girl should be the one to stay or the one to go away, and so on, but there was too much chance about those suggestions and they were rejected. Finally, as the best way out of the difficulty, they agreed upon a bicycle race for several miles along a country road, the loser to retire and leave the other to go in and win the girl.

"In the circumstances," remarked Ned as they rose to leave the comfortable room of the cycle club, "I do not think that this arrangement can be considered disrespectful to Miss Inglis, whom we both admire."

They had not left the club house far behind them when they met Miss Emily Inglis—met her so suddenly on turning a corner that they were quite taken aback and had some difficulty in collecting themselves quickly enough to answer her greeting without appearing foolish.

It was no wonder that the young fellows were "sweet," on her; and at that particular moment she looked so bewitching that in the breast of each young man there suddenly arose a feeling of jealousy towards the other.

"I am sorry that I shall not be at the meet to-morrow afternoon," said Miss Inglis after they had exchanged a few sentences of the usual kind about the weather and similar topics.

"Not be there!" said Jack and Ned in chorus. "Oh, that's a pity!"

"It won't be half so enjoyable without you, Miss Inglis," said Ned Hallam.

"I don't think I shall go now," observed Jack. He felt a little annoyed that Ned should have made the remark about the meet not being so enjoyable; it looked as though his companion was trying to advance himself unfairly, and felt impelled to go one better.

Emily Inglis looked curiously at them both; then she became grave.

"I am going away for a few days," she observed quietly. "I did not expect to go so soon, but—I hope you will have an agreeable afternoon to-morrow. Good evening, Mr. Meyers. Good evening, Mr. Hallam."

And she vanished round the corner.

"Perhaps it's as well, after all, that she is going away for a while," remarked Jack philosophically. "We shall have no disturbing influence now, and our race will be over by the time she gets back. It wasn't altogether fair of you to make that remark, old chap, see how quiet she became. I fancy she guessed something."

"I like that!" expostulated Ned. "Her demeanour did not change until you said something about not going, you know."

Digitized by Google

There was just a little coolness between the friends when they parted, but it soon wore off. Each went in training so far as circumstances would permit for the great race which was to decide their fate at the end of another week—the race was fixed for the following Saturday afternoon—and both were equally determined to strain every nerve in the competition. The contest promised to be exciting, for there was not much to choose between them in strength and skill.

They decided to keep the matter a secret; they required no starter or referee; they had sufficient confidence in one another to believe that each would act fairly, and it was hardly likely that there would be any great distance between them. Moreover, when the winner arrived at the inn which was to be the goal, he would request somebody to take note of his arrival.

The race was to be ridden in ordinary cycling costume, so as not to excite curiosity. The loser undertook to remove to some other town within a specified period.

On the fateful afternoon the competitors rode to the starting point, about half-a-mile out of the town. From this point there was a fairly good run over a quiet road for eight miles; the exact distance in a straight line would not have been more than five miles, this route having been chosen because they were far less likely to meet other cyclists.

The signal for starting was arranged thus. A blade of grass was placed on a branch of a tree where the wind would catch it and take it off; the competitors, with their machines in line, would watch the blade of grass, and when they saw it topple over they would start.

Their faces expressive of grim determination, Jack and Ned kept their eyes fixed on the signal; there was a murmur of excitement from both men as the blade of grass was swept away by a gust of wind, then they were off.

Not a word was spoken, both men saved their breath and did their utmost. There was no question of holding in until the end, and then making a sudden spurt in order to win by surprising the competitor rather than by real strength or skill. They were to go as hard as they could and get there in the shortest time.

The pace was a telling one, and by the time half-a-dozen miles had been covered they were nearly knocked up; both men felt that they had overdone it at the start.

A decrease of speed, it was tacitly agreed, should come only with a decrease of strength. When not more than half-a-mile from the end, they were still going at a great pace; Ned leading by half-a-dozen yards. Jack was straining every muscle to overtake his rival and was gradually getting closer.

Only a quarter of a mile to go, and they were abreast.

The one thought was in both minds—which would win? Then an accident occurred, and to this day Jack and Ned cannot tell exactly what happened.

A couple of dogs, one chasing the other, suddenly ran out into the road just ahead of them; both men, in their sudden anxiety, attempted to curve, there was a crash—and the race was over.

It was half-an-hour later when Jack and Ned, trundling their damaged machines, arrived at the inn, but instead of asking someone to note their arrival, they were annoyed because too much notice was taken of it.

However, they put the best face on it, made arrangements to have the bicycles sent to the repairing shop in town on the Monday morning, and proceeded to make themselves as comfrotable as they could.

"I suppose we shall have to ride it again," remarked Ned, moodily, rubbing a bump on the back of his head.

"Look's like it," observed Jack as he stretched a grazed shin.

It was dusk when they reached town by train. They had made themselves presentable and thought they had better go to the club in case their absence should excite suspicion. But here they were doomed to receive another shock.

"I say, you follows," said Alec Jeeks, apostrophising the rivals, "have you heard the latest? Emily Inglis is engaged to a fellow in Manchester! Fact! Had it from my sister—great chum of Emmie's—says they have known each other some time and been corresponding, and now they are engaged. She went to Manchester last Saturday to stay with his mother, you know. Settled it up there. Going to be married in six weeks."

And away went Alec to tell somebody else.

"Ned," said Jack solemnly, "we've made fools of ourselves!"

"Tell me something fresh!" exclaimed Ned sarcastically.

"That's why she looked grave at what we said the other day. But I never suspected it. Suppose that her manner towards us was just the same as towards anybody else—that girl is bound to be nice to everybody, she can't help it! It was our own imagination that made it appear different. Lucky beggar! I shall never marry!"

"Neither shall I!" said Jack just as decidedly.

It will be well to record a brief conversation which took place between Jack and Ned some four months later.

"Jack, you remember what you said about its being all bosh that we must marry the one destined for us? Well, I've got the sweetest, the best——"

"Yes, I know. So have I. I'm going to try to get her to fix the day soon." G. A. Day.

"He's looking for a wife," they said to her pointedly.

"He would be an object of greater interest to me," she replied with some asperity, "if he were looking for a single woman."

"She felt the strong arm of the law," he said, speaking of a woman who had got into trouble.

"How delightful?" commented the demure young thing.

"What is delightful?" he demanded in surprise.

"To feel a strong arm," she answered softly.

They are still sitting on that shaded seat on Yarmouth Parade.

It is not 20 TT's R, nor yet
XX Teas Sir,
Just simply
TWENTY TEAZER.

Digitized by Google

WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE

A MAN with his own way to make in the world ought to have two wives. The law should permit that. This was the burden of Jarvis Jessup's thought as he sat alone in the gloom of his unlighted library.

There should be a rich wife to begin with, of course, for a man must have money. But a rightly-constituted man needs more than money. He needs social opportunity, so that his money may produce its full effect. To gain that, the right kind of wife is a most precious helpmeet. Sometimes the rich wife is not at all precious in that way. Jarvis Jessup knew that.

But, unhappily, two wives at once are out of the question. Well, then, it ought to be lawful to expunge the rich wife when she has become detrimental. As things are now, she must be kept on the books long after she has ceased to be profitable.

At this point in his meditations, Mr. Jessup was startled by feeling some unaccountable and indescribable sound near him. He did not hear it—he felt it. It was like an inaudible cackle of diabolical laughter. A ghost might have laughed so, for another ghost to hear. It disturbed Jarvis for the moment, and made him uncomfortable.

But probably it was some queer echo in one of the library alcoves. He was not very familiar with the properties of his library. He often sat here of an evening, and reflected on his greatness, finding the library more satisfactory than any other sort of lumber-room to sit in; and that was all the use he had for it. But he had never "felt" that sound of strange laughter before.

Jarvis Jessup was a self-made man. The difference between him and the sort of men already made was considerable; but he was eminently satisfied with his own job, holding it greatly superior to the other kind. True there was still a good deal to be done; but when he had quite finished himself, men and other beings would see something well worth seeing. The steps of progress thus far were what he loved to comtemplate.

He had put vast wealth in the place of miserable poverty. That was a process pleasant to think upon. No matter how he had accomplished it. When a man has so many millions as this man now possessed, questions are impertinent.

His wife made his future more difficult; for, unhappily, she was a woman, he thought, to be ashamed of. Coarse and ignorant as she was, she could not prevent his progress, of course, but she hindered it. An aspiring man should not be hampered by such conditions. He wished he might be rid of this incumbrance, at whatever sacrifice.

As he came back to this, the starting-point of his reflections, Jarvis felt again the same strange echo of diabolical laughter. He got up and peered nervously into the dark corners of the room. He could see nothing and hear nothing; so he sat down again and listened to his thoughts.

They dwelt upon his daughter now. She was his reliance where his wife failed him so miserably. He was not ashamed of his daughter. She was beautiful and attractive. She was even brilliant. The money expended for her many accomplishments had been well invested; for now she reflected upon her father much of the light that is shed from high places. What more could he desire?

But he had trouble with her, too. It is a grievous thing when a father finds his own child arrayed against him. And the unhappy experience had come upon this father in the very turn and crisis of his shining career. If he were thwarted now, his most precious opportunity would be lost. Therefore he would not be thwarted.

At the expense of much effort he had secured the "option" of a son-in-law just to his mind. Many had been offered to him, but they were not what he wanted. It had so happened that his daughter did not want them either; but that was merely a trifling coincidence, of no real significance whatever. Here, at last, in his very grasp, was the very article he coveted. The man was available in every way. He owned as many millions as Jarvis Jessup himself, and he held keys to open the most exalted doors. So allied, this anxious father might rest from all his labours.

Then how sharper than a serpent's tooth the perversity of his only child. For in this case, also, the daughter did not approve. The preposterous excuse for her wickedness was a pronounced preference for some man of her own choosing; but that was only a trifling difficulty. Jarvis could manage his daughter easily enough. If only he could dispose thus easily of the wife that had become unprofitable.

Digitized by Google

Again his wife. Perhaps he thought so much of her to-night because this was their marriage anniversary. Twenty-five years ago this night he had taken her fortune with the incumbrance of herself. Twenty-five years was quite long enough for an ambitious man to wear such fetters as bound him to this undesirable woman.

He was startled by a faint light, shone about him from somewhere in the darkness. Then he saw a small flame moving through the gloom. At first it seemed to move of itself, but soon he saw that a hand guided it. A white-robed figure was revealed behind the flame. Do spirits of light come when the powers of darkness call them?

The next moment Jarvis Jessup smiled in mortified amusement at his own fears. The white-robed figure was his daughter, come to the library in search of a book. Being the only one who ever sought books there, she expected darkness in the room, and was prepared for it. She carried a pretty little silver lamp of antique pattern and by means of it she had scared her father most dismally.

The feeble torch did not reveal to her that the place was already occupied, and she moved with unrestrained carelessness from alcove to alcove; the perfumed oil of the lamp giving forth a faint fragrance as of spice-offerings to a goddess. No goddess was this, however. She was simply a bright, lovable, loving girl; grown a little awry in the arid soil and the unwholesome weather of home. As she carried her little lamp from place to place now she sang softly to herself fragments of a gay love-song.

The love-song was harsh discord in the ears of her father. If it had been a song of gold, now, or of high society. Anger at the foolish song made him forget the more foolish words that had frightened him so. He would give the girl something to think about besides love-nonsense.

"Grace, I have something to say to you. Come here."

The unexpected sound of his voice startled her a little, but evidently she was not much impressed by his presence or his words. As she came and stood before him there was, in her face and manner, a veiled insolence that suggested contempt for him and his pretensions. He was her father and she must wear for him a mask of respect. But he was also a man of ignoble baseness, so under the mask she must needs smile in derision. Filial love? Hardly, without at least a twig of paternal love for that heavenly vine to twine itself about.

"Grace,"—the father spoke sternly, but without looking into the beautiful, clear eyes, shining above him—"Mr. Atherton will call on you to-morrow. He has something to ask which you must answer. And I may as well tell you beforehand that your answer must be 'yes.' Do you understand? Your answer must be 'yes.'"

Grace calmly looked him over for an uncomfortable half-minute.

"Mr. Atherton has his answer already," she said quietly. "And I must say he behaved very well, considering how old he is, and how hopelessly vulgar."

"He has been here? Well? You knew my wishes; did you answer him according to them?"

"He wished to marry me, not you," said Grace. "So I gave him my answer, not yours. The answer he got was 'no.'"

"So!"

"Marry your beggar if you dare!"

The word was simply an exasperating sneer. The man was angry, but he would not dignify this petty revolt by treating it seriously.

"Mr. Atherton will call on you again to-morrow," he went on. "And he will get a different answer. You shall write him an apology to-night, and ask him to come and receive your final answer. And when he comes you will make the answer fit your duty."

"What if I refuse all this—as I certainly shall?"

"If! There's no 'if' about it. Do you suppose I'm going to lose the chance of my life-time for a baby whim of yours? Do you suppose I'm going to miss the advantages George Atherton can give me because you fancy yourself in love with a beggar? A fellow with a paltry hundred thousand, and absolutely without social position? If you refuse! Refuse if you dare! Marry your beggar if you dare! Do you know what I will do? I'll—But you won't refuse!"

"I certainly do refuse."

Grace spoke very earnestly. She set down the lamp on the table beside them, and stood directly before her father with her hands tightly clasped. That was the only sign of excitement—the tight clenching of her fingers.

"Now listen to me, father. We had best understand each other once for all."

She stopped abruptly in great alarm. Something dreadful had befallen her father. Some great terror had overwhelmed him. He sat cowering back in his chair, shrinking away from some frightful thing his staring eyes beheld. His features were convulsed, and his very hair seemed to stir above his scared brain.

Grace could see nothing to account for all this. Certainly her words had not produced the startling change.

Digitized by Google

She knew they would enrage him, but surely they would not terrify him. She leant over him and laid her hand anxiously upon his arm. She would have spoken soothingly to him, having a woman's instinct to relieve suffering; but he put her away with a trembling hand and his stiff lips shaped themselves to the one word:

"Go!"

So, in great bewilderment, she hastened away in search of her mother. She left her little lamp behind. In the light it shed, Jarvis Jessup looked again to see the frightful thing that had so affected him.

And, behold, it was only a shadow! Grace had set her lamp beside a bronze figure on the table. The shadow of this figure had leapt, like a grotesque, live thing across the table towards Jarvis; and in its odd and gruesome distortion it was the shadow of a demon. He recognized it as the shadow of the horrible presence that had been mocking him. And the wavering flame caused the impish shadow to leap and dance upon the table in fiendish glee. No wonder the haunted man was frightened.

But he was not frightened now. He was ashamed of his momentary weakness, and therefore in a worse temper than ever. In this frame of mind his wife found him. Summoned by her daughter, she had hurried to him in much anxiety. For in spite of twenty-five years in his company, this foolish woman still had love for her husband. How that could be, let the man who understands a woman's heart explain.

"What's the matter, Jessup?" she cried, coming to him in awkward haste. "Whew! What have you been burning matches for? You've filled the room full of brimstone! Say, what ails you?"

"Nothing ails me. Why are you here? I did not send for you."

He spoke with contemptuous impatience, as if some servant had been rather too presumptuous. But Mrs. Jessup was not visibly affected by his words. She was not a whit more in awe of his greatness than her daughter was.

"I did not send for you," Jarvis repeated. "But seeing you are here, I'll give you something to do. Find Grace, and tell her I insist on her doing what I ordered. She must do it this hour. Tell her I shall find ways to punish her if she disobeys! Go! and do as I bid."

"Don't you be simple, Jessup! Grace told me what you said. You don't suppose she's going to do such a thing as that, do you? Ask that old hunk to come back and marry her? She'd be a fool! Of course she won't do it, and you can't make her do it. Let old Atherton go. There's money enough without his. And you just tell Grace she can have Frank Julian. Frank's well enough off, and a better or nicer young fellow doesn't exist. You just say 'yes' to that; won't you, Jessup?"

She laid her hand in coaxing caress on his head, and waited for him to speak. He thrust her hand away with a gesture that was an insult.

"You surely don't suppose I am going to argue the matter with you—with you?" he said.

"Say 'yes,' Jessup!"

"Woman! you annoy me enough by being alive, without encouraging my child to be disobedient. I won't have that. Now go!"

She was not afraid of him, but he had power to hurt her. He had hurt her now. With a pain in her heart, she moved slowly away. Three steps made her invisible in the gloom, and her husband dismissed her from his mind.

"Admirable!"

The demon shadow leapt in mad glee. It seemed to have voice as well as life now, for surely it had spoken that word of approbation. And the voice was the silent echo made audible. With terrifying distinctness Jarvis Jessup heard the word. Anybody could hear it. His fears had been prophets, then.

Yes, and there was the confirmation of the prophecy. The shadow-demon was hidden now; for between Jarvis and the table, a shape had come, which almost caused the man to swoon with fear. And yet the thing was not so very dreadful to look upon. It was simply the form of a man; and, so far as appearance went, the man might have been a highly respectable prospective defaulter.

"Good evening, old friend!" said the Shape.

"You—you have—the advantage—of me," Jarvis stammered through his chattering teeth.

"Certainly. That is why I am here. I have called with my account. This is the end of the quarter, and my time for settlement."

"I—I have no outstanding accounts," Jarvis protested with an abject pretence of bluster.

"You will hardly be able to repudiate this one; and you will please give it prompt attention. I have already waited some time here, being unwilling to interrupt conversations with ladies. However, I enjoyed hearing you talk. You proved yourself such a customer as I love to deal with. Now to business."

The visitor seated himself on the edge of the table, and spread out a paper which he had carried in his hand.

"Here is the account," he said. "You wanted an article I could furnish. You offered the price I demanded, and I delivered the property. The date of delivery is here—just twenty-five years ago to-night. The transaction recorded is, the delivery to Jarvis Jessup of Matilda Bowen, with the fortune to her appertaining. Consideration—One Soul. You remember it? I was sure you would! You needed a rich wife, and had said you would give your soul for Matilda Bowen and her fortune. But I need not trouble you recalling the details. I am here to receive the amount due to me for my share in the transaction."

"No, no! Give me longer time! I didn't mean it for a bargain! I gave you no writing!"

The pitiful wretch in the chair shrieked the words, and cowered away from his dread creditor. The Shape, unmoved by his outcry, sat and smiled upon him implacably.

But the debtor's appeal for mercy had response. And of all beings in the universe, the one who came to Jarvis Jessup in his dire strait was Matilda Bowen, the wife he had just sent from him with reviling. Hearing voices before she reached the door, she had paused in surprise, and then had stayed in consternation. She realized who the creditor was; but if she was not afraid of Jarvis Jessup, she most certainly was not afraid of this other!

"Don't mind him, Jarvis," she said, coming to her husband, and laying her hand on his head again. "I'll manage him! All you've got to do is to say 'yes' to Grace and Frank Julian. Will you do that?"

Jarvis nodded with craven eagerness, clutching pitifully at her dress the while.

"Is that a promise—sure?" she demanded of him.

"Yes! Yes! Help me!"

"All right. Now," turning to the creditor, "you've got me to deal with!"

Digitized by Google

CHIVERS'

DELICIOUS! WHOLESOME! REFRESHING!

FLAVOURED WITH RIPE FRUIT JUICES.

DR. GORDON STABLES, R.N.: "No home is complete without these pure and excellent Jellies, which add to our health and luxury."

MEDICAL PRESS: "Chivers' Jellies are to be commended for the delicacy of their flavour, and for their absolute purity."

GRANVILLE H. SHARPE, F.C.S.: "Of the highest standard of purity and excellence."

FREE SAMPLE on receipt of post-card. S. CHIVERS and SONS, Histon, Cambridge.

JELLIES.

Neuralgia Positively Cured!

Free Test Offered.

The annexed cut presents in the prominent white lines the nerves most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. Sufferers will know only too well the pain tracks, and will be glad to know of a Simple and Sure Remedy. The proprietors will send Free two sample Zox Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped envelope to ZOX CO., 11 HATTON GARDEN, LONDON, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NOSE medically approved, 11/6.

MACHINES. LEES RAY, S.S. Dept., South Castle St. Liverpool, is a specialist on Ugly and Red Noses. Send stamp for particulars of his patent scientific Nose Improvers. Red Nose Cure, 3/9. Outstanding Ear Machines

FREE. FREE. NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money. Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 12/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5). 283 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1	Cash Prize £50	£50 0
1	Cash Prize, £40	40 0
10	Handsome Pianos, in walnut, £40 each	400 0
5	Cash Prizes, £25 each	125 0
10	Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10	Ladies' Bicycles, Free-wheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10	Cash Prizes, £10 each	100 0
20	Jones's Sewing Machines, £8 each	160 0
20	Cash Prizes, £5 each	100 0
50	Rolled Gold Lever Watches, £2 10s. each	125 0
100	Cash Prizes, £2 each	200 0
50	Dinner Services (56 pieces), £2 each	100 0
50	Folding Bed Chairs, £2 each	100 0
50	Ladies' Travelling Trunks, £2 each	100 0
200	Cash Prizes, £1 each	200 0
200	Ladies' Leather Hatboxes, £1 each	200 0
100	Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered, £1	100 0
400	pairs Blankets, 15s. per pair	300 0
200	½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large, 15s. per ½ doz.	150 0
200	½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small, 15s. per ½-doz.	£150 0
500	Ladies' Umbrellas, 15/- ea.	375 0
500	Gents' Umbrellas, 15s. each	375 0
400	Best Electro-plated Teapots, 15s. each	300 0
400	Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case, 15s. set	300 0
1000	Cash Prizes, 10s. each	500 0
1000	pairs Bed Sheets, 10s. each	500 0
1000	White Linen Table Cloths, 10s. each	500 0
1000	Ladies' Umbrellas, 7/6 each	375 0
1000	Ladies' Leather Purses, 7/6 each	375 0
200	½-doz. Table Knives, 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200	½-doz. Dessert do., 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000	Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge, 7/6 each	750 0
2000	Cash Prizes of 5s. each	500 0
4715	Ladies' Leather Handbags, 4s. each	943 0
4000	½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs, 2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000	Handsome Work-boxes, 2/6 each	500 0
25,602		£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write legibly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the largest sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize.

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,

will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

Digitized by Google

"Jarvis! Jarvis! Wake up!"

"Impossible, woman! I cannot deal with you!" said he with manifest trepidation.

"Well, you'll have to deal with me. The property wasn't yours to sell, but never mind that. Now take a pencil and set down the items I give you. Are you ready?"

Sullenly the creditor took pencil and paper. The woman stood transformed before them. She remembered what she had suffered from the fear-palsied wretch who was now clinging to her garments, and the memory made her heroic in his defence. That is the way of some women.

"A bargain is a bargain," she said to the astonished creditor. "You stood by your bargain; he shall stand by his!"

Jarvis screeched in new terror when he heard these ominous words. She continued as if he had remained silent.

"Jarvis Jessup wanted my money. To get it he made me believe that he loved me and I loved him. Have you got that down?"

The creditor nodded.

"Well, as soon as he got my money, he made me miserable by his neglect. He did not even show decent gratitude. Put that down."

"Gratitude," the creditor repeated mechanically.

"Worse than that," the poor wife continued; and now it was pitiful to hear her words. "He was ashamed of me. He has always been ashamed of me, because I am plain and awkward, and haven't fine manners. Put that down. He's ashamed of the wife he cheated into marrying him."

The creditor wrote swiftly, smiling the while.

"Since he got so rich with my money," the wife went on, "he wants to get into society. I can't help him there, so he hates me. Not half-an-hour ago he wished I was dead. Put that down."

"Dead. A splendid record it is!" said the creditor, enthusiastically.

"No conversation, if you please! Now for some items about our daughter. First item: He never gave her one word or look of fatherly affection in her life. Next item: he poured out money for her, but only as an investment. He thought she would be a credit to him, and help him along; that's all he cared for. Next item: She got into society, and that bettered his chances; so he pretended to be proud of her. Next item: Two men want to marry her. One is a good man, and she loves him. The other is not good, and she despises him. The man she despises could help Jarvis Jessup along, so the poor girl has been ordered to marry him. Next item: Just now Jarvis Jessup promised that she shall marry the man she wants. Why? Simply because that was the only way to save himself from you."

"All down!" said the creditor, gleefully.

This was a delightfully foolish woman to deal with, after all. She had made her husband's case about as bad as it could possibly be.

"All other items I suppose you've got already," the advocate resumed. "You know he hasn't had any conscience but the market reports; that he hasn't troubled himself whether the money he got belonged to him or to somebody else; that he never kept out of any speculation because it was going to ruin other men; that he made a beggar of every depositor in a bank, and was sharp enough to do it without being arrested. You've got all that, haven't you?"

"Every item!" the creditor responded, heartily. "And I have seldom had a finer record!"

"You are sure it's all right?"

"Perfectly correct."

"Good! Now we'll sum up." There was an ominous tone of triumph in the woman's voice at last. "Just take the trouble to find the sum of all these items; then subtract the total from the original amount and see how much Soul there is left!"

It was terrible to see the change that came upon the creditor.

"Understand," said the advocate, "your claim isn't disputed. You shall have all the Soul Jarvis Jessup has left after twenty-five years of such a life as that."

The only answer was an angry dash of the pencil, as the creditor wrote on the margin of his paper the words:

"No assets!"

Then the Shape vanished; and his rescued victim collapsed in his chair, insensible.

* * * * *

"Jarvis! Jarvis! Wake up!"

His wife's hand was laid on him again, and he came slowly and fearfully back to consciousness.

"Say, Jessup, are you awake? Mr. Atherton is in the parlour, waiting to see you. Says he wants your answer, whatever that means."

"Tell him," said Jarvis with a shudder, "that my daughter's answer is my answer!"

J. C. P.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

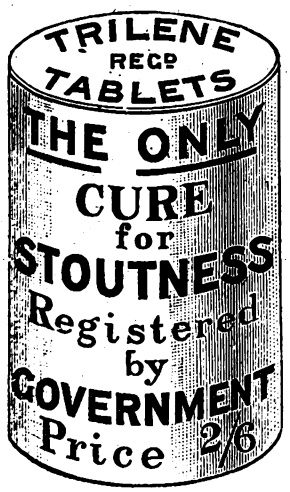
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 5lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

MISS NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Rischolme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

Transposed Letter Competition.

First Prize . . . . £5.
Second Prize . . . . £2.
Third Prize . . . . £1.

LIST No. 3.

LPY; CTU; AEHT; EOPS; AGLO.

Here are five sets of letters, and prizes will be awarded to the competitors who send in the longest words containing the letters in each of their combinations.

For example, the following words contain the letters IST in their different combinations: fIST, ITSelf, SIT, STIpend, ouTSIde, adverTISe.

CONDITIONS.

1. Write your attempts on one side of the paper only, and keep until one other list has appeared.
2. All words must appear in Nuttall's Standard Dictionary.
3. The letters of the combinations must either be underlined or put in red ink or capitals in the words in which they occur.
4. In the event of a tie, the prize will be divided.
5. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must enter on that understanding.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 235 to 240.

THE prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Miss A. J. Stefanoni, of 7 Grittleton Road, Elgin Avenue, W., whose attempt was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "The Vibart Affair," by G. Manville Fenn, has been sent to each of the following:

H. Quinton, Tennyson Road, Portswood Park, Southampton.
E. Hutchings, Hope Cottages, Mill Hill.
Charles Stephens, Sandringham Road, Fratton.
Charles Smith, Red House, Westleton.
George Humphreys, Colville Street, Nottingham.
W. Fay, Ormond Road, Dublin.
E. Goodall, Beaconsfield Street, Liverpool.
Mrs. E. G. Luck, Hazlebury Road, Fulham, S.W.
F. J. Smith, Alpha House, Saxmundham.
Miss E. J. Yarwood, Beech Road, Cale Green, Stockport.

SOLUTION OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 241 to 246.

No. 241. Will, I am, E. wart, glad, stone (William Ewart Gladstone).

No. 242.

L O S S
O B I T
S I T E
S T E A M E R
M O T E
E T O N
R E N T

No. 243.

C rocu S
O rmol U
M imi C
P hysi C
E as E
T eas E
E rran D

No. 244. BADEN-POWELL.

No. 245. MAR-k; car-RYI-ng; Far-NHA-m; STE-p; REP-tiles; s-ENT; m-ATL-ock; l-EIS-ure; p-URE.

"Marry in haste, repent at leisure."

No. 246. BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double ,, ,, ...	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page ,, ,, ...	5 0 0
Quarter-page ,, ,, ...	2 10 0
Eighth-page ,, ,, ...	1 5 0
Front page, whole ,, ,, ...	12 10 0
,, half ,, ,, ...	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate. Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 13th, if intended for the issue on sale Nov. 27th, and dated December 1st. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"THE MOST REMARKABLE WORK OF THE PRESENT CENTURY."

(Vide the Press.)

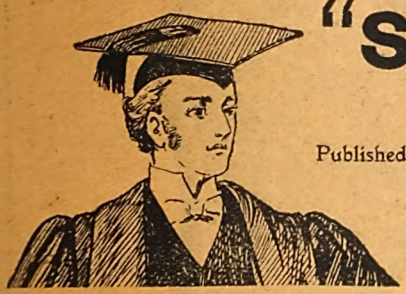
PROFESSOR BOYD LAYNARD'S GREAT WORK:



"SECRETS of BEAUTY, HEALTH, and LONG LIFE."

Published by HAMMOND, HAMMOND, and CO., 19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London.

The publishers have much pleasure in announcing the issue of the popular edition of Professor BOYD LAYNARD'S great work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE."

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the author—being, in fact, the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in TWO BOOKS, FIFTEEN PARTS, and 127 CHAPTERS, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in ONE VOLUME.

The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the publishers, be forwarded, carriage paid, to all readers of this paper at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

This is to secure for it a place in every home, by bringing it within the reach of all.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Boyd Laynard's Work, the following are but a few (a complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 chapters, enumerating upwards of 500 subjects and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers) :—

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs—Wrinkles, and how to treat them—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose may be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influence upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—Some perilous articles of food—Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—Baths and bathing; their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its culture and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their nature, prevention and treatment—Indigestion—Constipation—Neuralgia, Rheumatism—Nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—The mental, moral, physical, and external influences that are conducive to long life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

WHAT THE PAPERS ARE SAYING.

The Christian Globe says: "Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life," is no misnomer respecting the title of this remarkable work. The author has unfolded to the world many secrets regarding these subjects, the importance of which it is impossible to over estimate. The work, however, has not been written for the purpose of startling the reader with extraordinary theories, but as a practical hand-book for all those desiring beauty, health and long life. Nevertheless it is, perhaps, the most remarkable work of the present century, as a study of the syllabus of its 127 chapters will fully verify."

The Hull News says: "Professor Laynard writes well on a subject he has evidently studied deeply. As a guide to good looks, health, and longevity this book differs entirely from ordinary works on the same subjects. It is more thorough and at the same time more practical. It is safe to say that anyone who ordered his or her life on the rules laid down in this book would certainly profit both physically and materially."

The London Journal says: "Throughout the whole 127 chapters it is practical and sensible. It contains an immense amount of valuable advice, and, moreover, it is written in such a bright style that it is as interesting as a novel.

Society says: "A really practical work on this subject, free from objectionable and harmful features, has long been wanted. Professor Laynard's new book, 'Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life,' seems to supply the need. It is quite unlike any book on the subject we have ever seen. It is crowded with useful information from the first page to the last. It is the kind of book one can pick up at any time and read with pleasure."

The Woman at Home says: "The work should be of great interest and practical value, and Professor Laynard scrupulously avoids recommending cosmetics and similar 'aids to beauty,' which invariably do more harm than good. The writer is a man who evidently knows what he is talking about."

ORDER FORM* 6721.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & Co.,

19, 21 & 23 LUDGATE HILL LONDON, E.C.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

Digitized by Google

Don't cook Quaker Oats to death, but cook it enough to break up all the interior cells and so liberate all the nutriment. To secure its full food value and flavor, it should be prepared exactly according to directions on packet. Our Quaker Oats Cooker makes it easier.

READ OUR OFFER.

2-Pint Cooker Free. } For 25 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

2-Pint Cooker Free. } For 50 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

3-Pint Cooker Free. } For 40 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

3-Pint Cooker Free. } For 75 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

Required number of white squares must be sent in at one time.

On receipt by us POSTAGE PAID of required number of WHITE SQUARES or price mentioned below, before Sept. 1, 1901, a Quaker Oats Cooker will be sent at once, carriage paid to any address in Great Britain or Ireland.

IF YOU WANT THE COOKER AT ONCE and have not got the required number of WHITE SQUARES, send us 2s. for 2-pint size, or 2s. 6d. for 3-pint size. The amount you pay will be refunded immediately correct number of WHITE SQUARES is sent POSTAGE PAID, if received by us before Sept. 1, 1901. Write your address plainly.

Address: DEPT. W.3 QUAKER OATS, LTD., LONDON, E.C.

Quaker Oats sold in 1-lb. and 2-lb. packets only.

Beware of Substitution.

Quaker name and Quaker figure on every Packet.

Digitized by Google

FOOTBALL WINNERS GET £33 6s. 8d. EACH.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 620. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 17TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

"Absolutely Pure therefore Best."

CADBURY'S

COCOA

Free from Kola, Malt, Hops, or any foreign admixture. It is Cocoa and Cocoa only.

What CADBURY'S Cocoa is:

The Great Scientist, Baron von Liebig, says:

"COCOA is a perfect food, as wholesome as delicious, a beneficent restorer of exhausted power; but its quality must be good, and it must be carefully prepared. It is highly nourishing and easily digested, and is fitted to repair wasted strength and preserve health. It agrees with those whose occupations oblige them to undergo severe mental strains; with public speakers, and with all those who give to work a portion of the time needed for sleep."

CADBURY'S COCOA is Absolutely Pure, and a Perfect Food.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1 Cash Prize	£50	£50 0
1 Cash Prize,	£40	40 0
10 Handsome Pianos, in walnut,	£40 each	400 0
5 Cash Prizes,	£25 each	125 0
10 Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels,	£17 17s.	178 10
10 Ladies' Bicycles, Free-wheels,	£17 17s.	178 10
10 Cash Prizes,	£10 each	100 0
20 Jones's Sewing Machines,	£8 each	160 0
20 Cash Prizes,	£5 each	100 0
50 Rolled Gold Lever Watches,	£2 10s. each	125 0
100 Cash Prizes,	£2 each	200 0
50 Dinner Services (56 pieces),	£2 each	100 0
50 Folding Bed Chairs,	£2 each	100 0
50 Ladies' Travelling Trunks,	£2 each	100 0
200 Cash Prizes,	£1 each	200 0
200 Ladies' Leather Hatboxes,	£1 each	200 0
100 Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered,	£1	100 0
400 pairs Blankets,	15s. per pair	300 0
200 ½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large,	15s. per ½-doz.	150 0
200 ½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small,	15s. per ½-doz.	£150 0
500 Ladies' Umbrellas,	15/- ea.	375 0
500 Gents' Umbrellas,	15s. each	375 0
400 Best Electro-plated Teapots,	15s. each	300 0
400 Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel Blade in Case,	15s. set	300 0
1000 Cash Prizes,	10s. each	500 0
1000 pairs Bed Sheets,	10s. each	500 0
1000 White Linen Table Cloths,	10s. each	500 0
1000 Ladies' Umbrellas,	7/6 each	375 0
1000 Ladies' Leather Purses,	7/6 each	375 0
200 ½-doz. Table Knives,	7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200 ½-doz. Dessert do.,	7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000 Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge,	7/6 each	750 0
2000 Cash Prizes of	5s. each	500 0
4715 Ladies' Leather Handbags,	4s. each	943 0
4000 ½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs,	2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000 Handsome Work-boxes,	2/6 each	500 0
25,602		£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write legibly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the largest sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize.

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

TO THE QUEEN
PURVEYORS
HUEY MON

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA, GRAVY, JULIENNE, MULLIGATAWNY, TOMATO, HOUSEHOLD, CRESSY, &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

NOSE

Wintry weather makes Red Noses. I cure them. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER.

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 620.] For the Week Ending November 17th, 1900. [One Penny.

OLD - WHITE - FROCK.

Elliot Standring was always regarded as a well-groomed man, but he never took such trouble over his toilet as on that autumn evening when he was to try his luck with Helen Purdon. He had been invited by her uncle to dine with that gentleman and the object of his affection; he had arranged it with Mr. Carter, who was favourable to his suit and upon whom he had ventured to rely for assistance.

Standring was not over sanguine, concerning the result of his attempt. He knew that others had tried and failed; it was supposed that their failure was due to want of affection for them on the part of Miss Purdon, although there was an idea abroad that there might be some other reason, but nothing definite was known.

Standring was bound to admit that Miss Purdon had not given him much encouragement—perhaps no encouragement at all, for he might have been mistaken in his conclusions; but he was head over ears in love with her, and was determined to make an attempt to win her.

He summed up his qualifications as he surveyed himself in the mirror. Tolerably good looking, young and healthy, a fair income derived from investments made by his deceased father and left entirely to him when his father died just twelve months ago. That was all; not very much, but enough to satisfy a reasonable woman, as Helen Purdon was, who herself had ample means. Good character? There was no dispute on that point.

The others had had better chances than he, to judge by appearances, but that fact did not deter him, and moreover it is not safe to judge by appearances. So he ought to be hopeful; but he was not.

It was quite a cosy little dinner party, with Standring as the only guest. There was nothing extraordinary about this, as Mr. Carter occasionally invited a gentleman friend, and Miss Purdon at times invited a lady friend, and those times were not always the same, so that the dinner party might consist of two gentlemen and one lady, or, two ladies and one gentleman.

Miss Purdon and her uncle resided together; it would be more correct to say that Mr. Carter resided with his niece, as the house belonged to her. When she had been left alone in the world, her father's money had come to her, and her mother's brother had come to reside with her at her request. He had tried to induce her to have a companion also, but Miss Purdon declined, saying that she could manage the household herself. So Mr. Carter, who was not endowed with a large amount of wealth, gladly accepted the arrangement, which had now lasted for more than three years.

All rights reserved.]

Standring, in spite of the fact that he was a society man, was a prey to nervous agitation during dinner; he was becoming still less hopeful of the result of the interview which, by the aid of Mr. Carter he was to obtain with Miss Purdon after dessert. During the dessert, he recovered his spirits to some extent and the conversation became general.

Standring thought he would endeavour to sound the depths before he had the interview; he had just a slight misgiving that Captain Germaine, although reported to have failed in storming the citadel of Helen's heart, had come nearer to success than was supposed, and he was resolved to fathom this little mystery if possible, so that he might know what to expect in the way of odds when he made his own attack.

"I hear that Captain Germaine has volunteered for service in the Soudan," he remarked in a casual tone, taking observation of Helen from the corner of his eye.

There was a dry cough from Mr. Carter, who appeared to be gazing very intently at something on his serviette.

Standring felt a little chill go through him, for he perceived that he had made a false step, and before Helen had time to speak, he had skilfully turned the conversation by asking Mr. Carter if he had heard anything lately of young Jones, who created such a sensation by his violin playing at the Freemantles' reception.

Dessert over, Mr. Carter made an excuse for retiring, thus giving Standring his chance of a few minutes alone with Helen. The young fellow seized the opportunity without delay, and almost before the girl knew what was happening she was listening to an impassioned declaration of love.

"Mr. Standring," she said quietly, yet unable to suppress a trace of agitation which had begun to show itself in her face, "you have taken me somewhat by surprise. I think it is due to you—it is certainly due to myself—that I should speak frankly, even at the risk of being thought unwomanly."

Standring brought his eloquent appeal to an abrupt termination and allowed her to speak. Had he failed? He awaited her next words with feverish anxiety,

"Sit down, and listen to what I have to say," continued Helen, her voice having a firm ring in it this time. "I have one aim in life, to the attainment of which everything else must be subservient. I will tell you briefly and plainly what that aim is.

"About four years ago, my father, who had an extensive knowledge of Egypt and the Soudan, the customs and dialects of its inhabitants, left England on his own responsibility in a patriotic endeavour to glean information for the British Government that might be useful in connection with the saving of the Khartoum Garrison, and in the preservation of the Soudan generally from the clutches of the Mahdi. He has never been heard of since he left Egypt proper for the interior. I fancy that you do not know this."

Digitized by Google

"I have heard that Professor Purdon was killed by Arabs," murmured Standring sympathetically.

"That is the current belief," she went on steadily, "but there is nothing to confirm it beyond the continued silence of my father. But he may be alive and a prisoner. He may be anywhere in the interior of Africa with Gordon, whom many people believe to be still in the land of the living. My aim is to obtain confirmation of his death, or to find him if he still lives! It will be a great undertaking, but I will devote my life to it if necessary. I am studying the dialects and customs, and I am awaiting the course of events and watching for the opportunity to go out there with an expedition, or otherwise, to find him or his body. It is impossible for me, a woman, to go now, in the unsettled state of the country. You have spoken to me of love; I will not marry until my object is secured, and I will marry the man who either finds my father or helps me most to do so!"

It was quite a cosy little dinner party, with Standring as the only guest.

"But the man who was lucky enough to render you this service, might not be the man you love," objected Standring abashed.

"If a man does so much for me, I shall love him with all my heart!"

Standring advanced no further plea, he could see that it would be useless. If he wished to win Helen Purdon, the way to do so was through the Soudan.

"Make no rash promises, Mr. Standring," interposed Helen, as he was about to speak. "Let us dismiss this subject and talk of other things. Take time for reflection and ask yourself whether I am worth the task involved."

* * * * *

What a number of changes are sometimes crowded into the short space of twelve months! This was the thought that occurred to the mind of Elliot Standring while on out-post duty in the Soudan, as nearly as possible one year after the eventful evening of the dinner with Miss Purdon and her uncle.

He had meditated carefully on the task which Helen had set for the man who loved her, and soon afterwards he had gone to work deliberately to perform that task. He had set out for Egypt and had begun his search for men to help him and to study the best course of procedure.

It had taken a long time, longer than he had imagined, to complete the initial steps; and then, when he felt he was really making progress, his plans were upset.

He had sold out of the best concerns in which his money was invested, in order to obtain fresh funds for carrying out his undertaking; leaving the rest until the last moment, as prices were not good.

Having spent his ready money, he had written home to his stockbroker to sell out the rest at the best prices that could be obtained. But before his letter had reached home he received one telling him that the remaining investments were practically worthless; the companies, mostly mining companies, had failed or were in such a condition that they intended to go into voluntary liquidation, cut down capital and call upon the shareholders to pay twenty or twenty-five per cent. more on their shares in order to "put the concern on its legs again."

Standring found that when he had met his liabilities, there would be no further money to go on with, and, in addition, his income was gone.

After that he had an attack of fever, and when he had recovered, he gave up the hope of ever winning Helen Purdon. A month later he was wearing the uniform of a private in an infantry regiment and was on his way to face the Dervishes. He might have suggested to Helen that she should furnish the money to go on, but his expedition had melted away during his illness, and it did not seem fair to ask her to intrust him with the necessary money. It was possible that she had less confidence in his ability than he had.

Digitized by Google

He had joined under the name of Elliot, and Private Elliot quickly won the good-will of his comrades and the notice of his officers, and seemed to have good prospects of promotion. But this did not appear to have any cheering effect on Elliot; his demeanour was that of a happy-go-lucky, devil-may-care soldier, ready to volunteer for the most dangerous work. The fact was that Elliot would gladly have welcomed the bullet which would put an end to an existence, the future of which contained nothing hopeful.

"Well, seen him?"

This was the question addressed to Elliot by a comrade when he came off duty.

"No! You fellows have been frightened by a shadow!"

There was an indignant outcry from several of the men who had heard this reply. Shadow, indeed! Why he had been seen by scores of men! That tall, thin figure of a Dervish, in the long white robe, with eyes shining with the light of religious fanaticism—a shadow! The men's lips curled in contempt.

"There ain't no doubt about it, Mr. Tommy Elliot," said a man lying close to where Standring was standing, "it's a real man and no mistake. He comes upon you suddenly, with no weapons in his hands, and warns you to get out of the country and tell all the British to do the same. I dunno whether it's genuine or a fake; two or three times, when our fellows have been a bit scared, the enemy have swooped down upon us, which shows that they were close behind him, but as a rule he just warns you and off he goes."

"How do you know he warns you?" asked Elliot. "He doesn't speak English, I suppose?"

"You needn't talk in that sneering way," retorted another Tommy rather angrily. "It ain't often he says anything you can hear properly; it's usually a mumble, but you can tell by his actions what he means, and poor Jimmy Gates, who was cut down in the last scrimmage and knew some of the lingo, said that was what Old White-Frock meant."

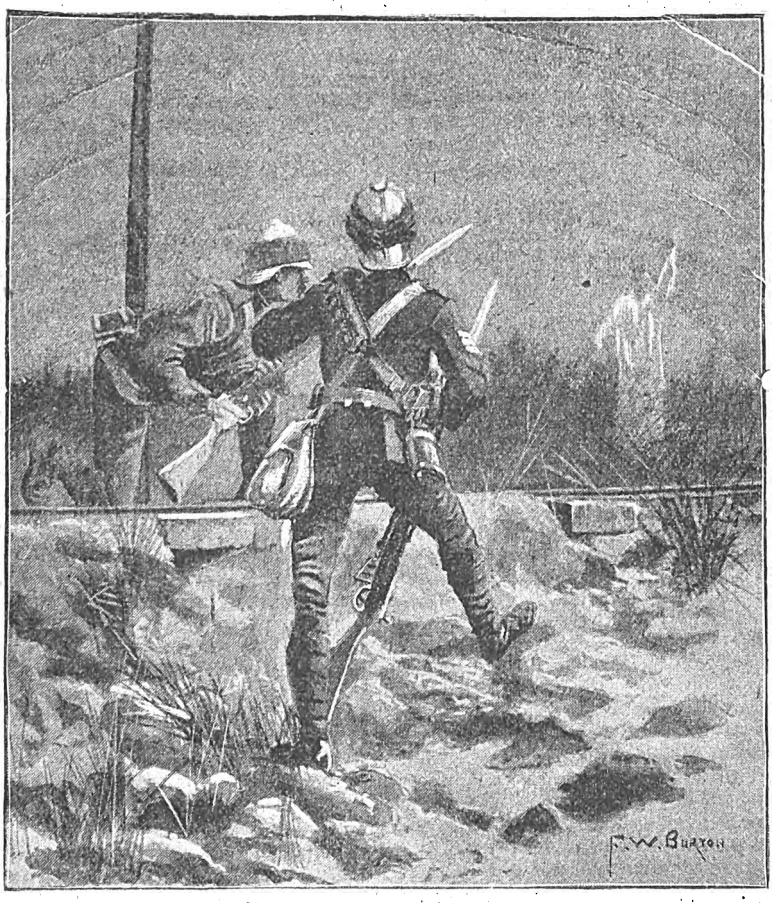
"I say, boys, Germaine is missing!" cried a corporal who had just arrived on the scene.

"Looks as if the blacks had got him. He must have strayed beyond the lines."

"P'raps Old White-Frock has run off with him!" interjected another soldier.

"I'm sorry for him if they have got him, although I don't pretend to love him, and if he had gone home invalided I should have said 'good riddance!'"

There was a chorus of approval, which confirmed the reports that Elliot had heard of the man whom he regarded somewhat in the light of a rival. He had overheard odd words from officers while acting as orderly, from which it appeared that Germaine scarcely merited the dignity of being called an officer and a gentleman; the captain was an impecunious man, who was not too particular on various points where money was concerned, while his disposition was not such as to win him the affection either of officers or men. Nevertheless, Elliot himself was too much of a gentleman to rejoice at the downfall of another; on the contrary, he was horrified at the thought that Captain Germaine might be tortured to death, and he longed for the chance to help him.



"There he is!" interrupted Elliot.

But there was little hope that he, a private, would have any opportunity of rendering assistance. He pictured to himself the possible grief of Helen Purdon when she heard of Germaine's fate, and his frame of mind for the rest of that day did not tend to make him a greater favourite with his comrades.

On the following day he was one of a score of men selected for special duty. The visits of Old White-Frock were becoming unpleasant, and it was resolved to capture the old man if possible. The easiest way to have got rid of him would have been to shoot him, but it was not in accordance with British chivalry to shoot down an unarmed man. So these men were detained for duty at adjacent points along a tract of country where the old man might be expected.

Digitized by Google

Elliot and Harry Baker were nearest to the railway line which was being gradually carried along the country in the execution of the steadfast object of reconquering the district right away to Khartoum.

It was near night-fall when they met at the railway track at the end of their sentry-go and exchanged a word before wheeling round to pace back to the other extremity.

"He hasn't turned up yet," remarked Elliot with a smile.

"You'll see him one of these——"

"There he is!" interrupted Elliot, and Baker, facing about, saw Old White-Frock in the accustomed attitude.

How he had contrived to get so near to them without being seen was a fact which they could not understand, and did not waste any time in trying to explain to their own satisfaction. Baker went down on one knee and was levelling his rifle, when Elliot stopped him with a gesture and the exclamation "don't!"

Reminded of orders by the word and action, Baker dashed to his feet again and both soldiers made a dash for the old man. He glared at them for an instant, then turned and fled.

The two men pursued him, but Old White-Frock was surprisingly fleet of foot for one of his years and kept the lead; half-a-dozen of the other special duty men, who saw the chase, joined in it, but they were unable to come up with Elliot and Baker, having a cross stretch to traverse. They kept up the pursuit until they reached the boundary laid down in their orders, and then they stopped; but Elliot and Baker, now wild with excitement, forgot everything in the way of orders and went on.

The old man, lightly clad, gained ground and increased the distance between his pursuers and himself. He reached one of those configurations of the ground which afforded shelter to the Dervishes for ambuscades, and disappeared. As they neared this mound, the two men were brought to a standstill by the sound of revolver and rifle shots, and cries of rage and pain. A minute later they saw a British uniform come from behind the mound, stagger a few yards and then fall.

"I believe it's Germaine!" gasped Baker.

"We must help him—he is wounded and we can't let an officer be killed without making a fight to save him!" cried Elliot.

The two soldiers ran forward and reached the captain's side. Baker took the revolver and then the two men hurriedly dragged the half-conscious officer, whom they now recognised, to the mound so that the Dervishes could not pick them off in the open. There the two privates waited with clenched teeth for the expected attack. Five minutes passed without further sign of the enemy than a few groans from behind the mound. Elliot decided to crawl round and make observations; he returned on foot with the intelligence that the enemy were gone, leaving two dead and Old White-Frock either dead or seriously wounded.

"I am dying, my lads," moaned Captain Germaine, "I want some one to send word to Miss Helen Purdon—that I found—traces of her father. He is alive. You—in my pocket-book."

The last words came with a gasp and the captain never spoke again.

The information thus tragically conveyed thrilled Elliot through and through. He felt that now Helen's father was so near being restored to her he was justified in searching the officer's pocket-book for further information that might lead to the rescue of Professor Purdon.

He thrust aside his scruples and made a search among the few papers contained in that book. He found a torn slip with a few words written in English; they were a warning to the British commander and they were signed "J. Purdon."

He was interrupted in his reading by Baker saying that they ought to do something for poor Old White-Frock, who was groaning at the back.

Elliot told him to look after the old man for a minute and explained that he knew Miss Helen Purdon and was as anxious to see if anything could be done to rescue her father. He had another paper in his hand on which the captain had scribbled a few notes.

"How is it that a man who does wrong so often makes notes or does something else equally silly that betrays him?" Elliot asked himself. "It is clear from this that Germaine, having picked up by some chance the note written by Purdon, deliberately left camp—practically deserted, in fact, for the time—in order to trace the Professor, rescue him, and so secure Helen and her money!"

Elliot tore up the incriminating paper. He had no doubt of the captain's intentions after reading the paper, and the fact that Germaine had never said anything about Purdon's written warning was proof of those intentions.

"The old fellow is dead," said Baker, coming back at this moment. "And I'm jiggered if his body isn't white, after all, and look what he was wearing round his neck!"

It was a locket, a very small one, and inside was a portrait of a woman who might well have been mistaken for Helen Purdon.

It was more than a month later when Helen received that locket from Elliot Standring, giving her certain details about her father's fate and the place where he was buried. And it was four months later still when Standring, having been invalided home, was installed in the residence of Miss Purdon and placed under the charge of Mr. Carter and a trained nurse, who received occasional assistance from Helen herself.

"My poor father must have been taken prisoner, and captivity turned his brain," said Helen sadly. "He retained just sufficient sense to know, or to think that it would be best for the British to retire, and so he warned them every now and then, or tried to. Probably the Arabs found it convenient to let him do so—or superstitious fear of mad people prevented them from stopping him. I told Captain Germaine of the task to be undertaken by the man who loved me, and I never saw him again. His being taken prisoner led to the discovery of my father, so I owe him a debt of gratitude in an indirect way. Don't you think that it was the Arabs who shot my poor father and not Captain Germaine?"

"Very probable," replied Elliot, although he knew that it was not so. "But in any case Captain Germaine was endeavouring to escape and if his bullet struck your father, he did not know that it was Professor Purdon. Of that I am convinced."

The last words were uttered sincerely, and Helen was satisfied.

"Did you—did you love him?" asked Elliot. His voice betrayed his agitation, and his eyes showed how much the answer to that question meant to him.

"No," returned Helen, after a moment's reflection.

"And do you think that you might be able to love me in time."

"Yes," was the immediate reply.

And Elliot's cup of happiness was filled.

GEORGE KNIGHT.

Digitized by Google

WITH TODGERS BY TANDEM.

THE weather really had been trying, and not being particularly busy, Todgers did not have so much difficulty as he might have had in persuading me to run down to his place for a day or two, and spend a brief season in the charmingly rural spot in which he has fixed himself.

Todgers is a deaf old fool—I beg pardon! I mean a highly respectable gentleman of middle age who is a bit uncertain in his hearing and a trifle erratic in his dealings, so I was not at all surprised, when, just as I had got dressed and ready to set off, he hurried up to my place, as a sort of afterthought, with a parrot in a cage, a tandem, and an entirely new programme of events.

The tandem Todgers had bought; the parrot was a present from an admiring colleague, and under the stress of necessity, or at all events anxiety, to get them home together Todgers, thought he might ride the one and between us carry the other.

"It's only forty miles or so, and you're fond of cycling," Todgers urged. "It will be a lovely spin too; just nice and fresh, and with a moon for the last part in all probability. It will save you a fare, too," he added wistfully.

It did seem rather enticing bar the parrot. I knew the parrot must come my way because I have never steered a tandem in my life, and it was obvious that the parrot must go with the rear rider.

"It looks a bit threatening," I objected, meaning the weather. For the sun had set in a sullen red glare, and the close heavy atmosphere suggested a thunderstorm.

"Oh, that's nothing," protested Todgers when I could make him grasp the nature of my objection.

"Wait till you get clear of London you'll find the country lanes as fresh and cool as a dewdrop."

Well to cut the story short I eventually agreed, and fixing up my trousers with the customary steel springs, and substituting a soft felt for the more conventional hat I had intended going down in, I reduced my luggage to pocket proportions and went swinging down the road on the back seat of Todgers' tandem.

Steadying the parrot's cage on the end of the handlebar, we went out on the Ongar Road turning off to the right before the town was reached into a series of cross-country roads that would bring us out below Chelmsford.

It was a pitch dark night and ominously still and heavy, but I knew the home country by heart, and Todgers knew it thoroughly beyond the Eastern Counties Road, so that was no great matter.

In default of conversation rendered impossible by reason of my companion's deafness, Todgers sang and smoked, and all was peace and happiness, and joy, when a sudden gust of wind came tearing down the road and took my hat with it as it passed me.

"Half-a-mo', old man," said I cheerfully, "my hat's gone overboard."

Todgers was in the middle of the Beggar's Opera, but I thought he heard me and came off on the pedal, we were going fairly leisurely when the opportunity offered.

The tandem went on with Todgers still carolling on it.

Even then the position didn't strike me, and I stood in the middle of the road, hatless, with the parrot's cage in my hand and smiled good humouredly at the thought of Todgers' surprise when he found I was missing—if he does discover it, and the smile suddenly faded out as I reflected on this not at all impossible contingency. Todgers is a steady old slogger of the get-the-machine-along-somehow order, and when I came to think of it there was no reason why he shouldn't keep going until Galleywood Hill forced him out of the saddle. If the machine went a bit stiff on the upgrades he would merely throw an expostulation at my supposed laziness, and knowing his own infirmity would take my answer for granted. All this crossed my mind in a flash, and long before the tandem had faded from sight I was tearing madly down the road yelling "Todgers, Hi! Todgers!! Tod—gers!!!"

I think I should have done it had not wretched luck put the silly, incompetent, careless cuckoo on an inviting slope just as I was drawing up to him, and away went tandem and Todgers and all, to be seen no more by me until day was far advanced.

"Well, I'll save my hat, anyway," I reflected, and retraced my steps, scanning the road and the adjacent hedges as I walked. It was sheer waste of energy and I might have known that it was absurd to look, in a pitchy darkness, for a hat that may be anywhere on a quarter of a mile of country lanes, with the unknown quantity of agricultural land adjoining, with matches which the wind extinguished as soon as they were lit. It was a good hat, seven and sixpence good, and I didn't care about losing it. At the end of half-an-hour's irritation and disappointment I didn't care if I didn't see it again, and picking up the cage I swung off hatless in the direction of Chelmsford to the accompaniment of rolling peals of thunder and strong gusts of wind that betokened something unpleasant to follow.

Digitized by Google

Half-a-mile further on heavy splashes of rain began to hit my bare head, and I thought some hard things about Todgers and his wretched old tandem as I turned up my trouser-legs and put on the pace a bit. I could only locate my position vaguely, but at the best I knew it was a good three miles from any sort of shelter, and that of the crudest and most uninviting description.

The bird and cage, too, were a serious handicap for a three mile sprint on a muddy road, and I found fresh cause of offence in Todgers for having saddled me with them. It was unreasonable of me, perhaps, but at such times things do get a bit distorted in one's mind, and no amount of logic just then would have induced me to acknowledge that Todgers couldn't just as well have taken that bit of his own property along with the rest of the outfit.

I put on a pipe and marched savagely along in what was now a heavy downpour, and refused to see the humorous side of the situation even when the parrot, which had been singularly meditative up to then, suddenly woke up under the influence of the drenching, and squawked:

"Oh, lor, it's raining!"

A couple of miles of heavy trudging brought me to a finger-post which by the fitful aid of a match informed me that Chelmsford lay off on the left.

That sounded hopeful provided that it didn't lay too far off, and that there were no bewildering cross turnings in which I knew, by painful experience, a man could very completely and satisfactorily lose himself for hours at a stretch, even in broad daylight.

I began to think that this fate had overtaken me, when, after walking for what seemed to me a long drawn out century or so, I came upon a little wayside pub. A man was standing at the door smoking, and to him I went in the hope of getting some useful topographical information.

"Chelmsford, sir, why you're in it, or you will be in five minutes," said he.

It was then, my watch informed me, close on ten, and I wasn't as satisfied as I might have been considering that the rain had blown over, and a fitful watery moon, the moon of which Todgers had so blithesomely spoken, robed in dreary mist, was shining through the storm driven clouds.

For one thing I was too damp and muddy to be quite comfortable; for another I distrusted my chances of a train that night to anywhere within measurable distance of Todgers' place.

It is true that I might have got one to town and gone home, but I didn't think of that. One never does think of the obvious somehow.

It was as bad as I had anticipated. I couldn't get anything at all without going back along the line to Shenfield. I could do that in three-quarters-of-an-hour if I cared to; but that was as far as the railway people could assist me until morning.

Under those conditions, needless to say I didn't care to avail myself of the Great Eastern Railway Co's services, and I went round, parrot and all, and banged up the keeper of a cycle emporium.

A lady came to the door after a quarter of an hour's more or less patient persistence on my part with knocker and bell and to her I explained my unhappy case.

She said she was very sorry for me, but they had lost one machine that way last week, and in the absence of the proprietor she didn't care about risking another. She was back in her own domain again before the full nature of this rebuff dawned on me.

When it did, I felt a trifle more savage and a good bit wilted; but it doesn't do to be too easily discouraged, so I braced myself up and set off in search of a more obliging and confiding cycle-monger.

By the time I had found one it was close on eleven; but I did find one, and while he was preparing the mount I managed to procure something useful and sustaining in the way of refreshment. When I got back I found the man waiting with the machine all ready. I was to be very careful of it, and return it by the first train in the morning because they wanted to hire it out, and business was brisk and machines scarce in the town.

I thought from the man's tone that he was intrusting me with something of quite the latest and most up-to-date pattern in bicycles.

"It isn't a free-wheel, is it?" I inquired casually, wishing to be informed.

"Not altogether," said the man significantly. "But your five bob won't go far to cover the cost, and I've got the number in case——"

Really this was rather mortifying. I suppose it was my hatless and draggled condition that inspired this embarrassing distrust; but it flattened me so completely that I hadn't the spirit to make even a cursory examination of the hired mount. I was glad to just get in the saddle and ride away, cage and all, into the outer blackness where my appearance might pass without comment, or at least I should not be compelled to stay and listen.

It didn't take me long to discover that I was mounted on a veritable old crock, and I picked up some more information regarding it as I went along. Up Baddow Hill a suggestive and well-defined squeak disclosed itself. It went off with painful monotony—two squeaks to the yard. And every time it squeaked the parrot—a singularly apt and intelligent bird for its age, shouted: "Coming, Jane, coming."

I don't know which got on my nerves the more, the squeak or the remark. I laughed when I first heard it and foolishly encouraged the lopsided, heavy-witted fowl by telling her, or him, that it was a "pretty poll." Half-an-hour later, toiling up Danbury Hill at a three-mile-an-hour gait in a gloomy and discontented frame of mind, I told it to shut up with suppressed ferocity.

On the hill I made some more discoveries about my hired mount, including the fact that the left crank was loose, the back tyre was flat as a flounder, and that I hadn't a pump or a spanner or a drop of oil with me. The machine was just a bare frame, bar the saddle and lamp. It hadn't even a bell on it.

Dropping the hill from Danbury at sixteen miles an hour, it was a ripper to go on the down grade. I discovered that it was a brakeless as well, and then to my exceeding horror the handles swerved and came away bodily, and the bicycle with the parrot and cage and myself on top of all rode slap into a mountainous mass of blue cloth and a bull's-eye and sat down in an undigested heap in the muddy roadway.

The policeman—it was a policeman, of course! Those fellows are always about when you don't want them—was furious. He began by telling me that I was riding without a light. I knew that as well as he did, seeing that the wretched bit of tinware went black and useless on Danbury Hill, and I had neither matches nor oil with which to start it going again.

Digitized by Google

Then he discovered that I hadn't a bell and made an anthem out of that. Moreover I was riding a brakeless machine at a furious rate to the danger of the public, and refused to stop when warned by the police.

"Oh lor'," squawked that fool of a parrot, "it's raining."

This drew the policeman's attention to my luggage.

"Ah! You must come with me, my man," said he pompously. "There's been a lot of this sort of thing about here lately, and I fancy I know just where that parrot would feel at home if he was put there."

"Don't be a fool, policeman," said I irritably, for really I was getting a bit tired of the persistent ill-luck which was dodging me. "The bird belongs to a friend of mine. We left London this evening on a tandem," etc.

I summed up the whole affair as concisely and clearly as I knew how, but the man wasn't satisfied. He said it sounded a bit thin and repeated his invitation to accompany him so pressingly and insistently that to save trouble I accepted it and went.

It wasn't a dignified or an enjoyable walk. The cage and the bicycle were both pretty badly bent up so that the parrot had to lean back and twist his neck at an angle in order to stand upright, and I had to shove the machine along on the front wheel after the manner of a wheelbarrow.

I offered to toss the policeman for the choice of jobs; but he was surly and wouldn't respond. He even refused to carry the parrot at first until I said I should sit down in the road with the whole giddy outfit until he fetched an ambulance or something if he didn't do his share.

I was sorry I couldn't shove the bicycle off on him; but as the parrot picked a hole in his regulation breeches and nipped him by the leg twice, each time compelling him to drop the cage and dance about the road in a frenzy of pain and ill-temper, I did pretty well by the arrangement, and found some solace as a set off to my manifold miseries. I quoted poetry to him:

> How joyous the lot of a policeman must be,
> When he dances at night in his innocent glee.

But he was not responsive even to poetry. We walked along together in silence after that for perhaps half-a-mile, and then an idea occurred to me.

"Do you know a Mr. Todgers?" said I.

"A dear old chap what lives down Burnham way?" said the policeman. "Yes, I know him."

"So do I," I retorted. "That's his parrot you are carrying, and it is mainly because of his deafness that you are carrying it."

"Well, I'm sorry if I have made a mistake, sir," said he. "But you were riding without a light."

"Owing to circumstances over which I had no control," I said.

"And you bowled me over," he continued.

"At half-a-crown per bowl," said I

"And spoilt my clothes," said he.

"At half-a-crown per spoil," said I.

The policeman smiled broadly.

"But I had better go with you, perhaps," I continued. The policeman's face dropped again. "Because I have no lamp and I am afraid the bike is past riding."

"They're mending the road a bit on ahead, sir, and the chap there will give you a drop of oil," said the policeman. He was keen to do business, and I hadn't the heart to disappoint him.

In the cheery glare of the watchman's fire I managed to unship the crank and straighten it enough to make the machine rideable, and with a fill of paraffin for my lamp I rode off with renewed hope and a depleted pocket to cover the last stage of my journey.

Considered from a financial standpoint I hadn't effected very much saving in taking the trip by road; but I had to confess that I had got a great deal more for my money than I should have had had I expended it on a railway ticket.

I struck Todgers' place at 1.30 in the morning, and found Mrs. Todgers up and anxious.

"Oh! you've come," said she a trifle coldly. "I began to think something must have happened. Where's Henry?"

"A great deal has happened, Mrs. Todgers," said I. "In fact I have never known so much detail to be crowded into a brief forty-mile spin before, but you don't mean to say that your husband hasn't turned up. Why I left him nine hours ago—or rather he left me—the other side of Chelmsford, taking the only means of locomotion available with him."

"Those wretched bicycles!" ejaculated the lady in alarm.

"I do hope nothing has happened to him. He sent me a wire this afternoon to say he was bringing you down, and I have seen nothing or heard nothing of him since."

I didn't want to go; in fact, I felt then as though I didn't care if I never saw a bicycle again; but Mrs. Todgers was so manifestly uneasy that I really had no alternative. I was able to mount myself decently from Todgers' outfit in bicycles, and to rid myself of that wretched bird-cage, that was one and about the only consolation I could obtain, and advising the lady of the house to go to bed, I set off in search of my host.

There was a choice of roads and I took what I considered to be the most likely one. Ten minutes after I had gone Todgers arrived.

There was a choice of roads and he took what he considered the most likely and followed me, when he found out how matters stood from his wife, with a kindly-intentioned, but injudicious desire to save me any further exertion on his account.

I got as far as the Yarmouth Road without gaining any tidings of the missing tandem, and being completely knocked up, then rode into Chelmsford and finished the night at the "Clarendon."

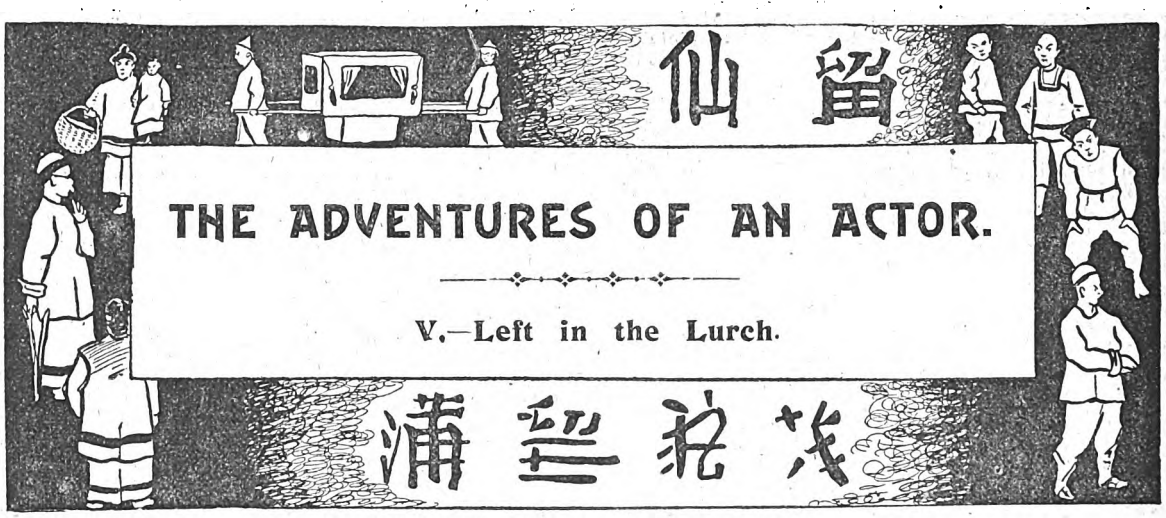
I got back to Todgers' place in the morning almost about the time that Todgers reached my place in the suburbs, and we met half-way again by telegraph arrangement, when our respective whereabouts could be made known to each other, and performed the journey together this time in safety and with some degree of enjoyment.

"Mrs. Todgers," said I at dinner that evening. "Harry is an excellent fellow in every respect, but if you go out on that tandem with him I should advise you to tie a string to his arm and to keep a tight grip on the end of it."

Mrs. Todgers laughed and assured me that if ever she did go on that or any other tandem with her husband she would certainly bear my advice in mind, but her tone suggested that Todgers' companion in life was not at all likely to be his companion on a tandem, and after my experience I could only commend her wisdom.

R. ANDOM.

Digitized by Google



THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTOR.

V.—Left in the Lurch.

THOUGH Sebastian Baggalle had a fine presence, and at first glance almost a noble face, his hooked nose gave him a sinister appearance, and upon closer acquaintance one discovered something of the mind that lay behind his deep-set, restless and cunning eyes. When he liked he had a certain charm and insinuation of manner that was almost irresistible.

The association that existed between him and his adopted son, an uninteresting and conventional youth who had the appearance of a counter-jumper, was often a subject of discussion and wonder. The only bond that appeared to exist between them was, common cause in roguery.

After a disastrous tour through Ireland, Baggalle had brought the poor remains of his company to the town of Huddleton, in the faint hope of it being a turning point in his fortunes. Hope was a thing of the past to his despairing company, but Baggalle it never left so long as he was associated with change.

Money he had none, and I doubt if the sum of five shillings could have been raised from the lot of us. He had booked the Town Hall to open on the last two nights of the week. It was now Monday, and we had the first four days of the week to work up the business, and live on credit.

Baggalle, nothing daunted, set out early in the morning to get bills printed, and the few miscellaneous lithos and posters we still possessed, stuck up on the hoardings. The first point of his attack was the principal hotel in the town. We three walked into the saloon bar.

There he tried his blandishments upon the barmaid, but she was out of temper that morning, and proof against his insinuating manner. He ordered two glasses of beer, on the pretence of it being too early in the morning for him to drink, and shared them with us when no one was looking.

We did not stay long for not a grain of information concerning the town could we gain from the surly barmaid, she even refused to sell tickets for us at a percentage.

By that strange absent-mindedness so often to be found associated with genius, Baggalle forgot to pay for our refreshment, and had to be called back to do so.

"That woman's a fool," said Baggalle reflecting upon her business capacity, as we walked across the market square.

"If you had only paid her before she would have been all right, she was not the kind that forget with the help of a ticket," replied Alfred.

"You are quite right, my boy, quite right, you are the saving of your old father, you have more insight though not the same address as I have."

Next we turned our attention to a printer.

Baggalle asked to see specimens.

"Certainly," said he, "what kind?"

"Some daybills, programmes; about fifty double crowns, and a few streamers."

"And the matter, sir?"

"Here is a copy of the programme and daybill matter. For the double crowns, let me see. Be good enough to take down the following: Town Hall, Huddleton. Special attractions for Friday and Saturday nights, October 5th and 6th. Mr. Sebast an Baggalle's Company of first-class Artistes. My name large type. Most expensive engagement of Alfred Baggalle—very large type—the great comedian—large type, next line. Under the patronage of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, Lord Heworth, and the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood. Then follow the daybill please."

Alfred nudged his father.

"It's all right, my boy, it's all right; old friends of mine, all promised to come," replied Baggalle to the nudge, "and what will that amount to, Mr. Printer?"

"£1 18s. 6d., say £1 18s.," said the printer, reckoning the amount up.

"Humph! yes, will you be good enough to present your little bill on Friday night, at the box-office."

"I am very sorry, sir, we don't do business that way, our terms are strictly cash," said the printer firmly.

"Just as you please, it is all one to me," replied Baggalle, putting his hand in his pocket and drawing therefrom several packets of tickets; "there are ten three shilling tickets, and four two shilling tickets, you will have no difficulty in selling them I am sure. Any you fail to part with I will buy back from you."

The printer was staggered at Baggalle's effrontery, and it was some moments before he spoke.

"Mr. Baggalle, you are trying to make a fool of me I think."

"I assure you, sir, I never attempt a task already accomplished," replied Baggalle, seeing the game was up. "And allow me to tell you, sir, I did not come here to be insulted, so I withdraw my order. Good morning!"

Digitized by Google

With which we all sailed out of the shop, leaving the printer speechless with surprise.

When we got out into the street, Alfred burst out laughing and slapping Baggalle on the back, exclaimed :

"You are a card, father, you ought to be a member of parliament," which pleased the old man mightily.

We soon found another printer, who being in a small way of business, was readily impressed with Baggalle, and did not at all mind waiting until Friday night for his bill.

Then we entered a large grocer's sh p, where Baggalle made himself very entertaining, keeping the manager and shop-assistants in a ripple of laughter with his jokes, and genial manner, while he gave a large order.

The parcel was packed and under Alfred's arm before he paid for it with the tickets. The manager made some demur about it not being usual, but Baggalle carried his point with a high hand, promising to buy back any he did not dispose of.

After a call upon the bill-poster, and another to secure the services of a pianist, we made our way to the Town Hall where I demanded a division of the groceries for the benefit of the Company. Baggalle and Alfred protested, but at the threat of a strike, they gave in with a bad grace.

O'Connor, our beer-soaked Irish heavy man, met us at the hall entrance. He looked ill at ease, and fidgeted in a nervous manner.

I knew what was the matter with him; he had borrowed a penny (a bad habit of his) probably off the hall-keeper, and was searching for some one to extract another from.

He drew me aside at the first opportunity, and began with the usual formula.

"Can ye lind me a penny, I've gone and left all me money at home in me ould coat" (he only had one) "and I feel a bit queer in me inside; and I find I only have a penny in my pocket."

I had often been caught before by this incurable, but repetition had made me wary. I declared to my sorrow I had not a stiver. But on his asking me if I had anything portable to pawn, I told him to clear out. He borrowed that penny shortly afterwards, and went to a public-house.

Miss Dellow, who played our old woman, then buttonholed me, and demanded to know all we had done and what we hoped and feared.

Miss Dellow was a person of past triumphs in the dramatic world. We took her word for it, as the per od to which she constantly referred was too remote for us to know anything about. Habit is strong.

Without waiting for me to reply to her questions, she at once began to tell me what she had been used to, and what she had not, and how Mr. X. Y. Z. had, after her performance of Ophelia, twenty years ago, told her he had never seen such acting before, and predicted a future for her.

I was in no mood for reminiscences that morning, so reminding Miss Dellow that we all had futures of some kind, unless we died young, left her abruptly.

Baggalle and Alfred had gone out to work up the business, and to try the effect of tickets on a local butcher or so. Deputing our baggage man, now risen to the dignity of an actor, to shadow them and demand on behalf of the company an equal share of the spoils, I called for our leading lady, and together we went for a ramble out into the beautiful country round about Huddleton. There we picked great bunches of flowers, ate blackberries, and forgot our troubles for a few hours, in rest and peace.

Friday night found us all in the highest spirits, for the house on opening contained about £12 and afterwards rose to £15. We proceeded to give our audience East Lynne played by six people.

Baggalle did not play, the taking of money in the front of the house was too important a duty to sacrifice to art.

Doubles such as Miss Cornelia and Barbara, Richard Hare and Bullock, were plentiful, and we flattered ourselves were successful in all instances except the extraordinary English of the baggage man who gave a unique rendering of Lord Mountsevern and Justice Hare.

Little Willie was played by a local child, and although she could not be heard over the footlights, she was received with great enthusiasm, and I am sure was responsible for half the house. We thought we were doing well; the audience did not, they could see there was something wrong, and in the second act began to murmur.

Where were the nobility and gentry, and the Mayor, was asked in whispers on all sides. By the end of the second act, they fully realised they had been hoaxed, and showed their resentment in increased noise.

Deputies from the Mayor and Aldermen were waiting on Baggalle in the front of the house, demanding an explanation of the bill matter. Baggalle made them some temporary excuse, and bade them wait, for we had sent round for him.

The aud ence were causing us extreme uneasiness. No one paid any attention to the play, which could not be heard. Shouts of "Where's the Mayor?" "Where's Mr. Mulligan and Mr. Cole?" "Where's Lord Heworth?" reached us from the audience.

We were at our wit's end to know what to do, but bravely went on with our lines until Baggalle arrived on the scene. He walked straight on the stage and addressed the audience.

The fire of indignation in his eyes was well simulated considering the way he had fooled the poor folk in front of him who greeted him with hoots, yells, and hisses. He raised his hand and thundered:

"Silence!"

The dramatic action took effect and thus he addressed them:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I must say your conduct is at least extraordinary, I have always heard the people of Huddleton described as a most just and fair audience. I have endeavoured to give you a good entertainment," here cries of "Where's Mr. Mulligan and Mr. Cole?" "Where's Lord Heworth?" "Where's Doherty? You are a fraud," and others less polite, interrupted him.

He continued after they had subsided.

"If any of you here are dissatisfied with this entertainment, they shall have their money returned to them at the conclusion of this act, on condition they remain quiet until then."

This announcement was well received, and Baggalle left the stage amid applause and cheers.

The audience remained quiet during the rest of the third act, and the curtain came down with hearty applause. And as we could not see much movement, except at the end of the Hall, we hoped they had decided to remain.

We rang up the curtain again after a ten minutes' interval to find the audience not apparently diminished in numbers. Our joy thereat was short lived, for anon there came from them once more murmurs and hootings growing louder every moment.

We sent round O'Connor to see what was the matter. He came back with the news that Baggalle was nowhere to be found. Where was Alfred? was our first thought.

Digitized by Google

We made a search, and discovered him sneaking towards the back door, with a big parcel of clothes under his arm. Then the horrible truth flashed upon us. Baggalle had flown with the entire receipts, and by now had had time to have left the town.

Just then all but O'Connor were wanted on the stage. He took the matter into his own hands, and pounced upon Alfred with a wild yell. They had a battle royal in the passage, but ordinary muscle proving of better quality than the beer-soaked variety, Alfred escaped, leaving O'Connor and his parcel lying together on the ground.

Upon recovery O'Connor immediately seized upon that parcel as his own. It represented to him liquid consolation for his injuries. We could not spare anyone to chase Alfred, for the audience were getting more and turbulent, a bold front and a continuance of the play was needed to keep them from further excesses.

O'Connor, whose one thought as a rule was beer, now proved the most resourceful of anyone of us. He ordered the baggage man to fish out a revolver from the property basket, and fill it with blank cartridges. Sticking the weapon in his pocket he said:

"I know the temper of the bastes in this district, I've been round here before."

The hall was sometimes used as a night-school. A quantity of books to aid these nocturnal studies, were piled up in a couple of deep window ledges at the bottom of the hall. The gods in exposition of their renowned temper seized upon these, and sought revenge, for being doubly fooled, by hurling them at us.

"Haul down the curtain," everyone cried, but the hall-keeper who had experienced the effect of a Huddletonian audience's displeasure before, affirmed they would ransack the place, back and front, and probably maul us if we did.

"Let 'em have their game," said he.

It is no joke to be with devils at play, thought we. As most of the flying books fell short, we did not budge, but later one well-directed shot caught our hired pianist on the head, and he scuttled out of the hall like a rabbit with shot in his tail.

Roars of laughter followed his disappearance, and with a loud shout they followed the leadership of a self-constituted captain, and jumping the barrier, made a dash for us full of grim Huddletonian humour. O'Connor was equal to the occasion.

"Take every one up to the top dressing-room," he commanded, and springing on to the stage he covered our retreat by levelling his revolver at the foremost of the mob, shouting, "back ye divils, I'll put a bullet through the first that comes forward, before he's time to move a step."

For the moment they hesitated at this piece of checkmate humour. But their leader, nothing daunted, exclaimed:

"Never fear, boys. If he fires the pistol it won't harm us for there's sorra a cartridge in it. Come on, boys."

They surged forward again; O'Connor fired, they halted abruptly, and looked serious.

"I've missed ye this time, but the next time I'll hit," he threatened.

Whether, after this demonstration of force, O'Connor, with his Irish eloquence could not have explained matters, and pacified them we were never to know, for the hall-keeper, contrary to his own advice, here lowered the curtain.

Emitting curses, loud and deep, O'Connor made with all haste for the top dressing-room with the mob at his heels. Placing the ladies in the room, we three fellows made a hurried barricade on the landing at the top of the stairs.

Everything that was portable we brought to cast on the heads of our assailants, reserving as a final coup a couple of heavy trunks to roll down the stairs. It was not long before they discovered us.

"Here they are," the leader cried, "go for 'em, boys."

Once more O'Connor's revolver came into requisition and held the foremost at bay while he addressed them.

He explained at length how we had been cheated as much as they; in conclusion asking them to go quietly home. Their answer to his eloquence was a shower of stones and books, and an attempted rush up the stairs.

We replied with heavier articles; O'Connor fired his revolver and they fell back. Then the battle began in real earnest, they made no attempt to storm our position, a spirited exchange of missiles was the order of the attack.

We had the advantage in position, but they had it in ammunition. Sticks and stones came flying about our heads. We let them have all back that remained with us, in addition anything we could lay hands on.

The ladies, nerved to the occasion, supplied us with bottles, glasses, brushes, boots, and even cakes of soap to cast on their heads.

The damage on their side we could only estimate from oft recurrent curses. On our side besides minor injuries, O'Connor had his left arm temporarily paralysed, and the baggage man his cheek cut open with a stone.

The time came when our ammunition ran short, and even the trunks had been rolled down to drive back the more daring of our assailants.

The mob were quick to see their advantage, and swarmed up the stairs. On the top stair we stood, and engaged them hand to hand, belabouring and thrusting them with iron scenery braces which did telling work.

This could not last for long we knew, a few minutes more and we should have been at their mercy, when the cry of "Police" burst from their midst, and the last I remember was a breaking up of the mass as I fell stunned from a blow on the head.

When I opened my eyes I found myself lying on a couch in a surgery with someone bathing my head. Roars of laughter proceeded from a corner of the room.

Turning my eyes in that direction I saw O'Connor with his arm in a sling giving a graphic account of the fray to the doctor, who was sewing up the baggage man's cheek. Our wounds proved our saving.

The doctor turned out a brick. He became so interested in us that with the help of the Mayor, and other influential people of the town, we got up a show a week later; this time with their genuine patronage.

Our fame spread and the whole town turned out to see us. Not only did we pay Baggalle's debts, but left the place with our pockets well lined.

The back seats greeted our reappearance with ringing cheers.

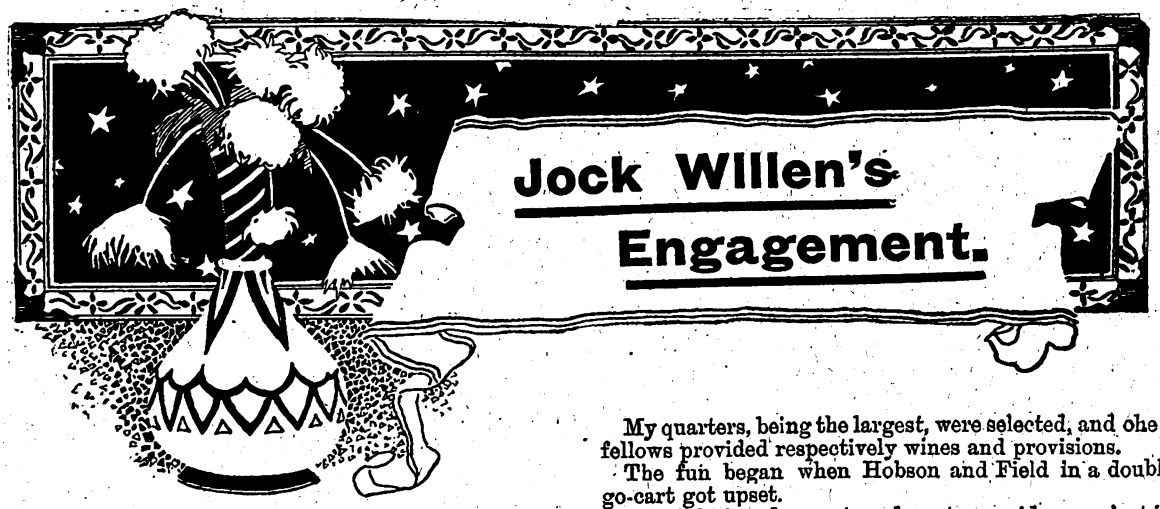
They were all agreed that we had given them better fun even than could be got out of an election.

I have lately heard that Baggalle and Alfred now own a booth in the north of Scotland, and there flourish like the green bay-tree.

DOUGLAS VIGORS.

[Next Week: "JOHN HANSON'S REVENGE."]

Digitized by Google



Jock Willen's Engagement.

For a right-down, rollicking, good dinner party give me a "Coaster!"

They may do themselves well in other parts of the world, but on the Gold Coast we simply don't draw the line anywhere. A first-class native cook can give any Frenchman points, and when we've got the wine—well, we don't put it away to improve the quality.

I've enjoyed a good many jolly dinners in my time, but I never met with anything yet to beat a regular Accra "send off"; though it may have been partly owing to the fits of the blues one gets there, and the reaction afterwards.

But we had a good many "send offs." If a chap was at all popular, when he went home on leave he was certain to get one, and if he had a birthday, or if he only said he had, it was much the same.

Bank Holidays were godsends, and if we could slip one in, sort of unawares, well, we always did. On national festivals we lost our heads, both figuratively and literally sometimes.

But the best I ever remember was the one we gave Jock Willen when he got engaged.

Jock was the most popular man on the Coast; from Sierra Leone to Calabar there was not a better fellow, and when he gave it out that he was engaged, all the chaps in the place wanted to give him the dinner.

Perhaps one cause of eagerness was the dearth of excuses that had recently prevailed. No one had done anything, there was no holiday coming, and we hadn't even had a funeral. After the last named I must tell you, we always had a dinner to keep our spirits up, as melancholia not unusually breeds fever.

A few months before we had had a regular harvest over the Ashanti business, as each Accra officer had to be "sent off" individually, but since then there had been a dearth.

We had only celebrated Halwell's old aunt's death when he got a legacy, the Governor's departure up country, and Beston's dog's puppies. (One of the latter was missing, and we found out afterwards it had been served up as a hors d'œuvres.)

No one could think of a reason for the next big "do" until Jock said he was engaged, and then everybody wanted to be host. At least everybody wanted to have it in his quarters, but they didn't exactly mean providing everything. In the end we divided the honours.

My quarters, being the largest, were selected, and the fellows provided respectively wines and provisions.

The fun began when Hobson and Field in a double go-cart got upset.

It caught in a deep rut, and went over sideways, just in front of my digs, and as several of us were watching from the balcony, they received a perfect fire of chaff.

We sat down twelve, and the noise increased gradually all through dinner. I had a surprise for them at the last, in the form of a real home-made Christmas pudding, that had come all the way from England. I had had two, and on Christmas Day, Medway, my partner in quarters, and I finished up one, after burning it in good old style.

Evidently our cook had seen the display, for when at last the pudding was triumphantly brought in, it was blazing away in fine fashion. I must confess I was a little surprised, but all the fellows looked pleased, and it was quickly divided round.

The first three men who took a mouthful, sprang up with a howl and everyone looked at me. To show there was no ill feeling, I took a mouthful myself—and howled likewise.

The cook had lighted the pudding by first soaking it in kerosene.

When the hubbub had subsided we got to the speeches; and if speeches ever made a man happy, Jock ought to have been the most absurdly happy man in the world. We wished him everything anybody could think of, to the point or otherwise, and broke various glasses in emphasizing our feeling, and we all promised to go and stay with him indefinitely when he was married.

Jock replied in his usual tip-top style, and was finally dragged out on to the verandah, as the only means of stopping him, and comic songs became the order of the hour.

But before we all separated, those of us who were capable of gravity congratulated him again very seriously, for we were all honestly pleased—we liked him so much.

Jock was serious enough himself as he thanked us.

"I'm an awfully lucky beggar," he said, "when you've seen her you'll understand, and I hope you all will some day or other."

* * * * *

"You'll go and see Miss Fortescue as soon as possible, won't you?"

I was just getting into the surf-boat and Jock was wringing my hand.

I was going home on leave and he was following in a month, but I was the bearer of an important little package for his fiancée, who happened to live, as I did, in Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

"I'll go the day after I arrive," I promised him. "and if you don't look sharp and come back I expect I shall cut you out."

He laughed happily.

"Have a try, old chap," he said. "I'll give you half my next year's screw if you do."

"Taken," said I, as the boat pushed off.

He stood watching a bit longingly and waved his hat. I see him now in his light flannel suit, with the sun on his fair hair and a smile on his lips in spite of the longing in his eyes. The handsomest, jolliest, and best fellow I ever knew.

When I got to England I lost no time in carrying out my promise, and was on the doorstep of Miss Fortescue's home by eleven the next morning.

She greeted me delightedly, and asked eagerly for every detail of news concerning Jock. She made no pretence of indifference, and was not in the least ashamed of her eagerness. She asked me a hundred questions, and I answered them gladly, if only for the pleasure of watching her expressive face. She was one of the prettiest girls I ever saw, and, what was better still, she was as natural and unaffected as a child. I quite agreed with Jock that he was a lucky beggar and almost told her so.

"It is my birthday to-morrow," she said, "and we are, having a little 'send off, as you call them on the Coast, in view of my coming wedding. Will you come? It will be quite informal and rather lively."

I accepted readily and proceeded to tell her of the "send off" we had given Jock. She listened eagerly, and wished we could all be there the following day. She thought it was so good of us to like him so much, but confessed it was not at all surprising.

Her dinner was as great a success as his had been, and, in its way, quite as jolly. She was evidently as popular as he was, and everyone vied with everyone else in wishing her joy. Things certainly looked promising for the young couple so far as wishes went, though a fulfilment of them must necessarily have been Utopian.

I had reason to remember that dinner with more pleasure even than the rest, for not long afterwards I became engaged to Miss Fortescue's sister, whom I met for the first time.

The three of us were chatting apart when she told me not to tell the name of the boat Jock was coming in.

"I'm going to meet him alone," she said, "just as I started him. We wouldn't have anyone there but just our two selves, and we arranged then, that when he came back, I should be the first he should speak to, and no one was to look on. That is twelve months ago," she continued; "it looked like a century then, but now it seems more like a week. I feel ready to go out of my mind with sheer happiness."

"Don't do that," I said laughingly, "it would be so jolly rough on Jock. He'd think he ought to go out of his mind too, to keep you company."

The morning the ship was sighted at Anglesea, I met her on the landing-stage, looking radiant beyond words.

"It can't be in for some hours," she said, "but I'm going to wait because time goes quicker here than at home. They don't any of them know for certain, though of course they have their suspicions."

"When may I appear on the scenes?" I asked chaffingly.

"You can meet the tender," she replied, "but you mustn't come out on it," and I told her I would obey orders.

What happened then I must tell as it was told to me, by a man who went out to meet his brother.

"I noticed her directly," he said, "who could help it? Also, it was rather unusual for a pretty young girl like that to be going on the tender alone. I speculated idly as to whether she was meeting husband or lover. I thought it must be one of the two from the light in her eyes. When we approached the ship she leant eagerly over the rail, trying to make out the faces of those who were aboard her. I noticed she did not seem to recognise anyone, and when we drew up alongside, she had turned rather pale, but was still scanning the ship eagerly. Still no look of recognition crossed her face, and I began to feel quite sorry, for I thought her friend, whoever he was, must have missed the boat. In fact, I kept near her on purpose, out of curiosity, and was still beside her when a lady, with a kind sad face, came up and asked her if she was Miss Fortescue. She said 'yes' in rather a bewildered way, still looking round. I don't know what the lady said then, but I heard the words 'fever' and 'last night' and then I saw Miss Fortescue drop like a stone."

That was all, but to this day when I see, in my mind's eye, Jock standing waving his hat on the beach at Accra, and the sunshine in the girl's eyes on the landing-stage, I feel a cold shudder.

The rest seems too cruel to be true, but one quickly learns things are none the less true because of that.

G. E. PAGE.

A TEN-POUND LADY CORNERED AT LAST!

Since last week two more Sealed Envelopes have been claimed, the lucky captors being:

Mrs. Johnson, 1 Milton Avenue, East Ham, who captured Ten-Pound Lady G,

Mr. F. W. Bull, 10 Kasghar Road, Plumstead, who captured No. 54 at a football match at Woolwich.

£340 HAS NOW BEEN PAID AWAY,

and there are still fifty Sealed Envelopes awaiting claimants.

There are also ten Ten-Pound Ladies about the country anxious to get rid of their Sealed Envelopes. No gentleman need apply, as these Envelopes are for ladies only.

The celebrated song

"HAVE YOU GOT THAT £10 NOTE?"

is now on sale, and can be obtained from all newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the SONG DEPARTMENT, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free.

DO YOU KNOW A GOOD STORY?

A prize of £10 is offered to the person from whom we receive the best anecdote relating to the Ten-Pound Scheme. All attempts should be sent in envelopes addressed: TEN-POUND STORY EDITOR, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by Monday next, Nov. 19th.

Full particulars of the Scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE CHINESE PIRATES OF SAIGON.

WHEN you have crossed the wide sea below Cochin China coming from the direction of Singapore, the first point of land you see is Point St. Jacques, a tall black cliff standing up from the sea, the furthest point of Cochin China below Saigon.

There are caves in the rocks where tigers live, and other caves where human tigers, called pirates, live.

People think, if they think on the matter at all, that pirates are by-gone creatures, that they do not exist now. They are less bold and powerful than they were fifty years ago, beyond a doubt: they do not dare to stop the big P and O's and North German Lloyd steamers that carry the mails, but it is still dangerous sailing these seas in smaller steamers.

Down the broad river mouths of Southern China where the low, flat marshes run back into the land, and where narrow creeks give easy cover, pirate junks lie hidden for days and weeks; no one disturbs these marshes, save an occasional French officer from Saigon or Tonkin, who has come out snipe shooting. Snipe are there in hundreds and wildfowl of many kinds, and there is also a chance of a tiger.

One broiling day in September a small trading schooner was crawling along a few miles from Point St. Jacques.

The owner had his wife and two children on board. They had been all the way to Colombo to get fresh stores to trade in amongst the Malay and Chinese in all the little villages and settlements about Cochin China. They did not attempt to trade in Singapore—the great shop of Little and Co. swamped smaller efforts there—or in Saigon either; no, they bought damaged goods cheap at Colombo and then they pottered round St. Jacques and the coast of Cochin and Siam, putting in at all the little villages and towns about.

Candles, cheese, tinned goods of all kinds and a lot of cheap whisky made up the cargo; cheese did not go bad in the intense heat, but only acquired an extra strong flavour, enough to make an Englishman feel unwell, but evidently much appreciated by the Chinese.

If it did happen to upset their inside arrangements, the whisky could be useful as an antidote. So Mr. Simpkins, the owner of the Mary Ann, felt himself provided at all points.

The family camped on deck in these latitudes, it was pleasanter for many reasons. Mr. Simpkins was smoking a pipe and sitting on a barrel, while Mrs. Simpkins was cooking the family supper, for it was getting on for seven o'clock. Joe and Matilda Simpkins were lying on the deck and kicking their heels in the air.

Joe was a sandy, nondescript kind of boy, about thirteen, with a turned up nose and freckles His sister was rather a pretty little thing, the sandy hair in her case had a quite golden tinge.

"What are we going to have for supper, 'Tilda?" said Joe.

"Fish curry," said Matilda sadly, "it's always fish in some way."

"Anything after?" asked Joe.

"Not as I knows on," said Matilda, "what a chance some folks have of enjoying themselves! There's Jane Brown, of Colombo, died the other day of eating ice cream on the top of hot puddin'."

"My," said Joe, enviously, "wot a lovely death!"

They were both gloomily silent for a short time—a silence broken by Mrs. Simpkins' voice calling them to the discussion of the despised curry.

The family sat round on the deck. with the curry on a large dish in the centre, from which it was ladled out by Mrs. Simpkins. All was peaceful and silent as the steamer glided through the oily water, a soft land breeze blew towards them, bearing the scent of spice-laden trees not far off, the Point of Saint Jacques towered above the small islands near.

"I always feel more happy-like when we've passed that there point," said Mr. Simpkins.

"Why, there ain't no pirates there now," said his wife, scornfully; "since Orang Kyah was smashed up, they haven't been seen about."

"That may be," said Mr. Simpkins oracularly, "but that don't prove that they ain't there. all the same. Also, Orang Kyah wasn't killed, he got away into the jungle, and there he is, you may take my word for it, awaiting his chance."

"Wot 'ud you do, father?" said Joe, "if he attacked the Mary Ann?"

"We'd do our best to defend her, o' course," said his father. "Tim and Mike would have to leave the injuns awhile, and I have a rifle apiece for us all, that may do some mischief."

"Lor!" said Joe, and relapsed into meditation, rather hoping the monotony of the voyage might be broken by a stirring incident.

Mrs. Simpkins and Matilda ate their supper undisturbed by these evil forebodings; there was no use in troubling one's mind over what might never happen.

"I hope they'll do some trading in the way of pine-apples and fresh vegetables in that there village not far round that corner, pirates or no pirates," said Mrs. Simpkins, practically; "the children are getting quite peaky and pale, for the want of fresh food."

"Well, we'll take a run near shore and see about it." said her husband, "we ought to get round the Point by eight o'clock."

The two engineers and general crew were to be seen popping their heads up through the hatchway, in a deprecating manner, meant to intimate to Mrs. Simpkins that it was time they also had a share of the fish curry, so with dispatch, taught by experience, she bundled off her family, swept up their plates, gave the latter a very perfunctory wash in a bucket, and then called up Tim and Mike to the festal board.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Simpkins sauntered to the bow of the steamer and took a survey of St. Jacques through a spy-glass. They were getting very near the big black rocks now. Suddenly two black specks shot out from a distant creek, on the wrong side of the Point to the settlement where they meant to trade. These specks soon developed themselves into two canoes holding about eight men each, and heading straight for the trading steamer. Mr. Simpkins groaned, and put the glass in his pocket,

"'Tis them pirates, sure enough," he said, in deep disgust.

"All steam on," he shouted down the hatchway to the engine-room.

"She won't stand much more, sir, without bursting," one of the men called out.

"I can't help it, she must take her chance of that," Simpkins answered, resuming his look-out on the rowing boats which were approaching unpleasantly fast. But the engines at first answered to the extra call bravely, and the steamer shot through the water much faster than any boat could hope to do.

This lasted for fully five minutes, in which time they had made good headway round the point. Suddenly what the engineer prophesied happened—the poor worn-out machinery gave way, a piston broke, there was a great whirr and everything stopped. On the steamer there was a pause of blank dismay.

"We're done for now and no mistake," said the stoker; "comes of going to sea in an old hulk like this 'ere."

He and his companion came up on deck and stood looking at the boats which were coming up fast.

"Come down, my men, and get your guns and cutlasses," said Mr. Simpkins, "and let's put the best face on it we can; after all, they may only be boarding us to trade."

"We ain't got no chance if it comes to fightin'," said the stoker sulkily. He was a miserable looking creature who looked as if he principally subsisted on coal dust. "Why, there must be at least thirty men in them canoes, and Chinese Boxers at that."

"I don't mean to prevent their boarding us," said Mr. Simpkins, "it's best to take for granted they don't mean us harm, as we can't get out of their way. These weapons are only to make a show that we aren't quite defenceless. You stay down here, my dear," he said to his wife.

"Certainly not," she replied determinedly, "my place is up by you, Henry Simpkins, and there I mean to stand. Matilda will stay below, but I go up."

"Very well," said Simpkins resignedly, "it don't make much difference anyway; come up, then," and on deck they all went—accompanied by Joe, who first carefully placed his rifle in a secure hiding-place of his own, behind a barrel of cheese.

The canoes were now within hailing distance and Simpkins stood up, waving a white flag. The occupants of the canoes took no notice whatever of this, but came straight on to the steamer, which was stopped to receive them. The Chinamen hooked the canoes on to the side and all of them scrambled on deck, looking alarming enough with their great creeses and curved knives. The leader, who was armed with a musket, was a very fine specimen of a Southern Chinaman, very tall and well-built.

Mr. Simpkins advanced, smiling, and said a few words in Chinese intimating he was a trader and anxious to do business with them.

The leader laughed contemptuously and repeated Simpkins' remarks to his followers, who evidently looked on them as an excellent joke. However, they made no attempt to attack either the family or crew, who were all on deck with the exception of Matilda; this young person had hidden herself down below, as soon as she saw the natives actually coming on board. She went down to a great flour-bin in the pantry, about a quarter full of flour, and having with difficulty climbed over the edge by the help of a barrel near, she sank down in the soft, white mass, covering herself all over with it.

She and Joe had often used the flour-bin as a capital place for hide-and-seek, when empty, and they had bored several round holes for ventilation and points of look out, when the lid was shut, so there was no danger of her suffocation.

It was lucky for her she was well covered by the flour, for the natives turned over and prodded about everything in the store-room and pantry, before proceeding to the hold. The lid of the bin was lifted several times by first one pirate, then another, but in looking in, they only saw a dim white heap, which was so evidently flour that they troubled themselves no further about it.

In about half-an-hour the pirates all assembled again on deck, most of them affectionately carrying a bottle of whisky, and made a report on the contents of the steamer to their chief, who had remained above.

The rifles concealed under the sail had been very soon discovered, and many unpleasant glances cast towards the unfortunate owners, whose hopes of getting off scot-free, except for the loss of the cargo, were getting lower and lower. The chief seemed pleased with the account brought him of the stores on board, he grinned pleasantly; then, making a sign to his men, they proceeded to seize Mr. and Mr. Simpkins and tie them up to the masts, of which there were two. Simpkins tried to remonstrate, but the pirate chief had him gagged at once with a spare Union Jack, while a Stars and Stripes performed the same kind duty to his wife.

The two men were first tied up and then rolled overboard, an employment which seemed to cause the pirates much amusement.

Poor Joe was also tied up and shoved into an empty barrel, and the top fastened securely on—then rolled away into a corner, no doubt to afford entertainment later.

Luckily for him the barrel was an old one and cracked by the heat, so, though very stifling, it was possible to keep alive.

These little arrangements finished, the pirates prepared to enjoy themselves. Still more whisky was brought up and several tins of provisions, and they all lay about, luxuriously, eating and drinking, while darkness crept over the sky.

Whisky was no new thing to them, they had been accustomed to it for years, though it was seldom indeed that such a glorious supply as this came to hand.

Moreover, there was no hurry about the feast, they could lie there in happiness and peace, watching the golden stars twinkle and the yellow moon slide round the point of St. Jacques, while the steamer rose and fell languidly on the glorious Southern Seas, and all nature prepared to sleep till the splendid dawning of another day.

A feeling of holy peace and contentment crept over the pirates—truly this world was a beautiful one—the moon above resembled the cheeses below, and through the mists of whisky, the stars winked sympathetically, and even the buzz of the mosquitoes was subdued to a gentle hum. Then they slept, all of them, full of good-will and sympathy, and rest.

Digitized by Google

But in the silent night-watches, the Angel of Death swept over the Point of St. Jacques, and folded his wings on the deck of the little schooner.

From man to man the dread whisper passed: "The plague, the plague!"—among those, that is, who awoke to sufficient sense to whisper. How it had come, no one knew, and no one ever does know.

Doctors have elaborate theories about it, and when it appears in some new place they set it down to some merchandise or infected goods imported from places where it rages; but who knows if they are right or not? It comes, that is all we know; it has its will, it slays its hundreds or its thousands, and when the thirst of the malignant devil is quenched, it flies away.

Perhaps it had come to the Mary Ann in the cases of damaged goods taken in at Colombo, perhaps it came in miasma from the swamps of Sumatra; who knew and who cared? It was there, that was all the victim cared to know; there in its full malignancy and in such deadly form that some of the stricken were dead in one short quarter-of-an-hour.

One by one they were attainted; the first ones who were seized believed it poison, but the blue swellings of the plague soon left no doubt of the identity of their visitant. In some, their necks were twisted and swollen, in others the huge bumps came beneath their arms, in others on the groin, and in all the end was the same.

When the sun rose, out of thirty men, twenty were dead. The survivors, many already stricken, pushed the dead men overboard, not caring much if they were only as yet in the stupor that in the plague often precedes death.

One of the men so pushed overboard was a Chinaman; the touch of the cold water restored his senses to a sufficient degree to enable him to recognise his desperate situation.

He stiffened himself mechanically and so floated on the surface of the sea. The noonday sun shed its fierce rays on him, the tropical showers that came in the middle of the day near the Equator drenched him in their cooling downpour, and the treatment of Nature did what no medicine could have done, to repair her own handiwork. Towards evening sense began to return to him and he commenced to swim.

He had drifted far beyond the Point of St. Jacques to the entrance to a land-locked bay. On the shore a mile away, a tall row of cocoa-palms lifted their graceful heads to the yellow-flushed sky—the murmur of the waves breaking on the sandy beach was borne far out to sea.

Fun Cheng had lived most of his life in a village on the coast of Formosa, the sea was to him as much his natural element as dry land is to us.

He swam on, gaining strength with hope, and in his deadened brain disease struggled with renewed life. Soon he distinguished the Malay huts, half on land, half in the water, some built on piles with only a few twisted bamboos between the inhabitants and an impromptu bath.

Fun Cheng swam on to a deserted creek, beyond the village; here he landed, and staggering up a short slope, lay down on the glittering sand. Some of the natives had seen him swim ashore, and came round cautiously to see what manner of man was this, who had apparently risen from the empty sea.

A Chinese shopman, who had set up his business in this out-of-the-way place, and who, by the way, made a remarkably good thing out of it, came too, and entered into conversation with his countryman from a safe distance. Fun Cheng truthfully told him the facts of the case, for there is honour among thieves and Chinamen, and his questioner, foreseeing gain from the stricken trader, indicated to him a distant hut, deserted, but weather-tight, in which, he told him he might take up his abode, if he could crawl so far. Fun Cheng thankfully agreed, and begged that food and drink might be sent to him there. Ah Chung trotted away to make arrangements. Then later, when all was quiet in the village and no eavesdroppers lurking round, the hope of gain led him to risk his precious person in the near vicinity of a plague-stricken man. He got from Fun Cheng the fullest particulars of the position of the trader, of the amount of the cargo, the number of men on board. Fun Cheng, though ill, had acuteness left to make a bargain, before imparting such valuable news.

"Before the morning dawns," said he, "all will be dead on the baneful vessel. Good wood and timber, and iron and money, will remain for the fortunate man who takes the ship into his keeping."

"'Tis an undertaking of danger," said Ah Chung, "the black death still lurks on board."

"True," said Fun Cheng, "but to a Chinaman, who has paid well for the tombs of his ancestors and has not left his father to groan in purgatory, what matters it? It is only these foreign barbarians who are utterly without intelligence, who waste good merchandise, for fear of the lurking plague. Wait but a few days and I will go myself to Cochin China to search for the trader."

Ah Chuug meditated: in a few days, the prize might be claimed by others.

"My friend," he said, "when to-morrow's sun breaks forth, I start myself. To you, as agreed between us, belongs one fifth of the profits that may arrive."

"'Tis little enough," said Fun Cheng sulkily, but Ah Chung cared little for that. He was master of the situation.

Next day at twelve o'clock he approached the Mary Ann, still anchored in the same place. Ah Chung was in a wide-sailed junk, accompanied by two stolid, immoveable Chinamen, his servants, and sharers in many a shady deed.

As they approached the schooner they hailed her, but no answer came; she lay like a painted image on the glassy sea. Ah Chung smiled, well satisfied.

"They sleep soundly in death," he said to himself. He hooked the junk on to the schooner and climbed on board. The Black Angel had used his scythe to some purpose—all were dead.

Mrs. Simpkins and her husband had evidently been released from confinement to give help to their captors, and in their turn released their children, but only to be themselves seized by the dread pestilence and to die side by side with their conquerors.

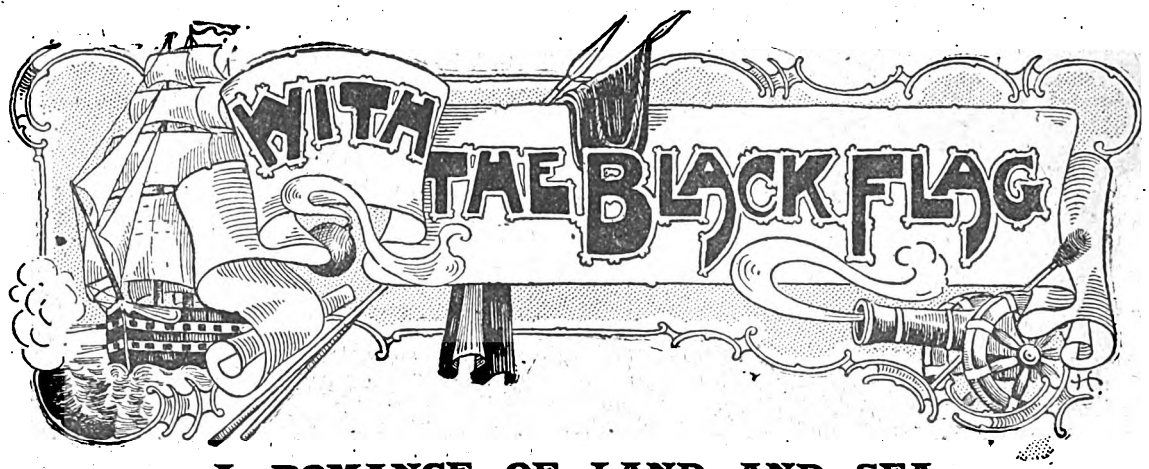
The schooner swayed slightly on the swell of the waves, and the sultry air seemed to cling closely to the stricken ship.

With stolid serenity Ah Chung and his men took possession. Why trouble about the self evident facts of death in life, of the suddeness of the judgment, of the terror of the plague? They pursued their ghastly duties of clearing the steamer and rifling the dead with unmoved hearts—and indeed with no little smug satisfaction.

In the East, sudden death is no strange visitor.

SADI GRANT.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty.
Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.
John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.
General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic.
Don Iago Santleo, a friend of Wyvenhoe.
General Urdenetta, Governor of Pampatar, a bitter enemy of Wyvenhoe.
Bolivar, Supreme Chief of the Venezuelan Republic.
Tamanac, an Indian Cazique, and great friend of Santleo.
Master Wyvenhoe, the leading man at Manoa.

CHAPTER XXI.

Rosalind's Answer.

I awoke next morning, happy and refreshed, and able to assure my host in reply to his courteous inquiry as to how I had slept, that I had not enjoyed so long and sound a sleep since I landed in Venezuela.

Nothing had disturbed me, neither the howlings of wild beasts, the barking of dogs nor the buzzing and biting of mosquitoes.

"That is because there are none," said he. "They don't breed here, it is too breezy for them. Our dogs are kept up at nights, our cocks do not crow before dawn, and we have neither wild beasts nor venomous snakes."

"What a favoured spot! I understand now why those Englishmen settled on this mountain. After their wanderings it must have seemed to them as it seems to me, a veritable paradise."

The judge smiled complacently, and I perceived that by praising Manoa I found my way to his heart.

"And as it seems so it is; at any rate, as much as any place here below can be," he said emphatically. "Where can you find a sweeter air, a finer climate or a more delectable prospect. Sickness is almost unknown. Manoeros live many years, and when their time comes they die of old age."

"You have no doctors, then?"

"Two or three of our people are skilled in bone setting, wound dressing and a knowledge of simples, the which, and water from the cold spring, are the only physic we use."

"Any lawyers?"

"None, thank Heaven, and very little law."

"What a fortunate folk! Hardly any sickness, lives easy and long, no mosquitoes, no lawyers, therefore no dissensions, and I am sure, very few troubles of any sort perhaps none. There is no place like Manoa."

The judge's face darkened, and I feared that I had said something which had better been left unsaid.

"You are right, there is no place like Manoa, and as it pleases you so well I hope you will make it your home for a long while," he observed after a moment's hesitation, in a way which showed that, though I might inadvertently have reminded him of something he would rather have forgotten, he had not taken offence.

We had breakfast under a tree in the garden. The ladies graced the repast with their presence and everything was delightfully simple. The spoons were of bone, the cups of horn, crockery was conspicuous by its absence; but the coffee and milk were delicious, and for the first time since I left England I tasted fresh butter.

I protested with truth that I had never enjoyed a breakfast so much, and was rewarded for my praises with bright looks and enchanting smiles.

Our talk was of the old country and Europe, as to which my entertainers could not hear enough. Rosalind questioned me about my family, and when she learnt that I had neither father nor mother, sister nor brother, said I must be very lonely, and looked as though she were sorry for me.

"Maybe our kinsman has a wife," quoth Beatrice, who was as impulsive as a child and blurted out whatever came into her head.

"Not yet," I said, thinking how narrowly I had escaped having one, and mentally comparing Araminta with Rosalind I need hardly say to the latter's disadvantage.

"That is a pleasure to come," remarked the judge.

"A pleasure to come," I repeated, glancing at Rosalind, whose eyes by the merest chance, and for a fleeting moment, met mine.

"On your return to England, for which I am sure some fair maid is anxiously waiting," put in Beatrice.

"Nothing of the sort. There is no maid in England for whom I care a pin or who cares a pin for me," I returned, perhaps more warmly than the occasion warranted.

"Maybe there is one somewhere else who cares for you. The world is wide, kinsman," rejoined the girl with a merry laugh.

"Don't heed her, she is in a mischievous humour and talks nonsense," said the father. "Would it please you to take a ride this morning and see something of the mountain?"

Digitized by Google

"It would please me vastly, especially if the ladies would favour us with their company."

"Oh, yes, let us go," exclaimed Beatrice.

"It is impossible for us all to leave the house, but thou and Rosalind may go," said Mistress Wyvenhoe.

"If you and Diana will go next time, else were it not fair," replied Rosalind.

"Very well, let it be so. Now run away and get ready."

"And I will see to the saddling of the horses," added the judge.

We had an agreeable ride. The horses were good and, though the equipments would not have passed muster in Rotten Row, they served. The young ladies rode well, as well they might, seeing that they had begun riding bareback almost before they could walk.

Beatrice was in high spirits, full of talk and laughter, now and then challenging us to race and going off at a gallop, Rosalind quiet and occasionally pensive.

I tried to draw her out, and found that I could always do so by talking of England and Wyvenhoe Court, themes of which she never tired and to which, however we might begin, we always returned. Yet she loved Manoa dearly, and passionately admired its superb scenery.

"You have nothing like that in England," she exclaimed pointing to Mount Lofty, as a mass of crimson cloud, floating slowl westward, revealed the glorious peak, crowned with his diadem of snow.

"Nothing; we have no mountains twenty thousand feet high, and Lofty must be that at least. Who gave him that name?"

"Our English forefathers. Nobody has ever got to the top, though many have tried."

"You don't know, then, whether it is an extinct volcano?"

"An extinct volcano! Why should it be an extinct volcano?"

"Because in the Andes, I am told, there are many volcanoes, extinct and otherwise, and is not that smoke rising from the summit?"

"Surely not; only a trailing cloud, or the steam of melting snow. Whence could smoke come?"

This suggested the tremor of the night before, though as it had not occurred to me that there could be any connection between them, I don't know why it should have done, and I asked Rosalind whether she had felt anything.

"Yes, and so did we all," was her answer. "It is caused by the swelling of the river, and of late hath happened oftener than usual. Why, I know not. But pray speak not of it to my father. It would only add to his disquiet, and just now he hath cares enough."

"I am sorry for that, and shall of course do as you wish. Is he apprehensive of danger from these vibrations?"

"Nay, why should he be? He does not like them to be talked about, that is all, and were there naught else we should not have a care."

"Cares at Manoa! I thought you were all as happy as the day is long."

"So we ought to be and so, not long ago, we were. But now——" and then with an air of embarrassment she stopped short.

"Do not tell me anything you think you had better not," I said gently, "only as you are good enough to call me kinsman, regard me as a friend whom you may implicitly trust, and who will be only too glad to serve you and also your father, in whatever way he can and you may desire."

"Thank you, kinsman, I will," she answered frankly, and as we were just then joined by the judge, who had stopped to give some directions to an Indian labourer, our colloquy ceased. Beatrice was a long way ahead.

Had Rosalind been an ordinary girl her candour and unreserve after so short an acquaintance would have shown

A young man accosted us, and was introduced to me as Master Antony Goring.

both a want of modesty and sense. But she was not an ordinary girl.

Of a frank and open nature, free from self-consciousness and ignorant of the conventions of polite society, she had no more knowledge of the world or taint of worldliness than an infant.

Moreover, the poor child (foolishly enough), looked on her English "kinsman" as in some sense a superior being, and I on my part, attracted by the comeliness of her looks and the sweetness of her disposition, had spared no effort to make myself agreeable to her.

Rosalind's pathetic reference to her father's troubles touched me deeply, perhaps all the more so because of its vagueness, and her reluctance to define them. Had I suspected that I might be, in some sort, the cause, my concern would have been still greater.

I thought we were going to ride all round Manoa, but the judge said that would be a day's journey, so we went no further than the track, the only way, in addition to the ladder, by which it was possible to go up or down the mountain, and the only point where the sides were not absolutely sheer.

A wide rift it was, deep and steep, which a sailor, a chimney-sweep, or a cragsman might scale, yet in its natural condition quite impracticable for amateurs, or any quadrupeds less sure-footed than goats. But by cutting paths in some places and throwing bridges across the chasm at right-angles to its course in others, a serviceable, albeit difficult, road had been contrived.

Digitized by Google

"That is the way the ladies go, I suppose?" said I.

"Ladies and four-legged things," replied the judge laughing. "We call it the ladies' ride."

"How did they manage when the path was blocked?"

"That was before my time. I suppose they had to abide where they were. The way by the ladders is much quicker."

"How about going down? Ascending is bad enough, but descending must be both dangerous and slow."

"Not when you are used to it. We don strong leather gauntlets and leggings and slide down. It is only a matter of a few minutes, whereas by the ladies' ride you cannot descend under an hour. You see how secure we are. We have only to pull up the ladder and block the path to make Manoa as inaccessible as the top of Mount Lofty."

"So you could stand a long siege?"

"A siege of Manoa would be a vain thing. So long as the mountain stands, and our people are true to themselves no missile can reach us, no foe hurt us, and as you have seen it produces everything we need, with a little labour. Nevertheless, we would rather keep foes at a distance, for if the mountain were turned into a prison we should no longer be free men."

As the judge said, I had noted the marvellous fertility of the mountain. It was an undulating table land, the greater part under cultivation, producing luxuriant crops, and abounding in rich pastures. The houses, too, were good of their kind, and the folk who lived in them looked prosperous and contented.

But they were of a different type from the Wyvenhoes, the Crosses, the Santleys, and others whom I had seen in the village and elsewhere; darker skinned and distinctly more Indian in feature and general appearance.

Santley inquired whether the judge had said anything about his troubles.

As I suspected at the time and afterwards learnt Manoeros were of two classes, I might almost say of two races. Certain of the descendants of the English settlers being more prosperous and fastidious than the others had chosen their wives with greater care, preferring those who were the most English-looking and occasionally intermarrying with Spanish Creoles.

This practice became a tradition and the families who observed it developed into an aristocracy of birth, wealth and ability. Nevertheless the results were not always uniform.

Now and then an aristocratic baby came into the world with a red skin and Indian features, and plebeian children were occasionally born who might have passed for the offspring of European parents.

On our way homeward the judge informed me that he meant to invite some friends to supper, with a view to my making their acquaintance, thereby reminding me that before we separated on the previous day my compadre had asked me to call at his father's house, a duty which after dinner and siesta I hastened to fulfil.

The house was in the same style as the judge's, though not so large, and the master of it a fine old gentleman with a wife as hale as himself. He had a grand manner and gave me a cordial welcome, saying how pleased he was that his son James and myself had become such good friends, and thanked me for the kindness I had shown him and the help I had given him.

To this I answered that the obligation was very much on the other side, and that without his son's help I should not have been alive, which seemed greatly to please him. As was to be expected, he asked many questions about England, and was very proud of his English lineage.

"I was born in 1740, when my father was forty years old," he said, "and his grandfather was the son of Paul Santley, one of the adventurers."

"Who came from Ware, in Hertfordshire," I added.

"How do you know that?" he asked.

"His name and birth-place are set down in the narrative of my ancestor, Gilbert Wyvenhoe, of which you may have heard. They were neighbours and friends."

"James told me about the narrative yesterday, and it is pleasant to think that we, too, are friends, for my son's friends are mine, and that our ancestors were also friends strengthens the tie," said Master Santley heartily, and we again shook hands.

When the visit was over, Don Iago, as I still liked to call him, bore me company. He seemed thoughtful, looking not nearly so bright as he ought to have done, seeing that he had only just arrived home after a long absence, and found his kinsfolk in good health.

"You seem dull to-day, is there aught amiss?" I asked him.

"Nothing amiss with my people. My father, though he was ailing when he sent Tamanac in search of me, is now quite well, also my mother, so are my sisters, and happily married, too."

"All the same, there is something on your mind, my friend, or you are not feeling well."

"Oh, I am well enough."

"You mean there is something on your mind?"

"I do. Things are not as they were when I went away. Has the judge said anything?"

"He has said a good deal; nothing, however, that suggests a cause for your pensiveness."

"He appears quite contented then. You did not gather that he had any particular cause for worry just now?"

"Not exactly, though when I come to think of it, he made two or three remarks that might be construed in that sense. On the other hand, he protests that Manoa is an earthly paradise and if all who live here are not happy the fault lies with themselves."

"He is right there, and I think nearly all are happy. But you must know that the judge is so devoted to Manoa that he will let nobody find fault with it but himself, and when matters are not quite to his liking, takes it very much to heart. However, as he has not been more explicit I think I had better follow his example—for the present."

Digitized by Google

"Manoeros seem to revel in the mysterious. For a long time you were a mystery, now there are other mysteries," I said, smiling.

"You know why I had to be mysterious. I could not help it. But I have no liking for mysteries and secrets between friends; they are incompatible with true friendship, and if you really wish it I will tell you what is troubling us. Only I would liefer the judge told you. If, however, he does not, I shall."

"Do as you think best, my dear Santley. This is no business of mine and I want to know nothing that you don't want to tell me."

On which he changed the subject and we presently met a young man who accosted us and was introduced to me as Master Antony Goring. He looked like a full-blooded Indian and his countenance and manner did not impress me favourably.

"He comes of a good family, but his father lost caste by marrying an Indian woman, who was not a Huaco, and he resembles her both in looks and disposition," remarked Santley as we resumed our walk. "We neither like him nor his family, with whom we are barely on speaking terms. It had given mortal offence, and for other reasons been impolitic not to introduce you, but don't tell your kinsman, he cannot abide him."

At the judge's garden gate we parted, Santley preferring not to enter, but we met again in the evening, he and his father being among the friends whom the judge had bidden to supper. It was a large gathering and I was greatly in request, being asked so many questions about England that in the end I had to give a sort of lecture, which, instead of contenting my audience led to further questioning, and it was past midnight when the party broke up.

I esteem it a great privilege to be an Englishman and am proud of my country, but before I had been at Manoa many days I was heartily tired of it as a subject of conversation. But I did not tire of my host and his family; he was always genial and they were always kind, and all made so much of me that knowing I should not be able to return their hospitality I began to feel positively uncomfortable and almost wished they would be less kind.

We made excursions nearly every day, riding sometimes round the mountain, now and then descending to the plain, where we had good sport, hunting leopards and wild pigs. But unless Rosalind were one of the party (and she did not go a-hunting) I never felt happy.

From the first I had taken a strong fancy to her, and fancy ripened rapidly into love, such love as I had never felt before. I laughed when I compared my penchant for Araminta with my passion for Rosalind.

Whether Rosalind returned my love I could not tell, and short of asking her had no means of ascertaining. That she liked me was obvious; she made no secret of it but I feared it was more the liking of a sister for an elder brother—a very much elder brother—for she thought me rather old—than the feeling which I would fain have had her entertain for me.

Also (and this increased my doubts) her manner to me at times was marked by a certain reticence and timidity, which was all the more perplexing as at the beginning of our intercourse it had been the reverse.

Had her self-consciousness been awakened, and if so what did it portend? Was it a good sign or a bad?

And there were other considerations that made for perplexity. Rosalind could become my wife and accompany me to England only by separating herself from her kindred for ever. The distance was so vast, the journey so hard, for a woman well-nigh impossible, that returning to Manoa would be almost, if not altogether, out of the question.

Between it and the Atlantic stretched two thousand miles of forests, llanos, mountains and swamps; between it and the Pacific towered the Cordillera of the Andes, with their raging torrents, their devastating storms and the terrible paramoes, and on the other side we might encounter

"Is anything troubling you?"

dangers still more formidable—rebels, royalists and robbers—and never reach the coast, much less England.

Had I the right to ask Rosalind to confront so many perils and make so great a sacrifice, and would her parents consent to lose her almost as utterly as if she were to die?

There was an alternative. I might settle in Manoa; but that would mean an end to the Wyvenhoes of Wyvenhoe Court, and I had interests at home which I could not abandon without a dereliction of duty.

Moreover, as there was no way of getting supplies from England, I should have to become a pensioner on my father-in-l w's bounty, to which, even though he were willing, I could never consent.

The more I pondered these things the more I was perplexed, and after long thought I concluded that there was nothing for it but to cease worrying (if I could) and put my trust in Providence and the good fortune which hitherto had served me so well.

Some time, a month or more after our previous conversation on the subject, Santley inquired whether the judge had said anything about his troubles and their cause.

"Not a word; I am as much in the dark as ever," was my answer.

"Then I will," he said, and told me rather a long story of which this is the purport:

Digitized by Google

Manoa was ruled by a council of seven, which, albeit once on a time chosen by popular vote, had become virtually self elective, vacancies as they occurred being filled up by the members themselves. Like other similar bodies, the Manoan council was dominated by its strongest man, in this instance Judge Wyvenhoe, who had so firmly established his authority that for many years he had ruled and ruled well, with almost despotic sway. But latterly, for reasons which it is unnecessary here to set forth, an opposition had arisen, led by Philip Goring (father of Antony) which threatened the judge's ascendancy and boded ill for the peace of the community, both of them having partizans outside whose rivalry was as bitter as their leaders', and my kinsman was too masterful either to yield or temporize; he would be autocrat or nothing.

Meanwhile, whatever he proposed was opposed. A majority of the council had been against my coming, alleging that to allow strangers to visit Manoa was unwise and contrary to all precedent. But the judge would not listen to them, and himself went to fetch me, thereby giving great offence, and still further embittering his enemies.

This vexed me exceedingly, and so I told Santley, adding that rather than cause strife I would leave the mountain.

"No, no, my dear friend, you must do nothing of the sort," said he. "You are not answerable for the strife. The council opposed your coming merely to thwart the judge, and your going away would grieve him as much as it would gratify your enemy. So dismiss the idea from your mind and, above all, make no mention of it to your kinsman."

To this I consented, though with reluctance, being far from sure that by prolonging my stay I should not add to Master Wyvenhoe's cares, and had there been no Rosalind I should have sought a pretext for taking my leave.

But no long while after my talk with Santley something happened which put an end to my indecision and brought matters to a crisis.

As I have already hinted, siesta was an institution in Manoa. After the midday dinner everybody disappeared, presumably to indulge in a nap. I generally betook myself to the garden and laid me down in a hammock, under the shade of a magnolia tree, sometimes to sleep, oftener to smoke.

One fine day, when I was thus occupied, I heard a light footfall, and, turning my head, espied Rosalind slowly pacing along a side walk, bordered with great rose trees.

I slipped from my hammock and joined her.

"You look pensive," I said. "Is anything troubling you?"

"Nothing worth mentioning. I was only thinking."

"About what?"

"Are your gardens at Wyvenhoe Court anything like this?"

"That is only an evasion," I returned, laughing. "You were not thinking about Wyvenhoe Court."

"Never mind, tell me about the gardens."

Which I did at some length, for they were old and quaint and delightful, and merited a better description than I could give of them.

"I should like to see them, they must be very beautiful," said Rosalind wistfully.

An irresistible impulse seized me; doubts, dangers and difficulties went to the winds.

"Go with me to England and they shall be yours," I exclaimed.

Rosalind regarded me with a bewildered stare.

"Go with you to England! What?" she stammered.

"As my wife. I love you, Rosalind, I love you."

"You love me! Me, a foolish girl, who has never been away from Manoa. It is not possible, it would be too much——"

"It is more than possible, my Rosalind. You are all the world to me. But can you love me?——"

"Yea, kinsman. I love you with all my heart. I began to love you that day you came to our house and were so kind."

"My darling, you don't know how glad you have made me," I said putting my arms round her. "But do you know what going to England means? The way is long, the dangers are great, and it is so far away that you might never see Manoa again. Think well before you decide."

"I have decided. I love Manoa much, but I love you more. As Ruth said to Naomi, so say I to you: 'Whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people and thy God my God.'"

"And may God bless you, darling," I murmured, drawing her closer to me and gazing enraptured into her sweet eyes, bright with happiness and love.

"Oh, kinsman, what was that?" she exclaimed, starting back in affright.

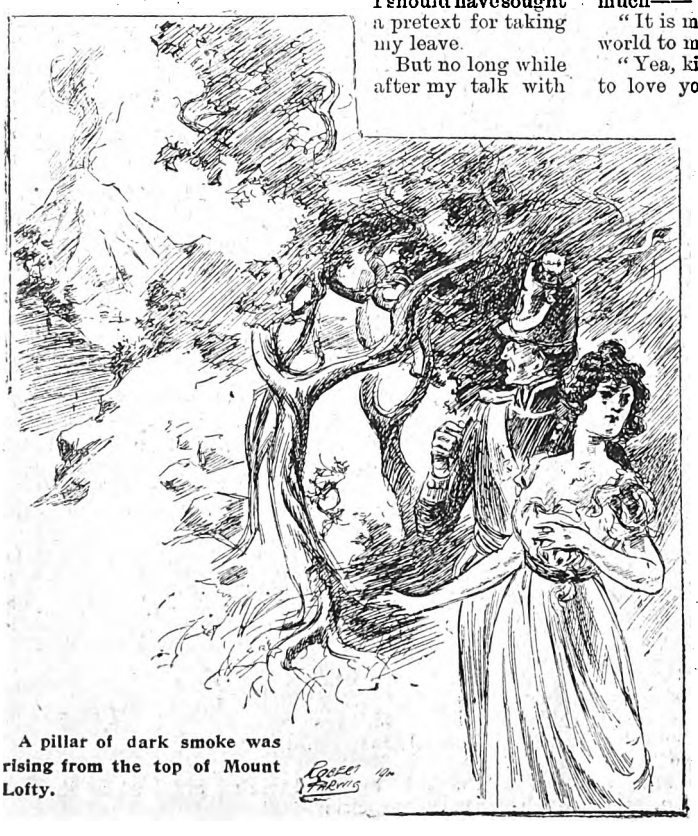
The ground was trembling under our feet.

"Nothing to be alarmed about, only the river," I said with feigned indifference.

"The river again, oh that river!" murmured Rosalind, clinging to me nervously. "Despite what my father says I sometimes think——"

Another trembling, longer and more marked than before arrested the words on her lips. I looked towards the Cordillera. A pillar of dark smoke was rising from the top of Mount Lofty into the cloudless sky and my heart grew heavy with a nameless dread.

(To be concluded.)



A pillar of dark smoke was rising from the top of Mount Lofty.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT GHOSTS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Jock's Ward," by Mrs. Herbert Martin, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr Thomas Riley, 178 Horton Grange Road, Bradford. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about CAMELS, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 19th. Post-cards only, please.

Quite Enough.

LANDLORD: "Good-morning, sir; hope you enjoyed a good night's rest, sir?"

Traveller: "Yes, thanks; pretty fair."

"Saw nothing of the ghost that is said to appear from time to time in the room you occupied?"

"Ah! yes, I did, though"

"And how did you get rid of the intruder?"

"I offered him a glass of your wine, when he vanished with a gesture of supreme disgust."

"Oh, ah! Well, I never!"

T. A. R.

Have You—

DIBBINS was staying at a strange hotel in Leeds, and retired to rest about eleven.

He had been in bed about half-an-hour, when he was startled by the opening of his bedroom door. Looking up he was horrified to see a figure clothed in white approaching his bedside.

He tried to speak, but could not; his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth, and he broke into a cold sweat from head to foot.

A moment more and the figure was at his side, and a voice said:

"Excuse me, sir, but have you got that Ten-Pound Note?"

J. W.

A Somnambulist's Danger.

A FRIEND told us the other day about a little experience he had with a young boy who was addicted to sleep-walking. Of this fact he was not aware, and he was much surprised, on being awakened at night, to see the youth standing at the window in the moonlight. Said the boy:

"I wonder if the water is very deep."

Evidently he thought that he was in a boat on the lake.

Our friend awoke at once to a recognition of the situation and to an awful sense of the emergency.

"It's very deep," he said. "I wouldn't try to swim if I were you."

"Why not?" asked the somnambulist. "It's just as calm as can be."

"But there are sharks in the water."

"I don't believe it," said the boy—the two had been out fishing all day long. "I mean to take a bath."

With that he would have dived out of the window had not his companion managed by this time to creep up and seize him by his night-clothes. C. H. M.

The "Haunted" Man.

THEY were talking of "spooks" at a hotel the other evening, and several stories had been told which made the flesh of the listeners creep.

During a lull in the conversation the quiet man, who sat near the door, spoke up:

"Gentlemen," he said, in sepulchral tones, "the weird narratives I have just listened to have awakened memories which I thought had passed beyond recall. I beg of you not to be sceptical, nor yet think me boasting, when I tell you that for many years I was the most haunted man in creation.

"Scarcely a night passed that I did not see apparitions of all kinds floating before my vision. Elves, demons, witches, and other evil shades were familiar companions of mine, whilst others of my constant ghostly visitors were the victims of foul crimes, whose shadowy fingers would point to the crimson tide oozing from their breasts, and whose eyes seemed to implore me to avenge them ere they vanished again into thin air!

"I was perpetually haunted; in fact, my existence seemed linked to the supernatural. Spiritland was an open book to me. I——"

"But where was this?" inquired his listeners excitedly in a breath.

"It was during the time," he replied, putting on his hat and seizing the door handle, "that I was the proprietor of Professor Bunkum's Unrivalled Ghost Illusion!"

A. V.

All's Fair in Love.

A FARMER, who had lately become a widower, was aroused at midnight by the loud barking of his dog. On going to it, the animal displayed extreme terror, whereupon the farmer took his gun and proceeded to an inspection.

All at once he saw a phantom, clothed in a white sheet, rise behind the hedge.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the phantom, "I am your deceased wife, come from the grave to warn you not to marry Maria Ames, to whom you are making love. The only woman to succeed me is Henrietta Burns. Marry her, or persecution and torment shall be your doom."

This strange address from the apparition, instead of dismaying the farmer, restored his courage. He accordingly rushed to the ghostly visitor, and stripping off the sheet, discovered the fair Henrietta Burns herself, looking extremely foolish.

It is said that the farmer, admiring the girl's trick, has had the banns published for their marriage.

F. W.

Digitized by Google

SOME OTHER LITTLE STORIES.

His Little Joke.

When the phonograph was a newer invention than it is at the present time, Edison put one of the machines in a clock and placed it in a guest-chamber. Being a great lover of a practical joke, he also placed a friend in the guest-chamber one night.

Just as his friend was disrobing, he heard a voice exclaim:

"Eleven o'clock; one hour more!"

It is needless to say that slumber did not descend upon the eyelids of the visitor during that hour. At midnight the voice exclaimed:

"Twelve o'clock; prepare to die!"

This was too much for the visitor, and he sprang from the bed and rushed to the library, where Edison and his friends were waiting patiently expecting his appearance.

The invention was soon explained, and quiet restored.

U. S.

Oh! Mr. Porter.

The other day a train drew up at Chester Station. One of two young ladies alighted, but remained chatting to her friend at the carriage window. As the signal stood at danger, the train did not start for several minutes.

"What are we waiting for?" asked one of the young ladies as a porter came up to them.

"We are waiting till you have finished your conversation, miss," replied the porter.

"Oh, thank you very much, porter; but we will not detain you any longer. Good-bye, Emily, darling."

Just then the signal dropped, and the train started, leaving the young lady on the platform looking in her purse for some small change for the purpose of tipping the obliging porter.

A. H.

Explaining the Business.

A well-dressed lad, the son of wealthy parents, thought it would be quite manly to earn a few coppers for himself by selling newspapers.

He stopped a tattered newsboy in the street and said to him:

"Do you think I should be able to earn money as you do, if I bought some papers and came to this corner to sell them?"

"Why do you want to sell papers?"

"I'm tired of being idle."

"Well," said the philosophic little newsboy, with a serious air, "d'yer think you can hold twenty papers in one hand, lick three or four boys bigger'n yerself with the other hand, while yer keeps two more off with yer feet, and yell 'Football 'dition!' all the time?"

"No-o, I don't," replied the well-dressed boy.

"Then yer no good in the newsboy biz," replied the tattered philosopher. "You'd better get yer people to prentice yer to something light."

A. S.

Why it was Tough.

The other day a gentleman entered a certain restaurant in Regent Street and ordered chicken.

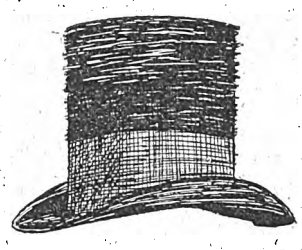
The chicken was evidently tough, for when the waiter came in he beheld the gentleman in a great state of wrath.

"Waiter," he said, "this chicken is very tough."

"Very sorry, sir. That chicken was always a peculiar bird. Why, when we came to kill it we couldn't catch it, so at last we had to shoot it. It flew on the house-tops, and——"

"Ah, by jove, that accounts for it. You must have shot the weather-cock by mistake."

E. C. S.



HERE IS A PICTURE OF KRUGER'S TOP HAT.

Do You Think it will Fit YOU?

Don't you think it would look nice on your drawing-room table, or under a glass case on your mantel-piece? Well, there is no reason whatever why you should not get it. As you probably know, the Editor of Pearson's Weekly has bought it, and is offering it as a prize in a simple competition. All you have to do is to send in what you consider the funniest joke you ever heard. It may be either cut from a paper or written up by yourself. In either case you must affix to it a coupon which will be found in the current number of Pearson's Weekly.

THE OPENING CHAPTERS

OF Mr. AUSTIN FRYERS'

WEIRD NEW STORY

"THE UNCREATED MAN,"

WILL APPEAR IN

"THE DAILY EXPRESS"

ON SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17th.

The powerful work of Mr. Austin Fryers is already well known to the readers of "PEARSON'S WEEKLY;" but his latest Romance of a scientist who sets himself to war with nature exceeds all his previous stories in the thrilling nature of its incidents. The grim plot is relieved by a charming love-story. . .

REMEMBER. . . .

The Date—November 17th. The Author—Austin Fryers.

The Title—"The Uncreated Man." The Paper—"Daily Express."

Digitized by Google

THE STAMP PORTRAIT.

THE senior partner at Messrs. Castle and Hayward's, the well-known East India merchants, came out of his private room. accompanied by his cashier.

Both gentlemen looked unusually serious and as the clerks in the busy counting-house looked up and caught the expression on the face of their chief they fell to wondering as to what storm was brewing, or to put it into the terms usually employed "Who's in for a wigging now?"

Just a glance and each individual immediately became a model of industry, until every pen was arrested by the voice of Mr. Anson the cashier, who was standing, with his chief, in the centre of the office.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I regret to inform you that something of a very unpleasant nature has occurred in the office. Last evening I brought from the bank a bag containing notes and gold, which I placed in my desk in the presence of Mr. Castle. This morning I find some of the gold is missing and also two five-pound notes. I very much regret the circumstances which compel me to request each man to lock his desk, place the key on the top, and remain seated in his place until a search has been made. Before commencing the search I have to inform you that at present suspicion is not attached to any one of you individually, but for general satisfaction it has been decided to make this search."

Astonishment was writ large upon the face of the busy bees of Messrs. Castle and Hayward's hive as they complied with the cashier's request. When every desk had been locked and the key placed on the top, Mr. Anson commenced his round, while Mr. Castle surveyed the proceedings from his position in the centre. scanning the faces of his clerks as though he would read their inmost thoughts. There was a variety of expressions. Some looked indignant, as if they resented the imputation cast upon them generally. others seemed inclined to be amused by the affair; one or two wore a look of bored indifference, real or assumed, a few looked grave and serious—a sort of reflection of their chief's expression.

Meanwhile the cashier was going the round of the desks, but when he had completed his task it was found that that cover had been drawn blank, to use a hunting phrase. He rejoined his chief and a whispered consultation ensued. As a result of this the cashier had another announcement to make.

"The search of the desks has not led to any discovery. and it is with extreme regret that I have to ask each of you to submit to a personal search. This is a most unpleasant and painful business, but I think you will all agree. If any man has an objection if he will step out here we shall be glad to hear his reasons, though I must say that I hope none of you will take that course."

There was a momentary buzz of conversation and then as nobody expressed an objection, though many of them looked upon it as an indignity, the search began.

The course of procedure arranged was as follows; each man, when his name was called, left his seat at the desk and walked over to the place where his outdoor garments hung, and after exhibiting the contents of the pockets in the clothes he was wearing, he turned out those in the coats which hung on the pegs. Many of them changed their coats on arriving at the office and as most of them had overcoats with them, the business was a lengthy one. It also caused some embarrassment, and had it not been for the gravity of the affair, the display would have been very amusing.

Pipes, pouches, cigarettes, photos—which were evidently produced with some reluctance—and papers, such were the contents of the various pockets. Still nothing had been discovered, and out of the forty odd clerks, only six remained to be searched.

The next to be called on to submit to the ordeal was James Armstrong. He stepped out with a look of quiet confidence. Pocket after pocket he turned out until he came to his overcoat. One by one the pockets were overhauled until only the inside breast pocket remained.

Inserting his hand he drew forth the contents and then started back with a look of consternation. A certain crisp crackle had denoted the presence of the paper currency, and as he started a small parcel fell from his grasp and struck the floor with a metallic chink.

The search was ended—the culprit was found. The cashier looked surprised and even regretful, while the appearance of James Armstrong might very well be taken to betoken guilt.

The cashier walked over to where his chief still stood and a second consultation followed, after which he again addressed the wondering clerks.

"Gentlemen, you may now resume your labours, but before you do so I am instructed by Mr. Castle to inform you that it is his wish that no mention of this painful business be made outside." With this Mr. Castle and the cashier withdrew to the private room, accompanied by James Armstrong.

When the door was closed, there was more talk than work in the office. The discovery of the missing money in James Armstrong's pocket had come as a general surprise, for, though none would have dared to venture on a guess as to who was the most likely to be the culprit, most of them, if asked to name the most unlikely, would have named, after themselves of course, James Armstrong.

There were, indeed, one or two of the wilder spirits in the office to whom John Armstrong had given offence by refusing to join them in their recreations, and whom he had ventured to remonstrate with and reprove, who affected not to be surprised and indulged in cheap sneers.

"Another hypocrite unmasked," said one; "I am always suspicious of these professing saints."

This remark, however, was received with evident disapproval, for though there were others who had disagreed with Armstrong, they were too English to gloat over a fallen foe.

Meanwhile a painful scene was being enacted in the inner room.

"Mr. Armstrong," said the chief, "I shall be pleased to hear anything you may have to say, though there is not much that can be said in the face of this discovery."

"Mr. Castle, I can only say, though I cannot blame you if you do not believe me, that I am utterly unable to account for the presence of the money in my pocket."

Digitized by Google

He would have said more but his emotions overcame him and he broke down.

"James," resumed his employer in a more kindly tone than he had hitherto used, "this discovery came both as a shock and a surprise to me. You have been with us a long time and have served us faithfully and well. I have watched you with considerable interest and had hoped to see you rise. If you were in financial difficulties, had you confided in me and I had found the reason of your difficulties not to be a faulty one I would have advanced you money. You must have been mad, however, to take this, for you must have known that the loss would be immediately discovered. Now, tell me, what led you to commit this folly?"

"I assure you, sir, that I am innocent and know nothing further about it than you already know," replied the clerk.

"Were you the first to arrive this morning?" asked the cashier.

"Thomas Hardcastle, Reginald Shaw and I arrived simultaneously, meeting at the door."

The other two clerks were summoned to the chief's room, and the excitement in the outer office became intense.

"I suppose he is trying to incriminate someone else, now," remarked the man who had indulged in the previous sneer.

Upon inquiry it was found that the three clerks had arrived together as Armstrong had stated. It was also ascertained that, before the arrival of the others, each of the three had, in turn, been left by himself in the counting-house for a short time, while the other two had been in other parts of the building.

Mr. Castle was sufficiently just to Armstrong to inform the other two before dismissing them to their duties, that no attempt had been made by their colleague to implicate them. When they had gone he again turned to Armstrong.

"James, I ask you to make a clean breast of the business and promise you that I shall not deal harshly with you. If you will only confess what made you thus rashly throw away your good character I will retain you in my employ, though you will have to be transferred to the wharf, as it would be unpleasant for all concerned for you to remain here. I make you this offer, because I am loth to think that one who has been so consistent and faithful as you have been during the years of your service here, can be utterly bad. I am inclined to attribute your action to a m d impulse."

Looking his employer steadily in the face James Armstrong replied, "I have nothing to confess, sir."

"Very well," answered Mr. Castle coldly. "In consideration of your previous good character and the fact that the money has been recovered, I shall not take any action against you, beyond, of course, dismissing you from our service."

Turning to the cashier he said, "Mr. Anson, you will pay Mr. Armstrong's salary up to the end of the month and arrange for the appointment of a man to fill the vacancy." With this the senior partner took his hat and coat and left the office, shortly followed by James Armstrong.

On leaving the office James Armstrong went direct to the clergyman whose church he attended and among whose workers he was enrolled. There he poured out the whole story and repeated his protestations of innocence.

The vicar listened sympathetically to the narrative. He had seen much of James Armstrong's inner life, and from his knowledge of him quite believed in his innocence. In assuring the grief-stricken clerk of his belief, however, he also pointed out the difficulty of proving it, and then he made a suggestion.

"I have a brother," said he, "who is engaged in business in Liverpool. He is a kind-hearted man and delights in doing good. With your permission I shall write to him, telling him of your unfortunate position and also of my own belief, and I think it very likely that he may be able to offer you a position in his office. While we are awaiting his reply, which I shall ask him to let me have promptly, you had better come and stay with me."

Armstrong was grateful for this offer. In his trouble, it would have been dreary indeed for him to stay in his lodgings, to say nothing of the agony which he would endure at the thought that the other lodgers would despise him, even if they did not refuse altogether to associate with him. He could not go back to his mother in Devonshire, and the proximity and companionship of the vicar would be a solace to him.

There did not seem to be much doubt in the mind of the Rev. Arthur Best that a place would be found for Armstrong in the Liverpool firm, so the young fellow felt more at ease with reference to earning a living; but the weight of the unjust accusation so overwhelmed him that he went about like one in a dream.

It was just after dinner on the following day, while the vicar and Armstrong were in earnest conversation, that a letter was brought in for the young man. It had been sent on from his lodging, he having informed his landlady that he was staying with Mr. Best.

The envelope bore the imprint of Castle and Hayward; the young fellow saw this at once and tore it open in great haste, his heart beating much more rapidly than usual and his brain in a whirl with the wild hope that the contents of the letter would inform him that a terrible mistake had been made. But a shadow passed over his face when he had opened the sheet of paper; he looked at the handwriting on the envelope, and then dropped both paper and envelope to the ground, and placed his hand before his face to hide the tears of vexation and grief which he could not repress.

"May I look at it?" asked the vicar kindly.

Receiving an affirmative reply in the form of a nod, he picked up the paper. It was a sheet of Castle and Hayward's letter paper, quite blank, with a miniature photographic portrait of Armstrong—about the size of a postage-stamp—pinned to it.

The Vicar then picked up the envelope and looked at the handwriting.

"Do you understand the meaning of this, Armstrong?" he asked. "Do you recognise the handwriting?"

"Yes, sir," replied the young fellow as soon as he could master his emotion. "Only two days ago I gave away the last three photographs I had to fellows in the office. One was to Shaw, with whom I always was on good terms. He has returned it to me in that way, it is his handwriting, and I must take it that he thinks me guilty and will not even keep my portrait."

The vicar scrutinised the postage stamp and made a mental note; he then unpinned the photograph from the paper and mechanically turned it over. He examined the back of the portrait for a few seconds very attentively and, putting envelope, paper and portrait into his pocket without a word to Armstrong concerning the result of his examination, he went up to the young fellow and whispered a few words of comfort to him.

Digitized by Google

"If I had not been a cleryman," mused the Rev. Arthur Best about half-an-hour later, on his way to the City, "I think I should have liked to be a detective. After all, there is just a resemblance between the two occupations; it is true that the detective is chiefly employed in the detection of criminals, but he also tries to prevent the commission of crimes, and the clergyman does that also, only in another way."

The reverend gentleman went straight to the offices of Castle and Hayward, and asked to see the chief partner. His request was granted immediately, and he was shown into Mr. Castle's private room. He remained there for about twenty minutes, which was an unusually long time for an interview with such a busy man; and when he left Mr. Best's countenance looked a little more cheerful.

It was about half-an-hour before closing time when Mr. Castle entered the large room and called out in a preoccupied sort of manner:

"Oh—er—yes, you'll do, Mr. Shaw. Come into my room, please, and bring your pen. I want you to copy something private for me."

Mr. Shaw, surprised and pleased at being selected, sprang from his seat and obeyed the summons. It was a short and curious document which he had to copy; a disjointed sort of affair, as it seemed to him, and contained something about paying a certain Jackson a sum of money without fail. There were three or four sets of figures among the writing.

Mr. Castle seemed to have a good deal of private business on hand just then, for he stayed after hours that night, and the next morning Mr. Hardcastle and Mr. Boulton, quite unknown to each other, were called to the chief's room to copy documents which were in some respects similar to that copied by Shaw. In each case the copyist was requested to keep the contents of the document a profound secret.

In the afternoon the Rev. Arthur Best called again, and, after another lengthy interview, departed in a very cheerful frame of mind. Then Mr. Castle asked Mr. Anson to step in, after which Mr. Boulton was called.

"Mr. Boulton," said the chief suavely, "here is a little memorandum of yours which you have no doubt missed and will be glad to have back."

As he spoke he placed the little photograph of Armstrong on the table, face downwards, in front of the clerk.

"It was discovered, you will be interested to learn, in the folds of the two £5 notes that were put into Armstrong's pocket," continued the chief.

Boulton's face went deadly pale; he glanced swiftly at the chief and the cashier, and then made a bolt for the door.

But as he put his hand on the nob, he was seized by the cashier and the chief touched the electric bell for the porter.

The Rev. Arthur Best made a second call at the offices that afternoon, this second call having been arranged by Mr. Castle.

"Yes, I'm happy to say that we have discovered the culprit, and he has confessed," said Mr. Castle. "Tell Armstrong to come back here to-morrow morning, and we will do what we can to make amends."

Mr. Castle then related what had occurred between the two visits, but it will be better for us to repeat the explanation given by Mr. Best to Armstrong.

Boulton had been betting and was hard pressed for money; he had yielded to the temptation of an unexpected opportunity and had taken the money. Then he became scared at what he had done, and in his anxiety to get rid of the money he had dropped it into the pocket of one of the overcoats hanging near his own, regardless of the consequences to the owner of the coat. He had just done that when Mr. Castle and the cashier entered the room, as above related.

When the notes were unfolded by Mr. Anson, the little portrait dropped out. The cashier had taken it for granted that this was a confirmation of Armstrong's guilt. In thrusting the notes into the pocket, the portrait had got in the folds, as smaller papers sometimes do. He had pinned this portrait to a blank sheet of paper without noticing anything on the back of the photo, and, after having sealed it in an envelope, had given that envelope to Shaw to address. He had concluded that Armstrong would recognise a piece of evidence against himself without explanation.

The vicar had first noted that the postage stamp was a perforated one, and had decided from this circumstance that the letter had been sent by the firm and not by Shaw personally. Then he had observed on the back of the photo a brief pencil note about "Jackson" and "pay without fail."

He had shown these things to Mr. Castle, telling him that it must be one of the three which Armstrong had given away. Mr. Castle determined to test the handwritings and figures of the three clerks and compare them with the words and figures on the back of the photo. He had stayed late in order to examine the books and compare the figures in those also.

When Mr. Best called on the second day, Mr. Castle was able to tell him that he believed the culprit had been detected. He was asked to call again an hour later, when, it was hoped, the whole mystery would be cleared up.

Armstrong went back to Castle and Hayward's the next morning, and received quite an ovation. He received an increase of salary, and his prospects are considered very good indeed.

J. H. PEAT AND GEO. DAY.

DAUGHTER: "Oh, papa, I've just got the most lovely yachting costume you ever saw."

Papa (busily): "I'm glad you like it."

Daughter: "It's too sweet for anything. Now all we need is a yacht.

"AH, but you have a loving husband, Mrs. Simms. I remember before your marriage he said he would move heaven and earth for you."

"I remember; but now that we are married he won't even condescend to move the dresser so that I may sweep beneath it."

"TWENTY TEAZER."

WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?

EVERYBODY seems to be trying to find out. We will tell you all about it in good time. Meanwhile a cheque for a guinea will be sent to the person from whom we receive the best four-line verse, the last two words of which shall be "Twenty Teazer." The verses may be humorous or serious, just as competitors like. All attempts should reach the "Teazer Editor" by Monday, November 19

Digitized by Google

The Salamander Powder Swindle.

A COMET SCARE.

GOOLEY took up the morning paper, drew a chair to the table and prepared for breakfast. The cruet served for a paper rest, as he deftly scalped an egg and scanned the news as an aid to digestion.

He had no fixed pursuit, belonging to that class who live on their wits if they possess any, if not they steal from someone else. Gooley was a human shark who preyed on his fellow man. For the last few months his banking account had looked ill—no new thing. He had prescribed for it before and meant to do so again, but it would want a strong tonic this time.

Suddenly he became interested in the paper. It was a line in large type. He read again, "The Destruction of the World by Fire." Then followed a prediction by that eminent man, Professor Biglie, stating how a comet would come into contact with the earth on November 7th, 1900, and how the earth would be destroyed with every living thing.

It was not the fear of a roasting—he expected a hot quarter—that worked on Gooley, but a sudden idea, a grand scheme. In fact, a fortune was staring him in the face. So brilliant and comical was the idea that he gave a wild whoop, jumped on to his feet, clapped his hands and laughed. It was not a laugh pleasant to the ear, but such a one as an enemy would favour you with after scoring a point.

Folding the paper he placed it in his pocket and left the house. A few minutes' walk brought him to a building where numerous brass plates were arranged. Mounting the stairs he knocked at a door bearing the inscription:

"Henry Clarke, Financial Agent."

A voice from within said:

"Come in."

Gooley entered, and the occupant rose from his chair.

"How do, Fred? What in the name of fortune brings you out at this early hour?"

Gooley handed him the paper.

"Read that, Henry, my boy."

Henry read, and exclaimed:

"Well, you don't mean to say you believe that; besides, you are too thick skinned to frizzle much."

"Frizzle be hanged," cried Gooley. "Don't you see a gold mine there, the biggest thing we've struck?"

Clarke sat down, and pointed to a chair, saying:

"Fire away, I'm all attention."

"In the first place," said Gooley. "do you think the B.P. can be made to swallow that prediction?"

Clarke rapped the table before speaking, then said:

"A good percentage probably will, but it will have to be kept before them and strengthened from other sources."

Gooley smiled.

"That's my idea entirely."

After a long talk and much jotting down on paper, the skeleton of a big scheme was built up.

A few days later Gooley made another visit to Clarke's office. Spreading some papers on the table they were soon at work.

"If only the nervous ones take the bait," said Gooley, "there's a fortune for us."

"Yes," answered Clarke, then after a pause, "I suppose you got those cuttings out for the papers?"

"That's all seen to. Biglie's prediction is now appearing in all papers of note."

Clarke nodded, saying:

"Well give the B.P. about a week to digest it, then for our second move, How does it read?"

Gooley opened a notebook and read:

"Doomed Humanity. According to Professor Biglie and other eminent men it would seem that some terrible catastrophe is threatened on Nov. 27th, 1901. All seem agreed that the comet Ceila will come into collision with the earth at three in the afternoon on the date mentioned. Should this prove to be correct then humanity will for a certainty be destroyed. We are apt to smile at modern prophets, but strange and ominous are the writings of an old German seer. These have recently been discovered in a German monastery and bear the date July, 1783. There are many prophecies in quaint verse, most of these have been fulfilled. We have translated the following:

Digitized by Google

"A year, its value ten,
End of century. List: all men.
For when the Archer, Sol doth see.
Alas! Alas! humanity.
A fiery comet here appears.
It comes in haste, the earth it nears,
A scorching heat; a dying wail,
All perish by its fiery tail.

"This clearly points to November 1900. 1+9+0+0 =10, the value of the year. The Archer is the Zodiacal sign Sagittarius, and Sol, the Sun, enters this sign about the 1st day of November.

"An old proverb states that 'Prevention is better than cure.' We agree with this and think it would be well for some of our scientific men to turn their attention to this threatened calamity, and though it may not be needed, the watchword should be 'Ready; aye, ready.' With care and forethought, something might be done to mitigate the evil."

"Capital, capital," exclaimed Clarke, "that should fetch them."

"It's not a bad leader for the next move," said Gooley proudly.

Clarke consulted a calendar, looked up, and said:

"All the baiting must be done with by the end of next month."

"That will give us nearly two months to catch and land the spoil," remarked Gooley with a laugh as he rose to his feet.

A fortnight later they met again, and Gooley read a copy of the third and last notice to appear in the papers.

Clarke took a cigarette and prepared to act the critic.

"The Comet Ceila Defied. Messrs. Sharpe and Gullem have, for last three years, been endeavouring to devise a means whereby clothing can be made fireproof. After much search, experiment, and large expense, they have met with success. This coming on the eve of the threatened catastrophe from the fiery element points to the Hand of Fate, as having chosen Messrs. Sharpe and Gullem as the Saviours of Humanity. Their discovery consists of a powder, so prepared that when dissolved in water it will make any fabric saturated therewith fireproof. This preparation is put up in boxes. Small size, 5s.; large, 7s. 6d. Full instructions with each box. Address: Salamander Powder Company, Dupe Street, E.C."

Gooley finished reading, and looking across at Clarke, said:

"How's that, will it fetch them?"

"Yes; you are a genius, my boy. What a pity you are not a writer for patent medicines."

"Chuck it," said Gooley, "we've got to move now. Just hand your share over to pay for the ingredients for that powder."

"Ha, ha!" laughed Clarke. "One ton chalk, and quarter ton carbolic, just to give it a chemical odour."

Taking a pen he asked the amount required and handed a cheque to Gooley.

"Thanks. I suppose the water will be the only fireproof thing about it, but you can safely bet it will never be tested by Ceila," remarked that worthy.

A popular 11 o'clock lunch especially in cold weather, is a "cup of hot Bovril." It not only warms and stimulates but also nourishes, sustains and invigorates the system, fortifying it against the attacks of disease and the inclemencies of the weather. To the outdoor man, battling with the elements, it is peculiarly acceptable; to the indoor worker it is a no less beneficial vitaliser and nourisher; to the homekeeper, tired with the care and responsibilities of house duties, it is a comforting and refreshing sustainer.

BOVRIL

Digitized by Google

All preparations were made, and orders came pouring in. The B.P. took the bait, and Salamander Powders were the rage. The perpetrators of the swindle were nearly suffocated with stamps and postal orders.

Never in history had a prediction been known to take such firm hold. Revival meetings were held in the theatres and music-halls. Laughter and pleasure were things of the past. Brewery shareholders began to look serious. The asylums were overcrowded with the insane, and business generally was paralysed.

The scenes in London can best be described from the writings of those who were in the Metropolis on the seventh of November when the prediction was expected to be verified.

"A dull morning, the sky clouded and a drizzly rain. Business at a standstill. Large crowds are gathered in the public squares listening to the evangelists and members of the various religious bodies. It is plain that something unusual is afloat. Serious countenances everywhere. The silence is oppressive. As three o'clock approached, men were seen to stagger and fall in the streets, their hearts unable to stand the strain."

Again: "The public baths in all parts of London were used for dipping clothing. Families combined and placed their Salamander Powders together, thus turning a bath into a huge dipping tank. A walk through the streets soon convinced me that all the wash tubs in the city had been called into service. All classes of clothing were undergoing the fire-proof treatment. In some cases such was the haste that women dipped children and clothing together."

From another: "Placards were posted all over the city drawing attention to the value of previous predictions, and intreating the people to use common sense, but to no purpose. The nation had decided that it must pass through this fiery ordeal and reason was thrown aside. The railway stations were crowded with those who wished to get near their distant friends to face the danger together. Many lives were lost through crushing and accidents on the line."

Another extract reads: "The ice stores of Messrs. Colder and Colder were broken into, the excited mob thinking the danger would not reach them there. Men forgot their manhood, women and children were trampled under foot, and men fought like beasts for a safe place. Gangs of men entered houses and took what valuables they could lay their hands on. If resisted, revolvers and knives were freely brought into action. Many householders forfeited their lives in the endeavour to save their property. Humanity had gone mad. Here men were on their knees calling for mercy. A few yards away they were looting, cursing, and allowing the worst passions to prevail. When the clocks struck three the fever point was reached. Yet the sky changed not, not even a breath of hot air to herald the approach of Ceila. Millions of eyes were strained to catch a glimpse of that which they prayed not to see. The quarter chime rang out. Someone was wrong. Men looked into one another's eyes, as if seeking the answer to an unspoken question."

A subdued muttering, then a wild shout and the silence was broken. Men, women, and children danced with joy. Listen, why the sudden change? Is the demon approaching after all? No, a fit of passion has now seized the mob. Shouts of vengeance are in the air. Men push their wives aside. Hands are clenched, and an angry light shines in their eyes. It has slowly dawned upon them that they have been fooled. Someone suggests that the clothing that has passed through the fireproof treatment shall be tested. Wood is soon procured and a large fire quickly roars in the square. Clothing is collected and thrown on.

"It burns! it burns!" shout the crowd.

A tall burly fellow waves his hand from a window for silence; this obtained, he speaks:

"Men, you have seen how this so called fire-proof powder has been tested. It is a swindle, it and the whole thing. A put up job to get money out of our pockets. Look at the lives lost, reasons destroyed, and property robbed. Are we as Englishmen going to stand this?"

"No! No!" shout the crowd.

The speaker continues:

"Let us go to this Dupe Street and find them who have fooled us. Dip them in their own fire-proof solution, and test them and it on this fire. Keep the fire going, you fellows."

A roar of applause follows this speech and the crowd hurry in the direction of Dupe Street. Policemen try to bar their way but as well try to stop a flooded river. Reaching Dupe Street they find the birds flown and the doors locked. Stones crash through the windows, the doors are burst open and the furniture smashed. They are mad at the escape of their prey. Nothing can stay them. The broken furniture is piled in the centre of the room and fire set to it. What matter if the innocent do suffer. The rooms of the Salamander Powder Company shall be known no more, those having offices in the same block must put up with the results. Thus one of the largest fires in London was started and witnessed by thousands of the frenzied and baffled dupes of Gooley and Clarke. The fire engines are driven back and only allowed to play on the adjacent property. As the fire gains hold the crowd roar with delight, and only when the building has become a blackened ruin do they disperse.

Where were the originators of this swindle? Thanks to Gooley, had he not seen the consequences of the failure of Biglie's prediction and the exposure of the Salamander Powders, he and his partner must have perished at the hands of their dupes. But as he remarked to Clarke:

"We shall have to slide out of this before the seventh. The best thing to do is to turn all the paper money and stamps into cash and book for America."

Clarke readily assented to this. So with all the money they could lay their hands on, which amounted to a decent fortune, they left Dupe Street. Berths were secured on the Persalia, and England's shores lost sight of on the sixth.

GEORGE BRATLEY.

In the Christmas Double Number of "SHORT STORIES" will appear the first of a series of articles entitled "BRITAIN'S WARS." They are written in a very readable style, and the whole will form a complete history of the most important wars in which Britain has been engaged.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE "GEO. R. SIMS"

HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY. 1s. 6d.
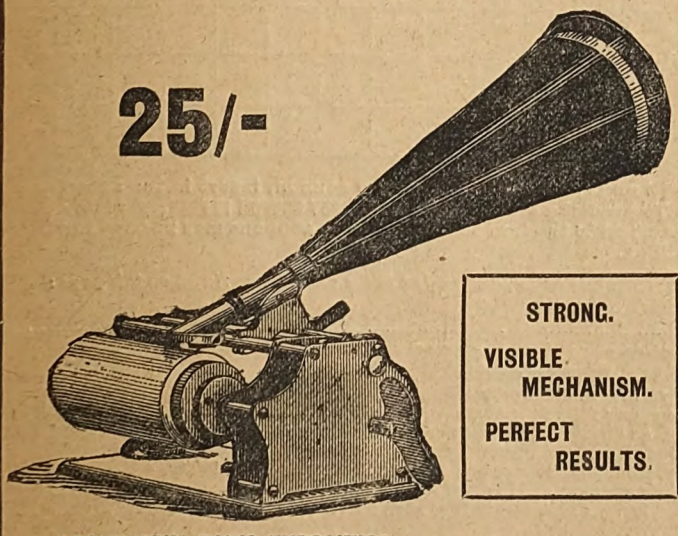
Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose b autiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:
"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hairdressers allover the world, 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:
The Geo. R. Sims Co., 81c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

A GRAPHOPHONE FOR 25/-



25/-

Reproduces Same Records as all Small Cylinder Talking Machines.

Makes Music in the Home, and is an Inexhaustible Source of Amusement and Pleasure.

STRONG.
VISIBLE MECHANISM.
PERFECT RESULTS.

The pleasure in owning a Graphophone is largely increased by being able to make and reproduce your own records. The Graphophone will record your own voice as well as reproduce specially prepared records.

Graphophones are sold from 25s. upwards.

The Toy Graphophone for Children, 8s.

GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION.

Send for Catalogue C. to

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Genl., 122 Oxford Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

Result of Competition No. 3.

As no one sent in the correct results of all the matches the £100 has been divided among the following three competitors, each one receiving £33 6s. 8d.: D. Hurd, 2 Allan Street, Leith, N.B.; J. Chubb, St. Mary's Villa, Matham Road, E. Molesey; W. Foden, 47 Kennington Road, S.E.

Notts Forest, Stoke, Manchester City, New Brighton Tower, Bristol City, and Millwall won their matches. The remainder were drawn games.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, November 17th. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 6. Matches to be played on Saturday, November 17th.

Matches to be Played on Saturday, Nov. 17th.	Free	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
1 Wolverhampton W. v. 2 Sheffield United
1 Derby County v. 2 Blackburn Rovers
1 Notts County v. 2 Bury
1 Sheffield Wednes. v. 2 Liverpool
1 Aston Villa v. 2 Newcastle United
1 Preston North End v. 2 Manchester City
1 Grimsby Town v. 2 Small Heath
1 Newton Heath v. 2 Blackpool
1 Leicester Fosse v. 2 Burnley
1 Tottenham Hotspur v. 2 Bristol Rovers

The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, November 16th, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "COUPON No. 6," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. In the event of a tie the prize will be divided.
7. Competitors may send in any number of attempts.
8. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

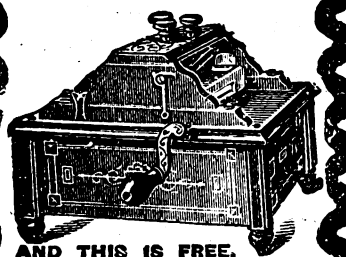
Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains valuable information and statistics showing the previous records of the various clubs, and the particulars of the points of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in determining the chances of the teams engaged. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ORCHESTRAL

35/- FOR AN ORGANETTE WORTH £4 4s.

The finest and most unique musical instrument ever made. Worthy a place in every home. Highly praised by all lovers of GOOD music. Built just like a full-sized Organ, with 2 sets of reeds and 3 beautiful stops. Requires no teaching or knowledge of music. A CHILD CAN PLAY IT with effect equal to the performance of a talented pianist.



AND THIS IS FREE.

We are presenting FREE to all applicants a copy of our Householder's Money Saving Guide to Jewellery, Watch, Cutlery, &c., buying. Profusely illustrated. Handsomely got up. A wealth of useful household information. Teaches you how to save money in buying. Write for it to-day —at ONCE. It is worth a postcard.

J. M. DRAPER (Dept. 366), Organette Works, Blackburn.

ORGANETTE

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS,
63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once: they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.
THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

TOO STOUT

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

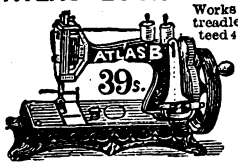
ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.,
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

A Magnificent Complexion Assured

By the Free Use of

LILLIE POWDER.

PRICE ONE SHILLING. BY POST 1/2.

The LILLIE SYNDICATE,
3 (S.S.) HENRIETTA STREET,
LONDON, W.C.

Free

From the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., if this paper is named, a booklet on the Skin and a FREE SAMPLE of

"Antexema."

It is absolutely the most wonderful Skin Cure that has ever been discovered. It gives immediate relief from itching and burning and cures all skin diseases and every form of Eczema.

1/1½ BOTTLES, post free for 1/3.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

RUPTURE

Gentleman (cured himself) will send Free Particulars of inexpensive self-curative treatment. Stamped address.—(Box 49), 59 Castle Street, Carlisle.

2,500 CYCLES FREE.

Our Lady's or Gent's Link will be sent, free of any charge for delivery, on receipt of 1/6. We are Giving these Machines Away as feeling assured that after you receive the Bicycle you will recommend our firm and explain to your friends how you obtained it.

A STARTLING ADVERTISEMENT,

1/6 FREE. 1/6

Genuine Offer.

We will send with the Bicycle a nickel silver lamp and pump, and the whole will be packed in wood crate and sent to your address Free immediately you take advantage of this advertisement and the offer we send. Do not hesitate, as by delay you may lose the chance. All orders dispatched in rotation. Send 1/6 P.O. or stamps, and stamped addressed envelope for receipt. ADDRESS—

LONDON DIRECT SUPPLY Co., Dept. S.S.
4 Duke Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Transposed Letter Competition.

First Prize . . . . £5.
Second Prize . . . . £2.
Third Prize . . . . £1.

CLOSING DAY NOVEMBER 26TH.

LAST LIST.

AGR; ETS; AEMN; ORTY.

MARK YOUR ENVELOPES "BRAIN."

Here are four sets of letters, and prizes will be awarded to the competitors who send in the longest words containing the letters in each of their combinations.

For example, the following words contain the letters IST in their different combinations: fIST, ITSelf, SIT, STIpend, ouTSIde, adverTISe.

CONDITIONS.

1. Write your attempts on one side of the paper only, and post the four lists in an envelope marked "Brain," to reach this office on Monday, November 26th.

2. All words must appear in HEAVY TYPE in Nuttall's Standard Dictionary, and must be different. Compound words with or without hyphens, and proper names are not available.

3. The letters of the combinations must either be underlined or put in red ink or capitals in the words in which they occur.

4. In the event of a tie, the prize will be divided.

5. The Editor's decision is final, and competitors must enter on that understanding.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 241 to 246.

THE prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Miss N. Daley, of 49 Salisbury Street, Liverpool, whose attempt was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "The Red Men of the Dusk," by John Finnemore, has been sent to each of the following:

Sergt. H. Hodge, Plumstead.
Thomas H. Howard, Swine, Holderness, East Yorks.
Miss M. Watson, Anerley Road, S.E.
W. Tackley, Willes Road, Kentish Town, N.W.
Rev. G. P. Horne, Newby Wiske, Northallerton, Yorks.
W. J. Cole, Merthyr Tydfil.
Mrs. Berry, Heathfield, Sussex.
R. Gilbert, Cowper Street, Glasgow.
R. Longfield, Kew Road, Richmond.
F. J. Smith, Alpha House, Saxmundham.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF THE QUEEN.

BY ONE OF HER MAJESTY'S SERVANTS.

With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 2s. 6d.

Some of the 27 Chapters are:

The Queen Among Children.
The Queen's Fads and Fancies.
The Queen's Fortune and Expenditure.
The Queen as a Housekeeper.
What the Queen Eats and Drinks.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " " "	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half " "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 20th, if intended for the issue on sale Dec. 4th, and dated December 8th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE John Noble

Model 313.

Tailor designed Reefer Coat and full wide Skirt, in Cheviot Serge, or Costume Coating. Price 10/6 only 10/6 complete. Carriage, 6d. Or the Skirt alone for 5/6. Carr., 5d.

Model 256.

Made in Costume Coating or Cheviot Serge. Full Tailor Skirt and well-cut Bodice with velvet revers. Price complete Costume, 10/6. Carriage, 6d. Or the Skirt alone for 5/6; carriage, 5d. Prettily Trimmed HAT (as sketch). 7/6. Carriage, 5d.

Model 296.

Smartly made Dress in Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating. Bodice trimmed Ribbon Velvet and well lined.

Lengths and Prices:

36	39	42	46	50 in.
10/-	11/-	12/-	13/-	14/- ea.

Carriage 6d. extra.

COSTUMES AND MANTLES FOR LADIES AND CHILDREN

Sent without delay by Parcel Post, safely packed. Satisfaction given or money returned.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE

of the very durable fabrics in which the Costumes are made:

THE JOHN NOBLE CHEVIOT SERGE, and THE JOHN NOBLE COSTUME COATING, &c., as requested.

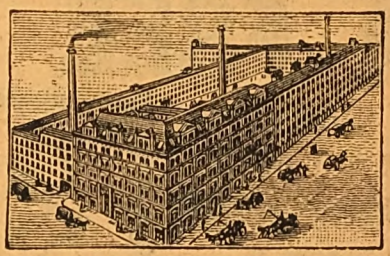
A FULL DRESS LENGTH of either Cloth (6yds. 52ins. wide) for 7/6. Carriage 8d.

Colours: Black, Navy, Myrtle, Brown, Fawn, Khaki, Grey, and Royal Blue.

Sizes in Stock of Ladies' Costumes are: 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms); Waists, 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other size made to measure, 1/6 extra.

MOURNING ORDERS
executed and sent off at one day's notice.

JOHN NOBLE Ltd.,



BROOK STREET MILLS, MANCHESTER.

Model 274.

Tailor designed Sacque Coat in Fawn or Black Beaver Cloth, 8/6 Velvet Collar. Price only 8/6. Carriage, 6d. Please say size of bust (under arms) when writing.

A LADY'S CAPE.
SPECIAL VALUE.

Model 339.

Lady's Cape, well made and finished in good Black Cloth, 8/6 with collar and front trimmed Black Fur. Length 26 inches. Price only 8/6. Carriage, 6d.

HANDSOME TOQUES.

As sketch, 6/11 each. Carriage, 6d.

THE
JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS.

Made in good strong Serge, with long sleeves and pocket. Price 1/6 for 2lin. long in front, and 6d. for every 3in. longer. Carr., 4d.

WINTER DRESS FABRICS.

Homespuns, Fancies, Silk Mixtures, Alpacas, Velveteens, Jacquards, &c., and All-Wool Serges.

The Finest Collection in the Kingdom at specially Moderate Prices.

A LARGE BOX OF PATTERNS

lent to choose from, and sent carriage paid, together with the New Fashion List illustrating Special Values in Children's Costumes, Millinery, Underclothing, Waterproofs, Houselinen, &c.

Readers will oblige by kindly naming "SHORT STORIES" when writing to

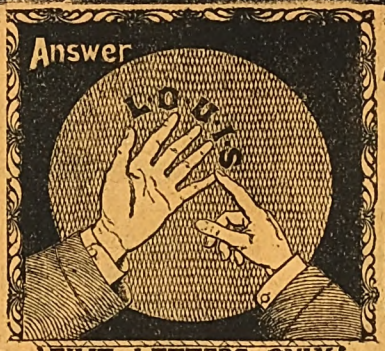
JOHN NOBLE LTD., MANCHESTER.

Dept. No. 46, Brook Street Mills,

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL

VELVETEEN?



FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

ZEBRA

Grate Polish

No Hard Work.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6.

50

FULL SIZE

HIGH-CLASS TABLE REQUISITES

FOR

25/-

(Cash Price 23/-.)

LIST OF CONTENTS.

Prices 1s. bought separate.

	s.	d.
6 Table Knives	3	6
6 Table Forks	5	3
6 Dessert Knives	3	0
6 Dessert Forks	3	9
2 Table Spoons	1	9
6 Dessert Spoons	3	9
6 Tea Spoons	2	0
1 pair Sugar Tongs	1	0
1 Sugar Sifter	1	6
6 Egg Spoons	1	6
2 Salt Spoons	1	0
2 Mustard Spoons	1	0
50	29	0

GOOD ENOUGH FOR A GENTLEMAN'S TABLE.

"4 Albany Place, Montpelier, Bristol.
"Sept. 1, 1900.

"Dear Sirs,—I herewith acknowledge receipt of cutlery received last evening, which gives entire satisfaction. I am, indeed, pleased with same, and shall do all I can to recommend you to my friends.

"Yours truly,
"A. SAVAGE."

"Grimaly House. Brackenboro' Road,
"South Linc.
"August 27, 1900.

"Dear Sirs,—I received the parcel of cutlery, and was very pleased indeed with it, and very good value for the money; it is really surprising how you can do it for the price. Thank you for your prompt attention.—I remain, yours sincerely,

"G. S. WRIGHT."

Any reader of Short Stories can have one of these parcels on monthly payments as follows:

You send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send one on approbation.

If you approve of it, you send us 2/6 on receipt, and 5/- each month for 4 months, making the full 25/-.

BUT OUR-NETT-CASH-WITH-ORDER-PRICE is 23/- only.

If you do not approve of it, we will refund cash sent if Parcel is returned within seven days.

J. N. MASTERS Ltd., Cutlers, RYE, SUSSEX.

"Roxley Nat. School,
"June 1, 1900.

"Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your parcel of cutlery, 25/-, and am very pleased indeed with it. I did not expect the thing could be nearly so good at the price, especially on the terms you supply them on. Thank you very much.—Yours truly,

"A. A. PORTER."

PRIVATE.—No one likes going into a shop to buy an "ENGAGEMENT" or "WEDDING RING" or "PRESENT." YOU can get one PRIVATELY from us by post in a few hours. Write for our CATALOGUE (128 illustrations) and RING SIZE CARD FREE. Address:

J. N. MASTERS LTD., RYE.

Digitized by Google

ONE WINNER GETS £100 FOOTBALL PRIZE.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 621. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 24TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

Worry and Low Spirits.

It is astonishing to what an extent we are all liable to occasional ailments. A mental trouble, pecuniary care, or food eaten in the wrong manner or at irregular periods, or food in itself indigestible, may, and often does, give us an "attack of the blues," a Bilious disorder, a disagreeable fit of Indigestion, or a Sick headache. During these periods our energies and strength appear to wane away, so that we are loth to undertake the day's duties and find difficulty in summoning sufficient resolution to carry them out. Besides which our Nerves are disorganised, and minor troubles, otherwise accounted "trifles as light as air," at these untoward periods fret and fume us to a degree out of all proportion to their importance. Everything is indeed jaundiced to our view, so that we fear impending trouble, pecuniary losses—in other words, the black dog "Care" has us for his own, and we anticipate evils for ourselves that happily rarely come to pass.

As a remedy for these and other Stomachic and Liver Ailments we know of no remedy so staunch and true as an old friend whose merits we have investigated and are fully able to indorse, to wit—Guy's Tonic. Many of our readers, we understand, keep this remedy by them for use in case of attack and take an occasional dose to prevent possible Digestive or Liver trouble. Minor ailments are best treated promptly with a remedy, proved like Guy's Tonic, to afford immediate benefit and effect permanent good. Otherwise that which is but a slight ailment may grow into a serious and chronic disease. Even also will Guy's Tonic act curatively and restoratively in the more serious phases of Stomachic and Liver disorders. It is pleasant to take, skilfully prepared, and as we have found out by personal inquiries give universal satisfaction to those who purchase it.

Head Pains and Depression Removed.

Mr. T. H. Griffin, of 32 Albert Road, Walthamstow, writes:

"I have already experienced benefit from the Tonic in the partial removal of head-pains and Depression."

Mrs. M. E. Standen, of Acton House, Wiltersham, writes on the 23rd. August:

"I feel it only right for me to let you know the great benefit I and my daughter have derived from taking Guy's Tonic. I have found it all your little pamphlet says. I have recommended it to several of my friends, and shall continue to do so whenever an opportunity occurs."

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on sale at all Chemists and Stores.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

DESIGN No. 2130.
TEN-AND-SIXPENCE.

The Famous Sacque Back Coat and Skirt Costume can be ordered with the coat made double or single-breasted, produced in the Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth, all colours. It has a velvet collar, and the skirt is cut full with the box-pleated back—grand value for Half-a-Guinea. Testimonials from all parts. Securely packed, and sent carriage paid 6d. extra. This Coat and Skirt also makes up exceedingly well in the Pretoria Tweed or Melton Coating. Price only 17/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

Design No. 2130. 10/6.

PATTERNS FREE.

Design No. 2131. 10/6

Write for
NEW WINTER SKETCH BOOK
AND
CATALOGUE OF BARCAINS.
PATTERNS & ORDER FORMS POST FREE.

Ladies are invited to call and inspect goods at our New Showrooms,
47 Golden Lane, E.C.
Business hours 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays 9 a.m. to 1 p.m.

DESIGN No. 2131.
HALF-A-GUINEA.

The Fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 30-in. long. Made in a superior Beaver Cloth in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a Chesterfield front with the new side pockets. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. The greatest value on the Market. Send for one. All sizes in stock. In sending order, give bust measurement and arms. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 329. 8/6

DESIGN No. 329.
EIGHT & SIXPENCE.

The Fashionable Braided Flounce Skirt. Made in good quality Black and Navy Serge. Warranted fast dye. This Skirt is cut in the latest shape, and has a 16in. braided Flounce round bottom, which is lined good linenette. Price only 8/6. Securely packed and sent carriage paid, 6d. extra. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

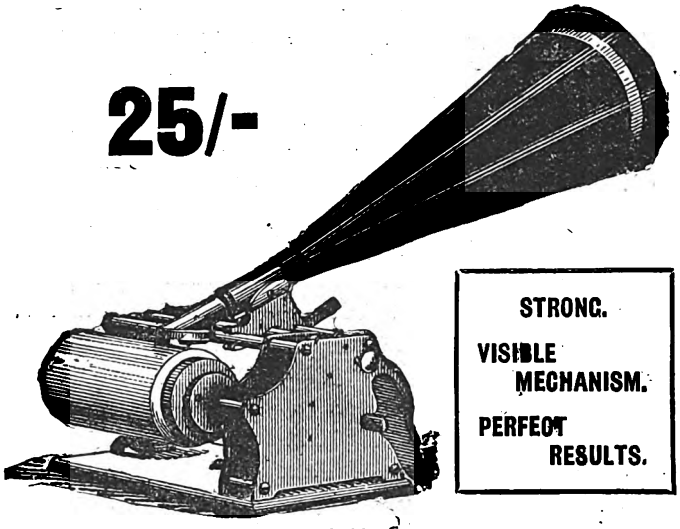
PATTERNS FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,
47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A GRAPHOPHONE FOR 25/-



25/-

GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION.

Reproduces Same Records as all Small Cylinder Talking Machines.

Makes Music in the Home, and is an Inexhaustible Source of Amusement and Pleasure.

STRONG.
VISIBLE MECHANISM.
PERFECT RESULTS.

The pleasure in owning a Graphophone is largely increased by being able to make and reproduce your own records. The Graphophone will record your own voice as well as reproduce specially prepared records.

Graphophones are sold from 25s. upwards.

The Toy Graphophone for Children, 8s.

Send for Catalogue C. to

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Genl., 122 Oxford Street, London, W.

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy For Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD, will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,

7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Cunham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 621.] For the Week Ending Nov. 24th, 1900. [One Penny.

THE FIRST SPEAR.

A Romance of the Indian Plains.

Under the grateful shade of a "tope" of grand old peepul trees was pitched the standing camp of Colonel Simkin, Cantonment magistrate of Broilempore, a station some ten miles off in the district of Oude.

The colonel was a genial, hospitable old "Shikaree," who took a delight in gathering about him a few sporting friends for a bout of pig-sticking in the neighbouring plains, or a week's big-game shooting in the Goruckpore Terai.

The site chosen for the camp was at once picturesque and advantageous, with a fine open country stretching around, admirably adapted for riding down the mighty boar, and plenty of jungle patches and sugar "Khets" near at hand, affording excellent covert and literally abounding with "pig."

The withering breath of an Indian summer had not yet parched the plains, and instead of that brown arid aspect which the face of nature would surely assume a few weeks hence, the surrounding country was still green and refreshing looking, its general flatness being relieved by the beautiful Nepaul Hills in the background.

Colonel Simkin himself, albeit now rather stiff in the saddle, was an enthusiastic pig-sticker and once a well-known member of the time honoured Nugger Hunt. Many a maddening race of "first spear" had he gone through in the Deccan, that great metropolis of hog hunting, and though this was several years ago, pleasant memories of those glorious meets beside the Grove of Arkola, of those dashing gallops over the sheet rocks and rolling stones of the Ghauts, came back vividly to his mind, the very perfume of the aromatic shrub peculiar to the Deccan hills seeming to arise round him and embalm those memories like some sweet incense of the past.

Amongst the colonel's guests (for such the hospitable old fellow made them in his "Dewan-Khana," or big dining tent) were a couple of sporting ensigns who had lately arrived from England, and who consequently came under the denomination of "griffs or griffins"—signifying neophytes in the manners and customs of Anglo-Indians.

These two youths were bosom friends; but alas, soon after their arrival at Broilempore, something, or rather somebody, suddenly came between them; the old story—a woman with whom both fell in love at the same moment. Now, as Claudio says:

> Friendship is constant in all other things
> Save in the office and affairs of love—and the friendship between Ensign Spoonley and Ensign Mashwell was there and then converted into the fiercest rivalry.

The Siren who had thus captivated these susceptible "subs" was one Mrs. Verigay, "a charming widow from the hills" (as she was universally spoken of), and a particular friend of Mrs. Simkin's.

This lively little lady and the colonel's wife represented the fair sex in camp, two or three hard-riding officers from the station completing the party. Mrs. Simkin generally went out with her husband on these sporting trips to superintend the commissariat and look after the sportsmen's comfort, and on this occasion begged Mrs. Verigay to accompany her, who, it is needless to say, jumped at the offer since she knew she would have two such ardent lovers in camp to amuse her. A terrible flirt Mrs. Verigay, it must be confessed, but there was no harm in her—at least, let us hope not; yet

> Be thou chaste as ice, as pure as snow,
> Thou shalt not escape calumny—and it was scarcely likely that such a fascinating little woman, with so many jealous rivals of her own sex, should

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

go unscathed in that hot-bed of scandal, an Indian station; nor did she.

But be that as it may, Mrs. Verigay drove her pair of youngsters in Cupid's curricle with consummate skill, kept them both well in hand—never allowing one to jib against the other—and gave to each exactly the same amount of rein and the same amount of attention.

At this season the nights in camp were marvellously brilliant, with a tropical moon turning darkness into day; and there was a crisp freshness in the air, which made it cosy to sit round a blazing log-fire outside the mess-tent after dinner.

There the jovial little circle told ghost stories, ran over their sporting adventures or sang songs to beguile the evening hours, and every night from the majestic peepul-grove, to the wild accompaniment of the jackal's yell might be heard trolled out in sonorous tones that well-known pigsticker's chorus:

> The boar, the boar, the mighty boar,
> The brave old boar of the plain!
> Here's a health to him who fears no fall,
> And the next great boar that's slain.

But while the toast of the brawny pig was on their lips, another toast, that of woman, sweet woman (otherwise Cissie Verigay), dwelt deep in the hearts of two of those musical sportsmen.

By-and-by as song, chat, and laughter flagged, and some dropped off to sleep in their easy chairs, or turned into their tents for the night, others wandered out into the bright moonlight for a romantic ramble; others in this case meaning either Mrs. Verigay and Ensign Spoonley, or Mrs. Verigay and Ensign Mashwell, whosever turn it happened to be, for the widow managed these walks with amazing tact, and generally contrived to favour both in the same evening, thereby preventing the chance of bloodshed.

"Now then, Spoonley, my lad," whispered Colonel Simkin one night as he saw Mrs. Verigay and Mashwell steal away together from the camp out into the moonlight, "stop where you are and have another peg. Two's company, three's none, as the boy on the donkey said when the devil jumped up behind. It's the Masher's innings—give him a chance."

"Poor beggar," thought Spoonley pityingly, "so I will. She's only humouring him—of course I know it's all right. Didn't she as good as tell me before dinner that she would be mine, and mine alone? What more can a fellow want?"

And so reflecting comfortably the happy lover settled himself down beside his host, with a huge Trichinopolee cheroot in his mouth and confidence in his heart. Long time they sat with their four legs stretched out over the protruding arms of their cane-bottomed chairs, chatting drowsily, whiffing and sipping; two pegs apiece disappeared, two cheroots went to ashes; the log fire burnt low and the colonel snored. Still those two returned not.

At length Spoonley became fidgety, rose suddenly from his chair and—no he wouldn't play the spy, why need he? (In truth he dared not, for fear of offending the widow.) So he sneaked up to the mess-tent instead and ordered another peg stealthily, a strong one; then returned to his seat feeling more composed. Indeed, such a still beautiful night was conducive to composure, especially when backed up by several brandies and sodas.

In the open country around it was almost as light as day; a shimmering light which glinted through the dense foliage of the peepul tope and made the tents loom grey-black through the partial darkness—the darkness made more apparent by those struggling rays.

Distant sounds fell upon the silence of the night—more or less dreamy sounds at that late hour—the muffled "tom-tom" from the far-off village, the faint tinkling of the cow-bell, the hoarse bark of the everlasting pariah; but one by one these died upon the senses, or became merged in the dreams of Ensign Spoonley.

* * * * *

"Then you mean to say you love him too?"

"I do—I confess I do."

"What, better than me?"

"Well, I won't say that; indeed, I don't know which I love the better yet."

These murmured sentences broke upon the slumbering Spoonley's deadened ears, 'twixt sleeping and waking, and the words exactly dove-tailed in with that which he had been dreaming.

He jumped to his feet with a start and a groan—the groan being partly caused by "pins and needles," partly by what he heard, and partly by what he saw, namely, the "widow" and the "masher" standing lovingly together beside the smouldering embers and almost within his touch.

"Oh, you're awake, are you, Mr. Spoonley?" said the silvery voice of the Siren, which to him sounded rather like irony. "Now, listen to me," she went on, with a little puzzled expression on her pretty face and nestling towards him in turn, "I'm in a fix, my dear boys, like the donkey between two sacks of hay. You have both proposed to me within the last few hours, and I really don't know what to say. I can't accept you both, can I? So, I tell you what—I'll make a proposal to you in return—ah! and here comes our dear hostess who shall witness the compact! Pray forgive us for being so late my dear," she exclaimed, as Mrs. Simkin joined them (the colonel had long since retired without waking Spoonley), "but we have rather important business to settle!" Here she gave a sly look and a smile at her friend which the lady seemed quite to understand. "Ahem! These two gentlemen, my dear Mrs. Simkin, I must inform you, have been good enough each to honour me to-day with an offer of marriage, and as I cannot at this moment make up my mind which to accept—" (Here both suitors drew themselves up to their full height and scowled at each other, whilst the "charming widow" smiled sweetly and impartially upon the pair.) "I say, as I don't know which to accept," she continued, "I propose that like the knights of old they should ride a 'tilt' for my hand!"

"A capital idea," cried Mrs. Simkin, looking askance at the love-stricken ensigns, "a capital idea, and the best way out of the difficulty!"

"Well, to-morrow, as there is to be a grand beat for 'pig,'" went on Mrs. Verigay in a very business-like tone, "I can only add that, of you two, he who wins first spear in the first contest falling to either may come to me and—and claim his well-earned reward."

Ensigns Spoonley and Mashwell started; they were taken aback and not a little indignant. There was a levity, an absurdity, about such a condition that jarred upon their sensitive natures; yet, despite a murmured remonstrance, they eventually bound themselves by the compact.

A few minutes later as the amorous rivals retired to their tents to gather strength from sleep for the coming struggle, suppressed laughter from the ladies reached their ears and the words:

Digitized by Google

"What will the Great Mogul say to this to-morrow when he comes? Ha, ha, ha!"

The Great Mogul! Who was the Great Mogul?

* * * * *

Early next morning the pig-stickers duly assembled in the "dewan-khana" at "chota hazree," or little breakfast, our two young friends attired in the most approved fashion. Nor did they leave anything to chance in the matter of gear, though they little guessed, when they so carefully equipped themselves, for what a priceless stake they were going to compete.

Their saddlery was of the best, and their spears the most reliable, with steel heads of the correct "sealed" pattern, and shafts of stout male bamboo, cut, so they avowed, with all regard to native superstition—that is, at night by the light of the new moon; not of the moon of the night before, of course, but by some other moon guaranteed by the vendor.

Their horses were two wiry screws (half-bred Arab "casters" from the native cavalry), which happened to be well matched in point of speed; and each ardent swain, though still chafing inwardly at the undignified nature of the compact, felt sanguine of his own success.

The ladies put in an appearance at breakfast before the sportsmen started from the camp, and Mrs. Verigay stimulated her admiring griffins afresh with the sweet words and looks which she bestowed on each in private with perfect impartiality; begging them, with the most earnest appeal with her liquid eyes, to be very careful that they didn't break their precious necks.

Both suitors drew themselves up to their full height and scowled at each other.

Meanwhile Mrs. Simkin had confided to her husband the conditions under which the ensigns were to "ride to pig" that day, and which conditions Colonel Simkin, having heard and chuckled over, kept to himself so as not to spoil sport. He proceeded to pair off his spears (of which there were half-a-dozen in all) after the fashion of the old Nugger Hunt, taking care to couple the griffs, and then gave the word to start.

Thereupon the party mounted and trotted off towards the distant "rummah-grass" jungle, where the first "honkwa" or beat was to commence; and as they left the shady peepul-grove the two youthful knights of the bamboo surreptitiously snatched separate moments to wave and kiss their "gauntlets" gallantly to the queen of their hearts.

On arriving at the covert-side the spears were quickly posted, each sportsman dismounting and waiting anxiously for the commencement of operations. A line of coolies, with sticks and native unmusical instruments formed the beat, and a most unearthly noise they made on being given the signal to begin.

In short the wild yells, the thrumming of the "tom-toms," the hollow bass of the "doobla," or big drum, the "wah-wahing," and now and again the winding blast of the conch, was enough to arouse the departed spirits of the wild boars which had been "stuck" since the conquest of the country. By such a fiendish row any porcine family hidden in the jungle was pretty sure to be set moving before many seconds had passed.

Presently excited shouts, responded to by deep spasmodic grunts and the waving of the tall yellow grass, announced the fact that the quarry was afoot—that a big sounder had been started.

Hurrah! Away they scamper in front of the beaters, tearing fiercely through the long, reedy jungle.

The hearts of the rival griffs were thumping like a couple of donkey engines as they heard the grunting sounder approach the border of the jungle nearest to them!

Oh, what moments of suspense! It seemed as if they never would break! But at last one porker thrusts his snout out of the thick cover, and the next moment follows it with his fat, hairy body, which is followed in turn by nine or ten more fat, hairy bodies, the last to leave their stronghold being a huge monster as big as a donkey, the mighty father of the family.

For a moment the hoary patriarch halts and listens, with his little, twinkling eyes flashing with anger, and his head thrown on one side; then, with a sonorous snort of defiance, away he shambles after the others.

A stentorian "Tally-ho!" is now heard from the colonel, followed by "Go-o-on away, my boys!" and every man leaps nimbly into his saddle and grips his horse with muscular energy; Ensigns Spoonley and Mashwell cannoning against each other as they try to mount, both by their own over-eagerness and the dancing fretfulness or their impetuous steeds.

"Confound it all, my dear fellow, where are you coming to?"

"Well, do look out yourself, man, it's not my fault!"

But there is no time to argue, the quarry has broken, and their business is to ride—to ride for their very lives—for love! for honour! for Mrs. Verigay! for everything in the world worth living for.

Digitized by Google

The country around looks good going enough at a glance, yet there are nasty quicksands, bandicoot holes, and other pit-falls to bring the unwary to grief; but who thinks of such trifles in those maddening moments? who cares for rocks, stones, nullahs, cacti or prickly pear with the pig before them and a good nag underneath them? —who thinks of the poor horses' broken knees or the rider's broken bones?—who thinks of anything save that one great prize, the first spear?

The sounder are given a start of some four hundred yards, and are seen heading for a tamarisk thicket in the distance; but long before they can reach it the thundering horsemen will be in their midst and scatter them to the four quarters of the wind.

"Forrard! forr-rard!"

Away the hunters dash in the wild intoxicating race, flying past clumps of palms and sand-hills, over acacia bushes, deep fissures, and almost unjumpable ravines—down into a dry stony nullah, and clambering up the steep bank opposite, with a shout and a hustle, and the agility of so many cats accustomed to scaling the perpendicular—onward they rush with ringing clatter! Oh, what a delirious blood-boiling gallop! Such thrilling moments once felt are never to be forgotten in a lifetime! Talk of foxhunting, let our top-sawyers of the shires only try this sport once if they want a new sensation, and when they have tried it, we warrant they will say with us that of all sport in the saddle the palm must be given to pig-sticking.

Every eye is fixed on the big boar, and every man picks him out from the rest for his own spear, as something worthy of his steel. Gradually the horseman gains on the panic-stricken sounder; but in that furious spurt two or three falls have already occurred, albeit our indomitable griffins are still to the front—well to the front, too, as they find to their delight—for their high blooded casters prove faster for the short distance than any of the other horses out.

Hand over hand they now draw up to the flying pig; bit to bit, and knee to knee, they race along, straining every nerve to detach the old jungle-king from his subjects, and ride him down by themselves.

Presently to their joy the foam flecked monster separates of his own accord from the now flagging herd, and takes an independent line, followed at once by the excited youngsters.

The colonel is watching them to see fair play, and is glad to notice that the rest of the party are not likely to interfere in this keenly contested match.

Now they are almost upon him. See, he is nearly done, look how he sways from side to side like a drunken man and his dashing enemies increase their superhuman efforts to snatch the much coveted honour—always coveted—but now, their whole future and happiness depending on the issue. No wonder they yell like escaped lunatics and ride like fiends.

It is a critical moment. But just as they are at his quarters, the hard pressed quarry doubles sharp and throws them off his line, then darts away in a new direction and suddenly disappears.

Good heavens, where's he gone to?

The mystery is quickly solved. The boar has merely dropped sheer twenty feet into a dry nullah a few yards ahead. His baffled pursuers manage to pull up in the very nick of time to save their necks, and view the old varmint afterwards clambering up the opposite bank, on reaching the top of which he halts, as much as to challenge them to "come on," and then with a contemptuous "whoof" and a flourish of his tail scuttles away once more across the "Maidan."

With shouts and smothered oaths the delirious sportsmen gallop along the nullah side, in the vain hope of finding some rideable spot where they may cross. but failing, charge valiantly together at the least precipitous part, and are rewarded for their pluck by scrambling over somehow and escaping a nasty spill by the very skin of their teeth. The cunning old boar has meantime got a fresh start of them, but he is badly blown, and very soon they are at his heels again.

He sees his danger and twists sharply from one to the other like a coursed hare, but his pertinacious foes stick closely to him, and the next instant both flesh their blades simultaneously in his brawny neck. "Who-hoop! First spear!" shouts each triumphant youth, as they dart forward and withdraw their points.

But the wounds are slight, though the spurting blood is sufficient to prove them, and now the furious hog, with every bristle on end, is brought to bay!

"First spear!" again scream the excited griffins, wheeling sharply round to finish off their work.

But Colonel Simkin has seen it all and shouts hoarsely in reply:

"No, no, dead heat! dead heat! as I live! At him again, my lads!"

But now the foaming patriarch,

Whose frothy mouth, bepainted all with red,
Like milk and blood being mingled both together—

takes the offensive, and with an angry roar charges full tilt at Spoonley

"My dear fellow, where are you coming to?"

Digitized by Google

knocks his caster's legs from under him with an ugly gash which lays open one cannon-bone, and brings horse and rider sprawling to mother earth. Then like lightning, before Mashwell can turn aside, he charges again and upsets him also, horse and all, in the same dexterous fashion.

Now indeed it might have fared badly with either or both of the prostrate griffins had not the colonel dashed up opportunely and buried his shaft behind the plucky old tusker's shoulder, transfixing the heart, and rolling him over in his death agony.

"Bravo, colonel! bravo boys!" shout the others as they come up one by one, and see the dazed ensigns bruised and bleeding and their horses' legs cut to the bone, but also see lying weltering in his life-blood at their feet the mighty hero of the jungle, as gallant a boar as ever bit the dust, thirty-seven inches at the shoulder, with a splendid pair of tusks, nine inches long!

Bravo indeed!

Dead heat for first spear! There was no doubt about it, according to the colonel—but it was hard lines! the disappointment was intense—yet both felt they had ridden straight and pluckily (the only chance a man has in such a sport as pig-sticking), and so said all. But this was not to be the end—not by any means the end. That first spear must be won beyond dispute, and so to pastures new where they may try conclusions again without delay.

* * * * *

About an hour after tiffin-time, two "dhoolies," or palanquins, were carried into camp—the said dhoolies (which the colonel had been obliged to procure for the purpose) containing what remained of the heroic ensigns who had that day risked life and limb—and all for her!

Behind the dhoolies came the two "syces" (grooms) leading two jaded, lame-on-all-fours, broken-kneed, broken-winded, mud-blood-and-lather-covered steeds—the fiery casters of the morning.

Poor brutes, they had had a hard time of it indeed, but not more so than their riders.

After the disappointment of the "dead heat," the enthusiastic griffs were more on their mettle than ever—more resolved to do or die—and they certainly did half kill themselves in their vain but frantic efforts to win an indisputable first spear.

Cropper after cropper had they come—were cut and bruised from head to foot and smarted all over from the cruel effects of prickly pear.

For the fact must be told that during one of their fierce struggles they had actually ridden at each other in their jealous desperation and rolled over together in a convenient clump of that uncompromising cactus, so that though the Colonel had saved them from being wounded by the boar, they carried the marks as of a hard conflict.

Now each again claimed "first spear" for the second time that morning, but it had been a near thing, and no one was up to see, so they returned into camp arguing the point clamourously from their dhoolies, and appealed at once to the charming widow, who came forth from the peepul-grove to receive them in her most loving and solicitous manner.

"Don't believe him, Mrs. Verigay, it might have been a dead heat the first time, as the colonel says so, but the second I'll take my oath wasn't, I was at least two lengths before him."

They returned into camp arguing the point from their dhoolies.

"Oh, I like you, Spoonley, look here, Mrs. Verigay, 'pon my soul and honour, I——"

"I tell you you weren't, and you know perfectly well that——"

"Then you mean to say I'm a liar, sir, because if so ——"

"I mean to say no gentleman would deliberately ——"

"There, there, my dear boys, hush, pray hush," cooed the dulcet voice of the bewitching 'widow.' "What am I to do with you?" (Here Mrs. Simkin appeared.) "You both claim first spear, do you? And therefore both claim me, I suppose. Well, there's only one person in the world who can decide the point, is there, my dear?" turning to Mrs. Simkin—"and that person is the great Mogul!" (The Great Mogul! Who the dickens is this Great Mogul?) "Ah, and here he comes. Gentlemen, allow me to introduce you—Mr. Mashwell, Mr. Spoonley, Mr. Verigay, my husband."

Oh, it was a cruel joke, though a cleverly kept secret—enough to make those poor confiding griffs turn misogynists on the spot and forswear the fair sex for ever. But they didn't, nothing of the sort.

They were young and recovered from their wounds, moral and corporal, long before their wretched horses did. Now we hear they are greater pals than ever, and have come across many more "charming widows," but are very careful never to both go after the same woman again, at any rate at the same time.

QUI-HAIE.

Digitized by Google

The Sanctuary on the Rock.

THERE was a marked difference in Ralph Hornby when he returned from that tour in France; it was a long time before we discovered what had taken place. But when we did learn all about it, we were amused and pleased to find that a woman had wrought in him the very change which he had always said no woman could bring about in any man.

That was a sweeping declaration of his, but it exactly indicated his opinions. His estimate of women in general was not a high one; he smiled sarcastically at stories of their love and devotion, and declared that they were all nonsense.

A girl would remain "true" to her lover just so long as she did not meet another man with better prospects or more money, and in support of his assertion he pointed to the number of broken engagements and second marriages.

His arguments were no more logical than his notion was correct, but no one succeeded in bringing about an alteration and he was allowed to continue in his cynical frame of mind. His mother died when he was a mere infant and he had no sisters; that was the excuse which charitable people urged in his behalf.

Naturally, the change was quickly noticed. How it was brought about is told in the following story.

Ralph Hornby spent a month at a fashionable watering place on the French coast, and it did not take him more than a fortnight to get very tired of the society into which he was thrown. He had been brought up partly in France and was as much at home there as in his own country, but this did not prevent him from tiring of the same tittle-tattle, the same routine, day after day.

"This sort of thing will drive me back across the Channel—if it doesn't drive me mad—in no time," he muttered one afternoon as he strolled further along the sandy beach than was his wont. "I wonder where I should get to if I went on walking for an hour or so? It looks pretty wild along there, with the rocks and reefs. I can imagine that it would be an awkward place for a ship in rough weather. Well, it may be lonely, but that will be a change, so I'll go."

He walked on for some time, lost in thought and paying no heed to the scenery which he had gone that way on purpose to see. He awoke from his day-dream with a start and looked about him.

It certainly was a lonely spot. He was in a hollow; some distance behind him lay the cliffs on which was the village or town whence he had started; almost at the same distance in front of him there arose rock after rock; on his right was the immensity of the ocean, and on his left a long stretch of sand with a background of forest.

"Pretty dismal, this," he muttered. "I think I can just about manage to get to those rocks; then I shall rest and afterwards tramp back. By that time I ought to be fatigued enough to go to bed early and sleep like a top. In that way I shall escape the routine of one half-day, at any rate."

He did not expect to find anything interesting or attractive on the rocks, but in this he was mistaken When he reached the foot of the first, which rose to a height of about one hundred feet, he thought he could distinguish something on the summit, and he resolved to climb up and reconnoitre. It was not particularly easy work, but by making use of his hands and toes he reached the top rather hot and a little out of breath.

The first thing that caught his eye was a roughly-moulded figure evidently intended to represent the Virgin Mary, around which were neatly placed nearly a dozen vases filled with fresh cut flowers. Ralph looked at the flowers in surprise; who could it be that came to this lonely spot with fresh flowers? Who could it be who had turned the bare summit of a rock into a sanctuary? A woman. So much was clear, so much was readily admitted by Ralph, who began to experience a feeling of reverence which was not common to him.

He walked round to the other side of the ledge and peered over. It was not inviting; the other rocks were more distant than he had expected, and below him was an abyss of water. He saw the jagged rocks, almost covered by the waves, and he shuddered as he realised how dangerous the Channel was and how hopeless would be the fate of any craft that might be driven within half-a-mile of where he stood. Out at sea he saw the bell-buoy intended to warn mariners to keep away from the hidden and half-hidden reefs. Landwards, the rock sloped towards the edge of the forest.

He turned again to the little sanctuary, gazing curiously at the rough figure and at the fresh pinks, roses and wild immortelles, so daintily arranged in the vases. It was strange; he must find out who did it.

He stayed there for a good half-hour, half-expecting that someone would appear; but he remained alone, and finally turned his face towards "civilisation."

Every day for a whole week he made what he called his pilgrimage; he varied the time of his arrival at the rock in the hope of being able to surprise the worshipper at this isolated shrine, but in vain.

The flowers were always kept fresh; they never showed signs of drooping and they were always of the same kind, and he began to wonder—with a feeling of awe—whether some miracle was being wrought or whether the flowers were renewed by human hands.

Unconsciously, a change began to take place in Ralph Hornby; he became more meditative and his flippant utterances became fewer. He could not believe in a miracle, and this brought him face to face with an instance of devotion at which he would have sneered only a few weeks previously.

He cast himself on the sand at the foot of the rock and remained there in deep thought until the waves began to reach his feet, when he became aware that the rising tide had cut off his chance of returning along the sand beach.

He did not clamber up the rock again at that point, but walked inland until he reached a more favourable spot; then he reached a higher land and made his way towards the pine forest, which ran parallel with the beach, with the intention of making his way homeward by a path through the woodland if he could find one.

Digitized by Google

Ralph Hornby was not a lover of nature and took but little notice of the beauty of the forest as he followed the indistinct footpath which wound in and out of the pine trees. He stumbled here and there over the brushwood, alternately wondering whether he would be able to find his way to his hotel, and where the pinks, roses, and wild immortelles came from.

Just for a moment the thought flashed across his mind that he was falling in love with an unknown—he, Ralph Hornby—and he laughed rather uneasily.

"This is a lively sort of path, and it will be getting dark before long."

He had just given half-audible utterance to this reflection when he caught sight of a cottage or cabin almost hidden away under the trees.

"Hallo, here's a chance of getting a little refreshment!"

A woman of matronly appearance was cutting up beans for cooking, and about her roamed some fowls intent on finding a meal. It was a lonely spot for anyone to live in, yet there was an air of comfort about it which made Hornby step briskly towards the woman and ask for something to drink.

The woman turned on her stool, looked through the door into the room and nodded. Ralph turned in order to see what this pantomime meant; he fancied that he detected a feminine figure disappearing through another door.

With his usual politeness he entered into conversation with his temporary hostess, their talk being interrupted a minute later by a young woman with a glass of water. Ralph repressed a start of surprise as he faced the newcomer; she was dressed in poor clothes, but her face was unlike that of any woman he had seen—it struck him by its expression of simple trustfulness and by the animation of the eyes, both giving the countenance a charm beyond comparison.

"You have vegetables here, but no flowers?" asked Ralph of the elder woman, as an idea came to him.

"Oh, yes; indeed we have!" replied the younger woman quickly. "If you look through that door right away over the market garden you will see some flowers."

Ralph looked in the direction indicated and saw pinks and roses of exactly the same kind as those in the vases on the rock. He glanced inquiringly at the speaker, who coloured a little at having her secret discovered—at least, that was how Ralph interpreted the flush.

Ralph Hornby did not sleep well that night, which fact he attributed to the length of his excursion during the afternoon. He was awake by five on the following morning, and at six o'clock he was on his way to the rock, this action stultifying his own explanation of the cause of his unrest.

Perhaps, after all, it was not the girl he had seen who placed the flowers round the rough figure on the rock. This thought tormented him and he did not seek to find out why it affected him to such an extent.

Surely, those flowers were grown in other parts of the forest, or nearer at hand, than at the back of that hut! It was early and he might see her at the shrine; he would see her, if he had to wait all day.

His heart gave a great bound, when, from the sandy beach, he saw a figure above him. Slowly, as cautiously and as noiselessly as he could, he ascended the side of the rock and reached the top; he had wished to reach the living figure before his approach could be noticed and he had succeeded.

Before him was the girl he had hoped to find; she was kneeling, looking towards the sea—the great sea that was so calm just then, which could be so cruel—kneeling in an attitude of supplication.

Ralph stood transfixed, his eyes rivetted on the girl's face. It was a pain face, yet how beautiful it looked now. He had thought it charming yesterday, but he recognised that love and devotion can effect a wonderful change. Here was the love and the devotion, at which he had so often scoffed, combined with the religious spirit which makes it more profound.

Yes, she was praying for the safe home-coming of a father, of a sweetheart, who was away on the deep sea. He looked seawards and noticed for the first time a fleet of fishing-smacks on the horizon; they were going on a voyage.

Sweetheart! If she were praying for a sweetheart, then he was confronted by an instance which flatly contradicted all he had said. He admitted it—admitted that he was wrong; and then a feeling of resentment sprang up within him.

Why should another possess this woman? She had shown him, unknowingly, that a woman could be so far above his estimate that he wanted her for himself. She had taught him so much, she must teach him more!

She arose at that moment and saw him. He doffed his cap in salutation, and she responded with a faint "Good morning," and smiled in recognition. She did not seem at all abashed. He must find out at once whether there was a sweetheart; he feared there was.

"You were praying for the safe return of one who is dear to you?" he asked meaningly, though half-ashamed of his intrusion.

"Yes, for Jean," she answered artlessly.

"He will be away a long time?"

"Yes," she answered again with just a trace of sadness. "He is dead. He died there, in the channel, trying to rescue the crew of a sinking ship."

There was a long pause. Then:

"You bring these flowers every day?" asked Ralph.

"Yes, Jean loved these flowers and this was our favourite spot. Here we vowed to be true to each other in life and death. It has pleased the good God to take him from me, but I know that as he looks down from above Jean will be pleased that I keep these flowers fresh. It is two years ago now, but I shall keep them fresh until I go to meet him."

So Ralph Hornby came back to England cured of his cynicism; and by an irony of fate he himself has remained true to the girl with whom he fell in love, but who knew not of that love.

As with Ralph, so with others; women have the power to work the salvation of men if they care to exercise it.

GEO. KNIGHT.

SOME RATTLING SHORT STORIES will be found in the Christmas Number of THE ROYAL.
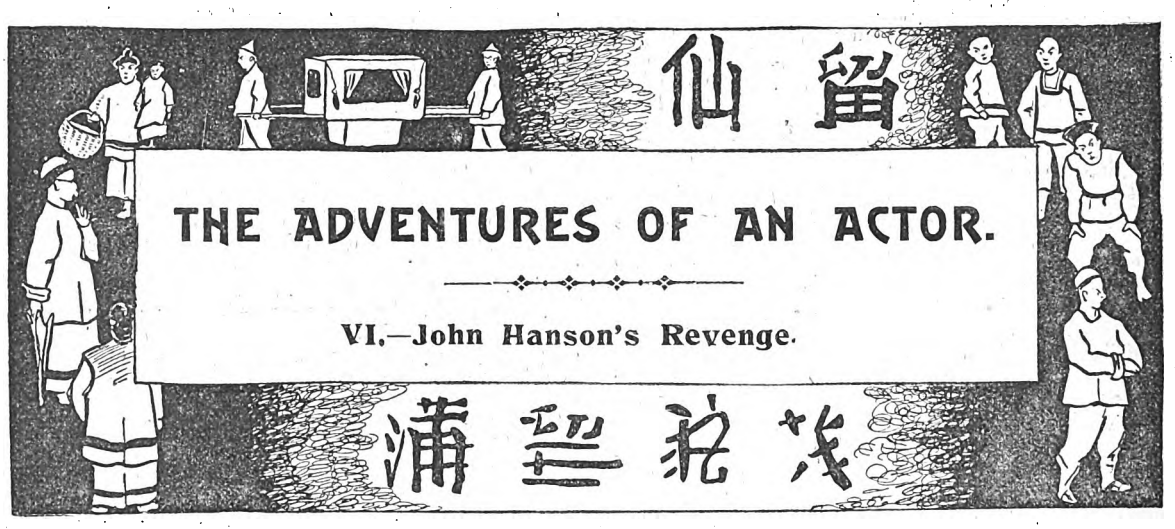
READY THURSDAY NEXT.
Stories of the Sea, of Travel, of Society, of Adventure, of Children, of Court Life.
All magnificently illustrated by the leading black and white artists.
Don't Forget. The Xmas Royal. Next Week.

Digitized by Google



THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTOR.

VI.—John Hanson's Revenge.

At Christmas time Ben Jowson always had a few weeks stock season at the Grand Theatre, Crumbleby, before the travelling pantomime deigned to book his wretched shanty.

Jowson was the sole proprietor, lessee and manager of a theatre, colloquially known as the disgrace of the North. He was proverbially mean and would not spend a penny on keeping the place in decent repair, at least so far as the back of it was concerned. He would sometimes consent to a little tinkering to the roof, where it let the rain through on the heads of the audience. But the dressing-rooms, generally by some fate the last portion of the theatre thought of, here were no exception to the rule. The floors were full of holes, and to escape a sprained ankle one needed to walk them with caution.

When the weather was bad the wind blew through and through them; water streamed from the roof, and down the walls, making existence anything but pleasant.

We were in the middle of the fourth and last week of the stock season, when the events happened that I am about to relate. Most of us were young and strong and had so far escaped with the usual coughs and colds expected at Jowson's theatre.

John Hanson's wife, our character old woman, had not fared so well. She struggled on to the end of the second week, then utterly collapsed, and had since been lying at her lodgings in a precarious condition.

The old man was quite broken down over her illness. His heart was not in his work one could see; he spoke his lines mechanically, and, unlike him, constantly dried up in the most pitiful manner. All the grand old school, grip and power, had gone out of his work. He was thinking, poor fellow, of his dearest in the world lying helpless in their poor lodgings.

"Well, John," said Bann, the heavy man, as Hanson entered the dressing-room, late on the Thursday night, "how is she to-night?"

"Worse and worse, my boy, thank you, I fear there is no hope."

"No, no, don't say that," we all exclaimed.

"It's true, my lads, quite true, I fear Margy's and my partnership is going to end. It is hard, very hard after five-and-twenty years together, in good times and bad. If she dies my life goes out with hers. The world will be dead to me if she leaves it."

We tried to comfort him, but it was a sorry task.

"That wretch Jowson ought to be hanged," exclaimed our fire-eating Juvenile man. "I'm blessed if I don't punch the life out of his fat carcase, when I've got my last week's salary. For I shall never come back to this death trap."

"Yes, my boy," said Hanson, "that's just what it is, a death trap, and what do you think the beast has done? Margy is ill, dying, all through his rotten theatre, and he has stopped her salary just when I want all the cash I can get hold of to buy her medicine, and delicacies."

"Oh, what a wicked shame," exclaimed the Juvenile man.

"Why don't you see him about it," I said, "surely he is human?"

"Not where his purse is concerned," replied Bann.

In spite of Bann's unhopefulness we persuaded John to appeal to Jowson that very night, but it was not until the next morning that he managed to catch him in front of the theatre.

The interview, and the results of which, he has often since related to me in every detail, for John knew my tongue would be silent while he lived.

Jowson was busy opening letters in his office when John presented himself.

Just glancing over his shoulder at him, as he stood in the doorway, Jowson said:

"Treasury is on Saturday night, after the show, (no runaways for me) and you can't sub. any more before then."

"I don't want money, Mr. Jowson, I want justice. And as to running away, I have never done that in my life, nor am I likely to commence when I have my poor wife at death's door; though by Heaven, there is inducement enough to run away from this death trap."

"Humph! I suppose you are referring to my theatre, Mr. Hanson. Well, all I can say is, that you are the first actor I have ever had a complaint from, and I have been here for fifteen years," said Jowson, intrenching himself behind a form of argument, as old as it is ridiculous.

"Then more shame to them for being either cowards,

Digitized by Google

or long-suffering idiots," replied John. "I suppose it never occurred to you the place might require renovating?"

"Look here, Mr. Hanson, my time is valuable, and I can't afford to waste it with a grumbler. What do you want to say to me?"

"I want to ask you what you are going to do about my wife. She is dying from inflammation of the lungs, caught in one of your dressing-rooms, wet and draughty, and absolutely uninhabitable, a place unfit to stable an ox. I have a long doctor's bill to pay, not to mention other expenses. You have stopped her salary; I have come here to appeal to your generosity, and to ask you to re-consider the matter."

"You know my rule, Mr. Hanson, no play, no pay."

"Mr. Jowson, I have been in the profession for over thirty years, and have never known the rule inforced when the illness occurred through fault of the management."

"Oh, my fault, is it? Why is no one else ill?"

"They are young and strong enough to cope with damp and cold. It is very different when one is old."

"My dear sir, I can't help your troubles."

"Will you at least pay the doctor's bill?"

"Perhaps you would like me to keep you and your family altogether, Mr. Hanson, for as long as you are pleased to live," said Jowson, insolently.

"Man, man, haven't you an ounce of humanity in your whole composition?" cried John in a breaking voice.

"I am no fool, Hanson, to be taken by every idle tale. I think you have said enough; good morning," said Jowson angrily.

"Ye gods, what man is this!" exclaimed John despairingly, with hand lifted in appeal to Heaven.

"No more heroics, Hanson, leave the office," cried Jowson in his bullying tones.

"Ah, you know you are safe, you lily-livered scoundrel. You know I am too poor to take my case into court. I should get justice there."

"Leave the office," Jowson shouted.

John looked at the man for a moment in silence.

His sunken glittering eye had often thrilled an audience, and the coward before him now trembled under his glance. He made one step towards him, as if to sieze him by the throat, Jowson cried out in terror, and John hesitated.

Though nearing sixty years of age John was as strong as a lion, while the younger man was helpless and weak with bloated fat.

"Bah! I would not pollute my soul with your miserable death," cried John, "but remember this, Ben Jowson, if my wife dies, hers will be the last death this theatre will ever cause."

So saying he left the office, slamming the door after him.

He walked quickly past the houses into the fields until his anger cooled, and then he turned his steps homeward. Home! No he could not go back to the misery that awaited him there; he knew his duty called him, but he salved his conscience with the thought that Margy hardly knew him now, and had he not sat up with her all night?

So he turned into the Red Lion Hotel, near the theatre, and sat down alone in a small bar, brooding over his wrongs, and blaming himself for not thrashing Jowson while he had the chance.

He was awakened from his apathy by the sound of Jowson's voice coming from the saloon bar, which was only separated from him by a thin partition.

"Yes," Jowson was saying, "the beggar came into my office, threatened my life, and cursed and swore at me till I had to take him by the scruff of the neck, and kick him out of the theatre."

Hanson rose from his seat to give the lie to the boaster, but controlling himself sat down and listened again.

"You did quite right, Mr. Jowson," said a local voice, "he is a dangerous man, I don't like the look in his eyes at all."

"No, it's a kind of mad look, isn't it?" said another, "a man like that might do anything. Shoot you in the back, or set fire to your house."

"More likely set fire to the theatre as he is so dead against it," replied the first.

"I'll put the police on his track, if he's not careful, that's what I'll do," cried Jowson.

"I suppose you are fully insured, Jowson," asked one of his friends.

"No, I've been in that theatre for fifteen years now, and I haven't wasted a penny in making insurance companies rich, and I'm not going to start now."

"Well I don't know. Everybody insures now-a-days, you know," was the reply.

Hanson did not wait to hear any more. He crept out of the bar, and went home with new thoughts burning in his brain, and a cunning smile on his face. He turned at the top of the street and waving his hand at the Red Lion, said aloud:

"Thank you, my enemies, thank you."

Mrs. Hanson died on Saturday morning, shortly after midnight. We were surprised at the calm way in which John took the blow. When we went to offer our condolences he only said:

"Thank you, my lads, thank you, I am glad Margy is at rest. She is happier now. It is only my selfishness that would bring her back to life, to struggle, and toil once more."

That night he played with all his old fire and strength as if trouble had not visited him. But when during one of the entr'actes the orchestra played in a selection that ever dear old air, "Home sweet home," it awakened in him fond memories, and he laid his poor old grey head on my breast and wept like a child.

After the performance that night John left the theatre with the rest of us, and went home. When the household he lodged with had locked all doors and gone to bed he went upstairs and remained kneeling for some minutes by Margy's bedside, then he rose to his feet, kissed her cold lips, and stealing downstairs left the house by the back door unheard.

The men were busy loading a trolley with our baggage when he arrived at the theatre, and in the hurry and bustle he entered unnoticed. He hid himself underneath the stage among the rafters and beams of the traps waiting there until the hall-keeper made his final round to turn off the gas at the metre, not five yards from him, and lock all doors.

When the last sound had died away, he crept out of his hiding place, struck a match, and found his way to the gas metre. Taking a file from his pocket he set to work to file all the pipes through that lead to the theatre.

Then he took the large gas key from the corner in which he had seen the hall-keeper place it, and turned on the gas. While it was escaping he turned his attention to various heaps of rubbish; wood shavings the carpenters had left in their recent work, preparing for the pantomime, old broken battens, and scenery stored there below the stage.

Digitized by Google

These he hurriedly piled in order of ignition against the flimsy walls of the dressing rooms, situated in a ramifying portion of the main building.

By the time his work was finished, and a goodly pile stood in front of him, the escaping gas became almost stifling, so he hastily set fire to the mass, and after waiting to see it had thoroughly caught, felt his way up the stairs on to the stage.

As he neared the top the sound of someone moving in the front of the theatre reached him, and for the moment his heart stood still with the fear of being discovered. He ran to the door at the side of the stage leading to the auditorium, and looking down the passage saw the glimmer of a light approaching him.

* * * * *

Was it the hand of fate that made Jowson pause as he approached the door of his house that night. His encounter with Hanson the day before, and the subsequent fears, the foolish imaginations of his friends had filled him with fear, had combined to make him very uneasy. His foot was on the door step when he remembered he had left a sum of money, amounting to a few pounds, in his office.

The house being a good one that night, he had reserved more cash than he had needed to meet current expenses. He had safely left money in his office for years during his ownership of the theatre, but this time he did not apply the argument he was so fond of.

Hanson might break into the theatre (not a very difficult task to one who knew the place) he reflected, break open the drawer that contained the gold, and steal it without fear of detection.

After looking carefully round the house to see that John was not on arson bent, he retraced his steps to the theatre, let himself in the front way and unlocking his office and the cash drawer, transferred the gold to his pocket. He was again about to leave the theatre when he thought he heard a sound proceeding from the vicinity of the stage. He listened and heard it again more distinctly.

"Heavens! It's Hanson come for the money," he said aloud, and went back again into the office.

Brave Ben kept a loaded revolver in his desk which he always carried when taking home large sums of money on dark nights. He drew forth this weapon, now, and lighting a taper went down the passage, muttering:

"I'll shoot the thief like a dog."

When the door at the end of the passage opened and shut, he quickened his steps. Just behind it he paused, and for a moment his nerve failed him.

He wondered whether Hanson stood on the other side ready to fell him as he entered, then considering how well armed he was, and that it might not be John after all, he threw open the iron door, and held the taper high above his head.

There stood Hanson in the middle of the stage with desperation written on his face, for Jowson barred his only way of escape from the explosion that was bound to follow soon.

"So I have caught you redhanded, have I, you thief," shouted Jowson.

"Let me pass, for in two minutes we shall both be blown to the devil," cried John hoarsely, approaching him.

Jowson's answer was a report from the revolver. The bullet passed through the fleshy part of the old man's arm, but before Jowson could fire again he had him by the throat with one hand, and the revolver wrist by the other.

The taper fell to the ground still burning there, and by its fitful light the two men struggled. With John's grasp on his throat Jowson could not utter a sound, but managed to fire another couple of shots into the air from the revolver they struggled for.

It was the old man's left hand against Jowson's right, but so superior was the former's strength, that before he could fire again the revolver was wrenched out of his hand. Swinging it free, John brought down the butt end of the revolver on Jowson's head, who fell stunned like a pole-axed ox.

Trembling from head to foot with excitement, and weak from loss of blood that poured down his arm, John tried to raise the fallen man and drag him down the passage, but his powerful muscles gave way under nervous exhaustion. His hands refused to grasp and his arms to lift.

A few hours ago John would gladly have welcomed death, but now life seemed as dear to him as it had ever been. The fire he could hear crackling and roaring beneath him; volumes of smoke swept up the stairs, and the smell of gas every moment became stronger.

With reluctance he left Jowson lying there still insensible, and murmuring, half weeping, "poor fool, poor fool," he staggered down the passage, pulled himself up to a window, opened it, and let himself down to the ground by means of the iron piping, all of which he had arranged beforehand.

Home again, unseen and unheard, he bound up his wounded arm, and carefully packed his torn and blood-spattered clothes at the bottom of his basket. He had only just closed the bedroom door when a loud explosion rent the air, and a red glare shone through the window blind, becoming brighter every minute.

The town was soon a tir, and cries of fire, and the patter of clogs came from every side.

He feigned sleep until his landlady knocked him up to see the fire, then he went out with the rest. He waited there, watching the firemen's futile efforts to cope with the flames, until he heard the news that Ben Jowson was reported to be inside the building, and could not be saved. Then he went alone to his room, and sitting beside his wife's bedside, he whispered in her ear:

"Margy, darling, your death is avenged."

DOUGLAS VIGORS.

At the moment of going to press we have received the following telegram from Mr. Bowser:

"Coming back to town next week. Am starting to learn bicycling.*—BOWSER."

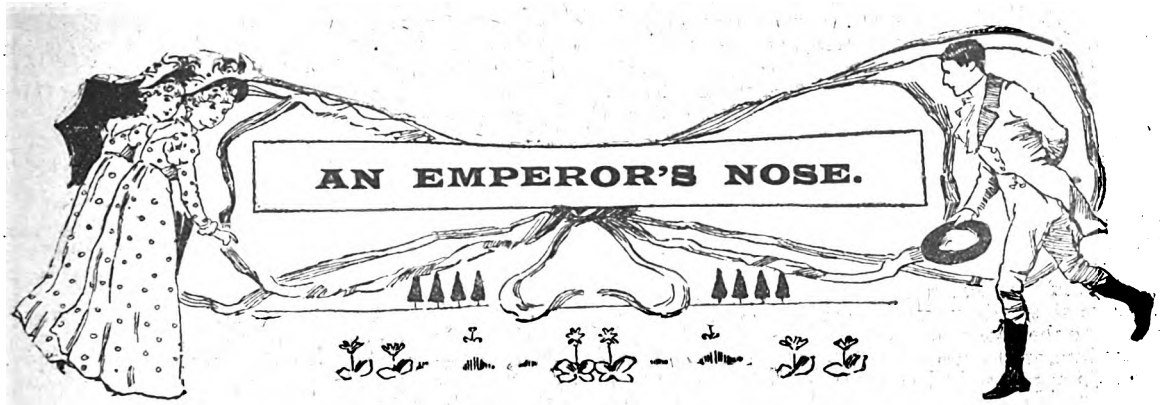
Digitized by Google



Two years before the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, and the downfall of the last Napoleon, an Englishman named James Birney arrived in Paris from London. He was what might be called a jack of all trades. He had been a small merchant in Liverpool, a bookkeeper in Edinburgh, a manufacturer in Yorkshire and an editor in Portsmouth. He was a good natured, easy going man, taking life as he found it and making no fuss. If he got a few shillings in hand, he would find some new excuse to get rid of it; if he was out of funds, his creditors would have to extend his account. Nobody called him smart, but everybody said he had a strong fund of humour and philosophy.

When a man in Cincinnati invented a bullet-proof shirt, Mr. Birney somehow got hold of the European agency—that is, he went to Paris at least to bring the patent directly to the attention of the French emperor, who was always on the lookout for military novelties. The Englishman's cheek and persistency secured him an audience after weeks of red tape. He had insisted that he would not deal with the minister of war or any other official, and was at last granted an audience with the emperor. It was in the war-office, and several cabinet officials were present. A musket was lying on the table, and Napoleon greeted the agent with:

"Well, sir, what about this bullet-proof shirt?"

"I have it here, your majesty," was the reply as the shirt was held up to view.

"Put it on."

"With pleasure."

"Now go to the farther end of the room."

"Certainly, your majesty."

"Now, sir," continued the emperor as he lifted up the musket, "I am going to fire at your breast. Are you willing to take the chances?"

"Fire away!" was the reply.

The emperor fired, and although the bullet did not penetrate the shield the force of it knocked Birney head over heels and silenced him for the next ten minutes. While it was decided that the shirt was not a success the Englishman's nerve excited such admiration that he was given a handsome present in cash and graciously dismissed. He seemed to want to say something to the emperor before he left the room, but did not have opportunity. Early the next day, however, he bobbed up at the war-office for an interview with the minister.

"It is no use," said that official as he gave him a minute. "The emperor has decided that he will not buy the shirt."

"I knew that yesterday, of course," replied Birney. "I am not here about the shirt, but altogether another thing. The fact is I do not like Napoleon's nose, and I want to improve it."

"Mon Dieu, man, but what do you say!" exclaimed the minister as he sprang to his feet.

"I say the emperor's nose is wrong, and that I can improve it. I wanted to tell him so the other day, but he hustled me out too quick. Can you bring about another interview?"

"The emperor's nose? You say it is wrong? You say you can alter it? Man what mean you?"

"I mean just what I say," calmly replied Birney. "I am not a surgeon, but several years ago I invented a little attachment to cure a badly-shaped nose. It has been tried in half-a-dozen cases and proved itself a big success. I brought one along with me, not knowing what I might run up against, and if you will give the emperor a hint——"

"Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu!" gasped the minister as he looked at the Englishman with wonder and terror in his eyes. "Then you have gone crazy! You are out of your mind. You know not what you say."

"I am all right from head to foot, my dear sir, and I can't understand your agitation. What's the matter with my scheme for improving Napoleon's nose?"

The minister rang his bell with nervous hand, and a minute later Birney was out on the pavement with a flea in his ear—that is, he was told to take himself off or he would be locked up as an insane person. It was rather a surprise for him, and it took him a day or two to get over it, but he finally came up smiling. If the minister would not help him, there were other officials who would. He tried two or three of them, with the result that he was eventually haled before the chief of police. That official probably sized him up correctly, for he said to him:

"You do not realise what you are doing. Don't you understand that you can be sent to prison for this? You do not appear to have lost your mind, and you are no fool, and the best thing you can do is to get out of Paris at once."

"But what is the crime?" argued Birney. "All I have done is to say that I can improve on the emperor's nose. Can a man be sent to prison in France for that?"

"He can, sir, as I wish to make you understand. You must not talk this way. You have made trouble for yourself, and you had best get away as soon as possible. Should the emperor himself hear of your insulting words you would be sent to some fortress for five or ten years."

"Shoo! You don't say so! But you Frenchmen are queer people! Well, I don't want to leave Paris for a few days yet, but I'll keep quiet about Napoleon's nose. I had no idea he was so touchy about it. Not another word from me if that's the way things are."

Digitized by Google

The chief added another warning, though he saw the humour of the thing, and smiled behind his mask. Birney might stay on for a few days, but he must keep that nose attachment of his in the background and his tongue between his teeth. He went out of the police office meaning to do it, but scarcely twenty-four hours had passed away when he accidentally met a French doctor who could speak English fairly well. Birney was naturally asked why he had visited Paris, and of course he told of the bullet-proof shirt. Having got started, he couldn't stop there.

"I say, do you know I could alter the emperor's nose in less than a month?" he remarked in a burst of confidence. "Yes, sir. I could improve that proboscis of his at least fifty per cent. in three or four weeks, and I wouldn't charge a halfpenny either."

"The emperor's nose!" gasped the doctor. "But what ails the emperor's nose?"

"Out of plumb, sir, and no excuse for it. All I want is three weeks' time. Can't you get me an audience with him?"

"The dickens! Why, man, you are insulting the emperor! You ought to be locked up!"

"Oh, come now!" laughed Birney in a protesting way. "I never saw such people before. Can't the emperor's nose be out of plumb as well as any other man's?"

The doctor left him without even a cold bow, and probably went to the police, as Birney was arrested an hour later. According to his story, he was sent to prison without a trial and detained for a full year. Then he was taken out one day and conveyed to the war-office and into the presence of Napoleon.

"Sir," said the emperor after glaring at him for awhile, "is my nose out of plumb."

"It is as plumb as a plumbet," was the ready reply.

"Does it want any alteration."

"Not the slightest"

"And how is it with yours?"

"It's out of joint, your majesty, but I think I could follow it out of France."

"Then you may try."

And try he did, and his nose led him back to the land of the free without any lingering on the road.

C. B. LEWIS.

THE YELLOW SEAL.

"LOOK here, Tommy, this is becoming absolute persecution. Just read this."

Tommy Singleton gingerly took between his finger and thumb the document handed to him by his friend.

"Um, um."

"DEAR MR. BRERETON.—I am alone this evening and have something to propose to you which, I think, will be to your advantage. Anyway, come, and we can discuss it.—FULVIA MASTERS."

"Oh, and you will go, I suppose?"

"I don't quite know. Tommy, I hate the whole thing. If I could believe that this visit was to be the last I'd go with a light heart."

"Well, then, don't go. It's easy, surely, for you to find an excuse. The woman hasn't hypnotised you, has she? If you don't want to go, why—don't go, that's all, and there's an end of it. I only wish the lady would make eyes at me—she's powerfully rich, isn't she?—I wouldn't hesitate. My boy, you don't sufficiently appreciate your opportunities. What does it matter if she's a trifle beyond the canonical age. Forty! It is a good age, a mellow age, a——"

"Oh, shut up!" irritably interrupted Brereton. "You know nothing about it. You go prospecting the town over as an unattached member of the ideal detective contingent, but in matters of this sort, in the reading of the more delicate problems, social or domestic, you're a child, Tommy—an innocent, a mere potterer and dabbler."

"Thanks, awfully. You've quite roused my interest and professional instinct."

"Professional! Why, Scotland Yard would repudiate you with scorn, wouldn't own you on 'free-service' terms even."

"And thou, too, Arthur! Well, well, time will unravel the skein of mystery and do me justice. You're going, I see. Now, don't be rash. If it is to your advantage to accept the widow's offer, proposal, or whatever it is, think twice before declining. By, by!"

Within half-an-hour Brereton was seated in Mrs. Masters' drawing-room in Phillimore Place.

Arthur Brereton, stockbroker's clerk—young, passably good-looking, impressionable, and mildly æsthe ic—had made the acquaintance of Fulvia Masters, a rich widow, at an up-the-river bungalow during the past season. He interested her, and before long she attached him to her chariot-wheels in the capacity of trifle-holder, boon-companion, and devoted attendant generally.

There happening at this particular time to be no especial counter-attraction, Brereton fell in complaisantly enough with her humour, but when, later on, the lady developed tender tones, soft sighs, and a disposition to an early and late appropriation of his time and services, he began to find the situation to be somewhat tiresome.

Twenty-five without an adorative object is, in these days, certainly unusual, but Arthur Brereton was, for some reason or other, the proverbial exception. He had not as yet met with his fate, the fact fairly accounting for much that followed.

Each day did the widow become more pronounced in her expressions of affectionate regard which, in a moment of thoughtless self-delusion, he professed to return. But the reaction was as cyclonic as had been the surrender. Alone and away from the influence of the widow's presence, in his right mind—if only temporarily—something nearly akin to disgust took with him the place of that other and strangely distorted state of mind.

Digitized by Google

The day arrived for the break-up of the house-party at Taplow and for the return of Brereton to City life. Since that time up to the evening of his visit, in response to her invitation, Fulvia Masters had, upon various pretexts, contrived to see much of him.

A rich woman, and with much idle capital, she would often drive into the City in the middle of the day, and under the cloak of business—the buying a few "Egyptians," an investment in "Kaffirs,"—would decoy Arthur out to lunch with her.

Of course, her investments, transacted through his firm, brought him both commission and credit, for they were always large. But he loathed the task she imposed upon him, and himself for the part he brought himself to play.

"Ah, truant, I have seen nothing of you for nearly a week," she said smilingly as she nestled down into a low easy-chair. "You were not in the City yesterday."

"No, I—I—have been unwell these last few days, and have had a week's rest."

"But you are recovered now?" she said quickly, leaning forward, her elbows on her knees and her face supported by her hands.

She was a decidedly and wonderfully fascinating woman. Forty? Yes. Fair and fat? No. Spare rather was she, and with large dark eyes, which under excitement glowed like coals of fire.

"Oh, yes, I'm all right now, thanks. And you?"

"Only so-so. But I've not asked you to come and see me in order that we may talk doctor's shop. Mr. Brereton, I am going to ask you an apparently impertinent question."

"That is an impossibility," he remarked.

"You think so? Well, it is for you to decide that point." She paused a moment, and then said suddenly: "Would you care to increase your income were the opportunity offered you?"

"I—I don't understand," he replied a little nervously. He half-feared from this preamble a definite declaration and a proffer of the widow's hand and—bank balance.

"No, but would you, could it be done in a business-like, practical way?"

"I should wish first to hear the way," he said, bending his head slightly.

To his astonishment she told him—he imagined the fact to be known only to his employers and to himself—that his firm were prepared to admit him into partnership provided that he could bring into the concern capital to the amount of £10,000. To his further wonderment the widow, if he would so agree, proposed to advance the sum for that purpose.

He could see by the glitter in her eyes and by the restless interlacing movement of her fingers that for her much depended upon his answer. However, he could not bring himself to a decision there and at once. He told her so, and she had perforce to be content with the crumbs of hope.

He left her, promising that on the following day he would communicate to her the result of his consideration of her generous offer. He thanked her, thanked her warmly, and reached his own rooms in no enviable state of mind.

* * * * *

Macpherson, Lyle, and Brereton have a large "deal," on hand for Fulvia Masters. It is observable that the widow is of late moody, reserved, irritable even.

Six months ago, when Arthur Brereton joined the great Copthall Court firm as junior partner, she for a brief while was radiant. But the brightness visibly dimmed day by day, until now she seemed to have virtually changed places with the object of her erstwhile admiration.

It was on this wise. Edie Drew, a niece of Mrs. Masters' dead husband, came to stay with her. This was about three months after Arthur's promotion. The girl was a charming little creature, a contrast in every way to her aunt, being fair and gentle, where the other, as befitted her brunette type of feature, was alike masterful and unsympathetic.

Arthur Brereton met her for the first time in her aunt's presence, and the latter, keen to note the drift of things where the young fellow was concerned, saw that he was not a little impressed. This decided her to curtail the visit of the young lady, who on her part was not by any means disposed to fall in with her aunt's views.

The young people, as if by instinct, refrained from any expression of mutual interest while actually under Mrs. Masters' roof; but as "love laughs at locksmiths"—or at any rate, they say so—so does he usually snap his fingers at the precautionary measures, ordinary and extraordinary, of guardians and duennas.

It was on the morning of the "deal" referred to that an apparently accidental early meeting by the rhododendron clumps in Hyde Park led to a confession and an engagement. The fact that Edie was returning that day to her Yorkshire home no doubt quickened Arthur's movements, and hurried him, perhaps a little prematurely, into the irrevocable.

It was when Edie told him how that she should certainly inform her aunt before leaving London of her engagement that Arthur saw trouble ahead. He knew, or at least shrewdly suspected, the jealous nature of Fulvia Masters, and the knowledge or suspicion, added to a twinge of conscience with regard to his own conduct, as being, so to speak, not altogether of the strictly straightforward order, rendered him now uneasy and anxious.

About three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day Mrs. Master's card was brought in to him. Having all necessary instructions with regard to the business to be done by them for her that day, he was not a little surprised at this visit; in fact, in the light of a recent personal event, he was vaguely apprehensive.

He was roused to attention by the sharp clicking of the closed door. As he sat, leaning slightly over his writing-table, she towered above him. She was an exceptionally tall woman.

"Arthur Brereton," and there was a dangerous light in her eyes, an ugly contraction of brow, prophetic of storm and trouble, "have I deserved that you should strike at me in this way—this mean, sneaking, underhanded way? Don't interrupt me, please." He had half risen as if to expostulate with her. "I have not much to say, but that little will, I think, be to the point and soon said."

"Mrs. Masters," he here succeeded in saying, "do not, I beg of you, hastily utter anything that will make our future friendship impossible. But will you not be seated?"

Digitized by Google

"No, sir, I will not be seated. Our friendship!" she added with fine scorn. "It has never, at least upon your side, been worth so much that its loss is to be regretted. Oh, I will not occupy your valuable time longer than a few moments, I assure you," seeing that he looked nervously at his watch. "You have this morning entered into an engagement with Edie Drew."

He silently inclined his head.

"Yes, she has told me. I may not blame her; she is her own mistress. But you!" And here her cheeks broke out aflame, although she drew up her figure to its full height. "You! But there; do you remember that summer evening, sir, at Taplow? But a man's memory is like the summer itself, gone before its coming can be realised. Woman's is as her life."

"Mrs. Masters, I am quite prepared to justify my action in the matter of my engagement to Edie, and if I have said or done amiss in—with——"

"If!" she said with barely suppressed anger. "If is but a little word, but it may kill, Arthur Brereton, it may kill."

She moved to the door, placing her hand upon the handle, and half turning towards him.

"We shall never meet again," she said, "never. But you—you will both hear and know."

She was gone, and the door closed behind her.

Passing the house in Phillimore Place shortly after he saw that it was shut up. On inquiry he found that Fulvia Masters had gone abroad for an indefinite period.

Then, one morning, he received a letter from Edie saying that her aunt had died suddenly. The English doctor at Interlaken had written describing the rapid decline into which she had fallen, and forwarding, by virtue of her last request, various documents to her lawyer in London.

Among the papers was her will, executed evidently prior to her leaving England, as it was witnessed by two of her servants, who had remained in charge of the Phillimore Place house.

The strangest thing about it, however, was a legacy left to Edith Drew. A large sum of money, and, so the will ran, "one certain pint bottle of rare old Malaga wine, with a 'yellow seal,' the same not to be opened until the wedding-day of the said Edith Helen Drew, and then the liquor to be drunk by bride and bridegroom to my memory."

* * * * *

"Oddest thing I ever heard in my life," said Tommy Singleton to his friend the evening before the wedding. Tommy was to be best man. "The old woman," he continued, "must have got a bit 'wobbly' in the top storey, I should say. But is there any penalty attached to the non-fulfilment of the bottle business?"

"Yes," replied the other. "In the event of the bottle being opened before the time specified, or of a refusal to drink the wine at all, the money otherwise bequeathed to Edie goes to the Hospital for Incurables."

"Where the old lady ought certainly to have been herself. Of course there will be a witness to the due performance of the conditions?"

"Oh, yes, old Shiel, her lawyer, will be at the table to give his attestation."

"Ah! And the bottle—where is it now?"

"It is in the charge of Edie's father, as one of the executors."

"Oh—um—I think I'll go for a stroll, Arthur. See you in good time to-morrow morning. Good-night, my expiring bachelor."

When Tommy Singleton requested at half-past eleven an interview with Mr. Drew at 51 Eccleston Square, that gentleman expressed considerable surprise, but when he learnt the object of his visitor's somewhat untimely call, he grew first interested and then alarmed. At the end of half-an-hour Tommy departed with a small brown paper parcel under his arm.

The wedding-day dawned dull and showery, but Tommy burst into his friend's room with all his usual mercuriality of spirit. There is nothing of any moment to chronicle in connection with the ceremony. It was just the old thing over again—flowers, millinery, and tears—save that, perhaps, the bride, at all events in the groom's eyes, was more than passing sweet.

It was at the conclusion of the breakfast speeches that Mr. Shiel rose, and after reciting the clause of the will relating to the bottle with the yellow seal, requested Mr. Drew, as its custodian, to produce it.

The little, insignificant-looking glass receptacle was handed by that gentleman to the butler, who, solemnly breaking the seal and drawing the cork, poured the contents into two wine-glasses standing ready upon a large silver salver.

At the moment that Brereton uttered the words: "To the memory of Fulvia Masters," he caught Tommy Singleton's eye. He had never seen his friend's face so serious before, and yet there was in it a strange look of triumphant thankfulness.

* * * * *

There is a certain analytical chemist in the North of London, Tommy Singleton's brother, to wit. In his laboratory, upon the topmost shelf in a dark cupboard, is an empty wine-bottle, the cork, topped with a yellow seal, being half drawn.

The scientist will tell you that the bottle at one time contained a prussic acid decoction, and that through the detective ability of Tommy Singleton two lives dear to him were saved, and a jealous woman's after-death-revenge frustrated.

How one bottle was substituted for the other is a secret between Tommy and Mr. Drew.

RALPH ENDERBY.

HOW TO WIN KRUGER'S HAT.

November 26th Your Last Chance.

DON'T you think it would look nice on your drawing-room table, or under a glass case on your mantel-piece? Well, there is no reason whatever why you should not get it. As you probably know, the Editor of Pearson's Weekly has bought it, and is offering it as a prize in a simple competition. All you have to do is to send in what you consider the funniest joke you ever heard. It may be either cut from a paper or written up by yourself. In either case you must affix to it a coupon which will be found in the current number of Pearson's Weekly.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

Result of Competition No. 4.—ONE WINNER GETS THE £100 THIS WEEK.

The £100 this week has been won by Mr. A. E. BARKER, 30 Gloucester Street, Coventry, who sent in the correct results to all the matches.

Sheffield United, Wolverhampton Wanderers, Sheffield Wednesday, Notts Forest, Derby County, Newcastle United, and Southampton won their matches. Swindon v Reading was scratched. The remainder were drawn games.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, November 24th. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 7. Matches to be played on Saturday, November 24th.

MATCHES TO BE PLAYED ON SATURDAY, NOV. 24TH.	Free	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
1 NOTTS FOREST v. 2 NOTTS COUNTY
1 SHEFFIELD UNITED v. 2 ASTON VILLA
1 BLACKBURN ROVERS v. 2 BOLTON WANDERERS
1 NEWCASTLE UNITED v. 2 LIVERPOOL
1 STOKE v. 2 DERBY COUNTY
1 WEST BROMWICH ALB. v. 2 SUNDERLAND
1 MANCHESTER CITY v. 2 WOLVERHAMPTON WAND.
1 WOOLWICH ARSENAL v. 2 MIDDLESBROUGH
1 WALSALL v. 2 LEICESTER FOSSE
1 SOUTHAMPTON v. 2 BRISTOL CITY

The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

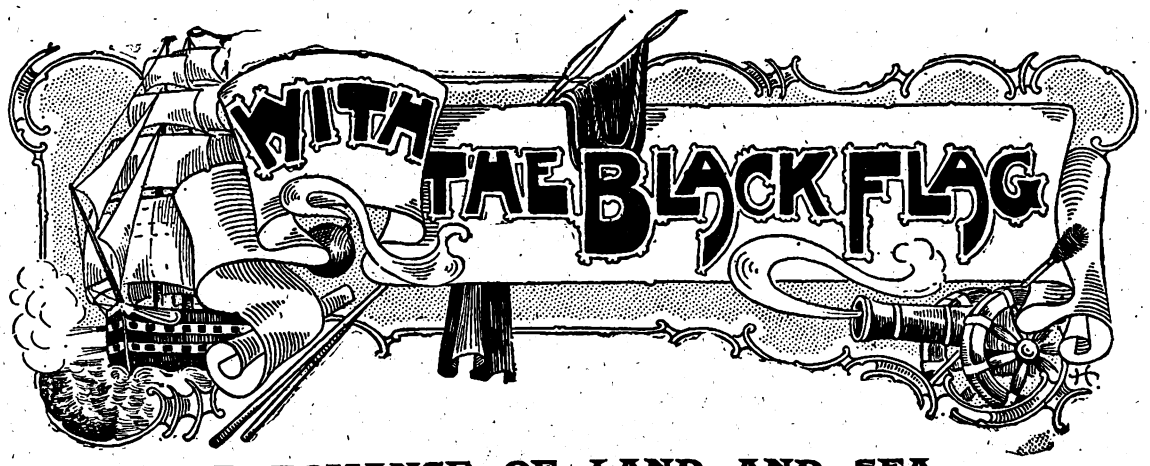
Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, November 23rd, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "COUPON No. 7," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. In the event of a tie the prize will be divided.
7. Competitors may send in any number of attempts.
8. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

* Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains valuable information and statistics showing the previous records of the various clubs, and the particulars of the points of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in determining the chances of the teams engaged. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of a booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By William Westall.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Major Wyvenhoe, commander of an expedition which went out from England to help the Venezuelans in their struggle for liberty.
Captain Cautley, who is in charge of the ship which took the expedition out.
John Ready, the servant of Wyvenhoe.
General Arismendez, ex-Governor of Pampatar and Vice-President of the Venezuelan Republic.
Don Iago Santleo, a friend of Wyvenhoe.
General Urdenetta, Governor of Pampatar, a bitter enemy of Wyvenhoe.
Bolivar, Supreme Chief of the Venezuelan Republic.
Tamanac, an Indian Cazique, and great friend of Santleo.
Master Wyvenhoe, the leading man at Manoa.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Destruction of Manoa.

"Rosalind! Rosalind!"

"Your father," I said, and going towards the house we presently met him.

"I have news for thee, lass," he exclaimed, laughing ironically.

"News for me! What is it, father?" she asked.

"Would'st like to be wed?"

"Would I like to be wed? You are pleased to make merry, father," rejoined Rosalind, regarding him with wondering eyes.

"Nay, it is too serious a matter to make merry over. A man would take thee to wife."

Rosalind and I exchanged glances.

"Could the judge have overheard us, or was it some other man?"

"Who is the man?" she inquired dubiously.

"Antony Goring. Nobody else. Stephen Parker hath just been here with a proposal from Antony's father, who, as thou knowest, is my bitterest enemy. Thou hast found favour in Antony's eyes, and if I give thee to him it will be a healing of all differences, and I shall have no further trouble. What sayest thou?"

"With your leave, sir, I will answer for Rosalind," I struck in. "Master Antony Goring has spoken too late. I have just asked her to be my wife, to which she has given her consent, and we were coming to ask yours."

"You, you have asked Rosalind!" cried the judge, now as much surprised as we had been. "A simple mountain maid, unlearned, knowing naught of the world to which you belong, is no fit mate for you, kinsman."

"That is my concern, judge. It is enough that we love each other, and the very fact that she is neither a woman of the world nor a worldly woman makes me love her all the more. May we hope for your consent?"

"Yea, verily, and I give it with all my heart, kinsman, knowing that you will make our Rosalind a good husband, and esteeming it a privilege to be still more your kinsman. Moreover, this will be a fitting answer for Antony Goring. I told Master Parker that I would as lief see Rosalind dead at my feet as the wife of one whose soul is as foul as his face. But Stephen being a wise man he counselled me to send a message less likely to stir up further strife, so I bade him say that I would consider the matter, and speak to my daughter. Now it will be enough to answer that as she is betrothed to Master Rupert Wyvenhoe I cannot gainsay her."

Rosalind's eyes filled with tears.

"I thank you my father; your kindness fills the cup of my happiness to overflowing," she exclaimed joyfully, putting her arms round his neck and kissing him.

"Mine also," said I. "I was your debtor already, now I am more your debtor than ever, and I have still another favour to ask. As you know, my home is in England——"

"And you want to take Rosalind thither. It will nearly break our hearts to part with her, and she will be loth to leave us. But that is far off, you will abide with us yet a long while. Nay, I am no Laban; I don't ask you to serve for Rosalind as Jacob served for Rachel. The sooner you marry the better I shall be pleased, so as to let Master Antony know of a surety that the prize he would win can never be his."

"It cannot be too soon for me. What say you, Rosalind? When shall it be?"

"Nay, kinsman, you are my master now, it is for you—when you and my father will."

"Your sweetheart, darling, not your master, and call me no longer kinsman, say Rupert."

"May I? Would it please you?"

"Much."

"Then I shall always call you Rupert."

"I do not know what is the custom here, but in England it is the bride's privilege to name the day. Had you not better speak to your mother?"

"Yes, that would be best. Hie thee to thy mother, child

Digitized by Google

Make the time when you will, only let it be short," said the judge.

"She is young and artless, and as innocent as an angel; for which she is perhaps none the worse," he added when Rosalind was gone.

"For which she is all the more precious. I am very fortunate and you are very kind, and for the present I shall say nothing about taking her away, only I must not trespass too long on your hospitality——"

"No more of that, an you love me, Rupert. You will only be a child the more, and my barns are full and my house hath many rooms. Ah, Master Antony will get an answer he little expects."

"I hope the rebuff you are going to give him will not add to your difficulties. If looks go for anything he is likely to be a dangerous enemy."

"He looks everything that is bad, the red-skinned knave, and I am sure of one thing, he would give me more trouble as a son-in-law than an enemy, and he and his people are enemies already. But never fear, ere long I shall master them all."

I hoped the event would justify the judge's confidence, though I had misgivings. About the earthquake shock, and the pillar of smoke, for as such I deemed them, he said never a word.

I had not expected that he would, but it did surprise me that these portentous signs were ignored by everybody else, even by Santley, from which I could only conclude that they had either become contemptible by long familiarity, or that Manoeros were perversely blind to portents, possibly from ignorance, which any other people would have regarded with apprehension and dread.

But as it was not for me to sound a note of alarm I held my peace, resolving, however, to take Rosalind from the mountain so soon as I could do so without giving umbrage to her kinsfolk.

Mistress Wyvenhoe and her daughters decided that the marriage should take place a month after the betrothal. And then something else happened.

I had noticed for some time that Santley and Diana were very friendly. My declaration emboldened him to make his, which met with acceptance from all quarters, and it was arranged for both weddings to take place on the same day.

In England this would have seemed undue haste. At Manoa it was nothing unusual. There were neither settlements to make nor trousseaux to prepare. The girls' outfits had been in preparation since their childhood, and it was very little Rosalind would be able to take away with her.

The judge dowered his daughters with gold and I was surprised by its amount and value. It was mostly in the shape of trinkets—bracelets, brooches, chains, rings and other baubles.

There were also some ancient Spanish coins, obtained I know not whence, and several ingots. The rings were of certain specified weights, and passed on occasion as coin, since though it pleased Master Wyvenhoe to say, and in a certain sense, truly, that they had neither money nor mints at Manoa, tokens of value, albeit not officially recognised, had long been in vogue and were found useful.

The judge's liberality was opportune and relieved me of an anxiety. My own funds were so low that they had not sufficed for our travelling expenses to the coast and the voyage to England, and it was to the last degree improbable that I should find anybody in Bolivia or Peru to whom I could sell a draft on London.

Nothing of moment befell in the interval between our betrothal and the weddings.

When my rival got his answer he was very angry, used bad language and vowed vengeance against both the judge and myself. But the judge only laughed, saying that people who threatened vengeance seldom executed it, and that Master Goring was too much of a cur to dare to raise his hand either against him or Master Rupert. Which I have no doubt was reported to Antony and added fuel to the fire. But I was too happy and too much taken up with my sweetheart to let his threats trouble me.

Even my forebodings as to the fate of the mountain, in

"You, you have asked Rosalind!" cried the judge now as much surprised as we had been.

the event of a serious earthquake happening and Mount Lofty becoming an active volcano, were almost forgotten, though I did once broach the subject to Santley. He saw no cause for alarm.

The tremblings had been going on ever since his grandfather could remember, and were so frequent that nobody noticed them. Lofty did not smoke. What I imagined to be smoke was merely a dark cloud hovering over the summit. Smoke and clouds were so much alike that they might easily be mistaken for each other.

Santley spoke so confidently that I did not care to argue the point, though I still held to the opinion that what I had seen was smoke, and what I had felt were small earthquakes.

The betrothal of the judge's daughters was a notable event at Manoa and excited general interest. He was the first man on the mountain and greatly respected as well by reason of his personal qualities as his official position.

The good wishes he received were numerous and hearty, his waning popularity revived, whereby his friends were encouraged and his opponents so much discouraged that they almost ceased opposing. All of which vastly delighted him.

"The very thing. We wanted something to unite us. This double marriage will do it, and we shall have the finest wedding feast that was ever known at Manoa," he exclaimed.

Everybody in the village, except the Gorings and their clique, and many from other parts of the mountain were invited and regaled with the best their Master and Mistress could give them. He himself, as Chief Magistrate, performed the ceremony and presented each of the brides with a marriage certificate drawn up in proper form.

Digitized by Google

Then there was a banquet, at which Santley and myself had to make speeches, and to the banquet followed a fandango that lasted till past midnight, a very late hour on the mountain. Never, I think, was a more joyous party, the guests were all gaiety and good humour, and danced as though they might never dance again, and poor souls they never did.

Truly, and without exaggeration, this was the happiest day of my life. It was happiness to know that Rosalind was mine, to see her smiling face and look into her glowing eyes, to join in the dancing and mingle with the guests as they strolled in the grounds, hear their merry laughter and receive their kindly greetings.

Yet so overshadowed is that day by terrible memories that I can never think of it without a sense of horror and a sinking of the heart.

We were to spend our honeymoon at home for the very sufficient reason that, short of camping out, we could not well spend it anywhere else. Nevertheless, we meant to make a few excursions, the first, in company with Santley and his wife, to the lake that fed the river; but as this would involve an early start and a long climb, the lake being considerably higher than Manoa, we decided not to set out until the day but one after the wedding.

Arrangements were made accordingly, the mules selected, provisions prepared, and the servants who were to accompany us, including John Ready, bidden to be ready betimes.

After supper the judge proposed that he and I should take a turn in the garden, which we did, leaving Rosalind and her mother in the verandah.

"My daughters have ever been dear to me, but it is only now when they have taken to themselves husbands that I know how dear they are, and how much I shall miss them. Diana will always be near us. But Rosalind. You will not take away the child very soon, Rupert," he said anxiously.

"Not soon at all," I returned. "Not for ever so long. Only my friends, with whom I have not been able to communicate for months, will think I am dead, and if there were any possibility of sending a letter——"

"If that will content you it shall be done. Tamanac is a great traveller, can find his way any whither, and likes wandering. He will take your letter to Choco, or some other place on the coast, and by hook or by crook get it dispatched to England. Then you will not think of going before the end of this year?"

"I won't think of going before the end of this year, at the soonest."

"I thank you, my son, for your complaisance, and the matter being for the present settled we will say no more about it. Sufficient for the day is the evil—oh, Heavens!"

The judge gave a spasmodic bound and lurched heavily forward. In trying to save him I slipped and we both went down. An arrow had pierced his back, and as I fell a second arrow whizzed over my head, and stuck in a tree a few paces in front of us.

I rested the stricken man's head on my shoulder and called for help, on which Ready, who was near, came running.

"He is surely not mortally wounded, John?" I cried.

"Judge Wyvenhoe will never speak again, sir," answered John, looking at his face; "this arrow has pierced his heart."

Just then Rosalind and her mother, who had heard my call, also came running. They had no need to ask what had happened. The prostrate body, the ghastly face, the murderous arrow, told their tale only too well.

I shall not attempt to describe the scene that followed. It was one of the most painful experiences of my life.

When the body had been taken into the house Ready and I tried to track the murderer but it was too late, the light had failed, and there was so much cover about that he had every chance of getting away unseen.

Soon, Santley and several friends of the family came, all in consternation and, save Santley, in utter bewilderment. Nobody had a doubt as to the identity of the murderer.

"Antony Goring hath done this," was in all their mouths. Yet nobody proposed to do anything. The judge had kept matters so entirely in his own hands, that now he was gone the whole community appeared to be paralysed. Moreover, this was the first murder ever committed in Manoa, and there existed no machinery for dealing with so terrible a crime.

I urged Santley to take action.

"What would you have me do?" he asked.

"Arrest Antony Goring and charge him with the crime."

"He would deny it, and we have no evidence against him. Also he is protected by a strong party, resolutely led; our leader is dead, and there is none to take his place. The deputy-judges are old men and too timid to move a hand. The council will meet to-morrow, perhaps to-night, to elect a

To the banquet followed a fandango, which lasted till midnight.

Digitized by Google

new judge who is sure to be Walter Goring. Only by force can it be prevented."

"I would use force then."

"If we can command it, which I doubt. I will make inquiries and consult with our friends."

In warm climates the interval between death and burial is of the shortest, and on the next day Master Wyvenhoe's body was followed to the grave by nearly all the village and interred with the forms usual at Manoa, which included a religious service led by one of the late judge's oldest friends.

After the funeral we had a family conference. In Santley's opinion there was no possibility of bringing the murderer to justice. Walter Goring, who had been elected judge, and several members of the council were, he believed, implicated in the crime, and would set their faces against any attempt to open an inquiry; moreover, their party was united and resolute, ours dispirited and disorganised. Some of them had already gone over to the enemy, and the people at large were too easy going to take up arms even in order to avenge the death of one who had devoted his life to their service.

"So nothing can be done?" I asked.

"At present, nothing. Later on, perhaps, we may find a leader, reunite our party and oust the Gorings. But that will take time, and though I am sorry to say it, my friend, you must go now."

"Go! What for?"

"Because if you don't you are likely to be held fast here, so long as you live. Those who opposed your coming are now in power, and for the same reason as they opposed your coming will forbid your going. They say that no stranger can be trusted to keep secret Manoa's history and whereabouts, on the preservation of which depends its prosperity and independence, if not its existence."

"When would you have me go?"

"This night."

"Nay, that would be too much like running away."

"It must be as James says, Rupert," interposed Rosalind with a peremptoriness which surprised me. "Delays are dangerous, that second arrow was meant for you, Antony Goring hath other arrows in his quiver, and there is no guarding against foes who lie in ambush and shoot you in the back."

This settled the matter, Rosalind was willing to go, and after what had happened I felt no desire to prolong my sojourn in Manoa.

"To-night you may get away without difficulty, nobody will suspect you of a design to leave so soon after the poor judge's death," observed Santley. "Later, even to-morrow, there might be obstacles. Diana and I will set you a day's journey on the way. We must make our preparations swiftly and secretly. Instead of taking your letter to the coast, Tamanac will guide you thither."

"May I not go too, James?" asked Beatrice.

"And leave your mother?"

"Let us all be together till the last moment; we will both go," said Mistress Wyvenhoe.

"I see no objection, it will be only two mules the more; and you and Beatrice would be very desolate, left here by yourselves after parting with Rosalind."

And so it was arranged. Tamanac, whose comings and goings were not regarded, and a servant whom we could trust, started with four pack mules when it was dusk. They were to wait for us at the rest house, near the foot of the ladders, where the Cazique would obtain two additional mules and load them with provisions.

We others did not set out till past eleven, which at Manoa was almost the middle of the sleeping night. Rosalind and I took with us only such things as were necessary for the journey, including of course her golden dower, the value of which I estimated at upwards of three thousand pounds sterling.

Santley led the way, and John Ready brought up the rear. Our unshod mules made no noise, nobody crossed our path, we went steadily on, and at four o'clock reached the rest house, where we found Tamanac and had breakfast.

I rested the stricken man's head on my shoulder.

"How if we are followed?" I asked Santley.

"Our flight won't be known for two or three hours. It will take at least one to organise a pursuit, and with a start of eight we shall not easily be overtaken."

"You forget the ladders."

"No I don't. The topmost ladder was lifted an hour before we set out, and cannot be replaced for at least three days."

(To be concluded next week.)

In the Christmas Double Number of

"SHORT STORIES"

will appear the first of a series of articles entitled

"BRITAIN'S WARS."

They are written in a very readable style, and the whole will form a complete history of the most important wars in which Britain has been engaged.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT TELEGRAMS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Knight of King's Guard," by Ewan Martin, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. E. C. Lempriere, 22 Seymour Road, Harringay, N. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about ELEPHANTS, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 26th. Post-cards only, please.

A Little Misunderstanding.

SHE was reclining in a low chair in the drawing-room, thinking about her dear Wil ie, who had been legally her property for the space of three months, when a telegram arrived for her. Hurriedly tearing open the buff envelope she scanned the contents, then fell back in a swoon.

The message was from her brother in the city, and read:

"Will run over to-day—George."

Her maid at last restored her to consciousness. Her Willie run over! She could not grasp the full significance of it. One thing she would do—go to him at once; so she hastily attired herself, and at length reached her brother's office, who, having sent the news, would be able to tell her all about it.

"How is he, and where have they taken him?" Her brother stared at her stupidly. "Oh, don't keep me in suspense! Tell me where he is!"

"Where who is?"

"Why, Willie."

"At his office, I presume. I haven't seen him to-day."

"Then what does this mean? Isn't he run over? Is this one of your silly jokes?"

George took the flimsy from his sister, read his own message, then exploded with laughter. It was a long time before he could convince her that his simple intimation that he would run over and pay her a visit, was not a detestable practical joke.

E. C. L.

Tricking the Post Office.

SOME time ago a journalist went into a post-office to send a telegram and post a letter.

"Can't sell stamps now," said the clerk; "it's after hours."

"But this letter is very important," urged the journalist.

"This office is only open for telegraph business," said the clerk decidedly.

The journalist took a form, wrote a telegram—fourteen words—and handed the clerk sevenpence. The clerk gave him a sixpenny and a penny stamp, and the journalist calmly struck out the last two words on the form. stuck the sixpenny stamp on his telegram, and walked out of the office, affixing the penny stamp to his letter in doing so.

W. A. S. H.

The Wrong Lords.

THERE was a dinner in the Marlborough Rooms. The principal talk was about a certain bill.

"I wonder what the Lords have done?" said the chairman.

"I'll wire to the nearest club and ask," replied a well-known M.P.

So he sent the telegram, with a request that the latest news of the Lords' division should be sent to him.

This was the reply:—"Latest from Lords'—Australians, 150 for eight wickets. Trott not out."

J. B.

Impossible.

A PEEBLESHIRE worthy was about to get married. The marriage was to take place at the home of the bride-elect who resided at a village some distance from where William lived.

The eventful day having arrived, the prospective bridegroom started for the station. On the way, however, he was hailed by the village grocer, who entertained him so heartily that the end of it was William missed his train.

The grocer suggested sending a telegram, and at William's dictation wired as follows:

"Don't marry till I come.—William."

W. J. B.

They Knew it Wasn't My Writing.

FOR the past few years my summer holidays have been spent at Scarborough, and, as I usually stay at the same house every year. it has been my custom to secure apartments beforehand by letter.

This year I omitted to write until a couple of days only remained before my holidays began, and, fearing lest I should be too late by writing, I sent a "wire," telling them to reserve apartments for me as usual.

On arriving there, in due course, I was surprised to be told that the house was full, the rooms I used to occupy only having been engaged that very morning.

"But why did you let the rooms?" I demanded hotly, "when I had engaged them myself by telegram two days ago. Didn't you receive it?"

The good woman threw up her hands in horror as she exclaimed:

"Oh, sir, I am so sorry; but when your telegram came we thought someone was playing a trick on us, for both Betsy and myself agreed as how it wasn't in your own handwriting!"

Expostulations being useless, I had to find fresh quarters.

A. V.

Digitized by Google

Not What I Wanted.

A FRIEND of mine held a good position in the Zoological Gardens.

I had been out of a situation for some time, and he promised to let me know when a vacancy occurred that I might fill.

Imagine my feelings one morning when I received a telegram to the following effect:

"A vacancy in the monkey-house; come at once."

R. J.

A Matter of Punctuation.

MR. JONES had a country house, and had run up to town. On his return journey, the train came into collision, occasioning damage and delay. Mr. Jones was shaken, but not otherwise hurt. He got a friend to telegraph for him, which he did, to the following effect:

"Serious accident. Mr. Jones remains. Coming 8.30 p.m. train."

But the clerk transposed the message, thus:

"Serious accident. Mr. Jones' remains coming 8.30 p.m. train."

And when that unfortunate gentleman arrived, instead of finding his carriage, there was an undertaker with a hearse waiting to convey his remains to his sorrow-stricken family.

W. C. L.

Smartly Done.

THE other morning, whilst at breakfast, I received the following telegram:

"Come at once. Father very ill.—Mother."

Hastily finishing my meal, I hurried off to catch the train. When I arrived at my destination I met my father, who never looked better in his life, who greeted me with:

"Good morning, Tom. What brings you down here so early?"

At first I could hardly believe my senses. What was the meaning of the telegram? Was someone fooling me? It really looked like it. For reply I handed him the telegram, which I had fortunately brought with me.

"Someone has been having a bit of fun out of you," he said.

"Going a bit too far, I think," I exclaimed.

"Anyhow, if I were you," he said, "I would hurry back home as soon as possible, and see if anything turns up."

So hastily bidding him good-bye, without waiting to see my mother, as the train started in a few minutes, I returned home again. When I arrived there, I let myself in with my latch-key.

The house appeared to be deserted. I searched the lower rooms for my wife, but found, instead, that burglars had been in while I was away. They had taken all the silver they could lay hands on. A horrible feeling came over me. Had they killed my wife?

I called out aloud, but received no answer. I rushed upstairs, and, lying on the table in my wife's bedroom was a telegram from her sister, the contents of which were: "Mother very ill; wants to see you particularly. Come at once."

This was the solution of the mystery. The burglars had sent the telegrams, so that they could go on with their work unmolested.

About three o'clock my wife returned, and had practically the same tale to tell as I. She had got her telegram five minutes after I had left, and had hurried off at once, only to find her mother in the best of health.

The plans the burglars had laid had worked well. We are more careful now about telegrams.

E. L.

Misunderstood.

A CERTAIN man travelling in America had not enough money to reach his destination, so he went to the railway official and told him his friend had large shares in the company, and if he would telegraph to him he would let him have a pass.

The railway official did so, and received the following reply:

"Don't let Tom walk."

The official at once gave him a pass and he reached his destination and at once went to thank his friend.

The railway official soon after received the following telegram:

"You idiot, I said, 'Don't, let Tom walk,' and you gave him a pass."

E. H.

Only the Code.

DURING the early period of the last revolution in Peru, the leaders of the revolutionist party stayed in Chili, and directed the movement by means of the cable.

I was at the time in charge of an English business house in Lima. My rooms were over our office, and one night I was awakened by a loud rat-tat-tat on the iron-bound door below. I went out on to the balcony, which overhung the street, and to my amazement I found that the house was surrounded by soldiers.

"What do you want?" I shouted in Spanish.

"The head of the firm," was the reply.

I went down and admitted the officer—he was a full-blown general—and his aides. I wondered what I had done.

"Is this cablegram for your firm?" he asked.

I read it. There was one word, "blindado"—the Spanish for ironclad.

Then I roared with laughter.

The gold-laced general looked indignant.

"You will find it no laughing matter, señor, to plot against the government, and arrange for ironclads."

So I explained. I had ordered some goods from Chili, and this suspicious cablegram was merely to advise me that they had been shipped, "blindado" being the cipher word in the code book.

H. N. R.

£25 IN PRIZES.

PEARSON'S TALKING PUZZLE.

Second Edition Now Ready,

Price 6d.; Post-Free from this Office, 7½d.

Digitized by Google

THE HEROISM OF "KID."

In Lowchester Cathedral Choir School we once had a hero, and this is the story of his heroism.

He was a fragile little fellow with a white face and big blue eyes. His name was Kenneth Irenœus Dalland; and, because the initials of his name spelt that derogatory monosyllable, he was always called "Kid"—always, that is, when he was not called "Miss Kitty" or "Saint Irenœus"—for so innocent and quiet and simple he was, or seemed, that any one of those names appeared to suit him.

He was more "had on" than all the other kids in the school put together. Somehow he seemed to lend himself to it. He was so guileless and trustful, and believed everything the fellows told him. He it was who was dispatched to the Lodge at the Close Gate to ask the stout old janitor at what time the balloon might be expected to go up; he it was who was sent to the chemist's for two gallons of pickled canary seed; and it was he who was deputed to collect subscriptions from leading citizens on behalf of the "Lowchester Society for Relieving Aged and Deserving Beetles."

From these, and many like expeditions Kid always returned with the same expression of trustful good fellowship; and he joined, as heartily as anyone, in the laugh against himself. But sometimes when the dormitory was still, and the fellows asleep, he would have a good cry because they thought him such a simpleton.

The boy who took most delight in proving to the satisfaction of everyone the extreme greenness of Kid was a fellow named Pearson—the noisiest, jolliest, most reckless boy in the school—a boy with curly hair, eyes that were a-twinkle with fun, and a voice which seemed made for the merry music of laughter. Pearson used his wits—and they were of no mean order—in devising original methods of making Kid's innocence a cause of mirth, and his efforts were crowned with conspicuous success.

And yet Pearson was Kid's hero and special idol. In all Pearson's triumphs he rejoiced, and he suffered with Pearson in his moments of misfortune. Whenever Pearson underwent personal chastisement—which he did, on an average, six times in the week—Kid's big blue eyes would grow dim with sympathetic tears, and on one occasion he expended a month's savings on a pot of soothing ointment wherewith to salve the hero's wounded palms. But Pearson cared for none of these things; it was another, and more delicate, kindness which melted his heart.

It chanced one day that the mighty had indeed fallen. Pearson the intrepid, Pearson the mocker of Mr. Gardiner's lithe cane, was standing in a remote corner of the playground convulsed with sobs. He had returned from an interview with the master with reference to his latest and most daring escapade, in which that sorely tried man had resorted to new and unwelcome tactics.

He had not whacked Pearson, he had talked to him. He had made touching references to Pearson's mater, who was a widow, and to the sad condition of the half-yearly report which she was expecting. It was that which got Pearson down, and he was having a dark hour of meditation and repentance.

At that moment Kid happened to cross the playground accompanied by another boy. He gave one pained glance at his hero; then, getting between his companion and Pearson's corner, he suddenly called the former's attention to some object on the school roof, and, his eyes being thus drawn from the contemplation of Pearson's fallen state, led him away.

Presently he returned alone. Pearson was standing in the centre of the playground. He came to Kid and shook him gently by the shoulder.

"Kid," he said, "you saw me blubbing just then?"

"Yes, Pearson," Kid replied.

"But Renshaw didn't?"

"No, Pearson."

"Kid," said Pearson, with lips a-tremble, "you're a brick! Some day I'll do as much for you."

About a fortnight later Pearson's opportunity came. Some repairs were to be done to the interior of the Cathedral, and the workmen had erected a scaffolding, the top of which rose higher than the triforium gallery. Pearson examined this structure critically as he passed out from service. He drew Kid aside.

"Look here, Kid," he said, "the chaps think you're a bit of a muff—got no pluck, and that sort of thing."

Kid nodded.

"I've done my share in making them think so," continued Pearson bluntly.

Kid nodded again.

"But I know you're not," said Pearson. "And you were jolly decent to me the other day; so, if you'll take your cue from me, I'll show the chaps what you are."

Kid was grateful, and there the matter dropped.

That evening after tea Pearson said in careless tones:

"Say, you chaps, do you know what Kid and I are going to do to-morrow dinner-time?"

No one could guess.

"Well," continued Pearson, "you know that jolly big wooden thing they've rigged up in the nave. Kid and I are going right up to the top of it when the men are at dinner, and going to look over the side. It would be ripping," he concluded, with a lame attempt at explanation, "to have a bird's-eye view of the tombs and things in the nave. I'm taking Kid because he's the only chap I can trust not to funk. And see here," he added, "if any fellow comes grinning at us he'll get his head jolly well punched. We don't want all Lowchester hanging round." And he winked ostentatiously at Kid.

* * * * *

"It's all right," cried Pearson the next day as he and Kid passed into the Cathedral after morning school, "those chaps are all out on the road; there's no one about, and there's the ladder. Come on Kid; don't funk it!"

"I'm not funking it," said Kid quietly.

He looked at the scaffolding. The long upright supports held two platforms, one considerably lower than the other, and the top of the ladder rested on the upper stage.

Digitized by Google

"Elders and betters first," said Pearson as he put his foot on the bottom rung of the ladder and began to ascend. "Follow me, Kid."

He ran lightly up the ladder, Kid following with a throbbing heart.

"Wh-whew!" cried Pearson, with a long whistle, as he stood at length on the top platform. "It's no end of a way up. No notion it was so high. Does it make you giddy, Kid?"

"N-no," said Kid, who now stood beside him, "I don't think so."

"It does me," said Pearson shortly.

"Then let's go down," cried Kid earnestly. "Do let's go down, Pearson!"

"Do you think I'm going to funk?" asked Pearson in a rather shaky voice. "Not me! Don't let's gas about it; I'm going to the end to have that bird's-eye view."

Without another word they walked to the end of the platform. Above them rose the vaulted roof; beneath them were the projecting, roughly-hewn planks of the lower platform, and beneath that—far beneath—the cold tiles of the nave floor.

"Now we've got to look over," said Pearson. "I'll look over first because I'm the biggest chap. Out of the way, Kid, let me come."

Kid held back and allowed Pearson to pass him. He was trembling a little, but his fear was not for himself. Pearson walked to the edge of the platform, his lips firm set. Not for the world would he have confessed how curiously his head was swimming and how loudly his heart was beating. Kid watched him as he advanced so near the edge that the toe of his boot was over the end of the platform, and deliberately looked over.

"There," he said, looking up again quickly, "I've done it. I said I would. But you'd better not, Kid, you——"

The end of the sentence was lost in a sudden shrill cry. Kid ran to the end of the plank, stretching out his hands. There was a dull thud, then a dead silence. The cold sweat stood in beads on Kid's brow, and a feeling of sickness nearly choked him. But in his heart there was no fear, only a great dread and a courage which drove away all thoughts of his own danger.

He stood where he was, and called Pearson's name in an agony. His voice echoed dully through the great hollow aisles, but there was no answer. He called again, and this time he fancied that he heard a groan just beneath him. He closed his eyes for a second, and whispered a prayer to the great Love who hears and heeds in the silence. Then, crouching cautiously on his hands and knees, he looked quickly down.

"Thank goodness!" he murmured, for there beneath him, on the projecting planks of the lower stage, lay Pearson, pale and huddled together, but alive. Kid paused a moment. The projecting portion of the lower platform upon which Pearson lay was immediately beneath him, about twice his own length below. But this lower platform was much narrower than the one on which he stood, and was altogether a frailer structure.

"The ladder," he thought, and hastened to it. But a glance showed that it was impossible for him to reach Pearson by that means, for the ladder, resting on the top stage, was useless for the lower and narrower planking below.

Kid slowly returned. He sat down on the edge of the upper platform with his legs dangling down. If he was to reach Pearson he must jump, and jump with care. To misjudge his leap would be—he cared not to think what. Slowly he lowered himself over the edge of the platform, clinging tightly to it. He hung by his hands over the lower scaffolding.

For a second he hung so; then, loosening his hold suddenly, allowed himself to drop. He alighted with a bang, and the shock sent him forward on his hands and knees. He scrambled up, and, kneeling beside his friend, called him by name. Pearson's eyes were closed and his face was colourless, but his breath came warm on Kid's hand. Presently he opened his eyes, and drew a long breath.

"Halloa, Kid," he said slowly, "where am I? Yes, I remember. Say, Kid, I can't move. There's something up with my leg. I was a cad to bring you here, Kid. Forgive a fellow, won't you?"

His eyes closed again. Kid was bending over him when he became aware of a new and terrible danger. The projection upon which they were crouching gave a great crack, and Kid felt it tremble. Then he saw that the planking was a fragile structure, joined for some temporary purpose to the firmer fabric beyond. There was another crack, then another, and another, and he knew that their support was giving way beneath their weight.

Then there came to Kid a great courage and a great determination. Stooping low, he seized both Pearson's listless hands, and drew them across his own shoulders. He looked neither up nor down—he fixed his eyes straight before him. The terrible silence of the great place lay solemn all about him. Raising himself to his full height, and putting forth all his strength, he moved slowly forward step after step across the narrow creaking planking, bearing Pearson, half dragged, half carried, with him.

Once he slipped and nearly fell; once he gave a little cry as the terror of danger swept across his mind. Then he set his lips and panted on till he gently laid his burden on the safe, though narrow, platform which was his goal. Then, throwing himself down by Pearson's side, he sobbed as though his heart would break.

Next moment there was a short, ominous crack, and the fragile planking upon which a moment before they had been went hurtling down with a rattling crash upon the tiles of the Cathedral floor. Kid put his arm round Pearson's neck and shuddered.

Then the workmen, returning at a later hour, found them; and, a ladder being directed to the lower scaffolding, strong arms bore Pearson safely down, Kid following with a white, grave face.

* * * * *

Pearson lay in bed with his leg in splints, and Kid sat by his side. Pearson was holding Kid's hand in his.

"Kid," he said suddenly, "you're a brick! You saved my life, Kid. I——"

"Chuck it, Pearson!" said Kid.

There followed a long silence.

"I'm always getting into some mess," said Pearson at length. "I wonder what the mater thinks; she——"

The door opened, and a lady in black stood on the threshold. She went quickly to the bed, and stroked Pearson's curly hair from his brow.

"Mater!"

"My dear boy!"

Kid softly left the room, closing the door behind him.

"I'm his chum," he said to himself, "but she's his mater."

SPENCER J. GIBB.

Digitized by Google

Cradwicke Park Mystery.

THE death of Mrs. Upton of Cradwicke Park was a shock to the whole of the district for miles round, and its mysterious character caused it to be a source of wonder and a topic of conversation for much longer than the proverbial nine days.

She was a young woman, not more than twenty-five, and had been married only a few months at the time of her death. Cradwicke Park was hers in her own right; her father had possessed two estates, and when he died he left one to his daughter and the other to his son. Miss Cradwicke had married Richard Upton, a young man from the next county; he had no property of his own, and the marriage was a "fine thing" for him, as other people were ungracious enough to say. The union was regarded as a love match at first, although there had been rumours of disagreements during the last two months.

As to Richard Upton, there was nothing said against him; he was a pleasant kind of young man and had contrived to win the favour of his neighbours.

Mr. Richard Upton went to London for a week. He had only been gone a few days when his wife disappeared. Search was made, but without result, and Mr. Upton was telegraphed for at the address where he was known to be lodging.

He responded immediately and returned by the first train, which started within forty minutes from the time he received the telegram. Further search was instituted and inquiry was made for miles round, and the little river was dragged; then it occurred to somebody that there were certain unfrequented parts of the Park itself which had not been explored.

In one of these out-of-the-way spots, Mrs. Upton's body was found. No one had anticipated that she might have met her death within the bounds of her own estate; the servants had stated that she had left the house with her hat and jacket on, and it was concluded that she was going to call on some of the poor people, as she occasionally did.

There was an inquiry into the cause of her death. The first examination simply revealed a severe scratch on the leg just above the ankle—such a scratch as might be caused by a thorn while scrambling through a hedge, but the loss of blood was so small that this could not for a moment be looked upon as the cause of death. The post-mortem examination threw a little more light on the matter, but it served to make the death proportionately more mysterious. There were traces of poison.

Closer search among the grass and twigs near the spot where the body was found resulted in the discovery of a small phial without a label; the husband admitted that there had been a dispute between them and that his wife, in a fit of anger, had threatened to take her life; but he added that he regarded this as merely an outburst of temper.

There was a difference of opinion, however, between the experts who made the usual analysis; it was pointed out that Mrs. Upton had been dead two days before her body was found, and that, in the ordinary course of decomposition, certain poisons are generated.

Had Mrs. Upton committed suicide or no? In the end, the jury decided upon a verdict to the effect that she had been found dead and that there was not sufficient evidence to show how she met her death.

Upton showed great grief at the loss of his wife and for some months led a very retired life. As there was some doubt about the cause of Mrs. Upton's death, the county police took the matter up, but they soon dropped it again and the interest of the public died away.

There was only one person whose interest was maintained; that was Mr. Fred Cradwicke, who resolved to devote himself to the task of discovering the truth if it were in any way possible to do so. But he kept his resolve to himself.

He made it his business to invite himself to Cradwicke Park for a few weeks, ostensibly to condole with his brother-in-law—who now owned the property by reason of his wife having died intestate. Cradwicke did not suspect his brother-in-law, but he wanted to find out exactly how matters had stood with husband and wife, as that might have a bearing on the probability of suicide. But he could glean no further information than that given to the coroner. So he left the Park in order to make an investigation farther afield.

Digitized by Google

The question of robbery and murder combined was out of the question, seeing that nothing was taken from the body; it was therefore useless to look about for the probable thieves.

Altogether, the affair was a mystery that appeared to be hopeless of solution, but Fred Cradwicke felt that it was a duty on his part to discover the truth, and he made up his mind to devote a whole year, if necessary, to the fulfilment—or attempted fulfilment—of his task.

It is one of the odd things of this life that you may search for something for a long time in vain, and then, when you are convinced that nothing more can be done and are about to give up the search, a "final try," conducted probably in a half-hearted manner—results in success. Thus it was with Fred Cradwicke.

Only two weeks of the appointed period remained, and Fred Cradwicke found himself in a small village within five miles of Cradwicke Park. He was dispirited and hopeless, and was making his way to the Park with a view to staying there and resting for two or three days.

He found the inhabitants of this village in a state of mild excitement, due to the fact that a fair was being held in a field outside the village. Curiosity, and the lack of something better to do, took him in the direction of the fair.

It was evening, just after six o'clock, and the shows were "about to begin," for during the day there was no chance of business. Fred walked about aimlessly, noting the poor booths and the general meagreness of the whole thing; he was about to leave the field and continue his walk to the Park when he was attracted by some gaudily-coloured pictures hanging outside one of the booths.

These pictures informed the wondering rustics that Nalla Dora, the Great Female Snake-Charmer, had come amongst them to exhibit her wonderful powers over gigantic boa-constrictors and similar reptiles; they showed her in various positions with fearful snakes of extraordinary length and girth twining themselves round her arms, legs, waist and throat, with their heads poised ready to sting her, while she remained a model of calmness. A show of that description was well worth an admission fee of one penny, and the rustics readily parted with their money.

Fred smiled and turned away, but by this time a little more animation had been imparted to the fair and he was impelled to stay a little longer. A goodly number of people had arrived from various parts and the fun was beginning. Fred had always been a student of human nature and it pleased him to stand first here and then there in order to watch the small crowd. It began to grow dark and naphtha lamps were lighted outside the booths, which induced the villagers to remain longer and spend a few more pence. Fred was outside the booth of the snake-charmer when a man attached to the show announced the last performance for the day. Only about half-a-dozen persons went in, and Cradwicke resolved to go with them.

The exhibition of snake-charming offered no particular attraction to Cradwicke; he would have left the booth almost at the commencement but for the fact that he occupied a front seat and did not wish to disturb the other spectators by pushing his way out. Owing to his position he was the last to get into the open, where he was surprised to find himself in the dark; all the shows had turned out their lights and the merry-makers were gone.

Not knowing exactly which way to go to get clear of the field, he tried to follow his late companions and find the opening in that way, but they seemed to have scurried off and he could only hear the occasional sound of a voice at some distance from him. There was no moon and the sky was cloudy, so that it was not an easy matter for him to find his way out.

He looked about him for a few seconds and then made a start in what he believed to be the proper direction, but he had not gone half-a-dozen yards when he brushed against a man who was coming towards him.

Fred was on the point of apologising when the other man uttered a brief "Beg pardon!" Fred never pronounced his apology, for the sound of that voice deprived him of speech. It was Richard Upton.

Fred walked forward for a few yards and then came to an abrupt stand. What was Upton doing there? He appeared to be going straight to the booth of the snake-charmer. Scarcely knowing what he was about, Fred deliberately faced about, so that he might be in exactly the same line of march, and walked back to the booth.

He found the door and pushed it open gently; there was a faint light from the lamp on the platform, and Fred, feeling something like a thief, peered about cautiously. He saw Nalla Dora and Richard Upton standing together on the platform.

There was some secret here which Fred resolved to penetrate. Slipping on his hands and knees, he made his way silently round the booth towards the platform. It was not a spacious place and he had to be careful. He kept his eyes and ears strained to catch every movement and every sound, but in spite of his vigilance he did not notice that another figure was keeping close to him.

"I sent for you because I intend to have an answer to this question—When will you redeem your promise?"

Those were the first words which reached the ears of Cradwicke as he crouched near the platform, and they were spoken by Nalla Dora, not in the strange accent which he had heard during the performance, but in clear English. This girl, as he had fancied, was no Hindoo; she was probably a gipsy of English birth.

"How can I marry you without arousing suspicion?" replied Upton. "In any case, you would not be received by the county people. It would——"

"It matters nothing to me what the county people may think, and it should matter nothing to you if you loved me as you pretended. We could go away—go abroad—and be happy." Nalla Dora spoke with the vehemence of rising passion.

Upton remained silent and the snake-charmer continued.

"I will not listen to your offer of money! I will share the wealth and position which I helped you to get into your own hands! You loved me once, and you left me for a woman with money. That woman is out of the way. You never loved her, and when you had her money you tired of her and would have married me had you been free. You are free now, but you have ceased to love me. But I claim my share!"

"Confound it!" exclaimed Upton, looking about him

Digitized by Google

uneasily. "Don't talk so loud! I tell you, it would be better for you to accept my offer."

"And leave you free to marry the other woman? You see, I know more than you think. Never!"

"Then you will get nothing!" said Upton in a tone of sullen determination. "You have no hold on me. If you tell the public that my wife nearly surprised us in the park when the show was outside our gates a year ago and that you caused that confounded serpent, which you are so fond of taking about with you, to sting her, you must incriminate yourself. What a fool I was to agree!"

Nalla Dora laughed scornfully.

"You call yourself a fool now, but you were ready enough to assist in regaining your freedom, and that before she had made a will, and you helped in making the scratch on her leg to obliterate the mark of the serpent. Listen, if you do not swear to do what I wish, you shall die as your wife did."

There was silence, followed by some angry whisperings which did not reach Cradwicke. Then he saw Upton catch her by the throat with his left hand, and the light fell on a gleaming object in Upton's right hand.

There was a scuffle, a cry that resembled a command from Nalla Dora, and as Cradwicke scrambled on to the platform he was horrified to see a monster serpent twine itself about the form of his brother-in-law. At the same moment Cradwicke was dragged from the platform and a heavy knee was placed on his chest.

"If you move a muscle I'll choke you!" hissed a voice which he recognised as that of the man who had done the shouting outside. "No man shall play with my sister!"

Fred lay there powerless, knowing the tragedy that was being enacted close to him. His eyes wandered to the platform in an effort to see what was going on, as though that might be some help to his wretched brother-in-law, but he could see nothing. He heard two or three gasping cries, and the sound of something being crushed, and then he fainted.

When Cradwicke came to himself he was lying in a dry ditch by the side of a road quite a mile from the field and he knew that some drug or anæsthetic had been administered to him, for it was noon. He staggered and stumbled along the road till he came to an inn, where he told part of what had happened. Upton's body was found at some distance in another direction.

The police did their best to trace Nalla Dora and the man who called himself her brother, but they never succeeded. She certainly never appeared again in the character of a snake charmer.

Cradwicke Hall came into the possession of a distant relative of Upton's. People wondered why Fred Cradwicke never attempted to get possession of the estate which bore his name, but he himself has declared more than once that he would sooner beg his bread than own Cradwicke Park.

DAISY GEORGE.

A CURATE preaching for a charitable institute (deaf and dumb), endeavoured to excite his audience to greater liberality than usual.

At the close of a flowing sentence, in which, without mentioning the name of the house, he praised the staff and the founders, he delivered himself as follows:

"I allude to an institution in our midst, our noble institution for the dem and duff—" (great confusion)—"the duff and dem institute, I mean!"

35 TEN-POUND MEN AND 1 TEN-POUND LADY CAPTURED.

Since last week one more Sealed Envelope has been claimed, the lucky captor being:

Miss A. Millard, 14 Swinburne Avenue, Manor Park, London, E.,

who captured No. 57 in Trafalgar Square.

£360 HAS NOW BEEN PAID AWAY,

and there are still a number of Sealed Envelopes awaiting claimants.

There are also ten Ten-Pound Ladies travelling about the country who are only allowed to deliver their Envelopes to ladies.

The celebrated song

"HAVE YOU GOT THAT £10 NOTE?"

is now on sale, and can be obtained from all newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the SONG DEPARTMENT, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free.

PLAYED ON THE STAGE.

Two sketches have been written on the subject of the Ten-Pound Note Scheme, one lasting about half-an-hour and one fifteen minutes.

In No. 1 Sketch the cast consists of four actors and two actresses. In No. 2 Sketch the cast consists of two actors and one actress.

Any organisers of entertainments for Christmas, such as church bazaars or Christmas parties, or private theatricals, who wish to include either of these sketches in their attractions, should write to the TEN-POUND SKETCH DEPARTMENT, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Full particulars of the Scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE OPENING CHAPTERS

OF MR. AUSTIN FRYERS'

WEIRD NEW STORY

"THE UNCREATED MAN,"

APPEAR IN

"THE DAILY EXPRESS"

TO-DAY (Saturday, November 17th).

The powerful work of Mr. Austin Fryers is already well known to the readers of "PEARSON'S WEEKLY," but his latest Romance of a Scientist who set himself to war with Nature exceeds all his previous stories in the thrilling nature of its incidents.

Every reader of Pearson's Weekly should read Pearson's Daily,

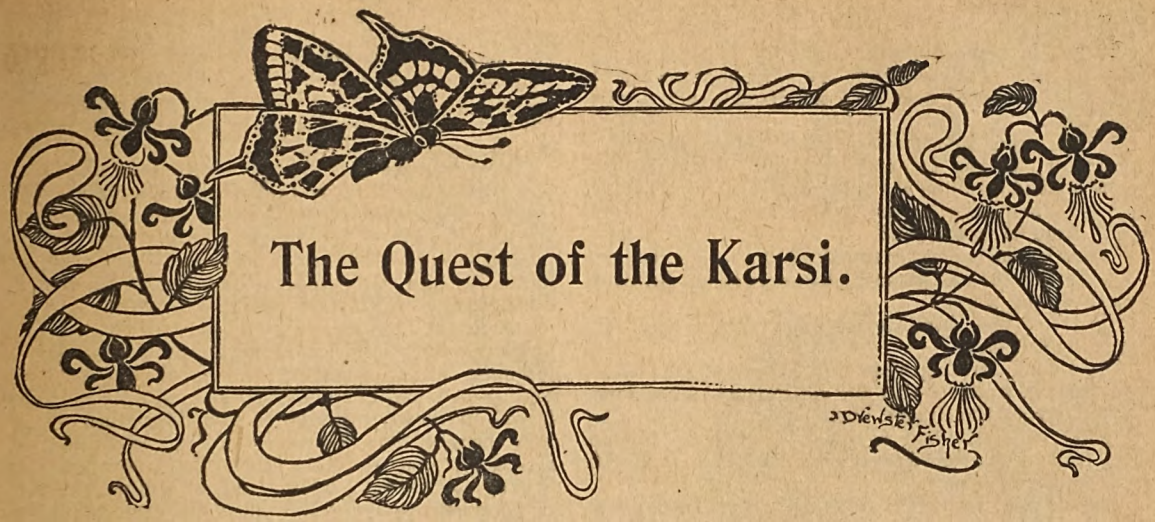
THE "EXPRESS."

It is the best and most interesting newspaper published and only costs ½d.

Digitized by Google



When it was made known that Professor Hunter was married, everybody stared at everybody else in surprise; and when it was ascertained that the marriage was the result of a romantic adventure, everybody opened his eyes still wider.

What! Hunter, who was at least fifty, a learned professor, a traveller who seemed to care for nothing except Eastern languages and similar curiosities—a man who took no interest in women-kind unless it were the stone or wooden image of some half-forgotten goddess, or the history of a female deity in some ancient manuscript—Hunter married, Hunter in a love romance! Impossible!

But it was true; he himself confirmed the rumour in a few terse sentences at the end of a letter on scientific subjects to his old friend, Professor Clayton.

The world wanted to know all about it and Clayton was besieged with inquiries; but he knew nothing of the circumstances. When asked to write to Hunter for details, he remarked that the latter would never give them by letter, he felt certain, and as he was going to Persia himself in a little while he thought it best to call on Hunter and obtain the information by word of mouth.

He did so, and two months later he sent home a long letter from Shiraz, where Hunter was residing for a time with his wife, a Persian lady. He said that Hunter had given permission for the facts to be made known, so that we need not scruple to show the letter to those who wished to learn the full story.

The narrative was given as nearly as possible in Hunter's own words, and ran as follows:

"The adventure really began in Bokhara where I made the acquaintance of an old Persian flower-dealer.

"I was on the look out for anything in the shape of very rare botanical specimens, and this old fellow had books and parchments containing descriptions and rough drawings of many plants which I have never come across in the whole course of my wanderings; musty old papers and volumes which looked as though they had not been opened for a score of years.

"'Ha!' said the old fellow, who spoke English very well and did not take it kindly when I addressed him in his own tongue. 'You are a great traveller, but I can show you more than you have seen in plant life. What do you think of this?'

"He pulled out a book composed of sheets of parchment attached together and to a cover; they were full of Chinese characters and drawings of flowers. Turning rapidly over the leaves, he stopped at one and pointed to it with his forefinger. The drawing represented a species of orchid entirely unknown to the world; it resembled a human head with a cap, and it was called the Karsi.

"'That plant is fictitious!' I exclaimed decisively.

"'Nothing of the kind!' cried the old man just as energetically. 'This volume contains the full history of the flower. It was discovered by an officer in the army of the great Timour the Tartar more than five centuries ago; he saw it on the brink of an ensanguined pool where the slaughter had been heaviest. It was taken away and cultivated by a sect which made a deity of the plant. It has been kept quite a secret ever since.'

"'H'm!' I grunted. 'A likely story. Just as if the temples, or whatever they be, of this sect, could not be entered and the secret discovered. Where is this sect located?'

"'The Russian Governor-General at Tashkend would give a considerable amount to anyone who could tell him!' was the reply. 'The members of that sect keep their whereabouts a profound secret, and there is reason to believe that the world would be all the better if they were dispersed. That is all I can tell you.'

"I took a tracing of the sketch in the Chinese volume and afterwards I made a drawing of the Karsi on card board and coloured it according to the description given in the book. Then I put it in my bag and forgot it for a few days.

"About three weeks later I was at Samarcand in company with an acquaintance who was, like myself, a traveller. We were talking of plants and I showed him the drawing of the Karsi. This incident occurred in the street, and I remember that we both stood still for a few moments while my friend scrutinised the sketch and listened to my account of it.

"'Do you intend to make a search for it?' he asked me jestingly.

"'I would, if I knew where on earth to look for it,' I replied.

"He laughed and then the matter dropped. The rare orchid was brought to my mind again on the evening of the following day while I was seated in the little restaurant; I had finished a light meal, and was gazing meditatively into space, when a folded paper fluttered into my lap and brought me back to myself. Before picking up the paper I looked round to see who had thrown it there, and discovered near me a tall Hindoo with a very white beard.

Digitized by Google

"I had seen him two or three times already in Samarcand; he was an expert juggler. Catching my eye, he nodded as much as to say that it was he who had deposited the paper on my knees, and then he went rapidly from the restaurant.

"I took up the paper and found written on it a message which startled me and yet still more excited my curiosity concerning the Karsi.

"'To seek the Karsi is to court destruction. Be warned by a friend!'

"I had but little sleep that night, for I felt that there was a basis of truth in what the old Persian had told me. I looked out for the juggler during the next day, but he was gone; so I resolved to speak to a wise old Mollah whom I had seen every day crossing the square on the way from the mosque.

"The old man had heard about the Karsi, but he could not tell me anything definite concerning the locality where the sect held worship, or even the name of the sect; but he gave me one piece of information which I considered of great importance. He told me that he had heard from a shepherd near the foot-hills of the Thian-Shan Mountains that a Hindoo had been found in a dying state at the foot of the mountain, and round his neck was a chain with a piece of gold on which was engraved a flower similar to that of which I spoke. The Hindoo had pointed upwards to the mountain, but had died before he had been able to utter a word.

"That decided me, and accompanied by two armed Armenians, I set out for the Thian-Shan Mountains and interviewed the shepherd. He confirmed what the Mollah had told me.

"I allowed two days to elapse and then I began my survey of the mountain for some trace of the whereabouts of the strange sect, for I was firmly of the opinion that somewhere in the mountain-range I should find the home of the Karsi. The presence of the Hindoo with the golden token established the fact beyond a doubt in my mind.

"We spent a week in wearying toilings up the sides of the mountains, but we were baffled every time; after struggling up a path which only a mule could climb with anything approaching to ease, we would find that it ended in a deep fissure or in a perpendicular wall of mountain.

"On the eighth day we came to a similar abrupt termination to the path we were ascending—that is, to a wall of rock; but this time I discovered proof that certain things had been hauled up this wall and I felt exultant.

"'I think we are upon the track at last,' I said to my two companions. 'We must see what is on the other side.'

"The wall was about fifty feet high, and I scaled it by cutting holes for my feet and hands. Once seated astride the wall, I lowered a line which enabled my less athletic companions to reach the top. I secured the line and let it down on the other side so as to form a means of getting back again.

"We appeared to be looking into the mouth of an extinct crater about two hundred feet in diameter; a well-defined path led downwards until it was lost in the blackness. Down this path we all three went with grim determination.

"When we had gone some few yards into the darkness, we found a tunnel on our right; we entered this, the two Armenians going just in front. When we were well inside, I struck a match and lighted a taper, which I fixed in a crack in the wall; it did not give much light, but at least it was something bright in the darkness and served to make us feel safer.

"How delusive that idea of safety was; we had not gone half-a-dozen yards further when a figure dashed out from somewhere upon the two Armenians; I heard a cry, and I knew by the sound that they had been pushed into some awful pit. Ere I had time to think more, the figure was upon me and I was engaged in a death struggle with some powerful creature.

"I am not a young man but I am still blessed with a large amount of physical strength and my assailant had his work cut out to master me. He did his best to drag me forward, and in spite of my struggles he managed to to pull me slowly towards the spot where my two men had disappeared. I was beginning to think that I should be forced to follow them, when he tripped and fell heavily on his back; he received my full weight on his chest and was rendered breathless and strengthless for the time being. Before he could recover, I had seized my opportunity and had him gagged and bound.

"I fetched the taper and had a look at him, with the result that I uttered an exclamation of surprise. It was the juggler, but without the beard, and round his neck was a chain with a golden token bearing a representation of the Karsi!

"'I thought you were a friend?' I asked him somewhat ironically. 'It looks like it.'

"By the light of the taper I could see an expression in his eyes which induced me to remove his gag. I had my hands ready, notwithstanding, for I was not quite sure of him, but he spoke in a low voice and told me briefly that he was indeed anxious to be my friend.

"'You are seeking the Karsi,' he said, 'and that means destruction to you unless you are careful.'

"Then he explained that he was the unwilling slave of this strange sect and would gladly be free, but he feared that they would compass his death if he left them. He had seen me show the drawing to my acquaintance, and determined to warn me. Finding that he was unable to dissuade me, he expressed his intentions to help me. As I showed some surprise at his conduct, he informed me that I had befriended his brother some years ago and he was willing to repay the debt of gratitude.

"Acting on his directions, I made my way through the door by which he had entered the tunnel and, after traversing other passages, I suddenly emerged in the open—in a valley of pine trees with a dark stream running through it and forming a moat to what seemed a fortified city on the opposite bank. For there rose a wall to a height of sixty feet, and above this wall I could see palm trees, domes and minarets. This must be the home of the Karsi and the strange sect that worship it! I must see more of it!

"Back I went to Keshub and explained to him what I wanted. He shook his head, but agreed to help me.

"'Go at midnight,' he said, 'and toss this ring over the wall. Ashkaba will find it and will drop a rope from the palm tree. You will climb into the tree and there you will be able to see much when the day dawns. You can only go at night, because then the stream is dried up.'

"He would not accompany me, saying that it was better for him to keep guard. So I waited impatiently for midnight and then went on my mission.

Digitized by Google

"I found the bed of the stream dry, as Keshub had said. I threw the ring over the wall and after a few moments I heard a rope dangling against it. It was knotted and I had no difficulty in reaching the top of the palm tree from which it depended.

"How can I describe all the wonders which met my gaze when daylight came? I saw streets with beautiful houses and lovely plants full of song birds; people of Mongolian type in fantastic dress. I saw processions wending their way through the streets which all converged to a common centre where stood a magnificent temple. I was lost in wonder and more than once nearly betrayed myself.

"At midday there was a special procession, in the centre of which was a sumptuous litter. On it reclined a Persian woman, young and of surpassing beauty, the like of whom has never met my gaze; I followed her eagerly with my eyes and I groaned in spirit when she passed from view.

"Yes, I who have never felt any passion for a woman was now consumed by love for one whom I had only seen for a short time and at a distance! But it was enough, and the appearance of that divine face and figure was burnt on my brain.

"I do not know how I passed the remaining hours, but when it was dark enough I slipped down the rope and crossed the stream, which was knee-deep—I could not wait until midnight. When Keshub saw me, he started in dismay and asked how I dared venture from my hiding-place at so early an hour.

"'What are they doing there with that young Persian?' I demanded without replying to his question.

"He would not answer until I had partaken of food, when he told me that it was the creed of the sect to sacrifice human beings to the Karsi. The emissaries of the sect were sent far and near to entice the young and beautiful to their city under various pretexts, but when the dupes reached their destination they were, after a brief measure of homage and enchantment, sacrificed to the Karsi.

"'Do you mean to say that the lovely woman I saw to-day is to be killed?' I gasped in horror. 'How?'

"'They will take her in a grand procession to the temple at noon to-morrow,' replied Keshub with a half-shiver. 'When inside, she will be taken into a vault and placed on a stone at full length, under the belief that some new delight is in preparation; but the long arms of Karsi will close about her form and drain the blood from her body.'

"'Horrible!'

"Keshub, in reply to further inquiries, said that the vault would be absolutely dark and that the woman's figure would be obscured by a thick black veil and a mantle.

"'I must save her!' I said in a decided tone. 'You must help me.'

"'But how can you do it?' asked Keshub anxiously. 'It is impossible and you will lose your life in the attempt.'

"I did not answer, for I was revolving in my mind various plans for saving the Persian. Suddenly I jumped to my feet.

"'I have it!' I exclaimed. 'You and Ashkaba must help me.'

"From my bag I took some pellets which were made of a poison of the most virulent kind and dissolved them in water, making a liquid with which I saturated my clothing and anointed my skin.

"'The Persian is tall and will be concealed by a veil,'

25,000 TRIAL PACKAGES Free!

Rheumatism Cured by a Single Remedy that You May Try Without Spending a Cent.—Cured Many Cases of 30 and 40 Years' Standing.

JOHN A. SMITH

If you have rheumatism, write to me and I will send you free of cost a trial package of a harmless remedy, which cured me and thousands of others, among them cases of over 50 years' standing. It is a grand remedy, and in order that every suffering reader may learn about it, I will gladly send them a Trial Package free, even if more than 25,000 invalids should apply. Many a distressing case of rheumatism, among them some which defied Hospital, Drugs, Electricity, and medical skill, were successfully cured. In Denham, Ind., U.S.A., it cured a lady who then cured 15 of her neighbours. In Prosser, Nebr., U.S.A., it cured Mrs. C. Morritz, who had been afflicted for 52 years. In Fountain City, Wis, U.S.A., it cured Hon. Jacob Sexauer after suffering for 33 years, notwithstanding having employed seven physicians. At 130 Oak Street, Vincennes, Ind., U.S.A., this remedy rescued Miss. Emma Callender from a case of rheumatism, which her physicians considered fatal. Rev. C. Sund, of Harrisville, Wis., U.S.A., testifies that this remedy cured two members of his congregation, one who had suffered 18, the other 25 years. Thousands of similar instances could be mentioned where this horrible plague has been completely cured. Write at once for a free trial package and other information, for it is an honest remedy that you can test before you part with your money. Be sure and write your name plainly and give your full address, to avoid any mistakes in delivery. Mr. Smith's principal offices are in Germania Building, Milwaukee, Wis., U.S.A., but for the convenience of the British public he has also opened London offices. Address all letters to John A. Smith (Dept 1007), 6 and 7 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

I said meaningly. 'I must take her place. I am saturated with a poison that would kill half the people in that city if they each took only a small dose. Do you understand?'

"At midnight both Keshub and I scaled the wall into the palm tree and thence we descended into the city. Keshub explained to Ashkaba what I intended to do, and together we made our way stealthily to the house occupied by the lovely victim.

"Ashkaba acquainted her with the doom intended for her and with my plan for saving her; it is needless to say that she nearly fainted when she learnt that she had been duped, but notwithstanding the horror of it, she declined at first to permit me to take her place in the procession, and it was not until she had been repeatedly assured that I had taken proper precautions that she consented.

"It wanted one hour to midday when the procession stopped in front of the house of Naski. Instead of the proposed victim, it was I who—enveloped in a veil and a mantle—stepped forth and took the seat in the litter.

"I will not stop to describe my feelings during the march to the temple; I saw nothing of what was going on, for I was absorbed in what might happen when I was conducted into the vault.

"I dimly remember some sort of formality when I reached the temple, but my faculties began to awaken only when I was descending the steps under the guidance of the priest.

"I could not see whither I was going, for I was in total darkness. When we reached the floor of the vault, I was led along it for a few yards and then bidden to lie flat on a stone which I could feel with my foot, and await the pleasures of paradise.

"As I lay there I was divided in opinion concerning the course I should take. I might leave the stone and grope my way up the stairs, trusting to luck for a chance to escape; before they could discover that their victim had eluded them, I might get away with Naski. But then the Karsi would still live to drink of human blood. On the other hand, if I could kill the dreadful plant, I should save many lives even though I might lose my own. In the end I resolved to go through the ordeal.

"My deliberation was brief, but I had only just arrived at a decision when I felt something gripping me in different parts of the body. I covered my face and neck with my arms in order to protect them as far as possible and then waited in awful suspense.

"Tighter and tighter the horrible things compressed my body; one cord or tentacle had such a tight grip of my left leg that I feared it would be broken, while another twisted itself round my bare wrist. The pain was as great as the mental agony; I feared that my plan had failed and that my end had come, when the tentacles began to loosen. I breathed again and waited, yet still wondering whether the poison had taken effect upon the plant. Some minutes passed ere I could be quite sure, and then with my free arm and hand I groped for my knife and cut myself free.

"The Karsi was dead; so far I had been successful, but I now had to get clear of the temple and the city. I had reached the foot of the stairs when the door at the top was thrown open and a flood of light revealed me to the priest who stood in the doorway, scimitar in hand.

"With a howl of rage he leapt down the steps. I quickly stepped aside and struck him a heavy blow as he reached the bottom, felling him senseless. Then I bounded up the steps and through the door, which I closed behind me.

"Cries of astonishment and fear arose as I walked through the street and the people shrank from me, which was fortunate. It was also lucky that Keshub had kept near the temple, for I might have chosen the wrong street and so upset my scheme. He came to my side, brandishing a scimitar, and bade me run before the people recovered from their amazement.

"We ran as hard as we could, cutting down the few who tried to bar our way, and reached the house of Naski in safety. Here we found the lovely Persian and the Hindoo woman waiting, and without a moment's delay we were off to the palm tree.

"Over the wall and across the black stream on a raft prepared by Keshub; and just as we reached the opposite bank we heard the loud howls of vengeance uttered by the sect that worshipped the Karsi.

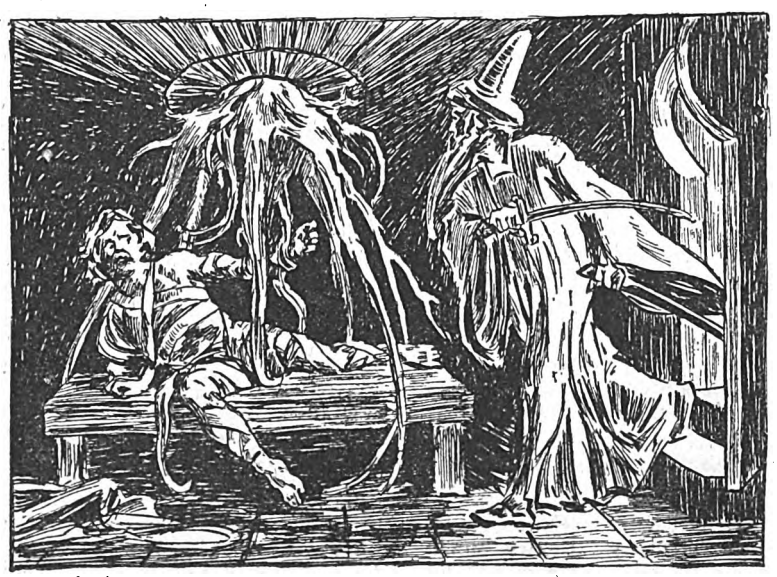
"We sped along through the tunnels, placing such obstacles as we could in the path of probable pursuers. As we neared the spot where the two Armenians had disappeared, we heard a rumbling, which made Keshub hurry us along at a still greater speed.

"'It is the earthquake!' cried the Hindoo.

"Across the mouth of the crater we sped, dreading every second that we should be swallowed up. We could hear the crash of buildings and the shrieks of terror even at that distance. Over the outer wall of rocks and down the mountain side we stumbled, and rested not until we reached the dwelling of the shepherd.

"By the time we reached Shiraz it had become clear to me that I could not live without Naski, and on questioning her I found that she was of the same opinion regarding myself."

G. A. Dray.



"I felt something gripping me in different parts of the body."

Digitized by Google

Solving the Jelly Problem.

No housewife who has wasted time and effort in attempting to make Table Jellies by the old troublesome and expensive method can fail to appreciate the economy and high excellence of Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies. Instead of facing the difficulty of ascertaining the correct quantities of the various materials used, and the further trouble of straining and flavouring, the modern housewife takes her packet of Chivers' Jelly, and without loss of time or trouble and at a minimum of expense, she produces a dainty dish fit for any table. Clear, sparkling, with the fragrance and flavour of ripe fruit, Chivers' Jellies are indeed a dessert to grace a feast. Prepared under ideal conditions of cleanliness and purity, they represent the highest excellence, and that the public recognise and appreciate this fact is well evidenced by the wide popularity of these delicacies. Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are nourishing, refreshing, and cooling, just the thing for large dinner parties and children's gatherings. Dr. Andrew Wilson writes: "Chivers' Jellies cannot be surpassed." A lady writes to her grocer as follows: "When I order Jellies, please always send Chivers', as cook says they are so much better"; whilst the Lancet, confesses them to be "an excellent Jelly, possessing a flavour of quite a natural character."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of post-card to S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

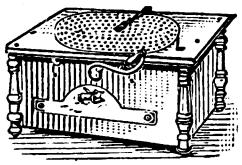
EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 182S High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

RUPTURE

Gentleman (cured himself) will send Free Particulars of inexpensive self-curative treatment. Stamped address.—(Box 49), 59 Castle Street, Carlisle.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street London, W.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

GUN. 12-bore double barrelled breech-loader, top lever, central fire, rebounding locks, extension rib, walnut pistol stock, new; 38/- approval.—G. V. James, 48 Devonshire Street, Bloomsbury, London.

NOSE Wintry weather makes Red Noses. I cure them. Send 1/ for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEBS RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

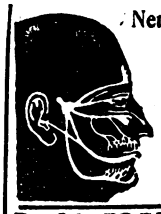
HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

GEO. R. SIMS' "TATCHO."

4/6 TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY 1/10

Address—GEO. R. SIMS CO., 81c GREAT QUEEN STREET, LONDON, W.C.



Neuralgia Positively Cured!

Free Test Offered.

The annexed cut presents in the prominent white lines the nerves most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. Sufferers will know only too well the pain tracks, and will be glad to know of a Simple and Sure Remedy. The proprietors will send Free two sample Zox Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped envelope to ZOX CO., 11 HATTON GARDEN, LONDON E.C.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO., 59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London W.C.

WHY BE FAT?

When a lady, who has discovered a simple means of Self-Cure will be happy to send particulars of same to any sufferer from this distressing complaint. Free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. ADDRESS:

Mrs. TREVOR WELLS, 63 HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.

THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.

Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.

SOLE AGENT:

GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.

Price 2/9 post free.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business. GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

TOO STOUT.

I was for years by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lbs., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

FREE. FREE. NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10/- Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5). 232 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, SHORT STORIES, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, December 3rd, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 247.

THOUGH in stature the smallest, I blush to confess
That by increasing my length you make me still less.
What am I?

No. 248.

THE following letters, when re-arranged, will give a well-known proverb:

A B C E HH I K L M N OOOOOO P R SS TTT Y.

No. 249.

MY SECOND by my FIRST is worn;
Of my FIRST'S life, my WHOLE'S a term.

No. 250.

I AM a double comfort to the poor, but I never visit the rich; I dwell in every town in the world, but never in a village; I assist the robber as well as the honest; I live in a house, and sit on the floor, but never on a chair; I assist the corn to grow, but never the grass; now, if you have not yet found me out, but wish to see me, you will not have to look beyond the door for me.

No. 251.

FROM equivalents of the following form a word-square, the diagonals of which will give the names of two of the most important commercial rivers in the world.

A method of driving two or more horses; divided amongst a number; what regimental pioneers wear; order; a carrier; part of a verb, meaning to desire.

No. 252.

THE first you must take is the name of a man;
Next the name of an implement find if you can;
Then a part of your body, not far from your head,
And also a metal (but I do not mean lead).
The next is an article used by housewives,
Then the leaves of a plant which mothers do prize.
The FINALS of these should backwards be read—
But with the INITIALS begin at the head;
And if they together be uttered by you,
They'll tell what now you are trying to do.

FOOTBALL WHO'S WHO.

Cloth, price 1s. net.

Post Free 1s. 3d.

Contains the biographies of nearly 1,000 of the best-known players, together with statistics and much general information relating to all the prominent Association Clubs. It gives information as to the various leagues, cups, and other trophies, rules, fixtures, etc., etc., and will be found invaluable to all followers of football.

Copies may be had from any Bookseller or from the Publisher,

17 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

DID YOU EVER SEE

Twenty Teazer?

IT'S COMING

Next Week.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

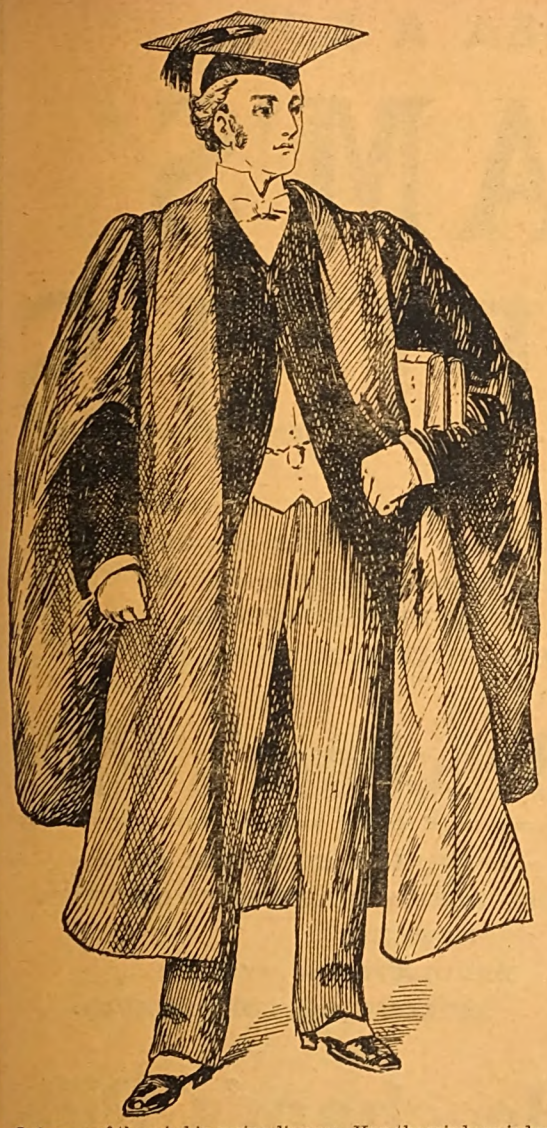
Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " "	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half " "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate. Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Nov. 27th, if intended for the issue on sale Dec. 11th, and dated December 15th. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



A BOOK THAT IS NOT A NOVEL.

"Not a novel! Then who wants to read it? People only read novels and newspapers nowadays." That is what you say immediately. But for once you are wrong. At the present moment hundreds of thousands of people are turning over, and eagerly reading, the pages of a book that is not a novel. They are telling their friends about it, and very soon every one will be reading the book that is not a novel. If you want to be interested, if you want to be instructed, if you want to live long, if you want to be healthy, if you want to be beautiful, you must read the book that is not a novel. What is it called? What does it cost? Where can I get it? What is it all about? It is called "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." By Professor Boyd Laynard. Its cost to readers of Short Stories is One Shilling and Sixpence (post paid). You can get it from Hammond, Hammond, and Co., 19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London. What is it all about? It is a practical guide to beauty, health, and long life. It is a book to read through with interest and profit. It is a book to refer to when in difficulty or doubt. It is a book for the lady to keep on her toilet-table. It is a book for the business man to have at hand when the strain and worry of work threaten his health. It is a book for the young to read, in order that they may get the most out of life, and live to grow old. It is a book for the old to read in order that they may feel young. Among the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Boyd Laynard's work, the following are but a few (a complete syllabus showing the contents of the whole 127 chapters enumerating upwards of 500 subjects, and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers):

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Effects of heat, cold, and changes of temperature upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relation to health—Baths and bathing; their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its culture and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their nature, prevention and treatment—Indigestion—Constipation—Neuralgia—Rheumatism—Nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—The mental, moral, physical, and external influences that are conducive to long life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

"The Most Remarkable Work of the Present Century."

Vide THE PRESS.

ORDER FORM 415,216.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & CO.,
19, 21 & 23 LUDGATE HILL, LONDON, E.C.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

Digitized by Google

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

OVER 6,000,000 BOXES SOLD ANNUALLY.

CURE BILIOUS and NERVOUS DISORDERS, CONSTIPATION, SICK HEADACHE, INDIGESTION, DYSPEPSIA, And all STOMACHIC TROUBLES.

PURIFY the BLOOD and REMOVE SCURVY, ARE MILD but EFFECTIVE in their action, Remove the Result of OVER-INDULGENCE. CURE RESTLESSNESS and INSOMNIA.

Beecham's Pills

REMOVE WIND and PAINS in the Stomach, AROUSE SLUGGISH and TORPID LIVERS, Ensure Proper Assimilation of FOOD, STRENGTHEN the STOMACH.

Beecham's Pills

Are SPECIALLY SUITABLE for the DISEASES and AILMENTS COMMON to FEMALES, REGULATE the SYSTEM, IMPROVE the COMPLEXION.

Beecham's Pills

Make you LOOK well, FEEL well, and KEEP well, REMOVE PIMPLES and BLOTCHES on the SKIN. LAY the Foundation of GOOD HEALTH, SUITABLE for OLD and YOUNG.

Beecham's Pills

Have stood the Test of over FIFTY YEARS without the Publication of Testimonials. Parents recommend them to their Children, Friends recommend them to one another, and BEECHAM'S PILLS recommend themselves.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills), with Full Directions.

Digitized by Google

NEWSAGENT GETS ONE OF THE £10 NOTES.

SHORT STORIES
A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 622. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 1ST, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

A STRAW-BLOCKER AND

DR. TIBBLES' Vi-Cocoa

HIS MATES NOW USE VI-COCOA.

MR. M. A. PEARCE, care of Mrs. Sygrove, Wheathampstead Road, Harpenden:—"I feel I must let you know that I have been taking Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa with excellent results. I am a straw-blocker at St. Albans, working in a very hot place, and used to be very easily knocked up. I used to drink a lot of beer while at work, but that did me no good. About two months ago I tried Vi-Cocoa, and after a week found I could work much better and longer, and I have used it ever since. I have also persuaded some of my mates to try it, and I think they are of the same opinion as myself. I feel a different man from what I used to when I have finished work. You can use this if you wish."

"Undoubted purity and strength."—Medical Magazine. "In the front rank of really valuable foods."—Lancet.

DAINTY SAMPLE TIN FREE TO ANY ADDRESS.

Address: Dr. TIBBLES' VI-COCOA Ltd., 60 BUNHILL ROW, LONDON, E.C.

DAINTY SAMPLE FREE

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

Model 313. Tailor designed Reefer Coat and full-wide Skirt, well made & finished. Price complete, 10/6. Carriage, 6d. Or the Skirt alone for 5/6. Carriage 5d.

THE John Noble

Costumes and Mantles sent by Parcel Post, safely packed. Satisfaction given or money refunded.

PATTERNS SENT POST FREE.

A FULL DRESS LENGTH of Costume Coating or Cheviot Serge, in which the Costumes are made (6 yards, 52 inches wide) for 7/6; carriage 8d. 7/6 Colours: Black, Navy, Myrtle, Brown, Fawn, Khaki, Grey, and Royal Blue.

Sizes in Stock of Ladies' Costumes are: 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms); Waists 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, and 42 in. long in front. Any other size made to measure, 1/6 extra.

JOHN NOBLE KNOCKABOUT FROCKS.

Thoroughly well made in Good Strong Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves and pocket.

Length and Prices:
21in. 24in. 27in. 30in. 33in.
1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6
36in. 39in. 42in. 45in.
4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6 each
Carriage, 4d. extra.

Please name Short Stories when writing to

JOHN NOBLE Ltd.,

BROOK STREET MILLS,

Dept. No. 46, MANCHESTER.

TO THE QUEEN
PURVEYORS

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA. GRAVY. JULIENNE. MULLIGATAWNY. TOMATO. HOUSEHOLD, CRESSY, &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NOSE

Wintry weather makes Red Noses. I cure them. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

TOO STOUT

I was for years; by chance I came across a simple home remedy that reduced me from 17st. to 10st. 12lb., and I will willingly send particulars free to any sufferer enclosing stamp. Mrs. L. E. FELL, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER.

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 89 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

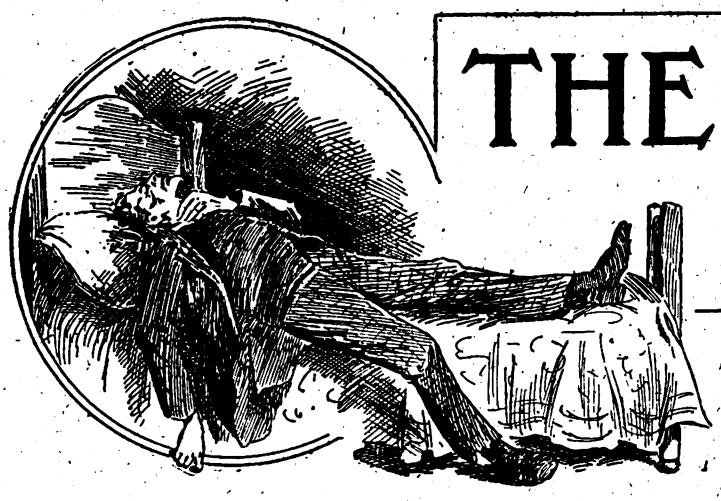
Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



THE NEW SUPER

THE stage-manager was fagged out. He came hurriedly upon the stage, took off his hat and coat, and threw them to the call-boy, who hung them on an electric light bracket. Then he drew a deep breath and looked about him.

It was a fearfully hot morning; no one seemed in the humour for work, the stage was in semi-darkness, the smell of the burning size was almost intolerable, and the crowd of supers who were now to begin learning their "business" for the forthcoming spectacular piece looked anything but intelligent to the calculating eyes of the stage-manager.

He sat astride his chair and faced the men who were waiting instructions. Such a sorry, shabby lot they looked—did anyone ever see such woeful old hats, or such greenish, greasy coats as they wore—and each man to his fellow bore the strange resemblance that clean shaven men usually do to one another.

The stage-manager snapped his fingers to attract attention.

"Now then, the opening scene! Beginners, please."

The supers began walking up and down the stage, laughing, shaking hands, slapping each other on the shoulder, button-holing each other in a dull, mechanical manner.

"Stop!" cried the stage-manager. "Stop, that won't do!"

The men were motionless in an instant.

"I should like you to understand, if you can," he went on, "that you are all"—here he ran his malicious light-blue eyes over the group—"supposed to be men of good position, in the best of society, walking in a fashionable street amusing yourselves, meeting, talking, and so on. Have you got that into your heads?"

The men murmured assent—at least the stage-manager regarded the murmur in that light.

"Well," he continued grimly, "you will oblige me—I pay you for it, remember; this isn't a charitable institution, you know—you will oblige me by trying to follow my instructions. This is the cue: 'Now do your worst—go!' See?"

The men began again the weary business of posing as gentlemen in good positions.

"Now then, now then!" the manager jumped upon his chair in order to obtain a better view. "Great Scott!" he groaned. "For goodness' sake, look as if you were alive! Spread about a little, can't you? Smile and open your mouths; don't look as if you had stepped out of a waxwork show!

"Don't go about there, Williams, as if you had paralysis and D.T.'s mixed. Edwards, you're sneaking round there at the back like a pickpocket. Come out of that corner, you new fellows! Dress the stage, I tell you! You're all together like a lot of sardines in a box! Run through that business again."

Again and again the men went through the scene till the manager raised his hand in sign of dismissal.

"Next act!" called the stage-manager.

Then he read three names aloud, and in answer three tall men stepped upon the stage.

The stage-manager motioned with his lead pencil for them to stand in line and then examined them critically.

"You'll do," he said to the tallest and most stalwart of the three, "you other two are not quite up to height, you may go."

The man selected stood listening to the stage-manager's directions attentively. He was a tall old fellow, with a fine face that seemed to have a story in it. It was easy to see that he had once occupied a good social position.

"What did you say your name was?" asked the manager.

"Hol——"

The man stopped abruptly and hesitated; then he continued:

"Parker, sir."

"Harker, eh? Speak up."

"Parker, sir," answered the man in a slightly louder tone.

A titter ran through the line of supers; the new man was being put through his facings. They remembered their own experience and enjoyed seeing another go through it.

"Now, then, Parker," said the manager, "you are to play the flunkey. Your part isn't very heavy—not much 'fat' in it—you've only got two words to say. You enter on the O.P. side—opposite prompt side—and announce 'Lady Claudia' that's the lot. You will take as your cue this sentence. 'Call my carriage.' from the leading lady. You see her over there in the hat with the pink feathers in it. You come in, say 'Lady Claudia,' bow, and make your exit up stage, walking backwards."

"Yes, sir," said Parker, looking a little mystified.

He turned his head in the direction in which the stage-manager had jerked the point of his pencil—towards the leading lady.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

As Parker's eyes fell upon her, she paused in her animated conversation with the principal actor and half turned her face in the direction of the new super, without, however, noticing him.

Parker stared at her for a moment as if unable to believe his eyes; then his face went as white as a sheet and he staggered back like one who has received a blow.

"What's the matter with the man?" exclaimed the stage-manager appealing to no one in particular. "What's the matter with you, man? Had too much to drink so early as this? By the look of your clothes I should say you haven't been able to muster enough to get a breakfast, to say nothing of drink!"

He sat astride his chair.

The man's white face flushed at these words.

He drew himself up and intimated with a gesture that he was ready to perform the not too heavy part assigned to him.

"Very good. Take up your cue, watch for it, pay attention."

Parker stood at the wings.

The call-boy—who, by the way, was a man—passed him once or twice and looked at his white, drawn face.

"Poor beggar! I am dashed if he don't look half-starved," he muttered.

The next time he passed he beckoned the new super to a dark corner, and held out a can of beer to him.

"Take a pull at this, father," said the man, with an encouraging jerk of his sandy head. "Do, mate, it'll do yer good."

The elderly super shook his head and stared in front of him vacantly.

"Wot, you won't have it? You ain't frightened of a drop of four 'alf makin' yer forget that heavy part of yours? I can't think what made yer take on this job. Was yer ever in a theatre before—straight?"

"No," returned the new super sadly.

"Couldn't get another job, I s'pose? Well, you ain't got the makin's of a star, an' the sooner you get an easier job the better."

The call-boy again held out the can, and the man suddenly took it and drank a few mouthfuls.

"'Ere, 'ave a drop more! Why, you ain't 'ad enough yet to wet yer whistle! That's right,"—as the new super took the can once more—"it'll sharpen you up." And off he went to the property room.

"Parker," shouted the stage-manager, "Mr. S's entrance. Watch for your cue."

Mr. S. entered, the lady with the pink feathers entered a few seconds later; she and Mr. S. began mumbling to each other up stage.

Suddenly the lady of the pink feathers raised her voice, and said:

"Call my carriage!"

"Parker, your cue!" shouted the stage-manager.

"Yes," said Parker, speaking in a dazed manner.

His eyes were fixed on the leading lady, but he made no attempt to go through his part.

"Your cue, man, your cue!" shouted the stage-manager, red in the face.

Parker stood stupidly, and as if they were speaking in a strange language. The other supers made signs to him to go on the stage, but he did not move.

The stage-manager bounded from his chair.

"Get on the stage, I tell you," he cried, and he put his hands on the man's shoulders and pushed him into position. "Now you, sir, remember your cue for the future."

Those who were near saw him flush a dull red, and his hands clenched, but he straightened himself in an instant, announced "Lady Claudia," turned his back to the footlights, and went off the stage in that manner when he should have bowed himself backward.

There was a hush in the theatre, the stage-manager got up slowly, and ran his fingers through his hair.

He was not a hard man by any means this stage-manager, he would do a good turn for anyone; as he said himself, "he'd never see a poor beggar want," but on the stage he was a martinet, and unless people were bright and smart he used bad language—without it, he said, bullock driving and stage management were impossible; besides, it was his living. He had a hard task master himself, one who expected all and forgave nothing—he had his public to please.

"Parker!" he yelled. "Come back!"

"Yes, sir."

"Take hold of my hand."

He held out a beringed hand that might have been a woman's, and the old man took it stupidly.

"Give the cue," said the stage manager.

"Call my carriage!" shouted the prompter.

The stage-manager and Parker walked on the stage, hand in hand, step by step they came.

"Now bow, bow, bow, I tell you!"

Together the two men bent their backs.

"Now—'Lady Claudia.' Say it after me," said the stage-manager.

"Lady Claudia," echoed Parker mechanically, and in a tone that indicated how distant were his thoughts.

He was looking fixedly at the leading lady, who, with a slight flush on her cheeks, was returning his gaze with an expression of mingled haughtiness and contempt.

"Now get off the stage and do it yourself," said the stage-manager. "I see I've got to teach you like one of the pantomime children. Now, sir, again, again, again!"

Poor Parker went over the entrance, the announcement, the bowing himself out, till even the brow-beaten supers sympathised with him. But Parker himself went through the performance more like a senseless machine than a human being.

Digitized by Google

"To-morrow at ten, we will resume this interesting study," said the stage-manager, "and those who have cues, see that you take them up."

Parker went out with the rest of the supernumeraries, but he declined their offers to take a drink with them and moved off slowly in the opposite direction.

When they were out of the narrow street, he turned and hastily retraced his steps towards the stage-door, stopping a few paces from it.

A few minutes afterwards he saw the leading lady emerge from the door and he followed her at a short distance.

He maintained this respectful distance until she entered a side street which had a dead wall on each side for half its length. Then he quickened his steps, caught her up and touched her on the shoulder.

She turned with a start, and, on seeing who it was, uttered an exclamation of anger and recoiled.

"Don't shrink from me, Amy!" pleaded the new super. "I wish to say a few words to you."

"I will have nothing to do with you. Why do you come near me to disgrace me? Have you not brought enough trouble already on your daughter? Go away!"

It was Parker's turn to shrink back. For a moment he covered his face with his hands, while Amy, taking advantage of this, turned to hurry away.

Aroused by the movement, Parker dropped his hands and stopped her once more.

"Amy, I swear that I went to the theatre by accident and not to follow you. I did not know you were there; I have not heard of you for so long. I am starving and that was the only chance I had of earning a shilling or two. Now that I have met you, I ask you to help me."

The woman shut her lips tightly and shook her head.

"You married my mother and then despised her because she was not of the same station as yourself, and you drove her away by your harsh treatment to do the best she could for herself and me."

"I did not. It was an ill-fated union; I was infatuated with her and she married me for my position. I tried to raise her up to it, but she took to drink and disgraced me in the eyes of everyone. Then I failed in my speculations, and she taunted me because I had come down in the world. Then she left me. Heaven knows I would not have said this—I would have respected the memory of the dead—but your cruel words forced it from me."

"That is your view," sneered the leading lady, her tone and manner savouring of the theatre. "If you had done what you ought, I should have been well brought up—I should have been a lady in high society, instead of acting on the stage of a cheap theatre. Have I anything to thank you for?"

"Had your mother left you with me," said Parker earnestly, "I would have done my best for you, but I seldom knew anything of her and I never knew where she left you. I saw your mother only from time to time, when she wished to get money from me, and then she would track me by bothering my relatives for my address until they gave it to her in order to get rid of such a woman. It was not until you were grown up that I saw you again, and then you would not come near me."

"It's all false; another of your trumped-up stories to cover your own doings. You talk of bringing disgrace! How long have you been out of prison? Who stole the pocket-book with the bank notes?"

"I swear by everything sacred that I did not steal it!" said Parker vehemently. "I have said enough against your mother, and I have no wish to say any more. We were found together near the house of the relative from whom it was stolen—he had foolishly placed it on the hall table and forgotten it. They said that I had incited her to take it, but I had only just met her, and, seeing the book in her hand, had wrested it from her in order to restore it. Your mother was let off because she was ill; she died, so they tell me, just before my trial came on and I was sent to penal servitude."

Amy had listened with her lips curled in contemptuous disbelief.

"It's false, every word of it! It is all of a piece with the other things you have done. You have never been a father to me, and I won't have you disgracing me now. Do you hear? If you keep that place as super at the theatre, I'll make your life a misery to you! Mark my words, for when I say a thing I mean it!"

"Take a pull at this, father," said the man.

Then, without another look at the wretched man, she hurried away.

Parker sat down on the kerb and wept. His mind went back over the story, the evidence of which was written so plainly on his features; an ill-starred marriage

Digitized by Google

"That is your view," sneered the leading lady.

with one of inferior social standing, an uneducated woman whose head was turned by fortune and who took to drink, a woman fair to look upon, but bad at heart; loss of fortune, followed by the degradation of prison for an act of which he was innocent.

He had struggled to keep above water since he had been liberated, but to-day's experience—the indignity to which he had been subjected at the hands of the stage-manager and the interview with his daughter—were too hard to bear. He

---

"Hallo! Wot, ain't yer got nothin' to do but sit on the kerb an' snivel?"

It was the voice of the call-boy. He shook the old man gently and helped him to get up.

"'Ere, you come along with me and 'ave something to eat."

The rehearsal was in full swing next morning. In the orchestra they were playing softly. The supers were resting while the principals gabbled through their parts.

The stage-manager darted up now and then, and ran round them like a sheep-dog, finding fault, suggesting, grouping them afresh as the fancy took him. The scene progressed till the cue was given by the leading lady.

"Call my carriage!"

No one took up the cue. Everyone was at a standstill.

"That's Parker's cue. Parker! Parker! Where's Parker?" called the stage-manager. "Anyone seen him this morning?"

"I've seen him," said the call-boy.

"What's the matter with him? Why isn't he here?"

"He told me yesterday," continued the call-boy, "that if 'e didn't turn up this morning, the leading lady would explain why."

The stage-manager looked from one to another in bewilderment.

"But you said you had seen him this morning," he said angrily to the call-boy.

"So I 'ave," was the quiet reply. "I didn't like the appearance of him yesterday, so I went this morning to the place where he 'ad a bed."

"Well, what's wrong? Why doesn't he come?" inquired the stage-manager.

"'Cos he's dead. He killed himself yesterday afternoon after the rehearsal!"

George Knight.

AMONGST MANY OTHER GOOD THINGS IN THE

CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER of SHORT STORIES will be the opening chapters of

"THE LOST LADY DELIA,"

A GRAND NEW SERIAL by LOUIS TRACY.

Digitized by Google

How Mr. Nicholson Mislaid the Baby.

MRS. NICHOLSON was standing in a dubious attitude, with the study door half-open, and her eyes turning from the quiet figure in the armchair by the table, to another open door in the passage behind her, through which she could see a flood of sunshine, and in the sunshine a cradle.

"I don't feel quite easy," she said, "I am so afraid she should cry and no one hear her. I wish I had not let nurse go out; but all you have to do," coming into the room and speaking impressively, "all you have to do is to ring the bell violently—violently, remember—for cook. For Heaven's sake, John," leaning on the table and stretching out a pretty hand to attract her husband's attention, "look up, or speak, or answer me, or you will drive me mad."

"What is it all about, Agatha?"

The calm, placid, intelligent face opposite was lifted gently, and the thin finger was slipped on to the page to mark a pause.

"It is baby, John," said Mrs. Nicholson in a faltering voice, and with idle, angry tears rolling down her cheeks. "Here have I, for the last ten minutes, been begging and imploring of you to remember baby; not to nurse her, I wouldn't trust you, but only to ring the bell if she cries."

"Does that stop her? It seems simple enough. I think even I could do that."

But Mrs. Nicholson shook her head, still weeping.

"You may laugh at me or sneer if you like. If it were my own baby I would say nothing, I would bear it all; but Emmy's!"

With a patient sigh the gentleman at the writing-table pushed the book away, and lost his place. He looked at her in a bewildered way.

"What is it Agatha? a baby! oh, Emmy's baby, of course."

"And not one half, one hundredth, one thousandth part as valuable in your eyes," broke in Agatha, with impetuosity, "as the smallest, the most unknown, the most undiscovered star. You need not tell me; I know it."

"Of course," frowning gently, "everyone knows that a star, hower small—stars are not famous according to their size, my dear—is of infinitely more value than one hair of a baby's head. I mean," hastily, "speaking from the entirely scientific point of view; but as you were saying, were you not," a little doubtfully, "something about that unfortunate babe of Emmy's?"

Mrs. Nicholson had dried her eyes, and was confronting him in all the cool splendour of her summer's dress, and with all the calm determination of a woman who has made up her mind.

"Yes, I was," she said; "only, once for all, John, if you call it a babe, I will leave your house at once, and never, never come back; and if you call it unfortunate, I will take that hateful MS. with me and burn it at the kitchen fire. If it were yours," with impassioned irony, "it might indeed be described as unfortunate; but Charles is the best of fathers, and he has always been the best of husbands."

"Yes, yes, of course, my dear. I said nothing against Charles; I did not know we were talking about him. We can finish him up to-night," cheerfully. "If that is all, you had better go out now, while it is fine," turning his eyes to the dazzling sunlight for an instant, and then back to his blotted page. "You can tell me about Charles, you know, when you come in. The best of husbands! I don't know much about them, I fear, but I know a little about the best of wives."

He rose, and laid his hand on the long, slender, soft grey glove that was lying with determination on his neat manuscript. The grey glove closed round his hand gently and clung to him, almost as if it were loth to leave the thin worn fingers; but he patted it gently and laid it aside.

Mrs. Nicholson gave a faint sigh, but when she spoke again, she spoke with less decision and more pleading.

"It is not Charles, indeed it is not; it is the baby. Nurse has gone out, and I have put her cradle in the morning-room, by the window. John," suddenly, "are you listening? What did I say last?"

"The morning-room, Agatha."

"Well," with a sigh of relief, "I see you are taking it in, and forgetting those horrible stars; and how you can compare a star to a baby," parenthetically, "is past me."

"I am sure I never did," he said gently.

"Well, don't interrupt me, John, or I shall never get out. What was I saying? Oh, baby is in the morning-room, and if she cries—makes one sound—you are to ring your bell—this bell, John—for cook; do you understand?"

"Yes, I believe so. I am to ring the bell—this bell—for cook."

"Oh, I hope you will," after a pause. "Fancy," her eyes filling with tears again, "if she cried, and no one heard her! Oh, John, you will not deceive me? You will try—and—ring?"

Digitized by Google

"My dear," speaking with some dignity, "surely I am not utterly destitute of common humanity or common sense. I have interesting work here," pointing to the manuscript and the books of reference heaped around him; "but I suppose, after all, I am human."

"Oh, I hope so, I think so," cried Agatha, clasping her hands; "only you might not hear her, that was all I meant."

"Then, I think," he said, with a gently sarcastic smile, "that you may dismiss your fears; they are quite groundless."

"Very well," said Agatha, moving in a hesitating way to the door. "I am satisfied, I am trying to be satisfied; don't forget."

"No," cheerfully, "I will take a leaf from Charles's book, the best of husbands."

"Oh,"—the grey glove had closed on the handle of the door, but released it again—"the Paynters are coming to-night, so you must not go out star-gazing."

"All right," obediently; "good-bye."

"Good-bye."

The bright face, that had almost disappeared round the door, came back again, and leant against the worn velveteen of the astronomer's coat; for a minute the lips were pressed to it, then lifted.

"Kiss me, John; you are a dear old fellow after all, and I am a fiend."

The sunshine seemed to leave the room with the sweet bright presence, and hover over the pretty cradle, amongst the sounds and scents of the midsummer day. In the library there was only one shaft of light that came through the high windows, and fell across the old velveteen coat, and the tidy manuscripts, and the open books, and left the handsome, clever, refined face in shadow.

It might have been two hours afterwards—painful after events created a confusion in Mr. Nicholson's mind, and the two hours might have been two days—when he became aware of a laugh in the passage by the door.

His hand had grown tired with writing, but the pen travelled steadily on; his eyes had grown a little tired, and it was a relief to raise them for a minute to the locked door, behind which he heard the laugh. He rose, with a half-smile on his grave face, and paused, struck by a sudden presentiment.

Something came back to him, as he stood in the dull light of the dull room; was it a dream, or a memory, or was it—the baby? He pushed his papers hurriedly away and walked over to the door, and unlocked it, throwing it wide open.

There was nothing in the passage but the yellow sunlight now upon the walls and on the old prints, and Mrs. Nicholson standing in her pretty grey dress, with her slim hands stretched out, and the laugh that had disturbed him still upon her lips.

In the room beyond there was more sunlight and the cradle.

"John," cried Mrs. Nicholson, laughing again as if she could not help it, "what have you done with her? Give her to me. You are earning your title to the best of husbands."

He looked up in quick perplexity.

"What is it, Agatha? What do you want? I have nothing to give you."

"Oh don't, John," she cried impatiently, "don't tease! I want baby."

"Well"—the same perplexed look creeping over his face, and softening its sternness—"take her," stretching out his hand to the cradle in the sunlight.

Agatha's eyes were turned on him for a minute with a look of contempt before which he positively quailed. Then she swept over to the cradle, and tossed out the little pillow, and the sheets with their lace edges, and the pale-blue satin coverlet on to the floor in a soft heap, and stood looking down upon the empty cradle as if she would conjure up the pink face and the flaxen head into their accustomed place.

Mr. Nicholson had followed her on tiptoe, and was stirring the softly shining heap on the floor with his patent-leather shoes, as if he half-imagined that she had tossed the baby out amongst them.

"Well?" said Agatha sharply.

"Well?" he echoed feebly.

"Do you mean to say," she said, putting aside her angry vehemence and speaking tearfully, with her grey eyes turned up to his, "Oh, John, do you mean to say that you have lost her?"

"I never touched her," he cried hastily, "I never—" heard her he would have added, but again the faint memory—that dream—stirred him. "Upon my honour, Agatha," he said abruptly, leaning down into the cradle and poking at the mattress with his thin fingers, "upon my honour, I can't remember."

"You can't remember," said Agatha with slow scorn. "Why, John she roared! Cook heard her in the kitchen. She came rushing up and found the cradle empty, and baby gone; she thought you had taken her into the study, she told me so; but, oh, John, it was somebody else, and they have stolen her!"

"My dear," he said, shaking himself together, and speaking more lightly, "who would steal her?—a baby roaring, as you say!" He shuddered. "Why, surely no one in his senses would do such a thing!"

"Emmy's baby!" cried Agatha tearfully, "and that is how you speak of her! Oh, John, dear John, think again; didn't you hear her? Perhaps you have forgotten—perhaps you have put her somewhere, and she has gone to sleep. Sit down, John, and think—perhaps you have put her somewhere and forgotten."

Mr. Nicholson sat down on the window-sill, and covered his face with his hands. He tried to think, but whenever he concentrated his mind on the baby he was dimly conscious of that fading fancy that he could not grasp—that dream of a cry.

It had disturbed him, he remembered, that loud, painful, jarring cry, but it had died away; surely it had died into peace without his interference?

"Agatha," he said, lifting up his face, sharpened with the effect of thought, "I do remember something—somebody crying; it must have been the babe."

"Yes," said Agatha eagerly, "go on! you heard her! that is right—cook says you must have heard her, she roared so—well, and then? You——"

"I—I can't remember, Agatha. I may have gone on writing, that seems the most likely, I think; but I may have gone to the door. No," shaking his head, "I can't get beyond the cry. I do remember that now, distinctly."

"Perhaps," said Agatha hopefully, through her tears, "you have put her somewhere in the library. What have you been doing or using this afternoon?"

Mr. Nicholson followed humbly as she swept in before him, and flung open the great curtains, so that the light rushed in on to his table strewed with plans and MS. Even then he spread out his hands, almost unconsciously, to defend his precious papers from her light scornful touch; but she stood in the centre of the room, looking into every corner with her quick, soft eyes.

Digitized by Google

"What have you used, John—this chair? You have not been to the cupboard? No," peeping into a dark recess, musty with papers. "What else?"

"Nothing else, Agatha, here, except," with a quick smile, "the waste-paper basket, and that is empty. You can see for yourself."

"Ah," said Agatha, "here is cook," as a heavy breathing became audible in the passage. "Cook," her voice trembling at sight of the sympathetic face, "your master has not seen the baby—at least, he thinks not. He was very busy, but he heard her cry, and he may have taken her up and forgotten. We are looking for her."

"Which you won't never find her, then," said cook in a broken voice. "In my last place but one, where I was general cleaner in Mrs. 'All's family, there was a child disappeared, as it might be this, and it was never found—gipsies or not, it was never come across again."

"Oh don't, cook!" cried Agatha plaintively. "And Emmy coming this evening! Your master thinks he may have put her somewhere and forgotten. He remembers hearing her."

"Which he might," said cook, "not being deaf. Which I don't mean no disrespect, sir, but she was roaring awful; and I says to Mary, says I, 'Master'll never know 'ow to quiet that child, so I'll run up and bring her down a bit;' and I stops to change my apron, and I ups as it might be here, and the cradle, as it might be there, and no sound and the cradle as empty as it is at this minute."

Cook turned dramatically, and pointed one stout arm to the little cradle in the sunlight.

Mrs. Nicholson's tearful eyes followed the hand, and her husband stood uneasily in the centre of the group, with an anxious frown upon his face.

"Which," added cook scornfully, "I think a baby—and such a one, bless her—is of more vally than all this rubbish."

She waved her hand over the table, on which lay the neat MS. and the rows of mended pens; and Mr. Nicholson moved instinctively a step backwards, as if she had an evil eye and his writings would shrivel up at her scornful gesture.

"Cook," said Mrs. Nicholson with dignity, marred a little by a quaver in her voice, "you don't understand. Your master is very clever and his writings are of great value. Of course," with a pleading look upwards, "baby is our first thought just now. There are no wild beasts here so she cannot be eaten. But she has gone, and before Emmy comes this evening she must be found."

"Of course she must," said her husband, plucking up courage from her exceeding gentleness. "We will begin systematically, and go through every room in the house."

So the search began, that ended, an hour later, in the great hall with three perplexed faces meeting each other at the foot of the stairs, in a silence that Mrs. Nicholson broke.

"It's no use, John, I cannot bear it any longer. She is lost."

She flung out her empty hands with a despairing gesture, but her husband caught and held them.

"Don't give up, Agatha; it will all come right. If I search the world through I will find her."

"Or the body," said cook.

Mrs. Nicholson shuddered.

The minute's silence was broken by a sound of merry laughter and the trampling of feet. For a minute Agatha raised her head, listening intently, and then she drooped it with a sigh.

"It is only the rectory boys, John," she said; "they have been in the hayfield all day, and I asked them to tea. I can't speak to them, I am too anxious."

She would have moved away, but the noise and laughter were in the hall already, and the boys were stumbling up towards her in the darkness, over the rugs and skins. Something white was being shoved from one to the other, and was pushed into Agatha's arms at last and held there by a pair of rough sunburnt hands.

"What is it? Oh, Jack, what is it?" she cried, bending down and kissing, to their owner's great surprise, the boy's rough hands.

"Don't, I say," said Jack, drawing them away with a curious shamefaced look. "It's only the baby, Mrs. Nicholson. She was crying in the cradle so I just got in and bagged her. She's been playing in the hay; she nearly got jabbed with a rake, but Jim got it instead. She's a jolly little thing. Did you miss her?"

"Yes, I thought she was lost," said Agatha gently.

"Lost!" with a roar of laughter. "Well, that is good! May we wash our hands for tea? I'm not so dirty, I've been ho'ding her; but Jim's simply mud all over. Here, have you got her? it's so dark I can't see."

The turbulent tide swept away into the dim distance of stairs and passages, leaving a little group in the twilight of the hall; a tall dark figure, against which a golden head was leaning, and two arms with a white bundle folded in them.

"Kiss her, John," came a soft voice out of the darkness. "I know you would rather not, she's only a baby, not a star; but just as a punishment, because you were so stupid."

The tall figure stooped, and laid a dark moustache against the little bundle.

"She's very soft," said another voice; "I don't think I ever knew so much about a baby before."

There was, after a moment's silence, a movement on the man's part, as though he were drawing himself up to his full height, with a view to reasserting his dignity. He cleared his throat.

"After all, Agatha," he said stiffly, "I did not lose the baby."

"I never said you did," said Agatha; "I only asked you, and you couldn't remember."

"Another time," with an evident effort, "I suppose I shall be condemned unheard."

"Another time!" scornfully. "You may set your mind at rest. Neither I nor Emmy is in the least likely to trust you again, at least not with anything of value."

"Then how about the baby?" with a laugh.

"That," said Agatha firmly, "includes the baby."

G. B.

THE 20th CENTURY IS COMING, but where will it begin? Who will be the first to see the first sun of the new era? Look in for an answer to this question; the finest Christmas number the world has ever seen.

THE CHRISTMAS PEARSON'S

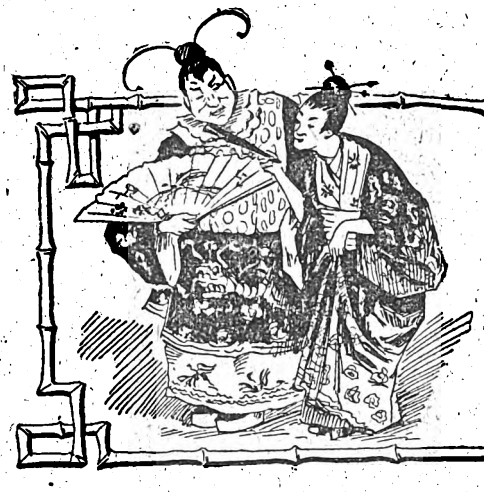
Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXVIII.—HE TRIES AGAIN TO LEARN CYCLING.

WHILE the Bowsers were eating dinner the other evening a package was left at the door, and as they adjourned from the table to the family sitting-room Mr. Bowser opened it and brought forth a sweater, a pair of knee breeches, a belt, and a pair of bicycle shoes and stockings.

"Who are they for?" asked Mrs. Bowser as he displayed the articles with a smile of satisfaction.

"They won't fit you, and I didn't buy them for the cook." he replied.

"But if they are for you, what on earth do you want with them? Three different times within the last two years have you almost killed yourself trying to ride a bike. You will never be able to do it if you live to be a thousand years old."

"Won't I? And why not, please? Am I the only person in the United Kingdom who can't learn to ride a bicycle?"

"You—you are too fat," she protested—"too fat and your legs are too short. You are what they call clumsy. I don't say it to hurt your feelings, but you——"

Ten minutes later he came down rigged out as a Zephyr.

"Exactly, Mrs. Bowser," he interrupted, "I understand your motive. You don't want to hurt my feelings, but you want to convey the impression that I'm an old rhinoceros on wheels or an elephant on skates. I thank you very much and will remember it of you!"

"But you have tried the bike and been almost killed."

"In a careless, casual way I have tried the bike. I tried it as a novelty, and not for my health. I had no interest or ambition It made no difference to me whether I ran up a tree or over a horse and cart. My failures were not failures. I simply fell off the bike and stayed off."

"And is it your health this time?" she asked.

"Purely a question of health, Mrs. Bowser. I am going to ride the bike to save the doctor's and chemist's bills. Brown has kindly volunteered the use of his machine, and I have joined the Zephyr club. We take our first spin this evening. Each spin saves a doctor's bill. Have you anything more to say?"

"Nothing more."

"Then I will go upstairs and get into this suit."

Ten minutes later he came down rigged out as a Zephyr. Mrs. Bowser was annoyed and perturbed, but when she caught sight of him she had to laugh. It was as if a bicycle suit had been put on a beer barrel.

The cat came in from the back yard and took one look at the Zephyr and then made a dive under the sofa.

"Something seems to appeal to your sense of humour," sternly remarked Mr. Bowser as he sat down to put on his shoes.

"I was thinking of Zephyrs," replied Mrs. Bowser as she choked back a laugh.

"Very kind of you, and you shall be rewarded in due time. I might have known just how you would act about it. Whenever the question of my health comes up, you are so determined and obstinate that only one conclusion can be reached. You long to be a widow."

"I hadn't heard that there was anything wrong with your health."

"And why hadn't you? Simply because I am one of those men who can suffer for years and years and never make a complaint. If I should tell you what the doctor told me the other day, you'd be astonished. Perhaps it will be news to you to hear that I have been on the edge of the grave for the last three years."

Digitized by Google

"But now you are going to get away from the edge?"

"I am."

"By running your bike into a kerbstone and being sprawled all over the footpath."

"By thunder, woman," shouted Mr. Bowser as he sprang up and danced round, "do you want to aggravate me till I do something desperate? When did I ever sprawl all over the footpath? I understand your motive in seeking to discourage me, but the plan won't work. I shall go out on the bike for a spin. As a member of the Zephyr club I shall be at the front. I will ride and ride and ride. I will not only ride for the sake of my health, but I will gambol round to have revenge on you. Every evening for the next three months—for the next three years, ten years—I will take a ten mile spin."

Mrs. Bowser sighed, but said no more. He had no sooner left the house than she looked about to see that there were brandy, camphor, hartshorn and mustard in the house.

Brown was waiting with the bicycle at the gate, and he said to Mr. Bowser:

"You have a quarter of an hour yet before the club meets, and you'd better practise up a little. Come round the corner and ride up and down a few times. You've ridden before, haven't you?"

"A few times."

When they had turned the corner and were out of sight of the house, Mr. Bowser made his beginning. He had heard an old rider say that confidence was half the battle. He summoned all his confidence and jumped into the saddle.

After a good deal of clawing he got one pedal, but the other kept out of his way, and the bike wobbled and dodged about and finally banged into the kerb and sent the rider over the handle bar.

Brown looked at him dubiously as he got up and rubbed his bruises, but Mr. Bowser was full of grit.

"I'm a little out of practice," he said in explanation, "but I shall be all right in five minutes. You don't think I'm too fat, do you? Mrs. Bowser says I'm too fat and my legs are too short, but I'll show her before I've finished. Lemme try again."

"Take her right out in the middle of the street and resolve to conquer or die. When you once get on, keep your head."

After two or three vain efforts Mr. Bowser reached the saddle again, and, to his intense surprise, his feet struck the pedals and he was off. A bike sometimes does this in its eccentricity.

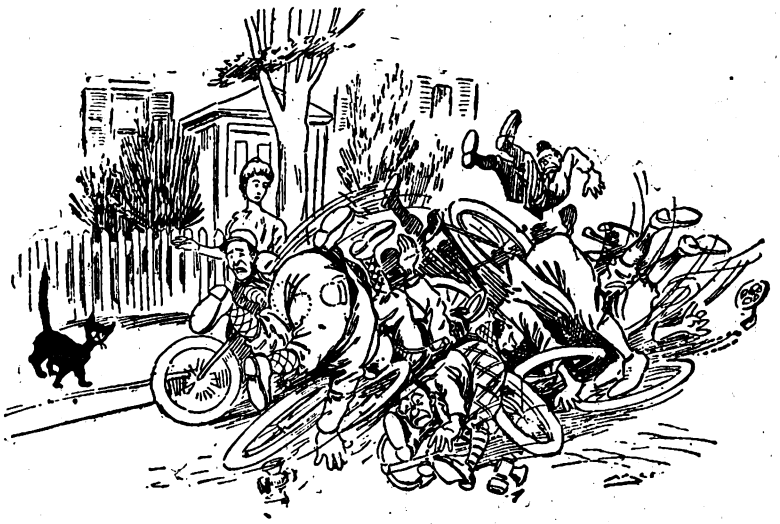
If he had been left to himself, he might have wobbled and twisted the length of a terrace and banged up against a milestone at the corner, but he had not gone a hundred feet when the sixteen members of the Zephyr club came round the corner. Brown yelled and Bowser yelled.

When the sixteen Zephyrs saw something wobbling all over the street, they also yelled, but the yelling did no good. Mr. Bowser tried to fall off or jump off or get off, but six or seven festive riders struck him in chorus and with exceeding unanimity, and what Brown saw was a dark cloud hovering over the street with human bodies and parts of broken wheels ascending and descending and whirling round. Mrs. Bowser and the cat arrived before the performance was over. As they watched the cloud it separated and men and women limped to the kerb and sat down. Mr. Bowser was left alone among the wrecked machines. He was lying on the broad of his back, and the look on his face was like that of a man being burnt alive at the stake.

They picked up the body and carried it along and lugged it into the house, and as they backed out they said to Mrs. Bowser:

"His heart beats yet, and you may possibly save him, but if you do he should be confined in a lunatic asylum all the rest of his days. A man like him is a danger to the whole town and should not be allowed to run at large."

M. QUAD.



Mrs. Bowser and the cat arrived before the performance was over.

[Next Week: "Things were all wrong, but he righted them."]

DO YOU WISH TO MAKE SOME CHRISTMAS PRESENTS?

Something simple, and that requires little outlay.
Something that will give pleasure to your friends.
Something that will be useful as well as ornamental.

WE CAN TELL YOU EXACTLY WHAT TO MAKE?

Go to the nearest newsagent's and ask for

Isobel's Needlework,

PRICE TWOPENCE.

It will be on Sale December 1st. It contains sketches and directions for making many pretty trifles for Christmas Presents and Bazaars, such as Dainty Table Centres (three designs), A Crochet Chemise Top, Pretty Smocking, A Child's Openwork Sock and Vest, Home-made Serviette Rings, Embroidered Initials, etc.

"ISOBEL'S NEEDLEWORK" may also be obtained direct from 17 and 18 Henrietta St., W.C., post free, 3½d.

Digitized by Google

The Ace of Clubs.

"DICK, this is one of your early nights, isn't it?" asked his wife as he kissed her and the two children prior to leaving home for the office.

"Yes, dear. Why?"

"Because we—the children and myself—see so little of you now that you have under aken this extra work. When you used to come home early, we had some happy evenings together, but it is often eleven o'clock now before you return, and even when you reach home to dinner, you seem so preoccupied that you do not care to talk. We have lost the Saturday afternoon, and on Sunday you are generally too tired or worried to take any interest in the children."

It was out at last. The absence and preoccupation of her husband had worried Kate for a long time, but she had hesitated to say anything to him on the subject.

He had undertaken this extra work for a city friend, as he had told her, for the express pur ose of increasing their income and making things more comfortable for his wife and family, so it seemed rather ungrateful on her part to make any protest; but his salary was a very good one and she would have been quite content with their original position—she would have preferred it to seeing him with that anxious look.

As a matter of fact, this work had not been very profitable hitherto, but Dick was always telling her that it would be all right later on.

"Now, Kate," said Dick reproachfully.

"Yes, I know what you are going to say," interrupted Kate gently. "But we were more—well, quite as happy in the old days. And you know," she c ntinued hesitatingly, "this new venture, or partnership, or whatever you may call it, has not really brought in much money."

"Very few businesses are profitable in that sense at the commencement," Dick reminded her. "It is like laying up something for a rainy day; we shall reap the benefit later on."

"I hope so, Dick," said his wife with a sigh. "We are not laying up anything just now out of your salary; our expenses and the money you require for the development of this business are eating it all up. I sometimes wonder, when I see you looking so anxious, whether the future result will be worth the present cost."

Dick laughed. He tried to make it sound like a hearty laugh, but it was not a grand success.

"It's time I went to the office, Kate; you are unstrung this morning and you will make me feel dismal. Remember, I shall be home at six, not later, so try to get into a more cheerful frame of mind before that time and cease worrying about the future."

He kissed her lovingly, lifted the boy "up to the ceiling," stroked the little girl's curly hair and hurried away.

"It would break her heart, I really believe, if she knew what the 'extra work' was," was his self-comment as he strode to the railway station. "Yes, it would do that just as surely as it will drive me mad if I don't make a big haul directly! She speaks of our money all going; she little knows that I am up to my eyes in debt! I must win soon or——"

He bought a morning paper and opened it, intending to read it in the train, but though he stared at it during the whole of the journey, he never read a line of its contents. His mind was busy with another subject.

"What on earth made me go to that woman and have my fortune told by cards and palmistry and all that sort of stuff? I suppose it is all bosh, but she hit upon one or two things very correctly and that makes me nervous about her prediction. How should she know that I spend three or four evenings a week at the card table? Let me see—what did she say? 'The ace of clubs will be the trump card on three occasions; on the first two occasions it will bring you more or less bad luck, but the third time it will mean your ruin.'

"Will it come true? It has turned up once, when it swept away a fair amount of money that I had won. In spite of myself, I dread the next time. I watch that card whenever I see it on the table and try to follow it through all the shuffling and dealing. I fall out of the game whenever I think there is a chance that the dealer will turn it up as a trump card and something within me whispers 'leave off playing altogether,' but how can I?"

The question was unanswerable; the gambling spirit, which had taken possession of him some three years previously, had been constantly getting a tighter grip on its victim; he could no more tear himself away than the opium victim can free himself from his besetting habit. To make the severance more difficult, he was saddled with an incubus of debt.

He went home that evening and tried to make his wife happy by joining them in their childish games before the young ones went to bed. At dinner, and after, he threw off his anxiety by a great effort and did his best to make amends for his shortcoming. Kate looked relieved and began to hope that she might induce her husband to confine his enterprise to his usual daily vocation.

The next day was Saturday and, to her delight, Dick promised Kate that he would spend the afternoon at home, although he must run up to the city in the evening to meet his friend. He accompanied her for a stroll in the afternoon, and on their way back they met Dr. Webster.

He was a young medical man established in the neighbourhood and a friend of the Bartons; rumour said that he had at one time hoped to win Kate, but there was no reliable evidence to confirm the rumour, although the persons who held that view pointed to the fact that Dr. Webster was still unmarried. He had a good practice and had earned reputation far beyond his own district for his skill in cases of insanity and nervous complaints generally.

Digitized by Google

"You are not looking well, Mr. Barton," said Webster after the usual greetings had been exchanged. "You are working too hard, but don't forget that Nature does not allow anyone to play tricks with her—she is bound to have revenge sooner or later in some form or other. I am afraid that your night work causes too great a mental strain."

Dick Barton shot a swift glance at the speaker and turned his eyes away, making some short rejoinder.

He felt uneasy. He had a suspicion that Webster knew something of his doings, and he trembled lest the doctor should say anything that might betray him. Kate was glad that Webster had emphasised her own assertion and hoped that this double reminder would have its effect.

But her hopes were quickly vanished; her husband's condition and appearance were far worse on Sunday morning.

She took the opportunity to implore him to give up the extra work, but he shook his head and answered her so abruptly that she went to her bedroom to relieve herself by a good cry.

Another portion of the fortune-teller's prophecy had been fulfilled on the Saturday evening; the ace of clubs had turned up most unexpectedly, and once again Dick Barton had left the room a heavy loser.

How he had watched and schemed to avoid this unlucky event. But all to no purpose; the fateful card had suddenly, and when least expected, presented itself to his astonished eyes, and he had lost the little pile of money which he had staked.

Dick Barton's mental condition and physical appearance were pitiful. He dreaded to resume his gambling—dreaded the coming of the evening all through the day, yet he could not keep away from the gaming table. Night after night he went there, staking his money and starting with fear every time the dealer turned up a card; he watched with feverish eyes for the ace of clubs, trying to follow it in all its journeyings, gauging the probabilities and abstaining from a game now and then when he thought that the chances were against him.

Every night for two weeks he went on in this way, becoming more and more nervous until he could scarcely hold his hands still, and the opening of a door near him frightened him as much as the report of a revolver, yet he could not give up. He dared not give up, for his creditors were pressing him and he must get money in some way.

Poor Kate was nearly distracted; her husband seemed to have lost all affection for her and the children, he was absorbed in his work—consumed by it as the miser is by his love of gold. She went in her despair to Dr. Webster for advice, and that gentleman promised to do his best to bring Dick to reason.

With a white, set face that indicated desperation, Dick Barton sat at the table playing for liberty. He had reached the end of his tether; unless he could retrieve his fortunes that evening, disaster could not be averted.

Luck was on his side to all appearance; again and again he won, until he threw aside the prudence with which he had begun and staked the larger and larger sums which his winnings permitted.

But in spite of his fortune he was ill at ease—haunted by the ever-present fear that the ace of clubs would be turned up.

With the usual feverish anxiety rendered more intense by the stress of circumstances, he tried to follow the dreaded card; he was trembling with fear like one stricken with ague, and he started and glared about him at every sound.

The other players noticed this and cast meaning glances at one another under the impression that Barton was not far from an attack of delirium tremens. Once, when a black card was turned up, he sprang to his feet with a groan, but he was recalled to himself by the dealer calling out what the card was.

"Thank Heaven!" he muttered, wiping the cold perspiration from his face. "Just a few pounds more—only a little more! Then I will leave off. I shall have enough to get out of the mess I am in, and I'll never touch another card! Oh, if that awful card will only keep in the background just a little longer!"

This fright served to increase his nervousness, and he presented a truly pitiable spectacle; it made him fearful of risking all his money and he reduced the value of his stakes. He lost twice in succession and then, rendered bold again by a sudden idea that his chance had come, he staked the whole of his money.

When he had done so, he began to repent. What if that card turned up? He gripped the edge of the table with both hands, and watched with parched lips and glassy eyes for the result. In his wretched state of mind, oppressed as he was by the prophecy, it did not occur to him that if he lost, it mattered not which card wrought his ruin.

The seconds seemed hours to the agonized man who was waiting to know his fate. With every second his fears increased. At the critical moment he half-raised himself from his chair and leant forward.

The ace of clubs!

Dick Barton stood bolt upright; he uttered no sound but the onlookers saw a reddish froth about his lips. Then he fell to the floor with a heavy thud.

* * * * *

Three months had passed away and Dick Barton was still in the madhouse. When he recovered consciousness after the seizure on the fatal evening, it was found that his reason had suffered and given way under the strain. He was a docile inmate, generally speaking, but subject to an occasional attack of an extreme character, when he was very violent and raved about the ace of clubs.

Mrs. Barton and her children were being taken care of by her father; they spent part of their time in the old home and the remainder with him. It had been decided to keep on the house for a time in the hope that Dick might recover.

The general opinion was that the chances were against recovery; there was hope, that was true, but it was so slender that it was not wise to calculate on it. Dr. Webster was a little more sanguine than his professional brethren, but he dared not raise hopes in Kate that might not be realised.

He had interested himself in the case of Dick Barton and had secured permission to see him at frequent intervals and study the progress of the malady. He made a point of reporting to Kate after every visit, and Kate herself saw her husband from time to time, sometimes being recognised and at others unable to obtain the least sign of recognition from Dick.

Digitized by Google

This was the position at the end of three months, when Dr. Webster came to Kate with a proposition.

"My dear Mrs. Barton," he said gently and deferentially. "After having given considerable attention to the case I have arrived at the conclusion that probably the only chance of restoring your husband's reason is to try the experiment of treating him homeopathically. He lost his reason as the result of a shock following on great mental strain; we must try the effect of a similar shock as a method of restoring the equilibrium. We cannot reproduce all the conditions exactly, but we will get as near as we can. We all know of cases in which a person has lost his memory through a blow, or in some similar way, and has had it restored by an accident of the same character. But in this instance there is a risk; the shock may kill."

Dr. Webster had spoken impressively; he wished Kate to understand the full importance of his words.

It was a terrible question for a woman to decide—to let her husband remain in mental darkness or to risk his life on the the chance of bringing back the light. She could not make up her mind then and there, but promised to give a decision on the following day.

When Dr. Webster came for the reply, it was in the affirmative.

Webster had made his plans in the expectation that Kate would agree, and he now began the execution of his scheme in conjunction with the medical attendants of the asylum.

Kate had nothing to do, but he stipulated that she should be present when the experiment was made.

The plan was to endeavour to instil into the mind of Dick Barton the idea that he must play at cards; that he must continue to play and stake his winnings, because if he could only hold out until the ace of clubs was turned up his fortune would be made and the disaster of which he was constantly talking would be redeemed tenfold. This was no easy task.

At first, the suggestion was terrifying to Dick, but by dint of continual persuasion it became less and less objectionable and finally he expressed a desire to begin. It took a long time to arrive at this result, but having succeeded so far, the rest of the experiment would be carried out much more quickly, whatever the end might be.

After the first game, Dick showed signs of eagerness; this was a favourable indication, but it was impossible to forecast the effect of the final shock. Dick's eagerness increased as the time went on, and then he began to show some anxiety at the thought that the ace of clubs would never be turned up to bring him good luck.

"It brought me bad luck before and it was not slow in turning up them, but now that it is to bring me good luck it will not turn up."

He watched for that card as he had watched for it a few months previously, but with quite a change of feelings. He longed to see it and felt disappointed every time it failed to appear. As Dr. Webster contrived matters so that it was never the trump card, the patience of Barton began to get exhausted; he became fretful at the delay and the other medical men—for Webster kept well in the background—had to exercise all their powers of persuasion to induce him to continue and to bring about exactly that nervous condition which they desired.

At last the time came when it was deemed advisable to make the culminating experiment. It was evening, the room was arranged and lighted so as to resemble as nearly as possible the gambling saloon in which Barton had spent so many evenings, and proper precautions had been taken in connection with the cards. Kate was present behind a screen, not far from her husband and placed so that she could watch him; Webster was by her side.

Barton had been led to believe that this evening he might expect his fate. Kate could scarcely bear to look upon the excited countenance of her husband, with the lips twitching nervously and with the eyes fixed upon one spot.

More and more intense became the expression upon Dick's face; more and more intense did Kate's feelings become, until she could scarcely stand upright.

"Now!" whispered Webster to Kate, after having given the agreed signal to the other players.

"Now for the final card!" they cried in chorus. Dick sprang to his feet and waited, every limb trembling.

The ace of clubs!

There was a wild cry, more like the howl of a beast than the utterance of a human being. Dick's hands went to his forehead and he reeled.

"Dick, oh Dick!" screamed Kate. She thought the shock had killed him, and she rushed forward and threw her arms about him.

There was an awful silence for a few seconds, as Kate looked pleadingly into the wondering eyes of the man she loved.

Then there came a great sob from his throat, and he sank into the chair with a cry of "Kate! Kate!" covered his face with his hands and wept, while his wife knelt by his side and tried to comfort him.

"Saved!" exclaimed Dr. Webster in a husky voice. "I am glad that I have been able to assist in bringing back happiness to her!" Daisy George.

In the Christmas Double Number of

"SHORT STORIES"

will appear the first of a series of articles entitled

"BRITAIN'S WARS."

They are written in a very readable style, and the whole will form a complete history of the most important wars in which Britain has been engaged.

£25 IN PRIZES.

PEARSON'S TALKING PUZZLE.

Second Edition Now Ready.

Price 6d.; Post-Free from this Office. 7½d.

Digitized by Google

A DRAMATIC COINCIDENCE.

"No," he said, "I am decidedly of opinion that a woman,—the average, well-constituted woman—cannot possibly love twice; that is to say, she cannot consistently re-possess herself, for re-giving, of that which she has to all intents and purposes parted with previously, and for ever."

And she agreed with him. How could she help doing so?

She was young, and very much in love, and although a girl with ambitious ideas and dreams, the mere suggestion that her affection (in this instance) was evanescent, made her acquiesce unreservedly in her lover's absolute proposition.

Harold McIvor was a young man with a certain literary reputation. Although looking to story-spinning, and "outside" journalism as a principal source of income, he was emulous of dramatic success. Beyond, however, a couple of one-act pieces, provincially produced, the desire of his heart was as yet ungratified.

He was a man, too, with a fixed idea—a fad it might be called—an almost aggressive opinion. He was an absolute unbeliever in woman as a literary quantity. Lady playwrights were an abomination to him. No woman, he averred, could write a play worthy the name. Woman, he maintained, was created only and solely for man's help, solace, and domestic comfort; as his intellectual equal and competitor she had no place, or ought to have none.

Of course these views brought him, within his limited circle, into frequent collision with its feminine element. Ellaline Drake was certainly an exception, but then, she was in love, and, as love is, as we know, proverbially blind, (even to the obvious, oftentimes), the woman was merged in the partisan.

The young lady held a fairly good position as typist in the Editorial department of a well-known London publishing house.

Of a quick imaginative temperament, her lot was, therefore, cast amid just such surroundings as must almost inevitably lead to the fostering of her mental bent.

Stories had she written by the score—Poetry, pathetic little pictures, wonderfully true to a certain phase of life so difficult of adequate portrayal, the child-existence of the lower human strata.

It was this feature of her published work which had brought her into personal contact with Harold McIvor. He was keen to detect the woman's lovable nature, peeping out of, and bubbling up through the work of "Ella Drake."

I am inclined to believe that implicit mutual confidence existed between them, with, however, one notable reservation.

Harold cherished the dream of future dramatic fame. He made no secret of it, so far as his sweetheart was concerned, and freely discussed with her his hopes, his aspirations and his plans.

On the other hand Ellaline burned to distinguish herself as a playwright.

As yet she had been unsuccessful in obtaining even a managerial hearing, but being a plucky little woman she worked and hoped on.

But she carefully concealed from Harold her ambition and efforts in this direction.

How could she? she said to herself knowing, as she did, his sentiments with regard to female tillers of the dramatic soil.

So she quietly burnt the midnight oil, paling thereby her pretty cheeks, and spoiling, with disfiguring dark rims, those big eyes of hers.

It was the day of the conversation between them upon woman's ability to love twice. In her present frame of mind, nothing was to be expected of Ella save complete agreement with Harold's views.

"You, darling," he said tenderly, "you could never forget or forsake."

Her only answer was the laying of her hand upon his with a gentle pressure.

"You see, dear," he continued, "the world would be almost untenable as a living-place were there no guarantee, as it were, for woman's faith, and loyalty to her engagements."

"Of course, dear, it would," she returned, "I'm sure that I for one shouldn't want to live in it, for if all women were faithless and disloyal, all men would be——be——"

"What?" he asked laughingly.

"Well, I can't exactly explain, but, say—ugly—in their ways I mean."

"I suppose they would, but as you are what you are, and have made me all that I myself am, why, I am content not to worry myself about it, except—on paper."

This talk had for both these young people great issues.

Both saw the possibilities for dramatic treatment of the subject they had been discussing.

Both mentally dec ded to make these same possibilities an accomplished dramatic fact (so far, at least, as the writing of a play on these lines was concerned) and, most momentous of all, both resolved upon absolute secrecy with regard, that is, to each other.

Possibly, had mutual confidence swayed them, much heartburning embarrassment and consequent entanglement might have been spared them, but Harold, held back by a disinclination to impart the extreme views to which his work would undoubtedly commit him was silent; while Ella, naturally apprehensive of offending his literary prejudices, possessed her soul in reserved patience.

It was observable that from the moment each began to work out his and her idea, that a peculiar and at first hardly perceptible constraint sprang up between the pair.

Harold worked early and late. No walks; no visits in company to theatres; no sunny evening excursions to country nooks and corners. "Sported oak" with him was the order of the day.

So, too, with Ella. Her daily employment kept her busy durin. the day, so that the result in her case was night work, with its inevitable consequence—mental and physical exhaustion.

This state of things continued for nearly six months, until one morning, when the street lamps were struggling with the swiftly breaking dawn, Ella typed the last word of her play.

Digitized by Google

There was only one title for it, of course, "Her second love," and, as she made it up into a parcel, and addresed it to the Actor-Manager, Imperial Theatre, she did so with, it must be confessed, a half-guilty sense of something she knew not what.

* * * * *

The private room of Athol Fearis, lessee and manager of the Imperial Theatre, was occupied on the morning of the day succeeding that of the dispatch of Ella's MS. by that gentleman himself and his reader.

It is the custom, as many are aware, for most managers, especially those of the great West-End houses, to employ as their readers of submitted plays literary men of some reputation.

That Harold McIvor should fill this responsible position at the "Imperial," was assuredly a strange coincidence, if nothing more, although in itself, it was but the most natural result of a life-long friendship with the actor.

"Only one this morning," remarked Fearis, "I congratulate you. Who's the author, anybody we know?"

"A novice, I think," hurriedly, and somewhat confusedly answers the other, "a Miss—or Mrs. Ella Drake."

"'Um. I know your sentiments, my boy, where the ladies are concerned. But be merciful; be merciful, as you expect mercy. If there is any good in it, give it a chance. What's the subject?"

"So far as I can see at present, Woman's second love, its possibility or otherwise."

"Good! well, tell me all about it to-morrow; if you've digested it by then. I'm off now down to the stage, to rehearse that 3rd-Act scene again with my new leading lady."

It may be just mentioned that the fact of Harold's readership being unknown to Ella was quite understandable, he having strong conscientious scruples with regard to "cleanness of hands," and particularly with reference to such a delicate position.

Harold did not attempt to read the manuscript at the theatre. He placed it in his pocket, and took it home with him.

He was not by any means a man given to plots, conspiracies, or double dealing of any kind, but I am bound to record that his action, after reading Ella's play, might well have been unfavourably construed by many who did not understand him.

He saw the utter, irredeemable badness of Ella's work. Apart from its acting impossibility it was unreadable. Yet he read it; for they were his Ella's words; her thoughts, crude certainly and distorted, but still hers. There was only one judgment for him to pronounce, but it was with a heavy heart that he did so. Then he turned to his desk. Upon it lay a white-wrapped packet, addressed to a prominent London actor.

Deliberately did he break the seal and remove the typed MS. It was his own play, and the title ran "Her second love."

They lay upon the desk before him side by side, the two creations of two brains. Twin children outwardly, although there the likeness ended.

He knew, as every good craftsman knows, that his own work was well and truly done, and that, given favourable conditions, it would meet with fame, success, and reward.

The struggle within him was terrible. On the one hand was his love, the one and only possible love for him; on the other was sacrifice, greater than could be conceived by mortal man.

A fire burned brightly upon the hearth, for it was winter, and very cold.

Slowly he took up the other manuscript, the work of nights upon nights of toil for those slender little fingers. Slowly he moved over from his desk to the fireplace, and as slowly dropped into the flames "Her second love."

* * * * *

Imperial Theatre.

Dear Madam.

Upon the recommendation of my reader and, I may add, after a personal perusal of your play Her Second Love, I have, subject, of course, to future discussion between us as to terms, etc., decided to produce it.

I propose calling upon you, if you will be good enough to name early date, and hour.

Faithfully yours,
Athol Fearis.

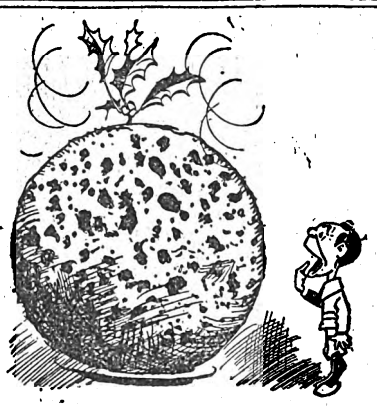
To Miss Ella Drake

* * * * *

"A great success," said the critics. "A great sucess," echoed the public, but Harold McIvor is still of the same opinion with regard to woman as a possible playwright, although the name of the one woman in the world for him is to-day upon every lip.

He had to tell her. His crime could not be concealed. And when she came to hear the truth, how that to glorify her name, and save her from the hurtings of rejection and bitter failure, he had sacrificed, by the substitution of his own work, for hers, the ambition and longings of a lifetime, it seemed to her that she had never truly known him, who had taught her to really know herself.

Ralph Enderby.



What would Christmas be without

A CHRISTMAS PUDDING

on the table? Why, it would be like Tuesday without SHORT STORIES! But this Christmas you can see a Plum Pudding nearly

AS BIG AS ST. PAUL'S!!!

Where can you see it? Why, in the Christmas Number of

THE ROYAL MAGAZINE.

NOW ON SALE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

This number also contains a Grand and Exciting Sea Story, entitled, "The Mystery of the Esmeralda."

Digitized by Google

A REVIVAL IN HOUSE PROPERTY.

THERE is a general impression that the house property business in London and its suburbs is exceedingly dull. In fact, it is said to be nearly impossible to obtain tenants for vacant houses. To own but one house which brings in no return for its cost, but upon which taxes must be paid and repairs made, is a severe strain upon any person; while the man who owns three or four houses is thereby reduced to abject beggary.

Such are the remarks which are constantly made every day concerning the real estate business, and yet it was the impression on Wednesday last among the inhabitants of Tooting that a sudden and spirited revival had taken place.

A month ago a house-agent of this rising suburb, whose name is suppressed in order to give him time to reach foreign parts, undertook to obtain a tenant for a house. To his surprise, he was one day called upon by a man who actually wanted the house, and was willing to pay as much rent as would be equal to three-fourths of the taxes on the place. The happy house-agent promptly landed his prey by making him sign the lease, and told him that the house would be ready for him on the first day of February.

Five days later another man appeared, and expressed a strong desire to take the Tooting house. Probably the house-agent had no intention at that time of indulging in illegal practices, but it was such a novelty to have persons applying for houses, that he delayed to mention that the house was already let, and permitted the applicant to think that it was still in the market.

When the new applicant asked what the rent would be, the agent named a price much larger than the owner required, and remarked that it must be paid in advance, thinking thereby to render it unnecessary for him to undeceive his customer. The new man unhesitatingly agreed to pay the sum asked, and, promising to call the next day to sign the lease, won his way.

Before he fell asleep that night the agent had decided that he would let the house for the second time, pocket the first quarter's rent, and visit Argentina. It was a wicked resolution and the agent was a wicked man; but it must be remembered that there are few house-agents whose brains would not reel at finding two successive tenants within two successive days.

When the second applicant appeared the next day at the agent's office, he found a lease waiting for him, bearing a signature which he supposed was that of the house owner. He paid his quarter's rent in advance, pocketed the lease, and promised to occupy the house on February 1st. After he had left the office the house-agent closed his blinds, locked his door, and disappeared, and by this time he is probably on his way to a refuge where no extradition treaty can reach him.

It was about noon on February 1st that two large waggons, loaded with furniture, and escorted by two local four-wheelers, each containing a separate family, drew up at the door of the Tooting house. The two families were those of the two tenants, and the two waggons contained the first instalments of their separate furniture.

Mr. Smith, the earliest tenant, was an irascible man, and lost no time in asking what Mr. Brown, the other tenant, wanted. In a short time the conversation between the two became very lively. Each shook his lease in the face of the other, and denounced him as a swindler. Meanwhile, the vanmen demanded to know what they were to do with the furniture, and the neighbours, hearing of the dispute, turned out in great force and lined the pavement.

Foreseeing that the matter would never be settled by argument, Mr. Smith finally ordered his furniture to be carried into the house. Mr. Brown instantly issued a similar order as to his furniture, and both enlisted strong contingents of on-lookers to assist in the operation.

Each tenant felt the necessity of being the first to occupy the house.

The two heavy furniture vans were unloaded with unexampled rapidity. Mr. Smith's gang stormed the front parlour with the piano, upsetting the Brown piano on the front steps. The Brown party threw a cloud of skirmishers with chairs, bedsteads, and crockery, into the bedrooms on the second floor, locking the door of each room as fast as it was filled.

Their rivals, however, reached the third story by way of the back stairs in advance of them, and also occupied the cellar with a strong force of books and rolls of carpets. The back parlour was the scene of a severe contest, but Mr. Smith hurled iron pots through the windows, and then, mounting the breach, locked the doors from the inside and garrisoned the room with boxes and mattresses.

Of course, these successes were not gained without heavy losses, and there was scarcely an article of furniture which was not wounded. When hostilities were suspended until reinforcements of furniture should arrive on the following day, the position of the rival tenants was as follows.

Mr. Smith occupied the cellar, the front and back parlours, and the third story.

Mr. Brown occupied the whole of the second storey and the remains of his piano occupied nearly all the front yard and a part of the adjacent street.

These positions are still held, and each side has enlisted half-a-dozen lawyers, who are busily applying for injunctions, writs of dispossessions, orders for arrest, and other legal delicacies.

P. E. ARSON.

Digitized by Google

BY THE HEAD OF A MANDARIN.

In Three Parts.

BY SADI GRANT.

PART I.

FROM the window of a feudal Castle in the North of China, a young man was looking out on the tumbled grey stormy waters of the China Sea. He was tall and well made, with the yellow complexion of his race. His line of ancestors was unbroken for five hundred years and more, and from his many grandfathers of the purest blood in China he had inherited the slanting almond eyes, flat nose, and prominent cheek-bones that all well-bred Chinese admire. His name was Li Ki Foo, and he was the eldest son of a Mandarin.

This Castle of Amoy belonged to his father, who came there in the hot months of summer from Pekin. It was battlemented and fortified in a very old-fashioned way; a couple of guns and an enemy's man-o'-war half-a-mile out to sea would have completely dismantled it in two or three hours. Flowering shrubs grew here and there on the rough ground below the Castle, but there was no attempt at a real garden here that lay behind, where two acres of most flourishing land was under the care of Chin Lung, the head gardener—an imposing individual, who trampled on his six under-gardeners as thoroughly as any Scotch fellow-artiste in England could have done.

Li Ki Foo was dressed in a loose jacket and trousers of purple silk; he wore no collar—it is not the custom in China—his jacket only just reached his throat, which was left bare. His trousers fitted tightly below the knee, and finished at his ankles, showing fine socks of silk and black polished shoes. Li Ki Foo had been an attaché at the Embassy in London, and was well acquainted with European dress and ways; sometimes he wished that in Europe he were allowed by his religion and the unwritten laws of his country to dress like other people, and so avoid being conspicuous, though still he thought that in beauty and convenience the dress and customs of his own country were superior to anything he had seen in Europe.

He was waiting now, with what patience he could command, for the entrance of his father, the most excellent and honourable Li Lang Hi, one of Her Majesty the Queen Empress's most favoured Councillors. The midday meal was ready and the old butler only waited the entrance of his Master to bring it in. On a small low table of inlaid ivory lay the post bag, brought over by a courier on horseback from the neighbouring town, and Li Ki Foo, being but mortal, wished to see if there were any letters for him in it. How were his famous trotting ponies getting on? Had a rival Chinese dandy put him out in the race for the Tientsin Plate? It was hard to be buried here in Amoy, while the world went its fashionable way without him. Not a sign of this impatience, however, was to be seen on Li Ki Foo's impassible face as he stood looking out on the stormy sea like an image of stone.

A movement in the room behind at last made him look round. Three or four Chinamen were coming in. The first was the Mandarin himself, a dried up, parchment-like old man, dressed in a grey silk petticoat and the yellow jacket that showed his rank. Of the other men, one was his secretary, another the chief steward of the house, and another his private priest. Li Ki Foo bowed low three times, a salutation his father answered by a curt nod; then he sat down on a low, comfortably-cushioned arm chair and drew the post bag towards him.

"What news from Pekin?" he said, as he unlocked it with a little key hung at his girdle, "goes all well at the Summer Palace, my leave of absence can be prolonged. Many letters for you, my son, four, five, six, verily the youth of the present day has more time to waste on scribbling than in my young days."

Li Ki Foo advanced and took his letters.

The old man continued: "Ha! I see letters from Canton from the Mandarin Kiu Lan; that will be about the marriage feast of his daughter, O Li Ki Foo. This concerns you most, but I cannot trouble to look at any of these letters before tiffin. Send the dishes in," he said to the chief steward, with a wave of his long, thin hand.

Li Ki Foo sat down on another low chair near his father, and laughed.

"I, too, am hungry, O my father; I have ridden many miles this morning without breaking my fast."

"And wherefore?" said the old Mandarin, rather crossly. "Are these the ways learnt in the land of the Barbarians? I have heard they do naught but try feats of strength to wear out their bodies before their time, and bathe at all hours of the day to exhaust themselves still further."

"It succeeds well with them, my father," said Li Ki Foo, "where see you finer developed limbs and muscles than among these Englishmen? In China the education of the brain is only studied, not the education of the body."

The old Mandarin looked at his son's stalwart frame and chuckled.

"Yet am I not ill-pleased with thee, O Li Ki Foo; thou art no weakling, that I should fear the degeneration of our race. But see, here comes Akkim with the eggs and the tea; at least admit, oh, my son, that in this dark island of theirs, thou sawest no tea to compare with what thou hast in my house. It were impossible, for I share of the Imperial first leaf-picking, of which none is exported to foreign lands."

Li Ki Foo sipped his strong, scented Orange Pekoe with appreciation.

"Your Excellency speaks but the truth," he said, "there is no tea worthy of the name in England, save at the Embassy, where the Ambassador can take care of himself. These barbarians drink a black decoction of old and inferior leaves, that often stands with water on it for fully half-an-hour; to this they add milk or cream to disguise the flavour. Tea in its real state they do not know."

"And eggs, too," continued the old Mandarin, who was never tired of finding out from his son the curious ways of Europe. "I am told they eat eggs as the common Chinamen do—fresh, at most but two days old, thereby losing the true flavour."

Digitized by Google

"It is so, your Excellency," said Li Ki Foo. "The black egg of two years old, with its curious, yet delicate, odour, is unknown in Europe, thereby they miss much," and Li Ki Foo commenced his third black egg.

"Two years—no less and no more—is the right age," said the Mandarin solemnly. "Each year a sufficient number of eggs for my use are preserved in trays, carefully dated. Is it not so, Akkim?"

"It is so, most honoured one," said Akkim.

"It is said," continued the old noble pensively, "that Her Majesty the Queen Empress has so fine a palate that, when her chief steward caused to be served to her an egg of but eighteen months' keeping, she detected the imposture at once."

"Ha!" said Li Ki Foo, "and what chanced to the chief steward?"

"He died the death of many criminals," said the Mandarin peacefully, "fastened in a cage wherein he could neither sit nor rest, nor even stand save on his toes, placed on the great bridge of Pekin without food or drink, save from the charity of the passer-by. I saw him oft; he lasted ten long days and nights."

"Ah," said Li Ki Foo in an uninterested manner, "and yet, perchance, Her Imperial Majesty was mistaken."

"It may be, it may be," said the old Mandarin; "the criminal asserted it to his last moments, but of what avail was that? The deep reasonings of Her Majesty could not be denied. The Celestial intellect could not admit mistake. It was after all but of slight consequence, the death of one man."

"Of slight consequence, save to himself," said Li Ki Foo.

"To himself!" said the Mandarin, "and what was he? The dust of the earth only. I fear me this sojourn of thine in England has bred foolish ideas in thee, O my son. What is the life of one man in the sight of Her Majesty? Naught."

"Naught, indeed," said Li Ki Foo bitterly, thinking of the hundreds the Queen Empress had caused to be slaughtered in her day.

The old Mandarin shook his head sadly.

"Thou wilt make no courtier, O Li Ki Foo," he said, "if thou canst speak of Her Imperial Majesty with aught but adoration."

Then his thoughts were diverted from the egg and steward question by the entry of some new and tasty dish, of which he was pleased to approve.

"I see there a packet," said Li Ki Foo, after a pause, "among the letters at thy right hand."

The Mandarin looked at it suspiciously and called his secretary.

"Take that and see whence it comes," he said, sharply; "but take it to the other end of the room, for in these days of anarchy and lawlessness it might contain an explosive."

The secretary, a thin, pale young man with spectacles, took the packet; evidently it was of no consequence if he were blown up by chance or design.

"The parcel is from Tartary, may it please your Excellency," he said, after a short examination of the outside.

"From Tartary!" repeated the Mandarin. "I know of no official who writes to me from that province. Open the packet, Ah Keu."

The secretary cut the string that bound it with a small knife, and then unrolled the thick paper of which the outside wrapper was composed. Inside there was a sheet of very grubby writing paper, and a small oblong object wrapped in a piece of blood-stained linen. This he undid carefully, and exposed to view a finger severed at the second joint—a man's little finger, with a deep scar like a burn on the left side. This and the sheet of paper, on which were some vertical lines of Chinese writing, Ah Keu placed on the inlaid table by the side of the Mandarin.

"See to this, O Li Ki Foo," said the old man crossly.

The first was the mandarin himself.

"Why is this sent to me? Am I not troubled enough by the vacillations of Court intrigue that my life should be further darkened by idle threats? For I conceive this is a threat—of some criminal, possibly—to induce me to interfere in his behalf."

Li Ki Foo quietly took the ghastly package from the table, and the letter with it.

"This is the finger of your Excellency's son, Li Ham," he said coldly, "the writer says it can be recognised by the scar on the left side."

Li Lang Hi took the finger and examined it, but without excitement. He had eighteen sons, and really could not be expected to have very vivid feelings of affection for them all.

"The finger is that of Li Ham, no doubt," he said, "the scar was caused by oil from a burning torch falling on his hand at a festival in the Great Temple. Rather than disturb the sacred rites Li Ham suffered the oil to remain on the flesh, thereby causing an indelible scar. What mischief is he engaged in now?" continued the Mandarin angrily, "and what business has he in Tartary? He was sent to a Mongolian monastery to study a folio of the great Confucius, and to perfect himself in knowledge of the ancient laws. But he was ever unruly and wishful for unknown dangers."

Digitized by Google

"In danger he seems now, at any rate, O Li Lang Hi," said Li Ki Foo blandly; "this paper is from a robber chief in Tartary, from the head of a wandering tribe, into whose hands Li Ham has fallen. Shall I read it to your Excellency?"

The Mandarin nodded, and Li Ki Foo read out:

"To the Mandarin Li Lang Hi—Greeting.

"Thy son, O, Mandarin, lies helpless in my hands. In token I send thee his finger, marked as thou wilt recognise, from a burn three years past. Send ten thousand taels of silver for his ransom by the fourteenth day of the next moon, or I swear by thy head, O Mandarin, I will kill him by the Heavy Death and scatter his bones to the winds of Heaven. An agent at Kin Sin, on the Great Wall of China, will receive the silver, and will make himself known on the arrival of the messenger.—Signed, Ku, Chief of the Lusan Tribe."

"Ten thousand taels of silver!" gasped the old Mandarin, "does this vermin think I am made of money? Li Ham is not worth a tenth part of such a sum."

"Yet he is thy son, O Mandarin," said Li Ki Foo; "should he die by the hands of a robber and his bones not be preserved in the family tomb, it were a disgrace to our ancient line."

Li Ki Foo was not at all excited on the subject, he had scarcely ever seen Li Ham, but still he felt the honour of the family required some sacrifice.

Li Ki Foo read out: "To the Mandarin Li Lang Hi—Greeting."

"Why should he wander on the Steppes of Tartary?" groaned the old man, "Why could he could not keep to his own business? Are my hard-earned taels to be squandered on robber tribes? Nay, O Li Ki Foo, I will not send the money. I am old, and I will not be reduced to poverty in the evening of my days."

Li Ki Foo knew there was little chance of this, whatever happened. Did not the great coal mines on the Yangtse Kiang belong to them, not to speak of hundreds of miles of fertile land and sea frontage? Still, there was no doubt ten thousand taels was a nice, compact sum to see vanish from the family coffers.

Li Ham was rather an advanced young Chinaman, brought up for the study of the law; but he showed much more inclination for hunting and racing and sport of all kinds than an earnest student should do. Even in dress he was frivolous; he did not dare to discard the coat and petticoat of his profession, but he had caused quite a scandal in Pekin by appearing on the public drive with a very rakish grey Terai hat set sideways on his head, and driving a very smart pony in an English ralli cart. A very fat old Chinese judge had nearly had a fit of apoplexy on recognising him that afternoon, and it had been delicately conveyed to the delinquent's family that a short absence from Pekin might be advisable. Hence his journey to Mongolia, and then there was no doubt further lightness of character had conducted him to shoot llamas in Tartary.

"'Tis the decadence of the age," groaned the old Mandarin, "'tis the example of these miserable barbarians, who go hundreds of miles to shoot and hunt, and whose attire is sufficient to disgust a well-bred Chinaman. Are they not hideous enough as Nature makes them, with their short hair and round eyes and beak-like noses, that they should seek to wear such garments that the very birds of the air are scared at the sight? They ruin the Celestial Empire and deprave our noble families by their pernicious example."

"Yet are there no Englishmen in Tartary at present," said Li Ki Foo, "this misadventure cannot be laid to their charge, O Mandarin."

"How knowest thou that?" said Li Lang Hi sharply; "where mischief is, there are the English. Mark my words, O Li Ki Foo, the boy went not to Tartary alone, and what sane Chinaman would risk his skin on those wild steppes for naught? Yet a barbarian will, to catch a new beetle, forsooth, or to drive hammer into rocks of granite, nay, for no reason whatsoever, save to see what they can see new and strange, these English will go anywhere, to the end of the Great Wall, to the Gates of Hell—and thy brother Li Ham is fool enough to go with them."

"'Tis possible he is with some of the Embassy," said Li Ki Foo doubtfully, "but had it been so, the Ambassador would have also communicated with you."

The Mandarin grunted disgustedly.

"This robber Ku," he said, taking up the paper again, "means what he says; he swears it by my head, the head of a Mandarin, a solemn oath. What do you counsel, O Li Ki Foo?"

"I have a plan, O my Father," said Li Ki Foo, "which I trust may meet with your approval; it is this—that I myself should take the ransom to Tartary, and that I should first try to deliver Li Ham from the robber before paying it."

The Mandarin hesitated.

"Thou art my eldest and favoured son," he said, "I like it not that thou shouldst place thyself in a position of danger."

Digitized by Google

"I will be careful and prudent, O my father," said Li Ki Foo coldly, "the danger will be small. I see no other way to save Li Ham and, at the same time, avoid the loss of so large a sum."

"Still, I like it not," said the old Mandarin; "thy mother was dear to me in days gone by, O Li Ki Foo."

Li Ki Foo was very much astonished at this evidence of affection for him, or his mother either; he did not remember her; she had died suddenly when he was about two years old, and he had even heard a rumour that she had been helped to her death by means of a sack and a midnight boating excursion, arranged by her loving husband. However, one cannot believe everything, and he was quite willing to let bygones be bygones.

"Your affection honours me, O Mandarin," he said, "yet would I still go forth. None other can do this mission as I would have it done; if I fail, it is the will of Allah, but I think not I shall fail."

"I like it not," repeated the old man, "I like it not. Are there not many men in China who will risk their lives for a moderate sum, without that thy life be put in question?"

Li Ki Foo got up impatiently.

"Without your Excellency's leave I cannot go," he said; "yet, believe me or not as thou wilt, it is the only way to arrange the matter."

"Wherefore?" said the Mandarin, "has no man brains but thou? Thou art conceited, O my son."

"Say, then, I am a liar and a fool," said Li Ki Foo impatiently; "I cannot manage the business."

"Nay," said his father, "be not too hasty! I say not thou shalt not go, but there are many things to arrange, and I must have the counsel of wiser men."

Li Ki Foo continued his meal in rather a sulky manner. He had never been to Tartary, and the adventures promised to be rather interestingly risky. However, no doubt, by patience and obstinacy, he would gain his point.

For one thing, he felt sure his respected father would leave no stone unturned to save the ten thousand taels, if he could do so, and save his son's life at the same time.

After tiffin was over, Li Ki Foo withdrew to his own apartments in the Castle, and flung himself in his favourite arm-chair in front of a window looking on to the garden, which was blazing with peonies and sweet with arum lilies. Li Ki Foo rang a hand-bell sharply, placed on a ledge near him. The embroidered hangings in one corner were lifted, and his private servant, Ah Cheh, came in.

"My lord rang," said he.

"My cigars, Ah Cheh," said Li Ki Foo lazily, "and a glass of green chartreuse, and, stay—have I not heard that you have been in Tartary, beyond the Great Wall?"

"I have, my lord," said Ah Cheh. "Six years ago I went there as valet to Lord William Gore, of the English Embassy. He went to Tartary on a shooting expedition and stayed there two months."

"Ha!" said his master, "that is well. It is possible I may require you to go beyond the Great Wall also."

He sat and smoked silently while Ah Cheh brought the Chartreuse and placed it on a small silver tray on a corner of the writing-table.

"My cigars, Ah Cheh," said Li Ki Foo lazily.

"Stay," said Li Ki Foo, as Ah Cheh was leaving the room. "Come here, Ah Cheh, and listen to me. I want you to draw up on paper, and submit to me in an hour, the number of men and horses in Lord William Gore's expedition and the stores necessary to take for two months' travel. Report to me as fully as your memory guides you, and, above all, say naught on the subject to any servants of his Excellency my father."

Ah Cheh bowed solemnly; it was no business of his to make remarks. In his inmost soul he was not pleased at the prospect of an expedition to Tartary, for very few Chinamen have any spirit of adventure, and Ah Cheh was remarkably comfortable just then in the castle of Amoy. However, in an hour's time he had drawn up a very complete list of what composed Lord William's expedition—of the servants, horses, and stores—and brought it to his master. Li Ki Foo glanced over it hastily.

"In how many days' time could you furnish forth a similar equipment, Ah Cheh?" he said.

"My lord thinks, then, of taking this journey?" said Ah Cheh. "To do it with comfort and in good order, six weeks' time of preparation should be sufficient; the horses must be carefully chosen for hard work, ammunition and food collected, all these things cannot be got together under that time."

"Then I must set forth without them," said Li Ki Foo carelessly; "in two days, at latest, do I start for Leh on the Great Wall, and thou wilt go with me. From now till t en do thy best—I give thee a free hand in money matters."

Ah Cheh bowed low, he never thought of objecting.

"My poor best is at your lordship's service," he said slowly; "in two days I will have a troop of horse, be it but a small one, at your lordship's disposal."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT SNAKES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Duke and the Damsel," by Richard Marsh, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. W. J. Bristow, 119 Stratford Road, Plaistow, E. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about GIRAFFES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 3rd. Post-cards only, please.

Harmless, After All.

NEW-COMERS from England to the Island of Borneo are, as a rule, very much afraid of being bitten by snakes.

A story is told of a young fellow who, very soon after his arrival, stepped on a snake, and felt the dreaded fang puncture his calf.

Having heard that powerful doses of alcohol, and the external application of liquid ammonia, were the only antidotes to a painful death in such cases, he applied himself to a bottle of brandy, with the recklessness of despair, and saturated his fang-punctured flesh with liquid ammonia till he roared with agony.

When he had got thus far in his fierce struggle with death, he found time to look at and examine the snake that had bitten him, and then discovered that it was one of the most harmless of its species.

Very sick, and, thanks to the ammonia, bellowing and groaning alternately, he staggered off, and tied himself up in knots in his attempts to kick himself.

W. J. B.

Where were the Other Two.

THE wife of a professor was one morning putting on her boots. A little scream attracted the professor's attention. Not having risen, he leant forward anxiously on his elbow and inquired what was the matter.

"Why, a little snake has just crawled out of my boot!" cried she.

"Only one, my dear?" interrogated the professor, calmly lying down again. "There should have been three."

He had put them there to keep them warm.

R. T.

The Duty on Snakes.

THE Custom House officer was going through his baggage.

"What's this?" he asked, pointing to a suspicious-looking box.

"You'll open that at your own risk," said the traveller.

"What does it contain?"

"Rattlesnakes."

The Custom House officer coughed dubiously.

"How many?" he asked.

"Five," said the other.

"Ah, well. That's all right. Rattlesnakes, if you have less than half-a-dozon of them, are free of duty."

And the box was never opened after all. W. T. M.

Once Bitten—Not Twice Shy.

A NEGRO on a Virginian plantation got bitten by a snake whilst wandering in the brushwood. His master gave him a good supply of whisky, and eventually he recovered.

A few weeks after his master saw him wandering about in the bush as if in search of something.

"What are you looking for, Sambo?" he asked.

"Looking for more snakes, massa!" answered the nigger.

J. S.

The Reason of His Love.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher, addressing her class the other day, wound up her remarks by impressing on her pupils that they ought to love all animals, and by asking one boy:

"Do you love animals?"

Boy: "Yes'm."

Sunday-school Teacher: "That's right. I'm glad you do. What animals do you like best?"

Boy: "Snakes."

Sunday-school Teacher: "Goodness! Why do you like snakes best?"

Boy: "'Cause it ain't wicked to kill 'em."

M. H.

"Snakes" in Guiana.

A BOA-CONSTRICTOR woke up thin and hungry after a three months' nap, and set off to look for his breakfast.

He was soon rewarded by the capture of an agouti, which he crushed and bolted whole, after the manner of his kind. His appetite being not yet appeased, he went farther afield in quest of prey, and presently coming to a fence, and essaying to pass through between the stakes, he was stopped midway by the lump in his body which was the outward and visible sign of the defunct but undigested agouti.

As he lay in this position, another agouti happened to wander incautiously near his nose, and was seized, constricted and swallowed in like manner.

Agouti number two passes down the serpent's body to join its predecessor, but was stopped on the other side of the fence; and the state of affairs now was that the boa could neither go ahead nor astern, being jammed by his fore-and-aft inside passengers; and in that situation was found, caught, killed, and made into a "snake story." Salt, please!

G. H.

Digitized by Google

Thought They Were Eels.

At one of the London halls a short ago, a lady snake charmer was performing with her huge snakes, twining them round her body, neck, and arms.

Just as the performance was at its height, a voice from the gallery yelled out in a rich Irish brogue:

"Oi say, missus, 'ow much a pound do yer want fer them there eels?"

W. L.

The Snake Gave In.

A Lancashire farmer who kept a large stock of fowls was one day prevailed upon by a travelling showman to purchase a fine snake, which he was assured was so cleverly trained that it would not only perform a number of tricks, but would keep watch as well as any dog.

As the farmer had lately missed some of his chickens, he placed the snake on guard near the fowl-house. Finding, however, that he was losing his birds more rapidly than before, he one day, in a fit of passion, struck the reptile a heavy blow on the head with his stick, at the same time exclaiming:

"A pretty guardian you are, indeed! Who's been stealing my fowls, eh?"

What was his astonishment when the dying snake, with its last effort, twisted itself into a capital "I!"

E. L.

Toughish—but True.

Near Fort Snelling, in America, an officer who was standing on the edge of a ravine saw a curious-looking snake running rapidly through the grass. He drew his sabre and cut it in two. The forward part kept right on. He cut another piece and then another, but that did not stop the front part of the snake making good time along through the grass.

At first sight this snake story seems a very tough one. But it is really not at all hard to believe if a person resolutely sets his mind at it? especially with the aid of the officer's explanation.

When that gentleman followed the snake to the edge of the ravine, he found that it was a thin rope attached to one of the horses which was walking along out of sight in the ravine.

He had been cutting the horse's lariat in pieces!

W. I.

Most Un-feline.

One night I was seated alone in the "haunted room" of my house reading one of Poe's blood-curdling tales. The room overlooked a dark and secluded back yard, and I sat with my back to the window.

The midnight hour had just struck, when, oh, horrors! I heard a tap against the glass behind me, followed by a crash which froze the very marrow in my bones.

Dashing down my book and hastily turning out the gas, I fled to my bedroom, expecting every moment to feel a ghostly hand gripping me in its chilly embrace.

Nothing further took place, however, but it was a long time before I got to sleep that night.

Next morning the secret was revealed and I thirsted for the gore of a certain midnight prowler.

In the back yard lay a broken flower-pot which some wretched cat, alighting from an adjacent low roof, had knocked off the window ledge, causing me groundless terror.

W. C.

Instead of a Bell.

At a Turkish bath in Paris a visitor patiently submitted to the various operations of rubbing, kneading, and pommelling comprised in the treatment.

When the shampoo was over the attendant dried him with a towel, after which he dealt the patient three heavy sounding blows with the flat of his hand.

"Good gracious!" the victim ejaculated, "what did you strike me for?"

"Ah, monsieur, don't let that trouble you," was the reply; "it was only to let the other man know I had finished with you and that he is to send me the next customer. You see, we haven't a bell in this room."

W. T. E.

THE GREAT

TWENTY TEAZER MYSTERY.

IT TURNS OUT TO BE A PROVOKING LITTLE DEMON OF THE

PIGS in CLOVER & 15 PUZZLE TYPE

WAS DISCOVERED IN "PEARSON'S WEEKLY" OFFICE,

Was Adopted by the Editor,

AND WILL NOW BE TURNED LOOSE ON A LONG-SUFFERING BRITISH PUBLIC,

TO SEND SOME CRAZY,

TO AMUSE OTHERS,

And GENERALLY MAKE A NUISANCE OF ITSELF.

During the past twelve months the British public have been kept in an uneasy state of mind. First there was the war in South Africa, then the China Peril, then the General Election. Business has been in a state of stagnation, and men have grown old very quickly. Now a new trouble has arisen. The proprietors of Pearson's Weekly have discovered a puzzle more demoniacal, more perplexing, more fascinating, more calculated to waste valuable time and send people distracted than either Pigs in Clover or the Fifteen Puzzle.

It's a simple, inoffensive little thing, too—to look at. The sort of thing you approach with calm confidence one day and give up six months later because your friends have put you under restraint.

It consists of four square blocks of wood in a box. On the six sides of each square there is a number. You have to make four of these sides total up to twenty each all at once. Strong men have given the thing up in despair, and weak men have wept bitter tears of humiliation over wasted efforts to get it right. This little box of concentrated fiendishness only costs SIXPENCE, and will be on sale at Messrs. Smith's bookstalls, all newsagents, and fancy shops next Thursday.

TRY IT.

Digitized by Google

THE CAPTAIN'S WIFE.

A Tale of the American Civil War.

"I AIN'T minding other folks' business, nor never was," said the third-sergeant as he placed a rasher of bacon on the winter-hut fireplace, "but I'll go as far as to say that it don't look right."

"Of course it don't," said the second-sergeant as he put his coffee to boil, "and I guess there'll be a row about it before long. It don't look right, and it ain't military discipline."

"What are you fellows gassing about?" asked the orderly-sergeant as he came in for fire to light his pipe.

"You couldn't guess in four years' time, and I won't keep you tremblin' and shiverin'. The Captain's wife has come."

"You don't say so."

"Yes, she has. Come down to stay the winter in quarters with him, and Company D is just talking itself hoarse about it. Did you ever hear of such a thing?"

"I'll be hanged if I did. A funny thing he never said anything to me about it. Well, well."

"And we was saying," said the second-sergeant as he lifted his eyes from the coffee-cup—"we was saying that it wasn't discipline and didn't look right. Just think of a woman down here! And I'll tell you what's going to happen. She's going to poke about and talk and interfere and break up this Company. They say she used to twist her husband round her thumb when she was at home, and why wouldn't she do it here? If she happens to get down on you or me or Jim what's goin' to save us from bein' broken up?"

"Great snakes!" whispered the orderly as he sat down to his smoke.

"Well, what are you goin' to do about it?" asked the third-sergeant after a pause.

"Dunno."

"Better find out pretty quick, I guess, if you don't want to see trouble. Can't no woman be down here without wanting to run the show and Captain Shattuck? You might go and tell him how we all feel about it."

"Yes, perhaps I ought to speak to the Captain," mused the orderly, "but I'll wait and think it over. I ain't for havin' women down here, but I'm in no hurry to lose my stripes and go back into the ranks. I guess we'd better keep quiet, and wait and see what happens."

That closed the talk in the sergeants' quarters, but there was talk among the corporals and among the privates. There was the army in winter quarters, sure of a rest for three or four months, and there was the Captain of Company D with a fine large hut to himself. His colonel and his brigadier had given him permission to send for his wife, but from orderly-sergeant to the last private the men were down on the scheme. As for the lieutenants, one was away on furlough and the other on detail.

There was soon a great change in the men of Company D, but the Captain did not notice it. It was the orderly-sergeant, who was virtually in command, who noticed the glum looks and heard the mutterings. He had made up his mind to stand neutral, and neither encourage nor discourage. Once in a while, when the talk became too strong, he felt it his duty to his superior officer to say:

"Now, then, shut up! P'raps the Captain's wife is goin' to upset the apple-cart, and p'raps she ain't. It's our business to wait and see. She ain't tried to run things so far."

A month had passed and no calamities had occurred. Some of the men began to breathe easier, and to wonder if they hadn't misjudged the kind-faced and smiling little woman who was sacrificing a good deal to be with her husband a few weeks, but others were firm in their first ideas, and soberly shook their heads and replied:

"You just wait. Women ain't fools to show their hands all at once. She's lyin' low, and when she's ready there'll be a sudden and awful bust up."

It was a cavalry command, and every pleasant winter's day the Captain and his wife had a gallop over the highroads. One day an engineer was dispatched to see about repairs to a bridge spanning a creek flowing through the neutral ground between the two armies, and the orderly-sergeant of Company D was detailed with ten men as an escort. The bridge was reached and inspected, and the engineer and his escort were ready for their ride back when there came a sudden alarm.

Half-a-mile down the road, where Captain Shattuck and his wife had debouched from a cross-road while taking an afternoon gallop, they had run full tilt against a Confederate cavalry scout. The enemy had shouted to the Captain to surrender, and as he wheeled his horse to get away a bullet brought him out of the saddle. His wife would have pulled up her steed, but he took the bit in his mouth and was beyond control. As she went flying up the road the scouting party followed. They knew of the small detachment of Federals at the bridge, and were hoping to make a surprise.

"It's the Captain's wife, and the Johnnies are close behind her!" shouted the sergeant as the woman came into view with a great clatter. "Open ranks and let her through, and then close up and give 'em hail Columbia."

Digitized by Google

With a rush and a clatter the horse of the fugitive passed the blue-clad troopers, but came to a dead halt a few rods beyond and turned about. A volley from the carbines checked the pursuers for the moment, but it was seen that they were strong enough to break through, and the sergeant gave the order to fall back to an abandoned log-house a quarter of a mile in the rear.

"Men," exclaimed the woman as she looked from man to man, "do you know that your Captain is back there, wounded and a prisoner? Are you going to leave him there?"

"It's too bad, ma'am, but they are three to one," replied the sergeant. "We'll be lucky if we ain't killed or gobbled up before help comes."

"But I'm going to ride back!" she cried, as her pale face flashed and her voice had a thrill to it. "If you won't go with me to rescue your Captain I'll let them take me prisoner and go to Richmond with him."

"My goodness, but she's a brave one!" whispered man to man.

"Heavens, ma'am," hoarsely whispered the sergeant with admiration in his eyes, "but we'll have the Captain or die! How far down the road was it?"

"Not over half-a-mile."

"And how many rebels in the party?"

"Not over fifty."

"Fifty rebels and ten of us! We'll never do it, but we'll die for the Captain. Into the saddles, boys. Ye'll ride on towards camp with the engineer, ma'am?"

"Not a foot. I'm going with you. Someone give me a revolver."

"By twos—right wheel!" shouted the sergeant as he handed her his revolver and drew his sabre. "Now, then, ride through or over them and don't stop this side of the Captain or destruction."

It was a curious spectacle the grey-clad soldiers witnessed—a woman riding at the head of the charging squadron—a woman with white face and glittering eyes, who held her reins in one hand and used the pistol with deadly effect with the other. Through the thick of them she went, and through the thick of them followed the ten, and fearing that the alarm might have already reached the Federal camps the Confederates disappeared into the woods instead of pursuing.

Down there beyond the bridge the Captain was lying on the ground with a bullet in his shoulder and three men guarding him. The cavalcade swept up to them and surrounded them, and there were three prisoners instead of three guards.

"Excuse me, sir, but it was the Captain's wife who did it all," said the sergeant as he reported to the Colonel. "She not only saved her husband from Libby Prison, but we might all have been wiped out if we'd made a fight for it at the old house."

That evening, as the second and third sergeants ate their evening meals, the third-sergeant looked up and said:

"Well, I ain't mindin' other folk's bizness, nor never was, but I'll go as far as to say——"

"Say, now," interrupted the second-sergeant, "if it hadn't been for your gab the boys wouldn't have made fools of themselves about the Captain's wife comin' down."

"You said as much as I did."

"You're a liar!"

"What're ye mad about? Didn't we all say——"

"Didn't we all say what?" asked the orderly-sergeant as he came into the hut.

"Didn't we all say that a woman had no bizness down here, and that the Captain's wife would bust the Company all to smash?"

"Look here, you fellers," replied the sergeant in menacing tones, "you want to stop your gabbin' and see that all others do the same. This mornin' there was ninety-one fools in Company D. This evenin' there ain't more than one, and I'm looking round to get my paws on him and break his neck."

"Goodness, but I allus knowed the Captain's wife was a daisy," gasped the third-sergeant.

"You bet your bottom dollar," added the second-sergeant.

"Then you finish your grub and rout out the boys, for we're going up to swing our hats and give three cheers for her."

C. B. Lewis.

37 TEN-POUND MEN AND 1 TEN-POUND LADY CAPTURED.

Since last week three more Sealed Envelopes have been claimed, the lucky captors being:

Mr. Thos. Tyzack, 16 Belmont View, Belmont Road, Liverpool,
who captured No. 65 at a Football Match.

Mr. J. Mamelok, 33 and 37 Oxford Street, Manchester, who captured No. 60 in his shop.

Mr. W. Kirk, 129 Hill Street, Sheffield,
who captured No. 64 at a Football Match.

£380 HAS NOW BEEN PAID AWAY,

and there are still a number of Sealed Envelopes awaiting claimants.

There are also ten Ten-Pound Ladies travelling about the country who are only allowed to deliver their Envelopes to ladies.

The celebrated song

"HAVE YOU GOT THAT £10 NOTE?"

is now on sale, and can be obtained from all newsagents for 1s. 4d., or direct from the Song Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., for 1s. 6d. Postal Order (not stamps) post free.

PLAYED ON THE STAGE.

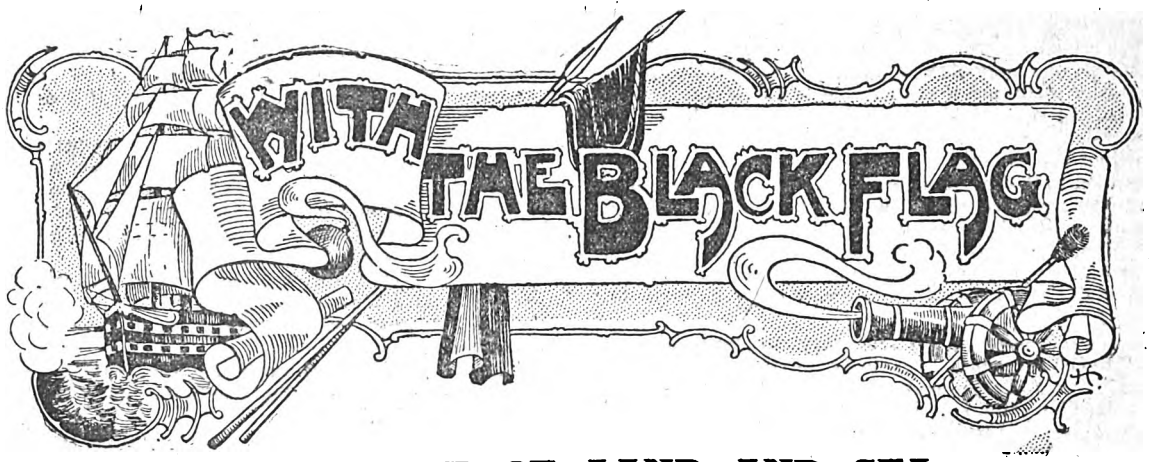
Two sketches have been written on the subject of the Ten-Pound Note Scheme, one lasting about half-an-hour and one fifteen minutes.

In No. 1 Sketch the cast consists of four actors and two actresses. In No. 2 Sketch the cast consists of two actors and one actress.

Any organisers of entertainments for Christmas, such as church bazaars or Christmas parties, or private theatricals, who wish to include either of these sketches in their attractions, should write to the Ten-Pound Sketch Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Full particulars of the Scheme will be sent on application to Room 36, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



A ROMANCE OF LAND AND SEA.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

Author of "With the Red Eagle," "The Phantom City," "Nigel Fortescue," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXII. (concluded).

So we resumed our journey, not very cheerfully perhaps, yet with easy minds.

The country was open, our course north, and the trend of the ground upward, so that we were soon above the lower part of the plain and the level of the river, which was unusually high.

Rosalind and I rode together. We said little, for our hearts were full. She was leaving her home and her kindred, I a place endeared to me by the pleasant memories of several happy months, and the chances were a hundred to one that we should never see it again.

Every now and then we paused and looked backward. I had never seen Manoa more beautiful or Mount Lofty more majestic. It was a lovely morning, too, with a cloudless sky and a brisk air, the sun not being yet so high as to make it unpleasantly warm.

"It is very hard for you, dear," I said taking Rosalind's hand.

"Yes, and my heart is heavy, yet am I glad withal. It had been still harder to see you lying dead as I saw my dear father; and had we tarried that would have been. We are leaving Manoa, but we are going home, for your home will be my home. I have no other now and want no other."

"And it shall be a happy home, darling. I will try to make up to you—hallo, what has happened?"

As though moved by a common impulse all the mules had come to a dead stop, stiffening and stretching out their legs, as sailors do on a rolling ship.

"Heaven help us! An earthquake!" I exclaimed, and slipping out of my saddle I helped Rosalind from hers.

The ground was oscillating so violently that we could scarce keep our feet, the mountains rocked, and there came, as from the bowels of the earth, a moan of muffled thunder, the most appalling sound I had ever heard. Then, with a roar that shook the air, Mount Lofty sent forth a shower of ashes that darkened the sun, followed, in a few seconds, by a dense cloud of steam and smoke above which flamed a great pillar of fire, half as high as itself.

Manoa crumpled up like a piece of paper. The supporting pillars had given way, the mountain fell with a mighty crash, and from its ruins rose a vast cloud of dust.

We were too stupefied either to speak or move, almost to breathe. Rosalind clung to me shuddering, the animals bent their heads and groaned in terror.

When the dust subsided a huge volume of water could be seen pouring down from the foot of Mount Lofty. The lake had burst its banks and the course of the river being blocked, the flood came on apace, dashing the heap of débris, which was once Manoa, in great waves and rolling wildly over the plain.

The shocks still continued, though at longer intervals and less violently.

"Mount, we must hurry on," cried Santley. "If the quebrada should be blocked we are lost. There is no other way out."

The quebrada was the defile where the Manoeros had destroyed the Spanish invaders. So we pushed on, and none too soon, for the flood, fed by the fast melting snow and loosened springs, was following us as with the velocity of a tidal wave.

In three hours we reached the quebrada. It was still open, yet before we got through the shocks recommenced and we were in great danger from falling stones, but as to halt might have been fatal we went on as swiftly as our mules could be made to go, and presently gained open ground when, the shocks having ceased, we were able to take a rest.

But for one of our party it came too late. As we lifted Mistress Wyvenhoe from her mule she swooned away, and within an hour died of exhaustion and grief.

This, albeit a great misfortune, was less felt, even by her daughters, than in other circumstances it would have been. We had undergone so many emotions and supped so full of horrors as to be almost past feeling either sorrow or surprise, and all knew that it had been hardly possible for the poor lady to survive the hardships and dangers that still lay before us. Moreover, we dared not linger. We were on a wind swept height, many thousand feet above the sea level. After sunset the cold would be piercing, and unless before dark we reached some place where shelter might be obtained, neither Rosalind nor Diana, perhaps none of us, could outlive the night.

The poor lady's body was laid in a shallow grave, dug with difficulty, over which we placed a heavy stone. Then, silent and depressed, we continued our flight, and after two short halts for refreshment and rest came to an Indian hamlet, where we found lodgings, as Tamanac had said we should.

We set out early the next morning for the Paramos, following a track that wound among wild mountains, covered with forests that overhung the road and almost excluded the light of day. The trees were the largest I had yet seen, being continually watered by the clouds they attract, from which falls an incessant rain. Late in the day we arrived, thoroughly drenched, at another hamlet known to the Cazique, where we dried our clothes and passed the night. Left to ourselves, or with a less efficient guide, we should of a surety have perished in those terrible wilds.

Digitized by Google

The next day was the most trying of all. We had to cross a "paramo," which signifies a strait pass, sunless at high noon, and often swept by icy blasts so violent as to prove fatal, both to man and beast. The way was strewn with the bones of unfortunates who had attempted the passage in bad weather; and its terrors were further enhanced by its loneliness and gloom.

Not a living creature did we meet; the silence was broken only by the screams of unseen condors and the murmurs of the distant waterfalls. Twice we had to dismount and lie down to avoid the force of the blast, which at times was fierce enough to stop a strong man. One of the mules died.

Fortunately for us the paramo chosen by Tamanac was not long and the weather was not bad, and in the end we won through without disaster, though Rosalind and her sisters were only just alive. But the sunshine into which we presently emerged and a rest before a fire in an Indian's hut restored their strength, and the thought that we had overcome our chief difficulties, and that there was a fair prospect of our gaining the coast gave them courage and hope.

From this point our journey, though tedious and slow, was neither eventful nor hard. We descended into more genial climes, and ere long were marching through verdant valleys, under a burning sun.

But though the elements were propitious the whole of Spanish South America was in revolt against Spain, and for the sake of our fair companions we had to travel with great circumspection, often making long halts, while Tamanac went ahead to scout and gather information.

Every route to the sea was more or less dangerous, but that to Guayaquil being, as we heard, less so than any other, we shaped our course in that direction and arrived thither five weeks after leaving Manoa.

A little while previously the place had been taken by the patriots, from whom—Bolivar and Urdenetta being out of the way—we had nothing to fear.

Guayaquil is situated on a plain, watered by a noble river and begirt with plantations and orange groves, but the dirtiest town I ever saw. Its only scavengers are vultures and masterless dogs, and the posada, where we put up, was if possible, less cleanly than an Indian pulperia.

However, there were shops at which we could replenish our kits and obtain the garments of civilisation, and so soon as I had made myself presentable I sought information as to whether it was possible to obtain passages to England, either at Guayaquil or any other place on the coast.

Hearing, in the course of my inquiries, that a Chilian cruiser, commanded by an Englishman, had just come into port, I thought I could not do better than see him, and so took a boat and went on board.

To my unspeakable surprise the first man I saw as I stepped on deck was Cautley.

"Wyvenhoe! Good gracious! Where do you come from?" he exclaimed, taking both my hands.

"From the other side of the Andes; and you, old friend?" I answered and asked.

"From the other side of the continent; but come into my cabin and I will tell you all about it. By jove! The idea of our meeting here! I feared you were dead."

"Not yet, thank goodness. How is Mrs. Barnish?"

"There is no Mrs. Barnish. She is my wife and I left her at Valparaiso. You are as single as ever, I suppose?"

"No, sir, I am as much married as a Christian gentleman can be, and I left my wife at the posada."

"Hurrah! We are both in the same boat then, and not for the first time, either. Yet you always pretended to be dead set against matrimony. How did it happen?"

The first man I saw on deck was Cautley.

On this, I related briefly what had befallen me since we parted, reserving a fuller account for a more convenient opportunity, and inquired how Cautley had fared.

"On the whole not badly," he answered. "I did good work with those flecheras, took a lot of prizes, but do what I might, my Zambos would cut their prisoners' throats, and as I could not get a penny either of prize money or pay, and had to serve under an admiral who was both a lubber and a coward, I chucked it up and got a ship in the Chilian navy, which, as you may have heard, is now commanded by Admiral Lord Cochrane. You will be pleased to hear that before I left the Venezuelan service I had the satisfaction of hanging that scoundrel, Conroy. I have heard nothing more of Molyneux, but I think he must have got his quietus. Mrs. Barnish and I were married at Port-of-Spain. We spent our honeymoon on the sea, on the passage to Valparaiso, where we have a house. That, shortly told, is my tale."

I need hardly say that Cautley was presently introduced to my wife and her relatives, or that an offer which he made to convey us all to Valparaiso, was gladly accepted. Thither, after a painful parting with Tamanac, we sailed and arrived in due course.

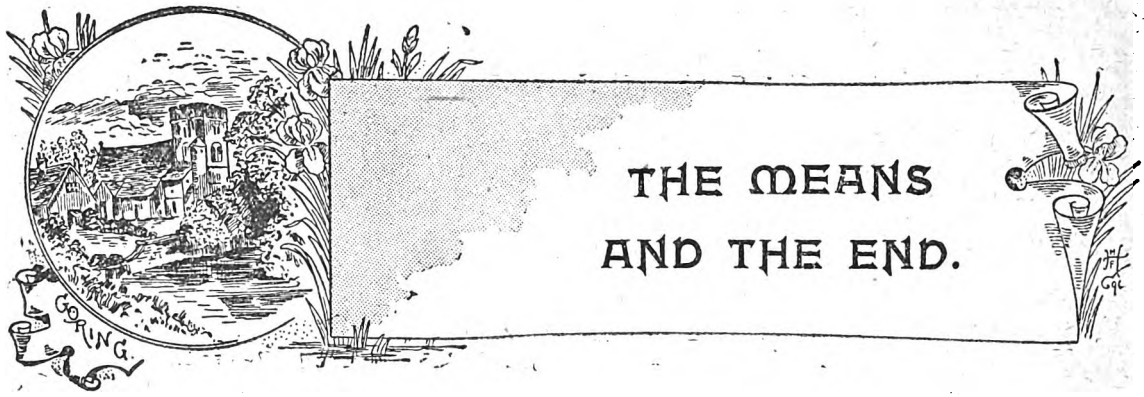
A while afterwards there were other partings—with the Cautleys as well as with Santley and Diana, for Don Iago having obtained an appointment under the Chilian government decided to settle in Chili.

Rosalind, with my full consent, divided between her sisters the golden dower which she had received from her father.

Beatrice accompanied us to England, and stayed as our guest at Wyvenhoe Court until Providence and a gentleman provided her with a home of her own.

THE END.

Digitized by Google



THE MEANS AND THE END.

THE old problem about doing wrong that good may come of it has been the subject of many discussions, so it is not surprising that my wife and I should have had some difference of opinion on that very point. She is a good woman, upright in all her dealings, but she stands firm to the opinion that it may, in certain exceptional cases, be justifiable to do a thing that is wrong in order that good may result from it.

Mind you, she does not say that it is justifiable anyhow, but only in exceptional cases, when you are convinced that your wrong doing will be the means of having justice done to somebody. She is strong on this point, because of an incident with which she was connected in a slight degree, and she always brings forward that experience in support of her argument whenever this subject is talked about. You will understand me better if you imagine that you are sitting with us in our cosy parlour, and listening to my wife as she tells the story:

"It was while I was in the service of Sir William Ashburton at the Lindens, acting as companion to Miss Eva, his daughter.

"Sir William was rather a peppery old gentleman—we called him 'old,' but he was only a little over fifty—and he was accustomed to have his own way. Everybody yielded to his wishes, and when he set his mind upon a thing, that thing had to be done or there was trouble. Lady Ashburton had died while the two children were young, and they had been brought up in the belief that whatever their father said was to be done, must be done.

"Things went on all right until Mr. Frederick was twenty-five, and then Sir William took it into his head that his son ought to marry."

"That was sensible enough!" I broke in.

"Don't you interrupt!" said my wife severely.

So, like an obedient husband, I kept silent until she finished the story.

"Frederick Ashburton had no objection to marrying when he met a woman who, in his opinion, would make him a good wife and whom he could love as a husband should love the partner of his joys and sorrows. But that was just the point where the father and son were at variance.

"Sir William was connected with a Mr. Hoare, a gentleman who owned property about five miles from the Lindens. The baronet and Mr. Hoare had had some business or some financial transactions together. I don't know quite what it was, but they were pretty friendly. Mr. Hoare had an only child, a daughter named Mabel, who was about two years younger than Frederick, and Sir William conceived the idea that his son should marry Mr. Hoare's daughter.

"The baronet called his son into the library one morning quite unexpectedly, and told him that he wished him to marry Mabel Hoare. Frederick protested; he said that he had not an atom of love for that young lady, that she was not the kind of girl to whom he could ally himself for life, and that he must refuse to obey his father's injunction that he would go that morning and arrange the engagement.

"'Nonsense!' raved Sir William, getting into a fury at the idea of having his wish thwarted. 'The girl's as good as any other, and she is quite willing.'

"'I have nothing to say against Miss Hoare,' replied Frederick quite calmly. 'I am not a piece of merchandise to be disposed of no matter what my feelings may be, and I cannot marry her.'

"'But you must!' cried the baronet. 'I have set my heart upon it.'

"'I am sorry to disappoint you, sir, but if Miss Hoare is willing to be disposed of like a piece of merchandise, I have not the slightest intention of marrying her!'

"'I suppose you have got yourself entangled with some low-born actress or adventuress who is anxious to become Lady Ashburton,' sneered the baronet.

"'I have done nothing of the kind, sir.'

"'Very well, then you will either marry Mabel or go your own way. To-morrow you will either be engaged to her or I shall send for my lawyer to draw up a fresh will, leaving everything to your cousin Percy. You will remember the property is not entailed.'

"The upshot of the whole business was that Frederick left home the following morning and before the week was out a new will was made. He was too much his father's son to be coerced into marriage, and as he had an income from his mother, which was sufficient for his requirements, there was no danger of him starving. With reference to the other party to the contract, Mabel Hoare had been so used to being ruled by her father, that she would have acquiesced in his arrangements without any demur.

"The only one to display any grief at the turn things had taken was Miss Eva, who deeply loved her brother, and who strongly resented the idea of her cousin reigning in the place which should have been his. Once, and once only, she tried to soften the old baronet's heart with her intreaties, but she only raised a storm and was forbidden to mention the subject again.

Digitized by Google

"Thus matters stood until a paralytic seizure carried off the old baronet. The night before this took place he had mentioned his son's name for the first time since his veto on the subject, and producing the will, had told Miss Eva its contents. Next morning his valet had knocked at the baronet's door several times without receiving any reply and eventually, becoming alarmed, he entered the room, to find his master unconscious. A physician was hastily summoned, but on his arrival the only hope he could give was that Sir William might possibly regain consciousness but recovery was out of the question.

"Miss Eva telegraphed to her brother, with whom she had kept in communication, but before he arrived the old baronet was dead.

"'It was after his death that we made a discovery that astounded us,' said Sir Frederick. 'No will could be found. His lawyer and I searched his papers for the document which had been drawn up and witnessed six weeks before, but it could not be found. My sister was asked to assist us in the search, but instead of doing so she looked at me with a curious smile and quietly informed us that she knew there was no will.'

"'But I drew one up only a few weeks ago,' said the solicitor, 'though I can assure you it was with extreme regret, but I could only do as instructed.'

"'I know all about that will,' replied my sister. 'The night previous to my father's seizure he called me into the library, and there in his presence, and at his request, I destroyed the will which left everything to Percy. My father expressed his intention of sending for his lawyer next day, but as you know, next morning he was powerless and he died without ever regaining his speech, though he recovered consciousness just at the last.'

"'That being the case,' said the solicitor, 'I shall have the pleasure of congratulating you, Sir Frederick, and I am heartily glad to do so.'

"This then was the explanation of my mistress's ramblings. The question now was whether the will had been destroyed or had Miss Eva hidden it. On one point Sir Frederick was firm. Upon no consideration would he retain possession of what was legally, if not justly, the property of his cousin.

"After a long discussion we decided upon the course to take.

"As long as Miss Eva bore the burden of her sin—though I am not sure that is the right word for it—so long would our efforts be in vain.

"The disclosure would no doubt be painful to her, argued the doctor, but after the first shock there would be a relaxing of the tension which would bring relief to the troubled mind.

"Immediately we had come to a decision Dr. Sumners and I went up to Miss Eva's room, where she was lying in bed in a thoroughly exhausted condition. She was awake and accordingly I slipped out again to fetch Sir Frederick, while the doctor endeavoured to prepare her for the interview with her brother.

"When we returned she was quietly weeping on her pillow.

"Sir Frederick went straight to her bedside and quietly kissed her.

"'Now, darling,' he said, 'we have not come to scold you, so dry those tears.'

"Turning to Dr. Sumners he quietly asked if he had told her of the disclosures of the night, and upon

THE

"WHITE MAN'S BURDEN."

Facts About Corpulence.

The burden of adipose tissue under which so many men and women suffer, with more or less patience and resignation, is one which none need bear who will listen to the teachings of science as set forth in a little book entitled "Corpulency and its Cure," by Mr. F. Cecil Russell, a well-known specialist, who has devoted many years of study to the subject—for however alarming it may sound to those who have a tendency to fatness, obesity is an undesirable encumbrance, and must be treated accordingly. It is singular indeed, that the medical profession should have given so little attention to the causes and the cure of this distressing malady, especially when it is known that an abnormal weight of fat accumulating around the internal organs leads not unfrequently to what is called fatty degeneration of the heart and liver. In Mr. Russell's treatise, which has recently reached its eighteenth edition (a significant proof of its popularity), the subject is treated with great thoroughness and lucidity. Eschewing the usual obscurities of scientific terminology, the author explains in good homespun English the origin of fat, the causes and the dangers of its undue accumulation, and the symptoms of the various ailments engendered thereby. Furthermore, Mr. Russell goes exhaustively into his unique method of treatment, and gives the ingredients (which are purely vegetable and absolutely harmless) of the preparation with which his name is associated. "Doing Russell" is a not uncommon phrase, and certainly one which has no terrors for those who have gone through this really agreeable treatment. The system is, in fact, as admirably simple as it is marvellously efficacious. It entails but slight interference with one's ordinary dietary, there are no arbitrary restrictions of any sort, and the preparation Mr. Russell prescribes is of so pleasant a kind that many persons take it, diluted with water, as a table beverage. This is no starvation régime; on the contrary, whilst the reduction of adipose matter is being effected, safely and surely, at the rate of no less than from 3lb. to 4lb. per week (sometimes considerably more), the appetite is improved, the system is gradually toned up, and strength, energy, and vitality are increased. The dainty little book under notice can be obtained by any of our readers who will send two penny stamps to Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London. Hundreds of grateful and enthusiastic letters from "ex-corpulents" are printed in this interesting work.

Digitized by Google

receiving an affirmative nod he again turned to his sister, who was trembling like a leaf.

"'Now, little girl,' he said, 'I know it was your love for me that prompted your action, but you know, Eva, I cannot retain what is not legally mine. My mother's legacy is sufficient for my needs, so I shall not be reduced to begging my bread, or even seeking a situation as a clerk in a merchant's office. I don't want you to excite yourself and do harm, but just tell me quietly what became of the will which my father made.'

"'Shall I be prosecuted for fraud,' she asked pitifully.

"'No, little goose,' replied Sir Frederick. 'Trust me to arrange everything. The outside world will never know anything about it.'

"Then we got the story, slowly and painfully told.

"When the doctor's pronouncement had been made and she knew that there was no hope of her father's recovery, her heart rose in rebellion at the thought of her cousin reigning in her brother's stead, and when her father eventually died without regaining the power of speech, she decided upon the act which was to insure Sir Frederick getting what she considered to be rightfully his.

"When she left the death-chamber to go to her room she had obtained possession of her father's keys, and hastily rushing to the library, she secured the will which she had seen him place in his desk the previous night, and in the security of her own room, she tore it into fragments and then reduced it to ashes. From that moment she knew no peace, but in her conscious moments she would have died rather than have divulged the secret of the missing will.

"When the story was told Sir Frederick spoke to her with added tenderness. He was deeply moved by this evidence of his sister's devotion, but he was too honourable to wish to avail himself of it. Miss Eva was quite exhausted when she had finished, and administering an opiate we left her.

"Sir Frederick's first act was to dispatch an urgent wire, reply paid, to his cousin, who was in London, summoning him to the Grange, and in a short time the reply came, informing us that he was starting at once. During the period of waiting Sir Frederick busied himself in the library, Dr. Sumners went off to visit his other patients, having first promised to return in the evening, and I retired to obtain some rest, but so great was my interest that sleep was out of the question.

"Percy Ashburton arrived about eight that evening. He was a fine fellow, with an athletic form and frank open countenance, and when I was introduced to him I thought there was not much fear of him causing any unpleasantness, and the subsequent proceedings showed that I had judged him correctly.

"When Dr. Sumners arrived we adjourned to the library and there Percy Ashburton was enlightened as to the nature of the business upon which he had been called to the Grange. I felt quite sorry for Sir Frederick, for it was very evident that the story of his sister's sin—I can't reconcile myself to that word, by the way—was an extremely painful one for him to tell.

"The man whom she would have deprived of his legacy listened in silence until Sir Frederick had finished, and then he burst out:

"'What a brick your sister must be, old fellow.'

"'I'm afraid that is hardly the question,' replied Sir Frederick.

"'Well, let us get the business settled at once,' went on his cousin. 'You don't imagine I am going to turn you out, do you? If your father was unjust I am not going to take advantage of his injustice, so that's settled without the assistance of any lawyers. But I wish I had a sister like yours.'

"To say that Sir Frederick was astonished quite fails to express the situation.

"Then commenced an argument. Both insisted on the other taking possession, but Percy absolutely refused to have anything to do with the estate.

"'You may argue till doomsday, old fellow, but you won't shake my resolution. I'm as obstinate as any mule that ever kicked,' he said, 'and so there's an end of the matter.'

"And so it was. Sir Frederick had to give way in the end, for you know you can't force a man into taking possession.

"He stayed on for a few days at the Grange, but he absolutely refused to discuss the subject again.

"'Look here, old man,' he said one day when Sir Frederick wanted to introduce the subject, 'it appears to me I have more respect for your sister than you have. If I bundled you out, there would have to be some explanation. As it is, nobody beyond those who already know—and I am sure they will treat the subject confidentially—need know anything about it, and so will you oblige me by shutting up.'

"So Percy Ashburton returned to his briefs and Sir Frederick retained possession.

"Percy had refused to see Miss Eva, as he was afraid it would be painful to her to meet him, but when she had regained her strength, which she began to do soon after getting rid of her burden, she insisted upon him being invited to the Grange, so that she might express her regret and her gratitude at the same time.

"His admiration of the 'brick of a sister' had by no means diminished in the interval, for about six months after I left the Grange I received an invitation to a wedding there, the contracting parties being, to put it in the language of newspaper men, Percy Ashburton, Esq., barrister, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, and Miss Eva Ashburton, only daughter of the late Sir William Ashburton, of the Grange, Templestowe.

"The happy man took the opportunity of privately informing me that he thought he had done better than he would have done by taking the Grange, and the Lindens got a tenant after all, as Sir Frederick handed the place over as a wedding present.

"Now, John, was Miss Eva justified in her act?" asked my wife in conclusion.

"Well," replied I, "as events turned out so happily it hardly seems worth while discussing it now, but I am afraid if Percy Ashburton had been a different sort of chap, there might have been a very disagreeable sequel to the business."

"Oh! don't be so matter-of-fact, John, in your remarks. Eva Ashburton was and is one of the dearest girls that ever breathed," replied my wife, and to avoid further discussion I assented, briefly remarking that I had the honour of very close acquaintance with another equally dear girl, to which the only reply I got was "You silly old flatterer," and the discussion was allowed to drop, as the reporters say.

But what is your opinion, my worthy readers? Was it a justifiable sin?

Percy Ashburton, who is a barrister, says it was, and being a barrister, his opinion should have some weight, but then he is prejudiced in the fair sinner's favour.

J. H. Peat and G. Day.

Digitized by Google

BIG PRIZE SCHEME

For MARCH, 1901.

25,602 PRIZES, value £10,000

LIST OF PRIZES:

1 Cash Prize £50	£50 0
1 Cash Prize £40	40 0
10 Handsome Pianos, in walnut, £40 each	400 0
5 Cash Prizes, £25 each ...	125 0
10 Gents' Bicycles, Freewheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10 Ladies' Bicycles, Free-wheels, £17 17s.	178 10
10 Cash Prizes, £10 each ...	100 0
20 Jones's Sewing Machines, £3 each	160 0
20 Cash Prizes, £5 each ...	100 0
50 Rolled Gold Lever Watches, £2 10s. each	125 0
100 Cash Prizes, £2 each ...	200 0
50 Dinner Services (56 pieces), £2 each	100 0
50 Folding Bed Chairs, £2 each	100 0
50 Ladies' Travelling Trunks, £2 each	100 0
200 Cash Prizes, £1 each ...	200 0
200 Ladies' Leather Hatboxes, £1 each	200 0
100 Basket Arm Chairs, upholstered, £1	100 0
400 pairs Blankets, 15s. per pair	300 0
200 ½-doz Electro-plated Forks, large, 15s. per ½ doz. ...	150 0
200 ½-doz. Electro-plated Forks, small, 15s. per ½-doz. ...	£150 0
500 Ladies' Umbrellas, 15/- ea.	375 0
500 Gents' Umbrellas, 15s. each	375 0
400 Best Electro-plated Teapots, 15s. each	300 0
400 Handsome Meat Carvers, with Steel in Case, 15s. set	300 0
1000 Cash Prizes, 10s. each ...	500 0
1000 pairs Bed Sheets 10s. each	500 0
1000 White Linen Table Cloths, 10s. each	500 0
1000 Ladies' Umbrellas, 7/6 each	375 0
1000 Ladies' Leather Purses, 7/6 each	375 0
200 ½-doz. Table Knives, 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
200 ½-doz. Dessert do., 7/6 per ½-doz.	75 0
2000 Ladies' Dress Lengths, Navy Blue Serge, 7/6 each...	750 0
2000 Cash Prizes of 5s each ...	500 0
4715 Ladies' Leather Handbags, 4s. each	943 0
4000 ½-doz. Fine Linen Cambric Handkerchiefs, 2/6 per ½-doz.	500 0
4000 Handsome Work-boxes, 2/6 each	500 0
25,602	£10,000 0

CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION.

Every tablet of Watson's Matchless Cleanser is enclosed in a Wrapper, with signature up the centre of same. Save the WHOLE Wrapper (tops of Wrappers will be disqualified), and send, postage or carriage paid, to Joseph Watson & Sons Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, Leeds, not later than MARCH 31ST, 1901. Each package will be counted as one lot; separate entries must be sent under separate covers. If any parcel arrives, postage or carriage not being fully paid, such parcel will be refused. Be careful to see that the full postage is paid. Each parcel sent in must contain the full name and address of sender, and number of Wrappers sent in must be marked on the same paper. On outside of parcel write legibly "Prize Competition." The prizes will be awarded in the above order to the senders of the highest numbers of Wrappers. A list, giving result of the Competition, will be sent with each prize when it is sent out. Every wrapper must have first contained soap. No employee of Joseph Watson & Sons Limited will be eligible. All prizes will be despatched about April 25th.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

The Best Soap for all purposes, still holds the lead. Quality perfect. Is the Housewife's Friend. It saves her health, her strength, her wealth; washes her clothes with ease and leaves them sweet and pure, and will not injure the most delicate fabric. It has the largest sale of 1-lb. tablets in the world. Sold by all Grocers, Oilmen, &c., throughout the United Kingdom. Buy it. Prove it and secure a Prize.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

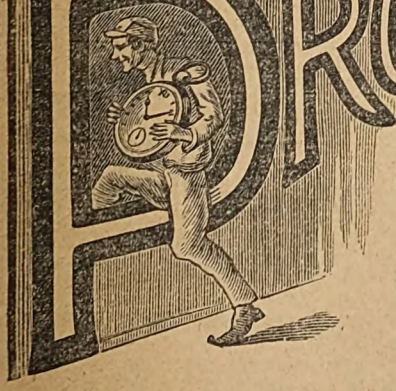
In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

PROCRASTINATION



TIME'S THIEF

is ever at work affecting our opportunities. You have a chance of saving nearly fifty per cent. on your outlay on the

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

you intend bestowing on your relatives and friends.

Don't Waste Time Thinking, but Write To-day

FOR H. SAMUEL'S BARGAIN BOOK.

By return of post you will receive

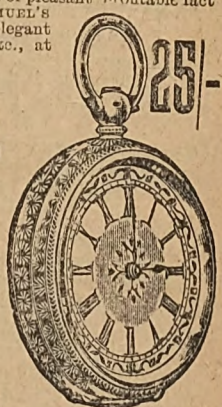
A HANDSOME ALBUM

ABSOLUTELY FREE OF ALL CHARGE TO YOU.

The pages of this unique work glow with an intertaining succession of pleasant profitable facts and fancies, in the shape of 3,000 pictures, and descriptions of H. SAMUEL'S Bargains in Gold and Silver Watches, Diamonds, and a vast array of Elegant New Jewellery of extraordinary value, Clocks, Cutlery, Plate, &c., at Remarkably Low Prices, and forming an endless array of

Suggestions for

CHRISTMAS GIFTS



Each Catalogue contains full particulars of

H. SAMUEL'S SYSTEM OF BONUS REWARDS

for Purchasers, ten Lists of Presents being enclosed to select from.

You are invited to practically test the wonderful value H. SAMUEL gives. A Post Office Order for 25/- will bring you H. SAMUEL'S MARVEL LADY'S "ACME" WATCH (as illustrated) in SOLID STERLING SILVER ENGRAVED CASE, fine ¾-Plate Movement, extra jewelled, richly decorated dial (plain, if preferred), and fitted with H. SAMUEL'S Special Improvements protected by HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT. Compare these with those sold at THREE GUINEAS elsewhere. FIVE YEARS' WARRANTY.

A MONTH'S FREE TRIAL

with every article, and will refund money in full, or exchange goods if there is any dissatisfaction.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29), 95, 97, 99, 101, 33, 89, and 121 MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

FOOTBALL SKILL COMPETITION

£100 PRIZE AWARDED EVERY WEEK.

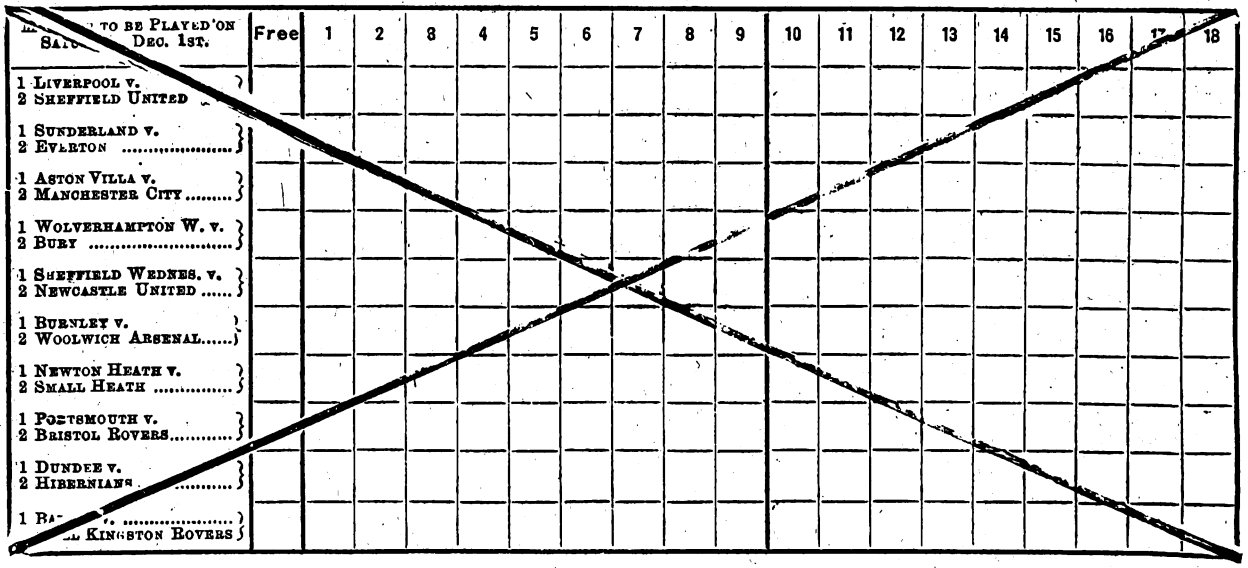
Result of Competition No. 5.

The following three competitors sent in the correct forecast of all the matches, and the £100 has consequently been divided between them, each receiving £33 6s. 8d.: F. GIRLING, Aldringham, near Saxmundham, Suffolk; S. A. SMITH, Campbell Villa, Campbell Road, Salisbury; D. W. MADGE, 27 Sutherland Avenue, London, W.

Notts Forest, Liverpool, Sunderland, Manchester City, Walsall, Woolwich Arsenal, and Southampton won their matches; the remainder were drawn games.

The football matches named below will be played on Saturday, December 1st. To the competitor from whom we receive the correct result of all these matches we will pay the sum of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. If no competitor gives all the results correctly, the HUNDRED POUNDS will be awarded to the person or persons most nearly correct.

FOOTBALL COUPON No. 8. Matches to be played on Saturday, December 1st.



The clubs engaged in each match are numbered 1 and 2. To fill in the above coupon, insert in the space provided the number of the club selected to win. To predict a draw, put X. THE FIRST COUPON IS FREE. A penny stamp must be inclosed for each coupon used in addition to the free one. Nine extra coupons may be used for Sixpence, and eighteen extra coupons for One Shilling.

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page.

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. All coupons must reach us not later than Friday, November 30th, first post.
3. Competitors should cut out the whole coupon, score it as directed, put their name and address in the space provided, and send to "COUPON No. 8," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.
4. All coupons are at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
5. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.
6. In the event of a tie the prize will be divided.
7. Competitors may send in any number of attempts.
8. It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains valuable information and statistics showing the previous records of the various clubs, and the particulars of the points of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in determining the chances of the teams engaged. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

CURES GOITRE.

Remarkable Discovery That Cures This Dangerous and Disfiguring Disease Without Pain, Operation or Inconvenience.

TRIAL PACKAGE SENT FREE.

Dr. John P. Haig, a well known Cincinnati physician has had marvellous success with a remedy that cures Goitre or Thick Neck. And owing to the fact that most sufferers believe

Mrs. Lillian Brown, who was entirely cured of Goitre after suffering 22 years.

Goitre is incurable Dr. Haig sends a free trial package of his discovery so that patients may try and know positively that Goitre can be cured at home without pain, danger, operation or any inconvenience. Send your name and address to Dr. John P. Haig, 333 Glenn Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A., and he will forward the treatment postage prepaid. Do not fail to get this wonderful remedy. In Rio Janeiro, Brazil, S. A., 60,000 patients in that infected district were cured with this same remedy, and wherever used its success has been marvellous.

Write at once, send name and address to-day, and Dr. Haig will be glad to send you a trial package of the remedy free. Do not delay.

Remember a letter to us from Great Britain requires 2½d postage. Write your name very plain and be sure to give your full address so there can be no mistake in delivery.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief if you suffer from cough try them but once they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s½d. tins.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street London, W.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.
184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.,
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

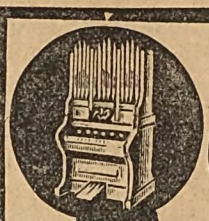
1,000 CYCLES.

1/6 1/6

FREE. FREE.

Our Ladies' or Gents' Link will be sent free of any charge for delivery on receipt of 1s. 6d. These are not American or foreign trash, but are made in England. This is our first advertisement, and by it we are determined to bring our name before the public, so this offer will only hold good to the readers of this paper for the next fourteen days. We will send with the bicycle a nickel silver lamp and pump, and the whole will be packed in a wood crate and sent to your address free, immediately you take advantage of this advertisement and the offer we will send. A written guarantee given with each bicycle. We give these machines away to encourage you to become agents for us If the bicycles are all given away your 1s. 6d. will be returned. Send 1s. 6d. and stamped addressed envelope for receipt. Address, the

London Direct Supply Company,
4 Duke St., Strand, London, W.C.
Mention this paper.



An Organ in Miniature!

WITH 2 FULL SETS OF REEDS, AND 3 BEAUTIFUL CONTROLLING STOPS.

All that the most finished musician can produce upon a 50 Guinea Piano or Organ may be produced upon the

'Orchestral.'

It is a marvel of ingenuity and construction and is an ideal musical instrument for the home. It requires no teaching,—

A CHILD . . CAN PLAY IT.

Perfectly simple, and cannot get out of order. Money returned if not satisfactory.

Also supplied on Easy Terms.

FREE

To all applicants our new and handsomely-illustrated catalogue of Watches, Cutlery, Plate, Jewellery, etc., contains a wealth of useful and interesting information.

J. M. DRAPER
DEPT., 366,
Organette Works, BLACKBURN

J.M. DRAPER'S ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE

THE MUSICAL MARVEL OF THE AGE,

35/-

Equal in value to a £4 4s. Instrument.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Barnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £2 will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solutions of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £2 will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one sheet of paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C., by first post on Monday, December 10th, 1900.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 253.

Re-arrange the following letters so as to form a well-known proverb:

AAA BB DDD C H III LLL NNNN OOOOO SS TTT WW YY.

No. 254.

When re-arranged,

A full two-thirds of reckon; plus half of leek; three-fifths of Dewey; a half of mine; a sixth of Hughie, will give a town in Yorkshire.

No. 255.

The initials and finals of equivalents of the following will give the names of two well-known Generals:

A measure; a fruit; a messenger of death; a period; a term in music and poetry; business; the answer.

No. 256.

My FIRST is myself,
An egotist quite;
My SECOND'S a wood
That is usually white.
My WHOLE is a state,
That most would admit;
My FIRST should make haste
And live up to it.

No. 257.

What word is that which, read forward, is a conveyance; backward, not the whole; and, beheaded, a sharp blow?

No. 258.

Form a word-square from equivalents of the following:

Part of a teapot; a gardening operation; a well-known novelist; beneath; indicative of grief.

Next week, an entirely new sort of Picture Competition will begin.

FOOTBALL WHO'S WHO.

Cloth, price 1s. net.

Post Free 1s. 3d.

Contains the biographies of nearly 1,000 of the best-known players, together with statistics and much general information relating to all the prominent Association Clubs. It gives information as to the various leagues, cups, and other trophies, rules, fixtures, etc., etc., and will be found invaluable to all followers of football.

Copies may be had from any Bookseller or from the Publisher,

17 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

SHORT STORIES ADVERTISEMENT RATES.

Single column, per inch, per insertion	£0 10 0
Double " " "	1 0 0
Full page inside, facing page of matter, either white paper or 2nd or 3rd page of cover, or back page, per insertion	10 0 0
Half-page " " "	5 0 0
Quarter-page " "	2 10 0
Eighth-page " "	1 5 0
Front page, whole " "	12 10 0
" half " "	6 5 0

All spaces above one-eighth of a page are charged at per page rate.

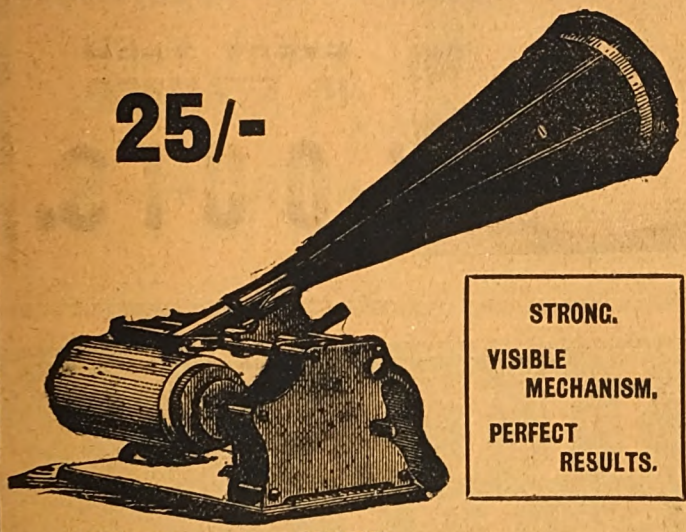
Series discount: 5 per cent. for 13, 10 per cent. for 26, 15 per cent. for 52 insertions.

Black blocks are charged 25 per cent. extra. All advertisements are subject to approval. All copy must be sent in by Noon on Tuesday, Dec. 4th, if intended for the issue on sale Dec. 18th, and dated December 22nd. The Proprietors reserve the right to hold over or suspend the insertion of any advertisement without prejudice to other insertions on order. All communications should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "Pearson's Weekly" Offices, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Printed and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A GRAPHOPHONE FOR 25/-



25/-

Reproduces Same Records as all Small Cylinder Talking Machines.

Makes Music in the Home, and is an Inexhaustible Source of Amusement and Pleasure.

STRONG.
VISIBLE MECHANISM.
PERFECT RESULTS.

The pleasure in owning a Graphophone is largely increased by being able to make and reproduce your own records. The Graphophone will record your own voice as well as reproduce specially prepared records.

Graphophones are sold from 25s. upwards.

The Toy Graphophone for Children, 8s.

GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION.

Send for Catalogue C. to

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Genl., 122 Oxford Street, London, W.

GUN. 12-bore double barrelled breech-loader, top lever, central fire, rebounding locks, extension rib, walnut pistol stock, new; 38/- approval.—G. V. James, 48 Devonshire Street, Bloomsbury, London.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS
A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.
Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.
THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

2/9 CHALLENCE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

RUPTURE

Gentleman (cured himself) will send Free Particulars of inexpensive self-curative treatment. Stamped address.—(Box 49), 10 Castle Street, Carlisle.

THE DAILY EXPRESS.
HALFPENNY.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.
DEVONSHIRE CREAM.
REALLY GENUINE.
In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s.; including tin and postage.
MRS. CONYERS,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

THE "GEO. R. SIMS"
HAIR RENEWER
"TATCHO"

"While you wait"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY.
1s. 6d.
Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

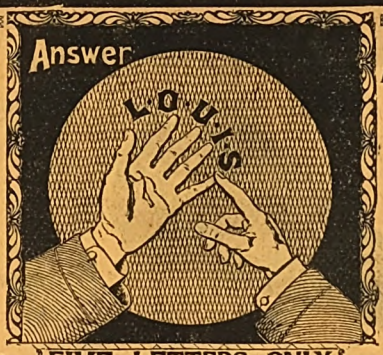
MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:
"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"
If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hairdressers allover the world, 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:
The Geo. R. Sims Co., 81 cGreat Queen St., London, W.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL

VELVETEEN?



Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

Height 12in. Width 7in. Depth 5in.

ALARUM CLOCK, 18/-

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

Any reader of Short Stories can have one of these Alarum Clocks on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2s. 6d. with your name and address, and we will send you one on approbation.

IF you approve of it you send us 3s. 6d. on receipt, and 2s. 6d. each month for 5 months, making the full 18s. But

OUR-NETT-CASH-PRICE-WITH-ORDER IS 16/- ONLY.

IF you do not approve of it we will refund cash sent if the Clock is returned within seven days.

SPECIAL XMAS BOOKLET

This Presentation Booklet is now ready; it contains many pages of interesting matter, including illustrations of hundred of the latest and most suitable Christmas and New Year presents. It gives you full particulars of J. N. MASTERS Ltd. Cash Present to each customer, and Free distribution of 150,000 valuable pencil cases. May we send you a copy? If so, your name and address please. We send it post free.

J. N. MASTERS Ltd., WATCHMAKERS, JEWELLERS, &c., RYE, SUSSEX.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW £100 FOOTBALL COMPETITION.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 623. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 8TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

GIGANTIC BANKRUPTCY SALE CATALOGUE.

Re BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO., late of Old St., London.

F. HODGSON & SONS, of LEEDS, have purchased for Cash the whole of the business' goodwill, and effects from Official Trustee in Bankruptcy. Illustrated Sale Catalogue of Brussels, Axminster, Velvet, and Foreign Carpets and Hearthrugs can be had Post Free, if mentioning SHORT STORIES, 8/12/1900.

4/6

To readers of SHORT STORIES, 8/12/1900. On receipt of Postal Order or stamps value (Regd.) we will send you the Largest Genuine Reversible Carpet in Brussels Finish, with Rug, ever sold at the Price, direct from the Looms to any address on receipt of amount. Suitable for drawing-room, dining-room, bedroom, &c., bordered and woven in Brussels Patterns, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any middle profit. Remember, these are woven and are made of a material almost equal to wool.

Thousands of these Carpets have been already sold at double these prices.

SPECIAL OFFER.—2 Carpets and 2 Rugs, 8/-.

Prodigious sale of the "PRUDENTIAL"

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS

Admittedly The Marvel of the Age.

Woven and Reversible, rich Brussels and Turkey Patterns and Colourings, superior quality, with handsome Border to match. A Marvel of Excellence and Beauty. These Carpets are superb imitations of real Brussels, and except by the closest scrutiny, the difference cannot be detected.

	REDUCED SALE PRICE.
6 ft. by 6 ft. 2/11		6 ft. by 7½ft. 3/11
6 ft. by 9 ft. 4/9	7½ft. by 9 ft. 5/11	9 ft. by 10½ft. 8/6
9 ft. by 12 ft. 9/6	9 ft. by 9 ft. 7/6	12 ft. by 12 ft. 12/9
12 ft. by 13½ft. 14/6	10½ft. by 12 ft. 11/6	12 ft. by 21 ft. 22/6
	12 ft. by 15 ft. 15/9
	9 ft. by 15 ft. 12/6
	12 ft. by 18 ft. 19/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible Hearthrug (Reg.) to match, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. 1yd.

The Readers of SHORT STORIES, 8/12/1900,

OFFERED

10,000 PATENT WADDED QUILTS,

Toraliums, or Bed Covers (as illustration), at an enormous reduction, to clear out.

SALE PRICE,

3/6 each.

Postage, 6d. extra.

Covered with beautiful soft Oriental Sateen Chintz, and on reverse side another beautiful art colour, size 50 by 60 inches. Special offer—3 Quilts for 10s., or 6 for 19s. 6d., or 12 for 38s. Cut this out. Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen, Curtains, etc., post free (if mentioning SHORT STORIES while writing).

These Quilts are offered below anything in the Wholesale Trade, and cause the greatest consternation to the buyer, wondering how they can be produced for the money.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—

F. HODGSON & SONS, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Allen Foster & Co.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

Buy Direct at First Cost from the Leading Firm of London Manufacturers.

DESIGN No. 2130.

TEN-AND-SIXPENCE.

The Famous Sacque Back Coat and Skirt Costume can be ordered with the coat made double or single-breasted, produced in the Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. In Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Fawn, Royal, Grey, Red, &c. It has a velvet collar, and the skirt is cut full with the box-pleated back—grand value for Half-a-Guinea. Testimonials from all parts. Securely packed, and sent carriage paid 6d. extra. This Coat and Skirt also makes up exceedingly well in the Pretoria Tweed or Melton Coating. Price only 17/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra.

Design No. 2130. 10/6.

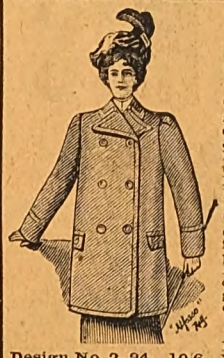
PATTERNS FREE.



Design No. 2194. 10/6.

Design No. 2194.

HALF-A-GUINEA.

The Fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket, 39-in. long. Made in the renowned 'Alfosco' Beaver Cloth in Black, Fawn, Brown, and Royal. This Jacket has a double-breasted front with smoked pearl buttons. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. The greatest value on the Market.

Design No. 329 8/6

8/6

Design No. 329. 8/6 Braided Skirt, made in an excellent Black and Navy Serge. This Skirt is cut in the latest shape, and has the fashionable 16in. flounce round bottom, which is lined linenette. Trimmed braid at top of flounce. Satisfaction guaranteed. Price only 8/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra. SEND FOR ONE

Write for

NEW WINTER SKETCH BOOK

AND

CATALOGUE OF BARGAINS.

PATTERNS & ORDER FORMS POST FREE.

Ladies are invited to call and inspect goods at our new Showrooms 47 Golden Lane, E.C. Business hours 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Saturdays 9 a.m. to 1 p.m.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PROCRASTINATION

TIME'S THIEF

is ever at work affecting our opportunities. You have a chance of saving nearly fifty per cent. on your outlay on the

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

you intend bestowing on your relatives and friends.

Don't Waste Time Thinking, but Write To-day for

H. SAMUEL'S BARGAIN BOOK.

By return of post you will receive

A HANDSOME ALBUM

ABSOLUTELY FREE OF ALL CHARGE TO YOU.

The pages of this unique work glow with an intertaining succession of pleasant, profitable fact and fancies, in the shape of 3,000 pictures, and descriptions of H. SAMUEL'S Bargains in Gold and Silver Watches, Diamonds, and a vast array of Elegant New Jewellery of extraordinary value, Clocks, Cutlery, Plate, &c., at Remarkably Low Prices, and forming an endless array of

Suggestions for

CHRISTMAS GIFTS

Each Catalogue contains full particulars of

H. SAMUEL'S SYSTEM OF BONUS REWARDS

for Purchasers, ten Lists of Presents being enclosed to select from.

You are invited to practically test the wonderful value H. SAMUEL gives. A Post Office Order for 25/- will bring you H. SAMUEL'S MARVEL LADY'S "ACME" WATCH (as illustrated) in SOLID STERLING SILVER ENGRAVED CASE, fine ¾-Plate Movement, extra jewelled, richly decorated dial (plain, if preferred), and fitted with H. SAMUEL'S Special Improvements protected by HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT. Compare these with those sold at THREE GUINEAS elsewhere. FIVE YEARS' WARRANTY.

A MONTH'S FREE TRIAL

with every article, and will refund money in full, or exchange goods if there is any dissatisfaction.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29), 95, 97, 99, 101, 33, 89, and 121 MARKET STREET, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE "GEO. R. SIMS"

HAIR RENEWER "TATCHO"

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES TO-DAY.
1s. 6d.
Sent Post Free in plain package, twenty one stamps.

MRS. BROWN POTTER, whose beautiful hair is the envy of her sex, writes:
"I Use only 'TATCHO.'"

If your hair is falling or failing, you have your remedy. Don't hesitate. Use "TATCHO." The result will surprise you and will be intensely gratifying. It is sold in bottles by Chemists and Hair-dressers allover the world, 2/9 and 5/-, or may be had direct in plain sealed package, post free, 2/11 and 5/3. Address:

The Geo. R. Sims Co., 31c Great Queen St., London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 623.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending December 8th, 1900.

RUINED BY RICHES.

JULIAN CASTLEMAN was the only son of a younger son. There was a title and wealth enough in the family, but as there were three lives between him and that title, he considered it of no account. He had therefore gathered all that he had together and was on the eve of his departure to a far country, viz., South Africa.

Before embarking on his journey he made a "duty call" upon his uncle, the present holder of the family title, Lord Clifton, and it is there we find him taking leave of his lordship.

"And so you hope to make a fortune out in South Africa, Julian?"

"Yes! it certainly seems an easier matter to amass wealth there than in England. The homeland is the place to live in when your fortune is made and you have nothing to do but spend it. In the diamond fields of South Africa a man may make more in a year than he could in a life-time here, and so I am off to try my luck."

"Well, my boy, far be it from me to throw cold water on your hopes, but I cannot help thinking of the many who in digging for diamonds have only dug the grave of their own hopes, and finally have themselves been buried in the same grave."

Julian laughed at his uncle's gloomy picture. He had all the sanguineness of youth and health, and, in addition, he was not afraid of hard work, provided there was some prospect of his labour being rewarded.

A few days after this interview, Castleman stepped on board ship at Southampton and was conveyed to the land of promise—but of scant fulfilment.

On arrival at Capetown he lost no time in procuring the necessary outfit, and proceeded up country in his quest for the diamonds which had in imagination dazzled his view.

It is not necessary to the purpose of this story to describe the various adventures which befell him in the next two years. Suffice it to say that things steadily went from bad to worse with him, until his hopes completely died out, and his only wish was to get back to the coast with a view to working his passage home again. With this object he turned his back on the diggings and commenced his lonely journey.

For several days he wandered on, but the unaccustomed hardships and privations had told upon him and finally, utterly weary and dispirited he sank down by the wayside.

Had not a good Samaritan passed that way in the person of an old Dutch farmer, Carl Jansen by name, this would probably have been the end of Julian Castleman.

When the old farmer came upon him, Castleman was raving in delirium. Carl Jansen's farm lay a few miles ahead, and in obedience to the promptings of his kindly nature Carl lifted the fever-stricken stranger into his waggon and conveyed him to his home. There the farmer's wife and daughter took charge of him and nursed him back to health and strength.

Some weeks had elapsed since Julian Castleman had entered those hospitable doors and he was now beginning to think of taking his departure. He and his host sat by the homely fireside, puffing at their pipes.

"What do you intend doing now?" asked the farmer.

"Oh! I shall resume my journey and get home as quickly as I can, though it goes very much against the grain to return home to admit myself beaten."

"Then why go at all. I can do with a strong arm like yours on the farm, and if you care to stay I can offer you a comfortable home and a fair wage. Come now make up your mind to stay with us."

Julian thought over the offer and finally decided to accept it. During his illness a warmer feeling than

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

When the old farmer came upon him Castleman was raving in delirium.

gratitude towards his host's daughter had taken possession of him.

Anna Jansen was a plump, rosy, vivacious specimen of budding womanhood, and there had been just sufficient romance in the meeting of the two young people to excite more than a passing interest. In fact, it was the old story over again. The nurse and the patient had fallen in love.

Turning to his host, Castleman told him of his decision and also of his affection for Anna.

"Well," said the old man, "if in course of a year or two—for the girl is but young—you are in the same mind, and are satisfied with your life here, I shall have no objection to giving my little girl to you."

Thus Julian Castleman became a modern Jacob with Anna Jansen for his Rachel. Not seven years, however, did he wait. Only two and a half years had elapsed since he became an inmate of that home when she became his wife.

Six months had elapsed since that event, when something occurred that changed the whole current of Julian Castleman's life. He had gone down to Capetown to transact some business there. While idling about in a hotel, he chanced to pick up an old English newspaper. As he carelessly turned it over, the following paragraph caught his eye:

Some strange fatality seems to pursue the representatives of the Clifton family. As our readers will remember, some months ago, the eldest son of Lord Clifton met with a fatal accident in the hunting field. Only a few weeks had elapsed when news reached England of the death of the youngest son, who had been mountaineering in Switzerland, and had fallen a victim to his own daring and love of adventure. The loss of his two sons in such rapid succession, proved too heavy a blow for Lord Clifton, and in a short time his remains were placed in the family vault, and the title descended to the only surviving son. Not long, however, has he been permitted to hold it. Shortly after his accession to the title his lordship started for a cruise in the Mediterranean. Fate still seems to pursue the family, however, as from advices just to hand, it appears that while out rowing, by some means the boat was capsized and the new Lord Clifton and one of the crew were drowned. We understand that the body has been recovered, and will be brought to England for interment. The heir to the title and estates is, we are informed, the only son of the elder Lord Clifton's brother and cousin of the last holder of the title. This gentleman left England some years ago and has not since been heard of, but we suppose every effort will be made to trace his whereabouts.

Julian Castleman's feelings on reading this were indescribable. He, from whom the title had seemed so far removed, was now Lord Clifton.

"I must go to England at once and prove my claim," he thought, and here he stopped as the thought of his wife flashed across his mind.

He rapidly reviewed the situation, and his resolve was soon taken. He had never told his wife of his aristocratic connections. Not that he had any motive for concealment, but simply because he had not considered it worth mentioning.

"To take Anna to England to mix with English society is impossible," he said to himself. "Why, I should be an object of commiseration and she a laughing stock."

"If you cannot take your wife to England, then stay in Africa yourself," prompted his better nature.

"What! Give up all which I left England to gain, and which has now fallen into my grasp so unexpectedly. It is too much to be expected."

Thus arguing the matter with himself, Julian Castleman allowed the devil to gain complete ascendancy over him. He decided to cut himself adrift from the old life completely, and in pursuance of this resolution, he made his way to the steamship office, where he ascertained there was a boat leaving for England on the following day.

Accordingly, as he had sufficient means with him, he booked his passage, and the next day he left the shores of Africa—left his young wife, left his benefactor—and sailed for England.

As the days sped by and he did not return, Carl Jansen became uneasy, and eventually journeyed to Capetown to make inquiries, but his efforts met with no success.

As the days lengthened into weeks and the weeks into months, the conviction forced itself upon Carl Jansen that Julian Castleman had deserted his young wife, and he swore a bitter oath of vengeance should they ever again meet.

The young wife was loth to believe her husband could be so base and still hoped on, but the uncertainty and anxiety undermined her strength until she became a mere wreck of her former self.

* * * * *

"We heartily congratulate your lordship, and trust you will be long spared to enjoy your wealth."

Thus spoke the family solicitors when Julian Castleman had proved his claim to the title and estates.

Lord Clifton, for such we must now call him, had landed in England about a fortnight ago, and had at once proceeded to the office of Messrs. Steel and Sharp, the family solicitors, where we now find him.

"Perhaps your lordship will do us the honour of dining with us this evening," said the senior-partner,

Digitized by Google

when the business was concluded. "We shall have one or two friends to meet you, but it will only be a quiet party."

Lord Clifton readily accepted the invitation. He spent the intervening period in looking up some of his old friends at the club where they had been in the habit of congregating, returning to his host's in time for dinner.

Among the guests that evening were Sir Wilfred Armitage and his daughter Evelyn. The worthy baronet had made his money in trade and having amassed a considerable fortune had retired, and his chief ambition now was to become allied to a title.

There was a tendency in certain circles to keep the remembrance of his trading days dangling before his eyes and he thought that if he could only marry his daughter to one of the nobility possibly he might suffer less from this cause.

Consequently he was most attentive to Lord Clifton, concerning whom he had been posted by their host.

As the gentlemen sat over their wine before joining the ladies after dinner, Sir Wilfred engaged Lord Clifton in conversation.

"I suppose your lordship intends to settle in England now, or are you going to become one of those truant landlords, who leave their affairs in the hands of agents while they roam the earth?"

"Yes! I have been an absentee from my native shores long enough to appreciate the opportunity of settling at home."

"We must get you interested in local affairs. For instance, now, there is a dearth of officers in our volunteer corps. You might join that. I am a member and shall be glad to introduce you to my brother officers as a prospective colleague."

"I shall be delighted to meet the officers of your corps, but I am not sure about becoming an officer myself."

"Well then, as I am entertaining them at dinner to-morrow I shall be glad if you will join us, and we will endeavour to arouse your patriotic feelings."

Lord Clifton assented and the conversation ended. On the following evening he adjourned to Templemore, the residence of the worthy baronet and there met the officers. He also renewed his acquaintance with Evelyn Armitage, whose fresh young beauty had attracted him on the previous evening. She also had been attracted.

Lord Clifton was a fair specimen of English manhood. He had a well-knit athletic frame and a handsome face. Moreover he was perfect in all matters of courtesy and gentlemanliness, not withstanding his rough life on the veld.

The upshot of that dinner party was that Lord Clifton became an officer of the corps, and as a brother officer a frequent visitor at Templemore, until it became whispered among observers that Evelyn Armitage was destined to become Lady Clifton.

In the early days of their acquaintance the face of his deserted bride often rose before Lord Clifton's eyes, but as time wore on the image became dimmed and he began to give some consideration to the idea of marrying the baronet's daughter.

Had he been free he would have proposed ere this, but his conscience had not been effectually silenced.

After much thought he decided to take the plunge. It appeared most improbable that the history of those early days would ever become known, consequently he proposed to, and was accepted by Evelyn Armitage.

In a few months the baronet bestowed her upon Lord Clifton with his paternal blessing and much self-congratulation.

At the time of this marriage, however, the real Lady Clifton lay dying in her South African home, as was subsequently ascertained.

No shadow had as yet fallen across the path of the young couple. Evelyn idolised her husband and would sometimes say as she leant fondly against him:

"Julian, dear, if ever anything should come between us I should want to die."

At these times he would inwardly shudder and hope that the ghost of the past would never rise.

It was about this time that the storm broke in South Africa, and we were hurrying troops out to the seat of war.

Ere long the call came for England's citizen soldiers to take up arms for their country.

Lord Clifton strolled into his club one evening and there found several of his brother officers discussing the news.

"Hello! Clifton, have you heard the news?" asked one of the group.

"What news do you mean?"

"Why, that the much sneered at volunteer, the Saturday night soldier, is going to have his chance. Now we'll show them what kind of stuff we are made of. Of course, you will offer to lead your company?"

Lord Clifton paused a moment.

Dare he go out to South Africa again? No, he could not go there, the risks were too great. The sight of that After dinner Sir Wilfred engaged Lord Clifton in conversation.

Digitized by Google

wronged father's face would unnerve him and strike his arm powerless by his side.

"Come, Clifton, surely you are not hesitating. Your men will look to you to lead them."

"I am very sorry, but it will be impossible for me to leave England."

General astonishment was depicted on the faces of all present and he was pressed for his reasons.

Clifton endeavoured to laugh them off, but as they were persistent in their inquiries, he at last burst out impatiently.

"Oh, hang it all, You fellows are worse than the Hebrews. By their laws a man was not expected to go to war within a year of his marriage, and here you fellows want to bundle me off in less than half the time," and with this he left the room.

Shortly after his departure, Sir Wilfred Armitage came in and was immediately tackled by some of the more boisterous spirits.

"Here, Sir Wilfred, you had better go home and lecture your daughter on her duty. She has actually turned Clifton into a stay-at-home and a coward."

"What do you mean?" warmly answered the baronet.

"Why, your noble son-in-law intends to stay at home when there is a glorious chance of leading his men to victory in South Africa. Go and tell Lady Clifton his country claims his services."

"What! Do you mean to tell me Clifton is not going out?"

"Certainly. He has just left us, pleading the recency of his marriage as his excuse for not volunteering for the front."

"Well, I'm off after him to get that decision altered," and so saying the baronet followed his son-in-law.

On arrival at The Towers, Sir Wilfred burst into the drawing-room where he found Lord Clifton and Evelyn.

"Here, Evelyn, what do you mean by keeping Clifton back when his country is asking for his services?"

"Father, what are you talking about?"

"Why, the fellows at the club are saying you have turned Clifton into a stay-at-home and a coward."

Turning to her husband, Lady Clifton said:

"What does all this mean, Julian?"

"Oh! I have refused to volunteer for service in South Africa, and those ill-mannered beggars at the club persist in saying that you have tied me to your side."

Evelyn flushed and paled alternately. It was evident that a mental struggle was going on. Eventually she said with an effort:

"Julian, dear, if your men are going none but you must lead them. It shall not be said that I made a coward of my husband. I would rather have kept you by my side, but not under such conditions, so I shall send you from me and pray for your safe return."

Clifton protested at first, but eventually ended by offering his services which were accepted.

In due time orders were received and Lord Clifton proceeded to Southampton with his men. Lady Clifton accompanied her husband to the docks and there took leave of him.

The voyage was uneventful. On arrival at Capetown Lord Clifton and his men were drafted off at once to join the main body of Lord Roberts' army at Kroonstadt. How strangely Fate was leading him will appear in the subsequent narrative.

Just after the date on which Lord Clifton led Evelyn Armitage to the altar, the farmer's daughter died and Carl Jansen moved to a farm situated some ten miles from Kroonstadt.

He was a peaceful man, and though compelled to take up arms in the earlier stages of the war, he had since given up his arms and returned to his farm. He had not that intense hatred of the "verdommde rooineks" which characterised some of his compatriots and only wished to end his days in peace.

The old farmer's revolver rang out.

Clifton and his men duly arrived at Kroonstadt where they were to remain for some time. Several days after their arrival Lord Clifton and five men set out on a foraging expedition, and after a ride of two or three hours, calling at several farms on the way, they came to a lonely farm from which the accepted token of submission—the white flag—was flying.

Turning to one of his men, Lord Clifton said:

"Robinson, ride forward to that farm and see if you can procure us some refreshment."

Riding off in the direction indicated, while the remainder of the party halted, Robinson came within hail, and in response to his call the farmer appeared. As he gazed he became strangely agitated, and before Robinson could speak the farmer addressed him.

"Who is the officer in charge of your party?"

"Captain Lord Clifton," replied the soldier.

At this the farmer seemed disappointed and listened while the soldier made known his errand.

He ordered one of his men to get what was required. Whilst they were waiting a thought seemed to strike the farmer.

"What was your officer's name before he got his title?" he asked.

Digitized by Google

"He was Mr. Julian Castleman before he became Lord Clifton," answered the soldier. "But you seem very curious, old man. What are you driving at?"

"Oh! I thought I had seen the officer before, but I must have been mistaken as I don't know that name," replied the farmer, and as the refreshments appeared at this moment the conversation ended.

As the soldier turned his horse to rejoin his comrades the farmer again spoke.

"Present my compliments to your officer and tell him I shall be honoured if he will come in and rest while his men refresh themselves," he said.

The soldier rode off and conveyed the message to Lord Clifton, which the officer readily accepted. Riding nearer he handed his horse to one of his men and was shown into an inner room by one of the hands, who informed him that his master would join him immediately.

The man had only recently been taken into Jansen's service and therefore knew nothing of what had transpired in those earlier days. Lord Clifton flung himself into a chair and divested himself of his arms with a view to making himself comfortable.

No sooner had he done this than he heard himself addressed by his old name and on looking up he found himself confronted by the man he had wronged.

Framed in the doorway the old Farmer coolly pointed a revolver in Clifton's face and warned him that any attempt to seize his arms would only precipitate his death. Unnerved and conscience-stricken Lord Clifton sat speechless.

Never taking his finger from the trigger Carl Jansen thus addressed the guilty wretch before him:

"And so, Julian Castleman, Lord Clifton, Fate has brought you back to me. You, who destroyed my peace and broke my girl's heart, have come here, unsuspectingly to your doom. When I buried my girl in the lonely grave on the veld I vowed that if ever you crossed my path again I would shoot you like a dog, and now my opportunity has come. I shall give you just two minutes and then I shall fire. No doubt your men will shoot me, but if I have sent your soul to account first I shall be satisfied."

Goaded to frenzy Clifton snatched for his pistol, but ere he could reach it, the old farmer's revolver rang out and the leaden messenger was buried in Clifton's heart. He sank lifeless on the floor, just as his men rushed in.

The farmer was immediately put under arrest and conveyed back to the camp. On arrival the men reported the incident and another case of Boer treachery was wired home to their respective papers by their correspondents.

The old man was tried and condemned to imprisonment, while efforts were made to hush the matter up.

The news of Lord Clifton's death, as recorded at the War Office and reported in the newspapers, came as a terrible shock to Lady Clifton, and for some weeks her life was despaired of.

"Why did I send him from me?" she moaned over and over again.

Eventually she began to regain strength and had just reached that stage of convalescence which permitted of her taking carriage exercise, when the final blow came with crushing force.

Lady Clifton, as we shall continue to call her, for who has more right to the title, the first wife being dead, was seated in a closed carriage which had been drawn up under the trees in the Park.

Leaning over the rails were two young officers recently invalided home from South Africa.

"Oh! I say, Fitzgerald, what was that yarn in connection with the murder of Lord Clifton?" asked one of them.

"Well, it was generally reported as a case of Boer treachery—another case of the abuse of the white flag—but the real facts of the case placed Clifton in a very black light."

"What are the real facts then?" queried the other.

In response to this inquiry, Lieut. Fitzgerald told the story as narrated by the old farmer at his trial. During this narration Lady Clifton had been listening to every word, her attention having been attracted by hearing Lord Clifton's name.

The words sank like hot iron into her very soul, yet she heard it all through. Then her over-wrought feelings gave way, and with one piercing shriek she fainted.

She was conveyed home with all speed and a physician summoned, but it was found that reason had forsaken her throne.

Thus two lives were sacrificed, one woman was driven to madness and the peace of several homes wrecked. In short, all these lives were ruined by riches.

J. H. Peat.

£400 HAS NOW BEEN PAID.

The latest capture in connection with the Ten-Pound Note Scheme has been made by

Mr. George Wardle,
55 Laburnum Road, Fulwell, Sunderland.

who captured No. 78 at a football match at Sunderland.

CHRISTMAS CARDS GIVEN AWAY.

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly has prepared a charming little Christmas Card, suitable for readers to send to their friends. The picture is a reproduction of a photograph, and contains a seasonable inscription.

A huge number of copies is being printed, and the first batch is now ready. In return for a postcard, giving your name and address, sent to the Christmas Card Department, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., we will post you a few cards free of all cost. Applications will be dealt with in rotation. The Christmas Card is quite charming, and is in no way an aggressive advertisement of Pearson's Weekly or the Ten-Pound Scheme.

The Sketch

"HAVE YOU GOT THAT £10 NOTE?"

suitable for two gentlemen and one lady, has now been put into type, and is to be obtained in book form, at sixpence per copy, from Messrs. Samuel French Limited, Theatrical Publishers, 89 Strand, London, W.C.

NO FEE WILL BE CHARGED AMATEURS FOR PLAYING IT.

The scene is one that can easily be arranged, and the costumes are quite ordinary ones.

Digitized by Google

THE FINDING OF LEO PHAYRE.

ULTIMA DREW was visibly perplexed, not vitally so, but quite sufficiently to insure momentary vexation at any rate.

As a rule she was a stay-at-home sort of young person, rather, however, from force of circumstances than as a matter of inclination.

Quick-witted, full of life and energy, she could be content anywhere, but the larger the field the greater her happiness and sense of personal enjoyment.

Living as she did a comparatively retired life with a widowed aunt in a quiet western suburb, her surroundings at mid-day, on a certain summer's morning about four years ago, were calculated to bewilder her a little. Fenchurch Street at that hour is trying to most people save and except your born "City Man."

Ultima's mission on this occasion was to find a particular Shipping Office, and there to make inquiries concerning one Ephraim Hoyt, the only son of her aunt, Prudence Hoyt, whose ship, upon which he served as third-officer, was long overdue.

Up and down the crowded thoroughfare toiled Ultima. Numbers seemed to dance before her eyes, while the legion of names upon the door-posts and window blinds fairly mixed themselves up for her into one kaleidoscopic whole.

Into a dark building well down towards Aldgate, she ventured at last, seeing within a long list of tenants.

"Beg pardon, miss, are you looking for anything or anybody? Perhaps I can help you?"

Ultima turned sharply round to see a tall, thin, grizzled man of middle age, unmistakeably a seaman.

"No thanks! I shall soon find what I want. Ah! here it is! Kirby, Danes and Co., Second Floor."

"That's odd!" said the man again. "Why, they're my owners! I'm going up there now. 'Scuse me, but my name's Lobb, Captain Lobb, of the barque Pearl, at your service."

Although Ultima did not by any means appreciate the appearance and manners of the captain, still his connection with the owners of the Cairngorm, her cousin Fred's ship, tended somewhat to disarm prejudice.

Her business concluded, and, curiously co-incident, the captain's also, Ultima started homeward.

It appeared that he was also bound for Notting Hill (not exactly a co-incident, for he had glanced at her return half-ticket, dropped by her and restored by him) and, in spite of Ultima's badly-disguised disapproval, he accompanied her to Cannon Street Station.

"May as well see you safe, as I'm going your way, Miss——"

Here the girl diplomatically made a half-slip, as if by accident, so cleverly evading giving the desired information.

In the train the Captain was discursive on the subject of his travels, until, Notting Hill reached, Ultima discovered to both her alarm and annoyance that her ankle was really sprained. She could scarcely put her foot to the ground. This of course necessitated the assistance of the gallant skipper in the ascent of the station stairs and a subsequent putting her into a cab.

"Hullo! Phayre! What are you doing in this part of the world?"

This to a young fellow in nautical attire, swinging round to enter the station.

"Just looking round a bit," answered the other, "ship's all right; I've left the bos'n in charge."

Leo Phayre, first officer of the Pearl could not help looking with some amusement at the Captain and Ultima.

Lobb's ways were not, according to Leo's experience, the ways likely to suit the average young lady.

But then he remembered that young ladies now-a-days are given oftentimes to strange methods and fancies.

"My chief officer Leo Phayre,—Miss—"

"Drew," said Ultima, though not so reluctantly, as she was prompted to do earlier in the Captain's case.

Quite of the Norse type both in build and feature, the fair-haired, stalwart young sailor irresistibly attracted Ultima.

He looked honest too, and true, a direct contrast, the girl thought, to her self-constituted escort.

"'Scuse me, Phayre, but Miss Drew has hurt her foot, and must get home at once!" (she had been sitting in the cab all this time) "see you on the Pearl in the morning."

There was nothing for it but for him to accept his dismissal, and the big sailor dived down into the "underground," full of the sweet vision vouchsafed him a moment before on the earth above.

Thus began the dramatic episode in three lives, although that the main issue and situation may be made quite clear and understandable, it is necessary that a very brief account should be given of these same three persons' actions during the six weeks immediately following David Lobb's self-introduction to Ultima Drew.

During the next few weeks, then, Captain Lobb contrived, on the pretext of sympathetic inquiry, to make many a call at the little Bayswater house.

Ultima disliked him, and I am afraid scare concealed her real feelings, but the captain was of the pachydermatous sort, and took no notice.

It may have been three weeks after the incident of the sprained ankle (which after all had turned out to be anything but serious) that, walking one day in the Bayswater Road, Ultima met Leo Phayre face to face.

A few words of courteous interchange; half-an-hour's stroll between Kensington Palace and the Marble Arch and the thing was done for all time.

The captain soon discovered the state of affairs, more than once finding his Chief Officer in Angus Place before him. He soon saw, however, that in competition with his younger rival he had no chance whatsoever for Ultima's favour.

Digitized by Google

Bound to one another a fortnight before the sailing of the Pearl for the South Seas, Ultima yielded to Leo's earnest petition for a hasty marriage two days prior to that event.

He wanted, he said, to be sure of her, not, as he hastened to explain to her, because he in any way doubted her faith and fealty, but just because of an indefinite, perhaps a foolish feeling of coming insecurity and danger. She could remain with her aunt until the Pearl came home again.

Married, therefore, they were, and the ship sailed away to the "Golden" Pacific, leaving behind her a girl-wife, who would wait, Penelope-wise, the return of her Ulysses.

* * * * *

Ten months afterwards the barque Pearl, David Lobb, master, arrived in the London docks. Her Captain reported to his owners the death, off one of the smaller islands of the South Sea group, of his Chief Officer, Leo Phayre, from fever.

On the evening of the same day Captain Lobb sought an interview with Ultima, and then communicated to her the news of her husband's death.

Strange to say she did not cry or "take on," as a certain type of women do, or as in fact most women would have done under the circumstances.

Had you asked her she would have said that she did not believe it, that nothing would induce her to believe it except the sight of her dead husband's face. As this was manifestly impossible she appeared, callously so, her aunt and the Captain thought, indifferent, calm and self-possessed.

"Darned odd!" said Lobb to himself as he left the house. "It's downright unnatural!"

The Pearl, owing to being laid up for overhauling and repairs, remained in port for nearly five months.

During the whole of the time Captain Lobb was not idle. His persistent endeavours to ingratiate himself with Ultima, appeared at first to be absolutely unsuccessful. For weeks she would have nothing to say to him. She denied herself to him when he called, pleaded illness, and adopted any and every ruse in order to avoid his presence.

Mrs. Hoyt expostulated but vainly with her niece, she having a rather better opinion of David Lobb than had Ultima Phayre.

Suddenly, and without any warning the domestic wind changed, so far, at least as Ultima was concerned.

To outsiders there was no apparent reason for this, but it may be stated that it was undoubtedly due to the receipt by Ultima of a certain letter signed Peter Rollinson, boatswain of the Pearl.

The letter was to this effect:

HOND. MADAM,—

'Don't trust our skipper. He's a villain. Mister Fare's not dead. He never wer'. Cap'n Lobb and me (he made me do it) carried him in the dingy to an i'land a few miles to the s'uth'ard of Tahiti, South Seas. If he's alive, which I think he could keep himself on roots and such-like, he's there now. Pleas keep this to yourself, ma'am, he's treated me shameful, and I'm telling you so as you can do something.

A letter sent to P. Rollinson, at the "Prince Arthur," St. Georges Road, E. will find me, and I'll tell you more.

Ultima, when she had read the letter, just smiled to herself, and went upstairs to her room.

Upon the Captain's next visit she was friendly to a degree. Some men, over-shrewd and keen-sighted, might have had their suspicions as to the sincerity of the lady's manner; but Lobb was, in spite of his years, very much in love, and, in consequence, blind to everything save his determination to make Ultima Mrs. Lobb.

If her aunt was mildly vexed before, she was angry now at Ultima's barefaced, (so she called it) encouragement of the Captain, and when, four months after the Pearl's homecoming the girl announced to her horrified relative her engagement to its enterprising commander, there was no more strength left in her.

"Ultima!" she said, trying to speak as indignantly as her affection would allow her, "I've done with you—quite done with you. You must do as you please; but mark my words that a marriage with this man before poor Leo is cold in his grave is not even decent, and will lead to sorrow for you and perhaps worse."

"Auntie! don't be angry!" replied Ultima seeking to stroke her aunt's hand. "Some day you'll understand and acknowledge that I'm right in what I'm doing."

"Never!—my dear!—never!" said the old lady emphatically, "right can never come out of wrong, and that this is wrong I am more than persuaded I am sure."

Shortly then, when the Captain pressed for an early wedding-day he was told that it would be granted only on three conditions. First that the ceremony should take place the morning of the day of sailing; secondly, that she, Ultima, should accompany the ship as a passenger, occupying her own cabin, with her aunt as companion; and lastly, that this latter arrangement should continue until so long as Tahiti, the destination of the Pearl, should be reached.

He was obliged to consent, although unwillingly, knowing as he did by this time something of Ultima's strength of will and temper.

And so for the second time in her life, did a young girl upon the eve of the same vessel's sailing for the same sea, take upon herself grave responsibilities which, as compared with those of the first occasion, were strangely terrible in their significance.

* * * * *

The barque Pearl was steadily forging ahead before a ten-knot breeze, and every evidence existed of a speedy and favourable termination to her voyage.

She had entered now into the wonderful region, known generically as the South Seas.

Ultima, ever since the departure from England, had rigidly kept her cabin, poring over and studying intently the various charts and maps. Did she take a breath or two of fresh air, it was during Lobb's "watch below" (for he took watch about with his new mate) and in company with Aunt Prudence.

Rollinson, the boatswain, made no signs as to his acquaintance with her, up to the day, that is to say, the events of which, and the night that followed, are now to be related.

For the first time Ultima had spoken to Lobb as he descended the companion from the poop to enter the saloon.

She asked him, in a matter-of-fact way, the probable date of arrival at Tahiti, and on receiving his reply that it would probably be some time during the afternoon of the following day, she said no more but retired to her cabin.

"Ah! my lady!" he said half-aloud as she disappeared, "when I do have you all to myself, you shall pay for this, take it from me!"

He felt instinctively that she was concealing something from him; that there was game afoot, but as to the meaning or the manner of it he was completely in the dark.

Digitized by Google

More study of one particular chart, and then somewhere about the end of the second "dog-watch" she took out of a chest a man's reefer jacket and donned it. Next, she put a small revolver in one of the side pockets, and, leaning over to assure herself that her aunt was asleep she sat down and waited.

"Two bells! Three bells!"

Quietly she opened the cabin door, and crept up the companion. It was quite dark, but she could see the "mate" lying fast asleep upon a hencoop to windward of the poop.

Passing him with a curious smile, she made her way to the wheel.

The oil-skin-clad figure there whispered her as she touched his arm. It was the boatswain.

"Ay!—ay! missie—it's all right," jerking his thumb over towards the sleeping, stertorously-breathing "chief." "It was a big dose; but it won't hurt him."

"Peter! alter the course to west and by south, and keep it at that until I come up again in an hour."

"Ay! ay! missie."

Ultima glided back along the poop deck to the companion, and so down to her cabin.

In an hour's time she came up again.

"Give me the wheel," she said, "you go forward and see the carpenter, and find out if he has done as you and he agreed with regard to the men."

The boatswain put the spokes into her hand and hastened forward.

Soon he returned, announcing that all was well.

She would not give up the wheel to him, but handing him the revolver, she bid him quietly stand by her, and keep a good look out.

"Seven bells" sounded, and simultaneously with their striking, Rollinson, who had, ten minutes before, gone "forrad" again, came hurriedly to Ultima's side.

"There's land ahead!" he said, excitedly, "off the starboard bow, and about ten miles I'm thinking."

"Well, I'll give you the wheel directly," she answered quite calmly, though could one have read her heart, there would certainly have been seen an agitation almost beyond bearing.

"My Leo! My Leo!" she kept singing to herself, and the song was as of heaven to her.

It was then that a movement in the saloon beneath was discernible, and before the two on the poop deck could realise the situation, Lobb's head and shoulders appeared coming up the port-companion.

At a glance he saw that the course had been changed.

"Hi! You!" he roared, making a rush for the wheel. "Who told you to alter the course?—Who is it at the wheel?—By Heavens! it's a woman!"

He would have torn the spokes out of Ultima's hand, had not the boatswain thrown himself between her and the captain.

Gripping the latter by the throat, he tried all he knew to throw him, and at last by a dexterous Cornish wrestling trick brought him heavily to the deck on his back.

It was but the work of a moment to make fast the prostrate captain's hands and ankles, with a coil of the signal half-yards.

"Give me the wheel now," cried Rollinson to Ultima. "And you, missie, you run to Chips, and tell him I want him—want him directly."

They were now within easy distance of the coral reef which inclosed the lagoon surrounding the little atoll.

It was daylight now, and straight ahead could be distinguished the gap in the reef through which the boatswain was making to steer the Pearl. The aperture was very narrow, and it needed all the old man's skill to avoid mishap.

But it was deftly done, and with a mighty wash and spray-cloud of white-capped water, and with an arrow-like speed, the barque, quivering for just a second on the top of a gigantic wave, shot through the gap to bring up safely in the calm, clear lake inside.

Events marched rapidly now.

Lowering with the aid of Chips and one or two of the "hands" the starboard-quarter boat, the boatswain first letting Ultima down into it, followed quickly himself, leaving Chips in command of the ship. It was but a little distance to the sandy beach of the atoll.

At first they could detect no sign of life, then (it was Ultima first) they saw distinctly a strange, weird figure sitting, head bowed upon his hands, upon a blackened tree stump close to the water's edge.

"Leo!——Leo!" she cried, and the figure looked up.

"Quick! Peter! quick!" and the old man nerved by her excitement, bent to the heavy oars with the energy and strength of youth.

As the boat grounded in the soft, wet sand, Ultima with a little cry sprang out and ran, her hair streaming behind her in the early morning wind, toward the tree stump.

His hair and beard were long and streaked with grey; his eyes sunken and dark rimmed; his clothes, such as they were, ragged and dirty, and yet there was for her no doubt.

He did not rise at her approach, but sat on, looking up at her in a dazed way; and then she pillowed his poor head upon her bosom, and crooned over him, as doth a mother over the child of her love.

* * * * *

There is little more to tell.

How, gently persuaded, he entered the boat, and was taken on board the Pearl; how, recovered from his "dose," the mate was induced to let "by-gones be by-gones," and to sail the ship to the nearest British Port; how Captain David Lobb paid eventually the full penalty for "marooning" his "first-officer," all this may well be imagined.

That Peter, the old boatswain was not forgotten may also readily be believed; and to-day as he dandles Ultima's youngest son upon his knee he tells over again to the fine little chap of six at his side the story of the finding of his father by the wit and devotion of his father's wife.

RALPH ENDERBY.

DO YOU WISH TO MAKE SOME CHRISTMAS PRESENTS?

Something simple, and that requires little outlay.
Something that will give pleasure to your friends.
Something that will be useful as well as ornamental.

WE CAN TELL YOU EXACTLY WHAT TO MAKE.

Go to the nearest newsagent's and ask for

Isobel's Needlework,

PRICE TWOPENCE.

It is now on Sale. It contains sketches and directions for making many pretty trifles for Christmas Presents and Bazaars, such as Dainty Table Centres (three designs), A Crochet Chemise Top, Pretty Smocking, A Child's Openwork Sock and Vest, Home-made Serviette Rings, Embroidered Initials, etc.

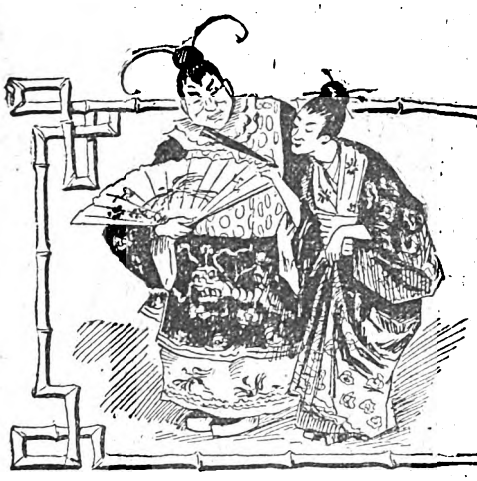
"ISOBEL'S NEEDLEWORK" may also be obtained direct from 17 and 18 Henrietta St., W.C., post free, 3½d.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXIX.—THINGS WERE ALL WRONG, BUT HE RIGHTED THEM.

WHEN Mr. Bowser reached home the other evening, dinner was ten minutes late.

This was such an unprecedented thing that he looked at Mrs. Bowser for an explanation, and she proceeded to say:

"You see, the butcher was a little late in sending the steak, but it may not happen again for years."

"Late, was he?" growled Mr. Bowser as the blood flew to his face. "What time did you order that steak?"

"At three o'clock."

"And, having three hours in which to execute your order, the butcher was ten minutes late! This is a matter to be inquired into. If that butcher thinks he can play fast and loose with me, I'll show him that he's greatly mistaken. He was probably off at a football match or a horse race, and he didn't care whether his customers had dinner or not."

"I don't think it will happen again," said Mrs. Bowser in a voice calculated to soothe, and just then dinner was announced.

During the meal she sought to divert Mr. Bowser's mind from the butcher's slip, but the more he thought of it the wilder he got.

It was also unfortunate that the baker's boy had been late with the bread and that they had to economise with the butter because the dairyman hadn't got round.

"In other words," said Mr. Bowser as he rose up before his dinner was half finished, "you let these people run your house instead of running it yourself. Do you suppose they would dare dilly-dally round if I gave them an order? What they need is waking up, and I'll go out and wake them!"

She followed him to the hat-stand and suggested that he let her make a complaint on the morrow, but he clapped on his hat with a bang and replied:

"I'll do nothing of the kind. I want them to understand who they are dealing with. Because you are a woman who'll put up with anything and everything it doesn't follow that folks can sit on my coat tails. You listen for a row."

The cat had followed them and he humped his back and gurgled at the thought of the fun ahead. Mr. Bowser had only to go along one street to find the butcher. He was received with a smile, but the smile faded as he shouted:

"And so my dinner must wait an hour and a half because you didn't get home from the races? Do you think I will stand such tomfoolery as this?"

"My delivery boy fell and broke his arm, and I had to deliver the orders myself," explained the butcher. "I was about ten minutes late at your house, but under the circumstances I hope you will overlook it."

"I'll overlook nothing! I want my house run on a system. If you can't run your shop on a system and a better system than this you'd better get out."

Then the butcher lost his temper and said he knew his business and all about systems, and Mr. Bowser got wild and said he doubted it, and they had a war of words which so scared an old woman after twopenny worth of sheep's liver that she had a bad attack of palpitation. Mr. Bowser was in good trim for the dairyman, and he went to him with eyes flashing and ears working and demanded:

"Are you in business to accommodate the public or yourself? A nice state of affairs that you should spoil my dinner for the want of butter!"

"You listen for a row."

Digitized by Google

"I'm awfully sorry," explained the dairyman, "but we had a fire in the back room which upset things and made us a little late to-day."

"But what has a fire in your back room to do with me? Did I cause that fire? Am I responsible because your dough-headed servant set fire to your place? You spoilt my dinner, and I want to know what you are going to do about it?"

"Can't you excuse such an accident as a fire?" asked the dairyman in surprise.

"No, sir; no, sir! It is your business to have a fire-proof building. Even with a fire raging, an ambitious dairyman would not have neglected his customers. I don't like it, sir, and you are a lymphatic man, sir, and if you can't promise to do better in future you'll get no more orders from me."

Then the dairyman called Mr. Bowser an old kicker, and in return Mr. Bowser made some unkind remarks, and in their excited movements they upset two cans of milk and made such a row that a policeman came in and said it was a burning shame.

The baker's face wore a smile of contempt, and he was softly humming to himself, when Mr. Bowser came in to him and thundered:

"If you don't know enough to run a bakery, why don't you sell out and try a coal yard?"

"But what is wrong?" asked the baker.

"My bread — for dinner! Did you have that bread at my house at half-past five o'clock?"

"I am sorry to say I didn't. I was seven or eight minutes late, but that was because a wheel came off my cart. I can't make out how it happened, but——"

"What are the wheels of your cart to me?" shouted Mr. Bowser as he banged on the counter. "Do I run your wheels? Do I run your old white horse and red-headed driver? Do I even know that you've got wheels to your cart? You were late, sir, and by being late you spoilt my dinner, and what are you going to do about it?"

"That's too bad, and I'm sure it won't happen again. How on earth that wheel—"

"That wheel be hanged, sir! When that wheel came off, you should have hurried yourself all the more. It is evident that you have no head on you."

Then the baker, who felt himself blameless, began to talk back and Mr. Bowser to use stronger language, and they finally shook their fists under each other's nose and got a boy so excited that he ran out and called up the ambulance. Mr. Bowser reached home boiling over, but remembered that some shirts were to come up by seven o'clock. It was now after eight, and they hadn't arrived.

"They will never come," he roared as he banged open the door, "because I will go out and hunt that false shirtmaker to his doom."

"It is early yet, and they will be here by nine," pleaded Mrs. Bowser, as he gasped for breath and jumped up and down. If he heard her, he paid no attention, but rushed off down the steps and out of the gate. At the corner he met the shirtmaker, who had come to deliver the goods himself, but had stopped for a few minutes to chat with a friend. There was an instantaneous explosion, followed by a grapple, and the crowd which speedily gathered saw two men rolling over and over on the pavement and punching away at each other, while the three new shirts went flying hither and thither until somebody picked them up and sneaked off with them.

Mr. Bowser had limped home and taken a seat on the step.

By-and-bye Mrs. Bowser and the cat looked out of the front door. Mr. Bowser had limped home and taken a seat on the steps. His hat was gone, his hair all ruffled, his coat split up the back, and he was looking into vacancy across the street.

The cat went down and rubbed against his back and purred to him, but he made no move. Mrs. Bowser quietly asked him if he had waked up the delinquents, but he never turned his head. He was thinking of systems and wondering why they did not pan out as he had told Mrs. Bowser they should. The shirtmaker had also got the best of their scrap, and the crowd had said they were glad of it. M. Quad.

[Next week: "He starts a Temperance Crusade, but gets all mixed up."]

In the Christmas Double Number of

"SHORT STORIES"

will appear the first of a series of articles entitled

"THE LION'S WARS."

They are written in a very readable style, and the whole will form a complete history of the most important wars in which Britain has been engaged.

Digitized by Google

A Forfeited Honour.

PEOPLE always run away with a wrong idea when they see that Victoria Cross standing under its little glass case, in a prominent position in my drawing-room. They think that my father, Captain Langham, won it during the Indian Mutiny, but, as a matter of fact, the distinction was earned by a private for saving my father's life.

Yes, I think I'll keep it locked up in future, as I invariably have to enter into an explanation, and the story shows up a rather dark side in the life of the man who won it; yet it may serve some good purpose to tell it, as it may wake up our Government to do something for the heroes who have fought for the Enpire. More is done now than formally, but there is still much to be done—and this is a story of years ago.

Private John Rushton was an agricultural labourer who, finding the times rather hard owing to the fact that he had incurred the displeasure of the squire and the tenant farmers in consequence of his independence and the suspicion of being concerned in poaching, had enlisted and donned the Queen's uniform.

Rushton was a devil-may-care kind of fellow, thoroughly good hearted, but fond of fun, ready to take a part in any diversion, and quick to resent a slight or an injustice—one of those men who become moody and bitter when they feel that man or fate has not treated them fairly.

He was sent out to India and took an active part in the doings of the army of relief and punishment. It was during a fight outside Cawnpore that Rushton won his V.C.

My father had been wounded in a hot corner; the little party had to retire and my father was left on the field. He had done a good turn of some kind to Rushton, who showed his gratitude by returning, lifting my father on to his back—he was a strong man—and bringing him away under a heavy fire. It's the sort of thing that has been done many times since, but that does not detract from its heroism.

My father was invalided home and Rushton went through the campaign to the end, but almost in the last fight he was so badly wounded in the arm that he was disabled.

When Rushton returned to this country, my father obtained employment for him, but after a time it appears that Rushton found considerable difficulty in obtaining work. The "Captain"—as my father was usually styled—helped him into several situations, but a one-armed man, as Rushton was practically, found himself at a discount, and as soon as the firms decently could, so as not to appear discourteous to my father, they got rid of Rushton.

I think we must admit that the man contributed in some measure to his own downfall by occasional lapses into intemperance, but I am inclined to think that these were brought on partly by the bitter feeling caused by his own ill-luck. There are very many people who, when luck seems to be against them, give way to drink or some other vice.

Then my father died and in the grief and trouble that followed, I lost sight of the man who had saved him from the Sepoys. It was many months afterwards before I recollected him and made inquiries, only to find that he had been convicted of theft and that his name had been struck off the V.C. list.

His sentence had expired before I became aware of the facts, so Rushton was an outcast, had lost his annuity and must get a living as best he could. I was sad at heart at this thought, but I could do nothing; he had vanished.

Time passed on and I married; my name was changed and there was no clue to the outside world that I was the daughter of Captain Langham.

I had some of my dear father's things in my house, and in gratitude to Private John Rushton I had cut from the Gazette the notice about the Victoria Cross having been conferred on Private John Rushton for saving the life of Captain Langham and had had it framed; it hung in my room and under it was the black edged card respecting my father's death.

At first, I used to look at the framed cutting every day and ask myself what had become of Jack Rushton; but one gets accustomed to everything and in course of time I had a good many other things to think about and only indulged in such reveries at long intervals. So seven years passed.

One night we had been out late, my husband and I, and it was quite midnight before we returned. I had told the servants not to sit up for us, so when we reached home we found the place in darkness, even the hall light having been turned out.

A letter which had arrived by the last post had engaged my husband's attention, so I left him downstairs and went straight to my bedroom.

The handle of my door always turned very easily and with scarcely any noise, so that the occupant of the room, whether a servant or myself, would scarcely detect the entrance of another person by sound.

I turned the handle and pushed the door back, thinking of what had passed during the evening, but I started in surprise as my eyes fell upon a gleam of light from the dressing-table. I knew by the position and by the kind of light that it came from a lantern.

Digitized by Google

Without thinking of possible consequences, I stepped into the room and demanded: "Who's there?"

Before I had time to utter another sound I felt my throat clutched in a tight grip and I was forced backwards in such a way as to shut the door.

"If you make another sound I'll choke you!"

The words came in a hoarse whisper and I knew that the threat would be carried out. There was no mistaking the determination of the burglar.

"Come and sit down in that chair," commanded the man, and as he drew me towards the seat by the hand which still held my throat, albeit more gently, I was bound to obey. "That's right! Mind what I told you or——"

He had by this time released his hold and now held a revolver in his hand—he held it within the radius of the light from the lantern, that there might be no doubt in my mind concerning what he would do if I gave the alarm.

I was in an agony of fear on my husband's account. If he came into the room, the man would probably shoot at him, and at such short range there would be very little chance that Richard would escape injury, at least.

"Now I want all your jewellery and any money you've got," said the burglar. "Make haste, now! I ain't got no time to waste and you've spoilt me for getting the plate. I was just trying to open the drawer, but now you've come in you can save me the trouble. Where is the key? Don't speak more'n a whisper!"

I took the key from my pocket, together with my purse, and began to slip off my bracelets and rings; I did it all in silence, for I was anxious to satisfy the man and get him away lest harm should come to my husband. I watched the house-breaker and the door alternately, and in spite of my pre-occupation my curiosity was aroused by the way the man went to work.

He did nothing with his left hand; the arm seemed to hang helplessly by his side except now and then when he made use of it much as I imagined a man would use a wooden arm. He had the drawer open and took from it some trinkets which he thrust into a pocket in his coat.

I fell to wondering how he would have carried away the plate, and I concluded that he was anticipating being able to walk out of the front door with it; he could not climb from my window with a heavy bundle, unless he swung it round his neck, and to drop it to the ground beneath would probably attract attention. Then I grew nervous again about my husband's safety, for I fancied I heard a noise on the stairs.

Having pocketed all he could find in the way of portable valuables, the house-breaker picked up his lantern and began to look about the room in search of something more. I noticed that he attached the lantern to a hook on the front of his coat, while he held his weapon in his available hand.

I watched him as he moved about the room; my heart was throbbing violently and I determined to make a dash for the door, or even to try and take him unawares.

I am a soldier's daughter and have inherited some of my father's courage, but up to the present I had had absolutely no chance against the intruder, and one must not forget that prudence is said to be the better part of valour.

Suddenly the light of the lantern shone upon the framed cutting from the Gazette and the card under it; the house-breaker stared at it for a few seconds and then turned to me with his revolver lowered, and said in a voice that sounded like a gasp:

"Dead! Dead! What do you know of Captain Langham?"

"I am his daughter," I replied.

Then, as the awful truth flashed upon me, I continued: "And you are Jack Rushton!"

No sound came from the man. I stood up, struck a match and in a second I had the gas alight. All my fear was gone; I felt that the man would never attempt to harm me.

"I have tried to find you many times," I went on gently. "I was sorry—oh, so sorry!—to hear that you had been sent to prison and had forfeited the distinction which you had earned so nobly. I have always kept that framed cutting in my room out of gratitude to the man who saved my father's life at the risk of his own. I was grieved that the man should have fallen into evil ways, but I was still grateful to him."

Rushton, for it was he, sank slowly into a chair near him, laid down his revolver, covered his eyes with his hand and began to weep. As he told me afterwards, all the past came back to him and aroused the better part of the man; then there came to him the recollection that his name had been struck off the list of heroes, and he sprang to his feet with a vehement exclamation that was clearly a cry of defence. Just at that moment my husband entered, but Rushton did not see him.

"I have gone to the bad, Miss Langham," he cried, addressing me by my maiden name, "but I did not take the first step myself, I swear it! What chance did a man like me, with a useless arm, have of fighting for his living, even if he did have £10 a year? Such as me are not wanted; we are left to starve by the country we've fought for! I was one of the lucky ones, with what I had got out of the V.C.—one of the lucky ones!

"Your father—heaven bless him—helped me time after time, but a man with any go in him wants to be independent, wants to earn his own living. And when he died I tried to shift for myself. But fate was against me, and one day I got dead drunk, and when I came round I found I was in a police-station cell and charged with stealing money from a man who had had a drink with me, and getting drunk on it. There wasn't enough evidence to rob a dog of its liberty, but they convicted me and I went to prison for three months. I swear I didn't do it! And when I came out, I was soured and I gave way. I have been to prison since then, and I have deserved it! I had to steal, for everybody was against me. And now I've come to rob the daughter of the man who helped me!"

And once more, overcome by emotion, he sank into the chair and wept. My husband came up to me and we held a conversation in whispers; then we both went to Rushton and spoke kindly to him.

My husband took Jack Rushton into his employ, and we both kept him in view, seeing that he was comfortably lodged and looked after. We had hoped to make an effort to get him reinstated, but he declared that he did not wish to make the attempt; he preferred that he should be counted as one who was dead.

No, Rushton had never really parted with his V.C.; it had been in the keeping of a woman for whom he had entertained some affection and who had never parted with it. He found her out when he was settled in my husband's service; she was married, but the Cross had been handed by her to her mother, from whom Rushton received it.

When he died, about half-a-dozen years later, he asked me to take it. I have kept it where you see it, as a memento and as a lesson to everybody to be practically grateful to the soldiers who fight for our country.

George Day.

Digitized by Google

PADDLING HIS OWN CANOE.

TAKEZAWA was the head of a large silk and rice house in Yeddo. His father had been head, his grandfather had been head, his great-grandfather had been head; in fact, the date when the first of the name affixed his seal to the documents of the house was lost in the midst of antiquity. So, when foreigners were first allowed a foothold on the soil of Japan, none were so jealous of their advance, none so ardent in their wishes to see the white barbarians ousted, as the members of the firm of Takezawa and Company.

But times changed. Up to the last Takezawa held out against the introductions of foreign innovations in the mode and manner of conducting the affairs of the firm; other houses might employ foreign steamboat companies as carriers for the produce from port to port, might import foreign goods, and even go so far as to allow the better paid of their clerks to dress themselves as they liked in foreign costume; but Takezawa and Company were patriotic Japanese merchants, and resolved to run on in the old groove of their ancestors.

But times still changed, and the great house, running on in its solid old-fashioned manner, found itself left in the lurch by younger and more enterprising firms. This would never do. So Takezawa consulted with his partners, patrons, clients, and friends, and after much wordy discussion, and much vehement opposition on the part of the old man, it was resolved to keep pace with the times, as much as possible, without absolutely overturning the old status of the house.

Well, Takezawa and Co. had still a very fair share of the export rice and silk business; but their slow, heavy-sterned junks were no match for the swift, foreign-built steamers employed by other firms; so with a tremendous wince, and not without a side thought at "Hara Kiri" —(the "Happy Despatch")—Takezawa consented to the sale of all his junks, and the purchase with the proceeds of a big foreign steamer.

The steamer was bought—a fine three-masted, double-funnelled boat, complete with every appliance, newly engined, and manned by European officers and leading seamen. From the dock at Yokoska, where she was lying, a preliminary trip was made; and so smoothly did everything work, and so easily did everything seem to act, under the guidance of the Europeans, that Takezawa considered his own mariners perfectly competent to handle the vessel after an hour's experience on board.

So the Europeans were discharged with six months' salaries—about six times as much as they would have received at home—and Takezawa fixed a day when the ship should be rechristened, and should make her trial trip under Japanese management.

It was a beautiful day in autumn—the most glorious period of the year in Japan—when Takezawa and a distinguished company assembled on board the steamer, to give her a new name, and to send her forth finally as a Japanese steamer. The ship looked brave enough as she lay in the dock—ports newly painted, brass-work shining, yards squared, and half-buried in bunting. At the mizzen floated the empire flag of Japan—a red sun on a white ground—and as Takezawa gazed fore and aft, and his eyes rested on brightness, cleanliness, and order everywhere, he wondered to himself how he could have been such a fool as to stand out so long against the possession of such a treasure, merely on the grounds of its not being Japanese. A fair daughter of one of his partners dashed a cup of "sake" against the bows of the vessel, and the newly-named Lightning Bird dashed forward into the ocean. Her head was made straight for Yokohama (Takezawa had seen the Englishman at the wheel manipulate her in that course on her trial trip, so he knew she couldn't go wrong). And straight she went.

Everyone was delighted; sweetmeats and wine were served round, whilst on the quarter-deck a troupe of the best "Geishas" or singing-girls in Yeddo mingled their shrill voices and their guitar notes with the sound of the fresh morning breeze through the rigging.

The engines worked magnificently; coals were poured into the furnaces by the hundred-weight, so as to keep a good uniform thick cloud of smoke coming from the funnels—if the smoke lacked intensity for a minute, Takezawa, fearful that something was wrong, bellowed forth orders for more coal to be heaped on, so that in a quarter of an hour's time the Lightning Bird consumed as much fuel as would have served a P. and O. steamer for half-a-day.

On she went everybody pleased and smiling, everything taut and satisfactory. Straight a-head was Treaty Point—a bold bluff running out into sea. The Lightning Bird was bound for Yokohama—Yokohama lies well behind Treaty Point—but at the pace she was going it was very apparent that unless a sudden and rapid turn to starboard was made, she would run not into Yokohama, but into Treaty Point.

The singing and feasting proceeded merrily on deck, but Takezawa was undecided and uneasy on the bridge.

Digitized by Google

The helm was put hard-port, the brave vessel obeyed, and leapt on straight for the line of rocks at the foot of the point, over which the waves were breaking in cascades of foam. But the gods would not see a vessel, making her first run under Japanese auspices, maltreated and destroyed by Japanese waves and rocks; so just in time to save an ignominious run aground, the helm was put hard over, fresh fuel was pile l on to the furnaces, and by barely half a ship's length the Lightning Bird shaved the point, and stood in straight for Yokohama Bay.

Takezawa breathed freely for the moment; but, as he saw ahead the crowd of European ships and native junks through which he would have to thread his way, he would have given a very large sum to have had a couple of Europeans at the wheel in the place of his own half-witted, scared mariners.

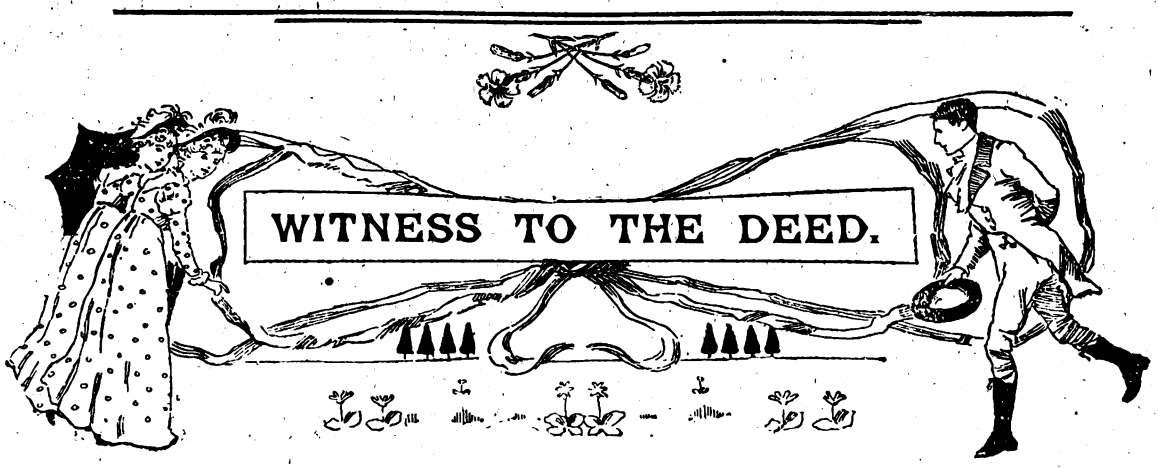
However, there was no help for it; the ship sped on, and the guests on board, many of whom were thorough rustics, were in raptures at the distant view of the white houses on the Yokohama Bund, at the big steamers and the graceful sailing vessels on all sides.

To avoid a chance of a collision, Takezawa managed to keep the steamer well outside; they nearly ran down a fishing junk or two, and all but sunk the lightship; still they had not as yet come to absolute grief.

Round they went for a long half-hour; many of the guests were suffering from sickness, and Takezawa thought that he might bring the trip to an end. So he bellowed forth orders to stop the engines, and anchor. The anchor was promptly let go, but stopping the engines was another matter, for nobody on board knew how to do so—there was nothing to be done but to allow the vessel to pursue a circular course until steam was exhausted, and she could go no further. It was idle to explain to the distinguished company that this was the course invariably adopted by Europeans, for under their noses was the graceful P. and O. steamer, a moment since ploughing along at full steam, now riding at anchor by her buoy.

So round and round went the Lightning Bird, to the amazement of the crews of the ships in harbour and of a large crowd gathered on the Bund; the brave company on board were now assured that the judgement of the gods was overtaking them for having ventured to sea in a foreign vessel, and poor Takezawa was half resolved to dispatch himself, and wholly resolved never to make such an experiment as this again.

He reviled the day when he was finally led to forsake the groove so honourably and profitably grubbed along by his fathers, and strode with hasty steps up and down the bridge, refusing to be comforted, and terrifying out of their few remaining wits the two poor fellows at the wheel. After a few circles, an English man-of-war sent a steam launch after the Lightning Bird, and to the intense disgust of the great Japanese people on board, who preferred to see eccentricity on the part of their countrymen, to interference by foreigners, but to the great delight of the women and rustics, who began to be rather tired of the fun, the engines were stopped. Takezawa did not hear the last of this for a long, long time; caricatures and verses were being constantly circulated bearing upon the fiasco, although it would have been as much as any man's life was worth to have taunted him openly with it. But it was a salutary lesson; and although he still kept the Lightning Bird, he engaged Europeans to man her, until his men proved themselves adepts, and she afterwards became one of the smartest and fastest craft on the coast. Frank Abell.



My mistress in Gainsboro' road had lost a five-pound note in the house, and the thief was the parlour-maid. I knew it from her actions, and three months after I left the house she was caught in a similar offence and owned up to the first theft.

However, the crime was laid on me, and because I made indignant and perhaps impudent protest I was sent out of the house at half-an-hour's notice and refused a character.

I was without a situation for the next three months. The first thing demanded when I applied for a place was a character.

As soon as it was found that I had none, it was useless to talk further.

It was for this reason that I finally paid a fee to a registry office in Margate Street, and was at length sent for to take a place at general housework.

It was an old man named Dyson who wanted me.

He was willing to take me without a character because he would have to pay less wages and because, as he grimly asserted, there was nothing lying about loose in his house for one to steal. As we sat face to face I sized him up as mean and penurious, but I did not see any evil in him. He had an aged and infirm wife, he told me, and I would be the only servant.

Digitized by Google

It was not for me to pick and choose. I must have a place and keep it long enough to get a character again. I went with him miles and miles out on the Holborne road, and we at last arrived at the jerry-built and cheap-looking cottage he occupied.

It was a place devoid of almost all conveniences and had been selected for its cheap rent. I found the old wife deaf, almost blind and palsied, and it was apparent that no one bothered about her. She had become childish and petulant, and before I had been in the house half-an-hour Mr. Dyson whipped her with a strap for saying that she was hungry.

As he whipped her I saw him look at her in a way which gave me a chill. In the course of three or four days I made up my mind that he regarded her with detestation and abhorrence and was hourly hoping for her death.

I wondered that he had not pushed her downstairs or found other means to bring about an "accidental" death, but the old man was full of craft and cowardice. I soon had evidence that he was in love with a widow in the neighbourhood, or at least he desired to be free so that he could marry her. The man had no occupation and seldom left the house.

During my first two weeks in the place he never allowed me to see the wife except in his presence, and found fault if I cooked anything extra for her or expressed my sympathy. He had a way of whispering to himself, and a dozen times over I heard him say:

"I've waited for five years, but I won't wait much longer. I'll get rid of her and be happy."

My natural impulse on finding out how he felt towards his wife was to leave the house, but I have explained how I was situated. And, too, I soon got the feeling that I ought to stay to protect the poor old woman. I calculated that, while he might thirst for her death, he would not proceed to extremities while I was in the house.

It seemed as if he would have lived on alone, as he had done for the last two months, if he meditated anything of that sort. I didn't know the depth of his craft, however. He had brought me there to work her death through me. The first thing that raised my suspicion this way was one morning when he asked me to help her downstairs. The stairs were steep and shaky, and he had prised one of the steps loose, that it might slide from under our feet. As a matter of fact it did give way, but I caught myself and saved the woman. When old Dyson saw the failure of his plot, he looked chagrined and savage, and presently found an excuse for cuffing the poor wife's ears.

In the course of a couple of weeks he declared that the cellar was full of rats and gave me money and ordered me to buy arsenic. He recommended me to go to a shop miles away and to say that I wanted it for my complexion and to give my own name. I went to a chemist's only two streets away and gave his name, and when he discovered this he was highly indignant for a day, and I rather expected to be given the sack.

However, in the course of three or four days he developed another plan. After telling the old wife what to say, he left me alone with her for the first time, and she begged me to get her some laudanum for toothache and not mention the matter to him. It was easy to tell that she had been told what to say, and I refused to buy the drug.

A few days later, as I was preparing her some soup, I had to leave the kitchen for a minute. When I returned, the soup was giving out a strange odour, and, being satisfied that the husband had poisoned it, I of course threw it away. He scolded about my waste, but when I looked him square in the eyes he dropped his and had no more to say.

I had been with the Dysons five weeks when the climax came. The old woman was holding her own, if not getting better, and the husband's impatience had a savage edge to it. Their bedroom was on the north side of the house. All along on that side was a deep excavation for a factory, and the cellar was full of stones and water. From the bedroom window the distance to the cellar bottom was about thirty feet. I slept on the west side, with two rooms and two doors between us, but so poorly built was the house that if voices were raised above a whisper they could be heard, and there were also many cracks and crevices to peer through. At ten o'clock one night I lay wondering if he really meant to take her life and how he would finally accomplish it when I heard a half-suppressed scream from his room. I got softly out of bed and went to the further door, and, looking through a crack, I saw that the window was up and that he stood before it with his wife in his arms. She was hanging on to him with fingers of steel, and making a great struggle. I heard him breathing heavily and snarling and growling as he tore her fingers loose, but I did not know what he meant to do till of a sudden he staggered to the open window and flung her out. She screamed as she went to her death, and in my fright I echoed the scream. I remember the man rushing across the room at me, his dashing open the door, his striking me down, and then came darkness which lasted for weeks. He struck me with a piece of iron and fractured my skull. He then carried my body downstairs and carried it a quarter of a mile away, and flung it into another excavation.

Before taking me from the house he put on my hat and cloak, and thus it appeared to those who found my unconscious body next morning that I had been coming home the night before and fallen into the pit. As to his wife, he gave the alarm and brought the police and made out that it was a case of suicide. While he was fast asleep, as he claimed, she had stolen to the window and leapt to her death.

His story was believed, and it was seven months before there was any contradiction. I had a fractured skull, brain fever and pneumonia and for weeks and weeks lay as one dead. When I mended, my memory was confused, and it was seven months before I told my story and put the police on the track.

Long before that Dyson had married the widow and sailed for America, and though efforts were made to find him, nothing came of them. Never did a man deserve the hangman's rope more, and yet, if living to-day, he is free and has no fear of the law.

C. B. Lewis.

Digitized by Google

BY THE HEAD OF A MANDARIN.

In Three Parts.

BY SADI GRANT.

PART II.

Li Ki Fo was no inexperienced adventurer; he had shot bears in the Caucasus, speared salmon in Norway, and hunted wild boar in the plains of the Punjaub; he was as hard as iron, and as callous as a graven image. Of fear he knew nothing, and merely regarded Death itself as an unpleasant but necessary evil. He had been attaché at two or three different capitals of Europe, and so was much more large-minded than most of his countrymen. He saw the other countries were more advanced in civilisation, but for all that he preferred his own—in no country of Europe could a nobleman be so completely a law to himself as in China, the high court-officers cared little for law and law's restrictions. In the Castle of Amoy, Li Lang Hi was a king to all intents and purposes, and absolute master of the lives of the dependents on his vast estates. Save for one thing, the life of a Chinese Mandarin was delightfully unfettered. And that one thing was the Queen Empress. If she swooped down on any official, however high in rank, there was nothing to do but to submit. Many a rich and powerful nobleman had she reduced to poverty, and the Imperial Treasury calmly absorbed his estates; she took and restored yellow jackets as it pleased her, and snatched away peacocks' feathers with the most heartless unconcern. One or two stiffnecked Mandarins had been known to object to Her Majesty's all-embracing greed and tyranny, but they were immediately sent a long-bladed knife "with the compliments of the Emperor"—a hint to commit suicide they dared not disobey. If they had, it would have meant a degrading public execution. So the condemned nobleman called his friends together and before them all stabbed himself to death. Then his bones were kept with his ancestors, and no disgrace was attached to the family.

Members of the Chinese Embassies who were supposed to have attached themselves too much to foreign ways and customs had been known to receive the fatal gift. Li Ki Foo himself at one time seemed to have a chance of it. But, before deciding on his execution, the Queen Empress had him appointed to her personal service for a month, and, luckily for him, his stalwart form and splendid muscles found favour in her sight; also she thought that no one so perfectly wooden in demeanour, and with such extremely sloping eyes, could be anything but thoroughly Chinese. So Li Ki Foo passed the ordeal safely, and was permitted to still exist, but the near shave he had had to commanded suicide made him rather bitter in his thoughts about the Celestial lady. He pitied the young Emperor, and was a secret partisan of his; but the Emperor's friends must wait their time—it was hopeless to do anything in his favour while the Queen Empress held by bribes and rewards the greater part of the nobility on her side.

The old Mandarin had this afternoon toddled off to his head wife's apartments, to consult with her on the advisability of Li Ki Foo going to Tartary. She was the chief woman in the household since the death of the Mandarin's mother. She was immensely fat, and had a round face like a full moon, in which her sloping eyes were nearly buried; but she was quite satisfied with her own appearance, and so was her husband—excessive fat is a beauty in China. She wore a jacket and trousers of pale blue satin, much embroidered.

In China women always dress like this, and the men often wear a straight, narrow petticoat, exactly the reverse of what men and women do in Europe. Her feet were simply stumps, nothing is so ugly as a Chinese lady's foot; in childhood the small bones of the foot are broken and the foot itself doubled up till it is simply a shapeless lump, and has no shape of a foot whatever. It slopes very slightly out from the ankle, and is nearly as broad as it is long. The very smallest push would upset a Chinese lady, for they have no surface worth speaking of to stand on at all. Li Lang Hi spent most of his afternoons with this head wife, and was guided much more by her judgment than he would have liked to admit. His favourite sofa was always ready for him, a most comfortable old pair of quilted yellow silk slippers stood waiting to be put on; he could lie and smoke in silence or talk as his wishes directed. A Chinese wife seldom contradicts her husband, or starts subjects of conversation he disapproves of. This afternoon Mi Cheng sat in her downy chair with a piece of elaborate embroidery in her hand, listening with deep interest to the tale of Li Ham's delinquencies.

"'Tis indeed a large sum, O Li Lang Hi," she said at last. "Ten thousand taels for the deliverance of that idle and shallow-pated young man."

Li Lang Hi groaned again.

"Thou speakest but too truly, Mi Cheng, it is an entire fortune of which this robber would deprive me, yet what can I do? It is not meet that the bones of a son of a Mandarin so highly placed as myself should be lost to posterity."

"What says Li Ki Foo?" said Mi Cheng.

"He!" said the Mandarin, scornfully, "he seeks only to make it an occasion for a visit to Tartary, himself."

"And how so?" said Mi Cheng.

"Li Ki Foo purposes," said the old man, "to take himself the ransom to Kin Sin, to the agent of this robber Ku, and he pretends that if this mission is intrusted to him he can, by the wiles he learnt in Europe no doubt, so arrange that Li Ham may go free and yet the ransom be unpaid, or if paid, recovered from the agent."

"Ha!" said Mi Cheng, "in that idea there may be some grains of his father's wisdom."

Li Lang Hi had not looked at it in this light before.

"It seems to me," he said, "that in letting two sons go I risk two ransoms for two sons."

"Thy words are wise, O Mandarin," said Mi Cheng, "yet is 10,000 taels a large sum to pay away without any hope of recovery."

"Also Li Ki Foo is my eldest and best-loved son," said the Mandarin. "I like it not that he should imperil his life."

Digitized by Google

Now, Mi Cheng had also two sons, younger than Li Ki Foo; she bore no ill-will personally to the eldest son, but human nature provides that one's own sons are dearer than stepsons. Should the Tartar Chief dispatch both Li Ki Foo and Li Ham to a better land than China, who was Mi Cheng to grumble at the fate that made an eldest son of Feng Lo? But she must not say this, nor give a hint that such thoughts were in her mind. So she only said:

"Truly Li Ki Foo is a young man of great promise and the staff of thy manhood, O Li Lang Hi."

"What dost thou counsel?" said the old man; "thinkest thou this is a dangerous venture?"

"Who am I, O Li," said Mi Cheng humbly, "to seek to direct thy thoughts? I am but an ignorant woman, yet methinks I have heard that there is a garrison of many Chinese soldiers at Leh, on the Great Wall, and also some troops at Kin Sin itself."

"What meanest thou by that?" said the Mandarin.

"But this, O Li Lang Hi—where soldiers are, there cannot be so much danger for thy son, Li Ki Foo, to venture. He can command an escort from the Chief Commandant."

"That is true," said the Mandarin thoughtfully.

"Yet do I not counsel this journey, O Mandarin," said Mi Cheng, "far be it from me to propose that danger should approach the most excellent and noble Li Ki Foo. Yet is ten thousand taels a large sum of money."

Then she embroidered in silence while Li Lang Hi weighed chances and possibilities in his own mind, smoking his amber pipe. On the evening of the next day he sent for his son, and formally gave him permission to go to Tartary; also, he remitted him an order on his bankers at Pekin for fourteen thousand taels, of which four thousand were for the expenses of the journey.

"This sum of money," said his father, "I give into your charge. It is a large amount to draw at one time. Should you be able to deliver Li Ham without enriching the Tartar Chief, do so, and I promise you, O my son, it will not be forgotten in days to come. After my death the ten thousand taels will be found added to thy original fortune, over and above what I now purpose for thy share."

"I thank thee, O my father," said Li Ki Foo. "I trust thy treasury will not lose the money; it shall not if diplomacy of mine can compass its safety."

"When wilt thou go?" said the Mandarin.

"To-morrow at dawn," said Li Ki Foo. "I will now give orders to my servant, Ah Cheh, that he shall make things ready, and before the morning mist melts on the China Sea I shall be far from the Castle of Amoy."

"May peace and success go with thee, O my son," said the old Mandarin; "yet it is a journey I like not, as I have before said. That thy life should be risked for that ne'er-do-well, Li Ham, is contrary to the dictates of my heart; yet have I consented to thy going, O Li Ki Foo; have a care for thyself and rather let the ten thousand taels enrich the steppes of Tartary than that thy life should be lost."

So Li Ki Foo made his preparations, which, indeed, were mostly already completed by the invaluable Ah Cheh, and the next morning, when the dawn sprang up in the far east, an armed escort was waiting outside the great gates of Amoy. Soon Li Ki Foo came out, clad in a neat riding costume of tan-coloured stuff, and with European riding boots to his knee. Ah Cheh followed him, dressed in much the same manner. The door closed gently after them, and with no further farewells they mounted and rode away, across the rough, short grass of the plain, away from the high road along the coast, taking a short cut known to Ah Cheh, straight from Amoy to the great Wall of China.

The time of year was pleasant for a long expedition. In the morning a cold wind blew over the plains and swept the sand up in clouds, in the belts of forest land the same wind sighed in the pine branches and carpeted the ground with fallen needles. For four days Li Ki Foo and his escort rode, only stopping at wayside inns for rest and refreshment; on the fifth morning they saw the long line of the Great Wall in front of them and knew their journey was nearly over. The square towers and turned-up corners of the houses of Leh stood out against the morning sky. On the journey

Mi Cheng sat in her chair listening to the tale of Li Ham's delinquencies.

Li Ki Foo had told Ah Cheh the reason of his journey—now he called him to his side and said:

"The Agent of Ku, the Tartar, is not to meet me until we arrive at Kin Sin, yet it is likely there are spies of his watching, even at Leh; therefore, Ah Cheh, will I ride into the town with only one attendant. Do you take the other men and follow in two hours' time."

"May I not be the one attendant that remains at my lord's side?" said Ah Cheh.

"Nay," said Li Ki Foo; "I wish none to know that thou art my trusted counsellor, else spies would also be set on thee. To-night, after dark, find out my lodging, and I will arrange my plans with thee further, but only a man of the escort must accompany me on arrival. Also, O Ah Cheh, go thou to the Office of the Post and ask there for a packet for me sent by special messenger from Pekin. That bring to me at night."

Ah Cheh assented and fell back. His master called up one of the escort, remarkable for nothing but his height and strength, then with him he rode on alone to the gates of Leh. There was a considerable garrison of soldiers there just then, as Li Ki Foo knew, and after dismounting and engaging a room at the principal inn, he sent a messenger to the Commander of the Barracks, a man he had met often before, asking him to come down, and see him as soon as he could. Li Ki Foo's plan was this; he meant to engage a large force of soldiers and irregular fighting men, these were to follow him to Kin Sin and remain there under the command of Ah Cheh, unless he could induce the Commandant to take up the matter thoroughly and command the expedition himself. This, he was afraid, he could not do, for the Government was very chary of interfering with the Tartar Chiefs, and unless the Commandant received official orders from headquarters, it was very doubtful if he would dare to come to the front himself. It would be easy for him, however, in the slack state of discipline in the Chinese army, to send two or three hundred men under a stranger's command, while he pretended ignorance of their having gone. The Commandant came down to see Li Ki Foo in the evening and they discussed the matter fully over a tasty Chow-Chow stew, made of two of those charming little yellow dogs you sometimes see as pets in England. The Commandant took the greatest interest in the expedition.

Digitized by Google

They mounted and rode away.

"I deeply regret, my friend," he said, "that I cannot myself command it, but it is well known that the General of this Division is on good terms with the Tartars, and it is even said, receives protection money fram Takal, a chief even greater than Ku, Had he done so from Ku, I could not have helped you at all, but as it is, three hundred soldiers shall be at your orders or at the orders of Ah Cheh to-morrow. You will, I presume, give some reward?"

"They need have no fears on that score," said Li Ki Foo, "a thousand taels shall be divided among them if they accomplish my design."

"That design I do not yet know," said the Commandant.

"No," said Li Ki Foo laughing, "because, O most honourable one, it is yet unhatched in my brain. When I get to Kin Sin and have met the Tartar's agent, I must try some means to get to the place where my brother is lying a prisoner, then I can settle with Ah Cheh when he is to bring up the soldiers and make the attack."

"It is a risky undertaking," said the Commandant; "small chance is there of your escape should you be in the Tartar's power when the troops arrive."

"I can but die once," said Li Ki Foo carelessly.

Later in the evening Ah Cheh came in. He had put up the rest of the escort at a small hostelry quite the other side of the town, and though the men wondered they said nothing. Crooked and mysterious ways are too common in China to excite much notice.

Ah Cheh brought with him a small, carefully packed wooden case, and this he delivered into his master's hand.

"It arrived but yester even, my lord," said Ah Cheh.

"'Tis well," said Li Ki Foo, taking it carefully from him, "it is an important item in my plan of campaign. Listen, O Ah Cheh, for I must confide to you all that I intend. From here I go to Kin Sin, with still only the one attendant, to meet the agent of the Tartar chief. I carry an order on the Bank of Leh for ten thousand taels; it will take the agent time to remove so large a sum, and till it is removed, they will, of course, keep Li Ham a close prisoner. My plan is this: I will send greeting to the Robber Chief and say, that being a great traveller in many lands, I desire also to see an encampment of a wandering tribe. Therefore I ask him, of his courtesy, to allow me to journey to his tents, to the place where my brother is confined, and there to stay till the ten thousand taels are in his possession."

"And my lord will so risk his precious life!" exclaimed Ah Cheh, in horror. "What possible chance can either thou, or thy honourable brother, Li Ham, have of escaping their clutches? Do I surround the camp with armed men the chief will avenge himself at once by putting you both to death."

"In this box lies the magic that will preserve us alive, O Ah Cheh," said Li Ki Foo, "have no fear for us. Can I but gain an entrance to the camp where my brother lies a prisoner all will go well."

Ah Cheh looked suspiciously at the box; he knew that in Europe Li Ki Foo had studied chemistry, for he had often been much disgusted at finding the apartments occupied by him at Amoy and at Pekin contaminated by the odour of gases and chemicals; no doubt, he thought, this box had something to do with chemicals, and his opinion of it did not rise on that account. However, he only committed himself to a contemptuous grunt as an expression of opinion.

"To-morrow," said his master, "I go to Kin Sin; you and the soldiers will follow in two days. When there you can have another interview with me, or, should I have left the place, you will find a letter, giving you full instructions, left by me at the inn where I shall have stayed. The most probable order will be that you should at once march out, with all the force you can command, and surround the Tartar encampment by night, as silently and secretly as you can. Then, as soon as daylight dawns, attack it. Li Ham and I will take our chance of being alive when you have succeeded in taking it."

Digitized by Google

"And what of the money?" said Ah Cheh, "the ten thousand taels?"

"They will not yet have arrived at the Tartar's camp," said Li Ki Foo. "I shall tell the manager of the bank here to accept my written order for the money, which will be given him by the Tartar agent, but to delay paying it for a fortnight, giving as a reason that he cannot collect so large a sum in less time."

"The plan is well thought out," said Ah Cheh, "save only that the Tartar chief may kill both thou and Li Ham as soon as he sees both in his power."

"Of that we must take the risk," said Li Ki Foo. "I think myself that when Ku once sees the order for the money, and learns that it is accepted by the banker at Leh, his mind will be set at rest, and he will guard us but lightly and treat us as honoured guests. That is what I would do in his place."

"That may be so," said Ah Cheh, "but thou, my lord, art not a Tartar savage."

"Well," said Li Ki Foo impatiently, "he must treat us as he lists. The venture must be made. Do thy part, Ah Cheh, as well as thy work is always done, and if thou findest naught but corpses to carry back to Amoy, thy conscience is clear, thou hast warned me."

There was nothing further to be said, and Ah Cheh went away, not exactly sorrowing, but rather enraged at his master's obstinacy and ill-advised rashness. Still his orders were plain; so he collected all the men he could together, in addition to the three hundred soldiers from the fort and his own small troop. He managed to engage about eighty more desperate-looking ruffians, who fought for anyone who would pay them, and were especially useful in removing inconvenient relatives of wealthy families.

Many a respectable citizen, on his way home from a peaceful gamble with a friend, had been relieved of his winnings on the way at some dark street corner, and many a lovely but frail and frivolous maiden had had her cries quenched by them for ever in the dark waters of the swift Hoang-Ho.

They fought for money, but they loved fighting for fighting's sake up here in the North; they were not like their faint-hearted brethren of Corea and Formosa. Civilisation had scarcely crept so far as Leh; they lived, as their ancestors lived hundreds of years ago, by rapine and murder, by lawless fighting with the Tartar tribes.

Li Ki Foo could have asked for no better supporters than these brawny, brown sons of Anak, with hairy chests and mighty limbs.

Ah Cheh assembled all his troops together, and told them the reason of their mission was to deliver Li Ham, the son of a powerful Mandarin, from the power of Ku the Tartar. He told them his plan of surprising the Tartar camp in the early morning, and ended his speech by promising the (to them) huge sum of 1,000 taels, to be divided in case of victory, to say nothing of the loot of the Tartar camps. Grunts of satisfaction rose from all; this was truly a promising raid.

So, two days after his master had left Leh for Kin Sin, Ah Cheh and his followers took the same road, not all together, for fear of attracting attention, but by companies of tens and twenties. On arriving at Kin Sin, Ah Cheh hastened at once to the inn where Li Ki Foo had stopped, and was handed a letter left behind for him. Li Ki Foo's prophecies had been fulfilled, the agent had met him and taken the order for the money, only the agent was no agent at all, but the Tartar chief himself, Ku, of the Lusan tribe. No one but himself could be trusted with such a delicate business. When Li Ki Foo had proceeded to express his desire to pay a visit to the tribe, he had been met with the greatest friendliness. True, Ku did not declare his name and rank in so dangerous a place, but he assured Li Ki Foo of Ku's goodwill and offered to be his guide to the camp.

"In that case who will receive the money from the Bank at Leh?" said Li Ki Foo sharply.

"That can wait," said the pretending agent magnificently. "Rather would my master wait for the money for ever than miss showing hospitality to so learned a traveller and so honourable a nobleman."

Also Ku was by no means indifferent to the fact that by getting Li Ki Foo into his camp he got security for another ransom.

"What fools are these travellers," said Ku to himself. "The shadow of the West has fallen on his brain. It is a deed worthy of a mad Englishman."

Still, he was by no means loth to profit by the mid-summer madness of a rich man's son. A doubt crossed his mind if Li Ki Foo were indeed so foolish as he seemed. He had watched his entry into Kin Sin with but one follower, still, more might be behind; it would be best to get him off to Tartary without delay.

"Lies the camp of the Lusan tribe far from here?" said Li Ki Foo.

"But three days' ride, honoured one," said the Chief;

"You will, I presume, give some reward?"

"straight to the rising sun, turning neither to the north or south."

"Good," said Li Ki Foo. "I will but go to my chamber and set together a few garments for the journey, then am I ready to set forth."

(To be concluded.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT CAMELS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Key of the Holy House," by Albert Lee, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. H. E. Luck, of 19 Cleveland Road, Chichester. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about TORTOISES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 10th. Post-cards only, please.

Genuine Camel Hair.

MR. BOWSER has been on a visit to Egypt, and that is why nothing has been heard of him for a week or two.

It has now leaked out that while in the land of the Pharaohs he elected to have his portrait painted, seated on a camel, with the hoary Pyramids for a background, and he accordingly engaged an artist and hired a trusty Arab to attend with his camel.

The appointed hour arrived, and Mr. Bowser perched himself gingerly on the camel, and tried to look as much like an Arab sheik as his modern get-up would allow; but the result was not altogether happy.

The artist, however, got to work, but had scarcely made half-a-dozen strokes when the camel, giving vent to a terrible shriek, started off at a rapid, lumbering gait across the desert, with Mr. Bowser clinging round the animal's neck, and the Arab in hot pursuit.

When the ship of the desert dropped anchor at its home, some five miles or so away, Mr. Bowser had just breath enough to gasp:

"W-what's the matter with the brute?"

"Him full ob grief, sah," replied the Arab solemnly. "Him rec'nised his mother's hair in the painter-man's brush, sah!"

H. E. L.

The "Camels" are Coming.

AT a recent review, as the skirl of the bagpipes broke forth, a little girl, hearing some remarks by her elders, strained eagerly forward, and, without deigning to look at the kilted Highlanders as they swung past, kept her eyes fixed in the direction whence they advanced.

As the last soldier passed she burst into sobs.

Her mother eagerly and sympathetically inquired the cause of her grief, and the child answered:

"You said just now 'Oh, the camels are coming!' and there wasn't one; not even a monkey went past us."

C. G. F. G.

Action and Re-action.

SOME time ago the Ordnance Select Committee assembled to test the feasibility of firing mountain-guns direct from a camel's back.

A gun was strapped to a cradle fastened to the camel's jack-saddle. The animal was led to the test ground, followed by a crowd of interested military experts.

The gun was loaded and sighted, and the camel stood with its tail to the target. A slow match was then lighted.

As soon as the camel heard the hissing it turned round, and those behind had their interests intensified in the experiments by considerations affecting their own safety.

Some lay prone, and speedy but not dignified movements were the order of the day. When the bang came the camel went in one direction and the shot in another, proving that action and re-action are opposite and equal.

M. L.

Cruel.

A WOMAN who lived in the country went to London to see a circus. While the mid-day procession was in progress a camel was taking up the rear.

When it was passing by the woman, she observed the keeper hitting it with a stick. Running up to him she exclaimed:

"You cruel brute! Look at those two bruises you have already made on its back." W. P. P.

Revenge!

A VALUABLE camel working in an old mill in South Africa was beaten by its driver. Seeing that the camel had treasured up the injury, and was waiting a favourable chance for revenge, he kept a strict watch upon the animal.

Time passed away. The camel, knowing that he was watched, was quiet and obedient, and the driver began to think that the beating was forgotten, when one night, after several months had gone by, the man was sleeping on a raised platform in the mill, and the camel was stabled in another corner.

Happening to awaken, the driver saw, by the bright moonlight, that when all was quiet the animal looked cautiously around, rose softly, and stealing towards a spot where a bundle of clothes and a bernouse thrown carelessly on the ground resembled a sleeping figure, cast itself with violence upon them, rolling with all its weight, and tearing them most viciously with its teeth.

Satisfied that its revenge was complete, the camel was returning to its corner, when the driver sat up and spoke.

At the sound of his voice, and realising the mistake it had made, the animal was so mortified at the failure and discovery of its scheme, that it dashed its head against the wall and died on the spot.

W. J. B.

Digitized by Google

What It Was!

THE little hamlet was roused out of its usual apathetic state by an event which had never happened before within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. A small travelling circus was passing through the village.

Bringing up the rear of the caravans was a miserable looking camel. The natives were much exercised in their minds as to what this strange creature could be.

In the absence of the minister (they could get nothing out of the showman), the only one who could enlighten them was the old dominie.

That dignitary was promptly fetched.

Peering through his spectacles at the camel, he remarked:

"There are but two creatures I have never seen—a scorpion and a crocodile. This animal must be either one or the other.

E. C. L.

Entangled.

A MENAGERIE camel, like a captive balloon, never gets far from its tether, and is subjected to so many indignities in its daily life that its kingly heart must ofttimes come nigh to breaking.

When Barnum's show was in Barnsley last year, one of the keepers noticed a collier viciously prodding a recumbent camel with a long stick.

"Steady on, there," he cried, as the pained animal struggled clumsily to its feet. "Let the poor beast alone, can't you? What harm is he doing you?"

The collier dropped his stick and assumed a bewildered expression.

"Guv'nor, hev all camels got four legs?" he asked tremulously.

"Of course, they have, you chump."

"Then Ah'm goin' artside to kick mesen. Ah wor thinkin' abart ostriches when Ah bet Bill 'Iggins they'd only two!"

R. A. H. G.

So He Lost the Case.

"I ONCE had a case," said a member of the Bar "against a man in the country, which was as clear as daylight in my favour, but, by the cunning of the lawyer, he had continued to avoid coming to trial for about two years.

"At last the case was called, late in the term and late one hot day, with the court and jury tired and impatient.

"I stated the facts, and produced the evidence, which was all on my side.

"The judge asked the counsel whether they wished to argue the case, stating that he hardly thought it necessary to submit it on so plain a matter.

"The lawyers agreed to submit it without argument. The jury went out, and immediately returned with a verdict for the defendant.

"As soon as the court adjourned I sought the foreman of the jury, and asked him how in the name of common sense they came to render such a verdict.

"'Why, you see,' said he, 'we didn't think much of the lawyer against you, and it wasn't strange he had nothing to say; but we thought you one of the smartest lawyers in the country, and if you couldn't find something to say on your side it must be a pretty hard case if we had to go against you.'"

WHAT WOULD YOU DO WITH £1,000?

Supposing—only supposing, of course—that you came into possession of £1,000 sterling, what would you do with it? How would you begin?

Probably, if you have a banking account, you would first of all put the £1,000 into it, and then take a deep breath and look around you to see how you could best utilise it.

If you haven't got a banking account, you very soon would have one. Then, what would you do? Would you go into a bigger house, spend all the money, and live in luxury for a year?

Or would you live just as you are and invest the money and spend the interest, leaving the capital untouched?

Or would you go for a long holiday on the Continent? Or, if you propose to double the £1,000, how would you go to work?

Write your views on this point, and send them to the Editor of Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "THOUSAND," to arrive not later than Tuesday, December 11th.

A Columbia Graphophone will be sent to the person from whom we receive what we consider to be the best and most sensible answer.

Well, What Do You Think of the "Twenty Teazer"?

ISN'T IT A LITTLE RASCAL?
CAN YOU DO IT?
CAN YOUR FRIENDS DO IT?

It is One of the most Teazing Teazers that ever Teazed a Teazed Public.

It is not much to look at. You would think there was nothing in it. You would think you could do it on your head in the dark. But you can't.

You sit down at a table after tea with the "Twenty Teazer" in front of you, and you say to your wife, "Now, just time me, and see how quickly I can do this alleged 'Teazer!'" And then you begin.

About two in the morning your wife comes down in her dressing-gown with a candle to find you grovelling on the ground with your coat off and your collar undone, hunting round for the fifth square block of wood which you are convinced must have been in the box.

But you are wrong; there are only four, and the "Teazer" can be unteazed.

One point, however, you should bear in mind, that it is not necessary for the numerals to be all facing the same way. Some of them may be upside down, others may be end on, just as you fancy.

THE PRICE IS SIXPENCE,

and you can get it from any newsagent or bookstall clerk.

You can try to do it in the train, or on the 'bus, at home, or up in a balloon, or anywhere except in your bath. Even there you can do it if you can keep the water steady.

The "Twenty Teazer" won't wash clothes; is not a tobacco or a carpet-sweeper; doesn't bark or bite or try to borrow money from you. It simply consists of four harmless little squares of wood in a neat little oblong box.

Digitized by Google

"Market Jemmy."

He put it down carefully. There was a suggestion of stealthiness in the action which puzzled me. It was a small neat volume bound in dark leather.

"A pound, sir?" he queried, making interrogation points of his eyes.

Whilst he busied himself over my order I was staring at the little duodecimo which lay half-hidden behind the scales.

There was a look about it which seemed to be familiar. In the roar of the Great City it awoke memories of the cloister, the chapel and the quad.

It lay upon its side, exposing to view a smooth brown surface which age had darkened, and use had polished, but giving no hint of its author, and suggesting no word of its contents.

He handed me the fruit, and I tendered him a coin. In searching for change, the volume got pushed forward beyond the point where, covered by the scales, it had lain in partial concealment; and on the two inches of bevelled back now revealed, I read the legend in gilt letters, QUINTUS HORATIO FLACCUS.

I looked hard at the man who was counting pence into my extended palm—I looked and was disappointed.

In his face I saw nothing that would differentiate him from his brethren—from the mass of the great brotherhood who make their living in the street.

"Surely," thought I, "a barrowman who can read Horace in the original ought to carry some sign thereof on his forehead."

My friend did nothing of the kind.

"Clean but commonplace," was the mental comment I passed upon his features, "Eyes, dull and watery, lips loose; nostrils wide and spreading, cheeks flabby."

Outwardly the man was a disappointment.

"Thanks!" he ejaculated, as the last penny fell into my hand and closed the transaction in cherries.

I glanced at the book on the barrow.

"Horace?" I murmured curiously, looking at the man with grave and serious eyes, "Horace?" He smiled, and, for a moment I caught a glimpse of another personality.

The man who had been crying "cherries! all ripe, foppence a paound," was not the man who was standing there smiling at me. My curiosity increased mightily.

"We're old friends," he volunteered. "But I don't desire to advertise it."

He picked up the book and slipped it into his pocket.

A policeman came along—the barrow was "loitering"—the officer sauntered up. Our colloquy was broken off just as it promised to become interesting. The man had a story to tell. I turned away unsatisfied.

* * * * *

A week had elapsed before I met "Horace" again. When I pulled up and requested "a pound," his features betrayed no intelligence, and in vain I looked for the little brown volume which had provoked my curiosity.

The preliminary "bit o' business" concluded, I reminded him that we had "traded" before.

"Yes," he said. "I remember you now."

My glance had been wandering over basket and board. He noticed it and added, "I had a friend with me, I think, on that occasion."

"You had," I replied in a voice and with a smile that was intended to invite confidence, "a mutual friend."

"So I reckoned," he laughed.

"Well, I'm thinking you won't see us in company again, Mister."

"Indeed!"

"No." He shook his head emphatically. "It was a mighty piece of folly to bring him to the city. Yet, believe me, I wasn't aware of his presence till I found him hiding in the pocket of my jacket. I ought to have let him stay there. But I've learnt my lesson——"

"Cherries, marm!" he broke off, as a lady stopped in front of the barrow, and I pondered over the traces of culture which had mostly marked his utterance.

"Yes," he resumed, when his customer had taken her departure, "I'm a street-hawker by'r leave, sir——a man in the gutter. And, what business pray has a 'coster' to be seen thumbing his Horace? What do you think?" and he looked up in my face with a smile that was curious and suggestive.

"I think I understand you," I said. We walked up Moorgate Street, our talk growing more confidential. At the corner of Finsbury Square he stopped. "I turn back here," he said, "and go down on the other side. I'm working the Moorfields beat to-day. Meet me to-morrow—eight p.m. You know where. Ask for 'Market Jemmy.'"

* * * * *

It was at a coffee-tavern near Farringdon Street that my fruit merchant told me the story which I have set down below.

"Yes," said he, settling himself in a quiet corner, and producing an aged-looking briar. "Yes, my friend, you guessed right. I was a Public School boy, and am a 'Varsity man. I took a double-first at Oxford; and am entitled to write M.A. at the end of my name. What that name is, is of no consequence to-day. It's long since I answered to it. But in common justice to you, sitting here 'hob and nob' with a man picked off the street, I will say at once that I've never been 'wanted.' No, friend, drink has been my curse. Cards have been my ruin.

"Ten years ago I locked away the memories that lie behind eighty three, and vowed never to open the chamber containing them again. That life has been lived, has ended, and may now be forgotten.

"Of the past, therefore, you must be content to know only, that the depth of my fall may be measured by the fact that while still under thirty, I was first assistant-master at a leading grammar school in a northern county; yet before I had reached thirty-five, I had become an outcast, and a wanderer, and three years later was selling fruit from a barrow.

"Would it surprise you very much to hear that that was really the first step in the process of 'unwinding the accursed chain?'

"I was living at a lodging-house in the Borough. On the same floor lodged a young woman whose husband had deserted her. She worked at a pickle factory. But her health was bad and she could never make full time. Her door was opposite mine. She had one child—a girl,

Digitized by Google

a pretty little flaxen-haired thing of three. The mother was a quiet, well-behaved woman whose lines had fallen in the roughest places. At times her face wore a look of anguish which distressed me to see. But she never complained. The complaints of the poor are seldom heeded. Even the children learn to suffer in silence.

"During the winter I got into the habit of knocking at Mrs. Martin's door to inquire if I could bring in anything for her.

"The little maid always ran to climb on my knee or play bo-peep with the skirts of my coat. I still drank when in funds, but was not often the worse for liquor. You see, I could carry a cargo in those days that would have 'laid out' many another man. My neighbour, I don't think, had ever seen me properly drunk.

"I always avoided her when the fit was on. Her husband had ill-used her in drink, and she would tremble like a leaf at the sound of a drunken step upon the stairs.

"One evening, after a day spent in bed to sleep off a carouse—I'd been doing a bit of penny-a-lining at odd times, you must know, for a popular journal out Fleet Street way; but had got the 'bullet' the week before, and was 'keeping it up.' My report of a certain function which I was supposed to have attended was found to contain but one half-pennyworth of fact to a most intolerable deal of imagination. Not to put too fine a point on it, I'd been on the 'bend' and vamped up a report. It was the second time of offending; and, very properly, my name was removed from the contributor's list.

"Well, one evening at the end of this drunken week, I knocked as usual at Mrs. Martin's door, and, turning the handle softly, went in.

"The fire was just a glimmer in the grate, and the room was in semi-darkness. On the floor, the child was playing with some reels.

"'Mammy seep!' she lisped, getting on her feet and running towards me. But stopping half-way, she eyed me curiously, and muttering 'Bad man you's dwunk!' went back to her play. It was the severest rebuke I ever received. An infantile voice, four simple words, and the turning upon me of a childish figure, had cut me to the quick.

"'Can I get anything for you, Mrs. Martin?' I whispered huskily, eager to escape from the room.

"There was no response, and I drew nearer to the bed. 'Aren't you well?' I said, bending over it.

"The sight I saw sobered me in an instant.

"'Mammy seep,' murmured the child, pulling at my coat.

"The woman had lain down in the afternoon to snatch a little rest. Her cough, always troublesome at night, seldom allowed her to get even an hour of unbroken slumber; and often, after spending the morning at the pickle factory she would return home exhausted, and, throwing herself on the bed, fall asleep from sheer weariness.

"She had evidently done so on this occasion. But a blood-vessel on the lungs had given way—p'raps during a fit of coughing, p'raps in an attempt to change her position—and she had been suffocated; probably before she knew what had happened.

"Well, my friend," continued 'Market Jemmy,' after a few slow and solemn puffs at his pipe, "that is now seven years ago, and not a drop of liquor have I tasted since.

"The child—little Milly—was my salvation. Nobody in the house knew anything of the mother. In London tenement-houses, the inmates, often enough, are a mystery to each other. They come and go, passing each other daily on the same staircase, each mounted by their own familiars, and each bearing their own burden. Very seldom are they curious to probe the secret of each other's lives. The struggle for existence consumes all their energies. The present hour claims all their attention. Only when death steps in is the current turned backward, and guesses hazarded concerning the antecedents of the individual who has 'gone over.'

"Mrs. Martin had been living on my landing for eighteen months but beyond the fact that she had come from Devonshire—poor soul! from the fern-clad combes of leafy Devon to the squalid streets of sordid Southwark—and that her husband had left her; beyond this, nothing whatever was known about her. Plenty of hands, however, were held out to take charge of little Milly.

"Many of them, prompted only by the sweet charity which the poor show to the poor—a few, actuated by motives which, to say the least, were open to suspicion. But she clung to me, and I claimed her; and verily, I believe I should have gone right under in double quick time had another taken her and not I.

"A month later I started out with the barrow to work for her—for her I am living—for her I am saving—for her sake I abstain.

"Live with me?—with 'Market Jemmy.' Heaven forbid! No, friend, Milly's at school. The girl shall have her chance, as I had mine. Heaven send, she make a better use of it.

"After much searching I discovered a throughly good middle-class establishment kept by a widow and daughter in a small town twenty miles from London. I interested them in the girl, and they agreed to take her as a boarder. On the first Sunday in every month I pay her a visit. She calls me 'uncle.' Last week she wrote to remind me that she would be 'eleven' before she saw me again. No," he said, replying to a question; and I fancied I could detect a shade of bitterness in the tone, "I have no ambitions for her. The future lies on the knees of the gods."

He rose from his seat and reached for his hat.

"The wind bloweth where it listeth," he said abruptly, "and no man knoweth—the course that a woman will take, or how far she will go.

"Milly has the promise of beauty," he added quietly, proceeding to refill the aged briar from an ancient pouch; murmuring slowly, as he pressed the tobacco into the bowl with his thumb:

"No, I have no illusions. 'The wine of life is drawn, and the mere lees is left this vault to brag of.'"

We parted at the door; and I walked home under the starry mantle of the night, silent and wondering.

H. Hunter.

OUR NEXT GREAT SERIAL
WILL BE BY LOUIS TRACY,
AND WILL BE ENTITLED
"THE LOST LADY DELIA."

It starts in the CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER of SHORT STORIES, and is of intense human interest.

It is written in a crisp and sparkling manner, and is calculated to hold the attention of the reader from the first to the last chapter.

Digitized by Google

LOVE'S GUIDING HAND.

"I'm very sorry, sir, but I'm a poor woman, and depend upon my lodgers for my living. I can't afford to let the bill run on any longer. You must either settle it to-morrow, or find other rooms."

The two, to whom the lodging house-keeper spoke, exchanged glances, in which there was mingled a world of despair.

The woman observed, and her somewhat unsympathetic face unbent a little.

"I don't want to be hard on you," she added. "As nice a lady or gentleman I never had in my house, so I'll give you another week. Perhaps by that time you will have written to your friends." And leaving her bill upon the table, the landlady left the room.

It was a common case enough.

A young and pretty actress—not too clever in her profession—and with a strong spice of romance in her little Bohemian soul, while playing in a small provincial theatre, had attracted the attention of a good-looking young fellow, occupying the stalls.

By the friendly assistance of a male member of her company, he had secured an introduction; and an acquaintance commenced on both sides with no more meaning than a passing flirtation—had ripened, in the short space of the company's stay, into a deeper sentiment.

Having money and leisure at his command, in spite of her protestations, he had followed the troupe from town to town.

Then one morning, yielding at last to his persuasions, she had accompanied him to church, where they were quietly married.

For a little time, life to the newly-wedded pair had been a dream of happiness, though like all dreams it sometimes had its waking moments, when, with his quarter's allowance running low, the necessity was drawing near of communicating the news of his marriage to his uncle—the stern old Berkshire squire, who had expected such brilliant things of his nephew and heir, and who—for some strange reason—for the o'd man was broad-minded enough in most matters — had an abiding hatred of the theatre.

Hugh Dalrymple dreaded the ordeal before him. He realised how much wiser his wife had been than he, when she had besought him, tearfully it is true, but with all the strength of her unselfish nature, to wait a while. He recalled the mystery—which, head over ears in love as he was, had then seemed of such little moment—attending his wife's birth.

Her father had been an actor, who had died when she was too young to recollect. His professional name had been Horace Lanceley, but more than that she did not know. She remembered her mother well—a gentle-voiced, dainty little woman, with turquoise blue eyes and fair hair, and with cheeks which should have been all smiles and dimples—in fact another such as herself. But for some unknown reason, her mother's eyes had always worn a saddened expression, and her cheeks had been pale and careworn.

Katie's childhood had been made up for years in travelling about the country with her mother—Kathleen Lanceley, as she called herself—playing tiny parts in the various companies in which her mother was the leading actress.

She recalled vividly when all this came to an end, and her mother, who had suddenly received an advantageous offer to tour in America, had left her, after a sad, sad parting, in the charge of a kindly landlady, whilst she went, as she said tearfully, to earn the means to secure her little one's future.

Katie possessed piles of letters, bearing the post-marks of nearly a l the big American cities, full of loving messages and letters which, as time went on, spoke hopefully of that day not far distant, when her mother would be able to return, and together they would leave the stage, and be as happy as the day was long.

She had still another letter—black-edged, and written in a stiff, legal hand, from a lawyer in Massachusetts, stating in curt, legal terms, the death of his client—Kathleen Lanceley—from typhoid fever, inclosing a lock of sunny hair, a photograph of her mother when a girl, and a cheque which represented the dead actress's savings, and which served to start Katie in the profession.

A pathetic little life-story enough, but not one, as Hugh knew, to appeal to Major Dalrymple, so ambitious as he was, for his favourite nephew to form a great alliance.

Digitized by Google

When the dreaded interview had taken place when their worst fears had been realised—and Hugh, proud and passionate as the fiery old despot, his uncle, had turned his back for ever, as he thought, upon the beautiful home which should have been his, it only seemed to draw the two closer together.

"I don't want to be hard on you," she added.

Hand in hand, as it were, they had thrown themselves into the great battle-ground of London, filled with the beautiful self-confidence of youth that they could make a living for themselves—he with his pen, and she, with a small part at one of the London theatres.

But alas! "The best laid plans of mice and men gang aft aglee!"

Three months had gone by, the last of Hugh's allowance had long since been spent, and one by one his stories and articles over which he had spent hours of anxious thought, had come back. Thanks to her good looks, and previous experience in the country, Katie had, indeed, been fortunate enough to obtain an engagement as extra lady at a West End theatre, but the small salary barely sufficed to keep t em in food. The rent for the past six weeks past had been unpaid, and now Mrs. Jarrocks had said that unless they could raise her rent, the coming week must be their last.

No wonder that for some minutes after the woman had descended to those mysterious apartments, somewhere in the basement where she lived and slept, the two remained silent.

She was the first to break the silence, and with the sanguine trust in the morrow to redeem the misfortunes of to-day, which is so characteristic of her profession, she hoped still that "something" might turn up. Besides if all else failed—as she told herself—with a little sob rising in her throat, there was always the plan, which more than once in their darkest hours had come to her, which would go far to set matters right—for Hugh.

"Never mind, dear," she said, putting her soft arms round his neck, "it is very terrible, I know, especially for you"—she only thought of him—"but we have another week to look about us, and by that time we may be able to pay the woman."

"We may!" he reiterated. Then with bitter sarcasm:

"And I may be offered the editorial chair of one of the journals, in place of the gentleman who shows such appreciation of my work. The chances are about as probable. But what a brute I am," as he caught sight of the tears welling up into her eyes, "talking like this to you, little woman, instead of trying to comfort you, but somehow," she nestled into his arms and laid her pretty head upon his shoulder, "I can't, and that's a fact! Everything looks so black, and I know no other way of earning money, unless," seriously, "I could get someone to give me a post as a gamekeeper. I can use a gun."

"No, no, dear," she replied. "We've not come down to that yet. Fancy my proud Hugh," with a hysterical little laugh, "following someone about, whom he'd know as an equal, loading their guns, and carrying their game-bags. Why he would eat his heart out in a week."

"Why should I? What right has a miserable creature like I, to have any pride?"—with a return to the old bitterness—"My pride has allowed me to live on your poor little earnings for six weeks at the least."

"You forget, Hugh, that I am your wife," she said softly.

"I wish to Heaven I could!"

"Hugh!"—there was acute pain in her tones.

"Don't make a mistake, dearie"—drawing her close to him—"I only mean that I wish I could forget that I had linked your life with mine—had brought you to this," with a sweeping gesture around at the mean little room.

"It is you who have made the sacrifice, not I, Hugh!" she said. "My life wasn't a very easy one before we met. Besides"—with a deep flush—"since we have known each other, I have been very, very happy, happier than I ever dreamt, a girl could be, and to have been happy is something in this hard world, something"—with a sob she could check no longer—"to look back upon, when the happiness has passed away."

"What do you mean by that, Kit?" he asked, taking alarm by the sadness of her tones. "Are you—no!" staring hard at her, "surely not! You are not thinking that this grinding poverty that is, and may be, will make our love grow less?"

"No, Hugh, I have no fear of that, I believe," with a far-away look in her eyes—"we shall love each other always—always! But there!" hastily brushing away her tears. "I'm making a baby of myself, when I ought to be putting on a thinking cap, to discover some plan to help us out of our present difficulties, for by-and-bye things must brighten up. The darkest cloud, you know—finish the quotation for me, sir."

Digitized by Google

"I can't, for I don't believe in it. There's only one thing to be done, Kit," seizing pen and paper, "and that is, to sink the pride, and write round to some of my old friends, and ask for a keeper's lodge. I won't borrow money from them, but I'll accept work."

With a firm hand, she took the writing materials from him.

"Not to-night, Hugh," she said. "Wait a day or two longer," as he shook his head, "well, over to-morrow, then," and with the wifely tact, which seemed second nature to her, she soothed him into a more hopeful frame of mind, and at least for the present, the letters were forgotten.

He was still unsuspicious when, the following morning as she was starting for a rehearsal as he supposed, she returned twice after she had reached the door, and stooping down to where he sat over his writing, kissed him with a passionate fervour.

He never dreamt that the parting which he anticipated was to last only a few hours, it was her intention to be for all time.

The thinking cap, which had been worn often enough on her poor little aching head, during these last six weeks, had suggested only one plan. Everything she had learnt of the past, had convinced her that Hugh had been very dear to his uncle. She herself was the only serious obstacle to a reconciliation. She would go down to Streathfield, Major Dalrymple's country seat, near Wantage, and propose to the proud old man, that she should go away—bury herself once more in her old profession—and as far as lay in her power—set Hugh free.

To think was to act with Katie. All Hugh's and her own jewellery had gone, save one thing—her mother's miniature. This was encased in a gold locket, on the back of which was the monogram, K. D. in diamonds. The pawnbroker with whom she pledged it, advanced her sufficient for her fare, and a little more, and just at mid-day, when she pictured Hugh putting on his hat to come and meet her, she ascended the steps of the fine old mansion, which had been Hugh's home, and rang the bell.

Thomas—the old man-servant, who had been in the Major's service from a lad—appeared. She recognised him instantly, from Hugh's description, and the wrinkled kindly face seemed like that of an old friend.

"Is Major Dalrymple in?"

The old man started slightly, and a look of strange interest crept into his withered face.

"No! The master is out just now, miss."

"Oh!"

She had nerved herself for the ordeal of meeting him, now she would have given worlds to have had the dreaded interview over.

"But I expect him back very shortly. Would you care to wait?"

There was something in the old servant's expression which gave her courage, and she entered the house. He showed her into the library, then instead of leaving her, fumbled nervously at the door.

"What name shall I give the major, miss?" he asked.

"Mrs. Dalrymple!" she said quietly.

His face fell, although the look, with which he was regarding her, was not less kind.

"Are you Mrs. Hugh, then—the young master's wife?"

"Yes!" she answered, half-shyly.

He heaved a sigh.

"It's wonderful! Wonderful!"

"What is wonderful?" growing annoyed at the

BODLEIAN·BERKELEY·CA

With a firm hand she took the writing materials from him.

old man's gaze which never wandered from her face.

For answer he went to the window, and looked anxiously out at the wide expanse of gardens and meadow-land beyond, then with a mysterious air beckoned her to follow him.

Wonderingly she obeyed.

He led the way up a broad flight of stairs and threw open a door. Within was a bedroom, which had evidently belonged to one of her own sex, for there were traces of feminine occupation everywhere—from the dainty lace upon the pillows, to the knot of faded blue ribbon upon the dressing table. But upon all and everything was the dust of years. The room remained apparently in the same state as its former occupant had left it—as Katie decided, more years than she had known.

She turned to question her guide, but he was standing pointing to a picture hanging opposite to the window—a ray of sunshine which had stolen through the closed venetians, falling full upon it.

"Look!" he said, and his voice quavered as he spoke.

Katie glanced up, then gave a low cry of astonishment.

The picture, which was a full length portrait of a young girl, with pale golden hair, and eyes of the purest blue, might have been herself, saving that she wore a dress of dark material, while the figure in the picture was draped in white.

"Who is she?" she asked in awed tones.

"It is the portrait of my master's daughter—Miss Kathleen. Now you will forgive an old man's seeming rudeness. When I saw you, it was as though I had seen a ghost."

Digitized by Google

"And this was her room?"

"Yes! Just as she left it more than five-and-twenty years agone. But you must never let out that you have been here. No one ever enters the room except the master, and he only when there is no soul to see."

"You are the very image of Miss Kathleen that was. For her sake he may soften towards you and Master Hugh. But"—with another sigh—"'tis a pity you've been a play-actress, a sad pity!"

They had left the room, and reached the top of the stairs, when a harsh voice calling "Thomas!" reached them from below.

"Go back! It is the master!" the old man whispered hurriedly, growing pale, "He must not see you here! Quick!"

"Where shall I go?"

He hesitated for a moment then replied:

"Back into the young mistress's room. When it is safe for you to come out, I'll let you know, but stop there till I come." And he hurried away.

As Katie found herself once more in Kathleen Dalrymple's chamber and alone, after the first feeling of intense awe which had seized her, had passed, a sense of peace stole into her aching heart, and the eyes of the dead girl—for somehow Katie had the conviction that dead she was—seemed to smile down at her, and how like those eyes were her own!

A curious fancy seized her. Her glance had fallen upon a wardrobe, and with feverish impatience she threw it open, disclosing a pile of dresses hanging within, and one was the white robe of the portrait.

Reverently, like one handling a holy thing, she drew it on, the dust, as she did so, rising from its silken folds in a cloud.

Now indeed as she gazed at herself in the dimmed glass of a great mirror, she saw that the old servant had spoken the truth. The picture upon the wall and the reflection in the glass might have been the same person.

What did it mean? She turned to question her other self—to ask those pathetic eyes which looked down so benignly at her from the painted canvas, to explain the mystery.

But the question was never asked. She was no longer alone.

Before her stood the figure of a tall, very tall, old man, his eyes distended, and the white moustache which hid his grim mouth, quivering with emotion. As she faced him a hoarse cry broke from his lips.

"Kathleen! Kathleen!"

Her terror told her that it was Major Dalrymple, and a gasp of fear escaped her.

At the sound he advanced slowly towards her, then with a doubtful movement, placed a shaking hand upon her shoulder.

The trembling form beneath his touch reassured him, and his face, which a moment before had been deathly white, became almost purple.

"Who are you," he cried fiercely, "and what mummery is this?"

But one word escaped her frightened lips.

"Kate!"

A puzzled, half-nervous look crept up into his eyes.

"Kate! What Kate?"

"Kate Dalrymple! Hugh—your nephew's wife!"

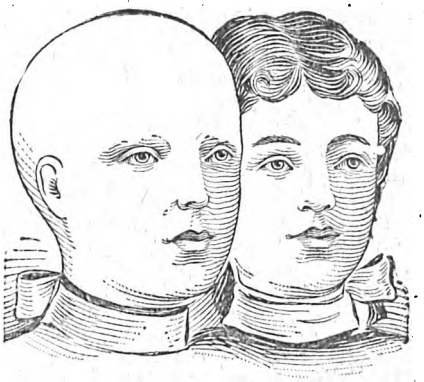
"What?" passionately.

CURES BALDNESS.

Prevents Hair Falling Out, Removes Dandruff, Stops Itching, and Restores Luxuriant Growth to Shining Scalps, Eyebrows, and Eyelashes.

A TRIAL PACKAGE FREE

People who need more hair or are anxious to save what they have, or from sickness, dandruff, or other causes have lost their hair should at once send their name and address to the Altenheim Medical Dispensary, 1792 Butterfield Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A., enclosing a 1d. stamp to cover postage, and they will forward, prepaid, by mail, a sufficient free trial package of their remedy to fully prove its remarkable action in quickly removing all trace of dandruff and scalp diseases and forcing a new growth of hair.



MISS EMMA EMOND, Quebec, Can.

The portraits of Miss Emma Emond show what a striking difference is made in a person when the bald head is covered with hair. Miss Emond was totally bald, the hair follicles, not only upon her head but upon her eyebrows, being completely contracted, not the sign of a hair being found. She sent for a free trial of the Foso Remedies, and was rewarded by a growth of hair, which, for thickness, quality, and luxuriance, was as remarkable as the result was gratifying. Miss Emond lives in St. Sauveur, Quebec, Canada, 24 Chateauguay Street.

Miss E. M. Haltnesser, 10 E. Hyde Park Mansions, Marylebone, London, N W., Eng.—"Foso Remedies are wonderful."

Miss Fannie Gibson, Well Bank, Taplow, Nr. Maidenhead, Bucks, Eng.—"Foso Remedies removed the dandruff and made hair nice and glossy."

Mr. G. Collyr, 103 Grundy Street, Poplar, E., London, Eng.—"Have had no itching scalp since using the Foso Remedies."

Mr. G. A. Rose, 40 Old Dover Road, Blackheath, S.E.—"Foso Remedies acting like magic; three weeks had a growth of new hair. It is now quite dark where before I had only a shiny scalp."

Mr. Herbert Emms, 153 Unthanks Road, Norwich, Eng.—"Foso Remedies are excellent. Can keep my scalp in fine healthy condition."

Mr. Geo. Ellis, Etruria, Stoke-on-Trent, Staffs., Eng.—"Have been delighted with results from using Foso Remedies."

Mr. Fred A. Robinson, Clerk in charge Victoria Market, Kingston, Jamaica, W.I.—"Had a severe itching scalp, which has been cured by the Foso Remedies."

Mr. M. Caistner, 28 St. George's Place, Canterbury, Kent, Eng.—"Hair greatly improved; believe your Remedies all right."

Mr. John Warren, care M. J. Reavy, 88 Regent Road, Salford, Manchester, Eng.—"Foso Remedies very good. Enclosed price for further treatment."

The remedy has cured thousands, and no one need fear that it is harmful.

The remedy also cures itching and dandruff, sure signs of approaching baldness, and keeps the scalp healthy and vigorous. It also restores grey hair to natural colour and produces thick and lustrous eyesbrows and eyelashes. By sending your name and address to the Altenheim Medical Dispensary, 1792 Butterfield Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A., enclosing a 1d. stamp to cover postage, they will send you, post paid, a free trial of their remarkable remedy.

Remember a letter to us from British Isles requires 2½d. postage. Write your name and address very plain, or, better still, enclose a self-addressed envelope, so there can be no mistake in delivery.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, please, please forgive me!" holding out her hands appealingly. "I only came to ask you to pardon him and to say," with a sob, "that if you will, he shall never never see me again."

He was unmoved by her tears.

"How did you obtain an entrance here? And what is the meaning of this?" touching the white robe she still wore.

She hesitated. To tell him the truth would be to betray another and yet——

"Answer me!" sternly.

She pointed to the portrait.

"I came to see her," she faltered. "She is so like me, and—and—then I found the dress and put it on. I didn't think there was any harm that anyone would ever know. Somehow I fancied it might have been my mother's."

He drew her to the window, bringing her face within the light of the sunbeam, and looked at her long and closely.

"Who was your mother?" he asked quickly, agitation in his tones, and seemingly forgetful that his former question was practically unanswered.

"She was an actress, and," waxing bold in the defence of the dead woman, who had toiled so bravely for her, "a good woman, and I am an actress too. But tell me," taking advantage of a subtle change in his manner, "why do you hate the profession so? Is—is it anything to do with her?" pointing to the picture.

"Yes!" he said slowly. "She left me to marry an actor, and I cast her off."

As she forced him a hoarse cry broke from his lips.

"That was hard, for they loved each other, and love you know, is stronger than ourselves. Ah, it is!" as he gave an impatient shrug of his shoulders, "for it has made me strong enough to give up Hugh."

Again his fierce eyes burnt upon her face, as though he were reading her very soul.

"Sit down," he said, "and tell me about your mother. What was her maiden name?"

And there in the dim light of that neglected room, Katie told her story, speaking of her mother's death in America, and all she knew of the dead woman's past.

"And now," she concluded, "say that you forgive Hugh, and let me go."

For some moments he remained in silent thought. When he spoke again, his voice had become husky, his features had softened, and the fierce eyes were dimmed.

"Yes, go," he said, "and bring Hugh home!"

"Home?"

Her brain reeled. She dared not believe all that his words inferred.

"Yes! To your mother's home, and yours! For more than twenty years I've mourned her loss, now," drawing up the blind and admitting a flood of glorious sunlight, which illumined every nook and cranny of the forsaken room, "I shall mourn no more. Love is stronger than ourselves, as you say. I can believe it, for the guiding hand of love, which led you here, seems to have brought your mother back again."

Hurbert Bartlett.

Digitized by Google

FREE
QUAKER OATS COOKER

OUR OFFER, READ IT

2-Pint Cooker Free. { For 25 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

2-Pint Cooker Free. { For 50 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

3-Pint Cooker Free. { For 40 white squares like this from front of 2-lb. packet.

3-pint Cooker Free. { For 75 white squares like this from front of 1-lb. packet.

Required number of White Squares must be sent in at one time.

On receipt by us, POSTAGE PAID, of required number of WHITE SQUARES, or price mentioned below, before Sept. 1, 1901, a Quaker Oats Cooker will be sent at once, carriage paid, to any address in Great Britain or Ireland.

If you want the Cooker at once, and have not the required number of WHITE SQUARES, send 2/- for 2-pint size, or 2/6 for 3-pint size. The amount you pay will be refunded immediately correct number of WHITE SQUARES is sent us postage paid, if received by us before Sept. 1st, 1901. Write your address plainly and mention this Paper.

ADDRESS: DEPT. W 3

QUAKER OATS, LTD., EASTCHEAP, LONDON, E.C.

QUAKER OATS, sold in 1-lb. and 2-lb. Packets only.

Beware of substitution. Quaker name and Quaker Figure on every Packet.

Shilling packets

Kaputine "the" safe Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

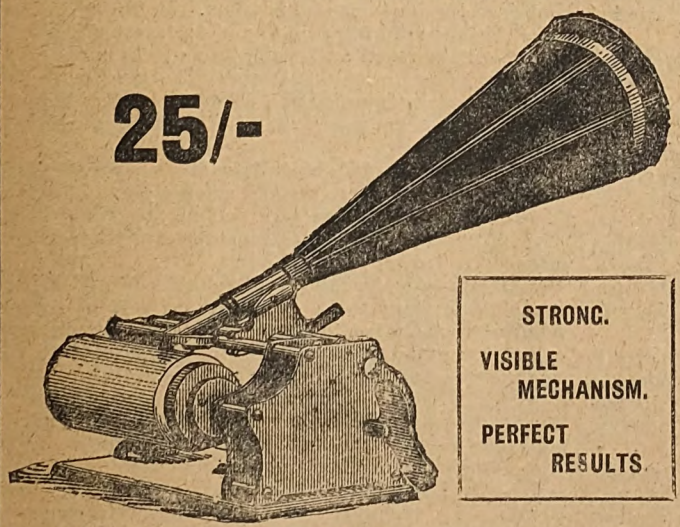
or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,

will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

A GRAPHOPHONE FOR 25/-

25/-



GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION.

Reproduces Same Records as all Small Cylinder Talking Machines.

Makes Music in the Home, and is an Inexhaustible Source of Amusement and Pleasure.

STRONG.
VISIBLE MECHANISM.
PERFECT RESULTS.

The pleasure in owning a Graphophone is largely increased by being able to make and reproduce your own records. The Graphophone will record your own voice as well as reproduce specially prepared records.

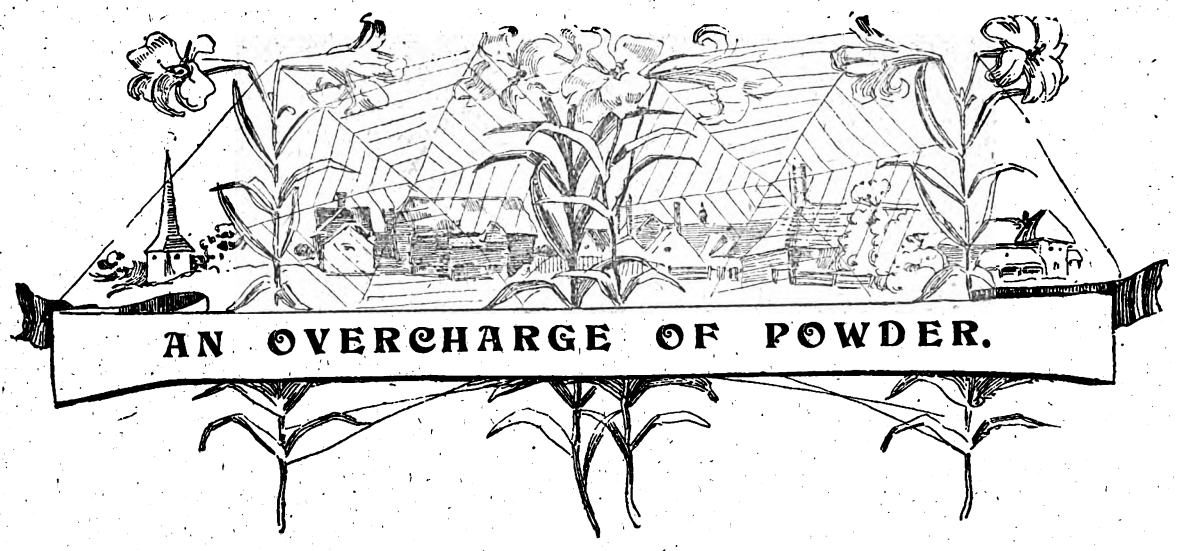
Graphophones are sold from 25s. upwards.

The Toy Graphophone for Children, 8s.

Send for Catalogue C. to

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Genl., 122 Oxford Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google



AN OVERCHARGE OF POWDER.

"THAT lion skin is the largest I ever saw," said Bill.

"I dare say," said the Major.

"And the thinnest," added Bill.

"And the thinnest, likewise," said the Major. "And, in fact, as I heard you whispering to Bob, you hardly think it is a lion's skin at all. I am glad to find you are so observant, my boy, and sorry to say you are mistaken in this instance. The skin has some fishy features, but they will be accounted for when I have explained how I bagged the lion that used to wear it.

"This ill-fated beast pursued me when I was riding on a camel in the desert. He was evidently hard up for prey, for he chased us in the daytime and almost all the day, though once in the forenoon we had left him a mile behind, and quite out of sight.

"I discharged all my bullets at him without effect, owing to the unsteadiness of my camel, which was young, and to the visible trembling of the air as it rose from the over-heated sand.

"Night was approaching, and my beast was showing signs of giving in, and the tension on my nerves was growing too great to bear much longer. Something had to be done, and at once. I threw my stock of dried meat behind me; but the lion smelt it, and left it lying, without pausing a second to decide. From this I assumed that he was more thirsty than hungry; that he wanted blood—or water. This thought gave me my cue.

"Though I had hardly a gallon of water left, I instantly resolved to offer it to the lion. Gratitude for the kindness would possibly have made him give up the chase; but I thought it a little safer to stop him by chemistry than by moral suasion.

"I cut my last gourd into halves, scooped out and ate the contents, for I could not afford to waste what was both food and drink. Then I took a dozen seidlitz powders from my medicine-box, which I always carried with me. Still galloping ahead, I put the blue-covered powders into one half of the gourd and the white-covered powders into the other.

"Then I dismounted, being about a quarter of a mile in advance of the lion. I hastily made two small holes in the sand, and placed in them the hallowed half gourds containing the powders, and filled both of these vegetable vessels with water.

"As I turned to mount, the camel suddenly dragged his halter through my hand and fled, panic-stricken. And little wonder either. The welcome sight of the water had quickened the lion's speed, and he was now approaching with terrific bounds. I followed the camel's example, I admit; but then, I did not run away half as fast as that craven brute.

"I looked round to see if the lion would drink, for my salvation depended upon that. To my delight he swallowed with two laps the water in the first vessel, which contained the blue-papered powders. In the vehemence of his thirst he did not stop to make a face, but bounded on to the other vessel, and drank its contents in one gulp.

"Then came a moment's terror. The king of beasts uttered a roar that ended in a portentious hybrid sound, blended of a steam whistle and the hissing of a fireman's hose.

"His eyes protruded; his tail was stiffly perpendicular; his form dilated till it became colossal; jets of steam issued from his eyes, his ears, and his nostrils. Then, with the sound of a thousand champagne corks popping at once the unhappy animal burst.

"A fizzing cataract that shot from his distended jaws propelled a loose tooth of his a distance of several hundred yards, which tooth happened to hit my runaway camel, and at once recalled him to a sense of duty, for he fancied I had sent a bullet after him.

"Had I had the elastic fancy of a classical poet, I should have sung how my lion was changed into a shower of rain. Or I should have called the story by the pretty name of 'Leo and the Fountain.' But I am not an Ovid, and did not think of it in time.

"Anyhow, I hope you know how that skin comes to be so spoiled and stretched. I brought it home as a curiosity, not an ornament; and in this point of view the things you noticed as defects are really its chief merits. Besides, there is a fine moral in that skin—it is the shabby coat of a dissipated lion who drank too much."

Digitized by Google

A Cluster of Fruit Farms.

Could you but witness the conditions under which Chivers' famous Gold Medal Jams and Jellies are prepared, you would not be surprised at their great popularity and high reputation. It is in the pretty Cambridgeshire village of Histon that the process of manufacture takes place. The freshly gathered fruit, chiefly grown upon Messrs. Chivers' own farms (covering many acres of land at Histon, Haslingfield, Haddenham, and Impington), is made into Jam, or the Juice extracted for the flavouring of the Table Jellies. The various processes are carried on in a model Factory, equipped with every modern convenience. Throughout the whole process the most watchful care is exerted to insure strict cleanliness and purity. Pure, ripe fruit Juices are employed to flavour the Jellies, and absolute freshness of material is always insisted upon. Thus Chivers'

Jellies have earned such a reputation for consistent excellence and purity that the public have perfect confidence in them. The Edinburgh Medical Journal says: "A perfect form of Table Jelly. The Orange tasted exactly as if a squeeze of fresh orange had been added." A Yorkshire Vicar writes: "Your perfect success will, I trust, remove for the future all those prejudices which people had previously cherished with regard to ready-made jellies. That your great success may reach every sick room as well as hospital ward is my earnest wish." The Charity Record says: "A remarkably delicate aroma. We safely predict an increasing popularity as time goes on."

Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers and Stores throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be sent on receipt of post-card. S. CHIVERS & SONS, Histon, Cambridge.

Don't Cough-use

They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

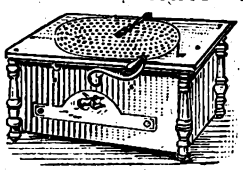
EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 1828 High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Send me an envelope (stamped and addressed) and I will tell you how to remove all superfluous hair free of charge. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Miss E. V. (Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

NOSE

Wintry weather makes Red Noses. I cure them. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

RUPTURE

Gentleman (cured himself) will send Free Particulars of inexpensive self-curative treatment. Stamped address.—(Box 49), 59 Castle Street, Carlisle.

1,000 CYCLES.

1/6  1/6

FREE. FREE.

Our Ladies' or Gents' Link will be sent free of any charge for delivery on receipt of 1s. 6d. These are not American or foreign trash, but are made in England. This is our first advertisement, and by it we are determined to bring our name before the public, so this offer will only hold good to the readers of this paper for the next fourteen days. We will send with the bicycle a nickel silver lamp and pump, and the whole will be packed in a wood crate and sent to your address free, immediately you take advantage of this advertisement and the offer we will send. A written guarantee given with each bicycle. We give these machines away to encourage you to become agents for us. If the bicycles are all given away your 1s. 6d. will be returned. Send 1s. 6d. and stamped addressed envelope for receipt. Address, the

London Direct Supply Company,

4 Duke St., Strand, London, W.C.

Mention this paper.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,

59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free; three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,

7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.

THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.

Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.

Sole Agent:

GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.

Price 2/9 post free.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

AND NEURALGIA Cured

by a Simple, Safe, and Speedy Remedy. A Zox Powder can be taken anywhere, at any time, and with any liquid, with wonderful results. Two free Sample Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped addressed envelope for same to

The ZOX Co., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 3/6).

We do not want your money. Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. P) 232 Central Chambers, Glasgow.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL PICTURE PUZZLES.

£100 IN PRIZES.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

2nd Prize - - - - £10 Note
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes
6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a well-known football player.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Maxwell. What are the other names?

If you cannot find all the names, ask your friends to help you.

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the player you believe the picture to represent. Then keep the list by you until THREE other lists have appeared. We will tell you when to send them in.

Example.

Maxwell.

You may send in as many separate attempts as you like when the time comes; but each set of four lists must be sent in separate envelopes, and will be considered as different attempts.

Only one solution is allowed under each picture.

Where two men bear the same surname, but different christian names, the christian name or initial is indicated in the picture.

The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 1.....

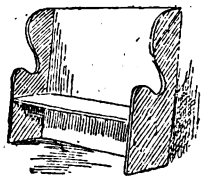
No. 2.....

No. 3.....

No. 4.....

No. 5.....

No. 6.....



No. 7.....

No. 8.....

No. 9.....

No. 10.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

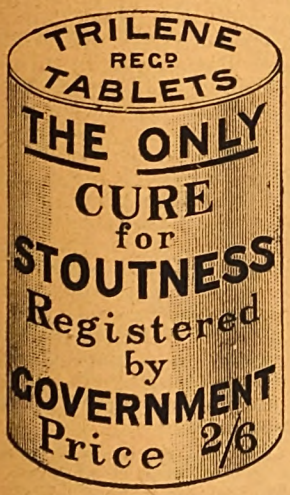
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

MRS. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st. and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholme Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MR. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

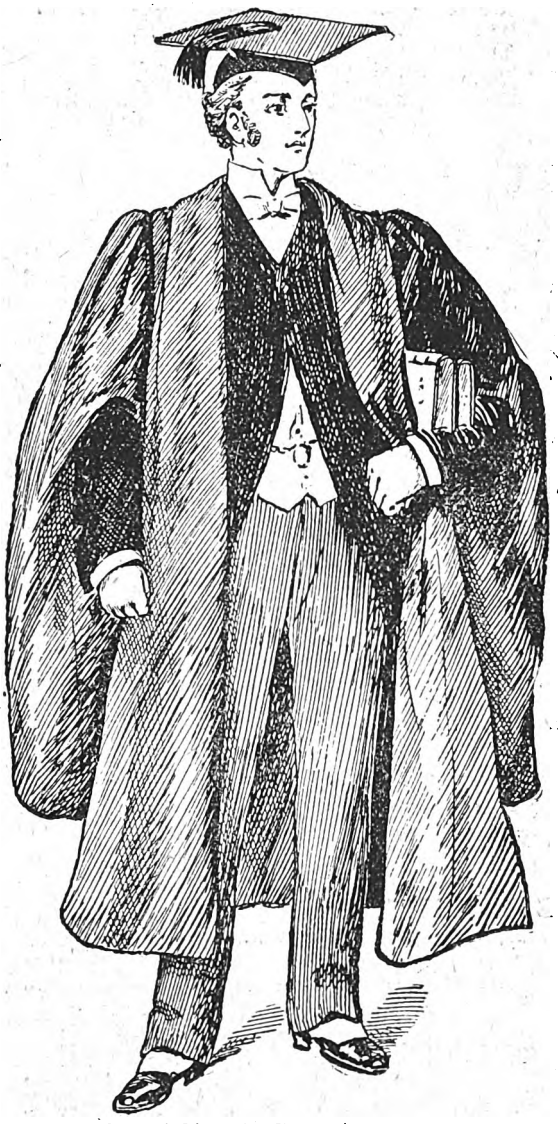
Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google



A BOOK THAT IS NOT A NOVEL.

"Not a novel! Then who wants to read it? People only read novels and newspapers nowadays." That is what you say immediately. But for once you are wrong. At the present moment hundreds of thousands of people are turning over, and eagerly reading, the pages of a book that is not a novel. They are telling their friends about it, and very soon every one will be reading the book that is not a novel. If you want to be interested, if you want to be instructed, if you want to live long, if you want to be healthy, if you want to be beautiful, you must read the book that is not a novel. What is it called? What does it cost? Where can I get it? What is it all about? It is called "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." By Professor Boyd Laynard. Its cost to readers of Short Stories is One Shilling and Sixpence (post paid). You can get it from Hammond, Hammond, and Co., 19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London. What is it all about? It is a practical guide to beauty, health, and long life. It is a book to read through with interest and profit. It is a book to refer to when in difficulty or doubt. It is a book for the lady to keep on her toilet-table. It is a book for the business man to have at hand when the strain and worry of work threaten his health. It is a book for the young to read, in order that they may get the most out of life, and live to grow old. It is a book for the old to read in order that they may feel young. Among the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Boyd Laynard's work, the following are but a few (a complete syllabus showing the contents of the whole 127 chapters enumerating upwards of 500 subjects, and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers):

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Effects of heat, cold, and changes of temperature upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can induce disease—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relation to health—Baths and bathing; their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Insomnia—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its culture and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their nature, prevention and treatment—Indigestion—Constipation—Neuralgia—Rheumatism—Nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—The mental, moral, physical, and external influences that are conducive to long life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

"The Most Remarkable Work of the Present Century."

Vide THE PRESS.

ORDER FORM 415,216.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & CO.,
19, 21 & 23 LUDGATE HILL, LONDON, E.C.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE

Name _____

Address _____

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW FOOTBALL COMPETITION—£100 IN PRIZES.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 624. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 15TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

WILL MAKE YOU LOOK WELL

These family favourites are composed entirely of Medicinal Herbs, and are warranted free from mercury or other Poisonous substance. They can harm no one, and may be given to children or to the aged and infirm with perfect safety. They cleanse the stomach and bowels and purify the blood; invigorate the whole nervous system, and give tone and energy to the muscles.

BEECHAM'S PILLS have stood the test of over fifty years without the publication of testimonials. Parents recommend them to their children. Friends recommend them to one another, and BEECHAM'S PILLS recommend themselves.

FEEL WELL

AND KEEP WELL

The manufactory at St. Helens is a model of system and cleanliness, and the care bestowed on their manufacture ensures BEECHAM'S PILLS being always reliable.

6,000,000 Boxes are sold annually; and wherever tried they have been adopted as the specific to be depended on for defeating those evils which usually assail health in our daily lives.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 pills) and 2/9 (168 pills).

'Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery

"TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4/6 SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the Hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself. Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

THE GEO. R. SIMS' COMPANY HAVE DECIDED TO DISTRIBUTE

20,000 LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON.
S.S.
Dec. 15, 1900.

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 810 Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/10. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO". POST PAID, which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

TO THE QUEEN
PURVEYORS

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA. GRAVY. JULIENNE. MULLIGATAWNY. TOMATO. HOUSEHOLD. CRESSY, &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

NOSE Wintry weather makes Red Noses I cure them. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.
½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.
Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER.
FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 122 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 624.] For the Week Ending December 15th, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

THE CRAZY AUNT.

"Vingt minutes d'arrêt!"

The train for England drew up at Amiens station, bringing to an end a painful talk between two people in a first-class carriage.

"The long and the short of it is, Lilla, you will have to put this nonsense out of your head," said Captain Jones, as he opened the door.

He was a good-looking man, with stern eyes and a determined jaw.

He might have been at least a dozen years older than his sister, who, however, had defended herself through a course of bullying all the way from Paris.

"You had better come and have some luncheon."

"No," she said, "I don't want any."

"Don't be a goose."

"I'm not hungry. I would rather stay here."

Under any other circumstances Captain Jones would have stuck to his point till he had gained it. But in this case it would have meant losing his own luncheon, so he shrugged his shoulders and walked away with the stream of passengers towards the buffet.

Lilla sat quite still in her place. She was a girl of twenty, and might have been a pretty girl if her features and expression had been a little less decided. Her eyes were remarkable—large, blue, and grave, with straight brows and dark lashes. She was pale, but her complexion was clear and good. Sometimes, when she was amiable, she did look very pretty, and at all times she was handsome. She was plainly dressed, and her manner was cool and straightforward.

Just now she looked anything but happy; paler and graver than usual, frowning slightly and sadly, as she sat alone by the carriage window and gazed across the lines at the crowded station. She could see her brother's broad shoulders disappearing into the buffet, and thought, as she watched him, how horribly disagreeable he was. As if a woman of twenty might not decide for herself! Just personal prejudice, and nothing more. He was so narrow-minded; he thought everybody ought tc be made on his own pattern. What could be more ridiculous!

Some sort of dimness—a dimness of vexation—clouded Lilla's eyes as she thought of the long, weary argument she had just gone through. Of course, she was not weak-minded enough to cry; but it is terribly hopeless work trying to convince one's brother, or even to make him understand that one means to have one's own way. After about five minutes of peace, and a strange stillness, for the train was nearly empty, Lilla was startled from her thoughts by a voice from the platform below.

All rights reserved.]

"May I ask if this carriage is full?"

She looked out and saw an elderly woman, carrying a bag and some shawls. Her voice was breathless and very tired, but there was a curious charm in it, a high sweet tone, and as she lifted anxious eyes to Lilla a very pretty smile lighted up her pale, delicate face. She was extremely well-dressed, but looked a little dishevelled. Lilla wondered instinctively what she had done with her maid.

With the unaffected readiness which belonged to her, she instantly made the stranger welcome, took her bag and shawls, helped her to climb into the carriage, and thought with satisfaction how disappointed Percy would be, when he came back, to find that his brotherly scoldings could not go on in peace all the way to Boulogne.

"Oh, thank you, how very kind you are!" said the stranger, looking earnestly at Lilla and smiling sweetly. "This is delightful. I thought I should never get away from that odious place, and the train seemed so full. There is room for me here, really?" looking round at Percy's scattered belongings with a touch of alarm.

"Yes; there is only my brother," said Lilla.

"How providential! What a place this is to get away from! I never stopped here before; but something happened yesterday in Paris which put me out dreadfully, and I felt too ill, and too cros , to start early in the morning, so I came as far as Amiens in the afternoon. Such a stupid thing to do! I had to leave my poor maid in Paris; she was ill—left her with a friend, you know—and then my—well my escort disappointed me, and I couldn't sleep last night—and really, do you know, that ever since this train came in I have been wandering up and down trying to find a compartment."

"It is full. I don't know how we managed to get one to ourselves," said Lilla.

"The officials were really very stupid. I thought one was going to help me. I asked him to find me a carriage

Digitized by Google

First he wanted to put me into the Dames seules, which is a thing I can't endure; and then he opened a door where a man was smoking, and when I declined that he shrugged his shoulders and waved his hands—'Voilà le

"Oh, thank you, how very kind you are," said the stranger.

train! Madame peut choisir!' So I struggled along the platform, actually got into one or two empty carriages and out again, because they were so full. No, I am not Irish," she said laughing, as she perceived a smile about Lilla's mouth. "They were full of bags—don't you see?"

"Yes, I see perfectly," said Lilla.

"Now, I ought to be very thankful," said the stranger, and she became silent for a few minutes, leaning back in her corner, watching Lilla with her bright expressive eyes, which seemed much younger than her pale face, marked with lines of pain and age. At a little distance, her slight figure, her eyes and manner, made her look less than forty; she was in reality near sixty.

Lilla was not a very talkative girl. After doing what she could for the lonely lady, and listening with sufficient politeness to her history, she fell back into her own grave silence, and watched the platform till she saw Percy coming back.

The stranger thought, "What a severe face! The girl is unhappy, I believe; but I like her, too. Now that is the sort of girl——"

Captain Jones's arrival at the door disturbed these meditations. He hesitated a moment, while his sister looked at him gravely. Then he said, "Give me my coat and things, will you? I am going to smoke," and he took himself off to another carriage.

When he was gone, the strange lady began again to talk to Lilla, who, in spite of herself, had to respond to these advances. There was something very pleasant, though not very wise, about her companion, who chattered of France and Paris, and abused England, and said a great many things that Lilla totally disagreed with.

In theory, this strong and sensible girl could not have imagined herself enduring the talk of a woman like this. It was exactly the kind of woman she disliked and despised—a silly, vain, affected, self-conscious chatterbox, much too young for her age, and altogether ridiculous. This was Lilla's charitable judgment. She would not confess to herself that there was a mysterious something in the stranger which redeemed all this; but the time went on, and she found that she must meet those quick, kind eyes, and smile in answer to that smile, and, in fact, be conquered by such a sunny presence as she did not at present count among her friends. What was it? What was it? Why was she obliged to give her sympathy, and even, worse and worse, later on, her confidence, to a foolish, weak-minded, accidental companion like this?

"Oh yes, many of the French manners and customs are most superior to ours," said this lady, talking so fast that Lilla—English to the backbone—could not contradict her. "Their marriages, for instance—how sensible they are! and how happy!"

"No, horrible. I can't bear them!" exclaimed Lilla; but her companion hardly seemed to hear this.

"Of course," she said, "people's friends and relations must know them better than they know themselves. Well, what a comfort not to be allowed to throw themselves away on the first person they take a fancy to. Oh, dear, what nonsense. Two silly children with a penny binding themselves down to a life of misery, finding out too late that they don't suit each other in the least. And if they were French everything would be arranged easily and carefully—money and all the rest of it. Frenchmen never make fools of themselves. I wish my nephew was a Frenchman!"

She said this half to herself, and sighed. Then she looked at Lilla, "Yes," she said, "I am in great trouble."

Lilla was looking at her with an earnest interest which was certainly encouraging. There was a kind of wistfulness in her eyes, and she said, "But one's relations don't know what is best for one, I am quite sure of that."

"Well," said the lady after a pause, smiling very prettily, "if I happened to be your grandmother I think we should disagree about that. However, we all speak from our own experience. Now I have a nephew, who at this moment is driving me quite mad by his detestable obstinacy. He has fallen in love with some girl I never saw or heard of, and wants to marry her at once. Now, listen. It is really a relief to me to tell somebody, and I'm sure you are sympathising and kind."

Lilla shook her head a little, but the stranger smiled and went on. "I don't want to boast of what I have done for Jack, but I must tell you, that you may judge between us. He has never had any money, and never will have any, except what I give him. I paid for his education, which was an utter farce from beginning to end. He never passed a single examination, failed in everything he tried for, simply from idleness, for I don't think he is a fool. Idleness, ingratitude, selfishness. Now he coolly tells me that he is going to be married, and, of course, expects me to support his wife as well as himself, for she has nothing. Some stray girl he met abroad, no doubt as odious as English girls abroad generally are. Our tempers are neither of them sweet, and I must tell you that Jack and I were very angry with each other. He declared that he expected nothing from me, which was utter falsehood and nonsense. So we wished each other good-bye. He may go his way, and I shall go mine. I shall certainly do nothing more for him, and I think he knows it. As to my money, it shall go to somebody who deserves it."

Digitized by Google

She looked Lilla straight in the face as she spoke. There certainly was something very strange and unusual in this outpouring from an utter stranger. In theory, there was nothing that Lilla disliked more; she hated effusive people, who talked of their own concerns, and thought they must interest everybody. But here was a contradiction. This woman's talk really interested Lilla. She listened attentively to every word; odd little thrills seemed to run through her as the story went on; her eyes deepened, and a faint colour rose to her pale cheeks. Lilla was at her prettiest now, and the stranger, looking at her, almost forgot her own troubles in admiration.

"What do you think?" she said, after a minute's silence. "I am right, am I not?"

"I don't know," said Lilla, with much more hesitation than was usual with her. "You couldn't expect, could you, that your nephew would give up the girl if they really cared for each other? Perhaps she is a much nicer girl than you think."

"Oh, no, no, I don't believe it. Of course, he says she is lovely. He wanted to show me her photograph, but I wouldn't look at it. But don't you understand, even if she were an angel he has no business to think of marrying at all. And he has engaged himself without even the politeness of consulting me. Well, as I tell him, but I know you think him wrong, which is very amiable of you. You would never forget all your duties and principles in that sort of way."

"Yes, indeed I should, I do," said Lilla quickly, with a sudden blush. "My brother thinks me just as bad—just as obstinate and ungrateful, as you think your nephew."

"Then I am sure your brother is mistaken." The stranger spoke as quickly and decidedly as Lilla herself, but with such a look and tone of kindly sweetness that Lilla suddenly moved from her own place, and sat down beside her. Almost directly her new friend took her hand, and held it while they talked together. This sympathy, so strangely met, brought Lilla's troubles rushing to her lips and eyes. She had no mother, no kind, foolish aunt, no one but a married elder sister, from whom she expected nothing but blame. Percy thought she had been making a terrible fool of herself, and the world in general was sure to agree with him.

She told her fellow-traveller that she and Percy had been in the south of France, and had there met a young man sketching, who meant to be an artist. They had seen a great deal of him, and at last one day—— Lilla did not enter much into her version of the old story, though, no doubt, like other people, she thought it was quite different from that of everybody else and far more interesting. But her few words were quite as touching, quite as effective, as other people's sentimental histories. There was a kind of simple genius about Lilla, which her brother called "being stupidly different from other girls."

Lilla's lover had no money; he had no profession; but he was extremely, brilliantly clever, drew beautifully, and was sure to be a great artist some day. He seemed to think that some relations might help him a little just at first, and Lilla thought her brother Percy, who was unmarried and well off, might do the same for her. But Percy took a very different view of the subject. He did not at all share his sister's faith in the artist's future; he wanted her to marry a friend of his own, who admired her. Percy, in fact, was not at all kind about it.

"Percy wants me to write to him, and tell him—but no, that I never will do," said Lilla, sadly and strongly. "I see we shall have to wait for years. I told him I thought so. He didn't seem to think so—but anyhow, he knows it will make no difference to me."

"Is he good-looking?" asked her fellow-traveller.

"Oh—yes!" said Lilla. She might have been talking of the Apollo Belvedere.

"And he paints well, does he?"

"At last one day——"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, indeed—such lovely landscapes. And he has only begun quite lately."

"He has a spark of genius, no doubt; that makes all the difference," said the stranger. "Jack thinks he can draw, I believe. He told me one day that he could make money by his sketches. Of course I laughed at him."

The visitor was coming in.

So they went on talking as their train hurried through France.

Lilla could hardly believe, afterwards, that she had actually told all her history and poured out her whole heart to a person she had never met in her life before; but then this was such a wonderful person. She began to realise what she had done when they saw the sand hills and the sea, and then rushed on to Boulogne through the green bruyères and the fir trees.

"I ought not to have talked like this—but you have been so very kind, and I really am unhappy," she said.

Then the strange woman took her hand again.

"My dear, you must not be unhappy. Trust me, and don't be unhappy. I think I see a way out of your troubles—only don't give in, whatever you do."

In spite of her beating heart and her heavy eyelids, Lilla could hardly help laughing at her friend's inconsistency.

"Give in! Oh, no," said she. "But I am afraid you are much more hopeful than I am."

"We shall see. In the meantime will you give me your address?"

"Yes; thank you so much. I do hope we shall meet again."

Lilla hastily pulled a letter out of her pocket. Then she coloured a little and hesitated. Then she took the letter out of the envelope and gave the envelope to her friend, saying half-aloud, "I have no other."

Looking at the letter in her hand, and putting it back in a safe place, she missed the first expression on her friend's face, which was that of extreme astonishment, almost anger, quickly succeeded by intense amusement.

"'Miss Lilla Jones!'" she read out, in such an extremely odd voice that Lilla was startled.

"Is there anything wrong?" she said.

"No, my dear, nothing. Only your direction in the South of France is not of much use to me."

"Oh, I'm so sorry. Please give it me back. I can find a scrap of paper, I daresay."

"No, no; I like this. Write your English address on it—there's plenty of room."

"And—may I have yours?" asked Lilla, when she had obeyed.

"No, it doesn't matter about me. You shall hear from me. We shall know all about each other in time. Here we are. Thank you for a miserable journey turned into a happy one."

"You have comforted me very much," said Lilla gratefully; but she was rather at a loss to understand her friend's meaning. The happiness of the journey, to all seeming, had only consisted in having the knowledge of another person's troubles added to her own.

* * * * *

Jack, as his aunt, Mrs. Lindsay, always called him—this was only a pet name, the world in general knowing him as Reginald Carr—was very much surprised at receiving a kind letter from his aunt a few days after she had cast him off for ever. The beginning of the letter was kind, at least; the latter part seemed totally unreasonable.

Jack was staying on at the hotel in Paris, where he had come on purpose to meet his aunt, and to break the the news of his engagement. From former experience he had quite expected that his aunt, after storming a little, would kiss him and give her consent. He was then going to take her back to England, where his further plans would soon arrange themselves. But her horrid obstinacy had knocked everything on the head.

Jack did not know what to do with himself, and so for the present was finding a little amusement in Paris. He was very painfully conscious that he could not marry on nothing. At the same time he could not possibly give up the girl with whom he was so much in love. He was furiously angry with his aunt.

In this letter she invited, or rather, ordered him to come to London at once, naming a particular day and hour when she desired to see him. She went on to say that she had met the person to whom she intended to leave all her money. "But there is still a loophole for you," she wrote. "You do not deserve anything at all, but come here at once, and we shall see whether we understand each other any better than we did."

"Hang the old woman, and her money! What on earth does she mean?" said Jack, with other exclamations of the same kind. "She's mad. I wish she and her money had never been heard of. It's too bad, to bring a fellow up to expect a thing, and then disappoint him after all. Who has she picked up now, I wonder! One of the Lindsays? I'll be hanged if I go. I'd require to pack at once."

He did go, however, not being quite such a proud and rash young man as he supposed himself, having also a private reserve of love and respect for his aunt, however ungrateful his words and thoughts might be—but he went in a very bad temper. He left his luggage, which was immense, at Charing Cross Station, and drove in a hansom to his aunt's house, not being sure whether she meant him to stay with her. She said nothing about that, but received him kindly and gave him luncheon, for he had arrived early in the day, according to the sudden and queer request.

Digitized by Google

There was something very odd about the old lady. Jack, who was inclined just then to take a dark view of all things, thought she was going out of her mind. She looked at him in such a curious way, and said funny things which he could not really laugh at. She moved about constantly and was in the highest spirits, while he sat slouching and looking down; his eyes were hollow and his face was red after a windy crossing.

"Did anybody ever think you good-looking, Jack?" asked Mrs. Lindsay.

"How should I know?" said the young man.

"Not a fair question, is it? I ought to ask somebody else. Well, you have told me nothing about your journey. Was it rough? Had you pleasant companions?"

"Yes, awfully rough. Don't know; didn't look at them; they were Frenchmen, mostly. By-the-bye, how did you get on?"

"Ah, by-the-bye! the first time I ever travelled from Paris alone. Well, I stopped at Amiens, you know—a great mistake; and yet it wasn't. I believe it was one of the best things I ever did in my life."

"How was that?" said Jack, trying to seem interested.

"Well, from Amiens to Boulogne—on to London, in fact—I had the most charming fellow-traveller. She helped me, she took care of me, she did everything for me; she told me all her history, and we became friends for life. I found that there was only one thing she wanted to make her happy, and I determined that she should have it."

"What?" said Jack, suspiciously. He guessed what was coming now, and thought himself most abominably treated. Not even one of the Lindsays, her husband's relations! but an accidental woman picked up in a railway carriage! Some sharp designing creature, who had got round his aunt and made a fool of her. It was no surprise when Mrs. Lindsay answered his question—"Plenty of money."

Jack threw himself back in his chair. He tried to look as if this was nothing to him; but scowled hideously at a picture over the chimneypiece.

"It's a common complaint, and a difficult cure," he said. "Well, go on, Aunt Fanny. Is she French or English, young or old?"

"English, young, and very pretty," said his aunt. "At least, I am sure you would say so."

"I bet you I shouldn't," replied Jack. "I haven't that desperate admiration for every girl I meet."

"I know that—but I know the sort of thing you do admire. Now, Jack, suppose you and I have a bet on the subject. Ten pounds, if you like."

"No thank you, I can't afford it," said Jack smiling grimly. "Besides, I'm not likely to see her, unless she has taken up her abode with you. And you can't expect me to like the notion of her—particularly."

"I am sorry for you, Jack, really," said Mrs. Lindsay. "But it is all your own fault. I have made up my mind, and I can't change it now."

"No, so it seems," said Jack, getting up and shrugging his shoulders. "Why didn't you let me stay in Paris?"

"A very bad place for you. Besides, as I have told you, there is a loophole. I will give you another chance."

"What's that?"

"You may marry her," said Mrs. Lindsay abruptly; and then she went to the other end of the room, and stood there fidgeting with some flowers, turning her back to her nephew.

Jack stood on the hearthrug with his hands in his pockets. First he laughed, an unflattering laugh to Mrs. Lindsay's new favourite; then he said. "Did you really send for me from Paris to tell me that, Aunt Fanny?"

For a moment she seemed to misunderstand him in some way. She turned round quickly with an exclamation on her lips—"You don't—" but then she stopped herself as quickly, for poor Jack looked both angry and dejected. "Well, you need not be scornful," she said. "My friend is very much too good for you. How do you know that she would have you, after all?"

"I don't see how you know it, either," he said. "But she won't be asked, so it doesn't matter."

"Look here, my dear Jack. You are ruining yourself; you are losing your last chance. The fact is simply this. If you marry anyone but this friend of mine I won't leave you a penny. You may go your own way; you may go to the dogs if you like."

"Thank you, I will," said Jack. He walked towards the door, but then he turned round again and faced his aunt, looking extremely grave.

The conviction had come to him that she really must be going out of her mind. She had always been an odd woman, with a peculiar temper and a great many fancies; but she now seemed to be something really too extraordinary. Jack, who was a thoroughly honest fellow, with all his faults, was grieved and shocked at her unaccountable behaviour. In former days she had always been kind, generous, and honourable. Now she seemed quite heartless. There she stood, almost laughing, giving him the alternative between total ruin and the most blackguardly, scoundrelly behaviour. An evil spirit appeared to have entered into her.

"You can't mean it, Aunt Fanny!" he said. "I have told you who I mean to marry, and you can't possibly expect me to change my mind. If I have to work hard for her, very well, I can and I will. We shall not be dependent on you."

"Then we understand each other. You refuse my offer. Go and work, then. You are a Vicat Cole in miniature, I believe," said Mrs. Lindsay. "We need not be anxious about you."

"I don't understand your offer," said Jack, taking no notice of this unkind remark.

He was flushed and very angry; to himself the poor fellow seemed to be in the midst of a whirl of mocking faces. His one wish now was to get away, and he turned to the door again. Just then came a visitor's knock.

"Here she is," said Mrs. Lindsay. "I asked her to come and see me this afternoon. Well, Jack, then you have quite made up your mind; you won't marry her? Perhaps it was too much to expect. Don't rush out of that door; you will meet her. Go out this way, into the study; wait there for ten minutes, and then come back to me. I should like you to see her, though, of course, my plan won't do."

Digitized by Google

They did not meet at all as strangers.

"I don't want to see her. I'll go off at once, thank you."

"Jack, do me this last favour. You need not stay in the room. You need only come in and say good-bye to me, if you like. You may be just as rude and sulky as you please—but I want you to see her. Go!"

Jack fled, for the visitor was coming in. It was Miss Lilla Jones. She looked very pretty, and very well-dressed. Mrs. Lindsay received her with eager kindness, and after thanking her many times for coming, began to talk seriously.

"I have been thinking a great deal about you," she said, "since we parted, and if you will let me, I am going to speak very plainly. First of all, my dear, it will never do for you to marry a poor man."

Lilla smiled, coloured, and looked at her rather sadly.

"Your brother is perfectly right, you know. It is a dreadful look-out for you. Now listen to me, I told you in the train the other day how much I liked French marriages, and how wise I thought them. Do you remember? Well, now I have taken it into my head to arrange a marriage for you—one to which your brother can't possibly object. I want you to give up all your wild ideas, and to be very good and sensible, and to make me and all your friends very happy—by marrying my nephew."

Lilla's face fell in a wonderful manner. She stared at Mrs. Lindsay in blank astonishment, and the only thought that crossed her mind was, "Poor dear thing, she is crazy!" She began to wish herself safe out of the house, was in fact a little frightened, and did not in the least know what to say.

"But you know—I told you—" she stammered out. "I thought you understood—"

"I understood perfectly," said Mrs. Lindsay smiling. "But I have just been talking to my nephew. I told him that he must give up all his nonsensical ideas, and offer himself to you. My dear, if you will marry him I will leave him all my money, and allow him fifteen hundred a year now. If you won't I intend to cut him off with a shilling, and I think in that case I shall leave everything to you. There's only one difficulty."

"More than one, I should think—but what is the one?" asked Lilla, as quietly as she could.

"He declares he will have nothing to do with you. He will not give up that girl he met in France. But I think, when he sees you——"

"Please, Mrs. Lindsay, don't let us have any more talk like this," said Lilla, getting up, with scarlet cheeks and eyes shining with surprise and anger. "You can't be serious in anything you are saying. You can't mean it—but your whole plan is perfectly impossible. How could I accept your money—a perfect stranger; and as to—I never heard such extraordinary things in my life."

"So Jack seemed to think," said Mrs. Lindsay, coolly. "You take my proposal very much in the same way that he did, poor boy!"

"Did you think that either of us could possibly consent to it?" asked Lilla, her blue eyes so dark and flashing that Mrs. Lindsay looked at her with admiration. "Besides, you astonish me. Don't you remember telling me not to give in? I have really hoped, all this time—you were so kind on the journey."

Lilla's voice failed a little. She bit her lips, and her eyes suddenly softened. It was too evident she was going to cry. The pain, the disappointment, the almost insult from a person in whose kindness she had trusted, were too much for her, added to her former troubles.

Mrs. Lindsay watched her for a moment, and an odd convulsion passed over her face, too. Then she got up, came across to the girl, took her face between her hands and kissed her, looking at her with such happy, loving eyes that Lilla's tears were checked.

"I really am fiendish," said Mrs. Lindsay, and she sprang across to the door, opened it, and called Jack.

He came slowly forward from the study.

"Come in, Jack," said his aunt. "Here is my friend. You need not be at all afraid of meeting her; she will have nothing whatever to say to you, and I have told her that you are in exactly the same state of mind towards her. But you both think you have to do with an old madwoman, so please indulge her last fancy by shaking hands. Oh no, Jack, no! You are forgetting yourself. This is disgraceful."

For Jack cried out, "Lilla!" and Lilla gave a little scream and they did not meet at all as strangers, but as lovers long parted, while Mrs. Lindsay, whose remonstrances were useless, walked away smiling to the window.

Eleanor C. Price.

Digitized by Google

BELOW THE SURFACE.

A Tragedy of Earl's Court.

THE Welsh Orchestra finished its last item in the Empress Theatre with a rush. The crowd of saunterers lounged on round the ring. As the music died down a sudden arresting of divided attention took place.

Pure and sweet above the steady "trapse, trapse" of the crowd and the light arguments of the merits of this or that group, soared out a woman's lovely voice. For a moment or two it was difficult to see where the music came from, and then I pushed my way through the people going all ways, till I found myself craning my neck over the heads of others who had arrived first and in front of the group containing the singer. The singer had her face turned away from me, and all I could see was little more than that she was probably beautiful. She had an almost olive skin, and that lovely but not aggressively black hair possessed by Southern Europeans.

I turned and verified my guess—the name descriptive of the group was Italy. As the song continued the girl, barely more than twenty, turned her full face to the audience taking little notice of them. The song seemed to draw her very soul. From cheering trills to the wailings of a love-lorn soul, the music changed; and one felt insensible to all save the real sorrow of a young life. She seemed to sue for pity from the lightly-come pleasure seekers, anon to implore Heaven's help in vengeance for her soul's pain.

I could not move; the girl's whole being seemed to permeate the crowd. Men stood agape, and when the last verse came with its exquisite harmony of anguish, one feared to move lest a visible vengeance should follow.

Then with a snapping of the tension the applause rang out. The girl sat down near the back of the stage, and—it was not mere fancy—real tears of anguish glistened in those dark eyes.

The crowd would not be satisfied: a man came up behind me; the crowd increased though the song was over. The girl rose and came forward. The clapping and cheering increased. But she did not intend to sing again. She bowed towards each corner of the crowd. Then, as she inclined to my side, a startling change came over the girl's face. Every bit of colour fled, and with what was apparently an effort to reach out over the heads of the crowd, she fell prone on the stage. At the same moment I was pushed aside by the man who arrived just as the song finished.

"Heavens! it's Pianita!" was his whispered ejaculation as the girl's face was turned full towards us.

No one apparently heard him but myself. My attention was centred for a second on the girl, who was at once attended to by someone of the audience. I had the impression that my neighbour on the first impulse began to push through towards the stage. His second thoughts, however, made him turn away. No one but myself had seen what was evidently a mutual recognition.

But the man had seen that I had noticed it. He was a young man, a well-set Englishman of a good type. A look of genuine concern came over his face for the moment. The crowd soon dispersed on finding the girl was being cared for, and we two were left alone.

"That was curious, wasn't it?" he said, casually. "I knew her once."

And we got into conversation. He was not very communicative, but I was quick to gather that these two in the South had been parties to what he said were very trivial love passages. But I could not believe that, and I felt instinctively that even if the chapter had been but a mere passing detail in his life, it had meant more, if not absolutely everything, to the girl. And I felt sorry for her accordingly, though I felt even in the short conversation we had that he was quite sincere in his belief that she had just such a light feeling.

We strolled round the Exhibition grounds for half-an-hour or so while he told me his tale. We became quite friendly—he was evidently of an ingenuous, confiding nature—and the girl had interested me to such an extent that I listened keenly to his story.

As time went on we decided to go round and ask for the girl. He had no compunction, and I willingly accompanied him. We went. An attendant took in our message and we soon found ourselves waiting in a little reception room at the back of the Theatre. "The Signora would come," the attendant said. She moreover added that the girl had not recovered long, and was very poorly still. I waited at his request. In a moment or two she entered. No name had been given, but she knew whom to expect, and as soon as she saw him rushed forward with extended arms.

The look in her eyes when she first saw him was sufficient to tell me what the meeting meant to her. Oh! that it meant the same to him!

Digitized by Google

"Carissimo mio!" she cried, and buried herself in his arms.

He gently put her aside. "Well, Pianita, this is funny. Fancy you in England! Why are you here?"

She opened her dark eyes a little, "Why what do you think, caro mio? To see my——"

He looked a little astonished. "Not to see me, Pianita, surely? That will never do, you know."

She drew away from him, but her whole soul was in her glance.

"Why, surely," she said; "I couldn't live always without——"

He saw it was more serious than he had anticipated. He almost appealed to me. I stood by all the time. No opportunity had been given to notice my presence, and she was far too much entranced at seeing him to mind a stranger. The tale seemed to unfold itself to me with more than a touch of sadness.

"Well," he said, "I'm staying in town for a day or two. Come and see me in the Warwick Road"—giving the number of the house—"I am up here alone, for you know"—playfully pointing a finger at her—"I'm a married man, and my——"

The remaining words were lost to me as I caught sight of the momentary expression on her face. For a second the evidently unwelcome news, I thought, would make her faint again. But no! that was not the expression. The look of intense love which she had kept fixed on him suddenly gave place to a pallor and a look as of one to whom that news was not absolutely unexpected, but who expected it as the very last straw in a load of evil. But it was only momentary. She drew away and the coolness suddenly assumed was almost as tragic in its intensity as the look of vengeance I felt the other was.

Yet her quiet assumption of the thread of the conversation disarmed us both.

"You married!" There was a hard sort of laugh. Then, after a pause, "Well, I will come and see you perhaps to-morrow," she said.

We left after a most conventional leave-taking, and left the Exhibition grounds on our way home. Before parting we exchanged cards, and I promised to look him up. His name was Leonard Methuen, and he was an official in the Government service.

* * * * *

The promised visit to his rooms was almost forgotten a week after. But I was terribly awakened to the remembrance by the newspapers, which told of a tragedy in the West End.

As the papers said, "A young man, Mr. L. Methuen, was found in his rooms at Warwick Road stabbed to the heart with a stiletto which was found in the hand of an Italian girl lying dead at his side. It is clearly a case of murder and suicide by the girl. The latter has been recognised as one of the performers in the Woman's Exhibition. No motive is known at present."

But I knew of one. Perhaps wrongly, but I could not think evil of either of the victims. The two cold and hot-blooded natures had viewed life differently.

Stuart Blofeld.

FOR A YEAR AND A DAY.

Nicholas Littlefield was a man who certainly ought never to have been married, at least so said those who knew him best. And this not because of any personal obliquity or moral one-sidedness—he was, indeed, honest and true to a degree—but solely by reason of his peculiar temperament, his utter inability, in fact, to rightly recognise his responsibility as a husband and father, a social unit, a living member of the great human family.

A clever man, he ever seemed to be but on the eve of success, the accomplishment, the fruition always, like the "Children's Ship," kept outside the bar, or else, hindered by the off-shore breeze, never advanced beyond the horizon, by-and by to disappear again into the great dark sea of "hope denied." A simple-minded, absent-minded man, too, was he, so much so that the failing, if failing it were, exposed him not a little to the mocks and gibes of his especial circle.

His occupation no one knew, for he had tried so many ways and means of providing for his own needs and those of his household that it is doubtful whether he was himself able definitely to specify the particular trade or profession he was really of.

His wife, one of those exceptional natures, popularly known as "one-of-a-thousand," in giving him herself had kept back no part of the price. Love is, proverbially, woman's, a woman's whole existence, the fractional portion of the average man's life that it occupies being hardly worth consideration. Hepzibah Littlefield's home was her world. It contained all that she loved and cared for—husband and infant son, and although the pinch of poverty was often felt she bore it bravely for the very love's sake.

Nicholas' latest idea was inventive. He had discovered, or thought he had—which with some people amounts to the same thing—a means by which the careful housewife might cook, warm, and illuminate with atmospheric air, caught, bottled, and distributed by a mechanical process too elaborate for description here. With the persuasive tongue of the inventor he had induced a friend, possessed of more money than discretion, to defray the preliminary expenses—patent fees, the making of models, and other things and sundry connected with the exploitation of "The Universal Heat and Light Generator."

As yet it had been all going out and nothing coming in, so that it was not wonderful that Hepzibah should sigh much in secret, and look forward with trembling anxiety to an almost hopeless coming-time. Not only did this domestic revolutionary fail to impress other people with the marvellous efficacy of his discovery—inasmuch as slender pockets must, so he argued, feel the benefit of practically free fire and light—but upon his hands remained a vast stock of unsaleable machines, which, though paid for by the friend aforesaid, effected nothing and did good to nobody.

Digitized by Google

It was at this time that Nicholas conceived the notion of seeking fortune in a foreign land—Australia to wit. He was childishly ignorant of travel, had never, indeed, sailed salt water in all his life; but, as he told Hepzibah, there was just a possibility that the Antipodes would recognise the value of his "Generator," and that in something less than no time he should have "struck oil," and be in a position to send across for her and little Guy.

For he meant to go alone. The house in London was Hepzibah's own, and she had besides a small annuity of something under a pound a week left her by her father at his death. She would, therefore, be not quite without means, if even she received nothing from her husband, which was an eventuality more probable than otherwise.

One thing troubled him, and, for him, troubled him much, for it touched him closely—the parting with his little son. He felt it more even than the leaving his wife. Oftentimes had he neglected the doing of trivial things, the remembering and carrying out of which would materially have brightened Hepzibah's life and given a sensible fillip to her happiness.

But the child—his little laddie—had so wound himself round his father's heart, shown him so plainly that there existed something upon which he could lavish his affection, that, waverer as he was, he almost hesitated as he kissed the chubby little cheek on the night before he went. He was to be up and leave before daylight, and Guy would be in dreamland when Nicholas started on his journey.

"Where's you goin'?" said Guy, wistfully looking up into his father's face. "When's you comin' back?"

"Where am I going, old chap? Why, to 'Tom Tiddler's Ground' to pick up gold and silver for you and mumma. And I'm coming back when I've got a sackful. Then we'll have good times, sonny, good times. Never have been or will be such times as we'll have then. And I'm only going for a year and a day, you know."

"Oh, make haste then, daddy, and come back; and you'll bring me some nice toys, won't you? A steamer with real engines that'll work, and a magnet that draws ducks in a basin of water, and a cannon that will fire off, and a——"

"Oh, yes, I'll bring you a steamer and a magnet, and I won't forget the ducks."

"You are a dear, good daddy!" and the little arms were round his neck, the little fair-haired head nestled on his breast, and Nicholas, fearing to further trust himself, gently laid the child back upon the pillow and left the room with a sob in his throat that echoed there many and many a time in the course of the year that followed.

* * * * *

There is a long, wide street in the great city of Sydney, the Antipodean metropolis, which is every whit as crowded and full of bustle at midday as is the principal thoroughfare in any one of the largest provincial towns in England. The shops are as big and as well-stocked as are those of London, which is saying a good deal.

A certain man, a loosely-built, shambling creature, shuffles restlessly along the pavement, stopping every now and again to examine carefully the shop windows, especially those in which toys and pretty things, suitable for children, are displayed in tempting profusion.

At last he halts in front of a shop of more than ordinary pretensions, and where the goods on show are of the most superior and costly description. Nothing else appears to attract his attention or have any interest for him. Toys evidently are the sum and end of his quest.

He might be, for all the passers-by knew to the contrary, a veritable "Santa Claus" on the look-out for objects to fill his little customers' stockings with next Christmas. His eyes rove in earnest, eager fashion over the feast of good things (in the toy way) set out before him, and it is only when he has apparently come to some sort of a decision with regard to certain possible purchases that he at length enters the store.

What a wonderful collection it is of articles that he selects, and how scrupulous is he that not only shall each particular thing be of a certain style and make, but he never questions in any way the cost, however great, and is utterly indifferent to the probable amount of the bill.

The salespeople are inclined to think him some harmless being with a mania for toys and childish bric-a-brac, but when, his errand done, he gives orders for the whole to be securely packed for Europe, and forthwith despatched on board the ss. Southern Cross, they are puzzled beyond measure.

He cares not, however, and as he wanders back through the streets to his rooms, and looks round them for the last time, he smiles contentedly to himself and sits for an hour or more gazing at the faded photograph of a pretty boy of about three, the only thing which has not been stowed away for removal.

Only a month ago he had been discharged from the asylum as a cured patient. Eighteen years before he had been brought there by two men, who said that he had been wounded at an up-country camp. Three "sundowners," after sharing his tea and damper, had during the night made an attempt to rob him. The result was a serious blow on the back of the head, and for awhile complete unconsciousness. They had thought it well to bring him by easy stages into Sydney, where a doctor had certified that his brain was at least temporarily unhinged.

The police who accompanied the little party testified to the respectability of his two mates, and the authorities, finding upon him no clue in the shape of an address to friends or relatives, could do nothing but detain him. A large sum in gold dust, sovereigns, and notes was handed over to the steward of the asylum as the property of the injured man.

His name, Nicholas Littlefield, marked on his linen, was all in the way of identification they could discover, and in the hope that he would presently recover his memory and general mental balance, they decided not to advertise.

Time went on, and still he remained oblivious to everything in his life previous to his landing in Sydney. Sometimes, but very rarely, he would cry quietly, and, taking a pillow, would carry it tenderly in his arms up and down for hours, talking to it and crooning over it. Then he would relapse into utter ignorance of his past, and so continue for perhaps a year or more.

When he left the institution rooms were taken for him in the city, and every arrangement made for his comfort. From the moment, however, of his re-entry into social life he seemed to be possessed with but two dominant ideas: he would go back to England and at once, and he must get the toys for his little Guy that he had promised him on the night when he had bidden him good-bye.

Digitized by Google

This was all possible, for during the first years of his residence in the colony he had been fortunate, not as a pioneer of atmospheric heat and light generation, for his Australian cousins would have none of it, but as a gold-miner. Associating himself with two honest-hearted Englishmen, he had been singularly successful, and, although not now inordinately wealthy, had sufficient to make things easy at home for the rest of life's journey. It is easily understandable that he never wrote, seeing who and what he was, and of course after the accident writing was impossible, his mind being a blank.

That nearly twenty years had elapsed since England's shores faded out of his sight he had not even the faintest notion. Little Guy was little Guy still to his sore, hungry heart. He pictured the toddling feet hastening towards him, the outstretched, dimpled hands eager to grasp at the treasures his "dear daddy" had brought him; while his ear could hear distinctly the crow of delight as wonder after wonder revealed itself to the baby eyes.

He lived in sheer anticipation. Poor Hepzibah scarce came into his vision, or if at all, but as a mere detail, a necessary background to the fair-haired, laughing little elf who was calling him home again with love's sweetest note, and whose little hands were hauling, as were they on his heart-strings, on the tow-rope of the Southern Cross.

The other passengers thought their fellow somewhat uncanny, unsociable; in fact, not a little mad, but he hurt nobody—he was so quiet, so gently inoffensive, that often the children would come around his deck-chair and listen to him as he told them fairy stories of marvellous and original ingenuity. At first the parents, especially the mothers, were fearful and repressive, but soon it was seen that the old man—his hair was snow-white now—was quite harmless, and the little ones learnt to love him dearly.

The packing-case containing the wonderful gifts for his baby boy he refused to be parted from, and it stood in his cabin, where he could always see and touch it, while he never failed when going on deck to lock the door and put the key in his pocket.

* * * * *

It was a cold, bleak November day when he disembarked at Tilbury Docks. For an hour previous to landing he had been busy selecting certain articles out of the wonderful packing-case and making them up into a huge parcel, which he carried ashore with him. Regretfully he left the case behind, to be forwarded up to London with his other baggage.

The lamps were being lit as he descended from a cab at the end of the street. He would not drive up to the door, he would inquire first if all were well, and if Hepzibah and his boy still lived in the old house. His heart beat excitedly; he could scarce control himself. The parcel in his arms was more than once in danger of falling, it was of enormous size, while he, for a man, was diminutive, and disposed to nervous unsteadiness of gait and manner.

Halfway along the street he saw come swinging along a fine, stalwart, young fellow, fully six feet in height.

"Pardon me, sir," said Nicholas hesitatingly as they came abreast of one another, "could you tell me if Mrs.—Mrs. Littlefield still lives at No. 7? There is, too, a—a little boy living there," and Nicholas' voice trembled as he looked wistfully up into the young giant's face.

"No. 7? Oh, yes, Mrs. Littlefield still lives there, I know; but the little chap you speak of is gone—gone long ago."

"Gone! Not dead—not dead!" and Nicholas, deadly white, clutched hold of the young fellow's arm to keep himself from falling. "Don't tell me he's dead! See, sir, these are for him. He asked me for them, and I remembered—I remembered. This ship—look!" and he began nervously to undo the string of the big brown-paper parcel. "The engines—they work; I tried them! And see, too, I've got the magnet, and the ducks, and the cannon, and—he's not dead! He can't be! Tell me he's not dead!"

Gently releasing himself from Nicholas' grasp, and supporting him with his own strong arm, the other said softly:

"No, he's not dead, for I saw him this morning, and spoke to him, and he to me. I live at No. 7 myself."

It might have been some echo of the long ago days, something familiar in the tone of voice, that broke the spell.

"Your name? What is your name? Tell me—tell me!"

"Guy. My name is Guy——"

"Oh, God!—dear God! how good you are! But I—I cannot understand. Are you really my little Guy—my baby laddie?"

"If your name is Littlefield, as I think it to be, I am. But not your little Guy. Come, it's only a step. Come to mother; she will be glad."

And the two went on and went in.

It was Nicholas, but yet it was another man. The grey-haired, patient-looking woman that rose up to greet him knew him, and just took him to her—thankfully, joyfully. She had hoped for it, against reason, perhaps, but still hoped for it, yearned for it, and now she had obtained her heart's desire. Ralph Enderby.

Does Anyone Want a Christmas Card?

Applications for the Christmas Cards are pouring in by thousands every post, and some little delay will necessarily result in filling the most recent orders. However, copies of the Cards may be obtained at the rate of six for fourpence, or twelve for sevenpence, post free.

The picture is a reproduction of a photograph, and contains a seasonable and suitable inscription. All those applications which have been received up to and including Friday, December 7th, will be attended to without any charge, but having dispatched the whole of the original number printed, we are urged by those who have received the Cards and want more, to reprint. This we are doing, and propose to make the nominal charge mentioned above, to which we are sure readers will not take exception.

Application should be made to the Christmas Card Room, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

£420 HAS NOW BEEN PAID AWAY

in connection with the Scheme, and there are still many Envelopes waiting to be claimed.

The Sketch

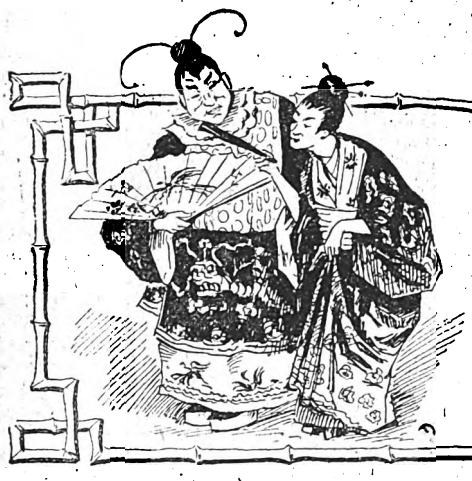
"HAVE YOU GOT THAT £10 NOTE?"

suitable for two gentlemen and one lady, has now been put into type, and is to be obtained in book form, at sixpence per copy, from Messrs. Samuel French Limited, Theatrical Publishers, 89 Strand, London, W.C.

NO FEE WILL BE CHARGED AMATEURS FOR PLAYING IT.

The scene is one that can easily be arranged, and the costumes are quite ordinary ones.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXX.—HE STARTS A TEMPERANCE CRUSADE AND GETS ALL MIXED UP.

THE Bowsers had finished dinner in great harmony and returned to the sitting room when Mr. Bowser opened the front door to take a look at the weather. Just then a drunken man came along, and after holding to the fence for a moment he pushed the gate open and lurched forward on to the grass.

Mr. Bowser called his wife to the door, and, pointing to the recumbent figure, he said:

"And they send money to the heathen of Africa when we have such things as that at home!"

"That's nothing new," observed Mrs. Bowser.

"No; it's only a drunken man, only a husband and father, only one of our fellow beings turned into a beast in order that public-houses may thrive. My goodness, if I only had the power to stop such things!"

"Men have been getting drunk ever since they learnt how to make strong drink, and they will probably keep on for anything you can do. It's an evil, of course, but we needn't be upset over it."

"And do you tell me," exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he turned on her, with indignation in his tones, "that you can see that man lying there like a hog without feeling that someone should be held severely responsible?"

"What can we do?"

"I'll show you what we can do. I'll take this man's case as a start, and before I've finished I'll make Rome howl. Here and now I'll begin a temperance crusade."

"Then you'll do a very foolish thing and get yourself into no end of trouble. You'd much better come in and smoke your cigar and let the man sleep for an hour and then stagger off home."

Mrs. Bowser entered the house, and he descended the steps, followed by the cat, and bent over the man on the grass, whose legs were doubled up under him as he snored in blissful ignorance. It took a great deal of shaking and punching and rolling to rouse him, but at last he sat up and looked stupidly about him and called out

"Wha-what's er mazzer? Whaz you hitting me f'r?"

"My dear fellow man, I am here to aid you," replied Mr. Bowser. "Someone, in order to make a few pence profit, has sold you liquor and made a beast of you. Come with me and point out the man, and I will let him know what the world thinks of him. Ah, the shame of it — the shame!"

"Yesh, shameful case—shameful," muttered the man as he seized the iron rails of the fence and pulled himself to his wobbly legs. "Shay, old man, you goin' buy me nozzer glass er beer?"

"No, indeed. I'm going to save you. Brace up and try and throw off this stupor, so you can go with me."

"Goin' ter shave me, eh? Well, I want ter be shaved. When we goin' ter get er beer, eh?"

"There will be no more beer, my friend," solemnly replied Mr. Bowser as he patted the man on the arm. "I take it that you have a wife?"

"Yes, got er wife."

"And children?"

"Yesh; sheven little children."

"And they may be hungry at this moment because you have spent your money on drink. I can almost imagine that I hear their wails for bread."

"Shameful case—shameful," muttered the man as he seized the iron rails of the fence.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Bowser received what is called "the cold chuck."

"Yesh, wailin' for bread, and hain't got no bread," said the man as he began to soften. "Wife and sheven children wailin' for bread, and I'm full er beer!"

"And someone ought to be sent to prison because such a state of things is allowed! Man, you were tempted to drink."

"Yesh; tempted to drink. Had er shilling ter buy bread f'r er children, and man said I had better spend it on beer. He orter be shent prison. Wish I had anozzer glass beer, though."

"I see. When the craving once begins, it is hard to satisfy it. You'll get no more beer, however. I am going to save you from yourself. Let me get my hat, and then you come with me."

"Are you going to the pub?"

"Yes; I want to call at half-a-dozen public houses and hold you up as an object lesson. After that we will take bread and hope and consolation to the wife and children."

"Where are you going?" asked Mrs. Bowser as Mr. Bowser came in for his hat.

"I'm going to start a crusade against intemperance," he replied. "There's a man who has been reduced to the level of a hog by dealers in strong drink, while his wife and children are starving."

"But you'd better guide him out of the gate and let him go. You'll only get into trouble if you pursue this fad."

"Fad! Fad! Woman, have you got human feelings, a soul, a heart, any care whether your fellow creatures walk upright or grovel in the gutter? I shall go with him. I shall start a crusade. I shall accomplish something for humanity."

She could say no more. She stood on the steps with the cat while he took the drunken man by the arm and led him up the street. She sighed as she felt that something was about to happen, but the cat arched her back and grinned.

Mr. Bowser led his man into the first public-house he came to. There were a dozen men drinking at the bar, but he heeded them not as he fastened his gaze on the publican in his shirt sleeves and said:

"Wrecker of homes and destroyer of family happiness, behold your work!"

"What's the matter with you, old man?" was the reply as the publican came from behind the bar.

"The matter with me, sir—the matter with me is that I found this man reduced to the level of a beast through your influence and temptations. Gaze on him! He is a husband and father. His wife weeps and his children cry for bread, while you have taken his last copper for drink."

"Yesh, taken my lash copper," tearfully added the convert.

"You old duffer, whatever do you mean!" shouted the publican as a dangerous look gleamed in his eyes.

"I mean that you and others have wrecked this poor man's life and that of his family, and are driving him to a pauper's grave."

"Yesh, wrecked my poor life!" blubbered the inebriate as he smelt round for beer.

"You're a liar!" shouted the publican at Mr. Bowser.

"What! Look out, sir!"

"I say you're a liar and an ass! The man has neither wife nor child and is one of the worst characters in town. What do you mean by coming in here and telling me such a story as this?"

"You have tempted him, and you know it," exclaimed Mr. Bowser, feeling that he must bluff it out.

"Liar again! He has never had a drink in this bar. Get out of this."

Mr. Bowser received what is called "the cold chuck."

The publican and his potman seized him and tossed him about and punched his head and flung him out on to the pavement, like a bag of sand, and he wobbled home like a mule with the blind staggers.

"Well, how do you like crusading?" asked Mrs. Bowser as she and the cat met him in the hall.

Mr. Bowser held his swimming head in his hands and uttered a sort of moan.

"You needn't hunt any farther for an object lesson," she continued as she looked him over and saw that he was a "chucked" man.

This time his moan was longer drawn out. and she waved him upstairs and followed after with a wet towel, the camphor bottle, and a yard of sticking plaster.

M. Quad.

[Next Week: He Levelled all Distinctions and a Tramp Levelled him.]

Digitized by Google

A Commonplace Story.

THE wind howled and whistled along the Embankment, making the poor wretches who nightly sought what repose they could on the hard seats shiver with cold. It was only those whose business, or sterner necessity, caused them to be out who passed along that way.

One of the few pedestrians out on that bitter night was Arthur Rollitt. As he passed several of the occupants of the seats appealed to him for aid.

"'Ave yer a penny, sir, just ter get a cup o' corfy?" asked one.

Arthur drew out several coppers and handed them to the man.

"Thank yer, sir," was the response. "It's awful cold, an' a cup o' corfy does warm yer."

Then he turned to his companion.

"Come on, Bill, this gent's gimme enuf fur us both ter 'ave a cup an' a bite o' summat to eat as well," and with repeated thanks the two human scarecrows, for such they were in appearance, scurried off to the nearest stall to get the warmth-giving fluid.

Arthur Rollitt pursued his course, resuming the train of thought which this incident had disturbed. Two years ago he had come up to London to take a good berth which he had secured, thereby exciting the envy of his companions in the village where he had resided.

To them, who had never seen London except on a brief holiday trip, this was synonymous with coming into a fortune. Some of them had been up probably to see a football final at the Crystal Palace, and in the course of the day had included flying visits to sundry places of interest.

They had gazed in admiration at the big building where "ahr member" was supposed to nightly watch the interests of the country in general and their part of it in particular; they had trod the floors of the Abbey and St. Paul's with reverential steps; they had been to the Tower and thought of the story of the two young princes who, according to the school history books, had been murdered there; they had noted the top-hatted, frock-coated throng, and concluded that this garb was indicative of a well-filled purse. All these things had they seen, and returned home wishing that Fate or Fortune would lead them to the gay Metropolis.

Hence, as I have said, when Arthur Rollitt gained his London appointment he was greatly envied. But while I am thus descanting on the ideas and longings of the young men of the villages, Arthur Rollitt is cooling his heels on that wind-swept Embankment. And why is he there?

Let me trace his career through the two years. On his arrival in his new berth he had most assiduously, during the day, devoted himself to his duties and quickly won golden opinions from his chiefs. During the evenings he also assiduously devoted himself to other things.

There were many, many theatres, and these he frequented. In his own district he had paid a shilling for the privilege of a seat in the pit, here he paid half-a-crown. There were dances, too. At home he, like his fellows, went to occasional dances, where all that was necessary were a white tie and a pair of shoes, and even these were not de rigueur. Here, he must, of course, have a dress suit, and the dress suit was accordingly procured through the good offices of a friend who introduced him to an accommodating tailor, and, later on, this same knight of the shears fitted him out with the frock coat for which his soul yearned. Meanwhile, he kept on spending at a rate that exceeded his income.

When the holidays came he betook himself to the home of his childhood, but it must be admitted that it was owing more to a desire to appear in his fashionable clothes and air his London-gained knowledge—some of it—than to a superabundance of filial affection.

By-and-by bills began to fall due, and the smiling tailor began to wear a frown. Still the young fool pursued his course. With the advent of summer came trips up the river on Sunday and various other amusements, and Arthur Rollitt gained the title he was particularly anxious to get. He was dubbed a jolly good sort. He was a good talker, and had read largely before he commenced the "giddy goat" business, and he was accounted clever.

But soon the creditors grew tired of waiting, and one day one of those disagreeable individuals, yclept bailiffs, came upon the scene, and tendered him a most pressing invitation to call upon a gentleman known as the county court judge. This was the beginning of the end.

Messrs. Watkin, Son, and Watkin were old-fashioned enough to have an extreme abhorrence of debts and very little faith in those who incurred them. They had heard rumours that young Rollitt was in difficulties, and though his work was still well done, they had a doubt that he might be tempted some day to relieve those pressing difficulties by juggling with their accounts. Such things had happened before, and prevention was to their minds much better than cure.

On presenting himself at the office one morning shortly after the visit of the county court emissary he was informed that the chief wished to see him.

"Hang it," muttered Arthur. "Wish it had been any other morning."

The fact of the matter was the previous day glorious news had arrived from the seat of war, and he had been "Mafficking," eventually arriving home with the milk, and consequently he was not in the best condition for an interview with the chief. Pulling himself together he obeyed the summons.

"Good-morning, Mr. Rollitt," said the chief as he entered. "Take a seat, will you?" and then he went on scanning the morning's letters.

Arthur waited, wondering what was coming. When he had got through the pile, Mr. Watkin again turned to him.

Digitized by Google

"Don't you think you are a very foolish young man?" he asked.

"I don't quite understand you, sir," stammered Arthur.

"Don't you? Well, I haven't much time to spare this morning for explanations. Briefly, we have heard rumours of difficulties with your creditors, and as we pay our employés sufficiently well to enable them to avoid that kind of thing, of course we have drawn our own conclusions. Moreover, we don't care for gentlemen like the one who visited you recently to be seen coming into our offices, and we therefore think it would save any further unpleasantness if you were to tender us your resignation at the end of the present month."

"Very well, sir," replied Arthur, and the interview terminated, as did his engagement with Messrs. Watkin, Son, and Watkin in due course.

This was the end of his hopes of building up a fortune as a City merchant. He had so little hope of gaining another situation, considering the circumstances, that he applied for none. He sat down to write stories instead. To his intense joy and, it must be admitted, his surprise, his first was accepted, and before he met with a rejection eight of his short tales had been accepted and paid for.

Sanguine as ever, Arthur Rollitt began to look forward to the time when editors would inundate him with requests for more; but suddenly the fountain of his inspiration dried up, and his manuscripts came back to him with heart-breaking monotony.

He never wrote home. They would doubtless see his work in the magazines, and would judge from it that all was well. When he had overcome his difficulties he would go and see them with the laurels of his literary triumphs on his brow. Meanwhile, before his London friends he presented a smiling face, and the general impression was that young Rollitt was doing remarkably well. How well he was doing one incident will show.

One night, after a visit to a theatre on the invitation of one of his friends, he strolled down to the Embankment. He had now come to that stage where he paid for his bed night by night at a cheap—very cheap—hotel, and on this particular occasion he had not the requisite coin.

"Funny time to be strolling around here, isn't it?" queried a policeman whom he encountered.

"It's all right, constable. I am a journalist, and at present I am engaged upon a series of articles describing night life in London for a country paper."

"Oh, is that it? Well, you'll find plenty to write about here," replied the officer, and strolled away.

Thus did Arthur Rollitt gradually but slowly slide down, until at last he could meet his friends no more, and thus we find him strolling once more on the Embankment.

"How the dickens do those poor wretches stand it?" he muttered. "And yet, except in the matter of dress, they are better off than I. There are so many things they can do which I cannot. Matches, newspapers, or penny toys they can buy and sell in the streets."

A thought occurred to him which seemed to amuse him.

"I wonder what my friends would say if one night I pushed a box of vestas under their noses and yelled 'Wax-lights, cigar-lights,' or I might try 'Collar-studs, six a penny.'"

Here his laugh, which was a joyless one, suddenly ceased. Thoughts of friends who were dear to him came before his mind's eye, friends who would grieve at his mysterious absence, and as these thoughts crowded through his brain the laugh gave place to tears, and these in turn gave place to anger—against himself.

"Don't be a fool," he muttered, addressing himself. "It's your own fault. You have made your bed, now go and lie on it."

He had reached Waterloo Bridge. He stood upon the seat of one of the embrasures and looked down at the muddy waters and the lights on the barges.

"I can't swim, and they say drowning's a pleasant death," he muttered.

"Hello, sir, what are you doing up there?" asked a constable, and looking down Arthur Rollitt saw the officer of the former night on the Embankment. The constable in turn recognised him.

"What is it this time, sir? Are you going to do night life on the river?"

"No, under it," muttered Arthur under his breath. Then, addressing the policeman, he said: "Did you ever attempt to describe the tragedies of life and death, officer?"

"No, sir," he replied.

"Well, you can make a start—with mine," and with this Arthur Rollitt plunged swiftly over the parapet.

The constable blew his whistle, and soon the alarm was raised, but only the body of Arthur Rollitt was recovered. There was nothing in his pockets to identify him—he had been careful to remove everything to obliterate all marks before starting out.

A few days later a jury returned a verdict that an unknown man was found drowned, and that there was no evidence to show the state of his mind.

His friends will go on wondering what has become of the gay and brilliant member of their circle, not knowing that on a cold October night the foolish life was ended.

John Hy. Peat.

Special Features of Next Week's

CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER

OF

"SHORT STORIES" will be:

No. 1.—The opening chapters of a grand New Serial by Louis Tracy, entitled:

"THE LOST LADY DELIA."

This is a story of absorbing interest, and is calculated to hold the attention of the reader throughout.

No. 2.—The first of a series of articles called:

"THE LION'S WARS,"

dealing with all the principal wars in which Britain has been engaged during the last hundred years. Each article will contain a full-page illustration.

The number, which contains 64 pages, is also crammed full of

CHRISTMAS STORIES

by the best authors, and illustrated by the best black and white artists.

The price of all these good things is only

2d.

Tell your Newsagent at once to reserve a copy for you.

Digitized by Google

BY ORDER OF THE BOARD.

For seven years old John Fosdick had been teller at a large bank in a western town. Previous to his taking the place he had been a private banker and merchant and had come to grief. He had secured the place through the influence of the chairman, but there had been a "ring" against him in the bank. The place had been promised to a relative of the cashier's, and old John was looked upon as an intruder.

Without the chairman behind him, even after he had held the place for three or four years, he would have received notice by those in authority. He was a man who said but little and rendered faithful service. As he grew old they tried to make his age a point against him, and, not succeeding in that, it was hoped that he might get caught upon a forged cheque or some other act of carelessness.

He went his way without paying them back in their own kind. If he lost his place, it meant poverty to himself and wife in their old age. He was prompt, careful and systematic, and the plans of his enemies were defeated.

The seventh year was drawing to a close when old John was hauled over the coals. A stranger presented a cheque which he hesitated to pay and about which he consulted the cashier. Later on the cashier stated that he had ordered it to be held over pending examination. Old John said that he had been ordered to pay it at once. The cheque was paid, and being forged, the bank was £150 out of pocket. It was a question of veracity between cashier and teller, and it was decided within the bank that the cashier had the better of it. Just then, too, old Fosdick slipped in a wrong figure in making up his day's account, and, though it made only a difference of twopence in the total, it seemed to prove that old age and carelessness had unfitted him for his position. The chairman being abroad, the board took the case under consideration and "by order" the old man was sent out into the world to begin life anew. There were resolutions, of course, and one of them was to the effect that the bank presented him with the sum of twenty pounds for long and faithful services.

He put on his hat without protest, and he left the bank without taking the money. At his humble home an old and anxious wife met him and, wifelike, gave him sympathy and encouragement first of all.

"Never mind, John; never mind," she kept saying. "We have a few pounds saved, and you are only fifty-five years old, and something good is sure to turn up. You have fought too long to give up now."

But the weeks went by, and nothing turned up. The business world has very little use for an old man who has no capital. John Fosdick's savings were gradually used up, the generosity of his few friends exhausted, and there came a day when the question of food and fuel became a serious one.

He was not one to sponge or turn beggar. If the world would not let him earn his food, at least he would go out of it and hope that his going would open the hearts of men towards his widow.

After pondering for an hour he started out with the firm intentionof drowning himself in the river.

It was a blustering November day, and as he passed the bank with bowed head, bent shoulders and well-worn garments, even those who had deprived him of his place felt a touch of sympathy. He was making for the suburbs and a highway bridge and wondering how long it would take to drown and what men would say of him when dead, when he caught sight of men and horses skulking behind an empty factory. It was singular, bound on such a mission as he was, that he should have seen or wondered and speculated on why those men and horses were there, but he had hardly passed the factory when he suddenly turned about and ran for the business part of the town with a speed that astonished himself.

In the vaults of the bank was a sum close upon £60,000, deposited there temporarily by a railway company. Outside the vault was a big safe containing £5,000 more. It was a quiet afternoon, with few people moving about. Over a hundred of the men living in town had gone over to the next town to an auction of real estate. There hadn't been a better opportunity for years to make a dash at the bank.

Of a sudden old John Fosdick, bareheaded and his gray hair flying, burst into the bank. He was speechless with his running, but he did not try to use his voice. He dashed open the gate and seized the heavy doors of the safe and closed them with a bang.

Several employés tried to seize him, thinking he had gone crazy, but he shook them off, and just as firing and shouting were heard in the street he slammed the door of the vault. He had only turned from it when four ruffians dashed into the bank, each with a pistol in hand, while three others remained outside and fired at every pedestrian in sight.

"Hands up and money out!" shouted one of the three who entered the bank, and in an instant every official and employé was covered.

The cashier gave in, and the others followed suit, but old John Fosdick stood up gamely under the deadly revolvers and quietly said:

"Gentlemen, this bank is closed for the day."

"Open the safe and vaults or I'll blow your brains out!"

"I have a key to neither."

"Take that!"

The old man sank with a bullet in his brain, and the white-faced cashier would have opened safe and vault with his own hands but for the arrival of assistance. A few citizens had gathered and killed one of the watchers and wounded another. This caused a stampede on the part of the desperadoes.

They did not even grab the money packages in sight, but hastened to get away as fast as possible. John Fosdick had not drowned himself, but he lay dead. He had been discharged on account of old age and carelessness, but his speed and acumen had saved the bank from being robbed. He wondered what men would say of him after death. They said he was a hero. He had hoped men would have pity on his aged widow. When he had been laid away, the bank voted her a life pension, the citizens and the railway company made up a public purse, and she wanted for nothing the rest of her life.

C. B. Lewis.

Digitized by Google

BY THE HEAD OF A MANDARIN.

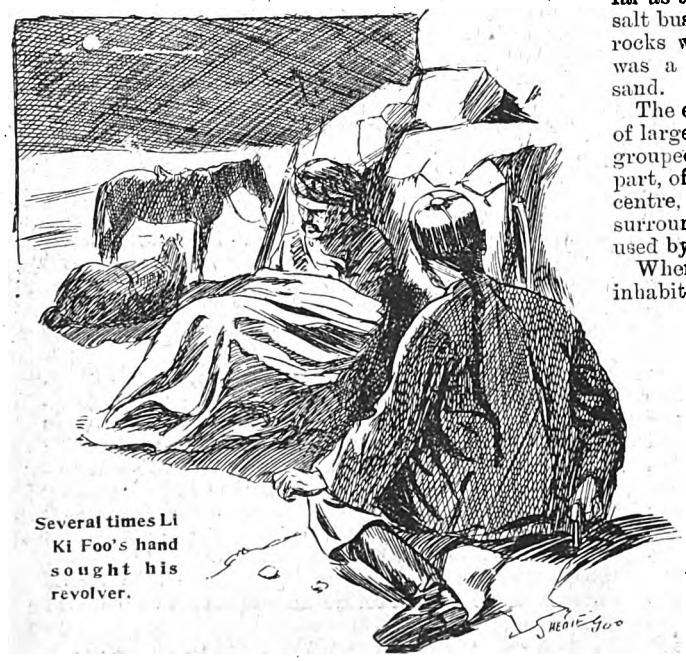
In Three Parts.

BY SADI GRANT.

PART III.

His first action on finding himself alone was to open the little box sent after him to Pekin. Inside were two small, flat, white cakes of some opaque substance, wrapped up carefully in cotton wool and then inclosed in small, neat, chamois-leather cases. They might have been mistaken for watches. Li Ki Foo placed these carefully in the two pockets of his embroidered waistcoat, then buttoned his straight jacket over. He wrote a few lines to Ah Cheh to tell him he had gone due east to the Tartar camp, to the camp of the Lusan tribe. These directions were enough, for when a large tribe like this were camped anywhere in the neighbourhood of a town, it was well-known in that town in which direction the encampment was. Then taking up a small bag already packed with necessaries, and pushing a Colt's revolver into his belt, Li Ki Foo was ready. He left his only attendant behind with the note for Ah Cheh, and rode forth alone and unattended, except by the Tartar, across the pathless waste of the great steppes.

His companion was mounted on a horse as good as his own, of a tireless breed, ugly and wiry, accustomed to scanty food and frequent fasts, and long journeys across the shifting sand. They talked as they rode of many things, and a pleasant kind of friendship sprang up between them, without, however, in the least imperilling their ultimate intentions—that of the Tartar Chief to force a ransom from his guest, or that of the guest to kill his host, if he could find freedom for his brother in no other way.



Several times Li Ki Foo's hand sought his revolver.

Long before the end of the ride, Li Ki Foo had a very shrewd idea of who his companion really was. There was a dignity and presence about him that could not well have belonged to a man of inferior position, also, on two or three occasions, he practically admitted his headship of the tribe. Several times when they bivouacked together under the shadow of the great desert rocks, Li Ki Foo's hand sought his revolver, and he felt tempted to blow the Tartar's brains out, and so dispose of his brother's greatest enemy.

Yet each time an immense distaste of such a deed stopped him; it was such an unsportsmanlike way of getting rid of an enemy, to murder him by night. When the faint lavender streaks of dawn stole along the edge of the steppe, and the night owl gave a farewell hoot to the crouching leopard, when all nature lay hushed in the arms of the rising day, such evil thoughts fled like ghosts. No, the fight, if fight there was, must be fair and open, and Li Ki Foo fell back on his saddlebags with a sigh of relief.

The Tartar was not so unconscious during those long night vigils as his friend imagined; he slept almost literally with one eye open, and had Li Ki Foo really tried to shoot him, he might not have found him so entirely unprepared as he imagined.

On the evening of the third day they approached the Tartar camp. Scattered goats and camels, in search of fresh green stuff, became frequent; the trees had long been left behind, and hundreds upon hundreds of miles of rolling plains, like the waves of the sea, stretched as far as the sight could reach. Patches of scrubby, short salt bush made dark patches here and there, and great rocks were scattered about; but the prevailing colour was a hopeless yellow—hundreds of miles of yellow sand.

The encampment was very rough and primitive, but of large extent, quite three hundred tents and huts were grouped together; the tents were made, for the most part, of a kind of rough sacking, but two or three in the centre, standing alone, twenty yards or so from the surrounding ones, were white, the usual travelling tent used by Europeans.

When the two horsemen were seen approaching, all the inhabitants of the camp crowded out to welcome them, and Li Ki Foo could be under no further doubt as to who his companion was. The women and children kept in the background, but the men came forward, roughly saluting the chief, and among them Li Ki Foo saw his brother. He rode up to him at once, the bystanders looking on curiously, but not attempting to interfere.

"Greeting, Li Ham," he said shortly.

"Greeting, O Li Ki Foo!" said Li Ham in return; "wherefore comest thou thus unattended, unless thou also art a prisoner of the Tartars?"

"I came but to bring thy ransom, my brother," said Li Ki Foo, so that all might hear. "Till it arrives I tarry in the Tartar's camp with thee."

Digitized by Google

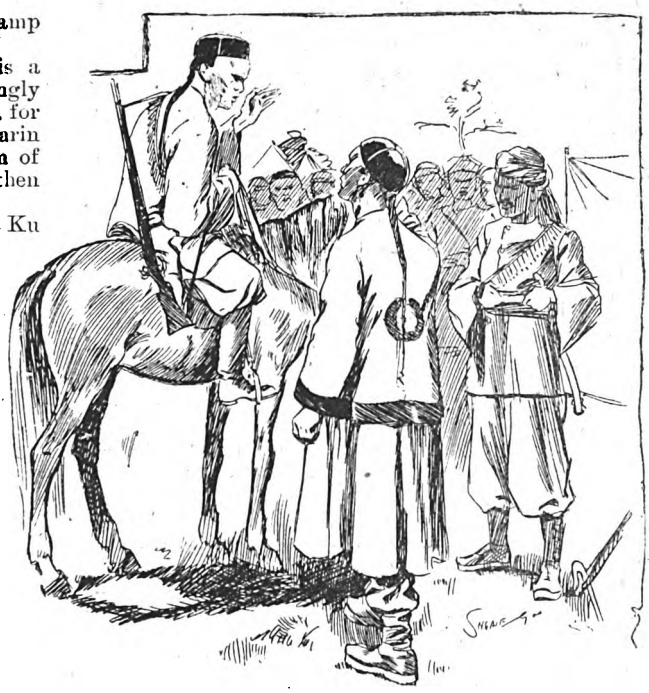
Li Ham did not look as if he considered this a specially good arrangement, still he was exceedingly relieved to hear the ransom was really on its way, for he had been by no means sure that the old Mandarin would consider him worth the loss of so large a sum of money. He assisted his brother to dismount and then turned with him to greet the Tartar Chief.

"Thou knewest not I was myself thy host," said Ku civilly, "yet it is so, and we are no worse friends for our journey across the steppes together. Where two brave men meet there treachery flies. Here art thou my honoured guest, O Li Ki Foo; rest in peace in the strangers' tent till thy brother's ransom comes here from Leh."

"I thank thee and accept thy hospitality," said the Chinaman, gravely, "the word of the Chief is security for the traveller. Yet may I share my brother's tent, O Chief, I would have an added debt of gratitude."

"A prisoner's hut is not the tent of a guest," said the Tartar, "rather may thy brother share the stranger's tent with thee."

So it was settled. Li Ham's wardrobe was not extensive, and his belongings were soon moved into the tent appointed for his brother's use. A large bowl of goat's milk and a long piece of a kind of black bread was brought for Li Ki Foo's refreshment, together with a message that the Chief expected both brothers to dine with him at sunset.



He rode up to him at once, the bystanders looking on curiously.

As soon as Li Ki Foo found himself alone with his brother, he hurriedly explained to him the plan of deliverance. This met with little favour from Li Ham, who would much have preferred that the ransom should have been paid in a straightforward manner without further risk to himself.

"Already have I lost a finger," he said sulkily. "It seems to me, my brother, a very poor chance that we have of not losing our lives. These Tartars draw back at nothing. Should Ku see these troops of which you talk surrounding him, he would murder us both without a moment's delay."

Li Ki Foo calmly took from his pocket the two small leather packets, and gave one to his brother.

"Thou hast heard of dynamite, Li Ham," he said. "Take this; it is a bomb, so constructed that a sudden blow will make it explode, and then one alone of these small packets contains sufficient dynamite to kill and destroy all within a radius of twenty yards. Take it and keep it, for it is possible I may be separated from you, when the attack of Ah Cheh's troops takes place."

Li Ham drew back.

"It is not a pleasant waistcoat companion, O my brother," he said fearfully, "art sure the heat of my body will not cause it to explode?"

"Have I not carried both from Kin Sin?" said Li Ki Foo contemptuously, "and am I yet dead? Take it and place it in safety, for I know not when I may have the chance of passing it to thee again."

Li Ham took the bomb and placed it with inward trembling in a small inner pocket.

"When thinkest thou Ah Cheh will arrive here?" he asked his brother.

"In two days at latest," said Li Ki Foo shortly. "I gave him orders to follow at once, and he left Leh but two days after me, so he should arrive here at dawn of the third day from now."

"And supposing," said Li Ham shrewdly, "that both thou and myself are overpowered by numbers, before we have time to throw the bombs, what then? It seems to me like enough. The Tartars are no fools."

"Of that we must take our chance," said Li Ki Foo, "there is of course a risk of such possibility."

"Not only a risk, but a great likelihood," said Li Ham angrily; "the Tartars number at least two hundred full grown men; say, if twenty are slain by thy infernal bomb, will not the remainder suffice to overpower two men?"

"The remainder will, I trust, be so blinded and astonished by the explosion, that we can escape," said Li Ki Foo; "also we must not resort to the bombs till our last extremity is reached, and then our troops should be close at hand."

Still he could not hide from Li Ham, or even from himself, that it was likely to be a risky business. Li Ham privately determined to use his bomb before the attack on the camp became known, if he had the opportunity. That evening they dined with the Chief, in the open air outside his tent. The wine was good, having been looted from a caravan of Persian merchants, who were crossing from Leh to Ispahan, but the food left much to be desired, broiled kabobs of very dry, poor meat, probably goats' flesh, and rice, followed by cheeses of camels' milk, and a lot of small dried figs, really the best things there at all. Ku informed his guests that a messenger had already been dispatched to the bank at Leh, with the order for the ten thousand taels, and that he trusted they would not be long detained.

"In the meantime the best my poor camp can offer is at your honours' disposal," he continued graciously; "also, in two or three days' time, I go to hunt the wild sheep of Thibet with thirteen of my best followers, and if you will, you can accompany us."

Digitized by Google

"How long do you propose being away from the camp, O Chief?" asked Li Ki Foo.

"But three days," answered Ku. "It is an opportunity for your Excellencies," he added politely, "to see something of the steppes and the wild country round the camp."

"I thank you," said Li Ki Foo, "ever have I much wished to explore strange countries and to see strange sights outside of mine own land."

Yet he was inwardly much perplexed, for he calculated that Ah Cheh was not due till the third day, and if anything happened to delay him he would find them gone. So time passed on till the evening of the second day and both brothers retired to their tent for the night, outwardly calm as usual, but inwardly very much perturbed. Instead of lying down and undressing as usual, they merely put out their oil lamp to divert suspicion, and then sat in the dark ready dressed for flight, sitting bolt upright to avoid falling asleep. A Tartar was mounting guard outside, but when all was quiet in the camp he, too, lay down on the rough ground, and was soon snoring as loudly as his companions in the tents. Li Ham crept cautiously out to the tent door and listened eagerly, but no sound could be heard on the still night air.

"If Ah Cheh plays us false," he muttered, "or even if he is delayed but a few hours, the plan will fail."

Across a small, open stretch of ground the moon shone brightly on the white tent of the Chief and on a guard of three men at the door. What an opportunity was this to get rid of Ku, swiftly and easily, by throwing the bomb across the open place! In a minute Li Ham's hand was in his pocket, and he held the bomb in his hand. He took off the outer coverings, and stood for a second looking at the flat, round cake that was capable of such murderous deeds. Then he lifted his hand to throw it.

"Stay!" cried Li Ki Foo, who had just come out to see what his brother was doing. But he was too late. The bomb had fallen short of the tent, but had struck a large stone outside sharply; instantly there was a terrific explosion. Sand and stones flew up in such blinding quantities it was impossible to see what damage was done. Both the Chinamen were thrown to the ground by the violence of the explosion. But they were too far off to be hurt, though their guard, who was only a few steps nearer, was killed by a fragment of rock falling on his head. Shrieks and cries came from every side, the camp was thoroughly woken up, and men rushed to the chief's tent from every quarter.

"Now is our time to escape, if ever," whispered Li Ham, and together they crawled out of the débris of their tent, and then, getting quickly to their feet, stole away as fast as possible to the outskirts of the now disorganised encampment. Nobody stopped them or asked where they were going, but they knew this state of things would not last for long, and they had better get away as soon as possible. They stumbled over tent ropes, and trod on many a sleeping dog, ere they reached the open plain. Here they looked in vain for any sign of Ah Cheh and his relieving force.

The first grey light of very early morning only enabled them to see a short distance, however, and they hoped as they went forward to meet him. Otherwise their case was hopeless indeed; there was no refuge of any kind for more than fifty miles, and they well knew that as soon as the Tartars had recovered the shock of their leader's death they would scour the plains around for their escaped prisoners. When caught, if caught they were, the vengeance of the Tartars would be terrible.

"Hadst thou but had patience," said Li Ki Foo, "all might have been well, but now, should Ah Cheh not appear in sight before two hours have passed, we are but dead men."

Li Ham did not reply, but marched on stolidly by his brother's side.

"Could we but secure two horses!" said Li Ki Foo, hopelessly.

"At the station where the outer guard lies," said Li Ham, "there saw I your horse but yesterday."

"Thou sayest not so?" said Li Ki Foo eagerly. "At all costs we must get him."

In the camp itself there were not more than thirty or forty horses, and these were kept in the centre and well guarded, as being the robbers' most valuable property. Li Ki Foo knew it was hopeless to think of getting them, but a single horse in an outside shed was a different thing. They stole up to the guard's hut silently, and looked in through an opening in the wall. Yes, there was the horse all right, but there was also a man sleeping on the ground beside him, fully armed. Li Ham being the lightest and smallest of the two, crept through the opening and dropped gently inside; then, quickly seizing the Tartar's short curved sword, he plunged it into the man's side twice. His victim simply groaned and rolled over dead; then Li Ham opened the door and led out the horse. The animal knew his master at once, and rubbed his head against his shoulder.

"For once must thou carry double, O Selim," said Li Ki Foo, patting his neck; "hasten, my brother, for the Tartars will be after us in a very short space."

Seizing the Tartar's sword, he plunged it into the man's side.

Digitized by Google

The bomb exploded with immense force in the face of the foremost Tartar.

Li Ham had re-entered the hut to take the dead Tartar's sword and knife, for both he and Li Ki Foo had been deprived of their weapons as soon as they had reached the camp. Now Li Ham came out and mounted quickly behind his brother. They rode away quickly straight across the steppe in the direction of Kin Sin.

Li Ki Foo was afraid to urge Selim too quickly forward. in case he should break down altogether; still they went at a good pace, and the camp was soon several miles away. The sun got hotter and hotter, and Selim began to show great signs of fatigue; but hope was in sight. Still far away they saw a cloud of dust, which betokened the movements of a large body of horsemen—without doubt it was Ah Cheh at last. Alas! before these had come properly in sight, another body of horsemen was seen riding towards them from the opposite direction, and these last were much nearer.

The Chinamen urged on their horse to the utmost, and he responded by a gallant effort, but they could see his strength was nearly exhausted, and the Tartars gained on them steadily. Li Ki Foo looked round and took in the situation at a glance.

Not far off was a clump of rocks, that would afford a slight shelter to them and their horse. He still had one dynamite bomb and Li Ham had the Tartar's sword and knife. They would fight for their lives yet. Ah Cheh was now only half-a-mile off. Li Ki Foo told his plan to his brother in a few short sentences, and riding up to the rocks, they quickly dismounted, and established themselves in the best position they could.

On came the Tartars, their curved swords gleaming in the sun. Li Ki Foo waited till they were close to the furthest rock before launching his only defence. Then he threw the bomb, and it exploded with immense force in the face of the foremost Tartar. Most of the Tartars were killed, or so wounded as to be incapable of further fighting, and the remaining few, after lingering round for a very short time, turned and rode back across the plain to their encampment, no doubt thinking it hopeless to stay and engage the enemy they saw coming on in such force, with their weakened numbers.

The Chinamen were nowhere to be seen, and their horse had torn away the bridle from its fastening, and was racing wildly over the steppes. Li Ki Foo and his brother were not dead, however, but they were insensible and half-buried by earth and stones; when Ah Cheh came up he soon unearthed them. Ah Cheh was not surprised by the explosion, for he had expected the packet sent to Pekin contained something of the kind, and he was thankful to find it had not killed the aggressors, as well as the aggressed.

He and a few of his little army stayed behind with his master, but the rest went on, under the command of the head soldier. They had come out for the purpose of looting the Tartar camp, and it was a pity they should be disappointed, according to Ah Cheh's own opinion.

The soldiers found, however, they had no easy task, for the men who turned back after the explosion gave warning of their coming, and the camp was fully prepared for their onslaught. Men fight hard when they fight for their lives and the whole of their earthly belongings, and in time the Chinamen were driven back. They got, however, the thousand taels Li Ki Foo had promised in the first place, though it did not come to very much, when divided among so many.

Li Lang Hi welcomed his sons back with satisfaction, but he was more convinced than ever that the magic of the English, though useful was diabolical; and he recommended both sons, for the good of their souls, to put all foreign explosives and barbarian devices aside for the future, and trust only to the wisdom of China, the sharpness of her swords, and the beguiling deceit of true Chinese diplomacy.

"BESIEGED WITH B.-P."

A complete record of the Siege of Mafeking.

By J. EMERSON NEILLY.

War Correspondent of the "Pall Mall Gazette" in Mafeking.

Crown 8vo, Price 1s. net.
Post Free, 1s. 3d.

"Mr. Neilly tells admirably the thrilling story of the siege."—Scotsman.

"As a realistic picture of how things actually happen, no less than a worthy record of one of the most splendid incidents of our history, 'Besieged with B.-P.' is a notable book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

At all Railway Bookstalls and Booksellers.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT ELEPHANTS.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "The Lucky Bargee," by Harry Lander, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. John T. Murdoch, 8 West Adam Street, Edinburgh. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about XMAS FESTIVITIES, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 17th. Post-cards only, please.

Charlie Got Jealous.

THEY were at the menagerie last Christmas. He looked a very shy young man, and the girl who leant on his arm was—well, one of Edinburgh's bonnie lassies.

When they came to the elephant the girl nervously (?) tugged at the young man's arm and exclaimed:

"Oh, Charlie, will it bite?"

"No, dear, of course not," said the young man with wonderful temerity, "elephants can't bite, but they can hug."

"Oh, Charlie!" said the girl, with a distracting smile, "I don't mind that."

And Charlie got so jealous he took her to see the tiger.

J. T. M.

Funny!

WHILE spending an evening at Belle Vue last week, I was watching an elephant—which had been giving rides—drinking at the lake, when two lads about twelve years of age came along.

One of them looked knowingly at the tremendous animal for a minute, and then, taking the other by the sleeve, pointed to the elephant, saying:

"Push him in, Tommy."

H. C. G. S.

Elephants Served Up Whole.

AT a certain restaurant not a hundred miles from Henrietta Street, it is the boast of the management that you have only to ask for a particular dish to get your wants supplied.

The other day a gentleman entered its portals and inquired of the obsequious waiter what he could have for lunch.

"Oh, anything you like, sir," replied the menial, "from a salted sausage to a pickled elephant."

"Oh, very well," replied the customer. "I'll have pickled elephant."

"Yes, sir," and the waiter disappeared to come up smiling a minute later with the announcement:

"I forgot to mention, sir, that we only serve our pickled elephants whole—we don't supply them in slices. If you think a whole one too much, we have some ham and chicken I can recommend."

He had ham and chicken.

J. B.

True Story of an Elephant.

A STORY is told of a civilian elephant that was employed in a timber yard. A number of logs had to be moved by him, and only one remained when the bell rang for ceasing work.

Of course the elephant knew the bell and what it meant, and was sauntering away, when the foreman bade him move the last log.

He did not object, but with all his tugging and straining did not manage to lift it. Seeing this, the foreman called up a second elephant to help, but even the two together did no good—the log could not be stirred. It must be left.

Next day, to the foreman's astonishment, when the bell rang for beginning work, the first elephant marched straight up to the log, lifted it quite easily, and carried it to its proper place.

One can only think that the clever fellow said in his heart, and told his companion:

"It's an awful shame to make us go on working when the bell has rung, so let us pretend we can't move the log!"

J. G. B.

Animal Friendships.

WILD elephants sometimes make devoted friends of other animals.

A party of hunters in Central Africa once wounded a large bull elephant, which, travelled scores of miles into the jungle, after receiving the heavy bullet in his shoulder.

The chase was abandoned for the time, but a fortnight later the hunters came upon the same beast. He was lying on his injured side near a stream in a dense forest. A buffalo cow was standing over the fallen monarch, gently licking the blood from the wound.

Frequently she would leave him and go to the stream, and by pawing at its edge toss a lot of water upon the rank grass within reach of the elephant's trunk. It was probably in this way that refreshing moisture had been conveyed to the fevered and suffering giant, keeping him alive.

The hunters were divided as to whether the elephant should be put out of his misery. It was finally decided to give him a chance for his life under the nursing of the cow.

Several weeks later, when the party were making their way back towards the course, they came across a lame elephant attended by a buffalo cow. The pair were not molested.

S. A. C.

Digitized by Google

Almost Human.

A valuable elephant contracted a virulent disease of the eyes, and after suffering with it for a few days became blind.

His owner called in a surgeon, who, after examining the elephant's eyes, applied nitrate of silver to one of them, and the elephant, uttering a roar of pain, jumped up and behaved in such an outrageous fashion that it was some hours before he could be calmed down and secured.

The application was successful, the sight of the one eye being almost entirely restored.

The surgeon was willing to operate on the other eye if the elephant was properly secured before the operation. However, the elephant had recognised the doctor's voice, and, to everybody's astonishment, followed him of his own accord, lay down without any persuasion, placing his head on one side with the diseased eye upward, then curled up his trunk and drew in a deep breath, like any human being might do who was about to undergo a painful operation, and awaited the doctor's pleasure.

J. B.

Simpson's Experience.

We had all told the best "yarn" we could think of, with the exception of Simpson.

"Now, come along, old man," said one, "what about that elephant business?"

Simpson fell back in his chair.

"Don't! don't!" he cried, "don't ask me to describe that horrible affair."

Everyone was instantly interested.

It took about fifteen minutes before he was finally persuaded to tell us his experience.

For half-an-hour he kept us all spellbound with the graphic description of how he was chased by a huge elephant in an Indian jungle.

"At last," he continued, "I got my chance. Dropping on one knee, I took accurate aim, and if it hadn't been for that confounded servant shaking me to say that 'breakfast was ready,' that elephant would undoubtedly have lost an eye."

H. C.

Engine and Elephant.

In certain parts of India railway engineers have many difficulties to encounter, some of them more amusing to read about than to experience. Of one such difficulty, the following story is told:

"A freight train was lumbering along, when a big elephant came out of the woods and undertook to butt the engine off the track. The engineer did not like to charge the brute, for fear of an upset, and several times reversed the engine, in the vain hope that the elephant would take that as a sign of surrender, and retire.

"Finally the elephant backed into the engine, and, setting its forefeet firmly between the rails, endeavoured to push the train backward with its hindquarters.

"The engineer promptly put on all steam, toppled the elephant over a small embankment, and before it could recover its senses, the train passed on."

E. R.

Where Ignorance is Bliss.

A party of seven excursionists from the vicinity of Manchester were, a few weeks since, perambulating about the shore at Seacombe, opposite Liverpool, and, seeing several flats and schooners lying high and dry on the beach, the tide being out at the time, one of the party turned round to a friend of his and said:

"I say, Bill, how do them there fellows get their vessels down in th' water?"

"Can't say," was the response.

"Well," returned Bill, "I'll know afore I go whoam to-neet."

On the party went, and at last, on coming to a schooner where one of the seamen was seated at the stern, Bill, to satisfy his curiosity, goes up and thus interrogates the sailor:

"I say, maister, how d'ye manage to get vessel into water?"

"Why, we don't put the schooner into the water; the water comes up to her."

Bill chuckled and, placing the tip of his thumb to the end of his probosc's, roared out:

"Gammon! thou'rt not old enough to joke us Manchester fowk."

A. W. H.

Well, Have You Done the "Twenty Teazer"?

ISN'T IT A LITTLE RASCAL?
CAN YOU DO IT?
CAN YOUR FRIENDS DO IT?

It is One of the most Teazing Teazers that ever Teazed a Teazed Public.

It is not much to look at. You would think there was nothing in it. You would think you could do it on your head in the dark. But you can't.

You sit down at a table after tea with the "Twenty Teazer" in front of you, and you say to your wife, "Now, just time me, and see how quickly I can do this alleged 'Teazer!'" And then you begin.

About two in the morning your wife comes down in her dressing-gown with a candle to find you grovelling on the ground with your coat off and your collar undone, hunting round for the fifth square block of wood which you are convinced must have been in the box.

But you are wrong: there are only four, and the "Teazer" can be unteazed.

One point, however, you should bear in mind, that it is not necessary for the numerals to be all facing the same way. Some of them may be upside down, others may be end on, just as you fancy.

THE PRICE IS SIXPENCE,

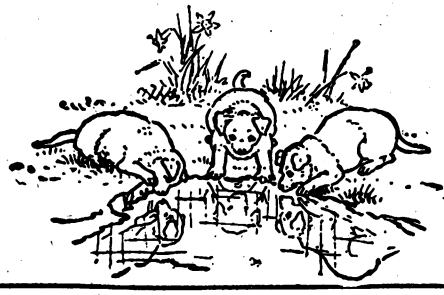
and you can get it from any newsagent or bookstall clerk.

NEXT WEEK THE . . .

CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER
OF
SHORT STORIES
will be here.
ORDER IT NOW. PRICE 2d.

Digitized by Google

WAS IT A FAILURE?



"It is just like a Beauty and the Beast, only the pity is—there is no Beast!"

The remark and the complaint were made by rather a plain young girl below a wall overhung with a mass of red and pink roses. There was an air of romance about the garden, where she was wandering alone, although it was only the garden of a hotel; but then the hotel was in Italy, the land of romance. It was growing late for the lake season; the crowd of English visitors had gone by; the heat was becoming fierce; people hurried off by the passes to the cool snowy uplands of Switzerland.

In all the Grand Hotel de Bellagio there were only two people left. Their names, as they called each other, were "Auntie" and "Hetty"; or, as they were written up on the hall-board, "Mrs. Kerrhurst, Angleterre; Miss Douglas, Angleterre."

There was a certain charm in finding that the whole place—the great spacious hotel, with its salons and verandahs, its wide marble stairs and corridors, its gardens lying along the lakeside with seats and shady walks—was at their sole disposal.

For, if the evening steamboats happened to bring a few travellers—some Russians, some German-American Jews, a German bridal pair—the boat, early the following morning, was generally certain to take them all away again, and leave the place empty during the hot still day.

Hetty often thought, as they sat down to their solitary breakfast of a morning in the long stately salle-à-manger, with its polished floors and carved and panelled walls, with its vast windows, which let in the scent from the magnolia-trees, and its suite of unemployed servants waiting listlessly about—she often thought it was like living in a fairy tale, where there was a palace all in readiness, but whose owner never appeared.

"That is the worst of it," she complained. "It is very nice being alone, auntie, but I must say I should like to see the Beast."

To which "Auntie" would respond: "Perhaps when he comes he will complain he can see no Beauty."

Mrs. Kerrhurst, who had lived in India, maintained that the secret in hot weather is to keep the shutters and windows closed, so she spent her days in her room at the back of the house, but Hetty, despite her aunt's deprecations that she was growing hopelessly sunburnt, preferred descending the broad terrace-steps, crossing the parterre, aglow with all-coloured flowers, and wandering about with her books under the leafy colonnade by the lakeside. She never tired of watching the wonderful changes which passed over the mountains, whose velvet-like green slopes rose sheer out of the water, nor of noting the lights and shadows over the distant snow-crowned peaks.

One day "the Beast" appeared. Hetty found him in possession of her favourite seat—the little corner bower in the uppermost path of the garden, where a yellow jasmine strewed its blossoms on the ground. There was no mistaking his nationality—it was "Milord Anglais" every inch. Age, apparently over fifty; an iron-grey moustache, keen, severe grey eyes, a forehead furrowed with melancholy lines, an expression both sad and savage.

That was the vision which from henceforth haunted the garden and salons. He was always alone, never spoke to anyone, always looked miserable and defiant. At table d'hôte he sat silent and rigid between some noisy foreigners, or generally he dined at a little side table alone. But Hetty was not repelled.

"I should like to make him look a little happy," she said. And she undertook the mission.

From that time the waiters—according to whose caprice people are either thrown together or kept apart at the tables d'hôte—ruled that the seats of the three English people should be placed side by side. And from the informal introduction: "Will you pass the salt, please?" Hetty made her starting-point. At first she met with anything but brilliant success. Colonel Wyse (as his name was registered on the hall-board) met her advances with chill sternness.

His answers were not so much blunt or brusque as grimly indifferent. He did not admire the lake scenery; he did not call it hot; he did not think much of Bellagio; he did not like Italy or anything Italian, it was quite a mistake of Hetty's to consider it a matter of regret that no more English arrived; it was a still greater mistake to imagine that foreigners were better than nobody; he hated foreigners; he detested the scent of magnolias, and wished that all the trees might die; he considered nightingales a downright plague, and had risen in the night to fling a piece of soap out of the window, which had gained him the satisfaction of dislodging twelve from one bush.

Everything he said was as though it were forced unwillingly from him. A shy person would soon have been discouraged; conversation must have flagged had it depended on him; but Hetty chattered unceasingly. She was not long in discovering that the Engineer Colonel, notwithstanding his haughty, forbidding mien, was in reality possessed by a certain shyness not uncommon to the corps; but, being one of those shy people who are the very last to own to it, he had grown accustomed to cover his shyness with an air of savageness. Most who met him were afraid of him; he had no friends; he travelled about for his health from place to place, lonely, blasé, discontented, suffering. The bright girl with the sunny smile at Bellagio, who insisted on making him talk, was a wonderful exception to the general rule of acquaintances, who, however sociably disposed, always ended in giving up their efforts as quite hopeless. But Hetty talked and laughed on—never sought for subjects suitable to his gravity—chattered away about the merest, most frivolous girlish trifles—anything that came uppermost; showed him her hands tanned to nut-brown by the morning's row; asked his advice what to do with them; consulted him on the colour of a silk scarf she intended to purchase; described a "spoony" scene she had witnessed in the arbour between a demonstrative German bridal couple. It was like sunshine on ice. A thaw set in—day by day the morose engineer relaxed, listened, grew interested in the girl as a comical study, was known to smile grimly, left off saying sarcastic things, grew less cynical and more gracious. Hetty began to be triumphant. The look of melancholy changed to something more like happiness when she was near.

Digitized by Google

She thought it a great discovery when she found out there were two things he liked—one was music, the other was tea—but he never met with either to his taste, so he said. However, Hetty's playing seemed to please him, for every evening, when she sat down to the piano in the empty public salon, he brought his cigar to the seat nearest the door, just outside in the verandah, and smoked there in the summer twilight so long as the music continued.

Hetty played as she talked—on and on—and never expected polite observations between whiles, such as "That is very pretty; who is the composer of that piece?" She seemed to play for herself more than for outsiders; no one was expected to listen unless he liked.

"I do not believe anybody can make better tea than I can," announced Hetty confidently. And the next rainy day there came a knock at Colonel Wyse's room, where he was spending a cheerless afternoon, and the femme de chambre of the stage presented a cup of hot, fragrant tea, with the compliments of the ladies of No. 14.

Quite a sweet smile accompanied the thanks for that cup of tea the next time they met. Then came an invitation to see the tea made; and at five o'clock one day Colonel Wyse found a welcome to Mrs. Kerrhurst's private salon, where Hetty was busy with spirits of wine and an Etna-lamp.

"This is the primitive way in which we do things abroad," said Hetty, with a wave of a solitary spoon towards two cups set out without any saucers, and a tiny china teapot with a broken handle. "This is my pet little old teapot which I bought in the market at Verona once. It is of no use carrying saucers; they take up too much room, and always get broken in the packing. We take turns with the spoon; it is the only one my aunt's butler would allow us to bring from home. But, oh! dear, I did not know we had eaten all the last pane dolce. Wait a minute; I will be back directly."

And Hetty snatched her hat and ran out of the room, leaving her aunt to ring for another cup and spoon, and to talk to Colonel Wyse about India and the people they mutually remembered there.

In a few minutes, indeed, back came Hetty breathless, bearing in triumph what she called a pane dolce—a round light cake with raisins.

"Do you patronise that quaint little baker's shop under the arcades, Colonel Wyse? That is where I have been. I told the woman I could not wait for paper and string, and had brought no centesimi. She always says 'Fa niente.' Now the tea is ready."

Colonel Wyse thought it the pleasantest tea-party he had ever known, and all the better for the absence of silver equipage and liveried footman, and the state and formality of an English drawing-room. But it must have been the sociable charms of the tea-maker and his hostess which made the real difference.

"Hetty has set her heart on rowing to San Giovanni by moonlight," said Mrs. Kerrhurst. "The moon does not rise until ten o'clock; if you would not think that too late, and would care to finish your cigar on the water, we shall be very glad."

It was not at all the sort of thing in the Colonel's "line."

"What difference does it make in a place whether the moon or the sun is shining?" he inquired of Hetty at that evening's table d'hote, when she alluded in joyous raptures to the prospect.

"Oh, if you do not know, I am afraid I cannot explain," she answered, a little puzzled; "except," she added lucidly—"except that it is the difference between sunlight and moonlight. Besides, the moon makes everything look so romantic."

"Ah, all romance was knocked out of me long ago."

"Oh, what a pity!" said the young girl, looking so sorry for him.

It may have been that he found it refreshing to watch the fresh glow of romance in somebody young and happy; at any rate, he was in the boat, which glided over the moonlight water, by garden walls overhung with roses, and by ilex copses where the nightingales sang, until it reached the broad, weird flight of stone stairs, bordered by cypresses, leading up the hill from the village of San Giovanni; and if the musical clang of the bells from the church campanile was nothing but a common sound to him, it may yet have been a pleasant change to be with one to whom they spoke the purest poetry.

Days and nights passed—a month flew—and Colonel Wyse, who had intended staying only a few days, still lingered on at Bellagio. They were happier days than he had known for many years—so happy that it was becoming dangerous. Circumstances threw the three English people very often together. A wonderful new feeling began to make its way into the self-hardened heart of the man who had grown accustomed to find this world a rough, cold place. At first he looked upon it as a mere madness, a wild impossibility; but the feeling forced its own way, and for a little while he indulged it.

Suddenly an influx of other English arrived at the hotel. They were a large party of mostly young people, all of whom proved to be friends of Mrs. Kerrhurst's and of Hetty's. They absorbed Hetty. All day—at the tables d'hôte, in the garden, on the water, in the veranda—she was surrounded by some of them. They were all so young and so happy; and the poor old Colonel, looking on, began to feel old and unhappy again. He never felt so old or so unhappy as when he saw a certain Alan Thornton helping Hetty in and out of the boats, laughing and talking with her under the trees.

"It is natural, quite natural," thought he, resigning himself to the loss of Hetty's companionship, and never for a moment guessing of the comparison Hetty, in her own mind, was making between some young men and some older men, nor how strongly she decided that the empty-headed class, who could talk of nothing but balls and theatres and races, were a great mistake; and that others who had "lived," and who possessed brains and sense, were far more to be admired and appreciated. Often, in the midst of Mr. Thornton's light rattling talk, she remembered with regret one of Colonel Wyse's blunt speeches.

Digitized by Google

"You must miss your friends," said Colonel Wyse, when they all departed, and Hetty's chair was once more moved up next his.

"Ye-es," said Hetty, "I shall miss the girls; but it is pleasant to have the place to ourselves again, I think. It seems like old times to be sitting at this end of the table again."

Her undisguised pleasure at that fact was not lost upon her neighbour.

The next day he said abruptly:

"I am going to England to-morrow."

It was a surprising piece of news; for it had been a long-settled thing that he and they should meet again in August, since both were bound for the same place in Switzerland. There was apparently no urgent reason for such a reversal of plans. He only said he had changed his mind; and if Mrs. Kerrhurst and Hetty had known Colonel Wyse better, they would have been aware that that was a thing he had rarely done in the course of his life before.

They were sorry; they had grown accustomed to their quaint companion and friend, whom, in the privacy of their own rooms, Hetty still called "the Beast," but she used the name as a term of affection.

"If there is anything I can do for you in London I hope you will let me know," said Colonel Wyse, as he gave the address of his club to Mrs. Kerrhurst, who, with Hetty, was remaining on the Continent for another year. Mrs. Kerrhurst happened to say something about the pleasantness of returning home to England, and to the welcome of friends. "I have no friends who will be glad to see me, nobody cares whether I am in the country or out of it." It was said so sadly that it wrung Hetty's heart with pity. "After all, my mission has failed." She sighed to herself, for since many days she had observed that all the sad lines had come back, that the face wore a look of greater suffering than even before.

"Good-bye," said he, with one firm grip of her hand as the steamboat came plying across the lake from the opposite shore, and he managed to smile as he said it. But Hetty's face had lost all smiles. Passengers and luggage were conveyed on board from the little pier at the garden gates, the ropes were loosened and thrown on land, "A col·ico?" sounded the peculiarly accented familiar shout, and the boat pushed off. Hetty stood among the roses on the terrace and waved a farewell.

"Might I have succeeded?" Colonel Wyse asked himself afterwards, as he remembered her face, from which the sunshine had fled.

Good, generous old "Beast:" Rather than put her to the test—rather than sacrifice one so young and bright—he, who was so much older, so broken down in health and dismal, had resolved that he would go away before his feelings should deepen—would go away and leave her to a better fate.

Of course, he never guessed what a dreary place Hetty found the beautiful garden by the lakeside after he had gone, and how "unwarrantably sorry" (as she called it to herself) she felt for the next few days.

"I can never forget your kindness at Bellagio. I am going to try the climate of Algiers for the winter," said a letter dated from the United Service Club, which was received by Mrs. Kerrhurst in the following autumn.

Before the winter was ended Hetty had given her heart to someone who, to her mind, combined youth, and brains, and fun, and every other charm to be desired.

They were married in London during the season and went to Italy for their honeymoon.

"What are you reading?" Hetty's husband asked one morning.

Hetty was absorbed in an open letter, over which she had begun to laugh softly, and had just exclaimed, with fervent warmth, "I am glad—so very glad." In answer to the question, she looked up and explained.

"It is a letter inclosed by auntie. Come and read it too. It is from a friend auntie and I once made in our travels. He has written to her. He was lonely and very miserable. I tried to cheer him, but in the end I quite, quite failed."

The foreign letter-paper was principally filled with a long, well-written description of Algiers. The writer hoped Mrs. Kerrhurst and "Miss Douglas" were well—he was feeling much better himself. At the very end of the letter he said there was a small item of intelligence he wished to tell them—he was going to be married. To this bare news was added no detail whatsoever—only a few half-apologetic remarks; he feared that in his frail state of health it might be thought unfair, but he had not acted without full consideration, and he was weary of the selfish, profitless life he had been leading.

"It is the very best thing for him that could possibly have happened," wrote Hetty to Mrs. Kerrhurst; "but I must say it is the most surprising thing, and the last thing I should ever have expected to hear. I always thought he was a confirmed 'old bachelor.' Try to find out who his wife is to be and what she is like."

But there was no one to ask—there was no one who knew more about him than they knew themselves. All they could ever hear was through the same friends who had been at Bellagio. They once told Hetty they had met "her old beau" at Montreux, travelling with a wife who, although not a child like herself, was still young compared to him, but that he had become surprisingly young again himself, and looked surprisingly happy.

Hetty never found their descriptions of the wife satisfying to her curiosity. It is easy to say that So-and-so is "fair," "tall," "slight," "rather pretty," "seems to be musical"; but the same adjectives apply to other people, and out of them Hetty could not frame to her fancy a living character. She could only feel glad there was some one to make the lonely life happy at last.

As the years went by, Hetty quite lost sight of her strange friend of those few summer weeks on the Lake of Como; but she remembered him and them together, and it was with a touch of real regret that she heard, not long since, of his death. But she likes to think that the end had been brightened, and that in the final failing of strength, there had been one near with the right and power to help. She had longed to make him happier; and although she still believes that it was "quite, quite a failure," she rejoices that, in a better way than any she could ever have planned, a happier time did come.

But "auntie" has her own thoughts. She feels sure that one thing led to another—that the generous earnest efforts of those summer days were not thrown away—that it was an unconscious girl's sunny influence which had won a way through the fast-locked door of a heart which had isolated itself from all life's sweet links, and that it was the same influence which unintentionally had raised a longing for a better state, which afterwards was sought and found.

Eleanor L. de Butts.

Digitized by Google

How a Child Was Illegally Patented.

SOME time last winter a lady, whom we will call Mrs. Smith, took her little girl, aged four, with her to make a call on Mrs. Robinson, her near neighbour. Mrs. Robinson was busy in her kitchen, where she received her visitor with her usual cordiality.

There was a large fire blazing in the stove, and while the ladies were excitedly discussing the new bonnet of the local Methodist minister's wife, the little girl imprudently sat down on the stove-hearth. She was instantly convinced that the stove-hearth was exceedingly hot, and on loudly mentioning the fact was rescued by her mother and carried home for medical treatment.

A few days later Mrs. Smith burst in great excitement into the office of a young lawyer, and with tears and lamentations disclosed to him the fact that her child was indelibly branded with the legend, "Patented, September, 1892."

These words, in raised letters, had happened to occupy just that part of the stove-hearth upon which the child had seated herself, and, being heated almost to red-heat, they had reproduced themselves upon the surface of the unfortunate child.

The lawyer entered into the mother's sorrow with much sympathy, but, after he had in some degree calmed her mind, he informed her that a breach of the law had been committed.

"Your child," he remarked, "has never been patented, but she is, nevertheless, marked, 'Patented, September, 1892.' This is an infringement of the statute. You falsely represent by that brand that a child for whom no patent was ever issued is patented. This false representation is forgery, and subjects you to the penalties made and provided for that crime."

Mrs. Smith was, as may be supposed, greatly alarmed at hearing this statement, and her first impulse was to beg the young man to save her from a convict's cell. With a gravity suited to the occasion, he explained the whole law of patents. He told her that had she desired to patent the child she should have either constructed drawings with specifications, showing distinctly what parts of the child she claimed to have invented.

The model, or these drawings, she should have forwarded to the Patent Office, and she would then have received in due time a patent—provided, of course, the child was really patentable—and would have been authorised to label it, "Patented."

"Unfortunately," he pursued, "it is now too late to take this course, and we must boldly claim that a patent was issued, and has been in some unaccountable way lost in the Patent Office."

This suggestion cheered the spirits of Mrs. Smith, but they were again lowered by the further remarks of the young man. He reminded her that the child might find it very inconvenient to be patented.

"If we claim," he went on to say, "that she had been regularly patented, it follows that the ownership of the patent, including the child herself, belongs to you, and will pass at your death into the possession of your heirs. Holding this patent, they can prevent any husband from taking possession of the girl by marriage, and they can sell, assign, transfer, and set over the patent-right and the accompanying girl to any purchaser.

"If she is sold to a speculator, or to a joint-stock company, she will find her position a most unpleasant one. To sum up the case, madam, either your child is patented or she is not. If she is not patented, you are guilty of forgery. If she is patented, she is an object of barter and sale, or, in other words, a chattel."

This was certainly a wretched state of things, and Mrs. Smith, in order to ease her mind, began to abuse Mrs. Robinson, whose stove had branded the unfortunate little girl. She loudly insisted that the whole fault rested with Mrs. Robinson, and demanded to know if the latter could not be punished.

The young man, who was immensely learned in the law, thereupon began a new argument. He said that where there is a wrong there must be a remedy.

"Mrs. Robinson," he continued, "by means of her stove has done you a great wrong. In accordance with the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, Mrs. Robinson, and not the stove, is the party from whom you must demand redress. She has wickedly and maliciously branded your child, and thus rendered you liable for an infringement of the patent law.

"It is my opinion, madam, that an action for assault, and an action for libel will both lie against Mrs. Robinson, and that there is also ground for having her indicted for procurement of forgery."

Finally, after much further argument, the lawyer advised Mrs. Smith to apply to a magistrate and procure the arrest and punishment of Mrs. Robinson. Accordingly, Mrs. Smith applied to a magistrate, who, after vainly trying to comprehend the case, and to find out what was the precise crime alleged against Mrs. Robinson, compromised the matter by unofficially asking that lady to appear before him.

When both the ladies were in court, Mrs. Smith, prompted by the clerk, put in her complaint in the shape of a charge that Mrs. Robinson had feloniously branded the youthful Smith girl. The latter was then marked, "Exhibit A," and formally put in evidence, and both complainant and defendant told their respective stories. The result was that the court, in a very able and voluminous opinion, decided that nobody was guilty of anything, but that with a view of avoiding the penalty of infringing the patent law, Mrs. Smith must apply to Parliament for a special Act, declaring the child legally and regularly patented. If Parliament finds time to attend to this important matter, little Miss Smith will be the first girl ever patented, and the legal profession in all English-speaking countries will watch with unflagging interest the lawsuits to which in future any infringement of the patent may lead.

W. E. PARSONS.

Digitized by Google

A REGULAR MESS.

SOME six years back in the beautiful village of Minoge, an old lady kept the big tea-house of the place known as the "White Pine."

Minoge is situated at the base of the holy mountain Oyama, and during the months of August and September trade in Minoge was always brisk, on account of the influx of pilgrims from all parts of Japan, who came hither to perform the holy duty of ascending the mountain, and of paying their devoirs at the shrine of the Thunder-God, previous to making the grand pilgrimage of Fuji-Yama.

The old lady was well off, and her inn bore an unblemished reputation of possessing the prettiest serving-girls, the gayest guest-chambers, and the primest stewed eels—the dish par excellence of Japanese gourmets—of any hostelry in the country side. One of her daughters was married in Yeddo, and a son was studying in one of the European colleges of that city; still she was as completely rustic and unacquainted with the march of affairs outside as if she had never heard of Yeddo, much less of foreigners. At that time it was a very rare thing indeed, for a foreigner to be seen in Minoge, and the stray artists and explorers who had wandered there were regarded much in the same way as would have been so many white elephants.

It caused, therefore, no little excitement in the village when, one fine autumn evening, the rumour came along that a foreigner was making his way towards the "White Pine."

Everyone tried to get a glimpse of him. The chubby-cheeked boys and girls at school threw down their books and pens, and crowded to the door and windows; the bath-house was soon empty of its patrons and patronesses, who, red as lobsters with boiling water, and dishevelled locks and garments hastily bound round them, formed line outside; the very Yakunin, or mayor, sentenced a prisoner he was judging straight off, without bothering himself to inquire into evidence, so as not to be baulked of the sight, and every wine and barber's shop sent forth its quota of starers into the little street.

Meanwhile the foreigner was leisurely striding along. He was taller by far than the tallest man in Minoge, his hair was fair, and even his bronzed face and hands were fair compared to those of the natives. On the back of his head was a felt wide-awake, he wore a blue jacket and blue half-trousers (Anglice, knickerbockers), thick hose, and big boots. In his mouth was a pipe—being much shorter than Japanese smoking tubes—in his hand a stick, and on his back a satchel.

As he passed, one or two urchins, bolder than the rest, shouted out "Tojin baka" ("Foreign beast") and instantly fled indoors, or behind their mothers' skirts; but the majority of the villagers simply stared, with an occasional interjection expressive of wonder at his height, fair hair, and costume.

At the door of the "White Pine" he halted, unstrapped his bundle, took off his boots, and in very fair Japanese requested to be shown to his room. The old lady, after a full ten minutes' posturing, complimenting, bowing, and scraping, ushered him into her best guest-chamber. "For," she said, "being a foreigner, he must be rich, and wouldn't like ordinary pilgrim accommodation." And she drew to the sliding screens, and went off to superintend his repast. Although nothing but the foreigner's boots were to be seen outside, a gaping crowd had collected, striving to peer through the cracks in the doors, and regarding the boots as if they were infernal machines. One, more enterprising than the rest, took a boot up, passed it to his neighbour, and in a short time it had circulated from hand to hand throughout the population of Minoge, and was even felt and pinched by the mayor himself, who replaced it with the reverence due to some religious emblem or relic.

Then the hostess served up her banquet—seaweed, sweets, raw "tighe"—the salmon of Japan—in slices, garnished with turnips and horse-radish, egg soup with pork lumps floating in it, chicken delicately broiled, together with a steaming bottle of her choicest "San Toku Shiu," or wine of the Three Virtues (which keeps out the cold, appeases hunger, and induces sleep).

The foreigner made an excellent meal, eked out by his own white bread, and wine from a flask of pure silver, then, lighting his pipe, reclined at full length on the mats, talking to the old lady and her three damsels, O Hana, O Kiku, and O Riu (Miss Flower, Miss Chrysanthemum, and Miss Dragon). He was walking about the country simply for pleasure, he said—which astonished the women greatly—he had been away from Yokohama three weeks, and was now on his road to the big mountain.

The party were soon screaming with laughter at his quaint remarks, and at his occasional colloquial slips, and in a short time all were such good friends that the old lady begged him to display the contents of his satchel.

"Certainly," said the stranger, pulling it towards him and opening it.

A dirty flannel shirt or two didn't produce much impression—perhaps wares of a similar nature had been imported before into Minoge—nor did a hairbrush, tooth-brush, and comb; but when he pulled out a pistol, which was warranted to go off six times in as many seconds, and proceeded to exemplify the same in the air, popular excitement began to assert itself in a series of "naruhodas" ("really!")

Digitized by Google

Then he pulled a portable kerosene lamp (kerosene lamps are now as common in Japan as shrines by the road side) and the light it made, throwing entirely into the shade the native "andon," or oil wick, burning close by, raised the enthusiasm still higher. Lastly, he showed a small box of medicines, "certain cures," said he, "for every disease known amongst the sons of men."

The old lady and maids were enchanted, and matters ended, after much haggling and disputation, in the foreigner allowing them to keep the three articles for the sum of fifty dollars—about fifteen pounds sterling—which was handed over to him, after which who called for his bedding and went fast to sleep.

The first thing for the old lady to do the next day was to present herself and maids in full holiday costume with their recent purchases at the house of the mayor. The great man received them and their goods with the dignity befitting his rank, and promised that a public trial should be made of the pistol, lamp and medicines, at an early date, in order to determine whether they were worthy to be adopted as institutions in the village.

Accordingly, by proclamation, at a fixed date and hour, all Minoge assembled in the open space facing the mayor's house, and the articles were brought forth. The pistol was first taken and loaded as directed by the foreigner, by the boldest and strongest man in the village. The first shot was fired—it wounded a packhorse, standing some twenty yards away, in the leg; he took fright and bolted with a heavy load of wine tubs down the street into the fields; the second shot went through a temple roof opposite, and shattered the head of the deity in the shrine; the third shot perforated the bamboo hat of a pilgrim; and it was decided not to test the remaining three barrels.

Then the lamp was brought forth; the wick was turned up full, and the village man applied a light. The blaze of light was glorious, and drew forth acclamations of the crowd; but the wick had been turned up too high, the glass burst with a tremendous report, the strong man dropped the lamp, the oil ignited, ran about and set fire to the matting. In ten minutes, however, the local fire brigade got the flames under, and the experiments proceeded.

The medicine packets were brought forth. The first was a grey powder. A man who had been lame from youth upwards was made to limp out. The powder mixed with water, according to directions, was given him. He hobbled away in frightful convulsions, and nearly injured his whole limb in so doing.

The second packet was then unsealed—it contained pills. A blind man was called out, six pills were rammed down his throat, and he was left wallowing in a ditch.

The third packet, a small book containing sticking-plaster, was then introduced. A burly peasant, a victim to fearful toothache, was made to stand forth. The interior of his mouth was lined with the plaster, and when he attempted in his disgust to pull it off, away came his skin also.

The medicines were condemned nem. con.

The foreigner returned, asked how matters had gone, and was told in polite but firm terms that his machines were not suited to the people of Minoge. Wherefore he returned the fifty dollars to the old lady of the "White Pine," and went away laughing. Minoge subsided into its ordinary every-day groove of life, and it was not until some years after that the inhabitants became better used to pistols, lamps, and European medicines.

Frank Abell.

Over Five Hundred Hospitals

and kindred public institutions, including all the most important in the United Kingdom, are regular users of Bovril. Such a practical public endorsement is conclusive evidence of the absolute purity of Bovril, and of its great value as a nourishing stimulant in convalescence.

Digitized by Google

The Value of a £10 Note.

It was Saturday afternoon, and Mrs. Moore was tidying up the kitchen for her husband's return from the City. Their home was a small house in a narrow street, but the autumn sunshine beamed in at the little window through the broad, brown leaves and scarlet flowers of a begonia, and the table was spread with a snowy cloth; a green glass vase filled with crimson and yellow dahlias was in the centre.

Mrs. Moore was fond of bright colours and cheerful things. She was a pretty young woman, with large, dark eyes, thick, waving brown hair, and a firm mouth and chin. She had come, an orphan, from a country home to lodgings in the City and to a post behind the "fancy counter" in Messrs. Rawlins and Cosgrove's.

Going to and from her work she had met with strange regularity a certain fair young man with large blue eyes. She thought he looked as if he had come, like herself, from the country, and she grew to feel a friendly interest in him. The street seemed, somehow, empty in the chill morning hours if she did not see his tall figure swinging along. They met at the house of one of her friends—they had no relatives to counsel wisdom—and, after a brief wooing, they rushed into unconsidered marriage without much visible means of support.

He was bookkeeper to a wealthy druggist in the City, but his salary was small, and called for the closest economy. He would have liked to see his pretty, dainty wife in a suburban cottage among the flowers she loved and with congenial neighbours, but he could afford only the little house in Mendip Street. The neighbours there looked askance at the young couple, and shook their heads as they peeped in at the pots of flowers and the kitchen, so spotless with its hearthrug and easy chairs. They knew, poor souls, the depressing hand of poverty, and how courage ebbs, and dainty ways change to slatternly under its icy touch.

Mrs. Moore sang to herself that afternoon for she felt in good spirits. Jim had bought her a new dress and an autumn mantle, and he had planned to take her a trip to the seaside, for the doctor said she should have change of air.

She had just begun to dust carefully a little china dog that sat on the chimney-piece when a familiar step sounded on the cobble stones of the street, and Jim came in and clasped her in his arms. He was her lover still though he had been nine months her husband. She looked at him keenly; something was wrong. The instinct of love had noted a weariness in his step and something wanting in the greeting.

"Are you ill, Jim?" she asked anxiously. "What has happened?"

He flung himself into a chair with a smothered groan, his lips quivered under his fair moustache, and he rested his elbows on his knees and buried his face in his hands.

"The worst has happened, Grace," he said in a dreary tone.

She turned pale as death, for she was not strong, and the shock was almost too much for her; but she was a dauntless little woman, and the braver of the two, so she laid her hand on his shoulder, giving it an impatient shake.

"Tell me, Jim—tell me at once," she commanded. "I can bear anything but to see you give way like that."

And with sobs and broken words he told the tale. He had wanted so much to give her a treat of some sort. Life was so dull for her in that sordid street, but there was no money past the daily needs. A fellow in the shop had made a lucky speculation and could put him in the way to do the same if only he had the money.

A gentleman had come in to pay an account of ten pounds. He had been in a hurry, gave the bookkeeper the money, and would not wait for a receipt. Moore turned up the books to mark the bill paid, but by some strange oversight, probably in a brief absence of his, the account had not been entered. A sudden temptation seized him. Ten pounds would do so much—a new dress for Grace, and, if that tip of Morton's proved a hit, a seaside outing for her. He hesitated, listening for a moment to his better angel, and then—he pocketed the money.

As ill-luck would have it an old clerk of Mr. Haslam's had guessed the transaction. He hinted it to his master, and Jim had been sent for that morning. Mr. Haslam was a rigid, upright man, with a strong regard for money and an indisposition to lose it. His heart smote him a little as he looked at the young face, grown so deathly pale, and the weak, trembling mouth, but he spoke sternly:

"If you can produce that ten pounds by Monday morning you may return to the office, for it may be that you have succumbed to some sudden temptation; but if not, you are dismissed from my employment."

Mr. Haslam was a wise man. It was better to make him produce the money rather than make the matter public property in the police courts.

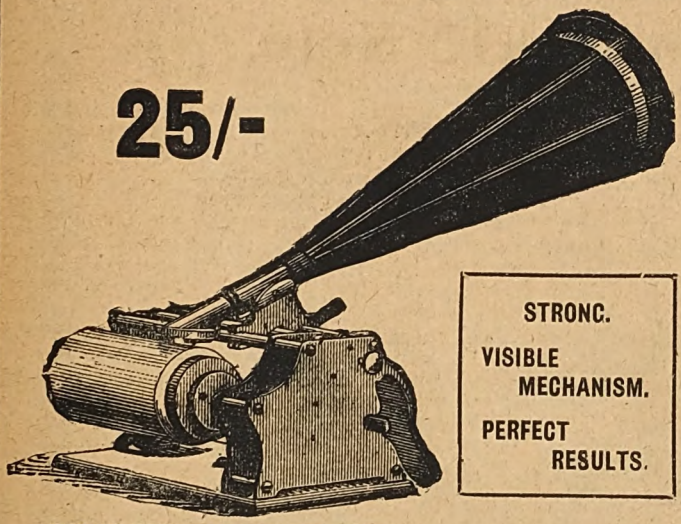
Slow, hot tears fell from Jim Moore's eyes as the story ended. There was silence in the little kitchen for a time save for the ticking of the gay gilded clock on the chimney-piece, a wedding present from Jim's friends in the shop.

"And so, Grace," he said at last, "you see we are ruined. Of course, I meant to pay it back by degrees; it was only a loan. I tried to tell him so, but he would not listen; he must have it back or I must go. It would 'prove a salutary lesson,' he said. Probably," he added recklessly, "the last I shall ever learn."

Digitized by Google

A GRAPHOPHONE FOR 25/-

25/-



Reproduces Same Records as all Small Cylinder Talking Machines.

Makes Music in the Home, and is an Inexhaustible Source of Amusement and Pleasure.

STRONG.
VISIBLE MECHANISM.
PERFECT RESULTS.

The pleasure in owning a Graphophone is largely increased by being able to make and reproduce your own records. The Graphophone will record your own voice as well as reproduce specially prepared records.

Graphophones are sold from 25s. upwards.

The Toy Graphophone for Children, 8s.

GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION.

Send for Catalogue C. to

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Genl., 122 Oxford Street, London, W.

TO STAMP COLLECTORS.

"S.S." PACKET. 125 STAMPS. POST FREE, 6½d.
Including Rare ORANGE RIVER COLONY, NEW ISSUE, ½d. GREEN, Surcharged on CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.
Western Australia (Swan)—New Issue, Jamaica, 1900 (View of Llandovery Falls)—U.S. of America (Warship)—Uruguay, 5 cents (Railway Engine)—Surcharged Siam—State of N Borneo, 3 cents (Tree)—Etc., etc.—ERNEST WOOD, Stamp Importer, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, MANCHESTER.

PIANO PLAYING BY EAR.

ARTHUR'S "HARMONIC INDICATOR."!!

This wonderful invention enables anyone, even if ignorant of music, to VAMP brilliantly on the Piano or organ to Songs, Waltzes, &c., in any key. No figures nor notes to learn! Beautiful effects. Everyone delighted! Post paid 1s. 7d.—C. E. ARTHUR, 7 Harrington Street, London, N.W.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.
GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

RUPTURE

Gentleman (cured himself) will send Free Particulars of inexpensive self-curative treatment. Stamped address.—(Box 49), 59 Castle Street, Carlisle.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

Digitized by Google

She stooped and kissed his burning brow.

"Why, Jim, we have each other, and we shall find a way out of this. You—you have some left, have you not?"

"No, Grace. I gave it to Morton, and now it seems this great hit of his is not going to come off for me."

"I am not sorry for that, dear. I would rather bear poverty than see you a gambler."

She looked round the kitchen. Her country training had imbued her with a horror of the pawn-office, but at all risks Jim must be saved.

"Paper, mem!" said a shrill voice at the door. It was the newsboy with the early edition of the halfpenny newspaper. She took it from him, giving it to her husband. He always read the news over his dinner, but he flung it aside now impatiently, and it fell on the floor.

She picked it up and folded it; she could not bear to see things lying untidily around. Her eye caught an advertisement in large type, and the fateful words "Ten Pounds." It was a notice of some sports, and one of Pearson's men was to be there with a Ten-Pound Note.

A sudden resolution seized her; she would put providence to the test. Her instinct was keen, and she thought it was a chance worth trying. She said nothing of it to her husband, it might be only raising false hopes; and, if it failed, there was still the pawnshop, and perhaps Mrs. Mooney would go there for her. Poor Mrs. Mooney, with nine children and a drunken husband, was no stranger to that friend in need.

Jim did not eat any of the appetising little dinner she had taken so much trouble to prepare, and when the cloth was removed he complained of a racking headache and went to lie down on the bed. He lay with his face to the wall like Ahab of old, and he took no notice of his wife putting on her outdoor garments. She was not one of those women who dress gaily before marriage and become slatterns after. Her pretty colour had paled, and her dark eyes looked strained and feverish, but her cloak was put on with care, and the little toque that rested on her bright brown hair was as becoming as her deft hands could make it.

Vehicles were rolling in a constant, noisy stream to the scene of the sports. She stopped at a news-shop and bought a copy of Pearson's Weekly. The tramcars were full, so she walked on till she reached the play grounds. She stationed herself at a post of observation where she could see all the passers in and out, and there she stood all the chill autumn afternoon.

People looked at her curiously. What was that pretty young woman doing there? they wondered. Waiting for her sweetheart coming out, no doubt. Ah, the old story.

One man, dressed like a gentleman, whispered in her ear. She blushed a burning blush, and a rush of tears came to her eyes. He had the grace to beg her pardon and pass on.

A stout farmer, with a long brown beard, stopped on his homeward way, and alighting from his spring-cart, stood watching the crowd.

"Come away, my dear," he said to her. "This is no place for one like you. I have girls of my own. Tell me where you live and I will drive you home."

But she thanked him gently in refusal. She had noticed several men, anyone of whom might have what she wanted, and she had been on the point of accosting them, but hesitated. She was getting weary and discouraged. After all, it was a wild-goose chase, and Jim would wonder what had become of her. Just then a man passed her among the crowd. He was in no wise remarkable, but some intuition told her to try him. She held out her paper in front of him.

"Have you the Ten-Pound Note?" she asked.

A burst of laughter from some boys near sent a crimson colour over her pale, tired face.

The man stopped, put his hand in his pocket, drew out something, and handed it to her.

She grasped it eagerly. It was what she had waited for. Jim was saved! A mist came before her eyes, and she felt as if she were fainting. The farmer had been watching her, and he came forward again.

"Now, you will let me drive you home."

She turned to him gratefully and he put her in his spring-cart, wrapping his rug round her knees. It was not his way home, but he was a man who counted it no hardship to do a kind turn to another. She told him as much of her need as she could without betraying her husband, and he wrung her hand so that she winced with pain as he helped her down at her own street. She would not let him drive to the door lest Jim should be frightened.

"Good-bye and good luck to you, missis," said her friend. "Ye're as plucky as ye're han'some, an' there's few men worthy of the like of you."

The strain over, she felt her knees giving way, and she could scarcely reach the bedroom door. She went softly for Jim might be sleeping, and she would not wake him. A low cry of horror burst from her as she thrust the door ajar. He was standing in his shirt sleeves in front of the little mirror that she had draped so neatly with muslin and pink ribbon bows. His eyes were wild, his face ghastly pale, and his throat was bared. In his uplifted hand he held an open razor. She rushed forward and dashed the razor from his grasp. He turned upon her angrily.

"Oh, Jim! Jim!" she cried. "Would you leave me so—alone?" and fell fainting at his feet.

There was panic and anxiety in the Moores' house that night. Mrs. Mooney came in with her motherly solicitude and large knowledge of such a crisis, and ere morning dawned a little life had come into this world of care and sin, flickered a moment, and gone back again to the world of light.

Jim Moore stooped over the little waxen form in the dainty cradle into whose adornment so many loving thoughts had woven themselves, and sobs shook his frame.

"Oh, Grace, darling," he cried, "you have lost your little baby, and I have killed him!"

"No, no. Don't fret, Jim," she said faintly. "I saved my husband."

And then Mrs. Mooney, with strong, common sense, came, and taking him by the shoulders, thrust him out of the room.

"Man, dear," she exclaimed, "where's your wits at all? Do ye mane to lose yer wife as well as yer wean?"

The ten pounds was paid in on Monday morning, and Mr. Haslam, who had some compunction in the matter, took the advice of his old clerk, a man who had himself known poverty and its temptations, and raised Jim Moore's salary. Mr. Haslam was an old bachelor, and he agreed crustily to the clerk's suggestion.

"If the fellow has been the fool to burden himself with a wife at his age," he said, "I need not run the risk of his robbing me to keep her up."

Evan Roberts.

Digitized by Google

THE John Noble

COSTUMES and MANTLES for Ladies and Children sent without delay by Parcel Post. Satisfaction given or money refunded.

MOURNING ORDERS sent off at one day's notice.

Model 256.

Made in John Noble Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating, consisting of smart Bodice with velvet revers, prettily trimmed Black and White. Plain fashionable Skirt with one box-pleat. Price complete, only 10/6; carriage, 6d. extra. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d. extra.

10/6

Model 296.

Smartly made Dress in Cheviot Serge or Costume Coating. Bodice trimmed Ribbon Velvet and well lined. Full Tailor Skirt.

Lengths and Prices:

36	39	42	46	50 in.
10/-	11/-	12/-	13/-	14/- ea.

Carriage, 6d. extra.

Well-trimmed, Felt Hat, as sketch, 5/11; carriage, 5d.

SMART SAC JACKET.

Special Value.

Model 274

Well-cut comfortable garment in good Black or Fawn Cloth, velvet collar. Length 30in. Price only 8/6; car., 6d. Handsome Toque, as sketch, 6/11; carriage, 6d.

8/6

Model 313.

Tailor designed Reefer Coat and full wide Skirt, in Cheviot Serge, or Costume Coating. Price 10/6; carriage, 6d. Or the Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d. Handsome Toque, as sketch, 8/11; carriage, 6d.

10/6

PATTERNS of Cheviot Serge, Costume Coating, and any other fabrics desired, sent post free. A FULL DRESS LENGTH of Serge or Coating (6yds. 52ins. wide) for 7/6; carriage, 8d.

COLOURS.—Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Fawn, Khaki, Grey, and Royal Blue. SIZES IN STOCK of Ladies' Costumes are 34, 36, 38 in. round bust (under arms); Waists, 24, 26, 28 in.; Skirts being 38, 40, 42 in. long in front. Any other sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

MILLINERY AT WHOLESALE PRICES.

TRAVELLING HATS,
VISITING HATS,
DAINTY BONNETS.

Photo Price Lists sent post free.

SPECIAL VALUES in Corsets, Waterproofs, Children's Costumes, &c.

WINTER DRESS FABRICS.

A large box of Patterns of the latest Novelties and of Standard Dress Goods lent to choose from, and sent carriage free.

PHOTO PRICE LISTS SENT POST FREE.

Showing Costumes, Mantles, Waterproofs, Blouses, Laces and Fancy Handkerchiefs, SUITABLE FOR GIFTS DURING THE FESTIVE SEASON.

Kindly name "SHORT STORIES" when writing

JOHN NOBLE LTD.,

Dept. No. 46,
Brook Street Mills,

MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL PICTURE PUZZLES.

2nd LIST. £100 IN PRIZES. 2nd LIST.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

2nd Prize - - - - £10 Note | 6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes | 21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a well-known football player.

If you cannot find all the names, ask your friends to help you.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Maxwell. What are the other names?

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the player you believe the picture to represent. Then keep the list by you until TWO other lists have appeared. We will tell you when to send them in.

Each set of four lists must be sent in separate envelopes, and will be considered as different attempts.

Only one solution is allowed under each picture.

Where two men bear the same surname, but different christian names, the christian name or initial is indicated in the picture.

Example.

Maxwell.

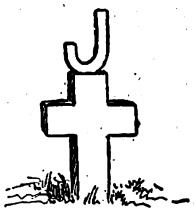
The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

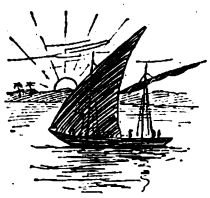
It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 11.....



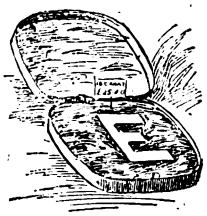
No. 12.....



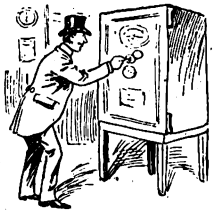
No. 13.....

No. 14.....

No. 15.....

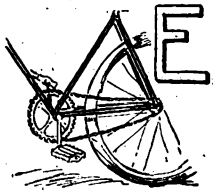


No. 16.....



No. 17.....

No. 18.....



No. 19.....

No. 20.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SEND NO MONEY. WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.

£2 10s. £2 10s.
REAL SILVER.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

Just send us a STAMPED ADDRESSED ENVELOPE, and say that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

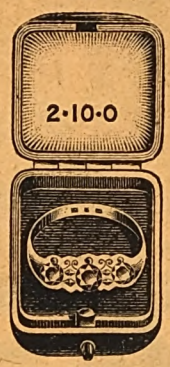
When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you, Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE TO-DAY.

FREE.



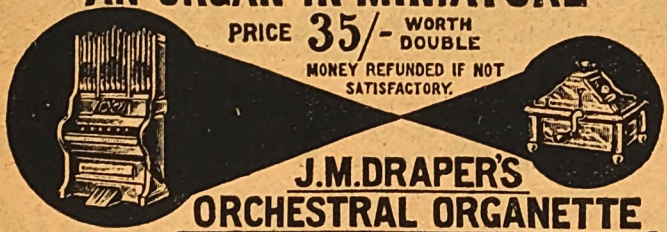
REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS' CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

AN ORGAN IN MINIATURE

PRICE 35/- WORTH DOUBLE

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY.



J.M.DRAPER'S ORCHESTRAL ORGANETTE

The "ORCHESTRAL" does all that a piano can do. Any and every tune can be played upon it, and it requires no teaching or practice. A child can play it at sight, and produce results that equal the efforts of the most brilliant musician.

Also Supplied on Easy Terms.

FREE TO YOU upon application our new Buyers' Guide and Catalogue of Watches, Jewellery, Plate, Cutlery, &c. Should be in every householder's hand.

Built upon the principle of the finest Cathedral Organs, and possessing 2 full sets of reeds and 3 beautiful stops, the "ORCHESTRAL" is an ideal instrument for home use, for parties and gatherings of all kinds. J. M. DRAPER, DEPT. 366, Organette Works. BLACKBURN.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief: if you suffer from cough try them but once; they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s½d. tins.

Free

From the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W., if this paper is named, a booklet on the Skin and a FREE SAMPLE of

"Antexema."

It is absolutely the most wonderful Skin Cure that has ever been discovered. It gives immediate relief from itching and burning and cures all skin diseases and every form of Eczema.

1/1½ BOTTLES, post free for 1/3.

A FREE GIFT.

500 40-EGG INCUBATORS.

Ladies and Gentlemen can greatly increase their incomes by POULTRY BREEDING, thus converting 1d. Eggs into 1s. Chickens. To encourage this industry we intend supplying each applicant during the next 28 days with one of our 40-Egg Incubators.

Write for Free Gift Form to POULTRY-BREEDERS' APPLIANCE CO., 3 Clarence Road, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.,
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

FREE. FREE. NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL

VELVETEEN?

Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

ZEBRA

Grate Polish

No Hard Work.

Height 12in. Width 7in. Depth 5in.

ALARUM CLOCK, 18/-

Brass Flag.

Carved Oak Battlement.

Enamel Dial.

"Hour," "Minute," "Seconds," "Alarum" HANDS.

Polished Brass Mounts

Real Oak Case.

A FREE TRIAL FOR 2/6

"THE COURT JOURNAL" says: "THE FORTRESS CLOCK sold by J. N. MASTERS LTD., RYE, is substantial, of original design, has a loud ALARUM, and is really a reliable clock."

Any reader of Short Stories can have one of these Alarum Clocks on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2s. 6d. with your name and address, and we will send you one on approbation.

IF you approve of it you send us 3s. 6d. on receipt, and 2s. 6d. each month for 5 months, making the full 18s. But

OUR-NETT-CASH-PRICE-WITH-ORDER IS 16/- ONLY.

IF you do not approve of it we will refund cash sent if the Clock is returned within seven days.

SPECIAL XMAS BOOKLET

This Presentation Booklet is now ready; it contains many pages of interesting matter, including illustrations of hundred of the latest and most suitable Christmas and New Year presents. It gives you full particulars of J. N. MASTERS Ltd. Cash Present to each customer, and Free distribution of 150,000 valuable pencil cases. May we send you a copy? If so, your name and address, please. We send it post free.

J. N. MASTERS Ltd., WATCHMAKERS, JEWELLERS, &c., RYE, SUSSEX.

Digitized by Google

GRAND CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 625. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 22ND, 1900. [TWOPENCE.

"Absolutely Pure therefore Best."

CADBURY'S

COCOA

"A PERFECT FOOD."

The Editor of THE LANCET, June 16th, 1900, says:

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to cocoa of certain foreign substances. This resource is quite unnecessary, and, indeed, pernicious, especially having regard to the fact that cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."

CADBURY'S IS THE PURE COCOA.

Entirely Free from Drugs, Kola, Malt, or Hops.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery
"TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4/6 SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the Hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself. Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

THE GEO. R. SIMS' COMPANY HAVE DECIDED TO DISTRIBUTE

20,000 LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON. S.S. Dec. 22, 1900.

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/10. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO" POST PAID, which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

Shilling packets
Kaputine "the" safe
Remedy for Headache

WARNING. Instead of using the common White Headache Powders, which generally consist entirely of a crude drug, which has been condemned as dangerous by the medical papers, insist on having a bona-fide anti-quack remedy, recommended by such eminent medical authorities as Dr. RAMAGE, L.R.C.P., Dr. THURSTIN, L.R.C.P., late Dr. BOYD-WILLIAMS (Liverpool), the Editor of the Medical Journal, "Health," etc., etc. The name of this safe remedy is KAPUTINE.

ALL LEADING CHEMISTS SELL IT, OR CAN GET IT FOR YOU IN A FEW HOURS.

Sold by BOOT'S, TAYLOR'S, DAY'S, WHITE'S and other Stores. Most Co-operative Stores sell it.

PACKETS, 1/-. SAMPLES ONE PENNY,

or KAPUTINE LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD,
will send it FREE for 12 stamps.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money. Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, which-ever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 6), 233 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. Assorted sample boxes, 6d., to be obtained from all Stationers. If out of stock, send 7 stamps direct to the works, Birmingham.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Christmas Double Number.

SHORT STORIES.

No. 625.] For the Week Ending December 22nd, 1900. [TWOPENCE.

A Near Thing

By GERTRUDE PAGE.

Author of "There is No If," "The Night of the Ball," etc., etc.

WHEN a man has lost five hundred pounds through an unlucky speculation, has had his head-clerk set up for himself in opposition to him, and has heard that the old bachelor uncle, from whom he had expectations, is thinking of getting married, he is not likely to feel very jovial, even when starting on his holiday. All this, to say nothing of minor worries, had happened to Ted Hall in the week preceding Christmas, and when on December 24th, he drove through a cutting east wind to the station, his state of mind was neither amiable nor enviable.

"First single to Wilstead," he said gruffly at the ticket-office, regarding the clerk with a somewhat injured air, as if he were fixing a destination to please him, very much against his wish. Afterwards he looked at the ticket in much the same way.

"What the dickens Anderson wanted to choose a hydro for I can't imagine," he muttered. "Of all the idiotic places! He might just as well have gone to a lunatic asylum."

A girl hurried past him, and, catching her foot or skirt against his stick, knocked it down.

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" she exclaimed, stopping a second, and flashing a pair of bright eyes in his face. Then she rushed on after a porter.

"You must be sure and see it put in yourself," he heard her exclaim; "if I arrive to-night without my box I'm sure there'll be a tragedy."

"All right, miss, I'll see to it," the man replied laughingly, and the girl laughed, too. In fact, nearly everyone on the station was laughing more or less, for it was Christmas Eve, and even railway porters, and bustling travellers, and tired parents with babies generally manage to be cheerful on that auspicious occasion.

All except "Ted Halls," who have a whole list of grievances, and feel the world and everyone in it is against them.

"Silly idiot!" he grumbled. "I wish she'd look where she's going, instead of fussing so about her precious box. I'm certain to lose the silver cap now; it was loose before," and he examined his stick moodily.

The train was standing in the station, and after selecting a smoking compartment, and throwing his rug into a corner, he tucked his hands in his overcoat pockets, and strolled up and down.

Presently the bright-eyed girl walked briskly along the platform. As she passed him, she looked into his face, and Ted felt annoyed. He didn't actually scowl, but he felt very much inclined to. He looked sufficiently haughty, however, to tickle Jill Haslam's fancy, and when she had likewise placed her rug in a corner seat, she tucked her hands in her muff and strolled out on to the platform, with a vague idea of annoying him if possible, out of pure mischief. She wondered if he had taken a seat yet, thinking it would be rather fun if he got into her carriage without knowing it, as he was evidently very vexed with her for knocking his stick over, and very cross generally.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

When she repassed him, she resolutely looked in the opposite direction; but a few paces further on she turned suddenly, and found he had done the same,

"Thank you," she replied shortly, and placed the shilling on the seat beside her.

which was just what she wanted, as she felt certain it would irritate him.

He struck her as fancying himself very much, seeing he was exceedingly well-dressed and groomed, and very good-looking; and conceited men were Jill's pet aversion. She could never resist a possible opportunity of annoying them.

She was not able to give him any more of her attention however, as she was expecting two brothers to join her, if they could catch the train, and was eagerly on the look-out for them. When the guard came to see the tickets they had not arrived, so she was reluctantly obliged to take her seat and start without them.

Ted Hall thought she was rather forward to remain on the platform watching the passengers, and took his seat with a vague thanksgiving that there were smokers for men.

"I shouldn't wonder if she isn't going to the Hydro," he mused gloomily, "she's just the kind of girl one meets there. Can't think what Anderson was dreaming of. Wish I hadn't promised to join him."

He took out a letter and glanced at the end, where a sentence ran: "Wilstead's a grand place, you're sure to like it. Good dancing and excellent links. I know a very jolly girl going, who is the best dancer in Shrewsbury, and she is sure to know others."

"A nice lot they'll be I expect," he mused. "Beastly matrimonial agencies, that's what hydros are."

His ill-luck seemed to dog him, for at the first station they stopped at, four noisy youths got into his carriage, and made it impossible for him to read.

When they commenced singing comic songs he lost his patience and scowled at them. The train was then in another station, and on one of them making a personal and impudent remark, he calmly gathered up his belongings and stepped out, making for the nearest compartment, which happened to be Jill's. At the moment he had forgotten her, and his feelings were not soothed when he recognised his companion.

"He looks as cross as a bear," was Jill's mental summing-up, and she dived into her book again.

Now it happened Jill Haslam was not a very clever traveller. She was one of those passengers who always imagine they ought to be changing, or that they are in the wrong train, and, in consequence, she occasionally got a little flurried.

This was the case when she suddenly thought she heard a porter call "Lichfield." She had been told she might have to change there, and she was in a terrible fright that she had remained quietly reading when she ought to be getting out. She sprang up and looked from the window, but no one was at hand, so in her extremity she turned hastily to Ted Hall and said:

"Could you tell me if this is Lichfield?"

Hall was still feeling very ruffled, and he replied a little testily:

"I really don't know."

Just then a porter came along, and Jill was reassured, so with a cutting glance at her companion, who was now stolidly reading, she reseated herself with a feeling of bitter resentment because of his rudeness.

When the train stopped again, however, as if from a feeling of compunction, he remarked:

"Was it Redfield you wanted, because I think this is it?"

"No, thank you," she replied very haughtily, and the enmity became mutual.

But fate had not done with them yet, for at the next station a boy with a large truck of single cups of tea stood a few yards distant from their carriage. Hall opened the window and shouted for one. When the boy brought it, Jill quietly ordered another for herself, and Hall at once, though very stiffly, offered her his Jill hesitated, and then stiffly accepted it. When the boy brought the second there was no time to spare, and while she was trying to ask him how much it was, Hall gave him a shilling and held out his hand for the change.

"It's all right," said the boy, pocketing the shilling, and the train moved slowly away.

Jill glared at his retreating figure, and Hall scowled at his paper, but nothing could alter the fact that he had paid for her tea, and they had been taken as belonging to each other.

"I have only a shilling," she said frigidly, holding the coin out to him.

"I'm afraid I have no change," he replied, without meeting her eyes.

Jill grew exasperated.

"Then you must take it all," she said, still holding the coin before him.

He looked at her a moment, and was about to say it didn't signify, but wisely changed his mind.

"Perhaps I can change it at the next station," he said instead.

"Thank you," she replied shortly, and placed the shilling on the seat beside her, directly under his eyes.

Hall called the boy a fool under his breath and returned to his paper.

The next station chanced to be Lichfield, and they both alighted. To Jill's relief, a newspaper boy stood close at hand, so she was able to change the money herself, and hand him his sixpence, without any further need of speech, hurrying away directly.

"Of all the rude men!" she muttered, as she once more settled herself in a comfortable corner and tucked her rug round her.

Digitized by Google

She was still thinking about him when she took her seat in the Hydro omnibus, and wondered a little why he was so cross. There were no other passengers, so she was congratulating herself upon getting away quickly, and possibly getting dressed in time for dinner.

But just as the coachman whipped up his horse, a porter shouted, "Hi! wait a moment! Passenger for the Hydro!" and as the 'bus stopped with a jerk, the door was hastily opened, and Hall scrambled in, the porter slamming the door behind him, and the horse starting off at a brisk pace.

Jill had a keen sense of humour, and her first impulse was to burst out laughing. But she was also very angry with him, and instead she carefully turned her head away and stared out into the night.

She would no doubt have congratulated herself warmly upon her action had she known he was inwardly remarking with disgust, "Of course—just the hydro class—as I thought!"

When they arrived, he sprang out first, because he was next to the door, and as the hall-porter stood waiting to take her wraps, he ran up the steps at once.

In the doorway a tall, fair girl stood watching eagerly, and when she saw Jill she exclaimed:

"Come along! How late you are! I've been watching ever so long. Where are the boys?"

"I waited on purpose for them," Jill replied, after greeting her, "and then the sillies went and missed the train. They won't get here until ten now; too late to dance. I wish I'd never waited."

"So do I; we've had such a jolly afternoon on the ice. But come along and dress; you'll have to hurry tremendously. We've got a lovely big room, and mother is just down the passage. We're going to have no end of a time."

"What a good-looking man that was who came up in the 'bus with you!" she continued, when they reached their room. "Do you know who he is?"

"No, and I don't want to, the rude thing! He got in at Shrewsbury. Did you ever see such a scowl? And he might be the Prince of Wales, the way he fancies himself. We travelled part of the way together; but I'll tell you about it afterwards. I shall have to hurry frightfully now."

"I suppose Will Anderson has come?" she said, as they went down the wide staircase together to the dining-hall.

"Yes, rather; and he's in great form. He came yesterday to help arrange the tableaux for Thursday. He's got a friend coming who is an excellent dancer; isn't it jolly? The floor is splendid; we tried it this morning."

At the foot of the stairs, one of two men who appeared to be making inquiries at the office, suddenly turned away and met the two girls face to face.

"Jill, by all that's good!" he exclaimed, coming forward with outstretched hand. "When did you arrive? and where are those scoundrels Phil and Gerald?"

"They missed the train," she replied, shaking hands warmly, "I wish I hadn't waited for them. I might have been skating here all the afternoon."

"Of course you might. The ice is simply glorious. We're going to have a grand holiday. Let me introduce my friend Hall to you. Here, Ted, old chap!" he called, "when you've done flirting with Miss Williams!"

Ted Hall turned at once, and a second later, he and Jill were bowing gravely to each other with icy formality.

"Miss Hayward, another perfect dancer," Anderson ran on in his usual gay fashion, "Mabel, let me introduce Mr. Hall to you."

Mabel Hayward was tall, slender, and very pretty, with just a suggestion of frailty, and a quiet, dignified manner. Jill, on the other hand, had glossy brown hair and laughing brown eyes and was full of life and spirits. She had seven brothers who all worshipped her and spoilt her, and she was in consequence a little impatient and quick-tempered, and very much upon her dignity when ruffled. This was why she chatted very fast and very merrily with Will Anderson at dinner, resolutely refusing to notice his friend more than she could possibly help, and then generally to administer a delicate snub. Not that Ted Hall minded in the least, as a matter of fact he was rather glad, as it fell to his share to entertain Mabel, whose quiet, deliberate manner was much more to his taste just then.

He was rather disappointed, however, when she excused herself from dancing with him. He had watched her round the ball-room with Anderson, and knew that his friend had not over-estimated her powers. He was a perfect waltzer himself, and rather particular whom he danced with, so that most girls regarded it as a direct compliment to be asked. Jill guessed as much,

"I am only dancing a very little," she replied coldly.

Digitized by Google

especially as he did not ask her until he had seen her performance, and she chose to think that he considered he was conferring a favour on her, and declined to accept it.

"I am only dancing a very little," she replied coldly to his measured request. "I am expecting my brothers shortly, and shall join them when they arrive."

He bowed formally and retired, and Jill had the two following with Will Anderson, who was rather at a loss to understand his good fortune.

For Will had long been an admirer of Jill's, and, though he never seemed to make much progress, he continued to hope on.

Ted Hall easily gathered as much from Mabel, and watched the pair with some degree of interest.

After Phil and Gerald had arrived, the Shrewsbury party met together in a small ante-room to have a little merrymaking on their own account. Hall sat quietly in an armchair, looking on, without taking much part, scarcely being noticed at all until Jill remarked sarcastically:

"I'm afraid Mr. Hall thinks we are very frivolous and childish."

"Not at all," he replied calmly, as she looked towards him. "In any case, it is always nice to be able to cheat the years."

Jill flushed angrily.

"True," she retorted; "but it's hard lines when it's no longer any use trying."

"Pass when collared, Jill," shouted one of her brothers, and her attention was instantly diverted by a silk handkerchief in her face, which she had only just time to throw back before Will Anderson hurled himself across the room towards her. Hall's lips meanwhile relaxed into a sarcastic curl just as Will tripped up and fell against Jill, pushing her on to the arm of his chair. She freed herself angrily, saying clearly:

"I beg your pardon. I hope we have not disturbed you. Mr. Anderson is so boisterous. You should be more careful, Will," she added, "Mr. Hall doesn't like being ruffled."

"Rot! He wants waking up," and Will aimed a cushion straight at his head.

Hall stopped it with his foot, and afterwards threw it back, breaking into a low laugh when it knocked a paper out of Will's hand from which he was holding forth.

"You're too bad, Will," said Jill coolly. "You forget Mr. Hall hasn't had his after-dinner nap yet."

When they all said good-night to each other outside Mrs. Hayward's door, she purposely overlooked him, and kept Will talking idly because his friend was waiting for him.

Later on, when she and Mabel were discussing the guests, the latter remarked:

"How quaint Mr. Hall is!"

"He's just eaten up with conceit," was Jill's quick reply, "and he's far too engrossed in himself to make conversation."

"I don't think so," Mabel answered thoughtfully. "Will would never care for a conceited man, and he thinks so much of Mr. Hall. He was telling me about him this morning. I should always trust Will's judgment."

"Oh! Will makes mistakes sometimes the same as others, though, of course, Mr. Hall may be all right with men; he's insufferable with women. I never saw such condescension," which made it evident that Jill's temper had not improved.

"I haven't noticed it," Mabel said rather shortly. "I think he's very nice; anyhow, he's a perfect dancer—better than Will, if possible."

Jill made no answer, but turned the conversation to the other visitors, and presently scrambled into bed and relapsed into silence. Her first evening had not been altogether a success, in spite of her seemingly radiant spirits. She had had a little too much of Will Anderson, for one thing. She had commenced by being unusually affable, in order to impress upon his friend how perfectly content she was without his company, and Will had not unnaturally taken advantage of her charming mood. He had become very lover-like indeed, and, as usual, Jill had grown bored.

"How are you and Will getting on?" Mabel asked presently.

In spite of all her efforts, and she had made them to please her brothers, she could not fall in love with Will Anderson. Directly he became ardent he bored her, so she had always decided that she had known him too long. But she had made fresh resolutions this Christmas, because she knew what a good, reliable fellow he was, and she was exceedingly fond of him. She really meant to let him have his way, and settle things.

But he was not her last thought that night. Before she went to sleep she told herself she wished he would not have such objectionable friends, and cast about in her mind for a possible opportunity of further snubbing Ted Hall on the morrow.

As it happened, however, Ted was one too many for her, and with a delicate skill that made it apparent only to herself, coolly avoided any contact with her whatever, both that day and the following.

Digitized by Google

On the evening of the second night, Mabel, who had had a great deal of his company, pronounced him charming, and was in a most annoyingly placid mood. Jill felt inclined to throw something at her, as she calmly brushed her hair and drawled it out. She, herself, felt all upside down and disturbed from end to end, so that it irritated her beyond everything. Both her brothers had spent most of their time with special friends of their own, and she had been drafted off perpetually with Will Anderson.

At first it had been all right, but later on the old boredom gained ground, particularly at the ball on Bank Holiday, when Ted Hall had purposely not asked her for a dance. She had laughed and talked very much on account of his constant proximity, but it had been a decided effort. He, on the other hand, beyond continuing depressed, had remained perfectly calm and unruffled; never looking in her direction, and seemingly unaware of her existence. At least he never looked when she could possibly perceive it, but at occasional moments, he shot a keen glance of scrutiny at her, because he was interested in her on account of her relations with Will Anderson, who had long been a great friend of his.

"How are you and Will getting on?" Mabel asked presently, with her back to the light.

"Much as usual," was the rather callous reply.

"You haven't settled anything?" with feigned carelessness.

"Certainly not; there's heaps of time yet."

Mabel was silent, and Jill pulled two buttons off her shoes in a fit of impatience.

Suddenly she picked one up and threw it into a far corner. "I won't marry Will," she exclaimed, and kicked the other one after it.

A slight flush coloured Mabel's pale face, but she still said nothing.

"It's absurd of anyone to wish it," Jill went on; "we're not in the least suited to each other. Anyone can see we're too much alike. Just think what a din there would always be in the house. He can't help laughing and chattering and I'm sure I can't. I want someone to listen to me, instead of always making jokes of their own. I know he's a good fellow"—she dug her small fist into the pillow as if it had done her an injury, by way of impressing her remark—"probably the best fellow I ever knew, or ever shall know, but I might as well marry my own brother Bob. I'm not sure I wouldn't rather, for Bob and I do fall out sometimes, but Will would be so eternally forgiving and patient with me, I should want to scream. I don't believe in marrying a man who lets you treat him anyhow. I like a man who requires a little managing, it's so much more interesting."

"I'm sure no one wants you to marry Will against your inclination," Mabel remarked quietly.

"No, but they want me to want to marry him," petulantly. "I'll tell you what, Mabel," with a sudden inspiration, "it's you that ought to have Will, not I. You'd make a perfect pair. I wonder why I never thought of it before."

Mabel flushed a sudden deep scarlet, and then gradually became deathly white, but she made no comment.

Long ago, at least it seemed long ago to her, she had learnt suddenly that Will Anderson loved Jill Haslam. There was nothing at all extraordinary about the news, but it meant for her that the love-dream of her life was over. She had made no plaint and she had not seemed to fret, but ever since she had cultivated that quiet, placid and seemingly passionless exterior. This Christmas she expected the engagement finally settled, and was prepared to be one of the first to congratulate Jill. When the latter expressed her opinion thus candidly, she was at a loss how to take her. One of her first thoughts was for Will himself.

"If you feel like that, why have you led him on so the last three days?" she asked presently. "It's rather a shame, I think."

Jill pouted a little. "I haven't," she said, after a pause. "I only didn't send him away. There was no object in being rude."

"No, but you have been distinctly more friendly than usual."

"Well, I tell you, I meant to settle things."

"Then what has made you change your mind? wonderingly,

"I don't know. I suppose I'm fickle. I'm sure I hate myself enough," dashing a blinding tear from her eye.

Mabel regarded her in mute amazement.

"Oh, you're out of sorts," she remarked, "you'll think quite differently to-morrow."

"It's all very well for you, you never do worry yourself, but I can't help being disappointed. Everything seems to be going wrong this year, because I expected it to be better than usual. I'm not enjoying myself a bit."

"Whyever not?"

"I'm sure I don't know, except that Bob's always off with Miss Webster and—and—oh, I don't know, but I wish we were going home to-morrow."

"Why don't you talk to Mr. Hall for a change? He's really very nice, only he's down on his luck about something, and it makes him quiet."

"He isn't," savagely, "he thinks we're all beneath his notice. I heard him tell a man he hated hydros. Why doesn't he stay away if he doesn't like it, instead of coming and giving himself such ridiculous airs."

Mabel turned away with a shrug of her shoulders.

"Oh, I give you up," she said, "you're really very unreasonable to-night."

Jill did not reply, but she hid her burning face in the pillow, and half wished she had never been born.

* * * * *

One of the principal arrangements of the Christmas week at Wilstead, was the golf handicap for visitors at the hydro, and the great event of it the scratch Foursomes.

On the morning of the day, a great rush was made for the notice-board, where the players were bracketed, as drawn. Jill was generally one of the first, but this year she walked up very leisurely towards the chattering, laughing group. As she passed her brother Bob and Miss Webster, she heard the latter remark with a little laugh, "How very curious, isn't it? Don't you think they ought to be allowed to exchange? I'm sure they'd all four be ready enough, and Jill can't endure Mr. Hall."

She passed on, wondering what she meant, and found her own name bracketed with Hall's, while just beneath were Mabel's and Will Anderson's.

She understood perfectly.

She turned away slowly to the door, and stood thoughtfully looking out. Supposing anything were said about an exchange, what should she do?

"They can't," she smiled; "it would be impossible."

Then she heard Mabel's voice behind her.

"I don't know whether she'll play with him," she was saying; "she won't if she's made up her mind not to."

Digitized by Google

"Well, I daresay we could arrange it all right," replied Will's voice. "We'll ask her."

A man had sauntered up and stood near her, leaning against a pillar idly smoking. She had been too engaged with her own thoughts to notice him particularly before; but now, as she half turned to meet Will and Mabel, their eyes met. It was Ted Hall, and she knew that he, too, had overheard. She tried to look at him defiantly; but she felt the blood creeping to her face, and turned her head away. He did not look quite the same, somehow; there was a little less self-assurance in his attitude and expression, and, instead of the usual gloom, just a shade of sadness.

As Will and Mabel came towards her he moved carelessly away, saying, as he passed them, that he had an appointment in the billiard-room.

Before he had finished his game Will came up to speak to him, standing aside while he completed his stroke.

"So she's made the exchange," he mused, with a vague feeling that it was very small of her, and turned to hear Will's information.

"I'm just arranging the times," Will said huriedly. "You and Miss Haslam play Whitehead and Miss Pearce at three o'clock. Don't be late, will you?"

"Miss Haslam?" he asked, in a momentary surprise.

"Yes, you were drawn together. Just your usual luck," he added, with a laugh; "she's quite one of the best ladies."

They walked to the ground together, talking casually on the weather and such-like uninteresting subjects.

They walked to the ground together.

Both felt a little constrained; but Jill showed it the most, probably because she was the most anxious to appear at ease. Suddenly the conversation turned upon dogs, and dogs happened to be Jill's hobby. It happened to be Hall's also, and they were soon so engrossed that they almost walked past the entrance to the links. They won their match easily, both first and second round, and Hall remarked that she had the best drive of any lady he had ever seen. Jill was pleased, but careful not to show it, merely remarking that she probably had a great deal more practice than the average girl.

All the players walked home in a party, and they did not meet again till dinner, when there was little cause to address each other.

But when they reached the ball-room he came and asked for a dance. Jill gave him one near the end, and spent the time meanwhile looking forward to it, though she would not for worlds have acknowledged it. Will Anderson found her decidedly absent-minded. He asked her if she were tired, and she seemed quite vexed at the mere suggestion. He looked unhappy, so she hastened to cheer him, asking him how he and Mabel had progressed at golf. Then she suddenly launched off into a panegyric of Mabel's charms, and finally flabbergasted him by remarking:

"You ought to marry Mabel, you know, Will. She's just the very girl for you. A little bit too good if anything," slyly, "but much too nice to think so."

Will's brow grew a trifle black, and he gazed moodily at his feet. "I'm just as fond of Mabel as you are," he said, "but I happen to be still fonder of someone else."

"Oh, it's your imagination," said Jill coolly. When she made up her mind about anything, she usually achieved it; and as often as not by sheer daring. She had no definite reason why she particularly wanted Will to marry Mabel, but the idea had taken her fancy, and she knew it would release her from certain qualms of conscience concerning her old admirer, and her beloved brothers' hopes. When Will looked up in dumb surprise, she only regarded him with a pair of half-laughing, half-serious eyes, and resting her hand a moment on his arm, said winningly: "I'm awfully fond of you, Will, and I adore Mabel. I want you both to be ever so happy, and I'm sure that's the simplest way."

"But my dear girl," he began remonstratingly.

"No, don't," she interrupted gaily, "just think it over."

"I absolutely refuse," he exclaimed stoutly. "Do you think I'm going to wait all this time and never so much as say a word? I want to marry you, and no one else; that's straight enough, isn't it?"

"Yes, but you're so rash, Will," soothingly, "we're not really a bit suited to each other."

Will got up looking a little stern.

"It is not a subject I care to speak lightly about," he said.

But she easily made him sit down again and listen to her. In the end, she made him understand clearly that it was no good going on waiting for her, and then, because he was very miserable, she chatted to him hopefully, and finally handed him over to Mabel, remarking that he had a bad headache and did not want to have to bother to talk to strangers.

Mabel smiled kindly and suggested refreshments, afterwards winning his gratitude by talking of Jill and then his friend Hall, so that when the dance was over he was not nearly so wretched as he expected to be.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile, Jill, after one sudden gulp of appreciation at her sense of freedom, gradually fell once more into the restless, unsettled state. She did not know why, and she felt very impatient with herself.

Her programme was as full as she wanted it; a convenient pier-glass told her that she was looking her best, and she could not fail to observe certain pairs of admiring eyes turned in her direction.

As the time wore on and the fifteenth dance approached, she cheered a little, and at the last became almost nervously excited. She knew that Hall was the best waltzer in the room, and she was eager for their dance. That was how she accounted to herself for her rising spirits, in spite of her avowed aversion to the man himself. When he approached her he looked grave, but remarkably calm. Apparently the similar expectation, which he was quite as entitled to, did not affect him. As they danced, neither talked much, the pleasure of the perfect motion was too delicious in itself. Afterwards, they sat down a little apart, and then, for some extraordinary reason, and perhaps for the first time in her life, Jill lost her self-assurance.

She could neither talk naturally, nor appear perfectly at ease, and the galling consciousness of it only increased her discomfort. Hall could not make her out, as she had always appeared to him the personification of life and spirits. He supposed she was still at enmity with him, and was surprised, after their pleasant golfing in the afternoon. He regarded her covertly with a keen, critical glance. He decided she was very pretty, perhaps as pretty as any girl he knew, and he thought she looked nice, too. He decided Anderson was rather a lucky fellow, and determined to try and make peace with her definitely, and pave the way for a pleasant friendship on Will's account.

"I hope you are not going to nurse your resentment indefinitely," he said presently. "I'll apologise for my rudeness, if that will make any difference."

Jill was taken by surprise, and hardly knew what to say.

"I thought we had mutually agreed to forget after this afternoon," she ventured, a little nervously.

"I hoped so," quietly.

He was studying some of the promenaders, and she turned to take a quick glance at his face. She thought it was a very strong one, and was glad that he wanted to be friends.

"That was my idea about it," she answered. "I am seldom angry for long. I get worked up at first, but it soon blows over. I admit I was pretty wild with you in the beginning," she added with a touch of her usual brightness.

"I know you were," he answered with a little smile. "I thought you were going to throw that shilling at me."

Jill laughed. "I wanted to badly," she said.

"I know you did. I can't think how you managed to refrain. I believe I had a vague feeling of relief that you wanted your tea too much to waste it."

The music struck up then, and they were obliged to rise.

"I suppose you haven't a dance left?" he queried.

"Yes, I think I have. I never quite fill my programme if I can help it at these impromptu dances."

"May I see it?" and he held out his hand. The two last spaces were vacant.

"Will you give me both as a token of forgiveness?" he asked.

Jill assented with a mischievous little smile, and suddenly all her moodiness vanished.

They enjoyed their two dances immensely, and sat chatting when the programme was finished.

"I hope we shall pull the match off to-morrow," he said, as they parted.

"Yes—rather!" she replied readily, "I think we stand a very good chance."

* * * * * *

"Yes," was his mental verdict the last thing, "Anderson is a lucky chap. He always was."

Then he fell into a sound sleep, and never stirred till he was called in the morning.

Jill would gladly have done likewise; but, instead, she tossed about half the night, and was only able to drop off to sleep when it was nearly time to get up. But she was willing enough to rise even then, for the golf match was before her, and the day full of joyful promise.

They won triumphantly, and carried off the prize in high glee, so far as Jill was concerned. Everything had gone well for both of them. The match had caused them to spend most of the day together, and though Anderson looked on moodily, neither of them took any notice.

Hall felt a trifle conscience-stricken, but he did not see that it was his fault; and decided, as he was leaving early the next day, it didn't matter, and Will could easily make up in the evening.

With this thought in his mind, he only asked for three dances, although her programme was, as yet, a blank, and Jill felt a chill of disappointment. There was not much etiquette observed on a last night like that, and she knew that many pairs would have as many as five together. She knew also that he had three with two other girls, besides an interval to smoke, and could

He took her to a small alcove and sat down beside her.

Digitized by Google

therefore easily have given her another without it seeming noticeable.

The first of their three passed very naturally; they danced it through without stopping, and then went to have refreshments. It did not quite come up to Jill's expectations, however, for though Hall was exceedingly nice, he was very much the casual friend. So she looked forward to their last two still more eagerly, wondering how and where he would suggest meeting her again.

"Hi! wait a minute! You've got the wrong lady."

He was waiting about for her some little time before the dance began, and her heart beat quickly when he was at last able to come and claim her, and she saw a suggestion of glad expectancy in his eyes. When they sat out, however, he was very quiet and scarcely spoke at all, so that it was almost a relief to continue dancing, and her heart sank very low.

Afterwards he took her to a small alcove and sat down beside her. He bent forward and rested his arms across his knees, looking down with knitted brows at his hands. Jill leant back wearily and fidgeted nervously with her fan, for the silence grew constrained. She had never known a man to turn his back on her in this way before, or indeed do anything but show his pleasure at the chance of having a merry tête-à-tête with her. The whole situation was new to her, she could not even talk herself, and yet she liked him better, and was more anxious to please him, than anyone she had ever known. She raised her eyes and looked at him longingly—everything about him suggested strength—strength of mind, purpose, and body; it was easy to forgive him his unconventional lack of politeness.

"I suppose you are really going to-morrow?" she said at last.

"Yes, very early, before anyone is up. It is quite time too."

"Don't you like hydros?" quietly.

"I have always detested them, but I have enjoyed myself here."

"Then why are you glad to go?"

"I don't know that I am. I only know that I must."

He sat up and tucked his hands in his pockets, but he still looked away from her, with a cloud on his face.

"I wonder if we shall ever meet again?" she ventured.

"Oh, sure to," was the rather callous-sounding answer. "I go to see Anderson at Shrewsbury sometimes; it's a very good bicycle ride. I hope we shall get another game of golf together some day."

Jill did not reply, but lowered her eyes to her fan and a little, tired droop lingered about her mouth.

Hall turned his head without her knowing and watched her a few moments. He thought she had never looked so entirely winsome and charming before.

Then suddenly he got up.

"Shall we look for the others?" he said abruptly.

She rose, and with a slightly cold and formal air took his proffered arm. A merry group in the hall hailed them gladly, and they were quickly separated among the others.

When everyone prepared to say "good-night" he sought her again. "I must say 'good-bye' now," he said, "as I shall not see you to-morrow."

"Good-bye," she answered quietly. "I hope you will try our Shrewsbury links some day."

When she and Mabel were alone she tried to chat briskly of the day's doings; but when they were both in bed and the light out, she lay staring blankly into the blackness about her.

"I wish I had never met him," she said, with clenched hands, struggling to keep back the tears. "I was so happy before, and now everything is spoilt. How can I ever get through weeks of dances and gaieties without him?"

She bit her teeth together hard.

"How can I ever get through the long years without him?" she finished.

* * * * *

When Ted Hall got into the homeward-bound train the next morning, he was, if anything, more depressed than when he had started the previous week.

"I was a fool to go," was his mental comment. "I might have known something would go wrong," by which it will be seen that a new grievance had been added to the rest, to vex his already over-wrought soul.

"I won't see her again until they're married," he finally concluded, "and then it will be different, but I wish I had never gone. It was just my luck to meet her, too late to even have a chance."

* * * * *

"Hullo! glad to see you're still alive," and Will Anderson vaulted a low gate, and crossed a lawn to where Hall was idly lounging with a cigar in his mouth. "Four whole blessed months, and never a word of you! You might have vanished off the face of the earth for all I could tell. What on earth have you been doing?"

"Busy," was the cool answer; "awfully glad to see you, though. Come into the house, old chap. Have a brandy and soda and help yourself," throwing his cigar-case on the table.

Digitized by Google

"You must be coining money, you beggar," said Will. "I wish you'd teach me the trick."

"I should need to get up early to teach you anything," Ted replied laughingly. "Had a gay winter?"

"Yes, all right. Things went a bit wrong at Christmas, but they've cheered up since. I've come over to tell you a piece of news and be congratulated."

"So I imagined. I'll get a bottle of champagne and we'll drink good luck to you."

"Who on earth told you?" exclaimed Will, in amazement. "I only knew myself the day before yesterday."

"A little bird and this," tapping his forehead as he went indoors.

He caught his foot in the carpet, and nearly fell headlong, which caused him to mutter a short but expressive monosyllable, all the stronger because of his suddenly disturbed state of mind.

"I knew it would come; what a fool I am to care!" he muttered angrily, as he descended the cellar steps, glad of an excuse to get away and overcome the first shock of the news. "But she was so different to the rest."

When he had filled their glasses, he raised his, and said, with assumed cheerfulness:

"Here we go, then! A long life and wedded bliss to my old friend Will and his charming fiancée, Miss Haslam."

"Hi! wait a minute!" exclaimed Will hastily, but laughing in spite of himself; "you've got the wrong lady."

Hall stared at him, thunderstruck.

"You don't mean——" he began at last.

"Yes, but I do, my dear fellow," jovially; "Jill and I decided we weren't very well suited. She told me I should be much happier with Miss Hayward, and, right or wrong, I'm happier than I ever was in my life before. So start again, old man, and give me my own mate this me."

When Hall had overcome the shock of the news, he again raised his glass, and the second toast was noticeably warmer than the first.

"It was at Christmas, you know," Will went on. "I hoped to get engaged to Jill then, but she was awfully sensible about it, she always is. I felt very down on my luck for a time, but Mabel turned out a brick, and now I wouldn't give her up for anyone in the wide world. I'm awfully happy, old man—ever so happy—take my tip and get engaged."

Hall smoked on silently for a few moments.

"I understood at Christmas that Miss Haslam was already privately engaged to you," he said at last.

"Oh, no, she wasn't, but it was a near thing."

A sudden light broke in upon Will, and he looked up sharply.

"If you hadn't thought that?" he began.

"But I did think it, so never mind," put in Hall.

"But I do mind. By Jove! this is grand, I see it all now; couldn't make you out before."

Hall tried to stop him, but he was incorrigible, and raising his glass exclaimed, "Go in and win, old fellow, here's good luck to you. She's one of the prettiest and nicest girls in the county, and Mabel Hayward is the other."

"You are jumping to conclusions very hastily," Hall said a little coldly. "Miss Haslam and I are mere acquaintances at present."

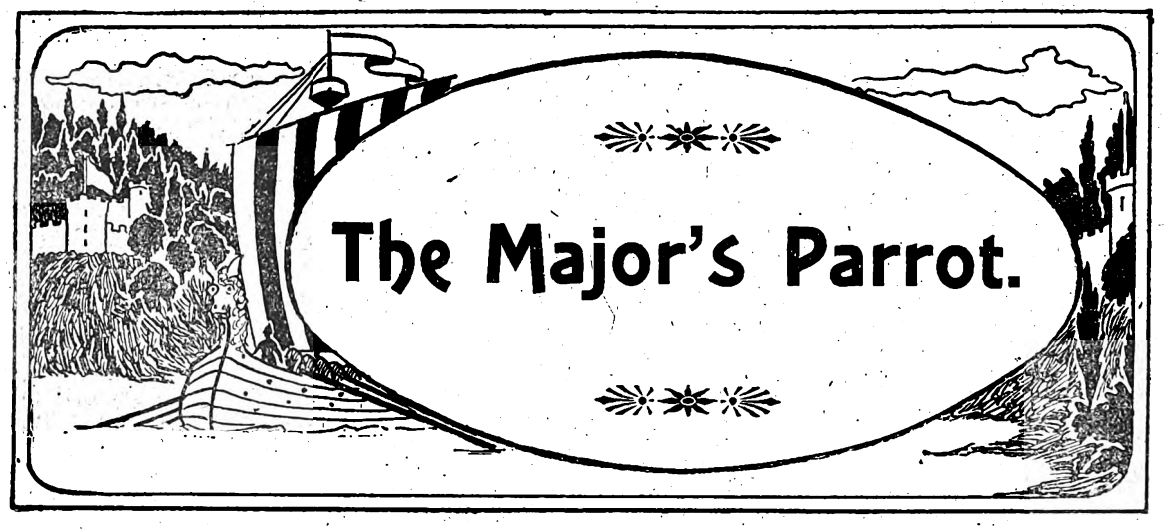
"Rats! I know better. Why, we haven't any of us known what to make of Jill, she's been so quiet this winter. And all the years I've known you, you've never gone four months without coming over before. You must come back with me to-night for a few days and make up for lost time. There's no atom of use in waiting."

Hall quite agreed with him, and before the week was over, a great health-drinking and congratulating took place one evening in Shrewsbury.

The four happy recipients of the honours finished up with a quiet ten minutes in the hall together, when Will remarked, with a wicked twinkle in his eyes:

"By Jove! but it was a near thing all round, wasn't it?"

Digitized by Google



The Major's Parrot.

WEI-HAI-WEI is going to become the fashionable summer resort in the Far East, so some people say. In the winter it is a dreadful wilderness, great blocks of ice, and cold, biting winds. It is late before the snow disappears, and the many spring flowers kept warm beneath it begin to show their gay little heads. Then the breezes blow soft from the summer sea, the wonderful blue of the Far Eastern blue sky is unclouded with grey, the officers of the Chinese regiment feel themselves once more within reach of the world, a few more troops come over from Hong Kong, and Wei-hai-wei becomes frivolously frisky.

Already little bungalows, in a row, each with its small garden, have sprung up on the sea-front, and the proprietor of the one hotel is dreaming of electric light and telephones. The men of the Chinese regiment are tall, finely-made men and look very neat in their smart uniform. Their pig-tails are wound up and tucked away under their service caps or helmets, they march well and they are not at all a bad imitation of our old acquaintance, Tommy Atkins.

The inhabitants of Wei-hai-wei talk of the "season" as a solid fact, and really a good many people from Hong Kong and Shanghai have begun to go there, though neither Cook nor Gaze yet condescend to number it among their cheap excursions or conducted tours.

Last year, a major in the Army Service Corps, quartered at Hong Kong, decided to spend his leave at Wei-hai-wei; firstly, because he had not enough money to take him home; secondly, because it would seriously decrease his small remaining amount of funds, even if he only went so far as Japan; thirdly, because Wei-hai-wei was said to be very cheap; fourthly and lastly and chiefly, because a lady, on whom Major Roslyn had long cast a covetous eye, had announced her intention of passing the hot months of the summer at this new resort.

The lady was called Miss Sophia Mac Tavish, she had come out from Scotland to adorn the home of her brother, a merchant in Hong Kong; but the brother was wickedly ungrateful, he did not appreciate the presence or the outspoken counsels of his elderly sister, and, adding insult to injury, had married two months before our story opens, a poor, pretty Irish governess.

When the engagement was announced to Miss Sophia, she stiffened her virtuous backbone in speechless wrath —she said nothing at all. Mr. Mac Tavish was pleased at this and thought, poor man, that his family affairs would arrange themselves peacefully. He proceeded to propound his plans for re-furnishing his bungalow for his bride. But he was not allowed to talk for long.

"Alexander," said Miss Mac Tavish, in a voice that caused the very flies to shiver, "whatever may be your plans for the reception of this godless and forward person, you need not repeat them to me. You have had an opportunity vouchsafed to few, of hearing the words of truth, and of associating with an unblemished member of the Scottish Church. If from this you can turn away, and lower yourself to the company of a low class Papist, all I can say is, I wash my hands of you, Alexander, from this day forth."

So she washed her hands of Alexander, for he showed no signs of turning from the pleasant paths, that diverged from the Scottish Church—and led to the Irish governess.

Miss Mac Tavish had a substantial income of her own, she was by no means dependent on her brother, report gave her eight hundred pounds a year, but report doubled the facts, as it often does.

She removed herself from the desecrated home of the Hong Kong Mac Tavish, appropriately named. Braemar, and she took rooms on the second floor of the Grand Hotel, which, as everybody knows, stands on the wide road bordering the harbour and looks straight across to Kowloon.

Here she found it very dull; very few of the friends she had made as mistress of her brother's house, came to see her in the hotel. She had made the acquaintance of Major Roslyn some time before and looked upon him with mild approval.

I scarcely like to say it of so discreet an elderly maiden, but in her own mind, she had settled to marry him if possible; to bestow her fortune, her counsels, her severe grace of religious character, on a mere follower of an unhallowed profession. The truth was, she did not wish to return to Dundee, like a cask of undesired goods; she had gathered from Major Roslyn's conversation that he was not too well off, though she did not know he had absolutely nothing but his pay, and many debts besides.

But lately, the Major's attentions had fallen off in a very marked way! Why was this? The truth was, he had had a small remittance from home, so he enjoyed himself and put off the evil day. He had a sort of vague idea that Miss Mac Tavish was the evil day—he did not wish to lose the chance of a joint partnership in a possible eight hundred a year, but he felt that his outlook must be black indeed, before he could put up with Miss Sophia. So he trod the primrose ways of dalliance, and enjoyed himself very much so long as his money lasted.

Digitized by Google

But it soon went, alas, and not only did it vanish away, but quarter-day arrived, and with it a pile of bills. Two days before, Miss Sophia had asked him tenderly where he meant to spend his leave, and had quite casually said that she herself was going to Wei-hai-wei. The Major had given some indefinite answer then; but now, when his servant, Ah Chung, brought in this little array of blue long-shaped envelopes with his early tea, (one looked extraordinarily like a summons), Major Roslyn made up his mind at once.

To Wei-hai-wei, he would also go. He told Ah Chung to pack up while he had breakfast. Ah Chung was never discomposed, and proceeded to the next room at once, to begin.

"I'll take the parrot, too," called out the Major through the folding doors.

"Yessir," said Ah Chung, but he shook his fist at the parrot's cage and murmured under his breath, "Bird of Satan, accursed one."

The parrot surveyed him quietly and seemed to wink. It was a new purchase of the Major's and showed an unusual aptitude for talking. Also it seemed to understand the meaning of remarks made to it, in a wonderful way. The Major called it Nebuchadnezzar; it was a grey parrot with red tail-feathers.

Nebuchadnezzar was not always quiet under Ah Chung's insults; on the contrary, he often commenced the fray by calling Ah Chung, "Son of a pig." On other days he would only look at Ah Chung gravely, and solemnly wink with enjoyment at having betrayed his immovable enemy to a show of resentment.

Ah Chung would have liked to drop the cage with the parrot in it, to the bottom of the China sea; but this he did not dare to do. On the voyage to Wei-hai-wei, Nebuchadnezzar enjoyed himself very much and learnt several new and choice expressions from the sailors. One peculiarity he had, that the Major could not cure him of, he would not speak a single word if any woman were near; he would chatter away to the Major or any other man, but as soon as a woman approached he would stop, fluff out his feathers angrily, and no inducement could make him speak another word.

After a few days of fine weather, they encountered a moderate typhoon, the sea rose mountains high and flung the ship first on one side and then on the other, down, down so low, it seemed as if she could never recover herself. Nebuchadnezzar clung wildly to the sides of his cage and his language left nothing to be desired, from a sea-sick person's point of view. But they soon got out of the choppy white-crested waves, and as they got under the lee of the land, near Wei-hai-wei, the sea became beautifully calm and blue. The newly-made forts gleamed white on the grey rocks.

First, on landing, the Major went to the hotel, but it was not very comfortable and it was expensive; so, as he had three months leave, he thought it better to look out for lodgings. He was recommended to try the row of bungalows, I have before mentioned, on the sea-shore.

After dinner one evening, he walked down there, and as they were practically the only houses to be let in the place, he was scarcely surprised to see Miss Sophia Mac Tavish emerging from the gate of one. He lifted his hat and greeted her civilly. Miss Sophia simpered; her charms then had drawn the Major so quickly after her!

"Let me see, he must have started within a day or two after I left Hong Kong," she said to herself.

Still his manner was not so warm as one might have expected. She entered into the question of lodgings with much interest and strongly recommended the row of little bungalows by the sea. She herself was installed in one, and she believed the one next door to hers was to let. They inspected it together. Two sitting-rooms on the ground floor, a wide verandah looking to the sea, and above, two large bedrooms and another verandah. What could be better? The rent, too, was very moderate and included necessary plate and linen.

So Major Roslyn took it, and the next day moved down from the hotel, accompanied by Ah Chung and Nebuchadnezzar. Ah Chung speedily found a Chinese cook, and the household was then complete.

The Major passed his time very comfortably, he often dined at the fort, or at the Chinese regiment's mess, of which he was made an honorary member, on other nights a man, or sometimes two men, dined with him.

Then he had Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he talked a great deal. The bird would sit on the arm of his chair with a very human expression in its wicked round eye, nodding its head and exclaiming at intervals, while its master detailed his grievances.

It was a funny thing to do with a parrot, but it was a great relief to Major Roslyn; his creditors were becoming unpleasantly pressing and the shadow of Miss Sophia loomed darkly on his mental horizon. So he told Nebuchadnezzar all his worries, and that wise bird croaked sympathetically, and would hop from the chair to his shoulder, and rub his head thoughtfully against the Major's face.

Ah Chung used to hear the talking, and became more firmly convinced than ever, that the parrot's body was the abode of an evil spirit. Next door nothing could be heard, for each bungalow stood in its own garden.

So two months passed, and Miss Sophia was by no means pleased with the state of affairs. Major Roslyn's attitude towards her was no more definite than in Hong Kong; true, he often accompanied her on her evening walks and had adopted an air of proprietorship when arranging her shawl, brought as a defence against the night air; but this was not enough

Could it be?—and Miss Mac Tavish shuddered with horror at the thought—could it be that he was trifling with her elderly affections, that he had no serious intentions at all? It required the whole strength of a mind endowed by the wisdom of the Scottish Church, to bear up against such treachery.

No, it could not be! Perhaps he was shy, poor man!—he certainly was a little younger than herself.

That was it, he was diffident, no doubt—a charming trait in these days of unblushing effrontery. So Miss Sophia redoubled her smiles and leant more tenderly on the Major's arm as they returned from their evening stroll.

"Do you know, dear Major," she murmured softly, "I have never inspected the interior of your charming bungalow since you have come to live there. I should so much like to," she insisted with childish grace."

The Major shuddered.

"I am afraid I have no lady to receive you," he said rather grumpily, "and I'm afraid a bachelor's quarters are, hm—hm——"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, not at all, dear Major," insisted Miss Sophia, gushingly, "I adore simplicity, and anywhere you live, must gain interest in my eyes."

"Good gracious," said the Major to himself, "I must be careful, by Jove."

Aloud he said:

"My dear Miss Mac Tavish, you are too kind. If you really will excuse my deficiencies, I shall be only too happy if you will honour me by coming to tea one day this week."

"How delightful," cried Miss Sophia, "you dear man, indeed I will come. Shall we say Saturday, at four o'clock?"

"That will suit me capitally," said the Major, "I will expect you then, at four o'clock."

They had now reached the lady's garden gate and stopped to say "Good-night." She pressed his hand lingeringly, and turned, with an audible sigh, up the path to the house. Poor old thing, she was very lonely, you know.

That night the Major dined alone, with only the society of Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he confided the singularly pressing state of his affairs. He sat for a long time on the verandah after dinner, with the parrot on his shoulder, and felt as if he were really talking to a friend.

Ah Chung received notice of the entertainment, and the feast was prepared, also the Major invited three extra people, a naval lieutenant and a captain in the Chinese Regiment with his wife. Fruit and cakes, and tea and cream, all were set out invitingly on little tables in Ah Chung's best style; the chairs were dusted, the wood polished, everything wore a festal air.

It was a remarkably fine day, so the long windows were wide open on to the verandah, and the fresh sea-breeze blew crisply in.

At four o'clock, the guests began to arrive—the naval lieutenant first, then Captain and Mrs. Venner, last but not least, Miss Sophia Mac Tavish. She swept in, arrayed in her best visiting clothes, a good and solid grey silk poplin, white China crape shawl, and a most festive-looking pink bonnet.

Poor Mrs. Venner sat appalled by such magnificence, she had on only a white shirt, a blue skirt, and sailor hat. Miss Sophia was gracious but distinctly patronising; in fact she was dreadful altogether, her host felt it more than all.

Nebuchadnezzar looked on with distinct disapproval. Why were all these people eating here? while he was offered nothing, and, an additional insult, even shut up in his cage. He was very rarely so now, but the Major was afraid he might fly at his guests, as two of them were women.

Nebuchadnezzar hated women, as I have said before.

Mrs. Venner said: "What a nice parrot you have, Major Roslyn, does he talk? Pretty Polly!" and she held out to him a piece of cake.

Nebuchadnezzar turned his back on her with scorn, Major Roslyn laughed.

"I'm afraid he'll have nothing to say to you, Mrs. Venner," he said. "Nebuchadnezzar hates ladies and will never say a word while any are in the room. I'm afraid I spoil him; I've got into the habit of talking to him in the evening as if he were a friend, a regular old bachelor's habit, and he seems to understand all I say."

"You call him Nebuchadnezzar?" said Miss Mac Tavish sternly, "do you not think it irreligious to give such a name to a heathen bird?"

Nebuchadnezzar's eye had been for some seconds fixed on Miss Mac Tavish's pink bonnet, and when she spoke in her usual rather grating voice, he gave a start, then he ran up and down his perch and gave a preliminary croak.

"Oh, hush, hush," cried Mrs. Venner eagerly, "he's just going to speak," and Nebuchadnezzar spoke with clear and awful distinctness.

"If somebody doesn't pay my debts soon," he said plainly, "I shall have to marry that infernal old woman next door."

Then he was silent, but he had said enough.

The Major's face was scarlet, the naval lieutenant was purple as if with apoplexy.

Miss Mac Tavish rose from her seat, she fixed her eyes on the Major's guilty countenance—then without a word she did the only thing possible, she rustled out of the room, her very poplin skirt seeming to shake off the dust of such society.

So she went, and the others were too taken aback with astonishment even to open the door. As she went through it, the Major sprang forward, but she waved him back with gesture worthy of a Bernhardt.

In the room she left there was an awkward silence; then all the others rose simultaneously to say "Good-bye."

The Major shook hands mechanically, then through the window he watched them going through the garden, simply doubled up.

"I can never show my face in Wei-hai-wei again," he said to himself.

Then he looked at the friend who had betrayed him and laughed bitterly.

Nebuchadnezzar winked in a confiding way.

"You have ruined me," said the Major with angry reproach.

"Just my beastly luck," said Nebuchadnezzar.

SADI GRANT.

MRS. GREENE: "Charles, I was astonished at the way you devoured that salad to-night. You know you always said you detested salad."

Mr. Green: "Yes, love, but I didn't know that there was another way of making it than yours."

"GREAT heavens, man!" exclaimed Bogg's old friend. "Do I find you reduced to playing a cornet at the street corner to make a living?"

"I ain't doing this to make a living. My wife won't let me practise in the house," Boggs replied.

UNCLE JACK returns from a long walk, and, being somewhat thirsty, drinks from a tumbler he finds on the table.

Enter his little niece, Alice, who instantly sets up a cry of despair.

Uncle Jack: "What's the matter, Allie?"

Alice (weeping): "You've drinked up my 'quarium, and you've swallowed my free pollywogs."

A GENTLEMAN touring in Scotland happened to be in the bar of a wayside inn partaking of some refreshment. While proceeding to light his pipe he was about to use a wax-light out of his box, when an old Scot, who was having his "half," handed him the box of matches lying on the counter, saying:

"Dinna use yer ain, maister; hae these—it's the only discount ye get in a public-hoose."

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

I.—THE NETHERLANDS WAR.

1793—1795.

CONSIDERING how universally we have been reviled on the Continent for our selfishness and rapacity, it is nothing less than astonishing that we should have allowed ourselves to be persuaded into joining the confederacy which sprang into existence against France after the death of Louis XVI, especially as no arguments derived from the balance of power could be invoked to defend the policy we adopted.

The execution of the French king no doubt excited the deepest indignation in this country, but that was no reason why we should join other Powers in depriving France of her conquests, especially as the dismemberment of France would not have enriched us.

Yet on March 25th, 1793, we signed a convention with Russia for the prosecution of hostilities against the French until they should relinquish all their conquests. As soon as it transpired that Britain was to play its old familiar rôle of plucking the chestnuts, the great Continental powers expressed their willingness to shed the blood of their soldiers in the cause of punishing revolutionary France, provided we paid the expenses.

Having worked themselves into a state of high moral fever, they also declared that as Britain would provide the sinews of war, it was only fair that she should be allowed to control its operations.

As we were to pay all expenses, the allies of course furnished extremely large armies.

Austro-Sardinia provided 55,000, the Spaniards 50,000, the Austrians 66,000 on the Lower Rhine, and 33,000 more between Meuse and Moselle, and there were 112,000 Russians and Prussians on the Middle Rhine.

In 1794, Pitt stated in the House of Commons that His Britannic Majesty had agreed to pay the Emperor William of Prussia £50,000 to enable him to carry on the war, with an additional £100,000 per month for forage, £400,000 cash down to put the army in motion, and £100,000 on its return.

As these sums proved insufficient we actually agreed to pay all expenses Prussia incurred provided reliable vouchers were produced. Needless to say this proviso caused no difficulty, Germans supplying Germans led to our being beguiled out of some sixty millions before the war was over.

War being declared, a British force under the youthful Duke of York sailed for the Netherlands and, landing, joined the Hanoverians. On the 7th of May, 1793, we quitted our cantonments near Tournay and marched to Maulde, a village in Belgium, where some Prussians and Austrians were posted.

To make head against her foes the French Convention had ordered a levy of 300,000 men, so there was a goodly array of Frenchmen at St. Amand on the Scheldt when we attacked. The Prussians on our left, after some hours of fighting, became so hardly pressed that the Duke of York had to send the Guards to their assistance.

The Duke of York was not a great strategist, but, accustomed to the atmosphere of courts, he was not unacquainted with the gentle art of flattery. On arriving at the point where the Prussians were being badly cut up, the Duke said. "I reserve for the Coldstream Guards the honour, the special glory of dislodging the French from the intrenchments our allies have failed to carry. As British troops you have only to show yourselves here and the French will retire."

Digitized by Google

Tommy must have liked this style of oratory for it is said that he loudly cheered His Royal Highness. But perhaps the words were not ill chosen, for the position was so strong as to require a supreme effort to capture it. To get at the French it was necessary to negotiate a ditch which was found to be so broad that they were compelled to use the village bridge. This exposed them to a most destructive artillery fire. Although we lost half our men we fared better than the Prussians. They, too, lost half their force and at the finish had to retreat, whereas we managed to get to the other side.

But the French were too strongly posted to permit of their intrenchments being stormed, although we made several desperate efforts to capture them. One headlong charge brought us within twenty yards of our goal. But we were driven back, the fire being too heavy. The night was closing in when we retreated. The French contemplated harassing our rear but a sharp repulse caused them to change their minds.

The French claim St. Amand as a decisive victory, which is strange considering that, shortly after, Conde was blockaded.

Before we could attack Valenciennes it was necessary to reduce the fortified camp at Famars. The French offered a desperate resistance, but the Austrians, coming up, a redoubt was captured, Famars fell and Valenciennes was beseiged. The siege operations were intrusted to the Duke of York, who used his artillery with such effect that half the town was destroyed before it surrendered.

Before the town capitulated the French people were desirous of making peace, but they rallied as one man the moment they learnt that the Duke of York had taken possession in the name of the Emperor of Germany.

The siege over, the Duke of York marched to the assistance of the Dutch, who had been driven by the French from Lincelles. The 1st Coldstreams, and the 3rd Guards were sent forward, but the Dutch, having retreated, the British, in their hurry to bring them back, took the wrong road, and presently found themselves confronted by a large French army.

General Lake at once prepared to retire, greatly to the disgust of our men who clamoured to be led against their old antagonists. So the orders were countermanded and Lake, sending word to the Duke of York to hurry up reinforcements, boldly attacked the French. The Dutch onslaught had been so lacking in fire and determination, that the French reckoned on an easy victory.

In fact, they burst out laughing, when the puny proportions of our force were revealed on its coming into the open. But their mirth was not of long duration. They purposely allowed us to approach within twenty yards in order to surround and capture the entire force, but before they could extend their lines, we had dashed into their midst.

The charge threw them into the greatest disorder. The centre was cut in two, one half being hurled against the left wing, and the other being precipitated on the right.

The French officers made frantic efforts to reform their men, but our soldiers rushed up and down the columns with such intrepidity that at last the French became thoroughly frightened and bolted from the field. We took two stands of colours and captured all the guns the runaways had taken from the Dutch. This battle is worth recalling if only on account of the gallantry exhibited by the regiments of Guards who to this day carry Lincelles on their colours.

Early in 1794 we again took the field, on coming out of our winter-quarters, against the French. Our neighbours have never liked us. To the French revolutionists we were especially objectionable. In 1794 their hatred led them to promulgate the following order:

"England is capable," ran this precious document, "of every outrage on humanity and every crime towards the Republic."

After enjoining the commanders of their forces to destroy the wounded, and shoot all prisoners, it closed with these remarkable words: "Shoot the British slaves and Europe will be free."

Whether the French thought it probable that any attempt to carry out these infamous orders would lead to reprisals, it is impossible to say, so it must be set down to the credit of the French generals, that they disregarded the barbarous edict of the Republic. The Duke in a counter-order reminded the men "that mercy to the wounded was the brightest gem in the character of the soldier."

In the campaign of 1794, the allied generals again demonstrated their incapacity by so dividing their forces that it was impossible to strike a decided blow anywhere.

The French, as was their wont, took up positions in the neighbourhood of woods, which served the double purpose of concealing their numbers and securing a safe retreat.

We managed to drive them from an intrenched position close to Landrecies, which we were besieging, but the success was temporary, for three days later they drove back the Prince of Coburg with great loss.

Encouraged by this success the French then boldly attacked the Austrians, and, knowing the value of concentration, brought such huge numbers to bear on the enemy that victory would have been certain had not Sir Robert Lauri and a brigade of cavalry taken them in flank and forced them to retire.

This audacious movement on our part so enraged the French that, reinforcements arriving, they were able to concentrate a most imposing force at Cambay. Their chances too, which suffered nothing from the vigour and initiative they displayed, were still further increased by the bickerings of the allies. The only subject on which the allies were unanimous throughout the war was that Britain was not being bled sufficiently.

The French having completed their preparations for a big coup, crossed the Selle at Saalzoir. The Duke of York sent orders to General Otto and his division to attack. Otto reconnoitred, and, finding the enemy stronger than he expected sent for reinforcements; but as the messenger lost his way, Otto had next morning to assault a force far exceeding his own in numbers.

Why the French did not attack would be inexplicable save for the circumstance that they (except at Waterloo and one or two other battles) invariably acted on the defensive when encountering us. They never hesitated to advance against any of the armies of the Continental Powers, but with us they preferred, as a rule, the shelter of the trenches.

For all his deficiency in numbers, Otto managed by repeated charges of cavalry to drive back his antagonists.

Digitized by Google

[Lawson Wood.

[Drawn by

One of these onslaughts resulted in our capturing eight pieces of cannon. Maddened by this reverse the French made a supreme effort and recaptured five. It was an expensive attempt for it cost them two whole battalions.

The courage displayed by the 15th Hussars at this battle won even the admiration of our allies, greatly as they disliked us. In 1800 the Emperor of Germany (the head of the Austrian Empire) sent through the Earl of Minto, Minister at Vienna, the Cross of the Order of Maria Theresa to Colonel Aylett and seven other officers for the gallantry they had displayed.

But the French were far from being dismayed by what they had undergone at the hands of General Otto. A few days later they furiously assailed the whole of the Duke of York's force. They did their very best to win, for that sinister body in Paris, the Committee of Public Safety, had intimated that any further reverses would be treated as crimes. General Chapius suggested waiting, but the Committee would not listen, so he attacked with his entire force, consisting of 3,000 cavalry, 25,000 infantry, and 75 pieces of cannon. One division of 10,000 men was sent to Ligny, where it attacked the redoubt at Troisvilles defended by Colonel Congreve. The second column was marched to Beausois, but fear of the Committee proved too strong, so it wheeled about and rejoined its companions.

General Otto, who had been carefully watching the disposition of the French, having ascertained that their flank, which rested on the village of Caudry, was only defended by 2,000 infantry and 500 dragoons and six guns, decided to fall on this weak wing with his horse.

General Mausel with 1,450 British cavalry, a division of Austrian cuirassiers, and a body of the Archduke Ferdinand's Hussars, bore down like a torrent on the village of Caudry.

After slaughtering the small force in charge, the British turned their attention to the main body of the French army.

Mauser rifles and quick-firing guns were unknown in those days, the sword being the usual weapon. It did rare execution amongst the serried ranks of the French that day. General Chapius sent down a regiment of Carbineers to check our progress.

The Austrian horse hung back, but the British, shaking themselves clear of the French foot, went pell-mell at the French horse and sent them flying.

This battle seems to have consisted of nothing but charges.

The rashness we displayed was so supremely ridiculous that the French would most certainly have annihilated us had they retained their presence of mind.

After disposing of the Carbineers our men descried some cannon posted on an eminence. There were fourteen fully-manned guns confronting us and the road to these led across a ravine exposed to a murderous fire. The Austrians were asked to join, but pleaded that their horses were tired.

So the British went alone. They trotted in open order till the ravine was cleared, then they closed their files and broke into a canter.

Although the French were firing grape we made straight for the guns; a good many saddles were emptied during that memorable ride, but not a single artilleryman escaped alive.

This decided the day.

The victory was greatly magnified in this country. The Evening Mail of May 14th gravely asserted that the French lost in killed alone 14,000 men, which is hardly likely. Fifty pieces of artillery were captured, of which forty were claimed by us.

Had the Duke of York brought his infantry up, we should probably have captured the entire French Army.

Whatever may have been the merits of the Duke of York as a strategist, he had none of the dulness so often found in the Georges. To stimulate the prowess of his men in the battle of Caudry he offered prizes in money for all munitions captured. In a General Order dated May 12, 1794, the following sums were offered for captures. "For each cannon or howitzer £20. For each pair of colours £10. For each tumbril £10. For each horse (alive) £12." No wonder the Duke was known in the army as the "Soldier's Friend."

On May 18, 1794, the Duke of York was surrounded at Turcoine by large bodies of French. Our men offered a desperate resistance, but they somehow got so muddled up that even a charge was impossible. The consequence was that French took 1,500 prisoners and guns. Badly as we were handled the capture of our artillery cost the assailants 4,000 men.

Our brave fellows retrieved this disaster a few days after at Pont-a-chin, where Pichegru, the French commander, after declaring that our repeated victories over the armies of France had been owing to a foolish superstition, scorned a defensive battle, and fell on us with a splendidly equipped army of 100,000 men. In this battle the Duke of York had insisted that the allies should do their fair share of fighting.

To their credit be it recorded that the Prussians and some of the Austrians fought well from 5 a.m. to 3 p.m. After this they began to waver.

The Duke, seeing this, sent up some British infantry.

Our men only fired one volley and then rushed forward, never stopping until they landed in the middle of the enormous French army. Nothing more was seen of them for half-an-hour. The flight of the French at length revealed them.

They were guarding fifty pieces of cannon they had captured, in the hopes that the prizes which had been given for war material would be continued.

At this time the Reign of Terror was in full force, and Europe shuddered at what would happen if the power of France were not quickly checked.

On the approach of winter the French entered Amsterdam, and, the Zuyder Zee being frozen over, the singular spectacle was presented of a fleet being captured by a land force.

The Duke of York, having to return to England, had handed over the army to General Walmoden who, on the advance of the French, retreated to Westphalia.

The public at home now clamoured for the recall of the army, which, coming to the ears of the allies, led to their perpetrating the most shameful barbarities on our sick and wounded. Those of our men, and alas! they were but few, who had borne up against the rigour of the winter, kept our friends at bay till we reached Bremen, whence in March, 1795, the troops sailed for England.

The war of the Netherlands is not one we have any reason to be proud of, although we did nearly all the fighting.

Some of the battles fought in this war showed the British soldier at his best; but we could not prevent the endless quarrelling which went on amongst the allies. It was internal dissension which eventually led to the triumph of the French.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXXI.—HE LEVELLED ALL DISTINCTIONS, AND A TRAMP LEVELLED HIM.

Mr. Bowser had come home not exactly mad, but he was in that state of mind known as "techy." He found Mrs. Bowser so pleasant, the dinner so good and the house looking so well that he couldn't find fault with anything until he sat down to his evening paper.

He hadn't been reading more than five minutes when he burst out with:

"By George, I have always said it would come to this, and here it is!"

"Has another king been assassinated?" asked Mrs. Bowser without much interest.

"No, there hasn't, but there has been something nearly as bad. Just listen to this: A millionaire who got on a 'bus for a short ride found himself alongside one of his employés. What do you suppose he did?"

"Bowed to him and offered to pay his fare probably."

"He did, eh? That's all you know about it. It so happens that he called the conductor and had the employé put off. He said he didn't propose to ride along with the riff-raff. My goodness, how I'd like to have been there! Because the man had accumulated a few thousand pounds he looked upon common humanity as so much dirt. He wouldn't even ride with a man who had to earn his daily bread by the sweat of his brow."

"It was silly for him to make such an exhibition of himself," said Mrs. Bowser, "but there is no call for you to get a stroke of apoplexy over it."

"But don't you see all this helps to preserve the aristocracy in this country—don't you see it?" he shouted as he waved the paper on high and brought the cat out from under the sofa to see what the row was about.

"Well, what of it? Why should you care?"

"I care because all men were born free and equal; because one man is as good as another; because money don't make the man. That's what ails the poor man to-day. We are trying to class him with the animals of the field. It's this shoddy aristocracy drawing its skirts away from the labouring man that makes socialists and anarchists. Because we happen to have a few thousand pounds in the bank are we better than our washerwoman or the man who clears away the rubbish?"

"I haven't heard of your inviting them to dinner or sitting down to tell stories."

"Then, by thunder, you will, and this very night too!" he roared as he kicked over a chair and started to stamp about. "The people of this country want to know who are the snobs. I'll soon prove to which class I belong!"

He started for the front hall and had his hat on before Mrs. Bowser could ask him what he was going to do. Without replying to the question he passed out of doors, and from the parlour window she saw him halting by the gate and gaze earnestly up the road.

"My friend, you are a man."

He didn't have to wait there long. A tramp who had been loafing at the corner and accosting a score of persons in vain for money to get a bed soon came shuffling along. He was debating whether to ask or not when Mr. Bowser observed:

"My friend, you are a man."

"I expect I am," was the reply.

"And as a man you are just as good as I am. Because I happen to be better off in this world's goods than you are I have no right to look down on you."

"Say, old man," remarked the tramp as a grin spread over his face, "unless you are drunk you are talking uncommon good sense. I like to hear it."

"I am neither drunk nor a snob," continued Mr. Bowser. "I say you are a man born free and equal. As a man, you are entitled to my respect, whether you are a millionaire or a labouring man."

"And you don't set yourself up as being above me?"

"No, sir."

"And I'm as good as you are?"

"Just as good."

Digitized by Google

There was a row in which the dining-room was almost wrecked.

"Shake hands, old man! You don't know how you encourage me. If I'm as good as you are, then mebbe—mebbe——"

"Come in and have dinner, and after that we'll talk. There'll be no aristocracy in this country soon if a man of my size can prevent it."

"You ain't goin' to git me in there to give me the boot?" asked the tramp as he hung back and wondered over his good luck.

"I am going to treat you as an equal. Come along."

The man was taken to the dining-room and the cook ordered to give him his dinner. She looked in wonder and astonishment and demurred, but Mr. Bowser insisted, and she reluctantly complied.

When the fellow had got well to work, Mr. Bowser went upstairs to explain what he had done and what was to follow, but Mrs. Bowser had gone to her room. He was minded to call her down and ask her to play the piano, but on second thoughts he decided not to rush the business too much at first.

After twenty minutes he went down, but the tramp was still going strong with knife and fork. He had asked for something to wash it down, and the cook had put on a bottle of claret, with which he was making free. Mr. Bowser winced a little, but gave him a quarter of an hour more.

At the end of that time there was still a piece of the second loaf of bread left, and it was about ten minutes more before the tramp had finished. A cask of food and a bottle of wine had restored the gall of the "equal" to its pristine glory, and shoving back from the table at last with a sigh of contentment, he pounded on the board with his knife and called to the girl:

"Hey, slavey, bring hither one of the old man's perfectos and let the wrapper be speckled!"

"How dare you talk that way to me?" demanded the indignant cook.

"A perfecto, pot wrestler, or out you go!"

Mr. Bowser heard from the head of the stairs, and his hair began to rise.

Running down, he said:

"Look here, ain't you rather over-doing this thing?"

"Not at all, old bird," was the smiling reply. "We are both men and equals. You have the splosh and I'm dead broke. It's your business to divide. How are you situated for cash?"

"I'll show you how I'm situated. There is the door! I want no more of your society!"

"But you can't turn me off that way old man—oh, no! My name is Jim the Sticker. When I gets a good thing, I hangs on. Don't go back on what you said about all men being equal."

Mr. Bowser again ordered him out, but as he refused to go he was taken hold of to be assisted.

He didn't propose to drop the equality business without a struggle. and there was a row in which the dining-room was almost wrecked and Mr. Bowser was badly knocked about.

By the time the cook had brought a policeman and Mrs. Bowser and the cat had got down stairs the tramp had filled his pockets with knives, forks and spoons and got away. Nothing could be said to the man left lying on the floor on his back. He had levelled all distinctions and been levelled himself.

M. Quad.

[Next Week.—He Does a Bit of House-cleaning while Mrs. Bowser is Away.]

A - SPLENDID - NOVEL.

Now Ready, Cheap Edition.

THE INVISIBLE MAN.

By H. G. Wells.

Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," etc.

Price 6d.

POST FREE 8d.

"The story is told with that fertility of imaginative resource which has made Wells conspicuous in this domain of fiction."—Daily Chronicle.

"Written in the author's merriest and most provoking mood."—Sunday Times.

"The tragedy is always on the brink of farce until we reach the last page and a piece of wholly pathetic tragedy. The hunted terror of society is caught at last, and most pitiful is the re-entry he makes into the invisible world he left so boldly."—Saturday Review.

At all Bookstalls, Booksellers, and of C. A. Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

PAST THE POST.

"I TELL you the beast must be pulled!"

The slightly-built man, who looked little more than a lad, fixed a pair of sad, hollow eyes upon the ground between the pointed toes of his boots, and listened to his companion's imperious directions in mute despair.

"It's done every day for much less than this affair means to either you or me," the other urged. "It means beggary to me and prison to you if the beast get's home. If it doesn't, you shall have that unfortunate cheque together with a hundred pound note the evening following."

"I never pulled a mount yet, Mr. Hall, and I'm hanged if I do now," the jockey ejaculated through his set teeth.

"It will mean prison for you, then."

"I dare say it will," cried the jockey in a shrill voice. "You kept that cheque until you knew it was too late for me to prove I didn't forge it, and now you come and threaten me with it unless I do your dirty work. I won't do it, prison or no prison, so I tell you straight; Besides, who told you I'm riding Merrymay?"

"Do you take me for a mole?" said Mr. Hall. "I know you have been asked to ride the beast, and if you refuse or fail to pull him—well, you know how unpleasant will be the consequences."

"I suppose you've got on to The Baker for all you're worth," Sillings said thoughtfully.

"That's none of your business. The Baker's got to win, that's all you need worry about, and if you pull Merrymay, all will be well."

"For you—yes: I don't doubt it. But what about Lord Shannon? P'r'aps you don't know that he backed my mount for all he's worth, and that Merrymay is relied upon to pay off the mortgage on his estate? A win to The Baker would be absolute ruin to his lordship."

"More fool he! I can't be expected to drop all my money because a friend has backed the horse to win. Now look here, Joe; don't let us have any more words about the matter. Will you or will you not ride and pull?"

"No."

"Tut! Confound you! What do you think Miss Mastman will say when you're thrown into gaol, and branded a felon? What will she say when she knows that you have been courting her with the crime of a forgery upon your conscience, such a high-minded young woman as she, too?"

"She'd think less bad of me than if I pulled Merrymay," Sillings returned in a hushed voice.

"Well, put it another way. How can you marry her after three or four years in prison? You may not get 'beefy' in gaol, but your skill will be spoilt, your name will be ruined, your career, which at present promises to carry you into the first rank of jockeys, will be cut short. In a word, you will be hopelessly ruined!"

"Surely the Prince of Tempters might come to you for hints!" the jockey hissed. "But even if Merrymay loses, The Baker may not win. He may go all wrong within the next three days. Then where will you be?"

"Fool! I have not backed The Baker; I have laid against Merrymay. If The Baker turns up fit on the course, then I may back him. But that is quite beside the point."

There, apparently, was Joe Sillings' last hope gone. No compromise between him and his tempter was possible. He had to choose between prison and ruins the loss of the girl he loved and degradation in her eye, which was perhaps even worse than losing her, and the mere tightening of a rein.

"Which will you do?"

"I'll think it over, and you shall see," the jockey replied weakly.

"Can't you decide now? Think what 'No' means to you."

"Can't you decide in your own mind what I shall do when the time comes?" Sillings replied doggedly.

"Yes, I think I can, Joe," said Mr. Hall, smiling quietly. "You're a wise man, Joe. The pros are out of all proportion to the cons."

"Have you anything else to say?"

"No, I don't think so."

"Then get out of my paddock, Cuthbert Hall."

Mr. Hall knew he had succeeded in his mission, and therefore took this insult with better temper than he would otherwise have done.

He went away without a word, but with a smiling face and a light heart.

Sillings watched him disappear, and groaned.

He was in the hollow of the man's hand, and how could he surrender a successful career, a life's possibilities and a life's love to race-course ethics. Yet was it merely a question of race-course ethics? Was it not rather an ephemeral effort which would be reflected by his conscience through all his life; an effort which would ruin many a home, and wreck many a life?

On the other hand there was no certainty in horse-racing and those men who had backed, or would back, Merrymay to win knew they might lose; and if he pulled the horse, and the world knew why, would not his reason justify him before all except those who had lost by this act?

Digitized by Google

He wandered through his stables, his heart lonely and sick within him, debating with himself which course he should take; and it suddenly occurred to him that if he could discover the whereabouts of his old friend, John Grainger, all would yet be well; John could prove that he never committed the forgery.

But where was John? Perhaps a thousand miles away, perhaps in the very next town. He had not heard anything of him for three years, and knew no one who had. John might be dead. Still there was hope in this idea. He would endeavour to find John before the day of the race, and if he failed—then, he would have to choose.

* * * * *

Late in the evening of the following day Cuthbert Hall was hurrying about his chambers in Sloane Street, preparing everything so far as he could to enable him to get down to Epsom early, without the necessity for rising before his usually late hour.

He was in high feather, flushed and not absolutely sober. He was looking for the morrow as a day that would see his making, a day of events which would wipe out his financial difficulties and put a handsome fortune in his pocket, and a day too which would ruin for ever the chances of his friend Lord Shannon redeeming his fortune sufficiently to marry Clair Dudley.

Mr. Hall was not the man to play half any game; he laid a plot to enrich himself, and developed it to ruin his rival. He had schemed for months to reach these ends, and he had omitted nothing which could further either object.

He had even forged a note to meet a creditor, whom he could easily have paid, to husband for a day or two a few hundred pounds which he would lay to his own gain. Then he would redeem the note, he decided, and wipe the matter out.

It was all planned to the finest point, and he was naturally elated. It was the honey of satisfaction to him to prepare for the eventful morrow.

At last when all seemed done, he paused and pondered to know if there were nothing else he could do to anticipate the next day. Then he sat down at his writing table, and took a cash-box from a drawer. From the cash-box he extracted a folded cheque.

He satisfied himself that it was the one he wanted, took a sheet of plain note-paper and, pinning the cheque to it, wrote, "The B.N. follows to-morrow." He folded the two up, slipped them into an envelope which he closed, addressed and stamped.

"He shall have the hundred to-morrow," he said, glancing down at the letter upon the blotting pad, as he rose and lit a cigarette; "meanwhile I can make four or five of it. I will take this with me, post it at the station on my return to town, and he will see I am a man who keeps his word in either way."

He smoked the cigarette half through in restless meditation, and, then, as if struck by a sudden thought, went out of the room, picked up a hat and stick from the hall rack, and passed out of the building.

He had not been gone three minutes, when his man entered the room. His heavy eyes wandered over the room from one object to another until they rested upon the letter.

Picking it up, he read the superscription apathetically, and he glanced at the clock on the mantelshelf.

"Juggins!" he muttered calmly. "I thought he was a bit wavey to-night. Two minutes to twelve. I can just catch it, and if I don't, I suppose I shall catch it—in another way."

Reluctant to cross the muddy road in his indoor shoes, he made a detour to a crossing and posted the letter at the box opposite the chamber buildings. He returned by way of the crossing, availed himself of the lift and entered the flat just behind his master who had used the staircase.

"Been out, Pink?" Mr. Hall inquired.

"Posted your letter, sir."

"Posted—my—! You blithering idiot!" cried the master, white with fear and rage. "Where did you post it?"

Pink told him and followed him down the stairs, three steps at a time, and across the road.

With fumbling fingers, Mr. Hall struck a match and looked at the little enamelled plate which indicated the time the box would next be cleared.

"Eight-twenty! The box is cleared. Oh, you vast fool!" he cried, turning passionately upon Pink.

He sprang into a hansom and drove to the district sorting office, with all possible haste.

"By mistake a few minutes ago my man posted a letter in the pillar-box at Camden Street corner," he said to an official who came forward. "It is of vital importance that it should not be delivered. It was addressed to Mr. Joseph Sillings, Darcy Lodge, Epsom. The box has been cleared."

"Are you sure it was posted?"

"Absolutely."

"Then I cannot help you; once posted the letter belongs to the Postmaster-General until it is delivered at the address of the addressee."

"But I must have it, man!"

"Out of the question, sir."

It was useless to argue; the official was obdurate.

"What time will it be delivered?" Hall asked anxiously.

"Epsom, you say? Between eleven and twelve—about eleven."

And Joe Sillings would not be on the course until one or two o'clock! He would probably get the letter before leaving home. Why, in that case, should he pull Merrymay?

Hall strode out of the office in a frenzy of rage and despair.

Somehow he must draw Sillings away from his house before the letter arrived there and keep the letter from him till after the race. But how?

"Pink," he said, when he had got back to his chambers, "I want you to send a telegram for me."

"Sillings, Epsom. Meet me Leatherhead Station eleven sharp, Wednesday. Important. John Grainger," was how he worded the message.

"That will draw him if nothing else will," Hall said, as he affixed a sixpenny stamp.

But even when this was posted he was uneasy in his mind; he knew Sillings would be at Leatherhead Station at the time appointed, that he would wait anxiously for the appearance of Grainger, and that the chances were a thousand to one against Sillings returning home before the race was run.

But there was the bare chance that the prematurely-posted letter would get to Sillings' hands in some way before Merrymay was paraded, and Hall could do nothing to obviate this contingency.

Next morning, however, refreshed by sleep and no longer muddled by drink, Hall was perfectly sanguine. On his way down to Epsom, he had sent a telegram to Sillings' head groom to ask where his master was, and at Epsom telegraph office he found awaiting him a reply to the effect that Sillings had gone early to Leatherhead to meet a friend.

Digitized by Google

This was good news indeed, but opened an ugly doubt for Hall.

Sillings' groom was almost certain to attend the race, and the letter must already have arrived at Darcy Lodge; and might not the groom take it to his master? It was a torturous doubt.

By chance, however, Hall met the groom just outside Epsom station, and satisfied himself that the man had not brought the letter, which had not arrived when Sillings left home, and that no one else was coming from Darcy Lodge to the meeting.

Lounging about the paddock some considerable time later, Hall caught sight of Sillings out of the corners of his eyes.

The jockey's face was pale and haggard, and there was a hard, sad look about his mouth.

"What a fool the man is," Hall said to himself. "One would imagine he was required to do murder."

Shortly afterwards Merrymay passed by where Hall was standing. Sillings was up in his purple and white silk.

Instinctively he turned his head, and as he caught sight of Hall, he gave him a look of mute despair. But Hall did not see it.

He was running his eye over The Baker and admiring the horse's wonderful condition, which so impressed him that he moved off and laid every penny he had with him upon the animal.

By the time he had edged himself into a good position for viewing the race the starters were already off. He could just make out the coloured jackets of the jockeys bobbing along in the distance.

The Baker was third to get off and Merrymay was running in a batch of five of the field behind the first three.

"How-d'ye-do, sir," said a voice over Hall's shoulder.

Hall turned and blanched as he recognised the sunburnt chubby face of John Grainger.

He could find no words to speak in his surprise and alarm.

Fate was surely trying to unhinge his mind; first by the hideous mistake about the letter, and now by John Grainger, the vanished man, turned up at such a time. If he had seen Sillings the day was lost, the lifetime ruined!

"I only arrived from South America last night, sir, but seeing my old friend Joe Sillings was up on a favourite in the big race I was bound to come down." Grainger explained.

"Have you seen Sillings?" Hall inquired hoarsely.

"Not to speak to, but I've put a pony on his mount, you may be sure."

Hall turned his head away and shuddered. Fate had played a waiting game with him, he thought, but luck was all on his side.

There, behind him, breathing in his very ear was the one man on earth, who, by a few moments conversation with Sillings, could have ruined his masterly schemes, and snatched Sillings out of his net; and he had come too late.

Twice in twenty-four hours Hall had been in an ace of ruin, and had been saved by chance.

There was a roar, and a pushing forward of the crowds that lined the course, as the horses swerved round the bend and began to come down the straight.

"Marcus!" roared half the crowd, "Haresfoot!" yelled the other half as two horses broke from the leading five and challenged each other.

There was a panting pause, then a roar that made the blood tingle in Hall's flushed cheek.

"The Baker!" shouted the crowd together, as another horse overtook Marcus and Haresfoot and showed them his heels.

A moment later a fluttering patch of white and purple seemed to leap forward.

It flashed past Marcus and Haresfoot, and began to overhaul The Baker.

"Merrymay does it! Merrymay!"

Inch by inch Merrymay drew down upon The Baker. The shadow of the favourite's nose flickered on The Baker's thigh, then upon its flank, ribs and shoulder, and then The Baker's nose began to fall back from the level of Merrymay's shoulder, to its thigh; when suddenly Merrymay seemed to pick himself up and leap forward a hundred yards—two hundred yards, and Merrymay had won.

* * * * *

Half-an-hour later Hall, white, haggard, and aged by many a year, too desperate to hurry from the scene of his ruin without an understanding with Sillings, met the jockey face to face.

Sillings was no less pale and hardly less haggard than Hall, but there was a triumphant light in his face which was naturally wanting in Hall's.

"You blackguard!" Hall hissed, half-raising his stick.

"You can't honestly call me that," said Sillings quietly. "Not now, at least; I've given all my world to keep faith with Merrymay's backers, and I gave you the chance to hedge. I know what it means to me—ruin, unless I can find John Grainger."

"To hedge?" Hall ejaculated.

"Aye; I sent you a telegram to tell you that Merrymay was not as fit as might be, but if the horse could win he should."

Hall turned and slunk away.

He crept to the station, into a train. He crawled to his chambers by back streets to avoid meeting acquaintances.

Pink greeted him.

"There's a telegram for you, sir," said Pink. "It came a few minutes after you'd gone."

Hall snatched it up and read:

"Merrymay none too fit. But if can win shall.—Sillings."

Hall groaned.

* * * * *

At precisely the same moment Sillings at Darcy Lodge was burning a cheque he had found waiting him.

He watched it crumble away in the flames, and smiled up at John Grainger who stood by, watching him.

C. Randolph-Lichfield.

FUN ON THE BILLIARD TABLE.

A Collection of 75 Amusing Tricks and Games, with Photographs and Diagrams.

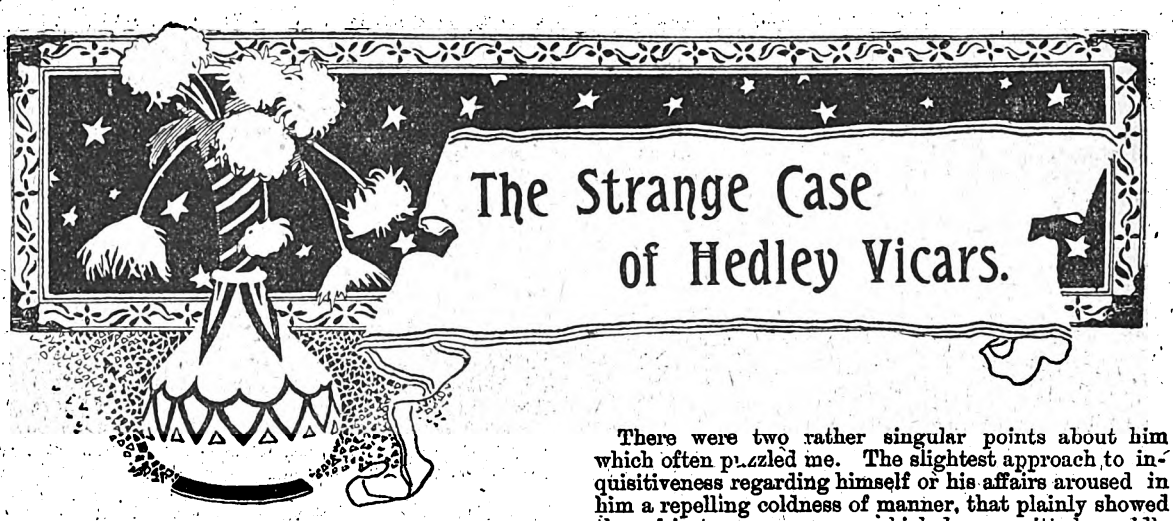
By "STANCLIFFE."

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 2s. 6d.

"To say that no billiard-room should be without this joyous and ingenious little volume is nothing; there is no player, amateur or professional, who would not get his moneysworth out of it."—Sportsman.

C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google



The Strange Case of Hedley Vicars.

If one looks down upon a peaceful valley, where a blue wreath of smoke curls upwards from some quiet homestead, and notes the tranquility, the air of repose which surrounds the dwelling, it is hard to realise that under such a roof there may be lives, that jar, aching hearts, hatred and discord.

And yet such is not infrequently the case.

So, too, is it in the lives of some of those around us. Outwardly they may appear calm and unruffled, yet, unsuspected by their closest friends, a consuming fire may be raging within.

The ever-present, torturing memory of some dark tragedy in the past is often cloaked from the world under a smiling exterior.

Some such reflections as these always come uppermost in my mind when I think of the strange case of Hedley Vicars.

Few knew Vicars as well as I did; fewer still had the remotest suspicion that there was any hidden mystery in his life. To have even hinted at the possibility of such a thing would doubtless have provoked an incredulous laugh, for he was one of those men upon whom fortune had showered her favours with a lavish hand.

A bachelor with an income that ran well into four figures, devoid of extravagant tastes, his lot was one which most people would have envied.

If you add to this that he was in full enjoyment of vigorous health—a fine specimen of an athlete, in point of fact—good-tempered, generous, and popular with his fellows, there seemed to be no room in his life for care of any kind.

Though he had abundant opportunities of doing so, Vicars was not the man to make many friends.

Indeed, even among those who knew him best, close intimacy was out of the question. He held you at arm's length at first, and it was only by slow degrees that you succeeded in penetrating his reserve. Even then there was a point at which you were brought up as by a dead wall.

What lay beyond, what thoughts or memories were stored in that hidden quarter, none could tell. In his company, when I had got to know him pretty well, an irksome sense of that impassable barrier in his nature was ever present to my mind.

There were two rather singular points about him which often puzzled me. The slightest approach to inquisitiveness regarding himself or his affairs aroused in him a repelling coldness of manner, that plainly showed the subject was one upon which he permitted no idle curiosity.

Then, if you happened to be with him in public, he had a strange way of whisking round suddenly and peering into the crowd behind him, as if he recognised the tones of some particular voice.

Moreover, though he had a fine musical ear, a woman's singing, no matter how enthralling to others, seemed to jar upon him as if it were nothing but a medley of harsh and discordant notes.

It was in the summer of '92 that a curious incident of this kind occurred. Vicars had a houseboat on the Thames, which he was wont to inhabit for a month or two every year.

I had run down from town to spend the week-end with him, and talk over a contemplated trip up the Nile during the coming autumn.

One evening we were lounging along the banks of the river in our flannels. The splash and ripple of the stream, the drowsy hum of insects, and the imperceptible shading away of day into night produced a quietude of mind, a tendency to meditation, that such scenes alone can evoke. That peculiar fresh-water smell was in the air; occasionally a skiff glided by with a scarcely audible sound of oars, or a distant peal of laughter came from some merry boating party.

Vicars was strolling along slightly in advance of me. Suddenly, to my surprise, I saw him stop short in the midst of a stride, turn his head towards the river, and appear to listen with the utmost intentness. I paused—held my breath for a moment—but all I could hear were the faint, far-off strains of a woman's voice, which were wafted down to us through the still, hot air.

I stepped up to my companion and looked at him. I was so little prepared for what I saw that it struck home to me like a shock. Even in the waning light I could see that his face was ghastly white. His eyes were fixed in a wild, unearthly stare, and his whole aspect that of a man stricken by some sudden and appalling terror.

"Good Heavens! Vicars, what is the matter?" I cried, clutching him by the arm.

Without a word he shook off my hold, swung round on his heel, and was off to the houseboat with long, swinging strides. I followed hastily, but he had disappeared below before I got back. As I stood for a moment on the bank I caught the gleam of light in his room, the window of which was open. Stooping down,

Digitized by Google

I glanced inside. Vicars was striding up and down there, swinging his arms about in a wild and frenzied manner, and clapping his hand to his head every few seconds.

I saw no more of him that night.

* * * * *

Early in the following September we started for Egypt, intending to make a short stay in Cairo before proceeding further upon our journey. It was there that the next scene of this singular drama took place.

We were returning rather late from the house of an English resident, with whom we had become acquainted on board ship.

It was a simply perfect night, I remember—still, sultry, with a brilliant moon riding high in the heavens. The black, sharply-defined shadows of the houses cut across the white glare that flooded the streets.

As we strolled along towards our hotel, puffing our late host's excellent cigars, we both seemed rather disposed to silence. Vicars was strolling on the inside, and I noticed that his eyes were bent thoughtfully on the ground. For myself, the strange jabber and chatter that came from dark corners engrossed most of my attention, and I vainly endeavoured to distinguish the dusky forms of the speakers as we moved past.

At the other side of the street, which was in the shade, an open window, with a glow of light streaming from it, caught my eye. Why I should have noticed it I cannot say, except, perhaps, there might have been some hazy thought floating through my mind as to whether the occupants of that particular house were regular inhabitants of the city, or strangers like ourselves.

As we approached the spot, the mellow chords of some stringed instrument floated out to us through the open window.

The next moment the full, rich, thrilling notes of a woman's voice seemed to fill the deserted street with a burst of melody.

Instinctively I paused to listen, facing round towards the house, and oblivious to all else save the ravishing strains that poured forth into the night.

Never in my life have I listened to such a song! The power, the pathos, the intense and vivid emotion, thrilled to the very depths of my soul. It seemed to lift you out of yourself, to transport, to bear you away to the realms of the spiritual. To this day I have no recollection of the words, but I hung upon every note of the song in breathless ecstasy.

As the voice died away into a low, melancholy cadence, like a parting wail, I suddenly became conscious of a sound behind me as if someone was scratching at the plaster of the wall. With a quick foreboding of something wrong, I turned sharply on my heel. Good Heavens! to my last day I will never forget that sight.

Vicars was leaning back against the wall, his hat and his reeking cigar lying at his feet.

The ghastly look in his eyes was appalling, his ashen features were quivering, and he moaned feebly from time to time as if in the clutch of some overpowering horror. His hands, hanging by his sides, kept clawing spasmodically at the wall, until the tips of his fingers were torn and bleeding.

I sprang towards him, for his body was slowly inclining to one side, and his legs seemed about to fail him.

My touch appeared to galvanize him. He started upright, grabbed me by the arm, and literally dragged me away from the spot. I had barely time to stoop and pick up his hat before we were hurrying off down the street at a rapid pace.

Not until we had turned the corner did he seem to recollect himself. Then he took his hat from my hand, jammed it on his head, and strode off without looking to right or left.

When we got back to the hotel, he parted from me abruptly in the hall, went straight up to his own room, and locked himself in.

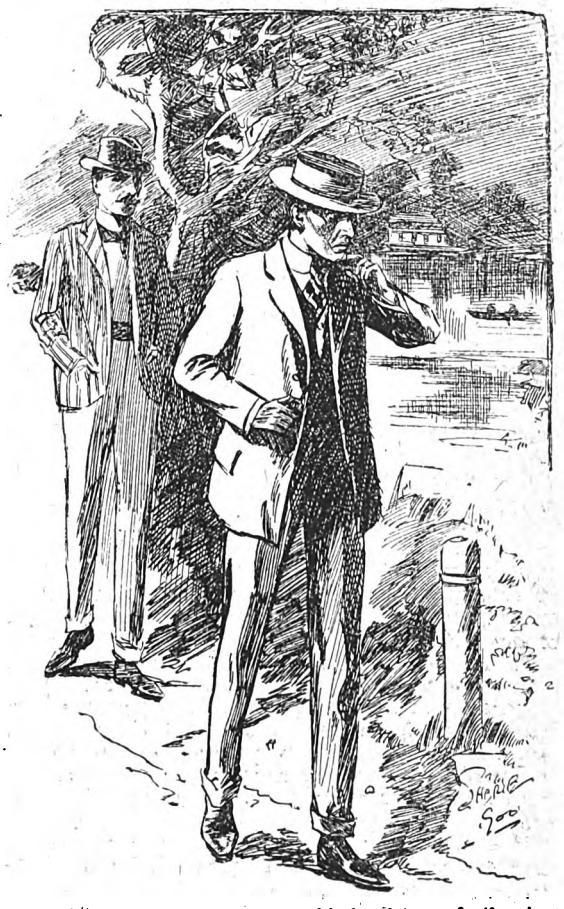
All through the night, whenever I awoke—and my rest was by no means tranquil—I heard him pacing his floor.

Not until long after daybreak did that monotonous tramp tramp in the next room cease.

The following morning he came down rather late, his face white and drawn, and a restless, scared look in his eyes. It was plain that he had received a shock the night before, and a bad one too. When I joined him in the hall he was giving instructions to have his luggage dispatched to the Nile steamer forthwith.

"What! tired of Cairo already?" I said, in a bantering tone, for I did not wish him to think I suspected the cause of this sudden departure.

"Yes, sick of it!" he answered, avoiding my eye. "I am off up the Nile. Will you come?"



I saw him stop short, and turn his head towards the river.

Digitized by Google

Vicars was leaning back against the wall, his hat and cigar lying at his feet.

"Of course I will," I replied. "I think we have pretty well exhausted the attractions here, and the sooner we hear the roar of the cataracts the better."

Not until we had put a hundred miles or so between us and Cairo did Vicars begin to pluck up heart a little and seem to take any interest in his surroundings.

Still, a marked change had come over him; he was subject to long fits of depression, of brooding melancholy, from which he would start up suddenly, and gaze around him with wild, horror-stricken eyes. It was plain that the old morbid fancy regarding a familiar voice at his elbow was stronger in him than ever.

Sometimes, in the hush of evening, as we sat alone under the awning on deck, he used to jump from his chair, hasten to the side, and stand there in the attitude of one who was straining his ears to catch some distant sound.

"Did you hear anything?" he would ask, in an awed whisper.

"No; not a sound. Did you?"

"I thought—I fancied—it seemed to me as if there was someone singing—over there, on the opposite bank. I could have sworn I recognised the voice, too."

"Imagination, my dear fellow," I answered, dragging him back to his seat. "Pure imagination!"

This sort of thing went on day after day, night after night.

To tell the truth I was by no means sorry when we put about, and headed down stream again.

These strange fancies of Vicars' were rather trying to one's nerves.

A voice—a woman's voice—the same which we had heard in Cairo no doubt—seemed to be perpetually ringing in his ears. It haunted him early and late; it sometimes brought him to my berth in the small hours of the morning with the eager questions, "You heard it? Surely you heard it just now?"

In six weeks, much to my relief, we were back in England.

Upon reaching London I parted from my companion, and saw little of him during the winter months. I rather fancy he was anxious to avoid me, for whenever we met there was a certain constraint on both sides, a consciousness on my part and on his, that the thoughts of each went back to that scene in the moonlit streets of Cairo.

* * * * *

In the following spring, just as I got back from a short trip to the South of France, I was surprised to receive a note from Vicars, begging me to come round to his rooms that evening.

Not having seen or heard of him for months, this sudden summons revived my interest in him, and I began to wonder how he had employed himself in the interval.

Vicars occupied a roomy flat in a quiet West End street. As I knocked at his door that evening, it suddenly occurred to me that if the woman's voice still haunted him, he might possibly have broken down under the strain.

But I was little prepared for the actual reality. As I entered his room I found him stretched upon the couch, hollow-cheeked, shrunken in face and figure, with wild, glittering eyes, and the look of a man who had some abiding horror ever before him; a mere ghost of his former self, in fact.

He greeted me in an abstracted manner, as if his mind were running upon something else, and motioned me to a seat near him. No sooner had I sat down, than he leant towards me and said:

"Fenwick, she is here—in London."

"Who?"

"That woman."

"Whom we heard in Paris?"

"Yes."

He dropped back on his cushions, turned away his head, and groaned aloud.

I was much distressed at his condition, shocked by the terrible change in him, but scarcely knew what to say.

"Fenwick," he went on, presently, facing round towards me again, "I regard you as a friend. That time in Egypt you displayed a consideration, a delicacy of feeling, which I am not likely to forget. If I tell you a strange story, you will, I am sure, keep it strictly to yourself. I must open my mind to someone, or this solitary brooding day after day will drive me mad."

He paused, and with a trembling hand wiped the cold moisture from his forehead.

"It is close this evening," he murmured, "and the room seems to be rather stuffy. Would you mind opening the window a little?"

I rose and crossed the room for this purpose. Just as I raised the sash, I happened to glance across the street. On the other side, directly opposite the house, two women were standing, surrounded by a little knot of curious passers-by.

Digitized by Google

One, the younger, wore a thick veil, or sort of mask that reached half-way down her face. Her tall, stately form was in striking contrast to the short, squat figure of her companion. Both were gazing up at the window where I stood.

Suddenly, without the slightest warning, the taller of the two began to sing.

Good Heavens! Was it any wonder that I started? There was no mistaking those clear, rich notes; it was the same voice that I had heard in Cairo!

* * * * *

A shriek from Vicars made me close down the window with a crash and hurry across to his side. He was quivering—gasping—his head rolling from side to side, the frenzy of madness in his eyes. I tried to take his hand, to soothe him, but he waved me back.

"Keep off! Keep off!" he shrieked, flinging his arms into the air. "Don't touch me!"

Glancing helplessly round the room I fortunately discovered a bottle containing an opiate. I measured out a draught, and handed it to Vicars. He swallowed it eagerly.

By this time the singing outside had ceased, and I heard the shuffling of many feet on the pavement as the crowd moved away.

With a weary, long-drawn sigh Vicars closed his eyes, and presently dropped off into a restless, fitful slumber.

Sometimes he woke up with a start, sometimes muttered incoherently about an island, the name of which I could not catch.

I sat with him throughout the greater part of that long tedious night. Day was already breaking when he awoke.

At his request I summoned his servant, who had remained in attendance during the night in an adjoining room.

The man soon had a fire blazing in the grate and got us some strong coffee.

"It was very good of you, Fenwick, to stay with me," said Vicars, when we were alone again. "You deserve my confidence, and you shall have it. Do not disclose my wretched story at present. That is all I ask.

"Some four or five years ago," he went on, "I was wandering about the West Indies. Something—Fate, I suppose—took me out of the beaten track, and I visited several of the smaller islands of the Windward group.

"At one of these—the name does not signify—I made rather a long stay. My headquarters were at a little town on the coast, but I spent most of my time in exploring the interior.

"The luxuriant tropical plants, the rich foliage, and the rare birds that flitted about overhead, all had a charm for me. The solitude was profound; it almost seemed as if no foot but my own was ever planted in those forest depths.

"One day I penetrated further than usual, and got into a thick tangle of giant plants, shrubs, and tall grass. I was pushing my way through this dense growth, when a sound reached my ears which brought me to a dead stop. It was a few stray chords of music, coming somewhere from the other side of the leafy screen which surrounded me.

"I listened intently—breathlessly. The music ceased abruptly; but presently, in the intense stillness a burst of glorious melody was wafted to the spot where I stood.

"A woman was singing—pouring out her whole soul in harmony, it seemed. As I hung upon those entrancing notes, I believe they produced much the same effect upon me as they did upon you in Cairo; for it was the same voice—the same woman.

"When the song ceased I hurried forward, and in a few minutes emerged into an open space. In the centre stood a picturesque little cottage, something after the style of a bungalow, with a verandah running round it. There, reclining gracefully in a wicker chair, was the singer—a beautiful girl, who seemed to typify the warm, rich loveliness of the West Indies.

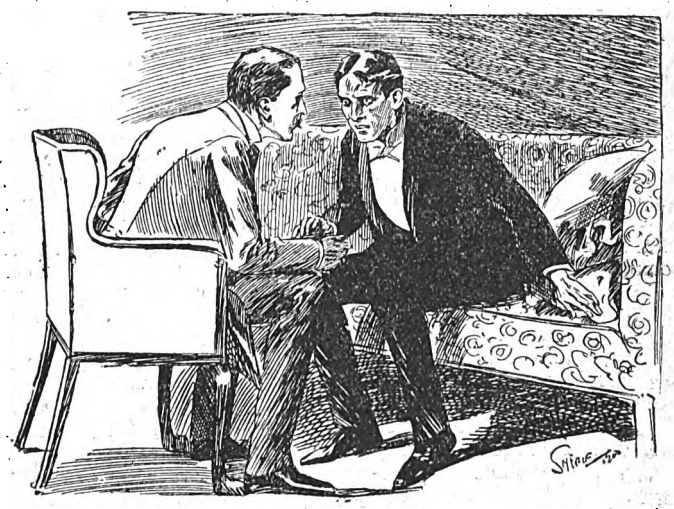
"As she caught sight of me, she sprang to her feet with a startled cry. I stammered out an apology for my intrusion; and by degrees, as if my presence was a welcome break in the monotony of that seclusion, she drifted into conversation. Standing above me on the verandah, her lovely face, and the graceful pose of her figure, formed a charming picture. I noticed that she kept glancing somewhat uneasily into the room behind her, where I fancied I caught the sound of voices.

"From that hour my destiny was sealed. Day after day my steps were directed to this secluded spot. The girl, I found, was a Miss Roupell, the daughter of a wealthy West Indian planter, but now an orphan. The household, so far as I could make out, consisted of herself, one or two negro servants, and a Mrs. Holt, an elderly, taciturn woman, with a face like a rock.

"The few people with whom I had become acquainted on the island could give me little information regarding this Miss Roupell, or why she chose to bury herself in the depths of that solitude.

"That such a lovely creature, who was fitted to shine in any society, should voluntarily lead the life of a recluse, was certainly most strange. Young, accomplished, wealthy, it was difficult to understand why she cut herself off from the world in this way.

"That, however, troubled me little at the time. It was enough for me that she was there. Day after day, week after week, I lounged at her side on the verandah, or we roamed together through the forest shade. Her gentle, loving disposition, her charm of manner, and the



He leant towards me and said: "Fenwick, she is here—in London."

Digitized by Google

unconscious grace which distinguished her, took my heart captive. I adored—I worshipped her.

"Need I tell you how the matter ended? I lingered on from month to month; and then, one glorious morning, I asked Ina—that was her name—to become my wife.

"Though this could not have come as a surprise to her—she must have anticipated it from my manner—she appeared startled and troubled nevertheless.

Standing above me on the verandah, she formed a charming picture.

"For several days she would give me no positive answer. She seemed to be struggling with herself, fighting some battle apparently. At last she gave in, and I won her consent.

"But even then there were times when the same troubled, shrinking look returned. It almost seemed as if she felt there was some insuperable barrier between us.

"She had strange fancies, too, in some respects; for instance, whenever I was with her, she appeared always anxious to roam about outside, instead of remaining in the house.

"One evening, when I had set out upon my return to the coast, I suddenly remembered that I had forgotten to give her a trinket, which I had brought with me that day. I hurried back to the house for this purpose. It was already dusk, and a lamp had just been lighted in one of the lower rooms.

"Feeling sure that Ina was there I sprang upon the verandah with the intention of entering through the window and taking her by surprise.

"Just as I set foot upon the verandah, my mind filled with joyful anticipations, there was a scream of rage in the room, a tumult—an uproar and the sound of heavy blows. The whimpering of a woman—evidently one of the negro servants—and her frantic appeals for mercy, thrilled me with horror. I sprang to the window, and I saw—I saw—oh, merciful Heaven!"

He dropped back on his couch, his breath coming in short, quick gasps, his eyeballs distended. I hastened to get him a stimulant. When he had gulped it down he turned to me again.

"Fenwick," he said, "I have been in many strange lands, and have beheld sights that appalled, that shocked me.

"Once, in South America, I stooped down to pick up out of the grass what I imagined to be a beautifully-marked, rounded stone. Before I touched it, it moved; and I saw that it was the head of a deadly, venomous serpent.

"Strange as it may appear, this very incident flashed through my mind as I stood on the verandah, looking into that room. She—that girl—that beautiful creature—was there, but she was transformed into a tigress, a fiend.

"With blazing eyes, her whole form quivering with rage, she held a stick in her hand, which descended again and again with a horrid thud upon the back of an unfortunate negro girl, who was crouching at her feet.

"Appalled—horrified—I stood there, as if my limbs had been robbed of their power. The next moment Mrs. Holt rushed in, flung her arms round the enraged girl, and dragged her from the room. The negress followed, sobbing bitterly.

"How I got away from the house, how I managed to reach the coast, I cannot remember. Early next morning I was on board a vessel bound for Porto Rico, and from there made the best of my way back to England.

"A year passed. The remembrance of that last dreadful scene I had witnessed was fading away when it was suddenly brought back to me with startling vividness.

"One night in passing a house here in the West End I heard a woman singing in a room on the second floor. I stopped—gasped—and reeled against the area railings. It was her voice!

"Since then it has haunted me. In Brussels, in Venice, in Rome, I have heard it. Go where I might, there was no escape from it. At the very moment that I deemed myself most secure it suddenly burst upon me. On each occasion it brought vividly before me that whole ghastly tragedy in my life; my love for that girl, the happy dream in which I had indulged, and the awful awakening. The thought of it all went through me like a knife.

"From time to time, too, I have received warning from her, all to the same effect. Letters, containing a ingle slip of paper, have constantly reached me. On hat slip, these words were always written:

Digitized by Google

The end is not yet.—I. R.

"And now, in face of it all, I ask myself—what will the end be? How, and when, will it come?"

Poor fellow! he little knew how near it was—on his very threshold, as it were. I left him, promising to look round again in the evening. When I did so, I was shocked to hear that he was dead. That very afternoon, while his servant was out, someone had entered his room and stabbed him to the heart.

* * * * *

The singular story which I had heard from Vicars' own lips made a profound impression upon me. Many and many a time, in the solitude of my own room, I went over it again.

I tried to piece it together, to weave these disjointed incidents into something tangible and coherent, but without success.

How account for that sudden and extraordinary change in the girl?—that transformation from a gentle and winning creature, such as Vicars described her, into a being of fierce and ungovernable passion, and eventually, as seemed only too probable, into a murdress.

In all probability the connecting link would have been for ever lost to me, but for the fact that, about a year afterwards, a friend of mine, Ronald Farquharson, came home on a trip from the West Indies. I gave him the outlines of poor Vicars' story, and he promised to look into the matter on his return.

Six months later I received the following letter from him:

My Dear Fenwick,—

Since I got back here I have made diligent inquiries regarding the Roupell family, and have picked up one or two rather remarkable facts, which ought to throw some light upon that tragic affair you spoke of when I was in England. The history of these people, so far as I have been able to ascertain it, should make good reading for those who hold to the hereditary theory. Here it is:

Old Anthony Roupell, the planter, was a bad lot by all accounts. Cruel, heartless, vindictive, there were about as many evil passions stored up in the man as it would have been possible to squeeze into any one human being. His wife, strange to say, was the very opposite; a gentle, lovable sort of woman, always doing good in her own quiet way. Anthony spent most of his time in flogging and ill-treating his niggers; his wife in bathing and dressing their wounds when he had done with them.

This ill-assorted couple had two daughters—twins. They were so alike that it was almost impossible to tell them apart. Both were gifted with rare musical talent—sang divinely, I hear. But there the resemblance ended, abruptly and finally. In character and disposition they were as widely separated as the North Pole from the South.

Irene, the elder, took after her father, inherited all his bad passions, and I rather fancy must have picked up one or two more on her own account. Ina, the younger, was simply a reproduction of her mother. A noble, true-hearted girl she was—at least, so I have been told. You should hear the niggers speak of her! They fairly idolized her.

After the death of their parents, Miss Irene began to make things lively all round. One day she set to work with her dagger upon a Creole girl, and that little ebullition of temper got her into trouble. In short, she was compelled to fly. Ina, brave girl as she was, would not desert her—stuck to her through thick and thin.

I have been to the island where they sought refuge. It seems that, soon after their arrival there, the elder sister grew so outrageous that for the most part they were compelled to lock her up in her own room. Probably her evil passions, now that they had no vent, boiled within her to such an extent as to drive her to frenzy.

The people there tell how an Englishman—doubtless your friend Vicars—came along one day, and fell desperately in love with Ina. Poor girl! her heart seems to have gone out to him from the very first. That was the one bright period of her existence, but it was quickly followed by the darkness of despair. His sudden and unaccountable desertion came as a death-blow to her. I verily believe it broke her heart. From that hour she drooped, pined away, and died.

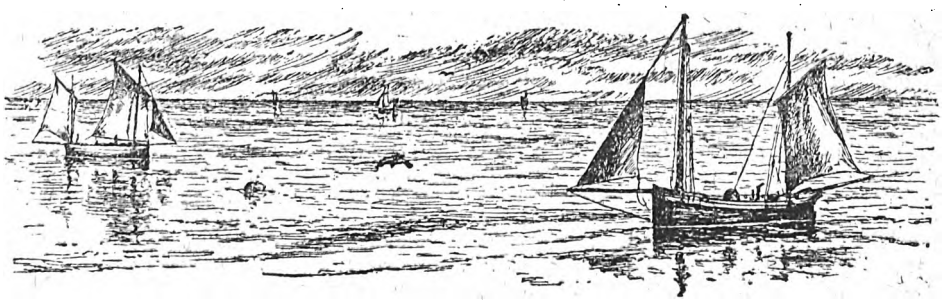
Irene Roupell had one good trait in her character at any rate: that was, a blind and passionate devotion to her younger sister. When she got to know all about Vicars, she vowed to enact a terrible vengeance.

With that purpose in view she controlled herself, curbed her fiery passions, and set out in search of him.

She was accompanied by a woman, an old servant of the family, who was almost as much bent upon the business as the girl herself. You know the rest.

That is the whole of the story. Curious isn't it?

J. L. Hornibrook.



Digitized by Google

LOST WORD COMPETITION.

1st Prize, £2 2s. 2nd Prize, £1 1s.
3rd and 4th Prizes, 10s. each.
Ten Consolation Gifts of Penknives.

BELOW is a story from which some of the words are omitted. The words to fill up these blanks will be found represented in the pictures given, and competitors are required to find out the words so as to complete the story.

The above prizes will be awarded to the competitors who send in the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions. In the event of more than one person being absolutely correct, the prize will be divided.

Write the words in tabular form (the number against each) on one side of a sheet of notepaper, together with your name and address, and then cut these pages out and pin all together.

All competitors must enter on the understanding that the Editor's decision is final.

All attempts must arrive not later than Monday, December 31st, in envelopes addressed: "Lost Word, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C."

THOSE in the besieged town who knew him, were convinced that old Jeffrey was alone in the world. Years ago he had taken up his quarters at the (1)——— by the (2)———, and there he had lived the life of a hermit, spending his time chiefly in cultivating the (3)——— for which his abode had become famous.

Not a soul was known to visit him save the (4)——— (5)——— who called him grandfather, and he seldom ventured beyond the (6)———, where he could usually be seen watching his little friends pass to and from (7)——— or (8)———, and making a (9)——— for them to approach him, when he would greet them with endearing words, and pleasant smiles, then throw into their outspread (10)——— the (11)——— which they so much loved.

Among all his pets there were none who had such claim to his affection as a little girl whose name was (12)——, and a (13)——— whose name was (14)———.

These (15)——— were his greatest joy, but above all, the girl, for there was an undescribable something about her face and manner that reminded him of (16)——— who had been more dear to him than all the world, and whom he longed to see again.

But although old Jeffrey had a great trouble at his heart, he would have found solace in his pets were it not for the fact that those cruel days of siege often deprived him of their company.

At times only the most daring would trust themselves in the open, while those more timorous through infancy or age, sought the shelter of a friendly (17)——. And old Jeffrey, not caring to brave the dangers presented by (18)——— and (19)——, deemed it advisable to remain for the most part within (20)———.

Thus it happened that after a day of persistent assault by the enemy, he sat within the (21)——— of his abode tending the (22)——— and (23)——— of a favourite (24)———. The occupation so thoroughly engrossed him that he soon lost thought of the dark (25)——— which hung over the town, its people, and himself. He even forgot the sorrow which had so long been blighting his existence, until, looking up, his eyes rested upon a portrait at the far end of his room.

And as he continued to gaze upon it, tears trickled down his cheeks, while he cried half-aloud, "Mabel! shall I never see you more? Was it not enough that death should rob me of your mother, without my declining years being spent in solitude, to mourn the loss of you, now dead to me, though living?" And, laying his head upon his hands, the old man wept until sleep relieved him of his sorrow, and he slumbered on.

Soon there was a hissing sound, then a loud (26)——, followed by a crash which startled old Jeffrey to wakefulness. He (27)——— hastily, threw aside the (28)——, and looked anxiously out of the (29)———.

A shell had crashed through the roof of an adjoining (30)——, and, satisfied that nothing more serious had happened, he returned to his (31)———, completed his task, and then retired for the night.

It was reported next morning that a twenty-four hours'

Digitized by Google

truce had been agreed to by the enemy, and most of the townspeople took advantage of this by indulging in a little out door exercise, of which they were so much in need. The children, too, were about, and old Jeffrey determined to take the opportunity of looking after his many pets.

So with anxious (32)——— he passed through the (33)—— of flowering creepers at his door, afraid each moment to find his garden ruined by the bursting shells that had fallen in close proximity to the cottage during the past few days. But he was delighted to find that all was safe. The (34)——— and even the (35)——— seemed glad at his approach, and while examining some of them, the child who held first place in his heart, came tripping up.

Soon they were sitting side by side under a canopy of fragrant (36)——, the old man looking happy and contented, the child nestling close to him. Suddenly, she looked up at him and said:

"Grandfather!"

"Yes, child."

"She will come to you one day."

He started, for her words brought to mind his reflections of the night before. Then, looking her full in the face, he saw there a vision of his long lost daughter. "Yes! yes!" he cried, "she will come one day to me. I am sure she will."

"Yes, mamma promised me this morning that she would come, for I have so often asked her, and I am sure you will love her, she is so good. But since poor father died she has been sad, so very sad."

When next old Jeffrey looked at her there were tears in his eyes, and the child exclaimed:

"Grandfather, are you ill?"

"No, child; once I had a little one like you, but when grown up, she left me, and I long to have her back again."

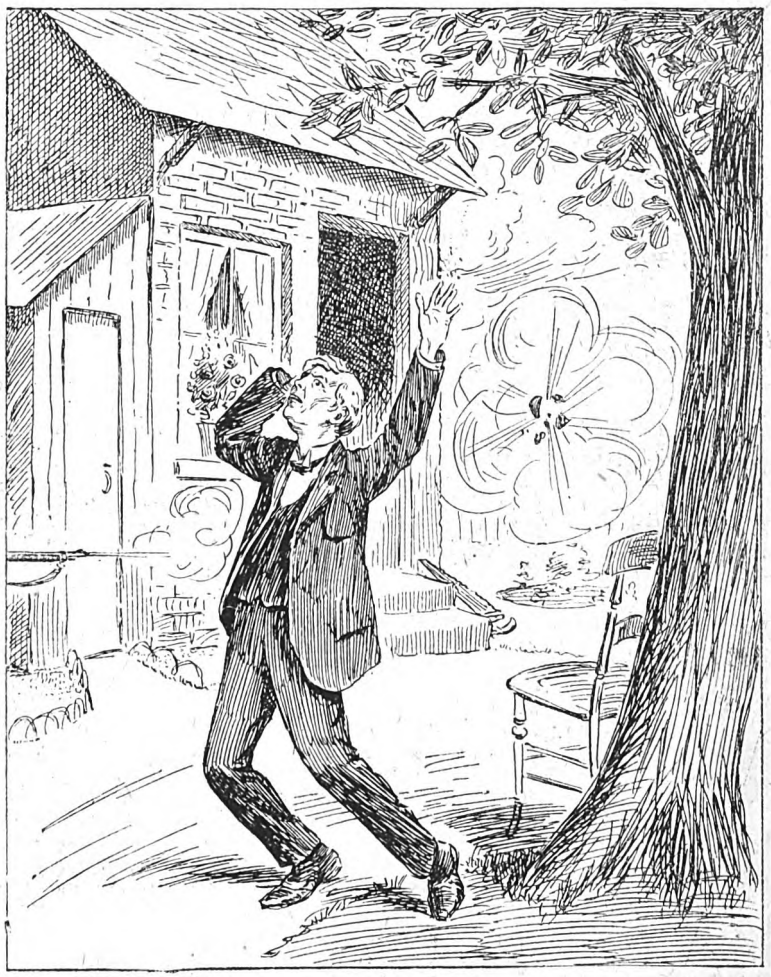
"Oh, mamma will do! I'm sure she will, I must bring her to you to-day."

And saying good-bye, she tripped off again.

He followed her along the (37)——, and stood watching till she disappeared behind the hill. Then returning, he seated himself upon a large (38)———, buried his face in his hands, and wept.

There was a sudden flash, a rumbling sound like thunder, then a fierce (39)———, and the old man fell senseless to the ground.

The truce was broken.



Now, some time after this mishap, a party of school-children returning from an outing, happened to peep into the garden, and were horrified to see "Grandfather" lying there apparently dead. They hurried away to give the alarm, and the news spread rapidly. Assistance was soon obtained, and by willing (40)——— the old man was tenderly lifted from the (41)———, and borne by strong (42)——— into the (43)———.

They laid him on a lounge, and used a soft cushion to (44)——— his head. While (45)——— went in search of a doctor, and another for (46)———, a third endeavoured to revive him with brandy. But he showed no (47)——— of returning consciousness.

At a signal from one of the bystanders, all stood aside, for they evidently (48)—— someone of importance coming. It was a doctor, and following was "Grandfather's" favourite, pulling at her mother's skirts to hasten her on.

"Grandfather, grandfather!" cried the little one, "I have brought her, it is mamma."

But the doctor insisted on seeing the patient before anyone else should approach. And having made an examination, he assured those present that there was no danger. Then leaving instructions, he departed.

The child now rushed to the old man's side, and the mother followed. But no sooner did her eyes rest upon him, than she shrieked out: "Father!" and sank upon her knees before him.

He slowly opened his eyes, a smile lit up his face, and from that moment he revived.

Soon, by careful nursing, his long lost daughter brought him round to full recovery.

Digitized by Google

LITTLE QUEEN MAB.

THE stage-manager was in despair; at his wit's end, in fact. Here was Boxing Day within appreciable distance, only a few hours off, and the fairy queen, the topmost glory—actually, not alone figuratively—of the most brilliant transformation-scene his house had ever produced, ill, and likely to be worse.

The original representative of Titania was a clever child, born in the profession. Her appearance might, perhaps, not quite realise one's idea of the light and delicate beauty associated generally with the sovereign lady of the fairies, but as a set-off there was to be considered her undoubted precocity and self-assurance, which made her both "safe" and reliable.

Mr. Lindus knew all this—who better—and groaned in the spirit.

"Tommy," he said to Tom Tolliday, the clown, the morning of Christmas Eve, the two being on the stage watching the test-working of the scenery. "Tommy, whatever am I going to do about supplying Kitty Green's place. I haven't anybody sharp enough to speak the lines or who could be trusted on that top iron in the transformation."

"Yes, it's a nuisance," replied Tommy. "You'll have to find somebody, that's a cert. Wouldn't Mother Finnigan's grand-daughter do?" (Mother Finnigan was the wardrobe-woman.) "She's likely-looking, though she is rather big for the part."

"Big! I should think she was—a tall, gawky, awkward hussy. No, she won't do," and Manager Lindus walked excitedly up and down in front of the "T" piece and muttered strong expressions, not loud but deep.

The pantomime being Cinderella it will be quite understood that there was good cause for the manager's tribulations, as the representatives of the fairy queen and fairy godmother were identical.

At the moment when Mr. Lindus had worked himself up to the point of hair-tearing and into a state bordering upon semi-lunacy, something happened. He had turned from the O.P. side to resume his restless "sentry-go" when from the wings opposite a child—she could not have been more than ten—tripped out and across to where the clown, Tommy Tolliday, was standing absorbed in the setting of one of the comic scenes. Always a taciturn man, with no trace in his appearance or manner of the bubbling fun that had made him famous, he seemed more than ordinarily so this morning.

"Daddy!" came in a silvery shout, and echoed clearly across the footlights right through the dreary-looking, deserted theatre. One or two women cleaning at the back of the dress-circle heard it, and stopped to listen for a repetition of it.

Daddy had caught the soft, fair-haired little vision in his arms, smiling over her, and saying such loving "fooleries" that the whole man seemed to be transformed. But the supreme effect of the little lady's unexpected advent was to be seen in the undisguised agitation of Stage-Manager Lindus.

"Tommy, who's the kid? Is she yours? Didn't know you had one; but, then, you're so precious close. She'll do, my boy, she'll do. She shall have anything more a week, in reason, that you like to name."

Tom Tolliday did not respond to this generous offer in the way expected of him. He stood leaning against a "practicable" pillar-box, the child in his arms, her curly head lying on his shoulder.

The other exhibited impatience, at a loss to understand the clown's quiet hesitation.

"Of course you'll let her come. Mark my words, she'll make a big success. I know talent when I see it, at least I ought to."

"No, Lindus, you can't have her. Don't ask me for a reason; I can't tell you anything, for—well, there's nothing to tell. My Queen Mab's a home-girl, isn't she?" he added, patting the child's cheek tenderly, in return for which she raised her head and kissed him again and again until she nearly took his breath away.

"Oh, but I say, Tommy, it's all nonsense, you know. I must have her—I really must. You don't want to 'crab' the show, do you? Well, you will if you don't let me have her for the run of the panto. Don't be an idiot; you'll let her come?"

"No, I tell you. I'm going now. Come on, Queen Mab, I want my dinner. I shall be back in the afternoon to go through that second 'comic' again. So long."

Possibly, but for one of those little things which turn and influence the current of events and the destinies of human life, the pantomime at the Metropolitan Theatre would have been a failure, the run short, and everybody, from manager to call-boy, discontented and disheartened.

"Daddy," said Queen Mab as her father turned to depart, "I'd like to if you'll let me."

"There," triumphantly exclaimed Lindus, "you can't go against that. The child's got more sense than you, Tommy."

The clown looked the little creature wistfully in the face, and said almost in a whisper.

"You wouldn't hurt daddy, would you?"

"No, but I'd be so good if you'd let me—just this once. Will you, daddy dear?"

"If you refuse now after that you're as hard as a stone," said the stage-manager.

"You think so, but I—well, I know more than you, and think differently. Perhaps if I were to give you my reasons for refusing, you'd not press me."

"But you'll not refuse. The child's willing and eager to undertake it, aren't you, my dear?"

"Yes, sir, if daddy'll say yes."

"There, what can you say now?"

"Look here, Lindus, if I consent—and it seems you mean me to whether I will or no—it's but for this once. Never again as I'm a living man."

The clown was evidently so earnest and sincere that Lindus could not but be impressed.

"Very well, that's your business," he said with visible satisfaction. "Only let me have her for this once and the future may take care of itself. Now you must bring her with you this afternoon, and I'll coach her. I'll wager she'll not only be letter-perfect by Thursday, but will do credit in every way to you, to me, and the Metropolitan."

Tom Tolliday was not of the ordinary professional type. A thoughtful man, apart from his stage duties, he took no interest in the chit-chat, the shop-gossip of the theatre. Years before—nearly eleven now—he had married a beautiful girl, a Russian, and a leading coryphée at London's most famous variety house.

Passionately devoted to his wife, she on her part had entered into the contract in that indifferent spirit so hard to define yet so common among the denizens of stage-land. It might have been dissimilarity of temper and disposition, or it might have been the difference in their nationality; but, whatever the cause, the fact remained that husband and wife, unsuited, unhappy, agreed to separate. Incompatibility in all sorts of forms furnishes unnumbered instances of the same kind daily, and though Tom Tolliday might have been naturally distressed, seeing that his affection was the greater, there was nothing out of the ordinary in the arrangement.

Digitized by Google

A few days, however, before she left her home, Tom Tolliday discovered that "La Zareska," as she was professionally known, had never really cared for him, but that she was in some mysterious way linked in with a Russian singer, at that time in London for the Italian Opera season. Three days after the opera shut its doors, and on the fourth Tom had reliable information that his wife, throwing up her engagement at the big house in Dudley Square, had left for St. Petersburg about the same time as the singer aforesaid.

Tom now set himself to forget. He had his little Mabel—his Queen Mab—and the whole soul of the man went out to the child. The two were inseparable except when Tom was at the theatre. There he would not take her, either by day or by night. Too many memories were called into life by any thought of a possibility of Mab's becoming bitten with stage fever. He knew that of course good, true, faithful women abounded in the profession, but Mab with his consent should not adopt it. It might be illogical and unreasonable, but if it rested with him it should not be.

Until that morning, when Queen Mab, against all paternal wish and command, had found her way on to the stage of the Metropolitan, the child had never been inside a theatre, and although Tom was vexed at the breaking through the rule, he could not be angry in the face of her delighted curiosity and eager interest in everything connected with "behind the scenes."

Nobody seemed to know how she got there. The stage-doorkeeper said he never saw her go by him, and that she was a veritable fairy, and had touched him with her wand. Her own account was that she wanted daddy, was tired of being alone, and had asked a nice boy she knew to take her to the door. Once there the rest was easy. Daddy was inside, and with him the danger and the difficulty would be forgotten.

After this things moved forward famously. There was plenty of hard work, and nearly all Christmas Day was occupied in final preparation. Tom's fears were not so much for that part of Mab's performance which would keep her on the floor of the stage; his great anxiety was when, in the transformation scene, the child was perched high up on the topmost point of all, that she might lose her head. The very thought of it made him sick, and he knew that he should have no peace of mind until, the run of the piece over, Queen Mab retired into private life again and resumed her sole position as the light of his heart and home.

Boxing Night, not quite so important a theatrical occasion as of yore, was yet sufficiently so to bring together a big crowd that made the narrow thoroughfare which surrounded the theatre on three sides almost impassable. The doors opened, the pit and gallery were crammed to standing-room point in less than ten minutes. From the latter a sea of closely-packed faces looked down upon nearly empty stalls, while a roar of voices, raised in song, in chaff, and in altogether deafening if indistinct conversation, testified to the lung power at least of the play-going plebs.

From the first everything went splendidly. Little Mab made a wonderfully effective fairy godmother, and spoke her lines with a distinctness that carried them to the rearmost seat of the great gallery. As fairy queen she was equally successful, and more than one impressionable schoolboy lost his heart that night to the golden-haired child actress.

At last the transformation scene was in sight, and behind the gauze clouds the clown, in all the glory of bismuth and vermilion, was testing the strength of the iron frame that in less than five minutes was to support his darling. All seemed right, and Tom descended to floor level again, took the dainty little figure in his arms, and held her until the signal for placing her on the frame.

The signal given, he placed her tenderly and carefully in the cradle, and saw her ready for hoisting to her dizzy elevation. The clouds rolled up and away, and as section after section of the beautiful spectacle was disclosed the applause increased with each development. Then from behind a glittering bed of golden lilies and rose-pink flowers of fairyland rose the figure of the queen of this garden of beauty.

Tom, ready to bound on to the stage with the traditional salutation, watched the gradual elevation of the child. She smiled delightedly as if thoroughly enjoying her position as the cynosure of all eyes. A crash from the orchestra, a sudden jerk as the frame reached its limit, a child's shrill shriek, followed by a man's cry of despairing horror, and down through the crowd of suspended fairies, down through flowers and lights and canvas clouds, fell like a heavy snowflake a little mingled mass of muslin and soft white flesh.

When Stage-Manager Lindus saw poor Tom on one knee, with the form of Queen Mab on the other, he bitterly reproached himself for his own part in persuading to that which had brought about so great a calamity and so great a sorrow for the unhappy father.

She was alive, but neither moaned nor moved. "Alas, poor Yorick!" Tom, the hot tears coursing down his painted cheeks, at last gently raised her and carried her out.

It was impossible to prevent the thing from becoming known to the audience, who, the curtain being dropped and a brief official explanation being made, quickly dispersed.

* * * * *

Far away from the atmosphere of London theatrical life, in a quite country place not many miles from a great Midland town, there live a happy couple, happy because between them reigns perfect love.

On fair, sunny days in summer, when the hedgerows are gay with leaf, berry, and blossom, a thoughtful-faced man, with eyes of almost womanly tenderness of expression, wheels an invalid chair along the quiet lanes and by the river which runs through the loveliest country in all England.

His companion is a girl of about fifteen, pale, and evidently a hopeless cripple. Still, the smiles she gives in answer to that of the man speak content and happiness.

Tom Tolliday wishes for no other occupation than that of tending Queen Mab—little Queen Mab, the fairy-sovereign of his home—while she takes all he gives, and forgets her sorrow in the joy of daddy's love.

It would indeed be hard to recognise in these two simple souls the one-time famous clown and the Queen Mab, who made her first and last appearance five years before.

RALPH ENDERBY.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL STORY. STARTS TO-DAY.

By Louis Tracy.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc.

CHAPTER I.

"Last Seen at Victoria!"

Lady Delia Lyle puckered her handsome forehead into a thoughtful frown as she drew aside the window curtains of her boudoir and tried to look out into the opaque blackness of a November fog.

Behind her was cheerfulness—in front uncertainty. Electric lights, a nice fire reflected from gleaming brass, the luxury of carpets and upholstery, formed an alluring contrast to the dull yellow glare of a single lamp in the outside obscurity.

But Lady Delia was a strong-minded woman. There was no trace of doubt in the wrinkled brows and reflective eyes. She held back the curtains with her left hand, buttoning a glove at the wrist with the other. Fog or no fog, she was going out, and she was already dressed for the occasion, in tailor-made costume and winter toque.

She was annoyed at the weather, but not disconcerted. Too long had she allowed herself to take things easily. The future was as murky as the atmosphere; the past was dramatically typified by the pleasant surroundings from which she resolutely turned her face. Lady Lyle was quite determined as to her actions, and a November night was a most unlikely agent to keep her from following the course she had mapped out.

Moving to the light again, she took out of her pocket a long, closely-written letter. Its details were familiar to her, but her face hardened as she hastily ran through it in order to find a particular passage.

At last she gained her object—to make quite sure of an address. Then she replaced the document, stood undecided for a moment, and touched an electric bell.

"James," she said, to the answering footman, "I am going out."

"Yes, milady."

"Sir Charles is not at home?"

"No, milady."

"I am going to Richmond—to see Lady Gwendoline Talbot. I shall probably not return in time for dinner. Tell Sir Charles not to wait for me."

"Shall I order the carriage for your ladyship?"

"Will you listen to me and remember what I have said?"

"Yes, milady."

James ran downstairs, opened the door, bowed as Lady Lyle passed into Portman-square, and then confidentially informed Buttons that "the missus" was in a "rare old wax" about something. "She nearly jumped down my bloomin' throat when I asked her if she would have the carriage."

Her ladyship's mood did not soften when she drifted from the fixed tenure of Wensley House, Portman-square, into the chaos of Oxford-street and fog at 5.30 on a November evening.

Though not a true "London particular," the fog was chilly, exasperating, tedious. People bumped against each other without apology, 'buses crunched through the traffic with deadly precision, pair-horse vans swept round corners with magnificent carelessness.

In the result, Lady Delia, who meant to walk, as she was somewhat before the time she had fixed upon for this very important engagement, took a hansom. In her present mood slight things annoyed her. Usually, the London cab horse is a thoughtful animal; he refuses to hurry; when he falls he lies contented, secure in the knowledge that for five blissful minutes he will be at complete rest. But this one flew as though oats and Lucerne grass awaited him at Victoria Station on the Underground Railway.

He raced down Park-lane, skidded past Hyde Park-Corner, and grated the off-wheel of the hansom against the kerb outside the station within eight minutes.

In other words, her ladyship, obeying the directions contained in the voluminous letter, was compelled to kill time.

As she stepped from the vehicle and halted beneath a lamp to take a florin from her purse, a tall, ulster-wrapped gentleman, walking rapidly into Victoria-street, caught a glimpse of her face and well-proportioned form.

Instantly his hat was off.

"This is an unexpected pleasure, Lady Lyle. Can I be of any service?"

She bit her lip, not unobserved, but the law of Society forced her features into a bright smile.

"Oh, Mr. Brett, is it you? I am going to see my sister at Richmond. Isn't the weather horrid? I shall be so glad if you will put me into the right train."

Mr. Reginald Brett, barrister, with clean-cut, clever features, and dark, deep-set eyes, knew that she would have been much better pleased had he passed without greeting. Like the footman, he wondered why she did not drive in her carriage rather than travel by the Underground Railway on such a night. He guessed that she was perturbed—that her voluble explanation was a disguise.

He reflected that he could ill afford any delay in dressing for a distant dinner, that good manners oft entail inconvenience, but of course he said

"Delighted. Have you any wraps?"

Digitized by Google

"No, I am just going for a chat, and shall be home early."

He bought her a first-class ticket, noting as an odd coincidence that it bore the number of the year, 1900, descended to the barrier, found that the next train for Richmond passed through in ten minutes, fumed inwardly for an instant, explained his presence to the ticket-collector, and paced the platform with his companion.

Having condemned the fog, and the last play, and the latest book, they were momentarily silent.

Among the newspaper placards on Smith and Son's bookstall, large type in red and black announced that a "Great Society Scandal" was on the tapis. "The Duke in the Box" formed a telling line, and the eyes of both people chanced on it simultaneously.

Thought the woman: "He is a man of the world, and an experienced lawyer. Shall I tell him?"

Thought the man: "She wants to take me into her confidence, and I am too busy to be worried just now by some small family squabble."

Said she: "Are you much occupied at the Courts just now, Mr. Brett?"

"No," he replied; "not exactly. My practice is more consultative than active. A lot of people seek my advice about matters of little interest, never thinking that they would best serve their ends by acting decisively and promptly themselves."

Lady Delia set her lips. She could be both prompt and decisive. She resolved to keep her troubles, whatever they were, locked in the secrecy of her own heart, and when she next spoke of some trivial topic the barrister knew that he had been spared a recital.

He regretted it afterwards.

At any other moment in his full and useful life he would have encouraged Lady Lyle rather than the reverse. Even now, a few seconds too late, he was sorry. He unbent so far as to try to bring her back to the verge of explanations, but he failed, for her ladyship was a proud, self-reliant personage—one who would never dream of risking rebuff.

A train came, twith "Richmond" staring at them from the smoke and s eam of the engine.

"Good-bye!" he said.

"Good-bye!"

"Shall I see you again soon?"

"I fear not. It is probable that I shall leave for the South of France quite early."

And she was gone. Her companion rushed to the street, and almost ran to his Victoria-street chambers. It was six o'clock. He had to dress and drive all the way to Hampstead for dinner at 7.30.

* * * * *

At ten minutes past nine Sir Charles Lyle entered Wensley House. A handsome, quiet, gentlemanly man was Sir Charles. He was rich—a Guardsman until the baronetcy devolved upon him, a popular figure in Society, esteemed a trifle fast prior to his marriage, but sobered down now by the cares of a great estate and a vast fortune.

His wife and he were not well-matched in disposition.

She was too earnest, too prim, for the easy-going baronet. He respected her, that was all. A man of his nature found it impossible to realise that the depths of passion are frequently coated over with ice. Their union was irreproachable, like their marriage settlements; but there are more features in matrimony than can be disposed of by broad seals and legal phrases.

Unfortunately, they were childless, aud were thus deprived of the one great bond which unites when others may fail.

Sir Charles was hurried, if not flurried. His boots were muddy and his clothes splashed by the mire of passing vehicles.

"I fear I am very late for dinner," he said to the footman who took his hat and overcoat. "But I shall not be five minutes dressing. Tell her ladyship——"

"Milady is not at home, Sir Charles."

"Not at home!"

"Milady went out at half-past five, saying that she was going to Richmond to see Lady Gwendoline Talbot, and that you were not to wait dinner if she was late in returning."

Sir Charles was surprised. He looked keenly at the man as he said:

"Are you quite sure of her ladyship's orders?"

"Quite sure, Sir Charles."

"Did she drive?"

"No, Sir Charles. She would not have the carriage when I suggested it."

The baronet, somewhat perplexed, hesitated a moment. Then he appeared to dismiss the matter as hardly worth discussion, saying, as he went upstairs:—

"Dinner almost immediately, James."

During the solitary meal he was pre-occupied, but ate more than usual, in the butler's judgment. Finding his

She held back the curtains with her left hand, buttoning a glove at the wrist with the other.

Digitized by Google

own company distasteful he discussed the November Handicap with the butler, and ultimately sent for a paper.

Opening it, a copy of the Second Extra Evening News,

"Good-bye," he said.

the first words that caught his eye were, "Murder in the West End." He read the paragraph, the record of some common-place crime, and turned to the butler.

"There's a lot of these beastly crimes occurring recently, Thompson."

"Yes, Sir Charles. There's bin three since the beginning of the month."

After a pause—"Did you hear that her ladyship had gone to Richmond?"

"Yes, Sir Charles."

"Do you know how she went?"

"No, Sir Charles."

"I wanted to see her to-night, very particularly. Order the brougham in ten minutes. I am going to the Travellers' Club. I shall be home soon—say eleven o'clock—when her ladyship arrives."

The baronet was driven to and from the club by his own coachman, but on returning to Wensley House was told that Lady Lyle was still absent.

"No telegram or message?"

"No, Sir Charles."

"I suppose she will stay with her sister for the night, and I shall have a note in the morning to say so. Just like a woman. Now if I did that, James, there would be no end of a row. Anxiety, and all that sort of thing. Call me at 8.30."

An hour later, Sir Charles Lyle left the library and went to bed.

At breakfast next morning the master of the house rapidly scanned the letters near his plate for the expected missive from his wife. There was none.

A maid was waiting. He sent her to call the butler.

"Look here, Thompson," he cried, "her ladyship has not written. Don't you think I had better wire? It's curious, to say the least, her going off to Richmond in this fashion, in a beastly fog, too."

Thompson was puzzled. He had examined the letters an hour earlier. But he agreed that a telegram was the thing.

Sir Charles wrote: "Expected to hear from you. Will you be home to lunch? Want to see you about some hunters"; and addressed it to his wife at her sister's residence.

"There," he said, turning to his coffee and sole. "That will fetch her. We are off to Leicestershire next week, Thompson. By the way, I am going to a sale at Tattersall's. Send a groom there with her ladyship's answer when it comes."

He had not long been at the sale-yard when a servant arrived with a telegram.

"Ah, the post-office people are quick this morning," he said, smiling. He opened the envelope and read:

"Want to see you to-day.—Dick."

He was so taken by surprise at the unexpected nature of the message that he read the words aloud, mechanically. But he soon understood, and smiled again.

"Go back quickly," he said to the man, "and tell Thompson to send along the next telegram. This is not the one I want."

A consignment of Waterford hunters was being sold at the time, and the baronet was checking the animals' descriptions on the catalogue, when he was cheerily addressed:

"Hallo, Lyle, preparing for the shires, eh?"

Wheeling round, the baronet shook hands with Reginald Brett.

"Yes—that is, I am looking out for a couple of nice-mannered ones for my wife. I have six eating their heads off at Market Harborough now."

Brett hesitated before he said: "Will Lady Lyle hunt this season, then?"

"Well, hardly that. But she likes to dodge about the lanes with the parson and the doctor."

"I only asked because she told me last night that she would probably winter in the South of France."

"Told you—last night—South of France!" Sir Charles Lyle positively gasped in his amazement.

"Why, yes. I met her at Victoria. She was going to Richmond to see her sister, she said."

"I am jolly glad to hear it."

"Glad! Why?"

"Because I have not seen her myself since yesterday morning. She went off mysteriously, late in the afternoon, leaving a message with the servants. I am naturally glad to hear from you that she got into the train all right."

"I put her in the carriage myself. Have you not heard from her?"

"No. I wired this morning, and expect an answer at any moment. But what is this about the South of France? We go to Leicestershire next week."

"I can't say, of course. Your wife seemed to be a little upset about something. She only mentioned her intention casually—in fact, when I asked her if we should soon meet."

The other laughed, a little oddly in the opinion of his astute observer, and dismissed the matter by the remark that the expected message from his wife would soon clear the slight mystery that attended her movements during the past eighteen hours.

The two men set themselves to the congenial task of criticising the horses trotting up and down the straw-covered track, and Sir Charles had purchased a nice half-bred animal for forty guineas when his groom again saluted him.

"Please sir," said the man, "here's another telegram, and Thompson told me to ask if it was the right one."

Sir Charles frowned at the interruption—a second horse of a suitable character was even then under the hammer—but he tore open the envelope. At once his agitation became so marked that Brett cried—

"Good heavens, Lyle, what is it? No bad news, I hope?"

The other, by a strong effort, regained his self-control.

Digitized by Google

"No, no," he stammered; "it's all right, all right. She has gone somewhere else. See. This is from Lady Gwendoline. Still, I wish Delia would consider my natural anxiety a little."

Brett took the proffered flimsy and read:—

I opened your message. Delia not here. I have not seen her for over a week. What do you mean by wire? Am coming to town at once.—Gwen.

The baronet's pale face and strained voice betrayed the significance of the thought underlying the simple question.

"What do you make of it, Reggie?"

Brett, too, was very grave. "The thing looks queer," he said; "though the explanation may be trifling. Come, I will help you. Let us get to your house. It is the natural centre for inquiries."

They hailed a hansom and whirled off to Portman-square. They did not say much, as each felt that the affair might not end so rapidly and satisfactorily as he hoped.

CHAPTER II.

Inspector Winter.

Lady Delia had disappeared.

Whether dead or alive, and if alive, whether detained by force or absent of her own unfettered volition, this handsome and well-known society woman had vanished utterly from the moment when Reginald Brett placed her in a first-class carriage of a Metropolitan Richmond train at Victoria Station.

At first her husband and relatives hoped against hope that some extraordinary tissue of events had contributed to the building up of a mystery which would prove to be no mystery, but a fortuitous combination of circumstances.

Yet the days fled, and there was no trace of her whereabouts.

At the outset the inquiry was confined to the circle of friends and relatives. Telegrams and letters in every possible direction suggested by this comparatively restricted field showed conclusively that not only had Lady Delia not been seen, but no one had the slightest clue to the motives which might induce her to purposely leave her home.

So far as her distracted husband could ascertain she did not owe a penny in the world. She was a rich woman in her own right, and her banking account was in perfect order.

She was a woman of the domestic temperament, always in close touch with her family, and those who knew her best scouted the notion of any petty intrigue which would move her, by fear or passion, to abandon all she held dear.

The stricken baronet confided the search only to his friend Brett. He brokenly admitted that he had not sufficiently appreciated his wife whilst she was with him.

"She was of a superior order to me, Reggie," he said. "I am hardly a home bird. Her ideals were lofty and humanitarian. Too often I was out of sympathy with her and laughed at her notions. But, believe me, we never had the shadow of a serious dispute. Perhaps I went my own way a little selfishly, but at the time I thought that she, on her part, was somewhat strait-laced. I can now appreciate her merits when it is too late."

"But you must not even yet assume that she is dead." The barrister was certain that some day the mystery would be elucidated.

"She is. I feel that. I am certain that I shall never see her on earth again."

"Oh, nonsense, Lyle. Far more remarkable occurrences have been satisfactorily cleared up."

"It is very good of you, old chap, to take this cheering view. Only, you see, I know my wife's character so well. She would die a hundred times if it were possible rather than cause the misery to her people and myself which, if living, she knows must ensue from this terrible uncertainty as to her fate."

"Scotland Yard is still sanguine." This good-natured friend was evidently making a conversation.

"Oh, naturally. But something tells me that my wife is dead, whether by accident or design it is impossible to say. The police will cling to the belief that she is in hiding in order to conceal their own inability to find her."

"A highly probable theory. Are your servants to be trusted?"

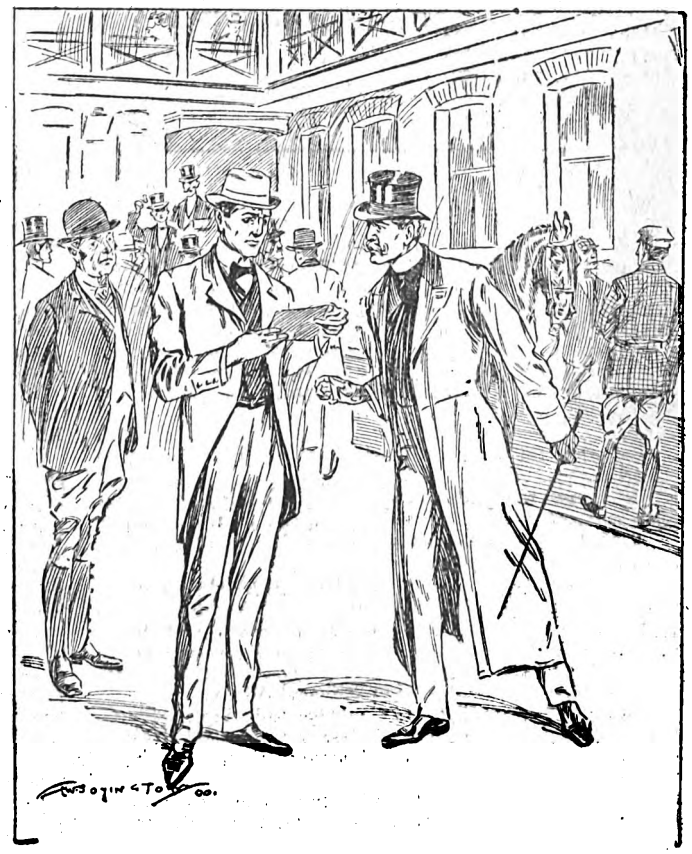
"Y-yes. They have all been with us some years. Why do you ask?"

"Because I am anxious that nothing of this should get into the papers. I have caused paragraphs to be inserted in the fashionable intelligence columns that Lady Lyle has gone to visit some friends in the Midlands. For her own sake, if she be living, it is best to choke scandal at its source."

"Well, Brett, I leave everything to you. Make such arrangements as you think fit."

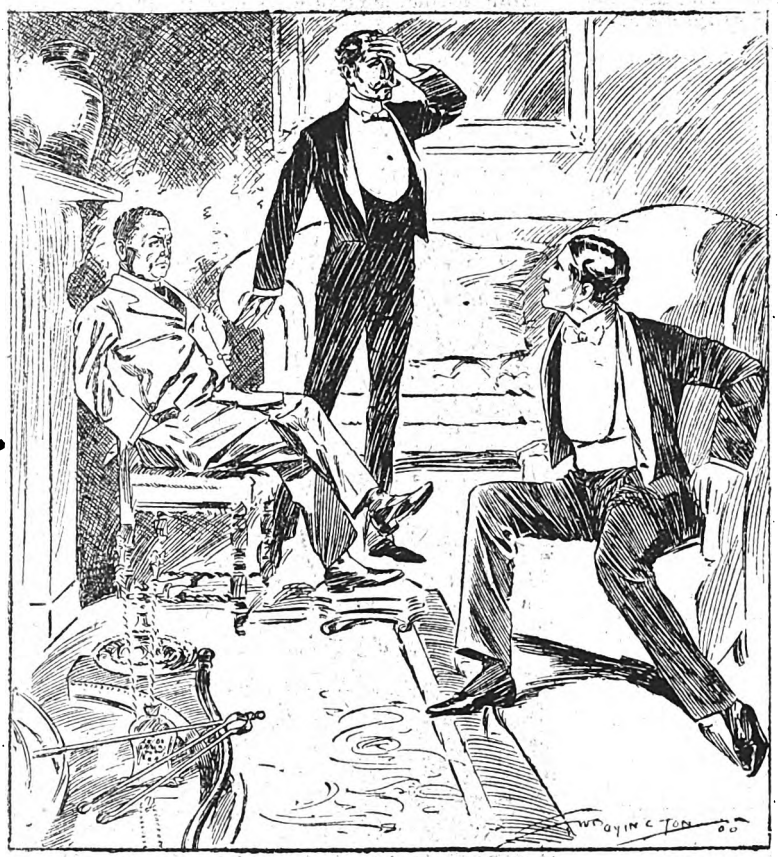
The barrister's mobile countenance softened with pity as he looked at his afflicted friend.

In four days Sir Charles Lyle had aged many years in appearance. No one who was acquainted with him in the past would have imagined that the loss of his wife could so affect him.



"What do you make of it, Reggie?"

Digitized by Google



"Heavens, Brett, how did you learn all this?" cried the baronet.

"I have done all that was possible, yet it is very little," said Brett, after a pause. "You are aware that I am supposed to be an adept at solving curious or criminal investigations of an unusual class. But in this case, partly, I suspect, because I myself am the last person who, to our common knowledge, saw Lady Lyle alive on Tuesday night, I am faced by a dead wall of impenetrable fact, through which my intellect cannot pierce. Yet I am sure that some day this wretched business will be intelligible. I will find Lady Lyle, if living; I will find her murderer if she be dead."

Not often did Reginald Brett allow his words to so betray his thoughts.

Both men were absorbed by the thrilling sensations of the moment, and they were positively startled when a servant suddenly announced:—

"Inspector Winter, of Scotland Yard."

A short, thick-set man entered. He was absolutely round in every part. His sturdy, rotund frame was supported by stout, well-moulded legs. His bullet head, with close-cropped hair, gave a suggestion of strength to his rounded face, and a pair of small bright eyes looked suspiciously on the world from beneath well-arched eyebrows.

Two personalities more dissimilar than those of Reginald Brett and Inspector Winter could hardly be brought together in the same room. People who are fond of tracing resemblances to animals in human beings would liken the one to a greyhound, the other to a bulldog.

Yet they were both masters in the art of detecting crime—the barrister subtle, analytic, introspective; the policeman direct, pertinacious, self-confident. Brett lost all interest in a case when the hidden trail was laid bare. Mr. Winter regarded investigation as so many hours on duty until his man was transported or hanged.

The detective was well acquainted with his unprofessional colleague, and had already met Sir Charles in the early stages of his present quest.

"I have an important clue," he said smiling with assurance.

"What is it?" Sir Charles Lyle was for the moment aroused from his despondent lethargy.

"Her ladyship did not go to Richmond on Tuesday night."

Inspector Winter waited for Brett to speak, but the barrister nodded, with the air of one who knew already that Lady Delia had not gone to Richmond.

Mr. Winter continued. "Thanks to Mr. Brett's remembrance of the number of the ticket, we traced it at once in the clearing office. It was given up at Sloane Square immediately after the Richmond train passed through.

Brett nodded again. He was obstinately silent, so the detective questioned him directly:

"By this means the inquiry is narrowed to a locality—eh, Mr. Brett?"

"Yes," said the barrister, turning to poke the fire.

Mr. Winter was sure that his acuteness was displeasing to his clever rival. He smiled complacently, and went on:

"The ticket-collector remembers her quite well, as the giving up of a Richmond ticket was unusual at this station. She passed straight out into the square, and from that point we lose sight of her."

"You do, Mr. Winter, eh?" said Brett.

"Well, sir, it is a great thing to have localised her movements at that hour, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is. To save time I may tell you that Lady Delia returned to the station, entered the refreshment room, ordered a glass of wine, which she hardly touched, sat down and waited some fifteen minutes, left the room, crossed the square, asked a newsvendor where Raleigh Mansions were, and gave him sixpence for the information."

His hearers were astounded.

"Heavens, Brett, how did you learn all this?" cried the baronet.

"Thus far, it was simplicity itself. On Wednesday evening, when no news could be obtained from Lady Lyle's relatives, I started from Victoria, intending to call at every station until I found the place where she quitted the train. The railway clearing-office was too slow, Mr. Winter. Naturally, the hours being identical in the same week, the first ticket-collector I spoke to gave me the desired clue. The rest was a mere matter of steady inquiry."

"Then you are the man whom the police are now searching for?" blurted out the detective.

"From the railway official's description? Possibly. Pray, Mr. Winter, let me see the details of my appearance as circulated throughout the force. It would be interesting."

Mr. Winter was saved from further indiscretions by Sir Charles Lyle's plaintive question:—

"Why did you not tell me these things sooner, Reggie?"

"What good was there in torturing you, Lyle? All that I have ascertained is the A.B.C. of our search. We are at a loss for the motive of your wife's disappearance. Victoria,

Digitized by Google

Sloane-square, or Richmond—does it matter which? My belief is that she intended to go to Richmond that night. Why, otherwise, should she make to the footman and myself the same unvarying statement? Perhaps she did go there?"

"But these houses, Raleigh Mansions. What of them?"

"Ah, there we may be forwarded a stage. But there are six main entrances and no hall porters. There are twelve flats at each number, seventy-two in all, and all occupied. This means seventy-two separate inquiries into the history and attributes of a vastly larger number of persons, in order to find some possible connection with Lady Delia and her purposely-concealed visit. She may have remained in one of these flats five minutes. She may be in one of them yet. Anyhow, I have taken the necessary steps to obtain the fullest knowledge of the inhabitants of Raleigh Mansions."

"Scotland Yard appears to be an unnecessary institution, Mr. Brett," snapped the detective.

"By no means. It is most useful to me once I have discovered a criminal. And it amuses me."

"Listen, Reggie, and you, Mr. Winter," pleaded the baronet. "I implore you in future to keep me informed of developments in your search. The knowledge that progress is being made will sustain me. Promise, I ask you."

"I promise readily enough," answered Brett. "I only stipulate that you prepare yourself for many disappointments. Even a highly-skilled detective like Inspector Winter will admit that the failures are more frequent than the successes."

"True enough, sir. But I must be going, gentlemen." Mr. Winter was determined to thoroughly work the new vein of Raleigh Mansions before even his superiors were aware of its significance in the hunt for her lost ladyship.

When the detective had quitted the room there was silence for some time. Lyle was the first to speak.

"Have you formed any sort of theory, even a wildly speculative one?" he asked.

"No. None whatever. The utter absence of motive is the most puzzling element of the whole situation."

"Whom can my wife have known at Raleigh Mansions? What sort of places are they?"

"Quite fashionable, but not too expensive. The absence of elevators and doorkeepers cheapens them. I am sorry now that I mentioned them to Winter."

"Why?"

"He will disturb every one of the residents by injudicious inquiries. Each housemaid who opens a door will be to him a suspicious individual, each butcher's boy an accomplice, each tenant a principal in the abduction of your wife. If I have a theory of any sort, it is that the first definite news of Lady Delia will come from Richmond. There cannot be the slightest doubt that she was going there on Tuesday night."

"It will be very odd if you should prove to be right," said Sir Charles.

Again they were interrupted by the footman, this time the bearer of a telegram, which he handed to his master.

The latter opened it, and read: "What is the matter? Are you ill? I certainly am angry.—Dick."

He frowned with real annoyance, crumpling up the message and throwing it in the fire.

"Confound people who bother one at such a time," he growled.

Soon afterwards Brett left him.

True to the barrister's prophecy, Inspector Winter made life miserable to the denizens of Raleigh Mansions. He visited them at all hours, and, in some instances, several times. Although, in accordance with his instructions, he never mentioned Lady Delia's name, he so pestered the occupants with questions concerning a lady of her general appearance that half-a-dozen residents wrote complaining letters to the company that owned the mansions, and the secretary lodged a protest at Scotland Yard.

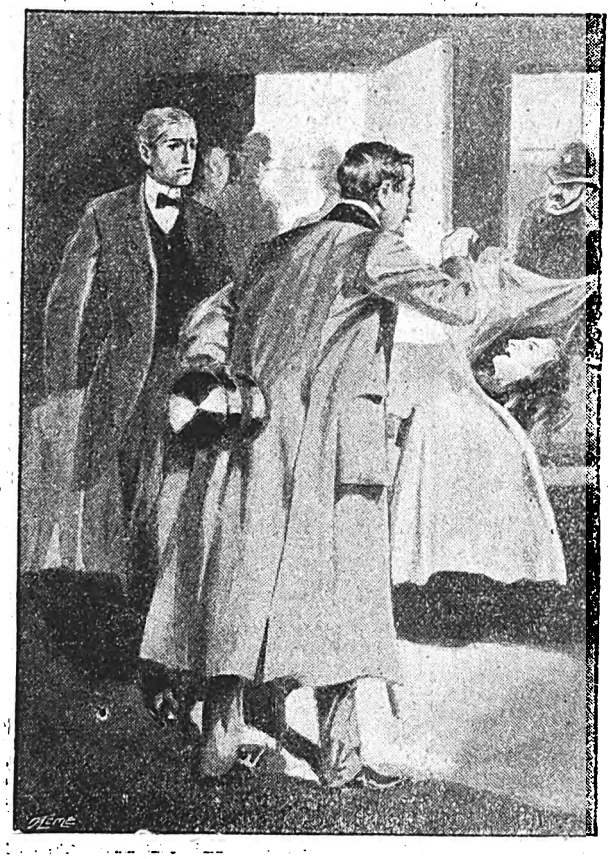
Respectable citizens object to detectives prowling about, particularly when they insinuate questions concerning indefinite ladies in tailor-made dresses and fur toques.

At the end of a week Mr. Winter was nonplussed, and even Reginald Brett had to confess that his more carefully conducted inquiries had yielded no result.

But towards the close of the month a sensational turn was given to events.

The body of a woman, terribly disfigured from long immersion in the water and other causes, was found in the Thames at Putney.

It had been discovered under peculiar circumstances. A



"I am sure this is not she. Let us get away quick."

drain pipe that emptied into the river beneath the surface was moved by reason of some sanitary alterations, and the workmen intrusted with the task were horrified at finding a corpse tightly wedged beneath it.

Official examination revealed that although the body had been in the water fully three weeks, the cause of death was not drowning. The woman had been murdered, beyond a shadow of doubt. A sharp iron spike was driven into her brain with such force that a portion of it had broken off, and remained imbedded in the skull.

If this was not sufficient there were other convincing proofs of foul play.

Although her coat and skirt were of poor quality, her linen was of a class that could only be worn by some one who paid as much for a single under garment as most women do for a good costume, but there were no laundry marks, such as are usual, upon it.

On the feet were a pair of strong walking boots, bearing the stamped address of a fashionable bootmaker in the West End. Among a list of customers to whom the tradesman supplied footgear of this size and character appeared the name of Lady Delia Lyle.

Digitized by Google

Not very convincing testimony, but sufficient to bring Sir Charles Lyle to the Putney mortuary in the endeavour to identify the remains as those of his missing wife.

In this he utterly failed.

Not only was this poor misshapen lump of distorted humanity wholly unlike Lady Delia, but the colour of her hair was different.

Her ladyship's maid, called to identify the linen—even the police admitted that the outer clothes were not Lady Lyle's—was so upset at the repulsive nature of her task that she went into hysterics, protesting loudly that it could not be her mistress she was looking at.

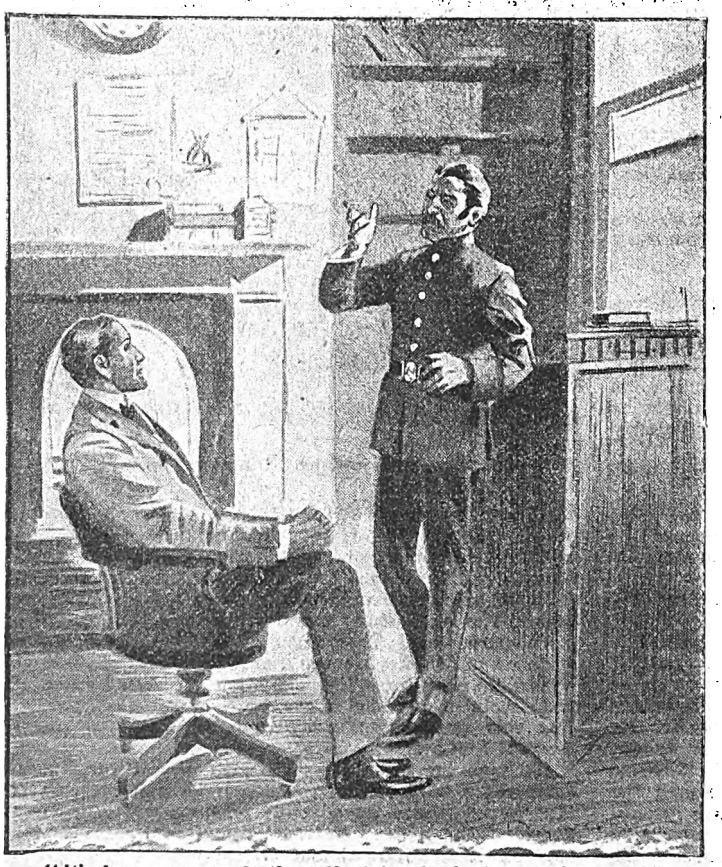
Brett differed from both of them. He quietly urged Sir Charles to consider the fact that a great many ladies give a helping hand to Nature in the matter of hair tints. The chemical action of water would——

The baronet nearly lost his temper.

"Really, Brett, you carry things too far," he cried. "My wife had none of these vanities. I am sure this is not she. The mere thought that such a thing could be possible makes me ill. Let us get away, quick."

So a coroner's jury found an open verdict, and the poor unknown was buried in a pauper's grave.

The newspapers dismissed the incident with a couple of paragraphs, though the iron spike planted in the skull afforded good material for a telling head-line, and within a couple of days the affair was forgotten.



"It's been gone to Scotland Yard for the best part of a week."

But Reginald Brett, barrister and amateur detective, was quite sure in his own mind that the nameless woman was Lady Delia Lyle.

He was so certain—though anything like an identification of the body was impossible, owing to the condition it was in—that he bitterly resented the scant attention given to the matter by the authorities, and he solemnly swore that he would not rest until he had discovered her destroyer and brought the wretch to the bar of justice.

CHAPTER III.

The Lady's Maid.

The first difficulty experienced by the barrister in his self-imposed task was the element of mystery purposely contributed by Lady Delia herself. To a man of his quick perception, sharpened and clarified by his legal training, it was no impossible undertaking to arrive at the positive facts underlying the trivial incidents of his meeting with the missing lady at Victoria Station.

Briefly stated, his summary was this: Lady Delia intended to go to Richmond at a later hour than that at which his unexpected presence had caused her to set out. She had resolved upon a secret visit to some one who lived in Raleigh Mansions, Sloane Square—some person whom she knew so slightly as to be unacquainted with the exact address, and, as the result of this visit, she desired subsequently to see her sister at Richmond.

Sir Charles Lyle was apparently in no way concerned with her movements, nor had she thought fit to consult him, beyond the mere politeness of announcing her probable absence from home at the dinner hour.

To one of Brett's analytical powers the problem would be more simple were it, in a popular sense, more complex. In these days it is a hard thing for a woman of such position in society to be suddenly spirited out of the world without leaving trace or sign. He approached his inquiry with less certainty, owing to Lady Delia's own negative admissions, than if she had been swallowed up by an earthquake and he were asked to determine her fate by inference and deduction.

It must be remembered that he was sure she was dead—murdered, and that her body had been lodged by human agents beneath an old drain-pipe at Putney.

What possible motive could any one have in so foully killing a beautiful, high-minded, and charming woman, whose whole life was known to her associates, whom the breath of scandal had never touched?

The key of the mystery might be found at Raleigh Mansions, but Brett felt that this branch of his quest could wait until other more transient features were cleared up.

He practically opened the campaign of investigation at Putney. Mild weather had permitted the workmen to conclude their operations the day before the barrister reached the spot where the body had been found—that is to say, some forty-eight hours after he had resolved to neither pause nor deviate in his search until the truth was laid bare.

A large house, untenanted, occupied the bank, with solid front facing the road, and a lawn running from the drawing-room windows to the river. Down the right side of the grounds the boundary was sharply marked by a narrow lane, probably a long disused ferry road, and access to this thoroughfare was obtained from the lawn by a garden gate.

A newly marked seam in the roadway showed the line of the drainage work, and Brett did not glance twice at the point where the pipe entered the Thames, as the structural features here were recent.

Digitized by Google

He went to the office of the contractor who had carried out the alterations.

An elderly foreman readily answered his questions.

"Yes, sir. I was in charge of the men who were on the job. It was an easy business. Just an outlet for rain from the road. An old-fashioned sort of affair; been there thirty or forty years, I should think; all the pipes were crumbling away."

"Why were the repairs effected at this moment?"

"Well, sir, the house was empty quite a while. You see, it used to be a school, a place where young gents were prepared for the Army. It was closed about a year ago, and it isn't everybody as wants so many bed rooms. I do hear as how the new tenant has sixteen children."

"The incoming people have not yet arrived?"

"No, sir."

"Can you tell me the name of the schoolmaster?"

"Oh, yes. When I was younger I have done a lot of carpenter's work for him. He was the Reverend Septimus Childe."

Brett made a note of the name, and next sought the local police-inspector.

"No, nothing fresh," said the latter, in reply to a query concerning the woman "found drowned."

"I suppose these things are soon lost sight of?" said Brett, casually.

"Sometimes they are, and sometimes they aren't. It's wonderful occasionally how a matter gets cleared up after years. Of course we keep all the records of a case, so that the affair can be looked into if anything turns up."

"Ah, that brings me to the most important object of my visit. A small piece of iron was found imbedded in the poor woman's skull."

The inspector smiled as he admitted the fact.

"Can I see it? I either want the loan of it for a brief period, or to have an exact model made."

Again the policeman grinned.

"I don't mind telling you that you are too late, sir."

"Too late! How too late?"

"It's been gone to Scotland Yard for the best part of a week."

So others beside the barrister thought that the Putney incident required more attention than had been bestowed upon it.

* * * * *

Brett concluded his round by a visit to the surgeon who gave evidence at the inquest.

The doctor had no manner of doubt that the woman had been murdered before being placed in the water, the state of the lungs being proof positive on that point.

"It is equally indisputable that she was put to death by malice aforethought?"

"Oh, yes. A small iron spike was absolutely wedged into the brain through the hardest part of the skull."

"What was the nature of the injuries that caused death?"

"This piece of iron penetrated the occipital bone at the lower part, and injured the cerebellum, damaging all the great nerve centres at the base of the brain."

"Would death ensue instantly?"

"Yes. Such a blow would have the effect of a high voltage electric current. Complete paralysis of the nerve centres means death."

"Well, I'm jiggered," said the detective.

"Then I take it that great force must have been used?"

"Not so much, perhaps, as the nature of the wound seems to imply; but considerable—sufficient, at any rate, to break the piece of iron."

"It was broken, you say? Was it cast iron?"

"Yes, of good quality. Off some ornament or design, I should imagine. But it snapped off inside the head at the moment of the occurrence."

"Curious, is it not, for a person to be killed in such a manner by such an instrument?"

"I have never before met such a case. Were it not for the way in which the body was jammed beneath a hidden drain pipe, and the effective means taken to destroy identity, I should have inclined to the belief that some strange accident had happened. At any rate the murderer must have committed the crime on the spur of the moment, and seized upon the first weapon to hand."

"You say she was forcibly placed where found?"

"Yes; the workmen's description left no other idea."

"Could not the tide have done this?"

"Hardly. One cannot be quite emphatic, as such strange things do happen. But it seems to be almost impossible for the tide at Putney to pack a body beneath a jutting drain pipe in such manner that the waist, or narrowest part, should be beneath the pipe and the body remain securely held."

"Yet it is not so marvellous as the coincidence that this particular drain should need repairs at the precise period when this tragedy happened."

"Quite so. It is exceedingly strange. But are you interested in the case? Have you reason to believe that this poor woman——?"

Digitized by Google

"I hardly know," broke in the barrister. "I have no data to go upon, but I feel convinced that I shall ultimately establish her identity. You, doctor, can help me much by telling me your surmises in addition to the known facts."

The medico looked thoughtfully through the window before he exclaimed: "I am certain that the woman found in the Thames came from the upper walks of life. Notwithstanding the disfiguring effects of water and rough usage, any medical man can rapidly appreciate the caste of his subject. She was, I should say, a woman of wealth and refinement, one who led an orderly, well-regulated life, whose surroundings were normal and healthy."

He proceeded to array himself in the most fashionable clothes he possessed.

Brett thanked his informant and hurried back to London.

A telegram to Inspector Winter preceded him. He had not long reached his Victoria-street chambers when the detective was announced.

Reggie soon made known his wishes. "I want you to get me possession of that small piece of iron found in the head of the woman at Putney. If necessary, I will return it in twenty-four hours."

Mr. Winter's face showed some little sign of annoyance. "It is against the rules," he began; but Brett curtly interrupted him.

"Very well, I will make direct application to the Commissioner."

"I was going to say, Mr. Brett, that although not strictly in accordance with orders, I will make an exception in your case." And the detective slowly produced the pièce de conviction from a large pocket-book.

In sober fact the police-officer was somewhat jealous of the clever lawyer, who saw so quickly through complexities that puzzled his slower brains. He was in no wise anxious to help the other in his inquiries, though keenly wishful to get the benefits of his discoveries, and follow out his theories when they were defined with sufficient clearness.

Reggie did not at first take the proffered article.

"Let me understand, Mr. Winter," he said. "Do you object to my presence in this inquiry? Are you going to hinder me or help me? It will save much future misunderstanding if we have this point settled now."

The detective flushed at this direct inquiry. "I will be candid with you, Mr. Brett. It is true I have been vexed at times when you have over-reached me. But I regret it immediately. It is foolish of me to try and solve problems by your methods. Kindly forget my momentary disinclination to hand over the only genuine link in the case."

"In what case?"

"In the case of Lady Delia's disappearance."

"Ah! Then you think it is in some way connected with the woman found at Putney?"

"I am sure of it. The woman at Putney, whether Lady Delia herself or not I cannot tell, wore some of Lady Delia's clothes. When we have ascertained the means and manner of the death of the woman buried at Putney we shall not be far from learning what has become of Lady Delia Lyle."

"How have you identified the clothes?"

"I managed to gain the confidence of the lady's-maid, who gave evidence at the inquest. She, of course, is quite positive that the body was not that of her mistress, but when I had examined some of Lady Delia's linen I no longer doubted the fact."

"If you knew all this, how comes it that more did not transpire at the coroner's inquiry?"

"In such affairs an inquest is rather a hindrance to the police. It is better to lull the guilty person or persons into he belief that the crime has passed into oblivion. They know as well as we do that Lady Delia is buried at Putney. We have failed to establish her identity by the evidence of the husband and servants. The linen and clothes, our sole effective testimony, remain in our possession, so, taking everything into consideration, I prefer that matters should remain as they are for the present."

"Really, Mr. Winter, I congratulate you. You will perhaps pardon me for saying that some of your colleagues do not usua ly take so sensible a view."

The policeman smiled at the compliment. "I am learning your method, Mr. Brett," he said.

As he spoke a servant entered with a note addressed to Brett and indorsed "Urgent."

It was in the handwriting of Sir Charles Lyle, and even the imperturbable barrister could not resist an exclamation of amazement when he read:

My Dear Brett,—My wife's maid has vanished. She has not been near the house for three days. The thing came to my ears owing to gossip amongst the servants. There is something maddening about these occurrences. I really cannot stand any more. Do come and see me, there's a good fellow.

"Well, I'm jiggered!" said the detective. "The blessed girl must have been spirited away a few hours after I saw her. Maybe, Mr. Brett, we are all wrong. Has she gone to join her mistress?"

"Possibly—in the next world."

Nothing would shake the barrister's belief that Lady Delia Lyle was dead.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER IV.

No. 61 Raleigh Mansions.

Really, the maid deserved to have her ears pulled.

People in her walk of life should not ape their betters. Lady Delia, owing to her position, was entitled to some degree of oddity or mystery in her behaviour. But for a lady's maid to so upset the entire household at Wensley House, Portman-square, was intolerable.

Sir Charles became, if possible, more miserable; the butler fumed; the housekeeper said that the girl was always a forward minx, and the footman winked at buttons as much as to say that he knew a good deal if he liked to talk.

As a matter of fact the police were as greatly baffled by this latter incident as by its predecessor. This time the movements of the maid were quite unknown. No one could tell definitely when she left the house. Her fellow-servants described the dress she probably wore, as all her other belongings were in her bed-room; but beyond the fact that her name was Jane Harding, and that she had not returned to her home in Lincolnshire, the police could get no further clue.

So, in brief, Jane Harding quickly joined Lady Delia in the limbo of forgetfulness.

Brett, however, forgot nothing. Indeed, he rejoiced at this incident.

"The greater the apparent mystery," he communed, "the less it is in reality. We now have two tracks to follow. They are both hidden, it is true, but when we find one it will probably intersect the other."

The new year was a few days old when Brett made his first forward step through the bewildering maze which seemed to bar progress on every side. He received a report from the man, a pensioned police-officer, who had been making a painstaking research into the history and occupation of every inhabitant of Raleigh Mansions.

Two items the barrister fastened on to at once.

"At No. 12, top floor right, entrance by first door on Sloane Square side, is a small flat occupied by a man named Sydney H. Pyne. He passes as an American, but is probably an Englishman who has resided in the United States. He does not mix with other Americans in London, and is of irregular habits. He frequents race meetings and sporting clubs, is reputed to belong to a Piccadilly club where high play is the rule, and has no definite occupation. He occasionally visits a lady who lives at No. 61, same mansions, ground floor, and sixth door. They have been heard to quarrel seriously, and the dispute appears always to have concerned money. Pyne left for Monte Carlo early in December. His address there is Hotel du Cercle, and the local post-office has a supply of stamped and addressed envelopes in which to forward his correspondence.

"At No. 61, as already described, lives Mrs. Gwendoline Hillmer. She maintains a good style of living, has a brougham and victoria, rented by the month, and is either a wealthy widow or maintained by some one of means. She dresses well, and goes out a good deal to theatres, but otherwise leads a rather lonely life. Her most frequent visitor is, or was, a gentleman who looked like an officer in the Guards, and, much less often, the aforesaid Sydney H. Pyne. Her servants, except the maid, live out. The maid, who is a sort of companion, is talkative, but does not know much, or, if she does, will not speak."

Brett weighed the foregoing statements very fully. They did not contain any positive facts that promised well for the elucidation of Lady Delia's visit to the mansions on that fateful November evening, but the absolute colourlessness of the reports concerning the other occupants rendered them quite impossible of individual distinction.

After an hour of puzzled thought the barrister finally decided upon a course of action. He would see Mrs. Gwendoline Hillmer, and trust to luck in the way of discoveries.

A quiet smile lit up his handsome regular features as he proceeded to array himself in the most fashionable clothes he possessed, paying the utmost attention to every detail in a manner that amazed his valet.

When at last that worthy was dispatched to the nearest florist's for a boutonnière, he communicated his bewilderment to the hall-porter.

"My guvnor's going out on the mash," he said confidentially. "I thought he would never look at a woman; but bless you, Jim, we're all alike. When the day comes for us we all rush after a petticoat."

It was nearly six o'clock when Brett walked down Victoria Street. For some reason he did not call a hansom, and it was almost with a start that he found himself purchasing a ticket to Sloane Square at the Underground Railway office. At this precise hour and place he had last

"Are you a policeman?"

Digitized by Google

seen Lady Delia on earth. The memory nerved him to his purpose.

A few minutes later he pressed the electric bell that communicated with No. 61, Raleigh Mansions. As he listened to the slight jar of the indicator within, he smiled at the apparent fatuity of his mission.

When his master entered a brougham in which was seated a fur-wrapped lady the valet grinned broadly.

He had one card, perhaps a weak one, to play, it was true, but he hoped that circumstances might prevent this from being tabled too early in the game.

The door opened, and a youthful housemaid stood before him, the simple wonder in her eyes showing that such visits as his were rare ones at that establishment.

"Is Mrs. Hillmer at home?" he said.

"I'll see, sir, if you give me your name."

"Surely you know whether or not she is at home?"

The girl stammered and blushed at this unexpected query. "Well, sir," she said, "my mistress is in, but I do not know if she can receive a visitor. She is dressed to go out."

"Ah! that's better. Now take her my card and say that whilst I will not detain her, my business is very important." This with a sweet smile that put the flurried maid entirely at her ease.

The girl withdrew, after hesitating for a moment to decide the important question as to whether or not she should close the door in the visitor's face.

Another smile from Brett, and she did not.

He was thus able to note the luxurious and tasteful air of the general appointments, for the entrance-hall to an establishment usually reveals much of the characteristics of the inmates. Here there was every evidence of refinement and wealth. All the display had not been lavished on the drawing-room.

As he waited, conscious of the fact that his colloquy with the servant had been heard within, a lady crossed from one room to another at the end of the passage. Her smart but simple dress and the quick scrutiny she gave him, as though discovering his presence accidentally, caused him to believe—rightly, as it transpired—that this was the maid-companion described by his assistant.

Not only had she obviously made her appearance in order to see him, but the housemaid had carried his message to a different section of the flat.

The girl returned. "My mistress will see you in a few minutes," she said. "Will you kindly step into the dining-room?"

He followed her, sat down in a position where the strong glare of the electric lamps would fall on any one who stood opposite to him, and awaited developments.

The furniture was solid and appropriate, the carpet rich, and the pictures, engravings for the most part, excellent. This pleasant room, warmed by a cheerful fire, impressed Brett as a place much used by the household. Books and work-baskets were scattered about, and a piano, obviously out of place, blocked up a corner. There were a few photographs of persons and places, but he had no time to examine these before the lady of the house entered.

Her appearance, for some reason inexplicable to the barrister himself, took him by surprise. She was tall, graceful, extremely good-looking, and dressed with quiet elegance. Just the sort of woman one would expect to find in such a well-appointed abode, yet more refined in manner than Brett, from his knowledge of the world, thought he would meet, judging by the hasty inferences drawn from his subordinate's report. She was self-possessed, too. With calm tone, and slightly elevated eyebrows, she said:

"You wish to see me, I understand?"

"Yes. Allow me first to apologise for the hour at which I have called."

"No apology is necessary. But I am going out. Perhaps you will be good enough not to detain me longer than is absolutely necessary."

She stood between the table and the door. Brett, who had risen at her entrance, was at the other side of the room. Her words, no less than her attitude, showed that she desired the interview to be brief. But, if possible, the barrister resolved that he would not be repelled so coolly.

Advancing, with a bow and that fascinating smile of his, he said, pulling forward a chair:

"Won't you be seated?"

The lady looked at him. She saw a man of fine physique and undoubted good breeding. She hesitated. There was no reason to be rude to him, so she sat down.

Reggie drew a chair to the other side of the hearth-rug and commenced:

"I venture to ask this interview for the purpose of making some inquiries."

"I thought so. Are you a policeman?" The words blurted out impetuously, a trifle complainingly, but Brett gave no sign of their interest for him.

"Good gracious, no," he cried. "Why should you think that?"

"Because two detectives have been bothering me, and every other person in these mansions, about some mysterious lady who called here two months ago. They don't know where she called, nor will they state her name; as if anyone could possibly know anything about it. So I naturally thought you were on the same errand."

"Confound that rascal Winter," growled Reggie to himself.

But Mrs. Hillmer went on: "If that is not your business, would you mind telling me what it is?"

Now Brett's alert brain had been actively engaged during the last few seconds. This woman was not the clever, specious adventuress he had half-expected to meet. It seemed more than ever unlikely that she could have any knowledge of Lady Delia or the causes that led to her disappearance. He was tempted to frame some excuse and take his departure. But the certainty that Lady Delia had visited Raleigh Mansions, and the necessity there was for exploiting every line of inquiry impelled him to adopt his last resource.

Digitized by Google

"It is not concerning a missing lady, but concerning a missing gentleman that I have come to see you."

The shot went home.

Why, for the life of him he could not tell, but his companion was manifestly disturbed at his words.

"Oh," she said.

Then, after a little pause: "May I ask his name?"

"Certainly. He is known as Mr. Sydney H. Pyne."

She gave a slight gasp.

"Why do you put it that way? Is not that his right name?"

"I have reason to believe it is not."

Mrs. Hillmer was so obviously distressed that Brett inwardly reviled himself for causing her so much unnecessary suffering, as the reason for her emotion in all probability had not the remotest bearing upon his quest.

Then came the pertinent query, after a glance at his card, which she still held in her hand:—

"Who are you. Mr.—Mr. Reginald Brett?"

"I am a member of the Bar, of the Inner Temple, My chambers are at No. 7, Paper-buildings, and my private residence is given there."

"And why are you interested in Mr. Sydney Pyne?"

"Ah, in that respect I am at this moment unable to enlighten you."

"Unable, or unwilling?"

Brett indulged in a quiet piece of fencing:

"Really, Mrs. Hillmer," he said, "I am not here as in any sense hostile to you. I merely want some detailed information with regard to this gentleman, information which you may be able to give me. That is all."

All this time he knew that the woman was scrutinising him narrowly—trying to weigh him up, as it were, not because she feared him, but rather to discover the true motive of his presence.

Personally, he had never faced a more difficult task than this make-believe investigation. He could have laughed at the apparent want of connection between Lady Delia's ill-fated visit to Raleigh Mansions and this worrying of a beautiful, pleasant-mannered woman, who was surely neither a principal nor an accomplice in the crime that caused Lady Delia's death.

"Well, I suppose I may consider myself in the hands of counsel. Tell me what it is you want to know!" Mrs. Hillmer pouted, with the air of a child about to undergo a scolding.

Brett was quite at a loss to understand her, but he acted his rôle with a skill few men could equal.

"Are you acquainted with Mr. Pyne's present address?" he said.

"No. I have neither seen him nor heard from him since early in November."

"Can you be more precise about the period?"

"Yes, perhaps." She rose, took from a drawer in the sideboard a packet of bills—receipted, Brett saw—searched through them and found the document she was looking for. "I bought a few articles about that time," she explained, "and the account for them is dated November 15. I had not seen my——" She blushed, became confused, laughed a little, and went on. "I had not seen Mr. Pyne for at least a week before that date—say November 8th or 9th."

Lady Delia disappeared on the evening of the 6th!

Brett swallowed his astonishment at the odd coincidence of dates, for he said, with an encouraging laugh, "Out with it, Mrs. Hillmer. You were about to describe Mr. Pyne correctly, when you recollected yourself."

Mrs. Hillmer, still colouring and becoming saucily cheerful, cried, "Why should I trouble myself when you, of course, know all that I can tell you, and probably more? He is my brother, and a pretty troublesome sort of relation, too."

"I am obliged for your confidence, Mrs. Hillmer. In return, I am free to state that your brother is now in the South of France."

"As you are here, Mr. Brett," she said, "I may as well get some advice gratis. Can people writ him in the South of France? Can they ask me to pay his debts?"

"Under ordinary circumstances they can do neither. Certainly not the latter."

"I hope not. But they sometimes come very near to it, as I know to my cost."

"Indeed! How?"

Mrs. Hillmer hesitated. Her smile was a trifle scornful, and her colour rose again as she answered: "People are not averse to taking advantage of circumstances. I have had some experience of this trait in debt-collectors already. But they must be careful. You, as a legal man, must know that demands urged on account of personal reasons may come very near to levying blackmail."

"Surely, Mrs. Hillmer, you do not suspect me of being a dun. Perish the thought! You could never be in debt to me."

"Very nice of you. Don't you represent those people in Leadenhall-street, then?"

"What people?"

"Messrs. Dodge and Co."

"No, why do you ask?"

"Because my brother entered into what he called a 'deal' with them. He underwrote some shares in a South African mine, as a nominal affair, he told me, and now they want him to pay for them because the company is not supported by the public."

"No, I do not represent Dodge and Co."

"Is there something else then? Whom do you represent?"

"To be as precise as permissible, I may say that my inquiries in no sense affect financial matters."

"What then?"

"Well, there's a woman in the case."

Mrs. Hillmer was evidently both relieved and interested. "No, you don't say," she said. "Tell me all about it. I never knew Bertie to be much taken up with the fair sex. I am all curiosity. Who is she?"

Brett did not take advantage of the mention of a name which in no way stood for Sydney. Besides, perhaps the initial stood for Herbert. He resolved to try another tack.

Glancing at his watch, he said: "It is nearly seven o'clock. I have already detained you an unconscionable time. You were going out. Permit me to call again, and we can discuss matters at leisure."

He rose, and the lady sighed: "You were just beginning to be entertaining. I was only going out to dine at a restaurant. I am quite tired of being alone."

Was it a hint? He would see. "Are you dining by yourself, then, Mrs. Hillmer?"

"I hardly know. I may bring my maid."

Reggie now made up his mind. "May I venture," he said, "after such an informal introduction, to ask you to dine with me at the Prince's Restaurant, and afterwards, perhaps, to look in at the Jollity Theatre?"

The lady was unfeignedly pleased. She arranged to call for him in her brougham within twenty minutes, and Brett hurried off to Victoria Street in a hansom to dress for this unexpected branch of business.

When he told his valet to telephone to the restaurant and the theatre respectively for a reserved table and a couple of stalls, that worthy chuckled.

When his master entered a brougham in which was seated a fur-wrapped lady, the valet grinned broadly. "I knew it," he said. "The guvnor's on the mash! Now, who would ever have thought it of him?"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT GIRAFFES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "A Bitter Vintage," by K. Douglas King, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. G. T. White, Plasnewydd House, Roath, Cardiff. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 24th. Post-cards only, please.

Undoubtedly.

A PARISH minister was examining a class of boys. In order to test their intellect he told them he would give a penny to the one who should first tell him what was the highest form of animal life.

Silence reigned for a moment, when a red-headed urchin at the bottom of the class, whose joyful face proclaimed that he was in possession of the grand secret, snapped his fingers with great glee and shouted:

"I ken't. I ken't, Mr. Minister."

"Well, my boy, will you kindly inform me what it is?"

"The giraffe," was the prompt reply.

G. T. W.

What a Neck!

A PARTY of laundry workers went some time ago to London, and, of course, the Zoo was included in the programme. After wandering round a bit, they came at last to the giraffes.

When they had gazed in wonder for some moments, one of the party exclaimed:

"Crikey! What a neck!"

Another moment of silence followed, and then:

"Well. Aw shouldn't like to get linen up for a family of six wi' necks like that!"

J. W.

A Donkey Raiser.

A GIRAFFE attached to a travelling circus got loose one night, and made a light meal off some geraniums and other plants that grew in a flower-box outside the bedroom window of an Irish costermonger.

In the morning Mike discovered his loss, and was much puzzled thereby, until looking out of the window he observed his donkey quietly grazing below.

"Bedad, thin so ye're the thafe, are ye!" he exclaimed. "But, by Saint Pathrick, I'd loike to see th' mon thot lifted ye up, I should."

J. B.

Wot Nex'!

Two boys were gazing in wonderment at the giraffes in a circus procession, passing through the town.

"I say, Bill," said one, "what a nobby long cool drink them there animals could 'ave, with a throat that length."

"Yus," admitted Bill, "but wot a thunderin' lot o' flannel they'd want, if ever they 'ad a sore throat."

J. D. W.

Poor Giraffe.

AN itinerant showman some years ago had pitched his "canvas" on the downs at Lewes.

The giraffe, being so tall, was accommodated in a tent all to himself, and it would seem that the poor animal was, among other uses, used as a tent pole, judging from the following:

One night the wind blew a hurricane, and, on being met next morning by a partner, or assistant, who inquired about the menagerie, he said:

"It did blow awful. The other tents was shook a bit, but the one with the giraffe suffered terribly. Why, if it had not been tied to his neck it would have been blown clean away."

W. B.

A Neckstraordinary Escape.

LONGBOW was in great form the other evening, and the fellows at the club were listening to his yarns with rapt attention.

"Yes," he said, in reply to someone's query, "I have had some narrow shaves in my time, but about the closest shave I ever had was when I was at Cairo some years ago. It was, indeed, an extraordinary escape. You see, it was like this:

"I was staying at the Grand Hotel, and one night, after all the occupants had retired, a big fire broke out in the basement, and in a few minutes the whole building was a mass of flames. I was sleeping off the effects of over-indulgence when it happened, and it was some time before the noise and bustle awoke me. When I did awake, however, I saw that my position was almost hopeless; for my room was on the sixth landing, and as the fire had worked its way upwards all means of retreat were cut off. Then I rushed to the window, only to find escape impossible that way, and I gave all up for lost.

"Suddenly, my hopes were renewed, for a native came galloping across the square with a giraffe. Stopping directly beneath the window at which I stood calling for help, the intelligent animal reared aloft its head and planted its chin firmly on the window-sill, thus forming an excellent fire-escape, and in another moment I had slid down its neck to the ground, and I was saved!"

"But, look here, old man," said Billson, "if that giraffe could reach six storeys, it was a pretty tall one, wasn't it?" "Yes" chimed in a cynical listener, "and in that respect it bears a striking resemblance to his yarn. Anyhow, we can't deny the fact that our friend there had a neckstraordinary escape."

A. V.

Digitized by Google

A Vegetarian.

"This," said the showman, "is a fine specimen of a giraffe. Its diet is principally a vegetable one, carrots being a great delicacy."

"For goodness' sake, Bill," exclaimed a youth to a chum, whose locks flamed like an Eastern sunset, "stand back a bit, or there's no telling what'll happen!"

"Very good advice, young man," said the showman, turning to the interrupter; "but have a care yourself, for I must tell you the animal is equally fond of greens."

E. C.

Interred.

In the middle of a stiff paper on practical chemistry, the boys competing for a certain scholarship found the following extraordinary question: "What is a giraffe? Tell all you know about it."

Whether it had got there through a printer's error, or was merely a ponderous attempt at a joke, nobody could determine; so the boys, with one exception, wisely fought shy of the question.

The exception was the pampered son of a merchant prince, who conducted his scientific experiments in a costly laboratory of his own. Not to be beaten, he answered the question thus:

"I am sorry I never experimented with giraffes. Pa brought me one from foreign parts in his ship, but the poor thing got its head raffled in the rigging, and had to be shot. They interred it in the Bay of Biscay."

R. A. H. G.

Dressing on the Railway.

There is a story told of a lady and gentleman travelling together on one of our railways. They were strangers to each other. Suddenly the gentleman said:

"Madam, I will trouble you to look out of the window for a few minutes; I am going to make some changes in my wearing apparel."

"Certainly, sir," she replied, with great politeness, rising and turning her back upon him. In a short time he said:

"Now, madam, my change is completed, and you may resume your seat."

When the lady turned she beheld her male companion transformed into a dashing lady, with a heavy veil over her face.

"Now, sir, or madam, whichever you are," said the lady, "I must trouble you to look out of the window, for I also have some changes to make in my apparel."

"Certainly, madam," and the gentleman in lady's attire immediately complied:

"Now, sir, you may resume your seat."

To his great surprise, on resuming his seat, the gentleman in female attire found his companion transformed into a man.

He laughed, and said:

"It appears that we are both anxious to escape. What have you done? I have robbed a bank."

"And I," said the whilom lady, as he dexterously fettered his companion's wrists with a pair of handcuffs, "am Detective A., and in female apparel have shadowed you for two days. Now," drawing a revolver, "keep still!"

M. H. E.

A Lift Incident.

Two women wandered into a large block of offices, and halted near the lift.

They saw the place was nicely carpeted, and contained comfortable seats, and one of them took a look in the mirror.

"Now, Eliza," said the older one, "you just take a seat in this sittin'-room while I go upstairs and see the lawyer."

Eliza took a seat in the lift, and the old lady started up the stairs.

She had just reached the first landing when she heard a yell and saw the "sittin'-room" flying towards the sky with Eliza inside.

The old lady was dumb with amazement, and stood looking upwards at the lift which paused a moment at the seventh floor and then started to descend. As it passed her she saw Eliza was still alive and she hastened to the lower floor, where she arrived in time to seize her as she came out.

"Did it blow up?" she inquired.

"No," replied the young woman, "it didn't blow up, but it flew up."

"Perhaps that young man was trying to elope with you," said the old lady, pointing her finger at the lift boy. "You come here at once. This is no doubt one of those places that we have been readin' about where they kidnap people, and right in daylight too. It is a lucky thing that I saw the kidnapper or he might have carried you off for good. Come along before he kidnaps both of us."

The two women made a bolt for the avenue and disappeared, and it took a bucket of water to revive the lift boy.

YOUR HEAD AND SHOULDERS ONLY.

If you have a relative who has passed away either at home in peace or abroad in war, send his photograph—which you probably cherish—and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. by 12in., mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. by 19in.

Relatives of soldiers at the front may obtain one of these enlargements for 6s.

Other photographs will be enlarged for 7s.

You will certainly get a genuine bargain by availing yourself of this offer. The enlargements can be made from any photograph, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible. All the enlargements are of the head and shoulders only.

What to do.

Write your name and address plainly in ink on a slip of paper, also on the back of the portrait you are sending us. Get a postal order for 7s. (if the photograph be that of a soldier or sailor get a 6s. postal order). Place all of these in an envelope, or make a securely packed parcel of them and address it to the PORTRAIT EDITOR, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A Reduction of Threepence on each enlargement, when the order is for two or more from the same photograph, will be made.

Orders will be treated in rotation.

All photographs—particularly those on glass—should be securely packed. Although all possible care will be taken, we do not hold ourselves responsible for photographs damaged or lost in transit.

Digitized by Google

"QUICK CHANGE" PUZZLES.

First Prize ... ... A Magnificent Graphophone.
Second Prize ... ... £2.
Six Prizes of ... ... 10s. each.

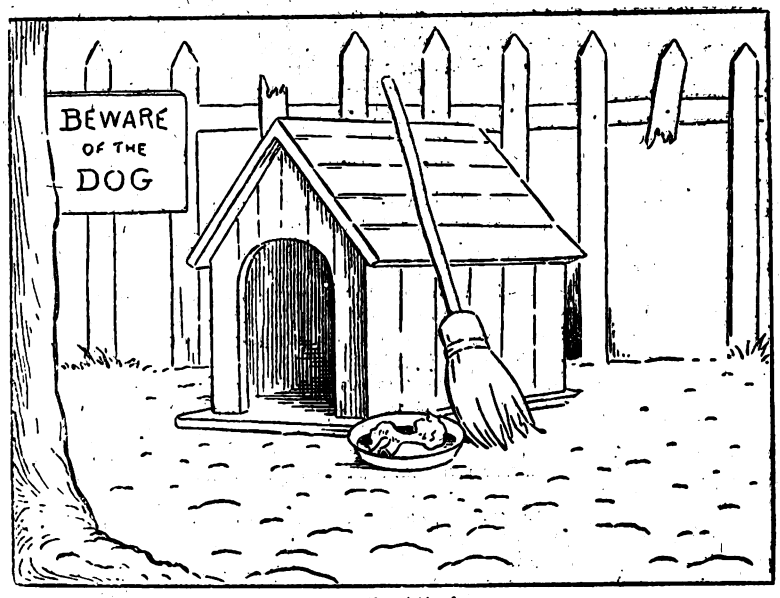
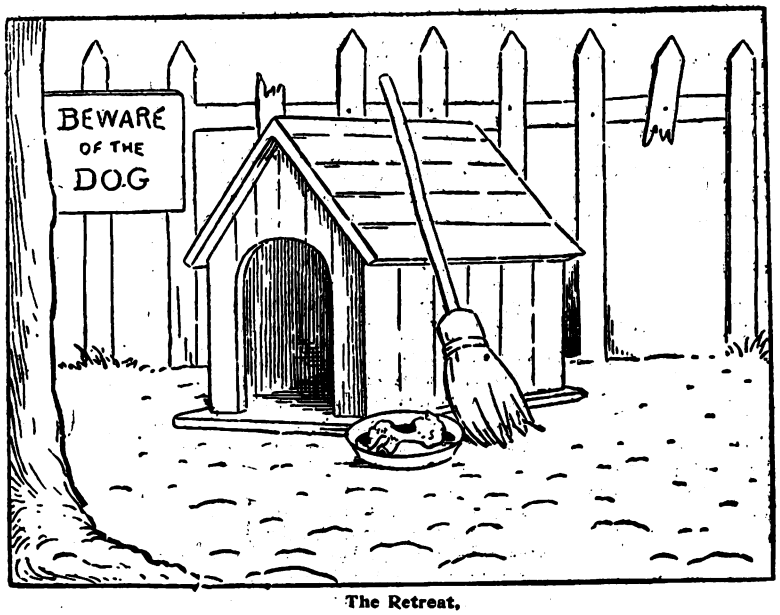
On this page you will find two drawings exactly alike, and a number of parts of animals. What you have to do is to cut out the parts of the animals at the dotted lines, and paste them on the picture in the way they should go. There is no guess work about it. Each part of an animal should be pasted on a certain spot, and will fit no other spot.

When you have pasted up your picture, put it by until two more sets have appeared. We will tell you the closing date in good time. Competitors may make any number of attempts, but each set of three puzzles must be sent in separately.

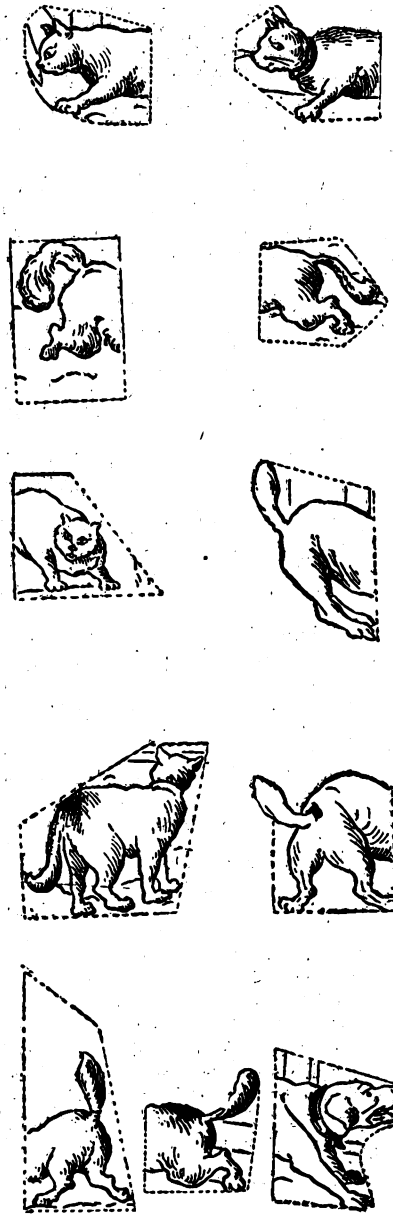
Competitors must abide by the Editor's final decision, and may enter only on that understanding.



The Attack.



The Retreat.



Digitized by Google

The Thoughtfulness of Twopenny.

FATHER and mother were having tea when Twopenny fell over the door-mat into the dining-room.

"I wanted to surprise you," he explained when he had recovered himself and picked up an ungainly parcel.

"You might have tried walking in quietly, old man," said father looking up sharply.

"He's only six," apologised mother.

Twopenny smiled at her. He was a solid, nice-looking boy, with baby-blue eyes and a huge smile.

"You'll say it's very good for me," he stated confidently.

He never claimed higher praise than this, being conscious that he could not approach the merits of his big sisters.

"Umph!" said father, whose notions of goodness did not always coincide with Twopenny's.

"Tell me, dear," asked mother.

"You will be surprised." He had a weakness for surprising people. "You see."

He bumped the package down heavily on the tea-table, knocking over an emptied cup and upsetting the cake upon the floor.

"I am surprised," said father, "that it wasn't the full cup!"

This is the sort of thing he usually says. Mother put her arm round Twopenny, which is what she usually does.

"The shilling that Uncle Jack gave me next day," he said mysteriously. He meant yesterday.

"You were going to save it."

"Ye-es." He fidgeted by one leg and nearly overbalanced. "Somefink better 'curred to me."

"To spend it?" inquired father, who is clever at guessing things.

He nodded.

"I wanted to buy somefink for ev'rybody."

Mother stroked his hair.

"Like a kind little boy," she said approvingly.

Twopenny undid the parcel with slow importance, and displayed—three loaves of bread! Father roared with laughter, and mother looked—surprised.

"Oh, Twopenny!" she cried. "Whatever made you do it?"

"Don't we give you enough to eat?" inquired father.

Twopenny looked from one to the other, and the big blue eyes grew a little moist.

"I couldn't fink of anyfink else that would be plenty for ev'rybody," he explained.

There was the least tremble about his mouth.

"It was very kind of you, darling," said mother quickly; "I shall like some for dinner, and so will father, won't you?"

Father inspected a loaf critically. It was the soft, brand-new kind, which is worst for the digestion.

"Of course I shall," he said. "It is a superior kind of bread, now I come to look at it."

Twopenny beamed with satisfaction.

"It was clever for me, wasn't it?" he claimed.

Father agreed. Also he took him on his knee and showed him the inside of his watch, where the time is made.

"You know, Twopenny," he explained presently, "you can't give presents to everybody. There are such a lot of people."

"More than twenty?"

This was as far as Twopenny had learnt to count. Some greater thinkers have fancied that the world went no further than their understanding.

"More than twenty. So you have to pick out a few. It's not a bad thing, either, to make sure that they want what you are going to give them. It would be no use my giving a big boy like you frocks, would it?"

"No," said Twopenny, laughing at such an absurd idea.

"Do you know what I should do, if I were going to give somebody bread?"

Twopenny shook his head.

"Why, I should see first who hadn't enough bread, and hadn't anybody to give it to them. Do you see?" Twopenny nodded. "You just think about it."

So Twopenny thought. Perhaps if father had thought a little more it would have occurred to him that it was dangerous to set Twopenny thinking.

* * * * *

Twopenny does not think quickly, but he keeps on for a long time, and thinks a good deal before he is done. It was October when he bought the new loaves, and father had the bad attack of indigestion, and told him to think. It was the end of November when he concluded that Mrs. MacDaub, the washerwoman, was a person who hadn't enough bread, and hadn't anyone to give it to her. About a week later cook noticed an extraordinary rise in the bread-book, and began thinking also. Cook is one of those people who can't keep their thoughts to themselves.

Digitized by Google

"There's waste goin' on," she told nurse, "an' I ain't goin' to take the credit of it. Master Alan eatin' 'earty, indeed! Why, 'e couldn't do it, not if 'e was a helephant, nor you neither!"

This set nurse thinking also. Thought is a curious thing, and you can never tell where it will lead to. It led nurse to the big toy cupboard, and then to mother. Master Alan had accumulated ten half-loaves, and fifty-seven pieces of bread, she reported, most of them now very stale. He was saving them for a present to Mrs. MacDaub and her six small children, he stated. He was of opinion that this arrangement was very good for him; and that it would be a surprise.

It did seem rather a surprise to mother, but unfortunately she did not consider his proceedings really good. It was very wrong, she told him, and he mustn't do it any more because it was stealing. Father took his part, however. It was following the same principle, he said, as the church bazaar, at which mother had recently been assisting. You robbed your friends to give to the poor.

"Oh, John!" said mother. "They needn't be robbed unless they like!"

This was so, father admitted, "in theory"—Twopenny did not know where this was—but it came to much the same "in practice"—which Twopenny knew was in the sum-books, where you learn that two and two make four.

"I couldn't fink of anyfink else that would be plenty for ev'rybody."

"However," father said, "in future if you want to give away anything of mother's, or mine, or anybody else's, you must ask for it first. If you don't I shall begin thinking of something you won't like. If you must think, just think of that."

So Twopenny continued thinking upon a revised plan; and as Christmas was approaching, and he was a generous little boy, his thoughts took the shape of Christmas presents for people who weren't getting any, and what he could ask father, mother and sisters to give him to give to them. The difficulty was that they gave so many Christmas boxes that nobody of importance seemed to be left out; but after careful researches he found two such unfortunate persons.

The first was Mr. Richards, whose garden was at the back of theirs, and who talked to Twopenny over the fence. He and father used to talk a great deal also, but now they didn't, because of something that happened in "business"—which everyone knows is in the City, wherever that is. Father said that it was because Richards wasn't "straight." He did stoop a little certainly, but Twopenny considered this rather a reason for charity. Besides, he hadn't any little boys and girls of his own to borrow his pennies to buy him presents like Twopenny was going to buy for father.

The other unfortunate was Fred Hanson. Fred used to come every evening to see his Sis, but now he didn't. This was a pity, because he was very jolly, and Twopenny liked him. Sis was jolly, too, but she wasn't quite so jolly as she used to be, and he feared that perhaps this was why Fred stayed away.

He suggested it to Mabel, who was fifteen and clever enough to take prizes at the High School. She said that Twopenny was confusing cause and effect—which he believed because he couldn't understand—and that they were a pair of great stupids—which he believed because he could. Anyhow, Mabel was quite clear that none of them were likely to send Fred a present this Xmas. So Twopenny made up his mind that he would, if he could get somebody to give him something to send. His own pocket-money was already mortgaged for presents to the family.

* * * *

Upon the morning of Christmas Eve Twopenny eluded nurse, and found his way into the library, where mother was busy adding a few words on some cards with printed writing and addressing envelopes. He ought not to have come, she told him—as he expected—but he might stay if he was very quiet—which he expected also. So he stayed.

"Are they presents?" he inquired, nodding at the cards.

"Yes," said mother, "in a way."

They were, in fact, invitations to dinner, which she was sending to a few friends who were likely to be lonely on Christmas day.

"Who for?"

"People."

"What people. Growed-up ones?"

"Yes, dear. Don't bother, there's a good boy."

"Will they be pleased?"

"I hope so. I can't write if you talk so, Alan."

"Why didn't you buy pretty picture cards? Do people like reading ones best?"

Digitized by Google

"Some do."

Mother finished directing envelopes and put the cards in. Some were left, he noticed.

"Give me a card," he begged, "and a wellup."

"Very well." She gave him one of each.

"Write on my card," he requested, "like you wrote on the others."

Mother wrote and handed it to him with a smile. She was thinking that it was for a dear little guest. It read like this:

If you have no engagement for dinner (2 p.m.) on Christmas Day, Mr. and Mrs. Nugent will be glad of your company.

R. S. V. P.

The Firs,
Rockwood Road,
Upper Burnton.

"Now run away and play, dear," said mother.

So Twopenny ran down to the bottom of the garden, to look for Mr. Richards, who was sure to be smoking a pipe there before lunch.

When he saw Twopenny's head over the fence he walked down to him.

"He's a nice little chap," he was thinking. "I've a good mind to send him a present as usual, in spite of his father." For Mr. Richards thought that father hadn't been "straight" in the "business" I mentioned. This was quite a mistake, for father is as upright as a —soldier.

"I've got a present for you, Mr. Richards," said Twopenny. "You'll be surprised."

"Yes," said Mr. Richards. "I am. What is it?"

"It's this," said Twopenny, handing over the card in its envelope. "It's nice reading, what grown up people like. You look at it."

Mr. Richards looked at it so long, and wrinkled his forehead so much, that Twopenny suspected that he couldn't read very well.

"Ye-es," he said slowly, at last. "It's very nice reading. Do you know what it says?"

"No-o. I—I didn't buy it," Twopenny confessed. "I'd spent all my pennies, you know; but I wanted to give you somefink. So mamma gived it to me for you."

"You're sure you asked her for it?" said Mr. Richards doubtfully.

"I never take other people's fings wivout asking them —not now," declared Twopenny solemnly. Mr. Richards looked at it again, and pulled his moustache.

"Did your mother know it was for me?" Twopenny thought the matter over carefully. He knew it was for Mr. Richards; and mother knew much more than he did, everyone said. So she must know.

"Yes," he said decidedly. "Of course she did."

Mr. Richards seemed buried in thought. It was a queer way to send the invitation; but doubtless they had noticed his friendliness for the child.

"Don't you like it?" asked the boy anxiously.

"Very much," he said. "Only I am surprised." Twopenny laughed and rubbed his fat hands.

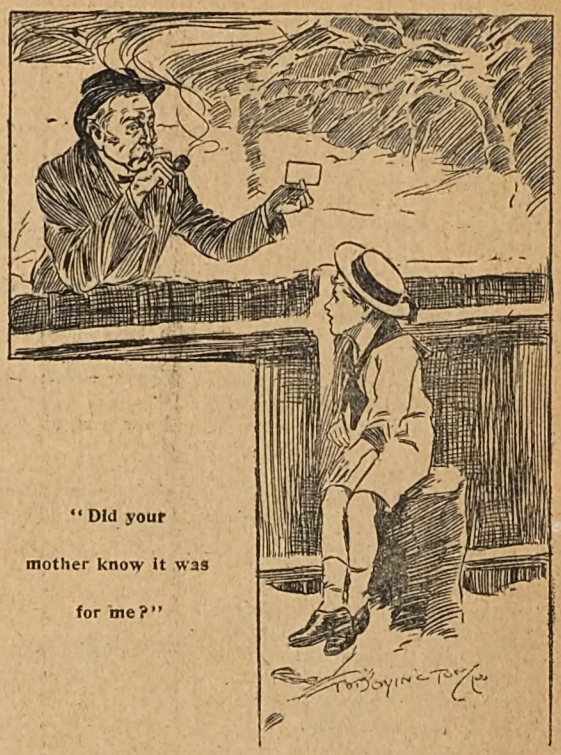
"I fought you would be," he said gleefully.

He was so pleased with himself that he kept smiling and rubbing his hands all the afternoon. When nurse asked the reason, he explained that he was only thinking, which made her extremely apprehensive.

"The things that boy thinks of," she told cook, "you'd never credit!"

* * * * *

Twopenny's thinking did not lead to any evil result so far as nurse observed. So, after dinner, she washed



"Did your mother know it was for me?"

him and let him go to find Sis, who generally read to him in the afternoon. He liked Sis's reading best of everybody's, because she had such a pleasant voice, and looked so nice while she read. He knew this was so, because Fred Hanson had corroborated his opinion.

He found Sis engaged in sending off her Christmas cards. They were beautiful pale blue ones, with a photo of Sis at the corner, and some reading underneath. This is what it said:

If meeting and greeting the Fates should end,
Yet once a friend is always a friend!

Twopenny edged up to the table and touched one of the cards gingerly.

"My hands is clean," he stated, holding them up for inspection.

"Very well, dear," said Sis, patting his head before resuming her writing.

So he inspected the card at leisure. It certainly was a pretty card, especially at the corner where the photo was. Fred would like that part, he decided; but mamma and Mabel had impressed upon him that he must not talk to Sis about Fred. So he thought, and at last Sis noticed that he was thinking.

"What is it, old blue eyes?" she asked, smiling at him in her kind way.

"I want one," he said.

She hesitated.

"They're rather expensive, dear, you know," she objected.

The first day that Twopenny had a card he usually thumb-marked it all over. The next day he drew things meant for British soldiers slaughtering enemies upon the back. The third day he drew soldiers and enemies upon the picture side. The fourth day it disappeared.

Digitized by Google

"I'd be awful careful with it," he promised, looking up at her pleadingly, "an' keep it in the wellup, if you gived me one."

So Sis kissed him, and gave him a card in a pale blue "wellup."

He said "Fank you," very politely—he was always polite to mamma and Sis—and ran off to find Mabel, who was sprawling on the sofa, reading a Christmas number. He jumped on her with a rush and sent the Christmas number flying. Mabel was the sort of girl you could jump on. She generally boxed his ears, it was true; but she never did it very hard.

On this occasion they scuffled till both rolled on the floor, which made them laugh a great deal. Then Mabel took him by the legs and shook him till his pockets emptied on the floor.

"You little horror!" she cried. "You've taken one of Sis's cards. Oh, you naughty boy!"

"I didn't," denied Twopenny, when he was right way up again; "she gived me it."

"Honour bright?"

"Honour bright," he vowed. So Mabel knew it was true. "I'm goin' to send it to someone, an' you'll d'rect it, won't you?"

"You send it? To whom, pray?"

"Fred Hanson, 'cause——"

"Nonsense!" said Mabel sharply.

"Tisn't!" said he indignantly.

Mabel put her hair straight in front of the glass. She did not care whether it was straight or not really, but she liked to do as grown-up girls do.

"No-o," she admitted, "I'm not sure that it is."

"Come along," said Mabel quickly, "I'll take you up to-night."

She looked thoughtfully at something and didn't see it, like she looks when home lessons are hard. "It's rather a clever idea for you, Twopenny," she said at last. "You mustn't tell anybody if I do"

"No. It'll be a secret, won't it?" Twopenny loved a secret. "Won't he be surprised?"

"I think he will," said Mabel with a gleam in the corner of her eyes. She walked over to the writing-table and took up a pen hesitatingly. Hesitation is rare with clever Mabel. "I wonder," she remarked half to herself, "if they really meant to—— Oh, but I'm sure they do. It's just silly, foolish pride."

"Why don't you do it?" asked Twopenny impatiently.

"You won't tell anyone? Honour bright?"

"Honour bright."

Mabel addressed the envelope rapidly. "I write very like Sis," she thought with another smile.

"Shall I ask mamma for a stamp?"

"No, no! It's to be a secret, you silly boy. Run and tell nurse to put on your things to come out with me. And if you say a word about it I'll—excorpusculate you."

Twopenny could only be daunted by words that he could not understand.

So Mabel took him out and bought the stamp, and treated him to little cakes with icing on and ginger-beer.

"You're not half-bad Twopenny, for a kid," she assured him.

As a matter of fact, she thought him the nicest small boy that ever was; but she knew that male creatures must not be flattered, because of their excessive vanity.

"You've been such a good boy to-day, Alan," said mother," when he was going off to bed.

"So far as we know," qualified father cautiously.

Twopenny beamed.

"If you knowed what you don't know," he began mysteriously.

"Come along," said Mabel quickly; "I'll take you up to-night," and she hustled him off.

Father laughed when they were out of hearing.

"I'm afraid he's been thinking again," he said.

"He means well," said mother softly, and father nodded.

* * * * *

Santa Claus left a sleigh-load of presents during the night, and Mr. Richards sent a clockwork train on Christmas morning. So Twopenny was fully occupied; but he could not help noticing that some strange things happened.

Just as breakfast was finishing, the postman came with letters for everybody. When Sis saw one of hers she trembled, and when she opened it she began to smile and cry quietly at the same time. As soon as she had finished reading it she went out of the room. Mabel followed her; and when Twopenny went in search of Mabel, who had promised to arrange a lead-soldier battle, he found them hugging one another in an extraordinary manner. Sis picked him up and kissed him more times than he liked to be kissed, and gave him an ivory penholder, and promised to make him a khaki suit, like a real soldier's; and Mabel carried him downstairs on her shoulder, and played with his toys, and was jollier even than usual.

"She's had a letter from Fred, Twopenny," she whispered. "It's all through your card."

Digitized by Google

"What did it say?"

"I don't know," stated Mabel. But she did. It was this:

Dear Little Friend—More Than Friend—

I've kissed the pretty face on your pretty card a hundred times. Once a true lover, always a true lover; and I was your true lover, Sis. It's been just a silly mistake, and so much my fault. Will you meet me in the park after church? I can't do without you, dear.

Always your lover,

Fred.

Father also received a letter, which seemed to surprise him. He was showing it to mother when the girls left the table. This is how it ran:

My Dear Nugent,—

I have the greatest pleasure in accepting your kind invitation to Christmas dinner. Thinking matters over I see that we misjudged one another. We ought both to have known that neither would take an unfair advantage intentionally. You have had the largeness of mind to recognise this first. A happy Christmas to you and yours.

Yours most sincerely,

Hy. Richards.

"You good little woman, to think of inviting him!" said father, putting his hand on mother's shoulder for a moment.

"But I didn't, dear," said mother. "I can't think how——" then she suddenly remembered Twopenny and his card.

Presently father and mother came down to the breakfast-room, where Mabel was amusing her brother. Mother petted him quietly. Father didn't say much, only smoked; but when mother went off to make some dinner arrangements, he stayed and joined in the games.

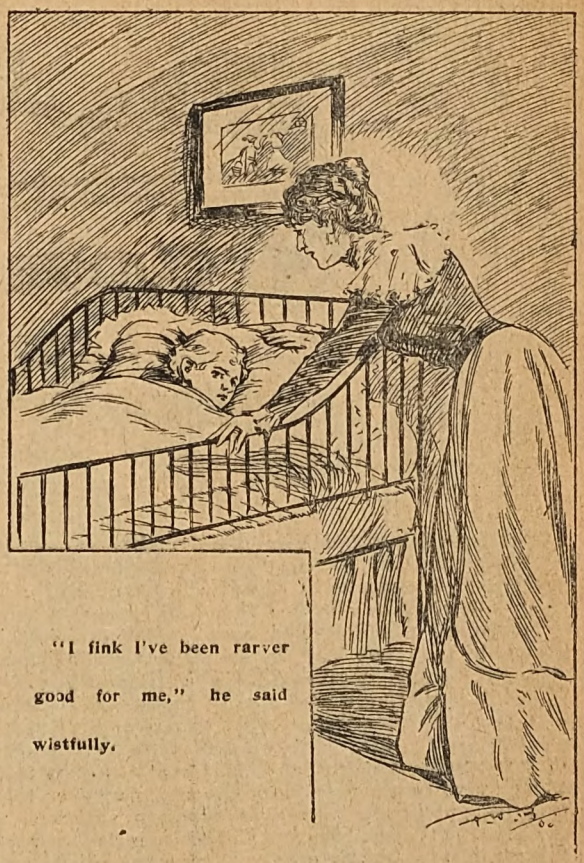
"I want you and Sis to pay every attention to Richards, Mab," he said presently. "He's coming to dinner." Mabel raised her eyebrows. "Peace and goodwill, you know."

"Yes, dad." Mabel was silent for a time. Then her mischievous eyes began to sparkle. "Won't I be enough to amuse him?" she inquired. "I'm getting awfully grown up; and Sis will have Fred to attend to, you see."

"Eh? What?" cried dad. "Fred? Well I am glad."

He laughed like a boy—indeed mother says he is half a boy still, though his hair is getting thin.

Then mother came in and they all explained things. Only Twopenny was so busy playing with his soldiers that he did not hear.



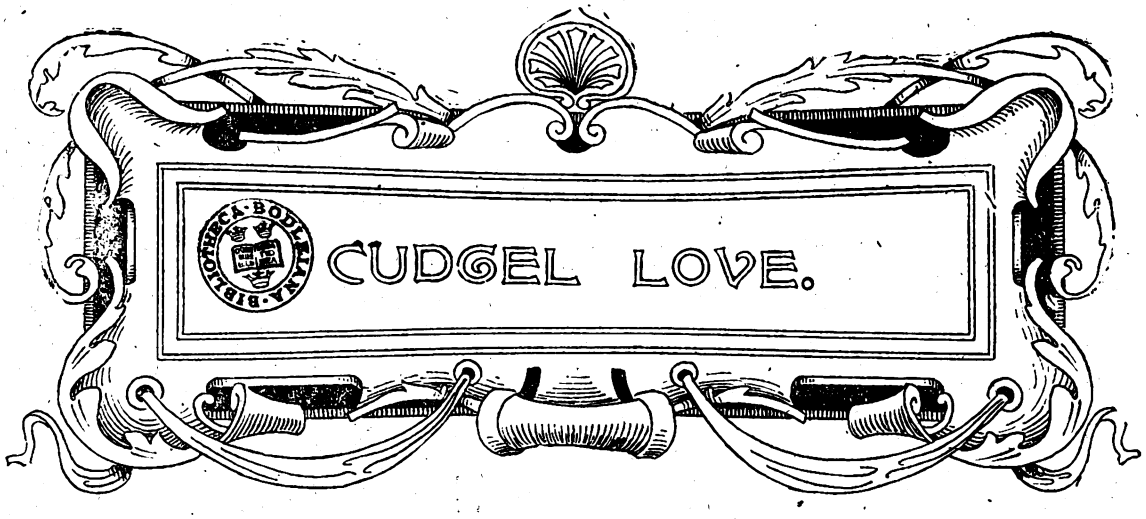
"I fink I've been rarver good for me," he said wistfully.

It occurred to him during the afternoon and evening that everybody was very kind to him. This set him thinking; and he concluded that it was because they were good, and that he ought to be good also, so far as a little boy of six could.

"I fink I've been rarver good, for me," he said wistfully when mother tucked him in bed.

Mother bent over him and hugged him. "So good, darling," she said; and somewhere, right down in her heart, she prayed a prayer. Owen Oliver.

Digitized by Google



How much do nine and seven, and three and a quarter, and fifteen, and one thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine and threequarters make? Two thousand and twenty-four. What do five thousand a year, a good constitution, a well-drained house, a popular temper, and a shrewish wife make? An all sort-of-life, happy and not happy, chequered, like a Highland plaid. What do a pretty girl and an old gentleman drinking brandy without knowing it, and a coward and a cudgel, make? Give it up? A story for the Christmas number of SHORT STORIES—the shortest Christmas story that was ever written for the finest Christmas number that ever was published. Wonderful powers of addition!

Listen, Christmas boys and Christmas girls. Stir the fire, until the sparks fly up the chimney as bright and as fast as loving looks from laughing eyes. Attention! Turn upon me, faces all, young and old, blooming and wrinkled. No coughing. No flirting. Nothing until the story is done, for done it quickly must be.

Here I am, well-known to be the second-best writer in England for spinning a story out, and the editor—between ourselves, a tasteless despot—tells me I shall have four pages, and no more. I seem to hear his scissors click and snip above my head in anticipation, like a hungry giant trying his jaws while his wife is getting his little bit of dinner ready.

If the story is jerky, abrupt, beginning too late and ending too soon, blame not the author, for he, with proper scope given to his unrivalled faculty, could produce a narrative such as every reader in the Empire would admit to be long enough. But to be measured by the inch, pruned, cropped, clipped, lopped, shaved, cut out and cut off and cut up, is fatal to that sort of Clarissa-Richardson-Pamela-Grandison genius, which critics tell me I possess. And now for the story.

An old friend of mine was for thirty years (and is still) practising in the town of Westerham. He never was a man of great ability, but, being careful and conscientious, he had gained the confidence of a large circle of patients. Let us call him Thompson, for his real name I must not tell you. Thompson had a son, who was studying the art of healing, and a daughter, who was studying the art of heart-breaking, and seemed likely to take honours.

Nelly Thompson's saucy face and twinkling eyes ensnared the eldest son of a wealthy merchant who lived in the neighbourhood. The father was a self-made man, and, though vulgar, had a force of character which made him respectable in society. The son, as is very common with the children of such parents, had all the father's vulgarity without his shrewd genius. He was a low, coarse, purse-proud fellow, and had not, I believe, sufficient culture to admire Nellie Thompson as she deserved.

But he heard her praised, and wanted to marry her, and thought, of course, that, with his personal and pecuniary attractions, he was sure of the girl. "No, thank you," pretty Nell said. It was all over the town in no time that pretty Nell had refused Charlie Stott, and Charlie was perfectly savage. He revenged himself in a way worthy of his character.

Old Dr. Thompson had for some time been in imperfect health. He worked on at his profession, but brokenly. His disease—disease it could hardly be called—was a species of cerebral weakness, which often simulates the graver form of brain mischief, but as often manifests itself only in a general decline of power. Of this affection a distinct symptom, in many cases, is intolerance of alcohol in any form. Sometimes a patient, in such a state, will be completely upset by a glass or two of wine.

This was Dr. Thompson's case, and, unfortunately, Stott, who had been a frequent visitor at his house, had ascertained it. Now it fell out that, shortly after Miss Nell's refusal, Dr. Thompson was summoned to attend the elder Stott, who, though irritated at what had passed, did not think proper on that account to desert a physician in whom he had great faith.

It was a blazing summer afternoon. One of Dr. Thompson's horses had an accident in the morning, and he walked out to Stott's house, about half-a-mile from the town. After his professional visit, young Stott met him in the hall as he was leaving, and finally asked the Doctor to take a glass of wine. Under ordinary circumstances, Thompson would have declined this offer, but thinking it a kind of conciliatory overture, he judged it wiser to say yes.

"Champagne will be agreeable to-day," said Stott, "and we have just had some in which is fine quality. It drinks rather fiery, perhaps, but a finer wine you never tasted, especially when it comes fresh from the ice, as it will to-day."

Digitized by Google

He went out himself to fetch the wine, and, after a long absence, returned with the bottle opened in his hand, and two glasses, muttering as he came in something about the servants being out for a holiday. The Doctor took a glass, and at the young man's urgent pressure another, and he was thinking of leaving when the scoundrel said:

"Dr. Thompson, I have not acted quite as I ought towards you lately; you know why. I am very sorry, and I wish all bygones to be forgotten."

So they shook hands very warmly, and then Stott said:

"One glass more to clinch it."

The Doctor objected.

"There isn't a headache in a dozen bottles!" cried Stott. "It is as mild as milk. Come, Doctor, you won't refuse to drink to renewed friendship."

So Thompson drained a third glass in quick succession to the other two. He had scarcely swallowed it when Stott cried out:

"Bless me, I have an appointment I quite forgot! So sorry to hurry you, Doctor, but I must meet a friend immediately."

And so fussing, and talking, and protesting, and apologising, he managed to get the Doctor outside of the house within ten minutes after his first glass had been tasted.

No sooner had he left the house, Thompson subsequently said, than he felt rather odd, and he mentally reproached himself for having taken so much wine. But three glasses of champagne did not seem very excessive after a fatiguing day, and, though he felt a little unsteady, he walked on confidently. From that time, however, until he wakened in his own bed, all was either very indistinct or lost in oblivion.

But what an interval there had been! It was market-day in the town, and the streets were full. Several people had stories to tell of Dr. Thompson. With one he had held a short, incoherent conversation. Against another he had jostled heavily, and, after a stupid stare, staggered on without apology. He went into a chemist's shop and gave some outrageous order for a patient. Finally, he fell down in the street, and lay motionless. The bystanders at first thought it a fit, but they were soon undeceived, and, amidst sneers from a few and openly-expressed grief and pain from others, Dr. Thompson was carried home dead-drunk.

The news ran like wildfire. Thompson was found drunk. Rumour gave free translations of the fact, with various additions. Thompson had nearly killed a patient through his liquor. He had fought a crossing-sweeper. He had sat up a whole night drinking. One sagacious person said he had always seen it in his eye. And apart from all exaggeration, the shock to the Doctor's friends and patients was very great. They pitied him, but even the kindest said his position was irreparably lost.

I have heard that within the Doctor's house the grief and shame were inexpressible. Neither wife nor children could reproach him. Years of kindliness and rectitude had impressed them too deeply with the goodness of his character to permit an instant's blame to overshadow the loyalty of their affection. They looked upon the affair as a terrible disaster, but never thought that he had done wrong. For three long weeks Thompson's was a sorrowful home. It is not always the saddest house that has the blinds drawn down.

To make the matter worse, Charlie Stott declared that it was utterly impossible that the quantity of wine Thompson had drunk in his father's house could have upset any man. And, indeed, it did not seem likely to produce such total intoxication in the most delicate subject.

"No, thank you," pretty Nell said.

So the inference was that Thompson had been drinking elsewhere, and the matter grew darker from examination. One lady of influence in the town, a well-meaning person of the revival school of piety, with that rather callous temper on social matters which I have more than once observed in persons of that type, wrote a solemn letter to the Doctor, remarking that although, socially, the sin he had committed might never be forgotten on earth, yet there was One, and so on. This letter, I have been assured, was, to the poor Doctor, the bitterest of the many mortifications he had to endure.

About three weeks after the event the hopeful Charlie Stott was billiard-playing, and, luck failing him, he drank rather freely to solace his misfortunes or to whet his play.

Growing talkative with his liquor, he said he could tell a capital story, and, without being pressed, went on to say that he had overthrown Dr. Thompson by putting brandy in his champagne.

"I took care," Stott said, "to pour it out at the other end of the room. Being iced, the old fool drank it,

Digitized by Google

suspecting nothing until it toppled him over in the High Street."

So far he had proceeded when one of his companions suddenly turned upon him, and said:

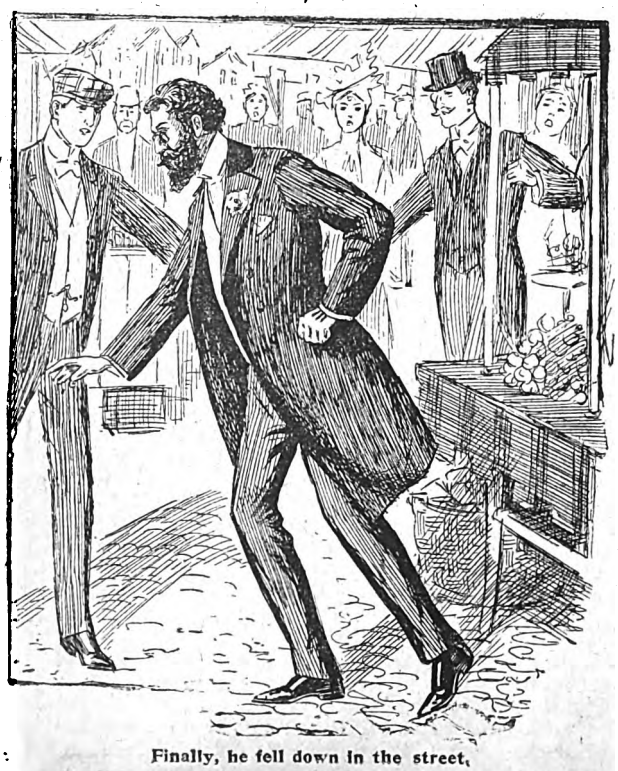
"Stott, I have known you for five years, and I never thought you a gentleman; but, after what you have told us, if ever I speak to you again in the way of friendship——" And he clinched his sentence by a wish framed in language more suited to the scene and the company than the spirit of his speech. So speaking, he walked out of the room.

Stott had sense enough left to grow frightened, and now began to deny what he had before of his own free will confessed; but he might have spared himself the trouble, for the rest of his companions were partial strangers, and but slightly interested in the story.

The other, however, went straight to Dr. Thompson's house, and, asking for his son, told him what he had heard. The two young men consulted upon the matter, and though the resolution they came to was characteristic of youth, the issue showed it was not practically unwise.

Charlie Stott was in the habit of visiting his father's mills every day. These were situated about two miles and a half from the town, and his homeward path lay through some unfrequented fields. As he was returning home, the evening after his game of billiards, he encountered his offended friend, and with him Dr. Thompson's son. Stott looked uncomfortable; but, with a surly nod, he was passing on when Thompson brought him to a stand with a shout of "Stop!" which sent whatever of heart he had into his mouth.

"So, you hound, it was you made my father drunk!" said Thompson fiercely.



Finally, he fell down in the street.

Stott lost his presence of mind.

"You have been letting out my secret, have you?" he said, turning angrily upon his late companion. "You are a man of honour, are you?"

"I hope so," said the other. "At any rate, you have an account to settle with Thompson, which I recommend you to attend to before you deal with me."

Stott looked from face to face, and now, for the first time, noticed two significant oak sticks in the hands of the young men. He prognosticated danger, and grew very pale indeed. But the common resource of the vulgar did not fail him. He at once resolved to lie himself out of the fix.

"Thompson," he said, holding out his hand, with an attempt at generous frankness, "I don't wonder at your being annoyed. If I had done as I was foolish enough to say last night, I don't know what I should not deserve. But, upon my soul and honour, I had too much wine myself then, and invented the whole story. The champagne your father drank at my house was pure champagne, and nothing beside, and that's the truth!"

"Look here," retorted Thompson, taking the stick out of his friend's hand and holding it up with his own. "You can choose whichever of these you like the better, and then defend yourself. With the other I will carve something on you that will last as long as the stain you have put on my father's name!"

Thompson's manner was so fierce in its very deliberateness that a stout heart might have quailed to hear him.

Stott was a coward, and, besides, a sense of guilt and shame helped to unnerve him. He declared he was unwell, would meet him another day, wanted a friend on his own side, at last fairly blubbered, when Thompson suddenly thrust one stick into his hand, and, by a smart cut of the other, announced that the struggle was about to begin.

A short struggle it was. Thompson, after a moment's pause, during which he had drawn back a pace or two, strode up to Stott, and, collaring him, began to lay stroke after stroke upon his quivering frame. Stott shrieked and swore, an art which he had practised largely and on various occasions, but never under circumstances so stimulating to the invention. He vainly tried to wrench himself out of his foe's grasp. As vainly he made a few spasmodic attempts to use his stick. Whack, howl, scuffle; scuffle, whack, howl. Such was the action that followed.

In two minutes Stott had received as sound a thrashing as ever a vulgar coward earned; and, to do him justice, he acknowledged the fact handsomely by his yells. Then Thompson threw him off with a few scornful words. Rage and pain, however, had imparted to Stott something that acted as courage for the moment, and he suddenly sprang forward and gave Thompson a blow with his stick across the temples that nearly knocked him down. Then, to show his prudence as clearly as his valour, he took to his heels, and tore across the fields like one who knew that vengeance was flying after.

Thompson was stunned for a moment, but, recovering himself, dashed after Stott like a fury. The race was not doubtful. Stott had reached the gate of the field, and was opening it, when a stroke cracked across his shoulders, and another, and another, to which all that had gone before were mere ladies' blows. Stott struggled desperately to open the gate, and defend himself at once, when a blow, which he managed to avoid with his body, came down upon the hand which was working the latch of the gate, hitting his thumb with such flattening force that he fainted with pain.

Digitized by Google

The two young men doctored him, bound up his thumb hastily, gave him a little brandy which the umpire had brought with him, and started him home, his small eyes glaring with the hatred and malice he dared not utter. Sorer bones never crossed a threshold than his when he entered his father's house, and the damage done to his thumb was so serious that Thompson's promise of leaving a lasting mark upon him was rigidly fulfilled.

As I have heard, the fellow told his father as many lies as he possibly could, and very artfully concealed the real facts of the case. The old man was infuriated. His son—his eldest son—the boy who would have his twenty thousand a year—beaten by an upstart medical student that hadn't two sixpences in his pocket! Stott senior was full of pride of purse and brutal contempt of poverty. He raved. He would see if there was law in the land. He would this, and he would that, his fine purple countenance displaying various apoplectic tints, as thus to various friends he declared his intentions.

But the affair soon got wind. Plenty of generous feeling was aroused on the other side. Old Dr. Thompson was really beloved, and people were only too delighted to see him honourably extricated from his disgrace. Callers came in showers. Young Thompson was the hero of the hour, and all the girls went wild about him, and one particular pair of eyes contrived to convey their silent appeal of his pluck so bewitchingly that Thompson resolved to take the ball at the hop. He married the bewitching eyes, and settled down as partner with his father.

And as for pretty Nell Thompson, who said "No, thank you," to Stott, she fell in with a young medical man of some private fortune and remarkable ability. The beginning was he loved her, and the end was she married him. No, that was not the end either. He—Dr. Mansfield—joined the Thompson partners, father and son. The firm enlarged its designation to Thompson, Thompson, and Mansfield, and a prosperous firm it has become.

For several miles round all the practice is gathered into this great medical net, and the two young men are rapidly making fortunes. No other doctor has a chance in the district, as one rash practitioner of the Dublin medical school—Titus O'Grady by name—found to his cost. After flourishing his brass door-plate before the public for twelve months, Titus packed up and departed.

"In the whole year," he said, with doleful humour, "I had one patient, and that was a girl with the measles, and even she had only one spot. How can a man demonstrate his abilities in such a place?"

So poor old Dr. Thompson's disaster, like the mishaps of a truly worthy man, turned into good fortune at last. He is supported on one side by an active and affectionate son, on the other by a loyal and talented son-in-law. He sees two blooming rows of grandchildren rising before him, and once in a twelvemonth or so a new face appears suddenly in the line in the oddest sort of way, Dr. Thompson, senior, need not complain; and as for Dr. Thompson, junior, he declares that his good luck began on the very evening that he thrashed that cowardly ruffian Stott.

Now, I discharge you all. Forfeits, mistletoe, Sir Roger, snapdragon, what you please, only never again say that I cannot tell a story in five minutes.

ALAN MUIR.

IT MAKES YOU SCREAM

WITH LAUGHTER.

What does?

Why, watching a man try to do the Twenty Teazer.

There's nothing calculated to titillate the risual palate more effectively than Twenty Teazer.

BUY IT, 6d.

TRY IT,

DO IT.

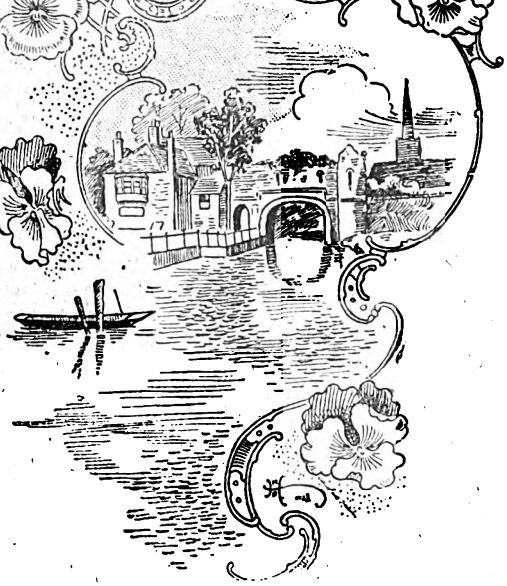
The first two things are easily accomplished. But the third—no, you cannot do it, can you? If you do succeed let us know how long it took you.

THE picture given below represents the name of something with which all my readers are acquainted. Stereoscopes will be awarded to the first five competitors whose letters, giving the correct solution, are first opened. All attempts must arrive by Thursday, December 27th, in envelopes addressed "Discoverer," Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

DONE BROWN.

A Tale of the old Smuggling Days.



NOBODY could make it out; at least, everybody said they could not make it out in Oatney—that little dull old south-coast town, abandoned to smugglers and fossillised folk, of ages dead to the rest of the world; and there were not many people in Oatney who would be at the trouble of expressing their views, even if they could make out how a successful run could be effected under the very noses of the Preventive men. In fact, looking at the very large proportion which loafers in Oatney bore to the general population—and loafers always know everything that is going on—the universal ignorance was perfectly astounding.

And so thought Lieutenant Pleydell, the officer in command of the Oatney Preventive Station, as he strode up and down the coffee-room of his temporary quarters at the Bull Inn, in none of the best of humours at the news that a 'run' had been effected in spite of the watchfulness and precautions of himself and his men.

"Heart-breaking work, this," he muttered, "to be stowed away in this dead-alive hole, whilst other fellows are winning kudos and medals and promotion by active service. I've a good mind to cut it altogether, and take to the Church or the Bar, or anything. And I suppose I must spend another Christmas Day here, without a soul to speak to."

It was quite upon the cards—not upon the Christmas cards, for in Anno Domini 1811 those delights of nurseries and abominations of letter-carriers had not been invented—that it was going to be what is called a seasonable Christmas; for the loafers who hung about all day over the parapet above the town green—in olden times the town port and harbour—and who were far more infallible in their weather prognostications than the modern Meteorological Office, cocked their heads knowingly at the clouds, and said that "Summat wur comin', it wur."

And so it turned out; for Christmas Day, by some juggling feat known only to itself, dawned somehow or other through the heavy masses of snow-clouds, and the worthy burghers of Oatney began to wish each other a "Merry Christmas" when they had no evidence that the day had even arrived except for a scarcely perceptible lightening of the atmosphere.

It was with anything but a desire to "salute the happy morn" that our Lieutenant stood at the coffee-room window, and gazed out upon as much of the street as he could see for the snow, which drifted about it apparently from each point of the compass, but which seemed to have no deterrent effect upon sundry red-cheeked, red-stockinged damsels on their way to morning service at the old church in Strand Street. He was thus engaged when there came a knock at the door, and the landlord entered.

"I beg your pardon, your honour," he said, "but it's Christmas Day, and me and the Missus, thinkin' you'll be lonely like a-sitting here all by yourself, wants to know if you'd do us the honour of dinin' with us this evenin' at five o'clock."

"Thank you, landlord," replied the officer; "I've some very important letters to write, so I think I'll dine alone to-night."

The landlord withdrew with a look half of surprise, half of contempt, for the man who would choose to dine alone upon Christmas night.

When the door had closed behind him the Lieutenant shook his head and said to himself:

"No, not this time. I'm a young un, but I'm too old a bird to be caught with gammon like that. Get me out of the way, make me half-seas over, and then——why, another run by Dungeness, and sell number two for me, No, I'll dine alone, and keep my eyes open all the time. Besides, the men dine at five o'clock, and they'd take it very strangely if I didn't give them a look in and tell them not to forget that there are such beings as Ned Ward and the Dymchurch gang, in the midst of their jollity."

So during the afternoon the Lieutenant plodded through the almost knee-deep snow to the look-out station situated at the mouth of the river some two miles southward of the town.

Digitized by Google

He duly admired the men's attempts at decoration, satisfied himself that there was plenty of good cheer in store, wished the men "A Merry Christmas," at the same time warning them not to forget entirely that there were such beings as smugglers in existence, left them a box of cigars, and turned back homewards.

It had become quite dark by the time he approached the inn, and the snow-clouds which had been sullenly hovering about all day delivered themselves of their pent-up wrath in a fierce blinding storm. So he hastened his steps.

He was somewhat startled to hear, during a momentary lull in the elementary warfare, a deep groan just as he arrived at the inn-door, and, looking in the direction whence the sound seemed to proceed, he could make out, in the dim light cast by the inn-lamp, a dark mass huddled against the opposite wall. Approaching, he saw that it was the figure of a young woman. He lifted her into his room at the inn, placed her by the roaring fire, and put some brandy to her lips, which seemed to revive her.

The Lieutenant saw that she was an exceedingly pretty girl, and revolved in his mind the possible causes which could have led her to her present position.

"Evidently no coast lass," he muttered, as he felt the soft, delicate hair, and marked the refined features of the girl. "There must be some mystery to bring a young and beautiful woman to such a position as this, on Christmas of all nights in the year. Do you feel better?"

"Yes, thank you," replied the girl, in a low, faint voice, "I shall soon be quite well. But tell me, where is he? where is he?" And her eyes flashed at these words, and her hands stretched out wildly as if to grasp something.

"Oh, never mind—wait a bit," said the young officer, "and when you've had something to eat and drink you shall go to bed and to-morrow you'll be as right as——"

"No, no," said the girl, with a shake of the head and a sad look in her large, black eyes, "I must go on to-night."

"Go on!" repeated the Lieutenant, "that's quite impossible. I wouldn't turn a dog out upon such a night as this. Besides, where and how are you going?"

"I must go on to T.," said the girl, mentioning a seaport town three miles from Oatney. "Please don't try to prevent me, as I have a duty, a solemn duty, to perform."

"Well, at any rate," said Pleydell, "you must eat and drink something before you go. It's Christmas night; I'm all alone here, and I shall be delighted if you will stay. So I'll make up the fire, and you sit close to it—you're still shivering—and in a very few minutes dinner will be ready."

He left the fair incognita gazing at the fire with a look of the deepest sorrow on her face.

"By George; she is a pretty girl, and no mistake," he said to himself as he went upstairs to change his reeking clothes and to make himself generally more presentable. "Depend upon it, there's some mystery connected with this, and I'll get it out of her before she goes."

The Bull had been famous for its dinners from time immemorial, and the landlord was quite equal to the task of consoling the Lieutenant for his inforced solitude by setting before him a most tempting little banquet.

Pleydell was pleased to see that the warmth of the room and the generous fare had the effect of completely reviving the strength of his guest, although she still re-

As to Moving About——.

"If I moved about much," said Lizzie Dickinson, "I could hardly get my breath."

Now if she had been a typewriter or a seamstress this would not have been so bad, as—save in acute asthma—the breathing goes on fairly well if one can only keep quiet.

But Miss Dickinson was in service, and how in Mercy's name was she to keep quiet and at the same time keep her place? No; it is upstairs, downstairs, and in my lady's chamber; early to rise and late to bed, and a perfect raffle of work between whiles. That's how it is.

So we see that she just had to "move about much," although she was really and truly not able to do it. The end was that she got so ill that three years ago—at this date—she was obliged to drop everything and leave her situation.

In her own little account of her trouble, written about the first of December, 1899, the young girl says she had a dry cough that shook her whole body, and a fearful sharp pain in her right side. Her cough was of the kind that frightens young people—and naturally; these coughs sound so like consumption, and there is plenty of that in dear old England.

"My appetite," she says, "was about gone. I stood in the greatest need of nourishment, yet when I looked at my meals, or even thought of them, I turned away with a strange feeling of dislike and disgust.

"Going on this way, and trying to do my work, I got so miserable and weak I didn't know what was to become of me. Sometimes I felt so wretched and nervous that I lay down on the sofa and cried like a heart-broken child.

"The doctors tried to help me, and of course I wanted them to succeed. One attended me for over four months, and I saw several others afterwards; but I kept getting worse in spite of all they could do.

"Finally, I commenced to fancy I was doomed to die, seeing that no good came of the medicines I had used—and there were so many of them. Who it was that wanted me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup is of no consequence to you, even if I could remember. Somebody did, however, and, as I could think of nothing else to do, I did try it. The first few doses made me feel better. I could eat a trifle, and no pain after it. Then my meals began to taste good, and I got strength out of them. It wasn't long before the pain went away, and my breathing was much more natural and easy, and I could move about and turn my hand to a bit of work.

"In this manner it was that I went on improving, and when I had taken four small bottles of Mother Seigel's Syrup I was quite myself again, and went back to service."

A common friend who saw Miss Dickinson recently, at Ashley, near Tetbury, Glos., reports that she is in fine health, and has plenty of colour. Long may she remain well and happy.

Digitized by Google

mained silent and sad; and he took advantage of her recovery to press again his questions about her intentions.

"I am sure you will pardon me for my curiosity," he said, "but as I am your temporary protector I feel that I have some right to know whither you are going, and how you propose to make the journey. I dare not ask you to tell me your story although I am convinced that you have a story, and a sad one."

She raised her beautiful eyes to him as he said this.

"Yes, I have a story, and a sad one, but I can only tell it to the nearest Preventive officer, and he, I believe, is at T."

Pleydell started.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "you need not go so far as T. for a preventive officer, as I have the melancholy honour to be one."

"You are!" the girl exclaimed. "Then listen, I have come upon an errand of revenge. Do you know the name of Ned Ward?"

"Ned Ward?" repeated the young officer. "I should think I did. The smuggler you mean?"

"Yes, the same," continued the girl. "Well, I loved him dearly; he gave me his troth solemnly, and I gave him my heart. We were to have been married on New Year's Day; but I found out yesterday that he is already married to another girl, the daughter of a French officer on parole, and that she is at sea with him. And I have come from Dover on foot, all through the snow and storm, on purpose to take my revenge. He is going to run a cargo ashore at ten o'clock to-night."

"To-night! Where?" exclaimed the Lieutenant.

"At Redman's Lane, you know, close by the Ship Inn. He will have this girl with him, and as I know they will be many, and well-armed, to do good you must take every man you can. Then, then I shall be revenged."

Her eyes flashed so as she said this, and she looked so beautifully fierce in her just wrath, that the young officer stooped and kissed her hand.

"You will remain here, will you not?" he said. "I must lose no time, for it is now getting on for eight o'clock."

"I will remain," said the girl, "trust me."

In a very few minutes he was ready, cloaked and armed, and in less than an hour he arrived at the station.

The men were lustily roaring the chorus of "God save the King," as he entered; but at his appearance voices were hushed, and each man stood at "attention."

"I'm very sorry to stop your fun, lads," said Pleydell; "but I've just received news that Ned Ward intends to have a try at Redman's Lane. We shall have our work cut out for us; but we can polish him off, stop his little game and finish ours afterwards."

At this the men burst out with a hearty cheer, they were just in the humour for fun of this sort, and would willingly have gone out to meet with an enemy a dozen times their strength.

In a very short time the whole detachment—some twenty men all told—were ready armed and equipped; forty rounds of ammunition were served out to each man; a parting bumper, to fight against the exposure upon such a night during a five mile tramp, was drained, and they set forth, leaving a couple of men on guard at the station.

They kept along the marsh road by the sea, eyes and ears open all the while for the smallest sign which might betray the proximity or existence of the quarry. The snow drifted in their faces, the wind blew almost a hurricane, and the word of command could scarcely be heard for the roaring of the sea and the shrieking and whistling of the gale. There were lights in the Ship Inn at Redman's Lane, the sounds of singing and laughter were heard as the little body of blue-jackets approached; otherwise there was no sign of life at this wild, out-of-the-way, sequestered spot, known to few but smugglers and fishermen, and doubly wild and remote on this inclement Christmas night.

It was almost ten o'clock by the time the Lieutenant had disposed his men in the most advantageous manner. Still there was not a sign; not a blue light from the sea, not a lantern hoisted from the window of the inn—both well-known signals in the freemasonry of smuggling.

Eleven o'clock; it was weary, bitter work waiting about inactively, searched to the very bones by the wind; midnight, the lights at the inn disappeared, and the sounds of revelry ceased.

There were audible murmurs of discontent and disappointment amongst the men, and Jem Beate, approaching Pleydell with a salute, said:

"I'm afraid, sir, it's no go. They've either done the business, or else the weather's too bad."

"I'm afraid so too, Jem," said the Lieutenant. "My information came from a most trustworthy source; at least, I—I have every reason to believe it to be so."

"Excuse me, sir," said the honest tar, "if I axe you who it was as told you."

"Well, I don't know that I can," said Pleydell. "I might get my informant into trouble."

"No, sir, but was it a man or a woman?" asked the sailor.

"Well, it was a woman," replied the officer.

"Well then, sir, depend on't we've been done brown."

The possibility of this had never occurred to Pleydell, so interested had he been in his patient at the inn, and yet it was humbling to think that such was the case.

It was evident, however, that nothing would be done at Redman's Lane this night; so the word was given to re-form, and the men, wet and shivering, obeyed with alacrity.

When they arrived at the station, Pleydell was surprised to hear no challenge, and ran ahead of the detachment. His surprise was increased tenfold when he beheld the two men he had left on guard gagged and trussed up like fowls in a corner, and on the table a piece of paper on which was scrawled:

> Dere Sir,—We 'ope you have ingoyed yore little walk. We have very much, igspeshally as we have done you regular brown.

Pleydell was beside himself with rage. The two men when released, could only say that at ten o'clock the door was burst open, and before they could spring to their arms they were gagged and bound so that they could neither speak nor move. That by the time occupied by the smugglers the "run" must have been a big one. Pleydell returned to the inn with all speed, and found, as he had feared, that his interesting guest had gone. So angry and mortified was he that he threw up his commission, and tried to forget his humiliation in the study of medicine. Years afterwards he bought a practice in Dover, and had for a patient upon one occasion an elderly woman, who, when he had entered her cottage, saluted him by his old title of Lieutenant. Naturally astonished how a poor woman in her position could have found out about his past career, he asked her.

"Lor' bless you, sir," she said, with a twinkle of her black eyes, "you surely can't have forgotten the Bull Inn at Oatney, where you was so regular done brown."

Frank Abell.

Digitized by Google

A Treat for the Children.

When children meet at birthday and other parties, the hostess is naturally anxious to provide the most suitable and acceptable fare. Children do not require heavy meat-food, yet they need variety, and the mother would do well to secure—among other appetising things—a supply of Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies. These excellent Jellies are refreshing and cooling and also nourishing. Chivers' Gold Medal Jellies are flavoured with ripe fruit juices, expressed by the firm themselves from the fresh fruit. Their sale and popularity are ever increasing. It is merit that does it all, the merit that takes pains to do the best. Children like Chivers' Jellies—there is no doubt about that. Put it to the vote where they have been used and the "Ayes" have it unanimously. The Medical Press, after careful analysis, says: "Chivers' Jellies are to be commended for the delicacy of their flavour and for their absolute purity." The Woman's Signal gives this testimony: Chivers' Jellies can be confidently recommended, they are perfectly pure, absolutely clear and pleasant to look at on the table, and the flavour is simply perfect." A high-class Cookery Teacher writes: "Your Jellies are almost daily on our table, and they are, without doubt, the best in the market."

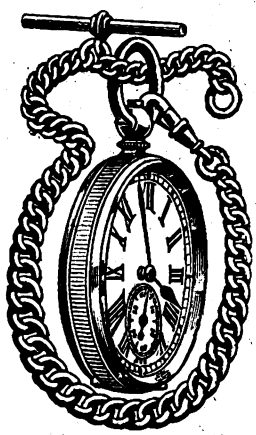
Chivers' Gold Medal Jams and Table Jellies are sold by Grocers throughout the United Kingdom. Insist on being supplied with Chivers'. A free sample packet of Jelly will be forwarded on receipt of post-card. S. Chivers and Sons, Histon, Cambridge.

SEND NO MONEY. WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.



£2 10s. £2 10s.
REAL SILVER.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

Just send us a STAMPED ADDRESSED ENVELOPE, and say that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

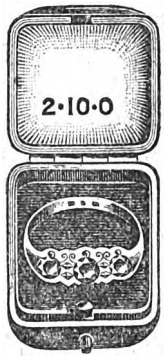
When sold, send us the 12s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you, Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND ND MONEY. WRITE TO-DAY.

FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO. (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business. GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS, 148 Old Street, London, E.C.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject.
THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

NOSE Wintry weather makes Red Noses. I cure them. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week

can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

AND NEURALGIA Cured

by a Simple, Safe, and Speedy Remedy. A Zox Powder can be taken anywhere, at any time, and with any liquid, with wonderful results. Two free Sample Powders to any reader of Short Stories sending stamped addressed envelope for same to

The ZOX Co., 11 Hatton Garden, London, E.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

VIE D'OR FOR THE HAIR.

THE AMERICAN TREATMENT.

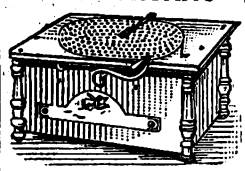
Vie d'Or puts 10 years on the life of the hair.

SOLE AGENT:

GUSTAV ROSSELLI, 4 New Park Street, Park Lane, LEEDS.

Price 2/9 post free.

HAND ORGANS FROM 20s.



Made in three sizes, in black and gold case. Full tone. Six metal tunes, plays all songs, hymns, or dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, balance 4s. monthly. Send for list of tunes, prices, &c. ATLAS CO., 182a High Street, Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Road, N.; and 14 High Road, Kilburn.

RUPTURE

Gentleman (cured himself) will send Free Particulars of inexpensive self-curative treatment. Stamped address.—(Box 49), 59 Castle Street, Carlisle.

Don't Cough-use

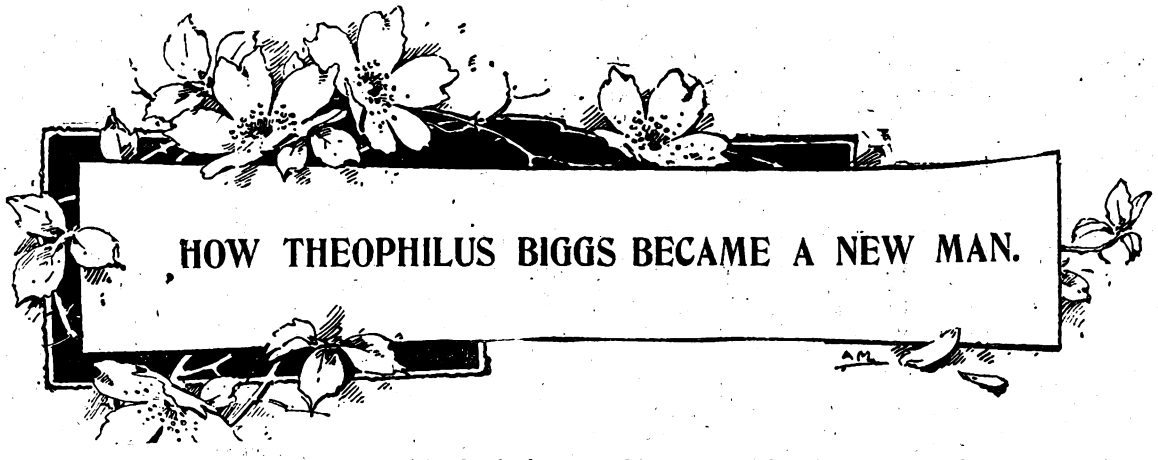
They at once check the Cough and remove the cause.

The Unrivalled

One Lozenge alone relieves. Sold everywhere, Tins 13½d. each.

Keating's Lozenges

Digitized by Google



HOW THEOPHILUS BIGGS BECAME A NEW MAN.

I THINK every man should have a friend of the Jenkins' order, because every man needs stimulating, keeping up to the mark, and Jenkins always keeps me in a state of perpetual bustle. One never knows what Jenkins is going to do next, and no one ever did know just what Jenkins was going to do next. Why, his own mother expected him to be born a girl. But that was just like Jenkins, and I feel sure that if his mother had formed the opinion that he would turn out to be a boy he would have been born a girl.

Jenkins' latest wheeze is to make a new man of me. It would have been no use to tell Jenkins that I did not want to become a new man—that I was perfectly satisfied with the kind of wreck I was. No, the best way is to let him do just what he likes with you, and if you survive the treatment to be thankful. So all I said to Jenkins was that so long as I could wear the same clothes and took the same size in boots after the process he could start the "new man" business as soon as he liked.

Jenkins beamed. He said that when he had finished with me I would thank him with tears in my eyes.

"The fact is, Biggs," he went on to say, "you are getting a trifle too plump. You want thinning down a bit."

I didn't protest; I never do with Jenkins.

"Now, if you let yourself go on like that," he continued, "you will only be sowing the seeds of future discomfort and rheumatism."

I like to hear Jenkins talk like this; it is like sitting on the seashore listening to the waves flopping on the beach.

"Now, what you want is exercise, plenty of it, Biggs, my boy, and you must take it early in the day. You have got a bicycle, and it is not necessary for you to be at your office before nine o'clock in the morning, so that you have everything that is necessary except one thing—to make a new man of you."

"And that one thing?" I asked.

"Will-power," said Jenkins.

I turned slowly round in my chair and faced Jenkins.

"Jenkins," I said, "if there is one thing I pride myself upon more than another it is the possession of strength of mind. Please, please Jenkins, do not attempt to rob me of the consolation that affords me by saying that I do not possess it."

"Well," said Jenkins, "I will put you to the proof. To-morrow morning at six o'clock I will call for you to go for a cycle ride with me."

I slightly amended Jenkins' proposition.

"Meet me at the Cross Roads' Inn at seven o'clock to-morrow morning," I said, and then we shook hands on it.

I had a very happy feeling that night as I went to bed. I was going to become a new man, and as I thought the new man might possible have a bigger appetite, I told my landlady to provide accordingly.

I must have been dreaming when Mrs. Gum called me, for I thought myself spinning along past charming scenery listening to the morning songs of the birds, drinking in the pure air of a delightful sunny morning.

Bang! Hello, there goes my back tyre, I thought, and I got off my machine to examine it. But it was only Mrs. Gum calling me, so I picked myself up from the floor and got back into bed.

"All right, Mrs. Gum," I shouted. "I'm nearly half-dressed and will be down in a minute."

Now this was hardly correct, but then I spoke as I felt. Before getting up I thought it would be best to decide upon the direction to take on this my first early morning ride. There was a choice of three routes. There was the road down past the farm. Grand ride that. All the charms of a peaceful English farm burst upon one as one rode past, the sweet-smelling hay in the fields, the happy looks of the contented—contented——

"It is eight o'clock, sir, and Mr. Jenkins is waiting for you downstairs."

I awoke with a start and went to the door.

"Not a word to Mr. Jenkins," I said to Mrs. Gum. "Go to him in ten minutes and say that you knocked at my door. Don't tell him anything more."

Before that ten minutes was up I had dressed, slipped out the back way, got my bicycle, and then cycled round through a bye-street as hard as I could to the top of the street in which I lived. I then scorched down the street to my dwelling. I perspired quite freely as I opened the front door.

"Has Mr. Jenkins been here?" I shouted to Mrs. Gum whom I met in the hall, at the same time giving her a most expressive wink.

"He is in the dining-room, sir," said my landlady.

As I entered the room where Jenkins was I was saying:

"Well, of all the lazy, weak-minded toads I ever met you are about the laziest, Jenkins."

"I own I was a bit late," said Jenkins rather sheepishly, "but then you might have waited, as I was only ten minutes behind time."

"I never encourage laziness, Jenkins," I said, and then I left him as I wanted to change my clothes.

Jenkins walked with me to the station, but I absolutely

Digitized by Google

FOR A XMAS PRESENT

There is nothing so appropriate, pleasing, or satisfactory as a

PARKER FOUNTAIN PEN

OR OUR

Gravity Stylo

AT

3/6

PEACE AND THE PARKER
JOINTLESS
FOUNTAIN PENS

Go hand in hand. If you want pen-peace, the smooth, swift, simple Parker will give it. It has neither screw joint or nozzle, but a perfectly smooth barrel from tip to tip, making it

Jointless.

The secret of its simplicity and perfection is the famous "Lucky Curve," Combined with our new Spring Lock Device. Also fitted with our Anti-Break Cap. Ask your dealer to let you try a Parker. Now and then a dealer tries to sell an old-style pen instead; in such a case write us. If you want to investigate send for our valuable Guarantee and interesting Booklet, Free.

Or if you need a pen at once our No. 020, Price 10/6, offers extraordinary value; and our Gravity Stylo at 3/6 is the best in the World. Sent by post on receipt of price if your dealer will not supply you.

THE PARKER PEN CO.,
Largest Manufacturers of Fountain Pens in the World, 193 & 195, Oxford Street, London, W.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

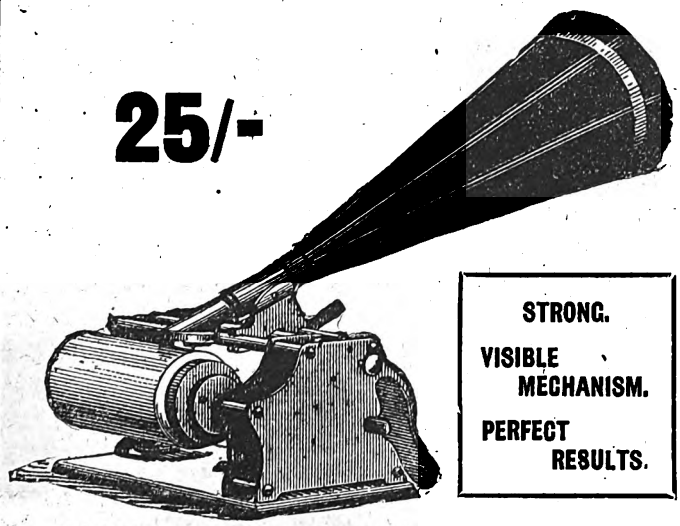
Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A GRAPHOPHONE FOR 25/-

25/-



GRAND PRIX, PARIS EXPOSITION.

Reproduces Same Records as all Small Cylinder Talking Machines.

Makes Music in the Home, and is an Inexhaustible Source of Amusement and Pleasure.

STRONG.
VISIBLE MECHANISM.
PERFECT RESULTS.

The pleasure in owning a Graphophone is largely increased by being able to make and reproduce your own records. The Graphophone will record your own voice as well as reproduce specially prepared records.

Graphophones are sold from 25s. upwards.

The Toy Graphophone for Children, 8s.

Send for Catalogue C. to

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Genl., 122 Oxford Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google

refused to talk of my cycle ride to him, saying that he should have been with me and that I was not going to encourage laziness. Jenkins offered me a cigar when I had got into the train, and I said to him:

"Jenkins, old man, I freely forgive you, but don't let it happen again."

Jenkins said he would not be able to join me in my ride the next morning, nor the following one, as he would be away from home.

"But keep it up, old man," he said to me. "I can see it is doing you good already."

I really did mean to follow Jenkins' advice, and bought an alarum clock that day in town. I set the clock for 7.15 that night and put it on a chair near my bed. At one o'clock I took the clock off the chair and put it under the bed.

I must have gone to sleep though eventually, for I suddenly jumped into the air and then as quickly dodged beneath the bed clothes to get out of the range of the gatling-guns; but it was only the clock telling me that 7.15 had arrived. I pulled my watch from beneath my pillow to see how long the clock would keep on ringing. It rang for three minutes, and then died slowly in jerks, ending with a slight hiccough. "Not a bad clock, that," I thought. "Only cost 3s. 6d., too."

I then began thinking how a clock like that could be made for the money. I was trying to find out where the profit came in.

It was late that morning when I got to the office, and I thought how disappointed Jenkins would be if he knew that I had missed my usual morning ride. If anyone had seen my face as I went to bed that night they would have noticed a certain look of determination which is always a sign of strength of mind, of great will-power.

I wound up the clock without a word. I didn't care if everyone whose incomes depended upon clocks got twopence or half-a-sovereign on every three-and-sixpenny alarum. I turned out the gas firmly, and then, whilst trekking for the bed, I kicked my toe against the bed-post. Those were the first words I had spoken since coming into the bedroom, and I hope Mrs. Gum didn't hear them.

I sank into a calm sleep.

Thunder and earthquakes, what's that? It was dark, and the clock was ringing for dear life. I struck a light. It was half-past two, and I had set the clock for 7.15. I took the clock up, gently but firmly, opened the window, and dropped it into the yard, where it lay ringing as if it had a contract on hand.

I got into bed again, and was just going to sleep when I heard a violent ringing at the front door bell. Thinking the house might be on fire I hurriedly donned my dressing-gown and went down to see what was the matter.

The policeman I saw told me that he had heard the "burglar-alarm" ringing and had come to see if anything were wrong. I am sorry I spoke harshly to that policeman, and I hope he will forget what I said. My conscience pricks me when I think how I told him it might be the "burglar-alarm" of the people next door, and that he had better wake them up.

Of course, after such a night it would have been folly to have got up so early, and Jenkins agreed with me when I had told him my adventures.

"You should never depend upon alarum clocks," said Jenkins. "Now I know many and very much better ways which will get you up at any hour you please. I have often tried them myself, and never knew any of them to fail."

That is the best of a man like Jenkins; one can depend upon him in any emergency. He can always tell you exactly what to do, how to do it, and, if necessary, what you will look like when it's done.

"Proceed Jenkins," I said. "Tell me all about these methods and I will try each in turn."

"Well, the first is this," said Jenkins. "Let us suppose that you wish to get up at five o'clock."

"Quite a natural desire upon my part," I said.

"Well," continued Jenkins, "to get up at five o'clock all you have to do is to bump your head five times upon the pillow just before you go to sleep. I have never known it to fail," Jenkins added.

"I will try it to-night," I told Jenkins.

I did. I bumped my head six times upon the pillow, and then, thinking to impress whatever unseen agent had the working of the little arrangement that seven o'clock was the time I wished to awake, I put some extra energy into the last bump and nearly caved in the back of my head with the iron railing at the top of the bed. This caused me to think about several of Jenkins' faults, and I mentioned them in the still and peaceful gloom of night.

I didn't awake at seven, and if I had done so I should have gone to sleep again for I felt quite cross with Jenkins. Now I am a peaceful kind of man generally, but when Jenkins offered to unfold some more methods I felt positively bloodthirsty, and spoke to that effect. I didn't want any more of his methods. I had thought of one myself and meant to try it.

I got an iron plate and fixed it to my bedroom door that very night. I showed it to Mrs. Gum and told her to bang upon that iron plate with the coal-hammer I had bought, and to keep on banging until I got up and opened the door. It was thus that I was able to go for the ride before breakfast that I had craved. It was not much of a ride. I got wet through and caught a severe cold, but what I wish chiefly to emphasise is that I did go for a ride before breakfast.

However, if anyone is desirous of buying a really good coal-hammer and an iron plate I am willing from sheer philanthropy to let them go cheaply. I hope someone will buy them and soon, for they rest in my study, and I really do not want to brain Jenkins when next he calls.

Henceforth, if I want to get up early and go for a cycle ride before breakfast, I will make up my mind upon the night before and simply say, "I will get up to-morrow morning at six o'clock," and then of course the rest will follow. W. St. G. Drennan.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM.

Nos. 247 to 252.

The prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Mr. J. R. Robinson, of 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate, E., whose attempt was the first correct one dealt with.

The following have each received a copy of "The Marquis of Valrose," by Charles Foley:

J. Solly, 21 Abbot's Park Road, Upton Park, E.
Miss E. Robinson, 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate, E.
Miss Mary Ryan, 21 Abbott's Road, East Ham, E.
F. Cheesman, Junction Road, Burgess Hill, Sussex.
F. J. Smith, Alpha House, Saxmundham.
T. Bennett, Doddington, Oxon.
E. Francis, 7 and 8 Regent Street, Teignmouth.
M. Dack, 93 Lee Road, Northampton.
H. Cammack, 32 Radcliffe Street, Liverpool.
Miss N. Daley, 49 Salisbury Street, Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

PEOPLE WHO NEVER GROW OLD.

It is curious, but it's true. Some people, both men and women, seem never to grow old. What is their secret? They retain their good spirits as well as their good looks. The explanation is simple enough, after all. These people have studied the art of keeping young, just as you would study any other art or science. Perhaps the most thorough and most scientific investigation into the matter that has ever been made is to be found in Professor Boyd Laynard's great work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." Most people have heard of this book, and certainly everyone who values his or her health and appearance should read it. It is now the standard book on the question with which it deals. Its publishers, Messrs. Hammond, Hammond & Co., 19, 21 and 23 Ludgate Hill, London, E.C., have produced a popular edition. The book, although published at two shillings, will, if ordered direct from the publishers, be forwarded, carriage paid, to all readers of Short Stories at the low discount price of One Shilling and Sixpence. Professor Laynard's Book is recommended because it is actually the only book of its kind. It is the Practical and Reliable Guide to Health and Beauty such as men and women in all parts of the civilised world have been waiting for since the pursuit of these blessings became the subject of serious scientific study. In the words of the Monitor: "A really practical work on this subject, free from objectionable and harmful features, has long been wanted. Professor Laynard's new book seem to supply the need. . . . It is crowded with useful information from the first page to the last." The Christian Globe pronounces it to be "the most remarkable work of the present century." The book stands alone. It is interesting without being frivolous. It is scientific without being dull. It is learned without being obscure. Briefly, it is what Professor Laynard means it to be—a practical guide to the Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life. Among the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Boyd Laynard's work, the following are but a few (a complete syllabus showing the contents of the whole 127 chapters enumerating upwards of 500 subjects, and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers):

Analysis of beauty—Beauty a possible attainment—The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Natural means by which a youthful appearance can be retained until late in life—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superficial hairs—Wrinkles, and how to treat them—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose may be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders, and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—How all kinds of ailments can be induced into the physical system by the action of the mind—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How violent passions injure health—The way anger effects the heart, brain, and liver—Organic diseases caused by fits of passion—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet, and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—Some perilous articles of food Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—What walking does for the body—Diseases cured by walking—Cycling as an exercise—Physical effects of cycling—Rowing as an exercise—The gymnasium—Dumb-bells—Baths and bathing; their influence upon health—Bathing physiologically considered—Proper temperature for baths—Sea-water bathing—Code of rules for the guidance of bathers—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—The voice: its culture and preservation Curious facts about the voice—How it can be rendered stronger—Rules for the preservation of the voice—Loss of voice, and its connection with hysteria—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—A common cause of deafness, and the remedy—Foolish practices that occasion deafness—Influence of health upon hearing—Frequent cause of the defective hearing of children—Sleep and its relation to health—Conditions for healthy sleep—Number of hours necessary for individuals of various constitutions—Children's sleep from infancy upwards—The various enemies of sleep—How to guard against sleeplessness—A mental remedy for insomnia—Facts concerning the duration of dreams—Theory concerning the subject of dreams—Remarkable psychological facts relating to dreamers—Drowsiness physiol gically considered—Remedy for inordinate drowsiness—Memory, and how to improve it—Influence of health upon memory—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Influence of diet upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Colds: their nature, prevention and treatment—Indigestion—Constipation—Neuralgia—Rheumatism—Nervousness—Articles of diet that are much responsible for nervousness—Headaches—That rebellious organ, the liver—How it is a common seat of disease—Nervous disorders for which it is responsible—To what cause nearly all the irregularities of the liver are due—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—The mental, moral, physical, and external influences that are conducive to long life—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—Attainment of long life under physical disabilities—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life, &c., &c.

ORDER FORM 916,261.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & CO.,
19, 21 & 23 LUDGATE HILL, LONDON, E.C.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of One Shilling and Sixpence.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL PICTURE PUZZLES.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

2nd Prize - - - £10 Note
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes
6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a well-known football player.

If you cannot find all the names, ask your friends to help you.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Maxwell. What are the other names?

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the player you believe the picture to represent. Then keep the list by you until ONE more list has appeared. The names are those of both Rugby and Association players.

Only one solution is allowed under each picture.

Where two men bear the same surname, but different christian names, the christian name or initial is indicated in the picture.

The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

Example.

Maxwell.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

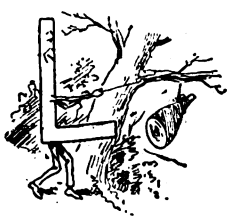
3rd LIST.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 21.....

No. 22.....

No. 23.....



No. 24.....

No. 25.....

No. 26.....

No. 27.....

No. 28.....

No. 29.....

No. 30.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

XMAS PRESENT.

Everyone can afford to give his Father or Mother, his Sister or Brother, his Cousin or Friend, the most magnificent present that could possibly be obtained in the whole world. Last year it would have cost him £15, £18, or £20—perhaps even more than that To-day, to readers of Short Stories

IT ONLY COSTS 5/-

Thousands who now possess these magnificent Bicycles proclaim them to be worth double the money we charge. £8 17s. 6d. for a perfect Bicycle is 5¾d. a day when spread over twelve months, or one tenth the cost of hiring an inferior worn out old cycle of an 1896 pattern.

NO INSTALMENT ON DELIVERY.

A Beautiful Cycle secured for 5s.

It is gravely questioned whether there will be a penny net profit, unless 100,000 Express Cycles are sold during the season. It is an established fact that three months ago, Cycles not nearly so good were being sold at £18 and £20. We charge you considerably less than half this sum.

5¾d.

A DAY

FOR A

CYCLE.

SCIENTIFIC REPORT

Of Mr. HENRY J. T. PIERCY, M.I.M.E.,

One of the ablest and most practical mechanical and consulting engineers of the day.

53 and 54 BROAD STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

I have visited your works, and have looked through the processes by which you produce the various cycle parts. I found the machinery of good construction, and the operators manipulating it with judgment and care. I have also examined the various parts of cycles, some in the rough and some finished. The material used in these parts is certainly the best, and the workmanship carefully and judiciously executed, and well calculated to cause the cycles to run easily and to wear well. I found necessary precision had been observed throughout, and wearing parts satisfactorily hardened. I have also examined a finished cycle. The design is modern, and built on good lines, and the appearance of the machine generally is pleasing. The adjustments are well-arranged and easy of manipulation. The frame is not only light, but rigid, and capable of resisting great strain, and the general character of the machine is such as to give confidence to the rider.

(Signed) HENRY J. T. PIERCY, M.I.M.E.

On View at 21 & 22 Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C.

PARTS OF THE MACHINE.

FRAME.—Steel Tubing (Best), Hudson Bros. Ltd. WHEELS.—Westwood Rims, J. T. James. CHAIN.—Perry & Co Ltd., Birmingham. SADDLE.—Lycett Ltd., Highest Grade. Pedals.—Optimus Pedal Co., Birmingham. GEAR CASES. (Ladies') Harthill Gear Case Co. SPOKES.—Patent Turned Spoke Co., Alcester. TYRES.—"Express." (cost £3).

Secure your Cycle by Sending To-day.

CYCLES SENT ON APPROVAL.
ENTIRE MACHINE GUARANTEED.

5/-

NO INSTALMENT ON DELIVERY.
NEXT PAYMENT MONTH AFTERWARDS.

Address the Manager "Express" Cycles, S.S. Dept., Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

DON'T HAVE CORNS

BUNIONS or ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of

THOMPSON'S CELEBRATED CORN PLASTER

will cure you. It is thin as silk, and removes the pain at once. Post free, 14 stamps, from the Proprietor. Beware of imitations.

LADIES should take DR. SIMPSON'S ARSENICAL PEARLS. They secure a beautiful clear complexion, free from Blotch, Pimples and Roughness. Post free, 2/9 and 4/6 only, from M. F. THOMPSON'S Homœopathic Chemist, 17 Gordon Street, Glasgow.

Ask for Thompson's Pamphlet, "The Woman Beautiful."

THREE CHEERS FOR THE RED WHITE & BLUE

COFFEE.

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST & AFTER DINNER.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary Coffee.

SOLD THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

HOW DO YOU SPELL VELVETEEN?

FIVE LETTERS ONLY.

Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

Height 12ins. Width 7ins. Depth 3ins.

Rye Clock

(WITH ALARUM) 18/-

FREE TRIAL, 2/6.

Any reader of Short Stories can have one of these clocks on monthly payments as follows:—

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approbation.

IF you approve of it you send us 3/- on receipt, and 2/6 each month for five months, making the full 18/-.

BUT OUR NET CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 16/- ONLY.

If you do not approve of the clock we will refund cash sent if clock is returned within seven days.

(Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

FREE TRIAL

CLOCK or PARCEL

FOR 2/6

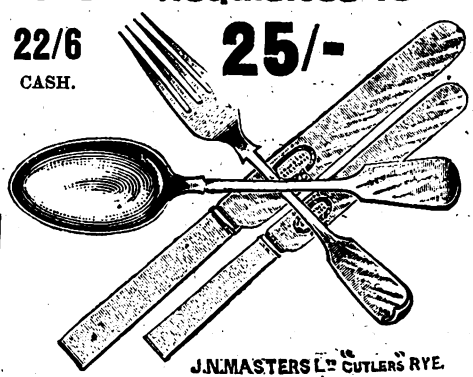
NO MAN ON EARTH

NEED BE without one of our NICKEL SILVER PUZZLE BOXES. You can use it for a Match-box, a Stamp-box, a Pen-box, or one hundred different uses, and it will amuse and excite you and your friends trying to open it. We shall present one ENTIRELY FREE to every customer during this month and January. For further particulars send for our special Booklet of all the latest goods suitable for presents. Brooches from 1/-, Real Gold Gem Rings from 4/-, and hundreds of other goods at similar low Prices. Shall we send you a copy post FREE? Send us your name and address.

50 Full-Size Table Requisites for 22/6 CASH. 25/-



J.N.MASTERS Ltd "CUTLERS" RYE.

WE will supply any reader of Short Stories with one of these 25/- parcels of Cutlery on monthly payments as follows:

YOU send us 2/6 with your name and address, and we will send you one on approval.

IF you approve of it, you send us 2/6 on receipt of parcel, and 5/- each month for four months, making the full 25/-. But

OUR NET-CASH-WITH-ORDER PRICE IS 22/6 ONLY.

And we will refund the Cash sent, if you do not approve of the parcel and you return it at once.

(Signed) J. N. MASTERS.

Each Parcel contains 50 Articles.

6 Table Knives.
6 Dessert Knives.
6 Table Forks.
6 Dessert Forks.
2 Table Spoons.
6 Dessert Spoons.
6 Tea Spoons.
1 Pair Sugar Tongs.
1 Sugar Sifter.
6 Egg Spoons.
2 Salt Spoons.
2 Mustard Spoons.

J. N. MASTERS LIMITED. "VERACITY" WATCHMAKERS, RYE, SUSSEX.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL STORY. BEGIN TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE FOR HOME AND TRAIN

No. 626. FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 29TH, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

How to Cure Indigestion.

(Quoted from "Our Home.")

"Indigestion or Dyspepsia, though it may not completely incapacitate a person, yet renders life a misery to a great extent. There are so many forms of Indigestion, too, and it leads to so many other diseases that it should always, if possible, be stopped in its earliest stages. With the change of season more people than usual suffer from derangement of the System, and it is therefore at this time that it becomes specially helpful to recommend a simple, yet thoroughly reliable remedy. Guy's Tonic has stood the test of many years' use, and becomes more popular from day to day. Its effect is quite wonderful; people who suffer from dreadful Discomfort after they have had a meal, find a course of Guy's Tonic gives them relief, and makes eating once more a pleasure, instead of an experience to be dreaded. Flatulence and Nausea are removed, and the food is not only enjoyed, but benefits the system.

"Debility causes Indigestion, and in such cases a tonic is of the greatest benefit, and the weakness that follows Influenza can be treated by no better remedy than Guy's Tonic. It is of simple Vegetable origin, is widely recommended by Medical Men, and is in use in many Hospitals. It can be bought in bottles at 1s. 1½d. at chemists and stores, but should there be any difficulty in getting it, it can be had direct from Guy's Tonic Company, 12 Buckingham Palace Road, S.W., who also will send free to anyone who writes for it, a little booklet, giving particulars of the many complaints for which Guy's Tonic proves an invaluable remedy."

Nausea and Flatulence Removed.

Mr. W. Campbell Muir, of Inistrynich, Dalmally, N.B., writes:

"For the last four months I have been suffering from "Nausea, Flatulence, and Depression. Occasionally three "days would pass without my having eaten solid Food. "I tried various remedies which did good for a day or "two, but the effects were not permanent. I thought at "last I would try Guy's Tonic, and with great pleasure I "have to inform you that I had only taken half a bottle "before my Appetite returned, the Flatulence dis-"appeared, and I am now as well as ever."

Guy's Tonic is the most pleasant, the most efficacious, and the most largely sold Tonic-Digestive-Medicine in the World.

A new size (Six Ounce) Bottle of Guy's Tonic, price 1s. 1½d., is now on Sale at all Chemists and Stores.

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' Discovery.

"TATCHO."

20,000 LARGE (4s. 6d. SIZE) BOTTLES TO BE DISTRIBUTED.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease. A sprinkle of a few drops on the scalp and five minutes with the brush daily works marvels with every head of hair.

"TATCHO" acts as an invigorating tonic. It stops the hair falling, creates a luxuriant growth, and imparts to it a bright and youthful lustre.

"When I discovered the preparation, I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders," said Mr. George R. Sims to the representative of the Daily Mail. "Look at my hair now. Look at the colour. In time people got to know. Then the trouble began.

"Letters in thousands poured in to me from men and women in every quarter of the world, from all parts of the Kingdom, from America, India, Africa, China, and Australia. The work of answering the letters was enormous, and as far as possible the desired information was supplied; but it became quite evident that at the rate at which the demand was increasing I should very soon need a large staff of clerks to attend solely to the hair renewer department of correspondence.

"In consequence, I said to myself, Why should this thing go on? If the public wants my hair renewer, the public shall have it; but the demand must be met in the ordinary business-like way. So I resolved to place the genuine article within reach of all, and with the assistance of a number of gentlemen, possessing the necessary commercial facilities, that has been accomplished."

The Geo. R. Sims' Co. have decided to Distribute 20,000

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES OF TATCHO

to enable those who have not yet profited by Mr. G. R. Sims' discovery, to have the opportunity of doing so. The Company does this in the belief that such distribution will enable the preparation to become more widely known, and will introduce it to every home in a far more satisfactory manner than through unlimited puffing by advertisement.

COUPON.
S.S.
Dec. 29, 1900

If you are desirous of participating in this distribution, cut out this Coupon and send it to the Geo. R. Sims' Co., 81c Great Queen Street, London, W.C., accompanied by a postal order for 1/0. You will receive by return of post a plain package containing

A FULL SIZE 4s. 6d. TRIAL BOTTLE OF "TATCHO" POST PAID,

which will enable you to give TATCHO a fair trial and to satisfy yourself as to its merits.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE

The Best & Safest Remedy for

HEADACHE.

NURSE HILL, of the London Association of Nurses, writes:

"I have seen Kaputine administered to many patients, and can truly say it is a remedy which should have a place in every household."

All Leading Chemists sell KAPUTINE, 1/-. Samples One Penny.

If your Chemist has not KAPUTINE send his name and address to KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD, and we will send you a SHILLING PACKET FREE.

WORTH A CROWN A DOSE.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

TO THE QUEEN
PURVEYORS

CROSSE & BLACKWELL'S

GREEN PEA. GRAVY. JULIENNE. MULLIGATAWNY. TOMATO. HOUSEHOLD. CRESSY. &c.

SOUP TABLETS

OF ALL GROCERS ETC. THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins. ½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

NOSE

Wintry weather makes Red Noses I cure them. Send 1/- for my book on "Their Cause and Prevention," or 3/9 for Medically approved Cure. Particulars of my Patent Nose Improver and Ear Machine sent for stamp.—C. LEES RAY, Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool.

A SUM of from 12s. to 25s. per week can be earned in spare hours or evenings by either sex everywhere.—Send addressed envelope for particulars to Box 24, Eclipse Works, 89 Aldersgate Street, E.C.

NEW AUTOMATIC KNITTER

FOR HOME WORK.

"The machine that knitted the hosiery and comforts for the troops in Africa."—See what The Times said.

Knits Socks (a pair in 35 min.), Stockings, Fancy Goods, &c. Easily learned. Lessons Free.

15/- to 30/- Weekly

Cash, hire, and Work Terms from "Sorres" dept.: 67 Southwark St., S.E.; 55 Oxford St., W.; 192 Upper St., London, N.; 105 Nicolson St., Edinburgh; 58 Union St., Glasgow; 132 Stephen's Green, Dublin; 62 Great Hampton St., Birmingham; 31 Stokes Croft, Bristol.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2% on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances when not drawn below £100.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 626.] For the Week Ending December 29th, 1900. [ONE PENNY.

AT THE BOTTOM OF A WELL.

"I WISH you to dig here," said Miss Morson. "I may have reasons, sentimental ones; but they would not interest you."

"And if we should meet insuperable difficulties?"

"I will bear the loss."

"Very well," said the expert; "I don't like the soil, and it is a pity to mar the beauty of this lovely spot; but I won't persist in what you are pleased to term frivolous objections."

"I hope your workmen are temperate, married men."

"One is single, but his age is not less than forty-five, and he looks older. The other is a benedict of thirty. Both are intemperate occasionally, and they also swear; but potential angels are few in the trade, and I never seek them."

Miss Morson considered the answer for a few moments, and as the men were not likely to flutter the hearts of her domestics, she professed to be satisfied.

Two days later the well-sinkers arrived. The bachelor was tall, and bowed. His sun-browned face was thin, and his dull eyes and heavy lips almost hid the mark of the gentleman.

He stood for some moments near a cluster of alders that half-hid a rustic chair, and stared at the grey house visible through a frame of trees; then he smiled, slapped his leg, and uttered an oath that thrilled the rough, common-looking benedict.

"Anything wrong, Jim?" queried that worthy.

"Do you believe in fate?" asked Jim, still looking at the house.

"No."

"Then you're a fool. When the boss said Elm House, Scratby, I never thought of this house; thirty years of starving and loafing makes a man dull."

"Did you know this place thirty years ago?"

"Know it; why I helped to plant that tree by the gate, and I made that rustic chair, or one like it. I wonder who lives here now."

"They tell me no beer is allowed at the house, so I worn't interested in the name."

"Well, people change their residences, and sometimes they die in thirty years. Let's get to work, Roger."

Jim was very silent as he worked and it seemed to his companion that he was thinking of other matters; but good progress was made, and at noontide when Miss Morson reached the alders, some hundreds of bricks were piled and Roger was wheeling away the earth thrown up by Jim.

Miss Morson walked close to the excavation and Roger warned her away.

"Surface soil ain't first-class," he said, "an' we can't lower the ring yet; so keep ten yards away, please."

"Who is foreman here?"

Jim raised himself and lifted his slouch cap, and Miss Morson stared at him as she would have stared at an apparition.

Roger grasped the shafts of his barrow and moved away.

"I am not surprised," said Miss Morson, recovering her composure without apparent difficulty.

Jim bowed again.

"I suppose you had good reason for changing your name," she continued.

"Family reasons," he said in very low tones, "no others, believe me. Do you wish me to go?"

"Certainly not. Resume your work Mr.—er—Phillips. You came here knowing that I still occupy Elm House."

"I was nearly drunk when I received instructions, and the name escaped me."

Miss Morson raised her head and looked down on her nose; then she gathered up her skirts and walked away with an unusually majestic stride. Jim again bent over his spade, and when Roger returned there was more than enough earth to fill his barrow.

At sunset the well-sinkers retired to the Green Gate tavern, and after tea Roger joined the company in the bar. But Jim walked abroad. There were no clouds in sight and the full moon made Scratby look very beautiful. So he moved along a narrow path leading to Elm House and listened to the nightingales. At length he halted beside the gate leading to the grounds, and resting his elbows on the top rail looked ahead, not to admire the beauty of the scene, but to refresh his memory. This done, he leapt the gate and walked towards the rustic chair. He had nearly reached it when a woman cried:

"You are trespassing; please leave the grounds again."

"Oh, I beg your pardon, madam," said Jim, "I am

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

merely going to satisfy myself that the work is all right."

"Don't tell falsehoods, Mr. Phillips, you came to look at my house and grounds by moonlight."

"You are right," said Jim coolly, "and I apologise

"You are trespassing. Please leave the grounds again."

for the falsehood, our meeting disconcerted me for a moment."

"I always go over my grounds before retiring; servants are not to be trusted."

"You trust other people, tramps for instance."

Miss Morson toyed with a whistle and carelessly looked at a very heavy walking stick.

"I am glad to see you are prepared," said Jim "But I suppose the old place is as peaceful as ever."

"Disreputable persons sometimes wander here."

"Thanks, I understand. But they are wanderers from necessity."

"Or from foolish choice. Where have you been all these years?"

"Australia, Africa, and America. Living like a dog, and unconsciously cultivating the manners of one."

"You are disguising them to-night."

"It is an effort, Madge."

"Mr. Phillips."

"Pardon me, Miss Morson. I did not know how low I had fallen until I saw you to-day."

"I did not think you occupied so high a position in the world."

"Thanks again. Probably you thought I was in prison, or better still, dead by order of Judge Lynch. Well, perhaps I have escaped my deserts. Yet at one time I was manager of a ranch out West, and if there had been no city journeys and no saloons I should have done well. After a row with the boss I joined the Brazilian army and won a commission in the field; but I insulted a general, and half his command hunted me out of the country. I then prospected in Rhodesia; no luck. So I fell back on my profession, civil engineering, you know, and helped to sink shafts in the Transvaal. I left that place in time to escape drinking myself to death; existed six months as a sundowner in Australia; and then returned to England where I have been living a tolerable life ever since."

"I am not sorry for you, or even interested in your story."

"I did not hope to interest you; but it is pleasant to talk sometimes of oneself. Shall I leave you now?"

"I am going indoors."

"Then I will stay here a little while. Good night, Miss Morson."

She stepped from the shadow of the alders and stood erect in the moonlight.

Jim looked at the stern pale face and clear eyes, and saw that her forehead was wrinkled, and her hair touched with grey.

"Good night," he said again. "If you can forgive me, please do."

"What have I to forgive?"

"Perhaps I spoilt your life as well as my own."

"Spoilt my life, bah. I have loved toads; but I never loved you."

"Good night, Miss Morson."

Miss Morson, without replying, walked away, and a few minutes later Jim heard the yard gate closed with unnecessary violence.

"Looks as lovable as marble," he mused. "Yet I loved her in the old days, and I thought she loved me. Not pleasant to be placed lower than toads, and I believe she is sincere. So 'tis all up, Jim. She's hard, and wouldn't shed a tear if you died. Yet they say she's the Lady Bountiful of these parts, and this well is to replace one which the village doctor connects with an outbreak of typhoid. Some women with nothing at home to love have large hearts for the outside world. Good-night, Madge."

He kissed the trunk of the elm that grew near the gate, and added as he looked at its gently moving boughs:

"We planted you, I and Madge. She used a spade like a man, and threw the earth up faster than I can throw it now. You were to have sheltered our family old fellow, we pictured ripe age under your boughs. God forgive me, she deserved a fuller life."

Jim looked at the house again, shrugged his shoulders and walked from the grounds.

That night he drank heavily, and in the morning his spade trembled in his hands, but he worked doggedly, and Roger found it difficult to keep pace with him. In the afternoon Jim often rested, and looked towards the house, but Miss Morson did not approach the well until the men were preparing to leave Then she bowed stiffly to Jim and passed on, after a brief inspection.

A week later the master arrived.

He had faith in his men, but he thought some personal superintendence was essential, and the men did not object. Jim had fitted the bricks carefully, but when men are working in loose and troublesome soil fifty or sixty feet below the surface, it is good to know that some one who desires their safety is above.

Jim often looked from the bottom of the well to the small piece of sky visible above, half-expecting to see a woman's face, but he was disappointed. The bucket went up and down with monotonous regularity, and only the face of the master was seen, which, Jim thought, looked strained and apprehensive.

Digitized by Google

One evening Jim ascended, smiling blandly. The spring was within measurable distance and he believed another day would see ten feet of water in the well. "I shall be glad," he added, "for my nerves are not just now better than a woman's."

"Be careful," said the master, "and promise me that you won't drink heavily until the job is finished."

"All right," returned Jim, "the promise is as easy to keep as to make in this case."

He heard next morning that Miss Morson had obtained from the master reassuring opinions regarding the safety of his workmen, and Jim smiled. The smile appeared at intervals as he filled the bucket, and Roger, more than once rested on his spade and looked at him.

"Am I unusually interesting?" Jim asked.

"You keep on grinnin'," returned Roger, "I don't understand why. This air is enough to choke me."

"Perhaps I'm happy because this is our last day down here."

"I hope so, but unless I go aloft for a mouthful o' fresh air I shan't know night from day. Hi! master, I'm coming up."

"Ta, ta," said Jim. "Come back soon, your conversation lightens the toil."

Jim seldom whistled and never sang, but as Roger moved from the mouth of the well a baritone that had once been sweet and powerful was heard, and those on the surface listened, amazed. The music was unknown to them and the words were indistinct, yet the song thrilled them.

The master peered into the well and saw Jim working in his old style. The bucket was filled, the last spadeful of earth flattened down with a stroke that hushed the music for a second, then, as the bucket was raised, the music stopped altogether, and a dull, echoing roar was mingled with a shriek.

The master crawled to the mouth of the well and looked down, his eyes staring, and his face ghastly. Jim could not be seen, and the bottom of the well was a chaos of bricks and loose earth.

"Heavens," he gasped. "Jim is buried. Stand by the windlass; I must go down hand over hand."

He snatched a spade with a cord attached to its handle, and holding this with his teeth descended for about thirty feet; then his heart sank and he looked at the bulging brickwork and shuddered. Ten feet lower and perhaps he too would be buried.

For some moments he stared at the spot where a man was dying unseen, then, reviling his own cowardice he cut the rope at his feet and bade the man at the windlass raise him again with all speed.

Roger was ready, but the master held him back.

"Jim is dead, and you have a family. Listen!"

Another mass of soil fell, and Roger whispered:

"There's fifteen feet o' soil on him now. No man can help him."

Labourers were hastily summoned, but they loved life, and none would venture into the death-trap. So, when Miss Morson reached the scene all were staring at the well, and talking softly.

Miss Morson clutched an alder branch as she listened to the truth; but recovering, she asked:

"Are you all cowards?"

"I bain't a coward," said Roger, looking at the crowd, "and no man must say as much. Give me a drink o' brandy and I'll go down."

And he did, in spite of the remonstrances of the master; but before the bottom was touched he shouted to be raised again, and returned to the surface with the information that a mass of red earth was ready to fall; that it must fall if the débris were removed, and that the man on whom it should fall would never know what struck him.

Miss Morson clutched an alder branch as she asked: "Are you all cowards?"

Digitized by Google

Miss Morson turned from Roger, and looked at the crowd; but no one moved.

"If he were alive, mum," said an old labourer; "I'd chance it, but a man can't only be buried."

Miss Morson offered twenty pounds for the recovery of the body, then thirty, forty, but in vain.

"'Tis death to go down," said Roger, "and what's the use o' a hundred pounds to a dead man?"

Miss Morson sighed and returned to her house. A few minutes afterwards an old servant found her weeping just like an ordinary woman.

On the morrow she rode to Denemouth, whence she dispatched a telegram to the master informing him that she had engaged a clever and daring well-sinker who would reach Elm House early in the afternoon and attempt to recover the body.

Part of the stranger's heavy beard fell away, and a white throat and skin were revealed.

The news went round, and when a stalwart stranger reached the scene a great crowd was collected about the gate. The stranger, without a glance in their direction, remarked to the master, "The lady at the house says you'll give me all the assistance I need. She seems too cut up to come herself. Says 'tis all her fault, and wishes she'd never thought about the well; but I says, what is to be will be. So I'm ready."

The master looked curiously at the stranger. He was bearded, and a slouch cap covered his forehead. His voice was very low and seemingly strained, while his calmness did not disguise a reasonable amount of fear. The master pointed out the extreme danger of the task, but the stranger refused to listen. He wanted exact information, and two vigilant men at the windlass, nothing more.

These wants having been satisfied, he descended, and after a brief examination of the strata and the brick-work, he proceeded to dig. The bucket was filled and raised with fair regularity, and to the surprise of everybody there was no fall. Great masses of earth loomed above the daring man, but he gave no heed to them. Gradually his spade reduced the depth of earth above the dead, the borer was discovered, and as evening approached, it was whispered that the stranger had nearly uncovered poor Jim. The excitement increased when the master, after a long examination of the well remarked to an assistant. "If Jim is not raised within an hour he'll have company."

Half-an-hour passed and the stranger was seen on his knees, cautiously scraping the earth aside, and the master looked at his windlass rope. It was strong enough to raise a ton, and satisfied with his examination he again looked into the well. Jim was uncovered, and the stranger was wiping the soil from the still face.

The master opened his eyes very wide because the stranger clasped the rigid form as though fearful of losing it again, and the rough beard was for a moment pressed to the dead man's forehead while the sound of a kiss floated upward. Then the stranger placed the body in a bucket so that it could be raised without touching the sides of the well, and shouted, "Haul up."

The men at the windlass obeyed, and as the bucket swung clear the stranger grasped it and uttered a cry of terror. For a few moments a sudden strain almost overpowered the men but they struggled bravely and the master cried:

"Thank Heaven," as tender hands lifted the stranger to a place of safety and Jim was laid on the rustic chair beneath the alders.

"A narrow squeak," gasped the master. "We dragged them through the fall. How are you, old chap?"

"Fainted or stunned," said Roger. "Undo his collar, sir, that's it. Now a drop o' brandy an'—What's this?" Roger stepped back in astonishment as a part of the stranger's heavy beard fell away and a white throat and chin were revealed.

"Do you want help there, mates?" asked a policeman.

"Yes," said Roger, reverently fastening the collar again, "but not from you. Send two or three women for'ard and keep the men away, while I run to the house an' tell 'em Miss Morson ain't dead, but only cut an' bruised."

A. H. Smith.

7s. FOR AN ENLARGED FACE.

If you have a photograph which you greatly cherish, send it to us, and we will enlarge it to a beautiful India ink and crayon portrait, 15in. × 12in., mounted on plate sunk mount 24in. × 19in.

The enlargements, which are of the head and shoulders only, can be made from any photograph, large or small, tintypes, or any kind of glass picture, provided the print is legible. The price is 7s. for photos of civilians, and 6s. for those of soldiers and sailors in uniform.

Full particulars appeared last week and will appear again next week.

Digitized by Google

PEM.

SHE was only a London flower-girl; nothing better, and—nothing worse.

Her name was Emily Petherick; but with her sister-vendors, and with her intimates generally, she was just Pem Peth'ick.

In her business she was successful above the average, although it is difficult to say why, since her brusqueness, and independent dealing with her customers, would, one would have thought, have operated adversely in her commercial transactions.

Probably, the secret lay in her having a connection, people who knew her, and made allowance for her odd ways. Strangers seldom patronised her, a fact she regretted but little. She served them when they came, and there was an end of it; while she was absolutely indifferent as to whether or not they were likely to come again.

Pem was a striking-looking girl, for one of her class; of middle height, and with a set of the head that gave her an appearance decidedly superior to her station.

Sal Emmet said that she, Pem, was "stuck up" ("chock full o' beastly pride," was, I believe, the actual expression) and if that meant that Pem kept herself strictly to herself, and maintained a close reserve upon the subject of her private affairs, then undoubtedly the allegation was more than justified.

Sal Emmet's motive in saying what she did is of course open to question, being entirely another matter.

That Pem had a sweetheart is in nowise remarkable, seeing that a drunken mother, and a by no means sober, and altogether brutal step-father made what little home she had almost impossible, and a place to be avoided upon any and every opportunity.

I don't think that she would have deliberately chosen Bill Smith, under different circumstances.

A hawker of the merry "winkle" and the festive "shrimp," he was but a colourless specimen of the ordinary street boy. If anything, Pem had the advantage of him in point of years, but they were, after all, children, if children of an abnormal growth.

Bill's knowledge, or, shall we say, its converse, was of a fearful and wonderful kind; its full flavour, and distinctive value being especially and peculiarly apparent on such occasions as a Sunday afternoon on Hampstead Heath, or in Regent's Park, or a street ramble after dark when the lamps were lit.

It would be rash to say that Pem correctly gauged the depth of his ignorance, but it may be safely inferred that she looked leniently upon it.

In fact, but for the matter to be now related, the course of humble love would possibly have run straight and smooth, with the usual results: an early marriage and its inevitable consequences, viz; squalor and an occasional "smashing" by the head of the firm.

Pem's "pitch" was by the steep flight of steps in Villiers Street which lead up into Charing Cross Station.

Every morning, between nine and eleven a continuous stream of business men poured down out into the street.

This two hours was Pem's harvest-time; this and later in the afternoon from five to six.

But it was on the stroke of "ten" that she would wake up to special alertness. Many a would-be customer then failed to attract her attention. She did not seem to care, her eyes were fixed upon the station door at the top of the steps.

"'Ere y'are, sir!" shrieked Sal Emmet, seizing her opportunity, and capturing a smart, elderly dandy, one of Pem's "specials." "White rose, sir! yessir! just picked this mornin', sir!"

Still Pem watched and waited.

Presently, as Big Ben chimed out the quarter past, a tall, fair young fellow came swinging down the steps.

Pem's face at once lost its look of eager suspense, she became almost unrecognisable.

"Well, what is it this morning? No, not a white rose—that red one—it matches your cheeks, I think," he added laughingly.

Poor Pem coloured furiously, and bit her lips; conscious of a titter among the other girls.

It was curious that she herself did not utter a word. No chaffing repartee, no preening in self-satisfaction at smile and compliment. She simply took a pin from the bosom of her dress, and, fastening the rose in its new owner's coat, took the sixpence he put into her hand.

With a pleasant inclination of his head he passed on into the Embankment Gardens. Pem's eyes followed him. Business might take care of itself. The one bright event of her day was over. Until to-morrow she would not see him again, for, for some reason, he daily returned country-wards via Victoria.

Sal Emmet had long spied upon Pem, in connection with this same recurring morning episode. Envious, spiteful, and only too well-disposed, like many another of her sex and class, to "put a spoke in the wheel" of a more fortunate sister, she bided her time to make the mischief her soul (or what passed for her soul) delighted in.

"Set 'er up! 'Oo's she? Think's the swell's gone on 'er! Yah! 'e's not such a mug as that comes to! On'y let Bill Smith get wind on it, an' there'll be ructions, you bet!"

Pem was not blind to Sal's malignancy of disposition, as toward herself; although her very spirit of blunt, reserved independence made her somewhat carelessly indifferent to anything the latter might do or say.

Digitized by Google

It is to be feared, however, that she was allowing herself to build an airy castle, which could not possibly have foundations, of any kind whatever.

She showed this by her poor little attempts at personal adornment. A larger hat, startling effects in feathers, and other head ornament; scrupulous, or comparatively scrupulous cleanliness of skin and apron, all this marked, and plainly, the bent of her mind.

No more innocent, at ordinary times, than her mates, in the use of a forceful vocabulary, she became, for her, strangely "proper" on those rare occasions when she did condescend to conversation.

Such a course of conduct necessarily subjected her to the only too ready gibe and sneer.

"She's quite the lydy, ain't she?" said Polly Carter. "It's callin' on Queen Victoria she'll be soon, at Buckin'am Palis! My word! we'll 'ave ter 'ave a 'oliday that day, gels, won't us?"

"Cuts 'er nails, bless yer! now she does!" said Bet, from Endell Street. "Borrered my mother's scissors on'y larst night. Washes 'erself, too, every mornin' afore she comes art! She'll ruin 'erself in soap, if she don't watch it! It's sicknin'! that's what it is!"

Pem, leaning against the wall, just round the corner under the entrance to the railway arch, heard, but took no notice.

One blossom remained in her basket; a beautiful blush rose, set in its own glossy, dark green leaves.

She took it up, and pinned it in the bosom of her dress.

"'Ere, Sal!" shouted Polly Carter, "look at Pem Peth'ick. Ain't she a-goin' it? Sportin' a button-'ole! My! we are grand, we are!" and the fat, dirty-looking Polly, her greasy fringe almost touching her apology for a nose, and her tattered hat grotesquely bobbing up and down as she wagged her head wildly about, minced up and down in front of Pem, to the accompanying derisive laughter of the rest of the girls.

Pem had promised Bill that she would walk out with him that evening, and, remembering this, she retired with dignity, not deigning even a word of remonstrance or retaliation.

Contrary to his usual custom, Bill Smith did not keep his appointment. Pem was not particularly disappointed her affections never being too busily engaged, but that she could as now easily console herself for her sweetheart's failure to come up-to-time.

Alone, therefore, she wandered about nine o'clock, back to the Embankment, and, finding an unoccupied seat, gave herself up to meditative imaginings.

She had devoured much cheap, deliriously sensational literature, so dear to the soul of the lowly born, in which the "lord of high degree" poses as improbably as fascinatingly, and she quite believed in the possible repetition of the story of "King Cophetua and the beggar-maid."

She must have sat there for nearly two hours, for it was long past eleven when she reached the end of the street where she lived.

Cabs, with returning theatre-goers, were plentiful, and Pem stood for awhile at the corner of the evil-smelling narrow lane and the busy thoroughfare, idly watching the traffic.

It might have been close on midnight when a hansom, in which was a gentleman in evening dress, whirled by. Not too quickly, however, for a recognition of the occupant.

Pem would have known him anywhere, and felt her listlessness vanish.

Less than a minute afterwards, a block occurred nearer the St. Martin's Lane end of Long Acre, the line of cabs, Westward-wending, including the hansom in question, came to a momentary halt.

Pem could not resist the temptation to run the few yards, and furtively feast her eyes on the face of her idol.

She was so absorbed in this that she failed to notice a youth of the coster class steal out from the shadow of the pawnbroker's shop-doorway at the corner of the little street, and follow in her wake.

Perhaps, had she made no sign, and refrained from any exhibition of undue interest in the "gentleman of the cab," all would have been well, but unfortunately, she pressed into the roadway, between two other vehicles, her face aglow with rapturous excitement.

Action and expression were alike seen, and although road and pavement were both crowded, and before anyone knew, or could have prevented it, a report rang out, and Pem fell forward upon her face on the muddy asphalte, shot from behind.

Making no effort to escape; standing on the kerb, the smoking revolver in his hand, Bill Smith offered no resistance when seized by the police, who, it being close to Bow Street, were near at hand in considerable numbers.

He spoke but little.

"Yus, I did it. Ask Sal Emmet as lives in the same ouse as 'er—she told me, an'll tell yer why."

Meanwhile, on raising Pem, they found her alive, blood streaming from a bullet-wound in the back of her head.

A tall, fair gentleman, who sprang out of a hansom, spoke to the policeman, and said that he recognised the girl as one of whom he was in the habit of buying flowers every day at Charing Cross Station, and that if she were taken to the Hospital, he would follow, and specially interest the house-surgeon, a friend of his own, in her case. He also gave his card, and expressed his readiness to say what he knew at any future time and place.

* * * * *

Pem recovered, thanks to exceptional skill and unremitting care on the part of the doctors and friends raised up for her through the influence of Henry Cassellis.

The latter's betrothed took her into her service on her complete convalescence, and few would recognize in the pale, quiet, neat hand-maiden, the old-time flower-seller of Villiers Street.

When, soon afterwards, Henry Cassellis married, Pem went with his wife as her especial attendant, and when, too, in due course replicas of husband and wife put in an appearance, who so devoted a nurse as Pem. They loved her, those children, from the cradle; and she—she gave them all the wealth of that heart of hers, that had known so much sorrow, and learned so great a lesson.

* * * * *

Bill Smith reaped the due reward of his cowardly deed; a long period of imprisonment.

As for Sal Emmet, the other girls, with the inconsistency of girls all the world over, cut her from that day forward; and to-day, it would be dangerous to speak in their hearing, one word in dispraise or disparagement of their erstwhile object of scorn and contumely, "Pem Peth'ick."

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

THE LION'S WARS

THE TWO FIRST GREAT MAHRATTA WARS (1802-1803).

A NOTION prevails in England, and still more in Europe, that the conquest of India by Britain led to the absorption of nationalities, abolished long seated dynasties, and did away with ancient nobilities. Our conquest did nothing of the kind, for the simple reason that when India fell into our hands there were no ancient dynasties or blue blooded aristocracies to displace in the countries we annexed.

Madhaji Scindia of Gwalior was the greatest of the Indian potentates in the last century. Whilst devoid of the cruelty which blackened the names of men like Tippoo Sahib and Surajah Dowlah, he was so inordinately ambitious that he devoted his whole life to the realisation of a scheme for the expulsion of the foreigner from India.

Scindia had, it is true, assisted us in the last Mysore war, which ended with the death of Tippoo Sahib, but that was only to lull the distrust with which he feared we were beginning to regard him. He hated us, but he had no desire to lose his country, which comprised over 33,000 square miles.

Before his death Scindia had conquered Bundelcund, occupied Agra and Delhi, reduced several of the Rajput princes, and largely extended the area of his dominions. He was succeeded by his nephew, Dowhit Rao, who, assuming the name of Scindia, took up the threads of the conspiracy.

At the beginning of the present century the Mahrattas were ruled over by three princes—Scindia, Holkar, and the Peishwa.

When the Marquis of Wellesley, the elder brother of the great general who in after years came to be known as the Duke of Wellington, became Governor General, the growing power of the Mahrattas at once attracted his attention, so as soon as the war with Mysore was concluded he endeavoured to bring the three princes under British control.

The task was not an easy one. He offered Peishwa a share of the spoils of Mysore on condition that he received in his capital a British contingent of six battalions, with guns, and set aside for their maintenance territory to the value of 26,000,000 rupees. This offer was haughtily declined. Being a man of endless patience the Marquis waited. A quarrel presently arose between Holkar and Scindia. Peishwa sided with the latter, and marched on Holkar's capital, Poona.

Although the forces of the allies exceeded 88,000 men, the victory which Holkar won October 20th, 1802, was so complete that Peishwa narrowly escaped capture before he reached Bassein.

In reply to appeals for assistance, Wellesley agreed to secure him his throne provided he became a feudatory Prince of Britain. This the Peishwa consented to do.

The treaty of Bassein, to which he affixed his signature, was greatly resented by Scindia and Holkar. Scindia especially was incensed as he saw in the treaty a death blow to his uncle's great project. The Governor, who knew nothing of Scindia's sinister plans, calculated that when Peishwa tendered his allegiance Scindia would do so, too.

Digitized by Google

In this he was mistaken. To make matters still worse, it was reported to the Governor-General that Peishwa, repenting what he had done, had entered into an alliance with the Rajah of Berar against the British. Hostilities being now imminent, General Wellesley marched against Poona with 8,000 infantry and 4,000 cavalry. Colonel Stevenson moved towards the same spot from Hyderabad with 6,000 of the Nizam's troops.

General Lake also received orders to expel Scindia's troops from Agra and Delhi, and then proceed to the assistance of General Wellesley. Ready to achieve his purpose without bloodshed, if possible, the Governor-General sent his secretary to Scindia, who declared that so far as he was concerned war depended on whether the Rajah of Nagpore joined him or not.

Even then Lord Wellesley was willing to temporise, but when he discovered for a fact that Peishwa, whom he had just reinstated at Poona, was secretly negotiating with Scindia, he declared war at once. To secure unity of purpose he invested his brother with full powers.

To gain time General Wellesley, who had marched from Seringapatam, a distance of nearly 600 miles from Poona, despatched an ultimatum to the conspirators, giving them twenty-four hours to consider the line of conduct they intended to adopt. The three princes instantly offered, if Wellesley disbanded his army, to retire thirty miles. This proposal was peremptorily rejected.

Hearing that it was the intention of the fiery Mahratta chiefs to combine their forces, General Wellesley pushed on to Poona with his cavalry, travelling so rapidly succeeded, although he had sixty miles to cover, in achieving his purpose.

On leaving Poona, Wellesley went north, taking the strongly-fortified town of Aurungabad, where, receiving information that the Mahrattas were threatening Hyderabad, the capital of our ally the Nizam, he made a forced march and got between them and the city.

The horde fighting under the banner of Scindia, although badly armed, were stubborn fighters. Existing entirely by plunder they regarded war as their natural avocation. Still, Scindia was not anxious to commence hostilities. His great uncle had so warned him to be careful of the British soldier, and not to begin unless he was certain of success. Scindia was contemplating a retreat with harassing attacks, but being reinforced by sixteen battalions of regular infantry and over seventy cannon, the whole led by French officers, he determined to risk a pitched battle.

As soon as Colonel Stevenson came up with a few thousands of the Nizam's native troops, Wellesley went in pursuit of Scindia. He was only just in time; Scindia had again changed his mind. The cavalry had gone and some of the infantry were decamping too. When the British appeared on the scene, Scindia's camp being six miles off, Wellesley was compelled to leave a strong force behind to protect his baggage and communications.

This so depleted his little army that he had only some 4,500 men, and of these large proportions were natives, to fight the huge Mahratta army of 50,000 hardy warriors. Worse still, Wellesley found the foe to his dismay encamped on the other side of the Kaitna and no ford in sight. At length one, and the only one for miles, was found. Fortunately for us it had been left unguarded. As soon as the news was brought to Wellesley he exclaimed, "I have them now, they cannot escape me."

As he was only thirty-five years of age and this was the first battle in which he had supreme command, the remark indicates the great self-reliance of the conqueror of Waterloo. As soon as our men had crossed, the battle of Assaye began. Wellesley had drawn up his men in two lines, which the French officers observing, altered the disposition of their men so that the right rested on the river and the left on the village of Assaye.

Scindia's artillery played fearful havoc in our ranks as we marched to the attack. The Nizam's troops, though well disciplined, would have run away but for a wholesome fear of their white comrades. Their courage revived, however, when they saw the calm ferocity with which the British repulsed a most determined charge of the Mahratta cavalry, who, brandishing their tasselled spears, attempted to break our ranks.

That one charge cost Scindia over 1,000 lives.

Urged by the French officers they made repeated efforts to drive us back, but as fast as our men fell other stern unyielding Britishers were ready to take their places. Wellesley was observing with delight how well the native troops, inspired by the conduct of our men, were behaving, when a miscarriage of orders nearly led to our being defeated.

The 74th, in reserve, having received orders to advance and reconnoitre, thought that it was called upon to attack. The Colonel therefore led his men against the village of Assaye, which was held by a large force of Scindia's infantry and nearly all his cavalry. The gaps in the ranks of the 74th so widened that Wellesley, ill as he could spare assistance, had to send supports in the shape of cavalry and guns. An officer galloping up reported that it would be impossible to get up the guns owing to the number of wounded men and dead oxen blocking the way.

"Tell the cavalry then that I look to them to retrieve the fortunes of the day. I know that they will not disappoint me."

There was a grim look on the faces of the troopers as they formed in line and tightened the girths of the horses.

Foreseeing what was coming, the French officers hurried up all their reserves, so that by the time we reached the lines the mass confronting us was so dense that to break through seemed hopeless. Just before the charge Wellesley rode up, the personification of calm intrepidity, attended by some scattered detachments of infantry who had followed in the wake of their chief.

The French called on their men to stand firm as we came tearing along. The Mahrattas were no cowards, but the force with which we delivered our blow made a break in the dusky wall of humanity large enough to admit of the infantry gliding in and getting to work. A desperate fight ensued, and at last, the centre growing unsteady, recoiled on the wings, which retreated in such haste that Wellesley was able to launch the 78th Highlanders, supported by a regiment of sepoy cavalry, on the rear of Scindia's quivering centre.

The Mahrattas offered a most gallant resistance, and so many of our men sank down that it became a question whether the next few minutes would leave sufficient British to complete the victory.

Wellesley noted this, too, but was quite unmoved. He knew that Scindia's horde, for all their bravery, lacked the dogged tenacity of the English; so, calling on his Highlanders, he charged again and again, driving the Mahrattas towards the Khelna to prevent them from defending their second line, which rested on the Jewah.

Simultaneously the victorious cavalry charged the

Digitized by Google

Drawn by] The natives paused on hearing the commanding tones of the pale, stern Englishman. [Lawson Wood.

Digitized by Google

village of Assaye, the 74th, which followed close behind, clearing out those who had escaped the horsemen. The two wings of Scindia, having recovered from their panic, rejoined the centre, but great as were their numbers they were also driven across the Jewah.

So far success had crowned our arms, but the battle was not yet won. Scindia's troops, instead of retreating, now took up a far stronger position than that they last occupied at Assaye. But Wellesley, who possessed the instinct only to be found in great commanders of knowing what the enemy would be likely to do, had made arrangements to defeat this move.

Before the Mahrattas crossed the Jewah he had posted a regiment of infantry near to, but out of sight of, the Mahratta position. Whilst the enemy were making ready to repel the onset of the cavalry, who had dashed across the river in pursuit, the force in hiding burst on their rear with such fury that the astonished Mahrattas took to flight.

Much still remained to be accomplished before this remarkable battle was won. Scindia's horse, numbering 30,000 men, had not yet come into action. Flushed with success it was with difficulty that our cavalry were recalled from the pursuit of the Mahratta foot to deal with the enemy's horse. For the second time that day we surprised the foe.

The Mahrattas were riding round our tiny force seeking for the weak spot when Colonel Maxwell and his troopers charged their rear. Cheered by the appearance of their General, who rode up, our brave fellows fought like lions. In less than ten minutes after this historic charge the whole of the enormous force of Mahratta horse galloped from the field hotly chased by the British, who did not pause in the pursuit till twelve miles had been covered.

This battle quite broke the spirit of our enemies in India. The town of Burhampore and the strong fortress of Alighur were so dismayed when the news reached them that they at once surrendered. Even Scindia's iron resolution so far faltered when he found our remorseless soldiers on his track as to induce him to make a pretence of suing for peace.

Wellesley then turned his attention to Bhoonsia, the Rajah of Berat. Stevenson had invested the great fortress of Gawilghur. On arriving he was confronted by the Rajah's army under the command of his brother, Vinsaji Bhoonsia.

In violation of the terms of the armistice, Scindia had sent a large body of troops to the assistance of the Rajah. Vinsaji had drawn up his army on the plain in front of the village of Argaum.

As soon as Wellesley had reconnoitred the position he resolved on an immediate attack. Our men by this time had got so used to fighting after marches of twenty miles and upwards that, although the sun's rays beat down that day with unusual fierceness, they only asked for half-an-hour's rest before attacking.

The Rajah's army was drawn up with the infantry and guns on the left centre and a body of cavalry on the left. Scindia's contingent occupied the right, with their flank covered by a body of Pindarese and other light troops.

The Rajah's position was strong but very extended. Its front occupied seven miles; still, owing to the number of water-courses which intersected it, it offered few points of attack. On account of the slowness with which the attack was developed, owing of course to infantry being employed, our Sepoys thought the battle was going against them, and began to retreat in disorder. Wellesley seeing this flew to the spot shouting to them to stop. The natives paused on hearing the commanding tones of the pale, stern Englishman, and followed him meekly back to the battlefield.

The Mahrattas, with the memory of Assaye still fresh in their minds, charged us several times, but not with the old irresistible ferocity. At this time the treachery of Scindia could not have been known, for Wellesley, in a dispatch to his brother, said: "The 74th and the 78th Regiments were attacked by a large body of strange horsemen supposed to have been Persians, and all these were destroyed."

Later in the day further reinforcements from Scindia arrived. In their first charge they encountered the first battalion of the 6th, a terrible lot of fighters, who had been stationed on the left to take charge of any fresh bodies of assailants.

Our men met the charge of the fresh arrivals with one of their own. The force of the impact was so great that the enemy were literally hurled out of the field.

As they were too demoralised to return we gave chase, capturing thirty-eight pieces of cannon and all their ammunition. The pursuit lasted for hours, and long before it was over we had captured so much plunder in the shape of elephants, camels, baggage, and war food, that the officers saw that if they continued the pursuit the spoil would have to be sacrificed.

They thereupon deputed the rest of the chase to the cavalry of the Mogul of Mysore. As the battle did not commence till late in the day our men devoted the night to recovering the elephants and camels which had wandered away.

During these exciting times Lake had been almost as successful as Wellesley. Marching from Kauhpur he fell upon the enemy's cavalry at Alighur, completely routing them. Then he stormed the fortress of Alighur, after which he marched to Delhi, defeated the Mahrattas outside the city, entering the town on the following day.

After resting a couple of days we find this active officer at Agra fighting and winning a battle for its possession. Agra and Delhi secured, Lake started for Central India in pursuit of Scindia. That wily prince, on hearing that the English were on his track, hastened his footsteps, but the English soldier, being as good a marcher as he was a fighter, overtook the enemy's army, after a series of forced marches, at Laswari, and at once assailed it with his cavalry.

Scindia's French officers had so strongly fortified the position they had taken up that Lake, after a couple of assaults, decided to wait till his infantry came up. On their appearance next morning Lake, in view of the formidable task awaiting him, decided to postpone assaulting the enemy's trenches till his men had had their dinner.

It was well he did, for in addition to the strength of the position Scindia's troops had been so well trained by the French that as Lake said, "At Laswari the Indians fought like Europeans."

The battle of Laswari displayed to the best advantage the intrepid fearlessness of the British soldier. Succeeding at last in reaching the intrenchments they calmly clambered over to receive the charge of Scindia's cavalry, the very flower of his army.

The onslaught shivered to pieces against the iron line confronting them, and after the second charge they took to flight.

On December 17th, 1803, Scindia and his chiefs signed a treaty which not only increased our prestige, but largely added to the possessions of the E.I.C.

Digitized by Google

"QUICK CHANGE" PUZZLES.

SECOND SET.

First Prize ... ... A Magnificent Graphophone.
Second Prize ... ... £2.
Six Prizes of ... ... 10s. each.

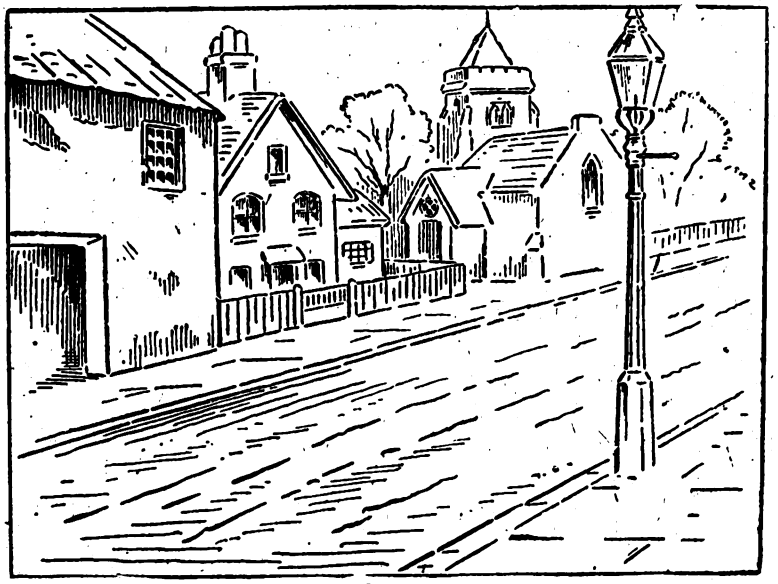
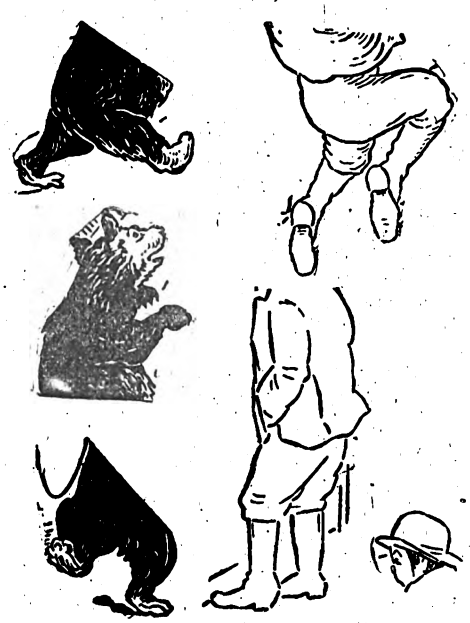
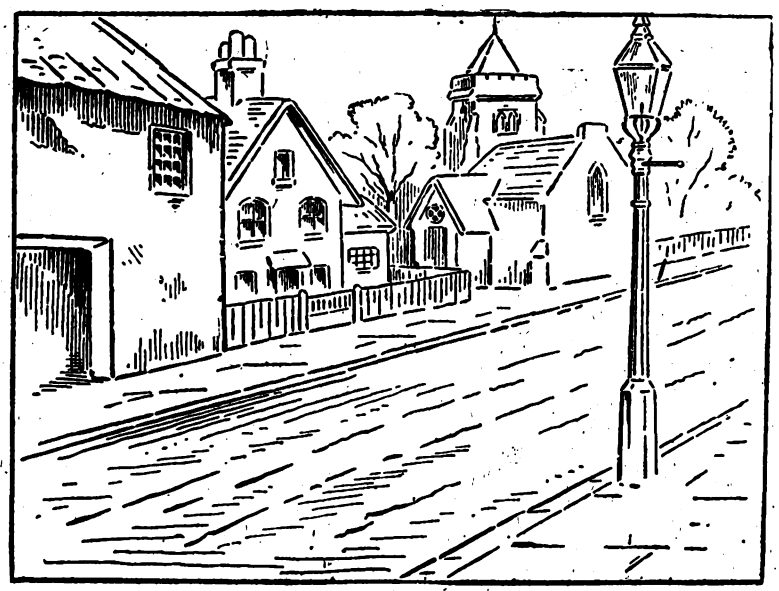
On this page you will find two drawings exactly alike, and a number of parts of figures. What you have to do is to cut out the parts of the figures, leaving a small margin, and paste them on the picture in the way they should go. There is no guess work about it. Each part of the figures should be pasted on a certain spot, and will fit no other spot. When you have pasted up your picture, put it by until one more set has appeared. We will tell you the closing date in good time.

Competitors must abide by the Editor's final decision, and may enter only on that understanding.



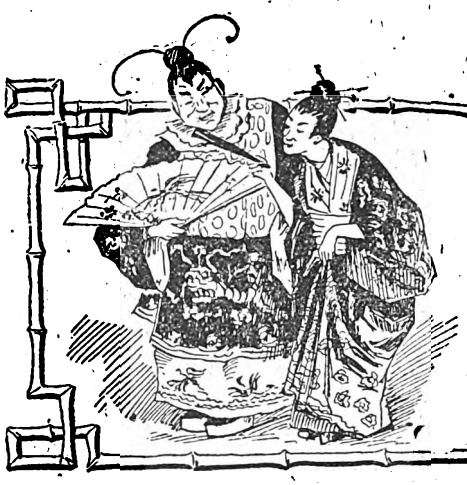
Fun.





Fear.

Digitized by Google



Mr. Bowser's Tribulations.

XXXII.—HE DOES A BIT OF HOUSE CLEANING WHILE MRS. BOWSER IS AWAY.

Mrs. Bowser had gone to her mother's in the country for a few days for a change of air, and Mr. Bowser and the family cat had been left at home to keep house and look after things.

Before leaving she extracted a solemn promise from him that he would not disturb things while she was absent, but on the evening before she was expected home, and while he sat just outside the door in the back-yard, a cigar in his mouth and the cat seated on another chair beside him, a sudden feeling of pity for Mrs. Bowser came over him. When she returned from her holiday, she would have to start at once on house-cleaning, and by the time she had finished, all the benefits of the country air would be dissipated.

"By George, I'll have a go at it to-morrow morning!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he remembered that business was a little slack and he could spare a day or two from the office. "Yes, I'll pitch in directly after breakfast and knock the socks off this house-cleaning business in less'n forty-eight hours. That little wife of mine shan't come home to break her back hunting the moths and dust out of this house."

There was a sound of gurgling and chuckling close at hand, and he turned to look at the cat. It was she, but she put on such an innocent expression that he laid the chuckling to a boy on the other side of the fence. He went to bed early to get a good start in the morning. He was alone in the house, and as he slept he dreamt that a big cat sat on his breast and grinned into his face.

At eight o'clock next morning he had coat, vest, collar and tie off and was ready for the fray. The first thing to be done, as he imagined, was to take all the parlour furniture into the back-yard and give him some room to spread himself.

He had decided that the woodwork ought to be gone over with a light coat of paint, and after getting the furniture out he went looking about for old paint cans. He had painted the verandah and the flower-pots in the summer, and he found some of the mixture left. It was a tender pink, which would have looked too lovely for anything on the cheeks of a bride, but it needed thinning down.

He knew that practical painters never used water, vinegar, cold tea or coffee to thin out paint, but his knowledge stopped short there. It was when his eye rested on the paraffin can that he solved the puzzle.

When the paint had been duly prepared for use, a little oil was added from the sewing machine can to give it a gloss, and Mr. Bowser went to work.

It takes some men years to become an artist with the brush. It didn't take him over ten minutes. The peach-colour not only stood out over the white groundwork, but the oil brought out a real bloom on the peaches.

As he stood back and surveyed his first door he could almost imagine that he saw rare ripe peaches hanging to trees out in the country. The odour wasn't exactly agreeable, but he decided to throw that in free gratis and for nothing. It was a job that would have taken an average painter a full day, with his going to the shop for putty, and sandpaper and round the corner for beer, but at noon Mr. Bowser stood in the middle of the room and put out his tongue and looked about him and saw that his work was finished.

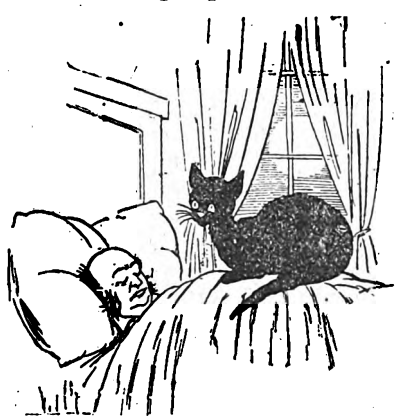
In addition to the bloom on the peach-colour, the oil had brought out thousands of bubbles, but he did not regard them as drawbacks. On the contrary, he rather prided himself on having struck something new in the line of high art painting.

* * * *

Mrs. Bowser had complained of moths. Yes, he remembered that she had been fighting moths for years and that it had been hard work to keep them down. Whether she had used the axe, the crowbar, or hot water, he could not remember, but she had slaughtered them without pity and left their corpses unburied.

Before he went out to a restaurant for his lunch he made a hunt for moths, and his search was ably seconded by the cat. It was the cat who finally found one hiding in a dark corner, and Mr. Bowser's resolution was taken.

The moths or the carpets or



As he slept he dreamt that a big cat sat on his breast.

Digitized by Google

something must be exterminated. He didn't go to a chemist's when he went out and ask for a remedy. Believing that a waiter in a restaurant ought to know all about moths, he confided his troubles to the man and was answered:

"Yes, sir, I can tell you what to do. I've known all about moths ever since I was knee high to Tom Thumb. You want to sprinkle that carpet with a compound made of water, lime and paraffin. Make up about six gallons of it and don't be stingy about putting it on. The idea is to kill the moths all at once and have no long drawn out suffering about the house."

* * * *

Mr. Bowser got the ingredients and made a six gallon saucepan full, and then, taking the garden watering can he went over the carpet and started every moth on the fly out of the neighbourhood. After the cat had walked across the carpet once she also started, and it was late in the afternoon before she returned with sore feet and a reproachful look.

When the sprinkling had been finished and just as the back parlour was to be attacked, a tramp rang the doorbell and asked for something to eat. Mr. Bowser felt complacent and liberal hearted. In place of food he gave the man sixpence and then said:

"I don't claim to be a professional artist, but I've just finished a little job here I'd like you to look at. In travelling about you must see more or less artistic work."

"I do, sir," replied the tramp as he followed him into the parlour and looked at the freshly-painted woodwork. "This is what I calls a beauty, sir, a real beauty. You've used paraffin and oil with the paint, and the neighbours will all be jealous of you. You should have been an artist, sir."

There was a tinge of sarcasm in his tones, but Mr. Bowser added another sixpence and bowed him out.

It was now noticed that the blue and red in the carpet began to look freckled, but there was no time to investigate. The furniture of the other room was hurried into the back-yard, and the work of putting on the peach-colour began.

* * * * *

Mr. Bowser had been painting and admiring for an hour when he heard the dull rumble of thunder. His artistic soul was not disturbed by it, nor did he heed the rain which presently began to pour down and continued for two hours. When he had finished his painting, he made another mixture of moth-killer and drenched the carpet of that room as well, and he chuckled with satisfaction as he imagined the mob of moths fleeing with terror, like the Boxers before the allied army. He had just got through and was contemplating his work with the satisfaction of a good husband when Mrs. Bowser arrived and came in to him.

"Welcome home, my dear," he said as he extended his painty arms.

She didn't rush into them. She looked at the bubbling painted woodwork, at the freckled carpets, out of the window at the upholstered furniture which had soaked for two hours in the back yard, and then she sat down on the floor and started crying.

M. QUAD.

"I've just finished a little job I'd like you to look at."

[NEXT WEEK.—He Buys a Fire Extinguisher and Proceeds to Extinguish.]

MOTHER: "Did you try to make yourself agreeable at Mrs. Hightone's?"

Little Daughter: "Yes, mamma; I told her all the funny things our callers said about her, and she seemed to be so much interested."

"WE'LL miss the play," she said impatiently. "We've been waiting a good many minutes for that mother of mine."

"Hours, I should say," he replied somewhat acrimoniously.

"Ours?" cried she rapturously. "Oh, George, this is so sudden."

LADY OF THE HOUSE: "Listen, cook. I am going to give a supper and a dance. Now, you will have to show what you can do, so as to keep up the credit of my establishment."

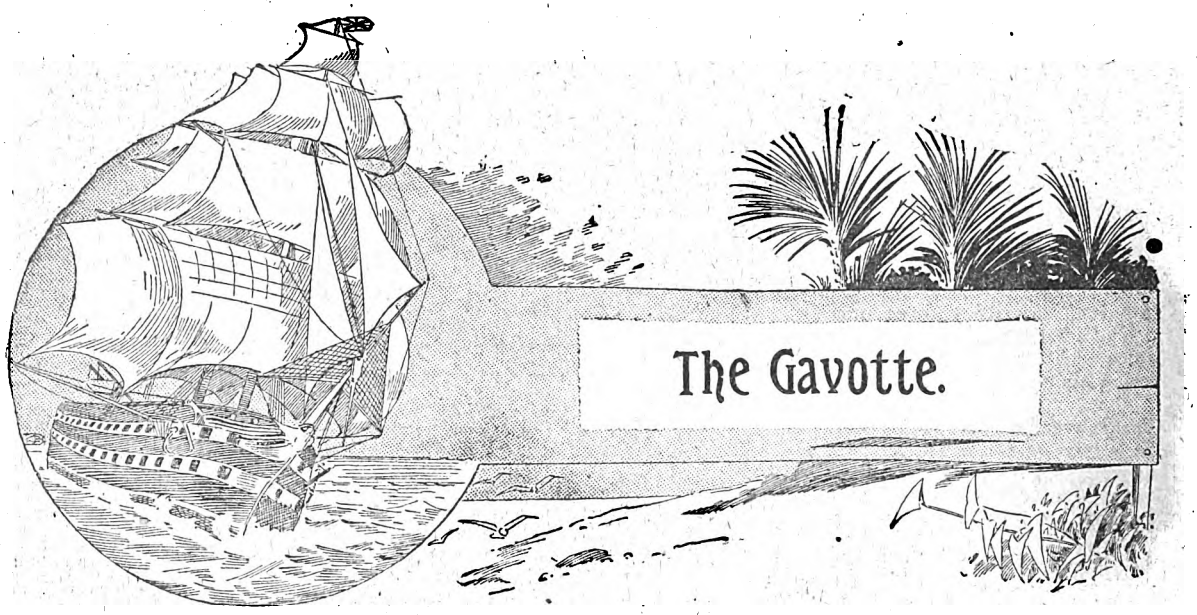
Cook: "With pleasure, ma'am; but I can only dance the waltz and the polka. You will have to excuse me from the quadrilles."

THE priest had been giving Pat and Nancy a little advice on some differences of opinion that had sprung up between them. And to illustrate his remarks he pointed to a dog and cat sleeping together by the fireside.

"See, my children, how agreeable these two little animals are."

"Yes, your Reverence," replied the woman; "but tie them together, and you'll see what they'll do."

Digitized by Google



The Gavotte.

THE worthy curé of Chauvigny knocked somewhat hesitatingly at the door of the spacious room in which he knew that the still more worthy bishop of his diocese was about to partake of his plain mid-day meal. In answer to a loud invitation to walk in, he opened the door and entered.

"Ha, my dear curé, you are very welcome!" cried the prelate heartily. "That is," he added hastily, "provided that you have not come to ask me to pardon your graceless nephew."

"Monseigneur, I trust that I shall be none the less welcome on that account, for that is precisely the object of my visit," responded the curé humbly, as he approached the other and bowed.

"Then I am afraid that your visit will not be a success," returned the bishop.

He spoke with determination, but there was something in his tone and manner that showed affability to the uncle as well as severity towards the nephew.

"Your nephew is a pupil at the seminary and I was hoping, quite as much as you, my dear friend, that he would become a member of the clergy. Now, what happens? He has to leave the institution to do his six months' military service; just as he is leaving he goes to a dance—and not only dances with a pretty girl, but also kisses the hand of that pretty girl at the conclusion of the dance! You see," shaking an admonitory finger at the curé, "I am well informed."

"But, monseigneur——"

"I tell you," continued the prelate, still shaking his forefinger vigorously, "that your nephew, when he has done his six months, had better enlist or settle down and marry; I fear that as a member of the clergy he might be flighty." And the speaker shook his head slowly, as if in grave apprehension.

"I hope that you will deign to reconsider your decision, monseigneur," pleaded the visitor. "If you persist, Jeannet's career will be spoilt; he is intended by nature for the priesthood and is devoted to the calling. He is young and, although I have no wish to palliate his offence, yet I must say that there is no wrong in the lad. It was a slip."

"No more; let us leave the subject," was the reply.

"My good friend, I am delighted to see you and I must ask you to do me the further pleasure of sharing my dinner. It will be ready directly, and in the meantime you must take this arm-chair—you'll find it a comfortable one—and draw it up closer to the fire. That's it. There, you will be quite close to the table and will merely have to draw the front legs round a few inches when my old servant brings in the dinner. But I cannot promise you a royal feast; I live very plainly. I know that you, my dear curé, in your secluded parish, have a better time of it than I do."

"I agree with you," replied Jeannet's uncle with conviction. "I know by experience that, despite your exalted position, you do not have the good things which fall to my lot. My parishioners love me and they keep me well supplied with such things as one gets more easily in the country than in the town. In fact, they keep me too well supplied, and I am able to bring some of the delicacies for monseigneur. I handed them to your servant, Marion, when I came in—some trout, two partridges and a dozen of wine. Some of the fish and one partridge are cooked, and I took the liberty of asking your servant to put them on the table. A cold repast, certainly, but none the less enjoyable."

Before the bishop could speak, the door opened and Marion came in with a tray. The dinner was served and the two men seated themselves at the table and lost no time in beginning the attack on the food placed before them.

"A dinner for a king!" exclaimed the prelate with the most evident enjoyment. He was a good man, giving away a large portion of his small stipend in charity and living in the simplest manner; he did not often sit down to a dinner like that.

The meal finished, both men lay back in their chairs and felt happy; the fish had been good, the partridge had equalled it in excellence and the wine had, at least, not been inferior to the comestibles in quality.

"My dear curé, you must not come to see me often if you bring such things with you, or you will tempt me into the wish to change places."

Digitized by Google

"I have something more than those to console me for my seclusion. I play the flute, and I find in that instrument a charming companion."

"I have been given to understand that you are a most expert player. When I come your way, I shall insist upon hearing you."

"My friends exaggerate my skill," said the curé modestly, almost shyly. Yet there was a certain eagerness in his manner. "I have my flute with me, and I should like to show you exactly what I can do, but I fear that you would think it a mere noise, not music."

"By all means give us a selection," cried the bishop, taking another sip at the wine. "There is nothing I should like better, and I should not be surprised if the playing attracted my old servant into this room on the pretext of clearing the table—she is fond of music. Come, come; Don't be shy! Out with the instrument and begin!"

The curé, with seeming timidity, produced the flute from the recesses of his coat and began to play.

As the bishop had predicted, Marion appeared in the doorway before many bars had been played, but neither her master nor the curé noticed her at first; the bishop was charmed by the music, and the player was too occupied in producing it, and in watching his superior.

The curé was an excellent performer; he made the instrument give forth full, rich tones, and he moved his fingers with the dexterity of a skilled player. Suddenly the bishop discovered that the curé was rendering an old-fashioned gavotte and his attention increased.

"Ah," he exclaimed, speaking softly in order not to utter the remark audibly.

"How well I remember that gavotte! What memories it recalls! It takes me back to the old days in Auvergne; many a time have I danced to that tune!" and his feet kept time to the tune.

"You could not dance it now, monseigneur," cried the curé, stopping in his playing to make the observation. "Your legs have grown too stiff for that."

"Nonsense," exclaimed the prelate. "Anybody would fancy I was a centenarian to hear you talk. Can't dance it now indeed! If I had a partner I'd show you!"

He looked about the great room with a face flushed with vexation and his eyes fell upon Marion standing in the doorway.

"You'll do, Marion!" he cried to the old woman. "Do you know how to dance the gavotte? A little? Come here, I'll show you how to do it. Play up!" he continued, turning again to the curé. "You shall see!"

Again the notes of the flute sounded in the room. Marion, quite flustered at this unexpected turn of events, approached her master diffidently; he took her hand and showed her what to do.

"Lift this foot," so ran the instruction. "Now the other—like this; now whirl round. A little skip, then round you go again. Now catch hold of the fold of your dress and bow. Very good!"

The curé continued to play, and the next minute the bishop and his elderly domestic were dancing with great vigour.

Round the room they went, the curé putting more wind into the instrument as they receded, and playing diminuendo as they returned. They kept it up until the dancers were out of breath and tired, when the music finished with a triumphant swell.

"Splendid!" cried the bishop. Then, with the utmost gallantry, he raised Marion's shrivelled hand to his lips.

"Monseigneur!" exclaimed the curé, in pretended horror. "Why, you have committed the same sin as my nephew!"

"What do you mean?" asked his superior in amazement.

"You have been dancing and you have kissed your partner's hand," replied the other. "I fear me as a member of the clergy you are likely to become too flighty!"

"But it is quite different!" protested the bishop. "I—that is——"

"Yes, it is very different. Just imagine yourself thirty years younger, with a good band instead of an old flute, with youthful blood in your veins and with a pretty partner instead of a wrinkled dame arrived at years of discretion. Think of the enjoyment you have just had, and then imagine yourself in the other circumstances which I have just mentioned. Ah, it was excusable on the part of Jeannet, and you must pardon him,"

The bishop looked perplexed and vexed; he did not wish to be hard on anyone, but he had his calling much at heart. Still, he was fairly caught, and, when he saw the sly twinkle in the eyes of the curé, he laughed good-humouredly, and yielded.

"I'm afraid that you are a very cunning old man, my dear curé," he said with a smile. "Very well, we will look over the little indiscretion of your nephew, and you may tell him he is forgiven. But neither of us must lapse again!"

CHARLES FOLEY.

"If anyone should call this afternoon, Mary, say that I am not well," said a mistress to her newly-engaged servant. "I'm afraid I ate a little too much of that rich pudding for lunch, and it, or something else, has brought on a severe headache. I am going to lie down."

A few moments later the mistress, from her room near the head of the stairs, heard Mary say to two aristocratic ladies who called for the first time:

"Yes'm, Mrs. Browne is at home, but she ate so much pudding for lunch she had to go to bed."

AN INTERESTING BOOK.

CONSULT THE ORACLE;

or,

HOW TO READ THE FUTURE.

Crown 8vo. Price 1s. Post Free, 1s. 3d.

Some of the Chapters are:

Chap. I.—The Meaning of your Dreams.
Chap. III.—Omens, Charms, and Spells for Lovers.
Chap. VII.—Judging Character by the Hands and Fingers.
Chap. XV.—Married Life Begun as it Should Be.
Chap. XXIV.—Table-Turning.
Chap. XXVIII.—Mystery and Danger of Mesmerism.
Chap. XXXIII.—Things Seen by Second-Sight.
Chap. XXXIX.—Looks showing your Character.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED, Henrietta Street, W.C

Digitized by Google

THE LOST LADY DELIA.

BY LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Final War," "An American Emperor," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

LADY DELIA LYLE leaves her house one foggy November afternoon, and is seen at Victoria Station, on the Underground Railway, by Mr. Reginald Brett, a barrister friend of her husband, who gets her ticket and puts her in the train for Richmond, where she says she is going to see her sister.

She does not return home at night, so in the morning her husband, Sir Charles Lyle, wires to her at her sister's, only to find that she has not been there.

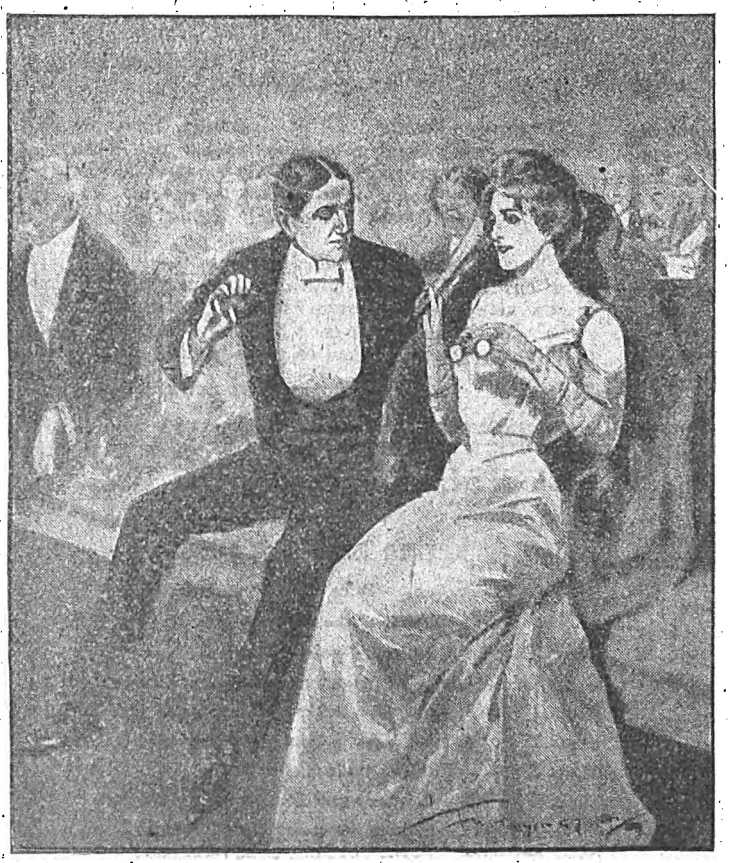
Later in the day Brett happens to meet Sir Charles, and tells him that he saw Lady Delia on the previous evening, and is surprised to learn that nothing has been heard of her since.

After some days have passed, without bringing any news of Lady Delia, Sir Charles puts the matter into the hands of detectives, Inspector Winter taking charge of the case.

Brett also promises to do all he can, and he finds out that Lady Delia, on the night of her disappearance, instead of going to Richmond, alighted at Sloane Square, and went to a block of flats called Raleigh Mansions.

Towards the end of the month the body of a woman, evidently murdered, is found wedged beneath a drain-pipe in the Thames at Putney, and, though Sir Charles does not identify the body, Brett imagines it to be that of Lady Delia. Shortly after this discovery Lady Delia's maid, Jane Harding, disappears.

Brett now starts investigations at Raleigh Mansions, and he fixes on two residents there as being likely to have been connected with Lady Delia. These are a Mr. Sydney H. Pyne, who is not at present in residence, and a Mrs. Hillmer, whom he finds to be Pyne's sister, and with this lady Brett arranges to dine and spend the evening at the theatre.



"Fie, Mr. Brett. You are taking altogether too much notice of one of the fair ladies in front."

CHAPTER V.

AT THE JOLLITY THEATRE

By tacit consent, Reggie and his fair companion dropped for the hour, the rôles of inquisitor and witness.

They were both excellent talkers, they were mutually interested, and there was in their present escapade a spice of that romance not so wholly wanting in the humdrum life of London as is generally supposed to be the case.

Brett did not ask himself what tangible result he expected from this quaint outcome of his visit to Sloane Square. It was too soon yet. He must trust to the vagaries of chance to elucidate many things now hidden. Meanwhile a good dinner, a bright theatre, and the society of a smart, nice-looking woman were more than tolerable substitutes for progress.

As a partial explanation of his somewhat eccentric behaviour he volunteered a lively account of a recent cause célèbre, in which he had taken a part, but the details of which had been rigidly kept from the public. He more than hinted that Mr. Sydney Pyne had figured prominently in the affair; and Mrs. Hillmer laughed with unrestrained mirth at the unwonted appearance of her brother in the character of a Lothario.

"Tell me," said Brett, confidentially, when a couple of glasses of Moët '89 had consolidated their friendly relations, "what sort of fellow is this brother of yours?"

"Not in any sense a bad boy, but a trifle wild. He will not live an ordinary life, and at times he has been hard pressed to live at all. As a matter of fact, it is this scrape he got into with Messrs. Dodge and Co. that induced him temporarily to masquerade under an assumed name."

"Then what is his real name?"

"Ah, now you are pumping me again. I refuse to tell."

"But they are generally serious reasons that induce a man to disguise himself in such fashion."

"The reason he gave me was that he dreaded being writted for liability regarding the shares I mentioned to you. It was good enough. Now you come with this story of meddling with somebody else's wife. Surely that is an additional reason. I supplied him with funds until we quarrelled, and then he went off in a huff."

"What did you quarrel about?"

"That concerns me only." Mrs. Hillmer was so emphatic that Brett dropped the subject. When they drove to the theatre Mrs. Hillmer, on alighting at the entrance, said to her coachman, "You can return home now, and bring Dobson to meet me at 11.15."

Digitized by Google

"May I venture to inquire who Dobson is?" said Reggie.

"Certainly. Dobson is my maid."

This woman puzzled Brett the more he saw of her. He was now quite positive that she lived on the fringe of Society. Her status was, at the best, dubious. Yet he had never heard of her before, nor met her in public. None of his friends were known to her, and she mentioned no one beyond those popular personages who are known to all the world. She was obviously wealthy and refined, with more than a spice of unconventionality. At times, too, beneath her habitual expressions of lively and vivacious interest, there was a touch of melancholy.

For an instant her face became even sad when her eyes rested on a typical family party of father, mother, and two girls who occupied seats in the row of stalls directly in front of her.

For some reason, Brett felt sorry for Mrs. Hillmer. He regretted that the exigencies of his quest forced him to make her his dupe, and he resolved that, if by any chance her scapegrace brother were concerned in Lady Delia's death, Mrs. Hillmer should, if possible, be spared personal humiliation or disgrace.

Indeed, he had formed such a favourable opinion of her that he had made up his mind to conduct his future investigations without causing her to involuntarily assist in putting a halter round her relative's neck.

Nevertheless, it was impossible to avoid getting some further information, as the lady herself paved the way for it. Her comments betrayed such an accurate acquaintance with the technique of the stage that Reggie said to her, "You must have acted a good deal?"

"No," she said, "not very much. But I was stage-struck when young."

"But you have not appeared in public?"

"Yes, some six years ago. I worked so hard that I fell ill, and then—then I got married."

"Do you go out much to theatres, nowadays?"

"Very little. It is lonely by oneself, and there are so few plays worth seeing."

Brett wondered why she insisted so strongly upon the isolation of her existence. In his new-found sympathy he forbore to question, and she continued:—

"When I do visit a theatre I amuse myself mostly by silent criticism of the actors and actresses. Not that I could do better than most of them, or half so well, but it passes the time."

"I hope that you do not regard killing time as your main occupation?"

"It is so, I fear, however hard I may strive otherwise." And again that shadow of regret darkened the fair face.

Someone in front turned round and glared at them angrily, for the famous comedian, Mr. Prospect Ricks, was singing his deservedly famous song, "It was all because I buttoned up her boots," so the conversation dropped for the moment.

Reggie focussed his opera-glasses on the stage. Whilst his eyes wandered idly over the pretty faces and shapely limbs of the coryphées his brain was busy piecing together all that he had heard. The odd coincidence of the dates of Lady Delia's murder and the speedy departure of the self-styled Sydney Pyne for the Riviera would require a good deal of explanation by the latter gentleman.

True, it was not Brett's method to jump at conclusions. There might be a perfectly valid motive for the journey. If the man did not desire his whereabouts to be known, why did he leave his adddress at the post-office?

And, then, what possible reason could Lady Delia have in voluntarily and secretly visiting him at his chambers in Raleigh Mansions? This virtuous and high-principled lady could have nothing in common with a careless adventurer, taking the most lenient view of his sister's description of him. And as Brett's subtle brain strove vainly to match the queer fragments of the puzzle, his keen eyes roved over the stage in aimless activity.

He strove to shield his portly form in the portico of a neighbouring restaurant.

Suddenly they paused. Brett's powers of vision and mental analysis were alike inadequate to the new and startling fact that had obtruded itself, unasked and unsought for, upon his sight.

Among the least prominent of the chorus girls, posturing and moving with the uneasy motions and visible anxiety of the novice who is not yet accustomed to the glare of the footlights upon undraped limbs, was one in whose every gesture Brett took an absorbing interest.

He was endowed in full measure with that prime requisite in the detection of criminals, an unusually good memory for faces, together with the artistic faculty of catching the true expression of anyone he had once seen for any length of time.

Hence it was that, after the whirl of a dancing chorus had for a few seconds brought this particular member of the company close to the proscenium, Brett became quite sure of having at least developed one branch of his inquiry within measurable distance of its conclusion.

The girl on the stage was Jane Harding, Lady Delia's maid.

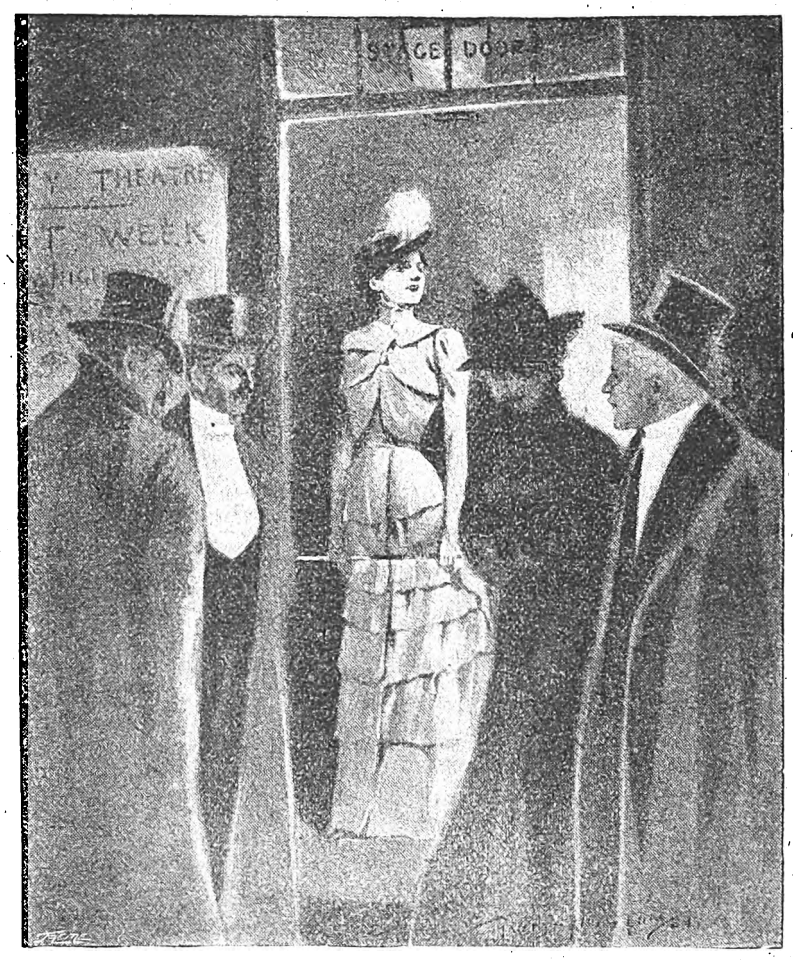
When her features first flashed upon his conscious gaze he could hardly credit the discovery. But each instant of prolonged scrutiny placed the fact beyond doubt. Not even the make up and the elaborate wig could conceal the contour of her pretty if insipid features, and a slight trick she had of drooping the left eyelid when thinking, confirmed him in his belief.

So astounded was he at this sequel to his visit to the theatre that he utilised every opportunity of a full stage to still further examine the appearance and style of this strange apparition.

When the curtain fell and Jane Harding had temporarily vanished he was brought back to actuality by Mrs. Hillmer's voice:

"Fie, Mr. Brett. You are taking altogether too much notice of one of the fair ladies in front. Which one is it?

Digitized by Google



At last the lady's maid appeared, dressed in a showy winter costume.

The tall standard-bearer or the little girl who pirouettes so gracefully?"

"Neither, I assure you. I was most taken up by wondering how a young woman manages to get employment in a theatre for the first time."

"I think I can tell you. Influence goes a long way. Talent occasionally counts. Then, a well-known agent can, for a fee, get an opening for a handsome, well-built girl who has taken lessons from either himself or some of his friends in dancing or singing, or both."

"Is such a thing possible for a domestic servant?"

"It all depends upon the domestic servant's circle of acquaintances. As a rule, I should say not. A theatre like this requires a higher average of intelligence."

This, and more, Reggie well knew, but he was only making conversation, whilst he thought intently, almost fiercely, upon the latest phase that had presented itself.

During the third act he devoted more time to Mrs. Hillmer. If that sprightly dame was a little astonished at the celerity with which he conducted her to her carriage and the waiting Dobson, it was banished by the nice way in which Reggie thanked her for the pleasure she had conferred upon him.

"The enjoyment has been mostly on my side," she cried, as he stood near the window of her brougham. "Come and see me again soon."

He bowed, and would have said something if an imperious policeman had not ordered the coachman to make way for the next vehicle. As it was, Mrs. Hillmer vanished into the traffic.

From force of habit, Brett glanced casually at the crowd struggling through the exit of the theatre, and he caught sight of Mr. Winter, who, too late, averted his round eyes and strove to shield his portly form in the portico of a neighbouring restaurant.

Reggie did not want to be bothered by the detective just then. He methodically lit a cigarette, and Mr. Winter slid off quietly into the stream of traffic, finally crossing the road and jumping on to a Charing Cross 'bus.

"So," said Reggie to himself, "Winter has been watching Raleigh Mansions, and me too. 'Pon my honour, I shouldn't wonder if he suspected me of the murder! I'm glad I saw him just now. For the next couple of hours I don't want any thick-headed detectives interfering with me."

Waiting for a few moments to make sure that Winter had not detailed an aide-de-camp to continue the surveillance, Brett fastened his overcoat to the chin, tilted his hat forward, and strolled round to the stage-door of the Jollity Theatre.

CHAPTER VI.

Miss Marie le Marchant.

The uncertain rays from a weak lamp, struggling through panes dulled by dirt and black letters, cast a fitful light about the precincts of the stage-door.

Elderly women and broken-down men, mostly slovenly and unkempt, kept furtive guard on the exit, waiting for the particular "super" to come forth who would propose the expected adjournment to a favourite public-house. Some smart broughams, a four-wheeler, and a few hansoms, formed a close line along the pavement, which was soon crowded with the hundred odd hangers-on of a theatre—scene-shifters, gasmen, limelight men, members of the orchestra, dressers, and attendants—mingling with the small stream of artistes constantly pouring out into the cold night after a casual inquiry for letters at the office of the doorkeeper.

This being a fashionable place of amusement there were not wanting several representatives of the gilded youth, some obviously ginger-bread or "unleavened" imitations, others callow specimens of the genuine article.

Brett paid little heed to these as they impudently peered beneath each broad-leafed and high-feathered hat to discover the particular favourite honoured by their chivalrous attentions.

Yet the presence of this light-headed brigade of cavaliers helped the barrister far more than he could have foreseen or even hoped.

At last the ex-lady's maid appeared, dressed in a showy winter costume and jaunty toque. She was on very friendly terms with two older girls, on whom the stage had set its ineffaceable seal, and the reason was soon apparent.

"Come along," she cried, her words being evidently intended to have an effect on others in the throng less favoured than those whom she addressed; "let us get into a hansom and go to Scott's for supper. Here, cabby!"

She was on the step of a hansom when a tall, good-looking boy, faultlessly dressed, and with something of Sandhurst or "the Shop" in his carriage, darted forward.

Digitized by Google

"Hallo, Milly," he said to one of Jane Harding's companions. "How are you? A couple of fellows have come up on leave with me for the night. Let's all go and have something to eat at the Duke's," thereby indicating a well-known club usually patronised by higher class artistes than this trio.

After a series of introductions by Christian names, amongst which Brett failed to catch the word "Jane," the party went off in three hansoms, a pair in each.

Reggie was not a member of the "Duke's," though he had often been there. But there was a man close at hand who was a member of everything in London that in any way pertained to things theatrical. Everyone knew Billy Sadler, and Billy Sadler knew everyone. A brief run in a cab to a theatre, a restaurant, and another restaurant, revealed the large-hearted Billy, drinking a whisky and soda and relating to a friend, with great gusto and much gesticulation, the very latest quarrel between the stage-manager and the leading lady.

"'Pon my soul, Brett, old chap, haven't seen you for an age. Where have you bin? An' what's the little game now?"

Mr. Sadler was fully aware of the barrister's penchant for investigating mysteries. The two had often foregathered in the past.

"Are you busy?" said Brett.

"Not a bit. By-bye, Jack. See you at luncheon to-morrow at the Gorgonzola. Well, what is it?"

"I want you to come with me to the 'Duke's.' There is a young lady there I'm interested in."

Billy squeezed round in the hansom, which was now bowling across a corner of Trafalgar Square.

"You!" he cried. "After a girl! Is she in the profession? Has mamma got frightened about her angel? The correct figure for breach just now, my boy, is five thou'."

"Oh, it's nothing serious. I will tell you all about it when matters have cleared a bit. This is a mere item in a really big story. But, here we are. Take me straight to the supper room."

As they entered the comfortable, brightly-lit club the strains of a band came pleasantly to their ears, and in a minute they were installed at a corner table in the splendid room devoted to the most cheery of all gatherings—a Bohemian meal when the labours of the night are past.

Brett soon marked his quarry. Jane Harding was in great form—eating, drinking, and talking at the same time.

"Who is that, Billy?" said Brett, indicating the object of his question.

Sadler carefully balanced his pince-nez on his well-defined nose, gazed at the girl, and laughed: "Goodness knows. She's a new-comer, and not much at the best. Do you know where she carries a banner?"

"At the Jollity."

"Oh! then here's our man"—for a Mephistophelian gentleman was passing at the moment. "Say, Rosenheim, who's the new coryphée over there?"

Mephistopheles halted, looked at Jane and laughed. "Her name is Miss Marie le Marchant; but as she happened to be born in London she pronounces it Mahrie Lee Mahshunt, with the accent on the 'Mahs.' Anything else you would like to know?"

"Yes, I'm stuck on her! Where did you pick her up?"

"She's a housemaid, or something of the sort. Come into money. Want's to knock 'em on the stage. That is easy."

"Say, Rosenheim, who's the new coryphee over there?"

"Has she been with you long?" put in Reggie, as their informant was the under-manager of the Jollity.

Mr. Rosenheim glanced at Brett. Sadler, he knew, had no interest in the girl, and the barrister did not quite possess the juvenile appearance that warranted such solicitude.

"She joined us just before Christmas. What's up? Is she really worth a lot of 'oof?"

"I should imagine not," laughed Brett; and Mr. Rosenheim joined another group.

Supper ended, Marie, and Millie, and eke Flossie, attended by their swains, discussed coffee and cognac in the foyer.

Chance separated Miss le Marchant, as she may now be known, momentarily from the others, and Brett darted forward.

"Good evening," he said. "I am delighted to meet you here."

The girl recognised him instantly. She would have denied her identity, but her nerve failed her before those steadfast, penetrating eyes. Moreover, it was not an ill thing for such a well-bred, well-dressed man to acknowledge her so openly.

"Good evening, Mr. Brett," she said, with a smile of assurance, though her voice faltered a little.

Reggie resolved to make the situation easy.

"We have not met for such a long time," he said; "and I am simply dying to have a talk with you. I am sure your friends will pardon me if I carry you off for five minutes to a quiet corner."

With a simper Miss le Marchant took his proffered arm, and they went off to an unoccupied table

Digitized by Google

"Now, Jane Harding," said Brett, with some degree of sternness in his manner, "be good enough to explain to me why you are passing under a false name and the reasons which led you to leave Sir Charles Lyle's house in such a particularly disagreeable way."

"Disagreeable? I only left in a hurry. Who had any right to stop me?"

"No one, in a sense, except that Sir Charles Lyle may feel inclined to prosecute you."

"For what, Mr. Brett?"

This emancipated servant girl was not such a simpleton as she looked. It was necessary to frighten her and at the same time to get her to admit the facts with reference to her sensational flight from Wensley House.

"You must know," said Reggie, "that Sir Charles Lyle can at least proceed against you in the County Court to recover wages in lieu of notice, and this would be far from pleasant for you in your new surroundings."

"Yes, I know that. But why should Sir Charles Lyle, or you, or any other gentleman, want to destroy a poor girl's prospects in that fashion?"

"Surely, you must feel that some explanation is due to us for your extraordinary behaviour?"

"No, I don't feel a bit like it."

"But why did you go away?"

"To suit myself."

"Could you not have given notice? Why was it necessary to create a further scandal in addition to the disappearance of your unfortunate mistress?"

"I am sorry for that. It was thoughtless, I admit. If I had to act over again I should have done differently. But what does it matter now?"

"It matters this much—that the police must be informed of your existence, as they are searching for you, believing that you are in some way mixed up with Lady Delia's death."

The girl started violently, and she flushed, rather with anger than alarm, Brett thought, as he watched her narrowly.

"The police, indeed," she snorted; "What have the police to do with me? A nice thing you're saying, Mr. Brett."

"I am merely telling you the naked truth."

"All right. Tell them. I don't care a pin for them or you. Have you anything else to say, because I wish to join my friends?"

The girl's language and attitude mystified Brett more than any preceding feature of this remarkable investigation. She was, of course, far better educated than he had imagined, and the difference between the hysterical witness at the coroner's inquiry and this pert, self-possessed young woman was phenomenal.

Rather than risk an open rupture the barrister temporised. "If you are anxious to quarrel with me, by all means do so," he said; "but that was not my motive in speaking to you here to-night."

Miss le Marchant shot a suspicious glance at him. "Then what was your motive, Mr. Brett?" she said.

"Chiefly to reassure my friend, Sir Charles Lyle, concerning you; and, perhaps, to learn the reasons for your certainly very strange conduct."

"Why should Sir Charles bother his head about me?"

"As I have told you. Because of the coincidence between your departure and Lady ——"

"Oh, yes, I know that." Then she added testily: "I was a fool not to manage differently."

"So you refuse me any explanation?"

"No, I don't. I have no reason to do so. I came in for some money, and as I have all my life longed to be an actress I could not wait an hour, a moment, before I—before I——"

"Before you tried to gratify your impulse."

"Yes, that is what I wanted to say."

"But why not at least have written to Sir Charles Lyle, telling him of your intentions?"

The fair Marie was silent for a moment. The question confused her. "I hardly know," she replied.

"Will you write to him now?"

"I don't see why I should."

"Indeed. Not even when it was you who gave some of Lady Delia's underclothes to Mr. Winter, by which means he was able to identify the body found at Putney as that of your mistress?"

She bounced up, fiery red, pluming herself for the fray.

"Mr. Winter told you that, did he?"

"He did."

"Then you had better get him to give you all further information, Mr. Brett, as not another word will you get out of me."

She bounced up, fiery red, pluming herself for the fray.

"Will you not communicate with Sir Charles Lyle?" said Brett, utterly baffled by Miss le Marchant's uncompromising attitude.

"Perhaps I will and perhaps I won't. Mr. Winter, indeed!" And off she ran to join her friends.

The barrister drove quietly home to his chambers. This was his summary of the evening's events: "I have found two women. When I know all about them I shall be able to lay my hand on the person who killed Lady Delia."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES ABOUT TORTOISES.

We devote, every week, two pages of Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a copy of "Heronford," by S. R. Keightley, to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case the source must be stated. The prize of One Guinea offered for the best Storyette in this competition has been won this week by Mr. John Whitaker, 40 St. Andrew's Terrace, Bradford. Attempts this week must deal with Stories about ANY SUBJECT, and must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 31st. Post-cards only, please.

Then Hoskins Exploded.

THE other day, Hoskins brought home a tortoise; while the same week Mrs. Hoskins brought home a new servant.

A few days after this, just as Mr. Hoskins was settling down for his after-dinner nap, in walked Mary with the tortoise in one hand, and a small key in the other.

"If you please, sir," she said, "would you be so kind as to show me how to wind this 'ere thing up? I've been trying for half-an-hour, an' I can't find the key-hole nowhere!"

"Gad!" shouted Mr. Hoskins. "What do you take it for, Mary?"

"'Ain't it one of them 'ere toy jumping frogs?" said she.

Then Mr. Hoskins shot out his legs in his excess of hilarity, and for a few minutes he couldn't speak a word. At last he managed to say:

"For goodness' sake, Mary; go downstairs, or I shall choke!"

Mary did go downstairs; and now Mrs. Hoskins wants a new servant. J. W.

Mr. Timmins Beetle Destroyer.

MR. TIMMINS bought a tortoise from a man in the street.

"Now, madam," said he on arriving from the City with his purchase, "you have been making my peaceful life unbearable with your nagging about the beetles and cockroaches who hold their 'at-homes' in our kitchen. Unable to stand it any longer, I have bought this wonderful animal—I mean insect—er—tortoise, madam, and to-morrow there won't be a beetle nearer than the house next door."

After placing the tortoise in the kitchen with a saucer of milk to quench its thirst after devouring a few hundred cockroaches, Mr. T. retires to rest.

Evidently the tortoise preys on his mind. About 3 a.m. Mrs. T. wakes in time to see her husband stealing downstairs with a candle in his hand; two minutes later a crash shakes the house, and Mrs. T. and the cook, on rushing downstairs, find Mr. Timmins has stumbled over the tortoise and is reclining against the wall with his head in the coal-scuttle, with about a dozen dead beetles underneath him, which he has crushed in his fall.

After accusing Mrs. Timmins of attempting his life for the hundreth time, he goes to bed. Next day a ton of insect-powder is delivered, and the tortoise has hidden itself in the garden.

A. E. H.

Misunderstood.

"WE must not forget," concluded the teacher at the end of the day's lessons, "what our fathers have taught us. On Monday I shall ask each of you boys to give me an example," and the class was dismissed.

On the following Monday one little fellow arrived and deposited a brown paper parcel on the teacher's desk, with a request that it might be returned, as it was a pet.

"Good gracious! whatever is this?" exclaimed the astonished master as he cut the string and revealed the contents.

"It's my father's tortoise, sir," replied the youngster proudly, "you said you wanted an example and I'm the only boy that's got one." A. H. J.

Mr. Bowser and the Tortoises.

HAVING failed in his mission of attempting to set things right, and being no longer infatuated with the charms of cycling, Mr. Bowser looked around for a new hobby; and finally decided to go in for natural history.

His plans being settled, he lost no time in hunting up specimens to form the nucleus of his zoological collection, and when he arrived home the other evening the budding naturalist brought with him a box containing a couple of tortoises.

"Whatever have you got there?" asked Mrs. Bowser, as he carried the box through the kitchen to the back garden.

"This, madam," he replied, "is the first instalment towards Bowser's twentieth century Noah's ark," and raising the lid he lifted out the tortoises and set them down on the grass before her.

"They seem to be mighty slow on their feet," said the cook after watching their movements critically for a time.

"Yes, you're right there," returned Bowser, "the speed at which they travel is painfully suggestive of the average messenger boy."

"And what funny creatures they are!" exclaimed his wife. "They seem to be encased in a sort of bomb-proof shelter. What is it supposed to be for?"

"Madam," replied Mr. Bowser, paving the way for a pun, "that bomb-proof shelter, as you call it, is to protect them from the constant siege to which they are exposed."

"But to what siege are they exposed?" she inquired, "and what is it that you mean?"

"I mean," he answered with a chuckle, "that the tortoises existence must be one long siege, since it is its lot to be always heavily shelled."

The joke missed fire, but Mr. Bowser was happy.

A. V.

Digitized by Google

An Insect.

Mr. Buckland was travelling by train one day to give a lecture in the country and conveying a live rabbit. When tickets were examined he was asked for one for the rabbit, being told it was charged as a dog. Buckland immediately pulled a tortoise from his pocket, saying: "You'll be telling me this is a dog next!"

"Don't know, sir," said the porter, scratching his head. "I'll ask the station-master."

He soon returned, and delivered himself with the following astounding piece of natural history:

"No, sir; cats is dogs and rabbits is dogs, but a tortyise is a hinsec!" W. C. L.

Unprofitable.

Not long ago the captain of a small vessel gained a good livelihood by trading between certain places on the east coast of the United States.

On one occasion he thought he saw a good opportunity of making a fair sum out of a lot of tortoises, and he purchased as many as twenty dozen, paying for them at the rate of four dollars a dozen.

The tortoises were of all sizes, from those only a few days old to full grown ones.

At the next place at which he called after making his purchase, a hotel landlord came on board and asked the captain how he sold his tortoises. The captain replied:

"If you pick them out I shall have to charge you at least six dollars for each dozen; if you let me pick them, you can have them for three dollars a dozen."

"All right," said the hotel man, "you pick them out."

The captain selected several dozen of the smallest, when the man said: "Go ahead, I want more."

The captain was now among his largest tortoises, and wished the man would stop, but he still said: "Go on."

The captain saw the point at last. The man kept him selecting until he purchased the entire lot at the loss of twenty dollars to the owner.

After this the captain sold tortoises on a different plan. R. T.

Only His Nipper.

Some years ago, when travelling from Cardiff to Shrewsbury, I witnessed a most ludicrous scene.

In the same compartment with myself was an old lady and a sailor, the latter sitting just opposite the lady, and, spreading his bulky pockets out on the seat each side of him, was very soon sound asleep.

Presently, glancing over my book, I observed a movement in the man's pocket, and a slight rustling sound was plainly perceptible; it ceased for a time and then commenced again.

This was plainly unnerving to the old lady, who eyed the man and his moving pocket with evident alarm.

Resuming my book I was deep in an interesting passage when a loud scream caused me to jump up instantly, but no quicker than the old lady who, standing on the seat in the corner, with her skirts drawn up around her and her eyes fixed on a small tortoise, which had emerged from the man's pocket, was looking a picture of abject terror and apparently ready to faint.

The "salt," waking up, took in the situation at a glance, and securing his captive, said, with a broad grin:

"You've no cause to be afeard, mum; it's only my little 'nipper!'"

This, I suppose, meant his pet, but it took me a long time to convince the frightened old lady that the wee torty was perfectly harmless. H. H.

Pussy.

In 1864 I lived in Pimlico in a house reputed to be haunted by a "woman in black," whom both my mother and aunt declared they had seen.

Gathered in the anteroom one night, we had been discussing this subject. The clock struck midnight, and with the last stroke we were started by the swish, swish, as of the silken dress of someone descending the stairs from the top floor. Alarm was depicted on each face.

The sound came on steadily and regularly, but without any accompanying footstep. Past the room we were in, down into the hall, and through the swing-door into the kitchen it took its way.

Seizing a light, I followed to clear up the mystery and discovered the cat with some pasted wall-paper edging sticking to its foot, which it had brought from the top, where the paperhangers had been at work, and which produced the rustling as of a silk dress.

J. C.

RESULT OF "TRANSPOSED LETTER" COMPETITION.

The most complete list in this competition was sent in by Mr. H. C. Heathcote, 159 Trevelyan Road, Tooting, S.W., who has therefore been awarded the first prize of £5. As the next two most complete lists contained an equal number of words, the second and third prizes have been divided between Mr. E. D. Jones, 10 Brooklands Terrace, Swansea, and Mr. C. H. Poynter, 22 Exmoor Road, Southampton, each of them receiving thirty shillings.

RESULT OF BRAIN GYMNASIUM COMPETITION.

Nos. 253 to 258.

The first prize of £2 has been awarded this week to Master H. G. Pugh, of 92 Chepstow Road, Maindee, Newport, Mon., whose attempt was the first correct one dealt with.

A copy of "The Pauper Millionaire," by Austin Fryers, has been sent to each of the following:

C. Wise, The School, Bringewood, near Ludlow.
S. Fletcher, 11 Gaythorne Road, West Bowling, Bradford.
J. W. Shaw, Shillington, Hitchin.
Mrs. Ayers, 86 Birkbeck Road, Leytonstone.
Mrs. Ticken-Smith, 26 Garden Street, Wakefield.
Dr. A. Spearing, Springfield, Patricroft, Manchester.
A. Carn, 77 Henderson Road, Forest Gate, E.
W. H. Bailey, 54 Milton Street, Westoe, South Shields.
G. D. Taylor, 3 Pryme Street, Hull.
H. Turner, 29 Inwood Road, Hounslow.

IT MAKES YOU SCREAM
WITH LAUGHTER.

What does?

Why, watching a man try to do the Twenty Teazer.

There's nothing calculated to titillate the risual palate more effectively than Twenty Teazer.

BUY IT, 6d.
TRY IT,
DO IT.

The first two things are easily accomplished. But the third—no, you cannot do it, can you? If you do succeed let us know how long it took you.

Digitized by Google

WE FOUR.

We were sitting in conclave. It was not at all a remarkable thing for us four sisters to be sitting in conclave, because we did it over everything, from a proposal of marriage to the choice of a new bonnet (the latter event of much more frequent occurrence than the former), but somehow to-day we seemed to be more in conclave than usual.

No wonder either, when the absorbing topic under discussion was the approaching proposal of marriage for Joan, from our cousin, Max Carew—not that we were calling him cousin then; when we did so it was only because he was present.

Joan was suffering so acutely from the re-action consequent upon her recent Edinburgh gaieties, that she did not work, or even pretend to do so. She only sat idly staring at our needles, as she enlarged upon her visit to the married sister of Max; told us how Max himself had come every day from his chambers in the city, to take her to see some new lion, and every night had escorted her to the opera, or a concert or theatre.

While Joan rehearsed these dissipations of hers, and sighed over their recollection, Dorothy and Patience and I worked away all the harder, just to show we didn't care a bit about them all in the way of being jealous.

We had had our turns in Edinburgh, when Max had been pleasant and attentive to each; and though we had never had such tales of his devotion to bring back as Joan had now (and we all knew it), we would sooner die than recall the fact aloud before her.

Why should Max have chosen Joan before anyone had chosen either Dorothy, or Patience, or me? She was by no means the most attractive of us. She wasn't half so sensible or domestic as Dorothy, nor half so handsome as Patience, nor half so—well, at any rate she wasn't nicer than me! And the whole three of us ought to have been married before Joan. There was Dorothy, our eldest, in the corner of the couch on Joan's right, she was eight and twenty, only nobody knew it but ourselves.

Then, there was Patience opposite her, sitting, as usual, upright in her chair. She was the beauty of the family, as everyone knew—as she knew, at any rate; and there was myself on Joan's left, quite on the shady side of twenty, which Joan hadn't reached yet. Why, of course we all ought to have been married before her. Yet we had now to entertain the prospect of officiating at her wedding first of all.

It was mortifying, to say the very least of it.

"What's the matter, Barbara?" inquired Patience, suddenly. I suppose because she saw my eyebrows raised and my mouth down at the corners.

"I was thinking what a good thing it is that there is the probability of Max marrying one of us. We are such an overwhelming number. It must require superhuman courage in a man to propose to one of four marriageable sisters; he must feel like proposing to them all."

"Why is it," mused Dorothy, putting in her needle very deliberately, "that four should seem such an enormous number when it bears upon unmarried sisters? We shall not seem even half so many when we are three."

"And the others go off so much more easily when one is married," I put in, consolingly. "The married one marries off one more—of course. That's her first duty. Then there are two houses to visit; and if one unmarried one stays at each, they marry directly."

"Yes, I do believe," said Patience, with meditation, "that many matches are brought about through visiting a brother-in-law."

"It often happens, too," asserted Joan, with an air of experience, "that the best man at a wedding falls in love with——"

"The best bridesmaid. That always happens. Which of us will it be?"

Patience, from her lofty pedestal, looked scornfully across at me when I made that remark. Of course, she would be the best bridesmaid so far as appearance went—she knew that; but then, Patience was—well, her godfather and godmothers at her baptism had not been gifted with any remarkable prescience.

"I suppose Dorothy will be the first of us to marry. She naturally ought to be," sighed Joan, with a sentimental air of resignation for which I could have choked her, because she evidently felt so sure of being the first herself unnaturally.

"No; it would be Patience first," replied Dorothy with just as much resignation.

But Patience sighed resignedly, too, and said that under any circumstances (she didn't specify the circumstances) she should be sorry to take precedence of her elder sister.

Of course it sounded very well, but I would not like to have tested her.

"It was so kind of Max to bring me home, wasn't it?" inquired Joan, naively, "and he was so careful of me on the journey."

"He certainly has the knack of making things pleasant for one," spoke Dorothy, "and making one pleased with oneself as well as with him."

"The oftener one sees him the better then," said I, sententiously.

"Yes," assented Patience, "I'm not sorry that he is coming next week."

"I suppose you are quite sure he said he was coming; eh, Joan?" inquired I; always the sceptical one of the family.

"Quite sure," returned Joan, resuming the lackadaisical pose of her head; "and quite sure that he told me on the way home that he had something particular to say to us—he didn't say to me, because it would have been so very marked."

Digitized by Google

"It will be a pleasant change to have a gentleman about the house for a bit," put in Dorothy, with placidity.

"It always seemed so nice to have him about the house in Edinburgh," sighed Joan, "and he was always so indulgent to me; forever planning some amusement for me, or some change."

Then somebody said—and I cannot be sure who it was—that it would be well for one of us to write to Max, and say that we should expect him by the afternoon train every day next week—I mean, of course, we should expect him every day until we saw him. Then, naturally, the question arose which should write.

"I suppose I ought," said Joan, complacently.

"Why so?" asked I, with a snap. "Who so fit as Dorothy—being the eldest?"

"Or Patience?" proposed Dorothy; "she writes the best hand."

Patience accepted the position under protest; yet after all, the task was tacitly conceded to Joan. And then and there I made a firm determination not to help her with a single idea, as I regretted having done on many previous occasions.

"I should think, Joan," said I, with great determination, when I had relieved my mind by this resolution, "Max cannot be coming to see you, because you have been together so lately. I wonder which of us he is coming to see—Dorothy, I expect."

Dorothy smiled at the idea. But Patience looked unutterable discernment about whom she thought it more natural he should come to see.

Then, after a good while, we fell back into our first chat about Joan's wedding; for, though we didn't quite see the fun of giving tamely up to our youngest sister the only suitor who seemed to be forthcoming, we were too fond of each other to regret the probable triumph of one; and too fond of ourselves not to be quite aware that the marriage of one—even though that one must be the youngest—would be a benefit to all. So we discussed it all as a definite thing for Joan, and hid our own private opinions.

Joan had brought from Edinburgh a glowing description of the little Dolly Varden aprons which had just come into fashion, and had minutely described one with pink trimmings which Max had admired. This narrative had sunk deep into my mind, and from that time I devoted all my leisure moments—in sol tude and my own room—to the manufacture of a similar one.

Oh! the heartburnings I suffered when steps were heard in the passage while I sat closeted there, with a lapful of ribbon ends and loops, and an open bandbox at my feet ready to swallow the materials en masse on the approach of prying eyes.

But, above all things, oh! the nervousness of appearing in it first on that Monday evening just before the train from Edinburgh was due, for of course it would never have done to keep it hidden, until Max had actually arrived, and then have had suddenly to appear in it, while the girls interchanged glances and put me out for the whole evening.

I could not venture that, so I boldly put it on and went into the drawing-room, assuming an expression that was intended to be unconscious, but was really defiant in the extreme, and rapidly uttering some very irrevelant observation for the purpose of turning every one's attention from my new and startling garment. But the remark and the expression of countenance were alike depressing failures. I might just as well have rushed in exclaiming at the very top of my voice, "Look here! Look at my new apron! I made it all myself, in secret, and at great expense; and for no earthly purpose but to captivate Max."

I might just as well have said it out that way in full, so plainly was it repeated in all the faces. Stupids! The more I tried to eye them down in my intense defiance, the more the six eyes glared at it. The bows grew limp under the trying scrutiny. I hopelessly felt that no such a caricature of a person had ever before rushed into their midst armed (to no purpose) with an irrelevant observation.

The apron grew, to my disordered fancy, ugly and enormous, and I could, with supreme satisfaction to myself, have pitched it on the fire. But then what a defeat that would have been, and after all Max had admired one just like it. If I could but just live down this first ordeal, presently, perhaps, my Dolly Varden would assume its natural proportions, and my mind its natural equilibrium.

I went boldly into the midst of the astonished eyes, and then I saw my opportunity and seized it. With one glance I took in the fact that Patience had made an investment, too. She had at least a guinea's worth of extra plaits on her head this afternoon for the first time, and these served beautifully as a means of removing the other four glaring eyes from my pink bows.

The plaits weren't becoming to Patience, their falseness being quite evident in a strong light; but I didn't mention this in consequence of the relief they had given me.

"What have you got new, Dorothy?" I asked, growing presently courageous, "plaits or aprons? Or have you branched out into a new line?"

"I have branched out into a new line," acquiesced Dorothy, good-humouredly, "and got nothing."

"I wouldn't," put in Patience, a little bit severely, "stoop to hide my investments, if I were you, Dorothy" (which was quite true for Patience never stooped).

And we didn't say a word more, though there upon the grate stood the little drawing-room kettle, with china handle, which she had been into town that morning on purpose to buy.

Housekeeping always was Dorothy's weak point, and Max was known to be very keen on appreciating the convenient or elegant appliances of a meal.

Well, every day that week, at the same time, we prepared for Max; in our plaits, and pink bows, and with tea laid for five, and the glistening little kettle singing on the trivet.

Five days out of the six passed, and the preparations had so far been wasted; except that they had grown familiar to us now, and we wore them without uncomfortable consciousness. But on the Saturday morning, when we came down to breakfast, there lay one of Max Carew's letters on the table—unmistakable with its handsome crest and bold address, "Miss Pendlethorpe."

"Good gracious!" I cried, with the keenest enjoyment, "It's Dorothy he means, after all."

"Don't be a goose, Barbara," reproved Patience, who had entered the room with me, and now advanced with her stately step to look over my shoulder. "Of course, if he writes to say he is coming, he would naturally address to Dorothy, as we have no mother."

"And if he is in love with her, he would naturally address to her too," I added, not quite seeing why Dorothy should be laid upon the shelf just yet.

Digitized by Google

"Come, Dorothy, don't keep us waiting," cried Joan; "I'm in an unbearable state of excitement."

But Dorothy would not hurry. I believe in my own mind that she preferred the suspense to the certainty. So, as we saw this, we made a great effort to hide our own eagerness, and began weakly and abortively to talk on other topics.

I never remember noticing before how desperately slow Dorothy is in opening a letter. I thought she never would have finished breaking the seal of this one; and, when at last it was broken, she deliberately looked between the leaves, and turned the sheet round twice.

"Oh, the signature is there all right," remarked Patience, just a little tartly. "What comes before the signature?"

"Of course he only writes to say when he is coming," returned Dorothy, with indifference so supreme and unnatural that it was plain enough to see it was feigned. "I suppose you can all wait while I read it," she added, looking at us over the paper with great aggravating enjoyment.

And to prove how utterly indifferent we all were to the contents of this absurd letter, we turned entirely away, and helped ourselves to tongue and bread and butter—ad libitum—just for two moments and a half. Then somehow we found our attention again concentrating itself upon Dorothy, who was reading steadily now, and in utter silence. I couldn't help it—I didn't try, but I felt quite sure that I couldn't have helped it if I had tried—I went near enough behind her to read over her shoulder, and the first two words I saw gave me an extraordinary sensation.

"My wife."

My heart bumped and thumped against my side. Which was it to be? Sure to be Joan. Yet, after all, it might be Dorothy. No; it would be Patience, of course—which of us looked anything beside Patience? Yet, why not me? I could remember hundreds of flattering and affectionate speeches Max had made to me. It was just as likely to be me.

It wasn't human power (feminine) to resist temptation any longer. While Dorothy read on, not vouchsafing us a word of explanation, we tacitly burst the bounds of polite conventionality and—one at a time first, then altogether daringly—hovered so near that we could distinguish the words.

I don't know whether Patience and Joan read it all straight through as I did, or whether they stopped dead at the first as I felt inclined to do. All I know is that I read it through from the ominous first line, My—Dear—Cousins, down to the flourish after the signature; and felt not at all mollified by the performance.

Dear me, couldn't he have chosen one to write to, and not swallowed up our individuality in such a distasteful gulp? Well, after saying that—My dear cousins—he said he had hoped to be able to run over to tell us the news himself, but had been unavoidably prevented.

On the first of the next month he was going to marry Minnie Frere, whom Joan would recollect having met in Edinburgh, and he was sure we should give him our valued sympathy, and kind and generous good wishes. His greatest desire just then, he added, was that we would extend to his wife the delightful friendship which had always been so much prized by him.

I believe there was more—lots more!—but wasn't that enough? We simultaneously attacked our breakfast, without uttering a word which related to Max; with faces set to an unnatural expression of beaming self-satisfaction, and voices tuned to joyous hilarity.

There was one circumstance attending the arrival of that letter which gave me unbounded satisfaction. It had not come by the afternoon post, to find us all expecting Max himself.

My apron—with all its pink bows opened jauntily—was at any rate out of sight in my bottom drawer; and this congratulation was not even marred by the consideration that Patience reaped an equal benefit. She could never have borne her position half so well if the new guinea plait had not been—I suppose in the same sarcophagus in which it lay undisturbed for weeks after that.

Certainly Dorothy's new kettle was asserting itself conspicuously by warbling away on the fire; but we didn't mind so much, because a few minutes before, in consequence of Dorothy's putting it down pettishly in the very hottest part of the fire, its china handle had cracked all across and fallen half away, so that it looked decapitated enough now to take away its sting.

MARK HARDCASTLE.

THE WHITE LADY'S CURSE,

A TALE OF GEORGIAN DAYS.

BY HENRY T. JOHNSON.

Appears in this week's "BIG BUDGET."

This powerful story will shortly be produced in its dramatised form at one of the best known London theatres.

"I struck a match and looked quite close into the sockets without any eyes, the teeth with no lips to cover them."

You will be able to read more about this striking scene in

THE WHITE LADY'S CURSE,

which will appear next THURSDAY in

"THE BIG BUDGET," 1d.

Digitized by Google

A CORNER IN CAMPHOR.

Being a Chapter in the Unwritten History of China

"I'll allow there are rogues in all countries, and of all colours and all complexions," said the man in the cabbage-palm hat, with his hand on the door; "but for pure unadulterated iniquity 'the Heathen Chinee is peculiar, as my illustrious countryman out West has very tersely put it. But I guess the resources of civilisation are not exhausted, Mr. Watson." With which oracular remark Mr. Rufus K. Umphelby opened the door and left the apartment.

Mr. James Watson, resident manager at Shanghai of the big Fung Yang Syndicate, whose headquarters were in East India Avenue, Leadenhall Street, was sitting in his office on the water-front in a very depressed condition of spirit and a correspondingly dejected attitude of mind. Too limp even to find consolation in the very excellent cigar which his colleague, Mr. Rufus K. Umphelby, of the American Settlement, across the muddy Soo-chow creek, had recommended to him as a never-failing panacea for all earthly ills, he had allowed the cheroot to go out after Umphelby's departure, and now sat chewing the end thereof, sublimely unconscious of everything save the one, dull, cold, paralysing fact that financial ruin and commercial disgrace were within measurable distance, and advancing with strides that must soon overtake him and bring him crashing to the ground.

Nothing could save him—nothing, he had told Umphelby, short of a miracle, unless it were one of those heaven-directed combinations of time, place, and circumstance, which in the melodrama dear to the heart of his youth had so often been the salvation of distressed virtue on the old Adelphi boards.

But alas for the weaknesses of human nature. Jemmy knew too well that the virtue which was rated highest by the Fung Yang Syndicate was hardly the sort for which he could expect a deus ex machinâ would intervene in the day of trouble.

Moral excellencies are not exactly the sort of goods which commercial syndicates care to stock. Financial successes are a better line, and Mr. Watson's ventures hitherto had been eminently successful; but in an evil hour he had been tempted to touch camphor. He had gone into the camphor deal cheerfully, and had stayed in till he couldn't see his way out.

His speculations in the odoriferous drug were hardly covered by £50,000. He had been selling it in every market in both hemispheres. He had sold it in Canton and Hankow. He had sold it in London and sold it in Paris. He had sold it in New York and sold it in San Francisco. He stood to make a very handsome pile out of the camphor deal when he was through; but the elaborately-constructed machinery had not been running a week before Jemmy made a discovery. He was "cornered."

Jemmy had bought and sold, bought and sold, on the strength of reports made to him by his native agents on the probable yield of the camphor laurel—Rufus K. Umphelby standing in with him over the Yankee deal; but as that didn't figure out at more than 20,000 dollars on a total of 250,000 it didn't take much off the dead weight of the "carry"—and now, after the operation had been in progress for several months, Watson found that he had oversold himself to an extent that spelt ruin. While orders for delivery were pouring in daily there wasn't an ounce of the stuff to be had in the market. The stocks Jemmy held had been exhausted in a week.

In vain he urged the native growers and manufacturers who had put out contracts to deliver. They pleaded—first, that they were only bound to deliver at the nearest treaty port, which they were quite ready to do; next, that the local governor had placed an export duty on all camphor going for shipment, which they were not willing to pay; then that the laurels had failed and the crop was short; lastly, that as the Fung Yang Syndicate was not taking the camphor they had contracted for the factors were unloading it on the inland market, and should look to the Syndicate to recoup them the difference in price.

It was enough to make a man say things that were unfit for publication. But when Jemmy learnt that Kwang Sen, the Taotai of Shanghai, had been the principal purchaser for the home and foreign market the situation at once became clear and intelligible.

Years back, at Canton, Kwang had been removed on a complaint of Watson's. At Shanghai, whither they had subsequently found themselves, their relations had never been strained, and had always been outwardly cordial. The Englishman bore no ill-will, and believed the Chinaman harboured no malice. Kwang Taotai had been biding his time. The Englishman had first to be lulled to sleep.

Digitized by Google

Englishmen, argued Kwang Sen, thought less of their lives than of their honour. If now he could make this Englishman suffer in his honour, could humiliate him in his own country and before his own kind, strip him of his wealth, stamp him as a beggar—a man dishonoured and disgraced—it would be a revenge worth striving for, a revenge worthy of the cause—the Yellow Man against the White.

Through Yo-Chow, Watson's chief native agent, Kwang had learnt all about the camphor contracts and laid his plans accordingly. It was an agent of Kwang's who had first opened the deal to Watson; it was Kwang himself who was now pressing for delivery, not only in the home market but on the banks of the Thames; not only in Paris but in New York and San Francisco. The wires were pulled at Shanghai, and the puppets moved obediently on the shores of the Seine and in the Empire City, in London Town and at the Golden Gate. Kwang was a merchant prince, and had agents at all the chief centres of European commerce.

With the reputation of being a good hand at a deal, with a shrewd insight into men, and a ready comprehension of the exigencies of the moment, Jemmy found himself completely cornered by the artlessness of the child-like and bland, whose knowledge of time-bargains, shortages, and sales for future delivery, was fearfully and wonderfully displayed to the everlasting undoing of the Englishman.

How was he to get out? How indeed! That was the question he had been considering when Rufus K. Umphelby had dropped in. It was the question he was still considering when Rufus K. Umphelby had gone out.

Rufus had made certain suggestions, to which his parting remark had distinctly pointed; but Jemmy, while not inexperienced in practical politics, thought China was hardly the country on which to try Central American fashions. It was not that he was unwilling, but the risks were much greater. So Umphelby had taken his leave thinking the strangest thoughts, and Watson had stayed behind doing ditto, but the longer Jemmy thought the less able was he to scheme, to evolve any plan that he would be willing to bet on.

That oily, simpering, old devil, Kwang Sen, was giving the screw another turn every day. He had seen him only that morning, and with much washing of hands with invisible soap in imperceptible water, Kwang had told him how he had been obliged to send to Pingloo for the camphor which the Fung Yang Syndicate should have delivered this week, that the price had sprung several points since last quotation, and that carriage would cost nearly twice as much more.

He was grieved to the very centre of his internal economy—the old hypocrite—for the Honourable Syndicate, and his heart—never knew a Chinaman to have one, had been Jemmy's mental comment at the moment—was broken into ten thousand pieces on account of his illustrious friend; but was it not written in the Book of Wise Maxims that "success cometh not by striving but is sent to every man according to his works?"

Jemmy smiled bitterly at the recollection, and thought unutterable things. A Scotsman, Burns' hackneyed line about the plans "o' mice and men going oft agley" naturally occurred to him. His plans for a camphor scoop had gone very far agley; but the consolation he might at another time have found in Robbie Burns was not to be gathered from him to-day.

Jemmy thought he understood now how Sampson felt when he was brought forth to make sport for the Philistines.

It irked him to feel that he was the toy and plaything of this yellow "iniquity" with the ever-lasting simper upon his soulless face.

The loss in £ s. d. would be bad enough, but the loss in prestige, in savoir-faire and commercial caste, would be infinitely worse.

Never again would James Watson, Esq., of London and Shanghai, be able to hold up his head on the China market if these shambling, shifty Celestials scored off him over the camphor contracts. And do it they would, unless——

"Yes," muttered Jemmy, catching at an idea which had been vaguely floating in his mind, "camphor must be accumulating somewhere since so little is coming into the market. Yes, Rufus K. Umphelby's suggestion might be worth considering if——Hang it all," he burst out angrily, "there's always some confounded if in a man's way whenever he wants to do anything. The trump cards are held by Kwang and his friends. Before I get a chance to cut they'll have won the game. They mean to force up prices, compel the Syndicate to buy at the inflated figure, pay the differences, or settle for a fixed sum. Then, having finished the squeeze, they'll unload the stuff, and there'll be camphor on offer all over the shop." Jemmy flung his unfinished cigar across the room and groaned aloud. "Stocks must be accumulating somewhere," he repeated with desperate energy, beginning to pace up and down.

At that moment Jemmy's chief compradore appeared on the threshold.

"Can see? All light? Talkee pidgin?" said Yo with an evil smirk on his yellow features.

"Come in, Yo," said Jemmy, who had an idea in his head. "Plenty much talkee. You savvy?"

"Can do. Kwang Sen velly bad man," muttered Yo.

Jemmy raised his eyebrows. His idea seemed likely to germinate without forcing.

"Yo wishee happiness, wishee peace, wishee prosperity number-one-English-pidgin-man," and kow-towing elaborately, Yo came forward as requested, while Jemmy grinned, put a bottle of samshu on the table, and lit a fresh cigar.

The conversation which followed was long, complicated, and involved. It was carried on in that horrible jargon known as pidgin-English, which is wearisome to reproduce when it is easy to understand. In Yo's case, however, much of it would be unintelligible to an outsider, and not being required for the telling of the story, may be dispensed with altogether.

Jemmy had sojourned in the Flowery Land quite long enough not to deceive himself over the motives which had induced Yo Chow to offer up Kwang Sen as a sacrifice to the injured feelings of the Englishman, and to do the Chinaman justice he made no assumption of virtues to which the yellow race is a complete and utter stranger.

It was love of pelf, greed of gain, which had opened Yo's eyes to the wickedness of Kwang Sen. A lively sense of favours to come is the only power which exercises any influence over the actions of John Chinaman, when it is not fear, abject and direct. Give John reason to believe that he has nothing more to expect and though he may have served you for half a lifetime, he will immediately transfer his talents—to your worst enemy by preference.

It was, therefore, not without a strong sense of the sardonic that Jemmy listened to the tale which laid bare the iniquity of Kwang Sen. It was told without the exhibition of a single human emotion by a man who confessed himself stripped of all his possessions, even to his wife and—coffin.

Digitized by Google

Like all good Chinamen, Yo was a devoted disciple of fan-tan and an ardent admirer of che-me, forms of gambling which he had pursued with varying success since the days of his youth. But since Han Yan from Whampoa appeared on the scene "the devil had been in the dice," and whether it was fan-tan or che-me, Yo had lost, lost, lost, till he had nothing left to lose, even the coffin which had cost him so much and the wife who had cost him so little—"she veer cheap" had been Yo's principal reason for marrying her—even these prime necessities to a Chinaman had been staked and lost.

"Me nothing. Allee gone," said Yo, smiling serenely at Jemmy.

It was not till he realised the fact that his sole possession was a bit of information of no use to anybody but the manager of the Fung Yang Syndicate that Yo Chow awoke to the enormity of the wickedness of Kwang Sen.

"And this camphor is at Swatow and at Tai-nan, in the island of Formosa?"

Yo made a sign in the affirmative.

"Six thousand yen on the mainland and nine thousand on the island? H'm! Come to me at 7 a.m. to-morrow, Yo, and I'll give you an answer."

In less than fifteen minutes after Yo had left the go-down, Jemmy was at Honkiew, the American Settlement across the creek. Rufus K. Umphelby, who was strolling down Broadway, guessed that "the resources of civilisation were not exhausted," and mended his steps. Both men entered the hong at the same moment.

"Don't spoil the best chance you ever had, Mr. Watson, and forfeit the gratitude of the whole community. It's a dead cert, sir. They want a lesson, and that's a fact. The rascals will never dream of resisting. Confine yourself to words, and you may as well write off your losses, for lie they will through thick and thin till the worse appears the better cause, and all who haven't learnt John's little ways will cry shame on the brutal Englishman. But nobody out here will. Not a white man in China but will cry 'Bravo, bravissimo,' let the folks in London howl as they will. And after all's said, it's you who take the risks, not they."

"Don't think I hesitate on my own account, Mr. Umphelby," said Jemmy with a curious smile. "I was at Whampoa you know in '69. But to make war on China is rather a big order for a private trader. I don't want to get the fellows out here into trouble with the big-wigs at home, and if the job didn't come off right——"

"Do you think the big-wigs at home, in London or Washington, understand so much as the A B C of Peking politics?" put in Umphelby.

"No, I don't, and that's where the harm comes in. Supposing now——"

"I tell you these muddy-peaked, rat-eating Asiatics will never dare to resist the resources of civilisation."

Jemmy laughed.

"The stuff is unquestionably mine," he said after a pause. "It's been sent to Swatow and elsewhere simply to prevent me getting hold of it. Undoubtedly I have the right to seize it; but—it may mean war with China."

"Waal, all I can say to that, Mr. Watson, is that if my people had a crowd o' gunboats gettin' in each other's way on this yere heathen coast for want of a job I should find them one durn'd quick, and that's a fact."

"I'll tell you now how I think the trick might be worked," said Jemmy in confidential tones. Penfold, our consul at Swatow, is a friend o' mine. There's a coaster going down to-morrow. I'll take Yo along, get him to swear an information as to the ownership of the camphor stocks, and see if Penfold hasn't got a chum on the station—an enterprising young lieutenant, say—who, putting a liberal interpretation on somewhat doubtful instructions, would make an armed demonstration in front of Tai-nan. Less likelihood, p'raps, of a row on the island than on the mainland. It might frighten Kwang into releasing enough stuff to enable me to fulfil my western contracts, and might also——"

"Remove him to another sphere," chipped in Rufus K. Umphelby cheerfully. "We're going to put this thing through, Mr. Watson, for the benefit of the white population in China, and that's surely worth taking a little risk over. If the pepple at home don't know their book I guess you're going to teach 'em."

A fortnight after Mr. James Watson and Rufus K. Umphelby had foregathered in the office of the latter at Honkiew, Shanghai.

A British gunboat had appeared off Tai-nan, Island of Formosa, and made a formal demand for the camphor stored there to the prejudice of the Fung Yang Syndicate, the lawful owners.

It was refused, whereupon the lieutenant commanding had opened fire on the town. Half-a dozen lives had been lost, the yamen of the magistrate destroyed, and much property injured. Result, consternation at Peking and Hong Kong. But an order was sent down promptly from Shanghai to release the camphor.

In a time so short that it seemed incredible, Jemmy found himself able to meet all engagements, even forcing Kwang Sen to accept delivery at prices which left him on the wrong side of the account.

Long after the camphor contracts had become a memory amongst the white community at Shanghai, long after Kwang Sen had been degraded as one consequence and Jemmy Watson promoted as another, long after the Fung Yang Syndicate had paid a heavy dividend out of the camphor scoop, and Jemmy was contemplating a big deal in brick tea, messages were still passing between Peking, Hong Kong, and London over "the affair at Formosa," which, however, London never understood, and the Admiral and the Minister were content to leave it so.

"Let the talking-shop at Westminster look after its manners," said the Admiral one day at the Country Club, out on Bubbling-Well Road, "and the Navy will look after theirs, and take uncommon good care that 'Chop-Dollar Jack' looks gay and smart after his."

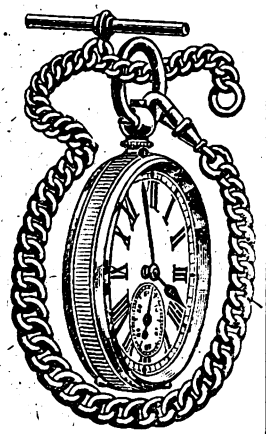
And in this fashion history is made.

H. Hunter.

Digitized by Google

SEND NO MONEY. WE TRUST YOU.

FREE.



£2 10s. £2 10s.
REAL SILVER.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1s. 6d. each. (Regular price 2s. 6d.)

WE DO NOT WANT YOUR MONEY.

Just send us a STAMPED ADDRESSED ENVELOPE, and say that you will either sell the Jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the Jewellery.

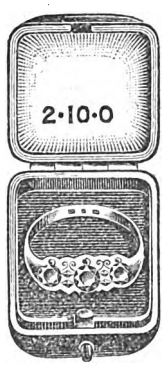
When sold, send us the 13s. 6d. you have received for same, and we will at once send you, Absolutely Free, our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch, with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A Written Guarantee for Ten Years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1s. 6d. each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

SEND NO MONEY. WRITE TO-DAY.

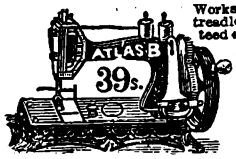
FREE.



REAL GOLD AND REAL DIAMONDS.

BRITISH GOLDSMITHS CO (DEPT. 29), 48 GRAY'S INN RD., LONDON.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine 39/-
To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO.,
184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.,
63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

2/9 CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD—OUR WARRANTED TIMEKEEPER, 2/9

With a guarantee to keep correct time for three years, will be sent to any address on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 2/9 and three stamps extra for postage. To every purchaser during this month we give with it ABSOLUTELY FREE a strong Mexican SILVER CHAIN. All we ask of you is to show them to your friends, as by doing so you advertise our business.

GENEVA WATCH IMPORTERS,
148 Old Street, London, E.C.

POST FREE THREE STAMPS

A Treatise on the Modern and Successful Treatment of Nervous Diseases and Exhaustion, by local absorption.

Fully up to the advanced ideas on the subject

THE MARSTON CO.,
59 and 60 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

HAVE YOU TRIED KEATING'S LOZENGES FOR YOUR COUGH?

ANY DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU "there is no better Cough Medicine."—One gives relief if you suffer from cough try them but once: they will cure, and they will not injure your health; an increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s¼d. tins.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

VARICOCELE.

Every man suffering from Varicocele and the allied troubles, should send for treatise, describing their Causes, Symptoms, Results, and Successful and Painless Treatment without surgical operation or the use of cumbersome trusses and electrical appliances. Will be sent sealed, post free, three stamps.

S. S. MURRAY,
7 Southampton Row, London, W.C.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

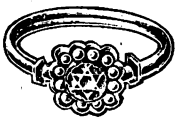
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF "SHORT STORIES."

GOLD CLUSTER RING (Stamped)



3/9 Post Free.
Send size of finger.

with a fine imitation Ruby, Sapphire, or Emerald centre surrounded by 12 Real Pearls. Orders for these rings sent off by return post. H. E. JONES, Manufacturing Jeweller, The Junction, Hulme, Manchester.

Unsolicited testimonial of this ring.

Lincoln, December, 1900.

Dear Sir,—I received the ring this morning, with thanks to you; it is very pretty.—Yours respectfully, M. F.

Bankers: Williams, Deacon, Manchester and Salford Bank Ltd. Mention Short Stories.

TWENTY FUN FOR THE WINTER EVENINGS. TEAZER. 6D.

HAVE YOU TRIED THE

TWENTY TEAZER?

—??????????—

THE BEST PUZZLE IN 50 YEARS.

—!!!!!!!!!!!!—

Read the following letter:

"BY A FLUKE the first time I did it in five minutes, the second time in half an hour, but since then I have not been successful, although I have tackled it for five nights." So writes A VICTIM.

6d. At all Messrs. SMITH'S BOOKSTALLS, and of EVERY NEWSAGENT. 6d.

FREE. FREE.

Our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch (with chain), or A Real Gold Ring Set with REAL DIAMONDS and other stones.

SEND NO MONEY.

NO MONEY REQUIRED. WE TRUST YOU.

We give you your choice of either of these handsome presents for selling NINE articles of Jewellery at 1/6 each. (Regular price 2/6).

We do not want your money.

Just send us a stamped addressed envelope and say that you will either sell the jewellery or return it to us if you fail to sell it. On receiving your letter we will at once post you the jewellery.

When sold, send us the 13/6 you have received for same, and we will at once send you ABSOLUTELY FREE our £2 10s. Real Silver Watch with Chain, or the Gold Ring, whichever you desire.

A WRITTEN GUARANTEE for TEN years sent with each watch.

You can sell our Jewellery in a few minutes at 1/6 each article. We have thousands of testimonials as to the quality and value both of our Jewellery and Presents.

Send no money. Write to-day.

BRITISH PREMIUM SYNDICATE (Dept. 5).
282 CENTRAL CHAMBERS, GLASGOW.

Digitized by Google

Pulsifer Maginley's Christmas.

It was the day before Christmas. Pulsifer Maginley was seated in his office, upon his face an expression of agony that would have been worth £5 a week to him as an undertaker.

Pulsifer Maginley was an operator on the Stock Exchange. Sometimes he operated not wisely but too well. This was one of the times. Some weeks before he had fancied that he scented from afar a tremendous rise in the market. He converted all his available assets into stock of the X.Y.Z. Railway. As soon as he had done so the stock began to drop, and it was still dropping.

"The blessed Christmastide is at hand," mused Pulsifer; "the streets are filled with busy, happy throngs; the small boy is in a state of feverish anticipation; the church bazaar is getting in its deadly work; and I have but 15s. left. What becomes of my propitiatory gift to old Mortimer Bluff?"

Pulsifer Maginley loved and was beloved. Mary Jane Bluff was responsible for this unfortunate state of affairs. She was the daughter and sole heiress of Mortimer Bluff, Esq., who was known to be a millionaire. She could not help this, and Pulsifer was willing to overlook it.

Old Mr. Bluff did not favour young Maginley's suit. He wanted his daughter to marry a plumber or a bank cashier. And here the matter rested at the time our story opens.

"I will go round and try to borrow a fiver from old Jenkins to stand me over till after Christmas," said Pulsifer, rising at last with a heavy sigh.

* * * * *

When Pulsifer Maginley reached the more or less palatial mansion of his friend Malvolio Jenkins, he was ushered into the reception-room by a haughty menial.

As he sat awaiting the entrance of the man from whom he intended to procure the means to celebrate the coming holiday in a fitting manner, his attention was attracted by the sound of voices in the adjoining room. With unstudied grace, an ingenuous smile upon his features, he sank upon his knees and applied his ear to the keyhole.

In five minutes he rose, his face beaming with a smile of generous dimensions.

"Who would have suspected it?" he remarked in an inquiring voice. Malvolio Jenkins glided into the room.

"I overheard all," was Maginley's greeting.

"Then you know—"

"That Petruchio Dowd, of the old firm of Petruchio Dowd and Co., bankers, of which you are a member, has fled to the land of Jabez Balfour."

"It is true," said Mr. Jenkins; "but we do not want the papers to get hold of it until the latest possible moment—not until after Christmas. May I rely upon your secrecy?"

"You may. Lend me £10 will you?"

Malvolio Jenkins handed over the money without a word.

"Did Mr. Dowd leave nothing?" inquired Pulsifer.

"Ah, he was not wholly bad," said Jenkins, in a voice choked with emotion. "He left the carpets and furniture."

"Nothing else?"

"Nothing."

"Your private fortune, then——?"

"Is in my wife's name."

"But what will the depositors get?"

"Left," replied Jenkins, with a silvery laugh.

Pulsifer Maginley was a man of large mental resources. Before he courted sleep that Christmas Eve he had planned all the details of a great scheme for his worldly advancement.

* * * * *

On Christmas morning Pulsifer sought and obtained an audience with old Mortimer Bluff.

"My dear sir," he said, "I am aware that you are deeply interested in the Home for Incurable Prudes. I, too, have the welfare of that institution at heart, and, as I have been singularly fortunate of late, I wish to give to it, through you, the trifling sum of ten thousand pounds as a Christmas gift."

He handed the old gentleman a cheque for the amount named on the banking house of Petruchio Dowd and Co.

Mr. Bluff was evidently greatly surprised and moved.

"You—you bank with them?" he stammered.

"All that I have in the world is in their bank."

"They are men of sterling integrity."

Pulsifer smiled broadly. It was, however, an internal smile, and was not visible to the naked eye.

"I have been somewhat mistaken in you," said Mr. Bluff. "I know you better now. I have also a Christmas gift for you. Mary Jane is yours."

* * * * *

When the news of the utter and complete failure of the firm of Petruchio Dowd and Co. was published, Mr. Bluff felt sorry for the Prudes' Home, but sorrier for Pulsifer Maginley. He offered to lend him money, and Pulsifer did not make any strenuous objections.

Before he could learn the truth, Mr. Bluff accommodatingly died of apoplexy.

When a year had elapsed Pulsifer Maginley led Mary Jane to the altar.

This little story teaches us that virtue is its own reward.

W. E. Percy.

Digitized by Google

TO LADIES.

A NEW MAGAZINE FOR YOU.

PARTICULARS · NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

FOOTBALL PICTURE PUZZLES.

1st Prize - - £50 in Gold.

Last Day: TUESDAY, January 1, 1901.

2nd Prize - - - - £10 Note
3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes - 3 £5 Notes
6th to 20th Prizes - 15 Sovereigns
21st to 40th Prizes - 20 Half-Sovs.

Send your attempts to Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C., in an envelope marked "FOOTBALL," to arrive not later than Tuesday, January 1st.

Below will be found ten pictures; each picture representing the name of a well-known football player.

If you look at the picture in the margin you will see that the name is Maxwell. What are the other names?

If you cannot find all the names, ask your friends to help you.

All you have to do is to write underneath each picture, in the space provided, the name of the player you believe the picture to represent. The names are those of both Rugby and Association players.

Only one solution is allowed under each picture.

Where two men bear the same surname, but different christian names, the christian name or initial is indicated in the picture.

The prizes will be paid to the competitors from whom we receive the correct, or most nearly correct, solutions.

No more than one prize will go to any competitor.

Example.

Maxwell.

It must be taken as a condition of the competition that anybody competing therein agrees to abide by the Editor's final decision.

Intending competitors in the above would do well to procure a copy of "The Football Who's Who," which contains the names of about a thousand of the best known players. This book will be found of great service in discovering the names depicted. It only costs a shilling, and may be obtained of all booksellers, and post free for 1s. 3d. from the publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

No. 31.....

No. 32.....

No. 33.....

No. 34.....

No. 35.....

No. 36.....

No. 37.....

No. 38.....

No. 39.....

No. 40.....

I send in this coupon as a competitor for the prize advertised in this paper, and subject to the conditions printed on this page:

Name and address.....

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

1. Coupons may be sent either from "Pearson's Weekly" or "Short Stories."
2. Do not send in your coupons till we tell you.
3. All coupons are sent at senders' risk, and if they go astray, from whatever cause, we do not accept responsibility.
4. Competitors must attach their private address to their attempts. No prize will be sent to any post-office, refreshment rooms, or other places at which letters are called for. Attempts bearing such addresses will be disqualified.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

NEW YEAR'S GIFTS.

Everyone can afford to give his Father or Mother, his Sister or Brother, his Cousin or Friend, the most magnificent present that could possibly be obtained in the whole world. Last year it would have cost him £15, £18, or £20—perhaps even more than that. To-day, to readers of Short Stories

IT ONLY COSTS 5/-

Thousands who now possess these magnificent Bicycles proclaim them to be worth double the money we charge. £8 17s. 6d. for a perfect Bicycle is 5¾d. a day when spread over twelve months, or one tenth the cost of hiring an inferior worn out old cycle of an 1896 pattern.

NO INSTALMENT ON DELIVERY.

A Beautiful Cycle secured for 5s.

It is gravely questioned whether there will be a penny net profit, unless 100,000 Express Cycles are sold during the season. It is an established fact that three months ago, Cycles not nearly so good were being sold at £18 and £20. We charge you considerably less than half this sum.

5¾d.

A DAY

FOR A

CYCLE.

SCIENTIFIC REPORT

Of Mr. HENRY J. T. PIERCY, M.I.M.E.,

One of the ablest and most practical mechanical and consulting engineers of the day.

53 and 54 Broad Street, Birmingham.

I have visited your works, and have looked through the processes by which you produce the various cycle parts. I found the machinery of good construction, and the operators manipulating it with judgment and care. I have also examined the various parts of cycles, some in the rough and some finished. The material used in these parts is certainly the best, and the workmanship carefully and judiciously executed, and well calculated to cause the cycles to run easily and to wear well. I found necessary precision had been observed throughout, and wearing parts satisfactorily hardened. I have also examined a finished cycle. The design is modern, and built on good lines, and the appearance of the machine generally is pleasing. The adjustments are well-arranged and easy of manipulation. The frame is not only light, but rigid, and capable of resisting great strain, and the general character of the machine is such as to give confidence to the rider.

(Signed) HENRY J. T. PIERCY, M.I.M.E.

On View at 21 & 22 Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C.

PARTS OF THE MACHINE.

FRAME.—Steel Tubing (Best), Hudson Bros. Ltd. WHEELS.—Westwood Rims, J. T. James. CHAIN.—Perry & Co Ltd., Birmingham. SADDLE.—Lycett Ltd., Highest Grade. Pedals.—Optimus Pedal Co., Birmingham. GEAR CASES. (Ladies') Harthill Gear Case Co. SPOKES.—Patent Turned Spoke Co., Alcester. TYRES.—"Express." (cost £3).

Secure your Cycle by Sending To-day.

CYCLES SENT ON APPROVAL.
ENTIRE MACHINE GUARANTEED.

5/-

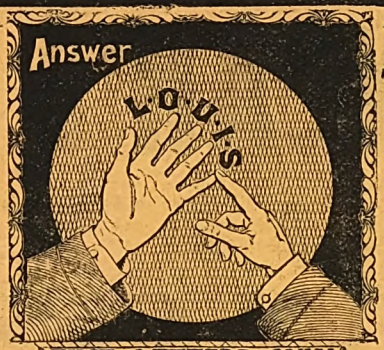
NO INSTALMENT ON DELIVERY.
NEXT PAYMENT MONTH AFTERWARDS.

Address the Manager "Express" Cycles, S.S. Dept., Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW DO YOU SPELL

VELVETEEN?



Don't Forget this when you buy.

EVERY YARD IS STAMPED

L-O-U-I-S.

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

THREE INTERESTING BOOKS.

NOW READY. THIRD EDITION.

"BESIEGED WITH B.-P."

A Complete Record of the Siege and Relief of Mafeking.

BY J. EMERSON NEILLY,

War Correspondent of the "Pall Mall Gazette" in Mafeking.

"Mr. Neilly tells admirably the thrilling story of the Siege."—Scotsman. "As a realistic picture of how things actually happened, no less than as a worthy record of one of the most splendid incidents of our history, "Besieged with B.-P." is a notable book."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Crown 8vo, price 1s. net; post free, 1s. 3d.

NOW READY. CHEAP EDITION.

A Splendid Novel.

THE INVISIBLE MAN.

By H. G. WELLS,

Author of "The Time Machine," "The War of the Worlds," &c.

Price 6d Post Free, 8d.

"The story is told with that fertility of imaginative resource which has made Wells conspicuous in this domain of fiction."—Daily Chronicle.

"Written in the author's merriest and most provoking mood."—Sunday Times.

THE ART OF BEAUTY.

By A TOILET SPECIALIST.

Crown 8vo, cloth, post free, 1s. 2d.

SOME OF THE CHAPTERS ARE:

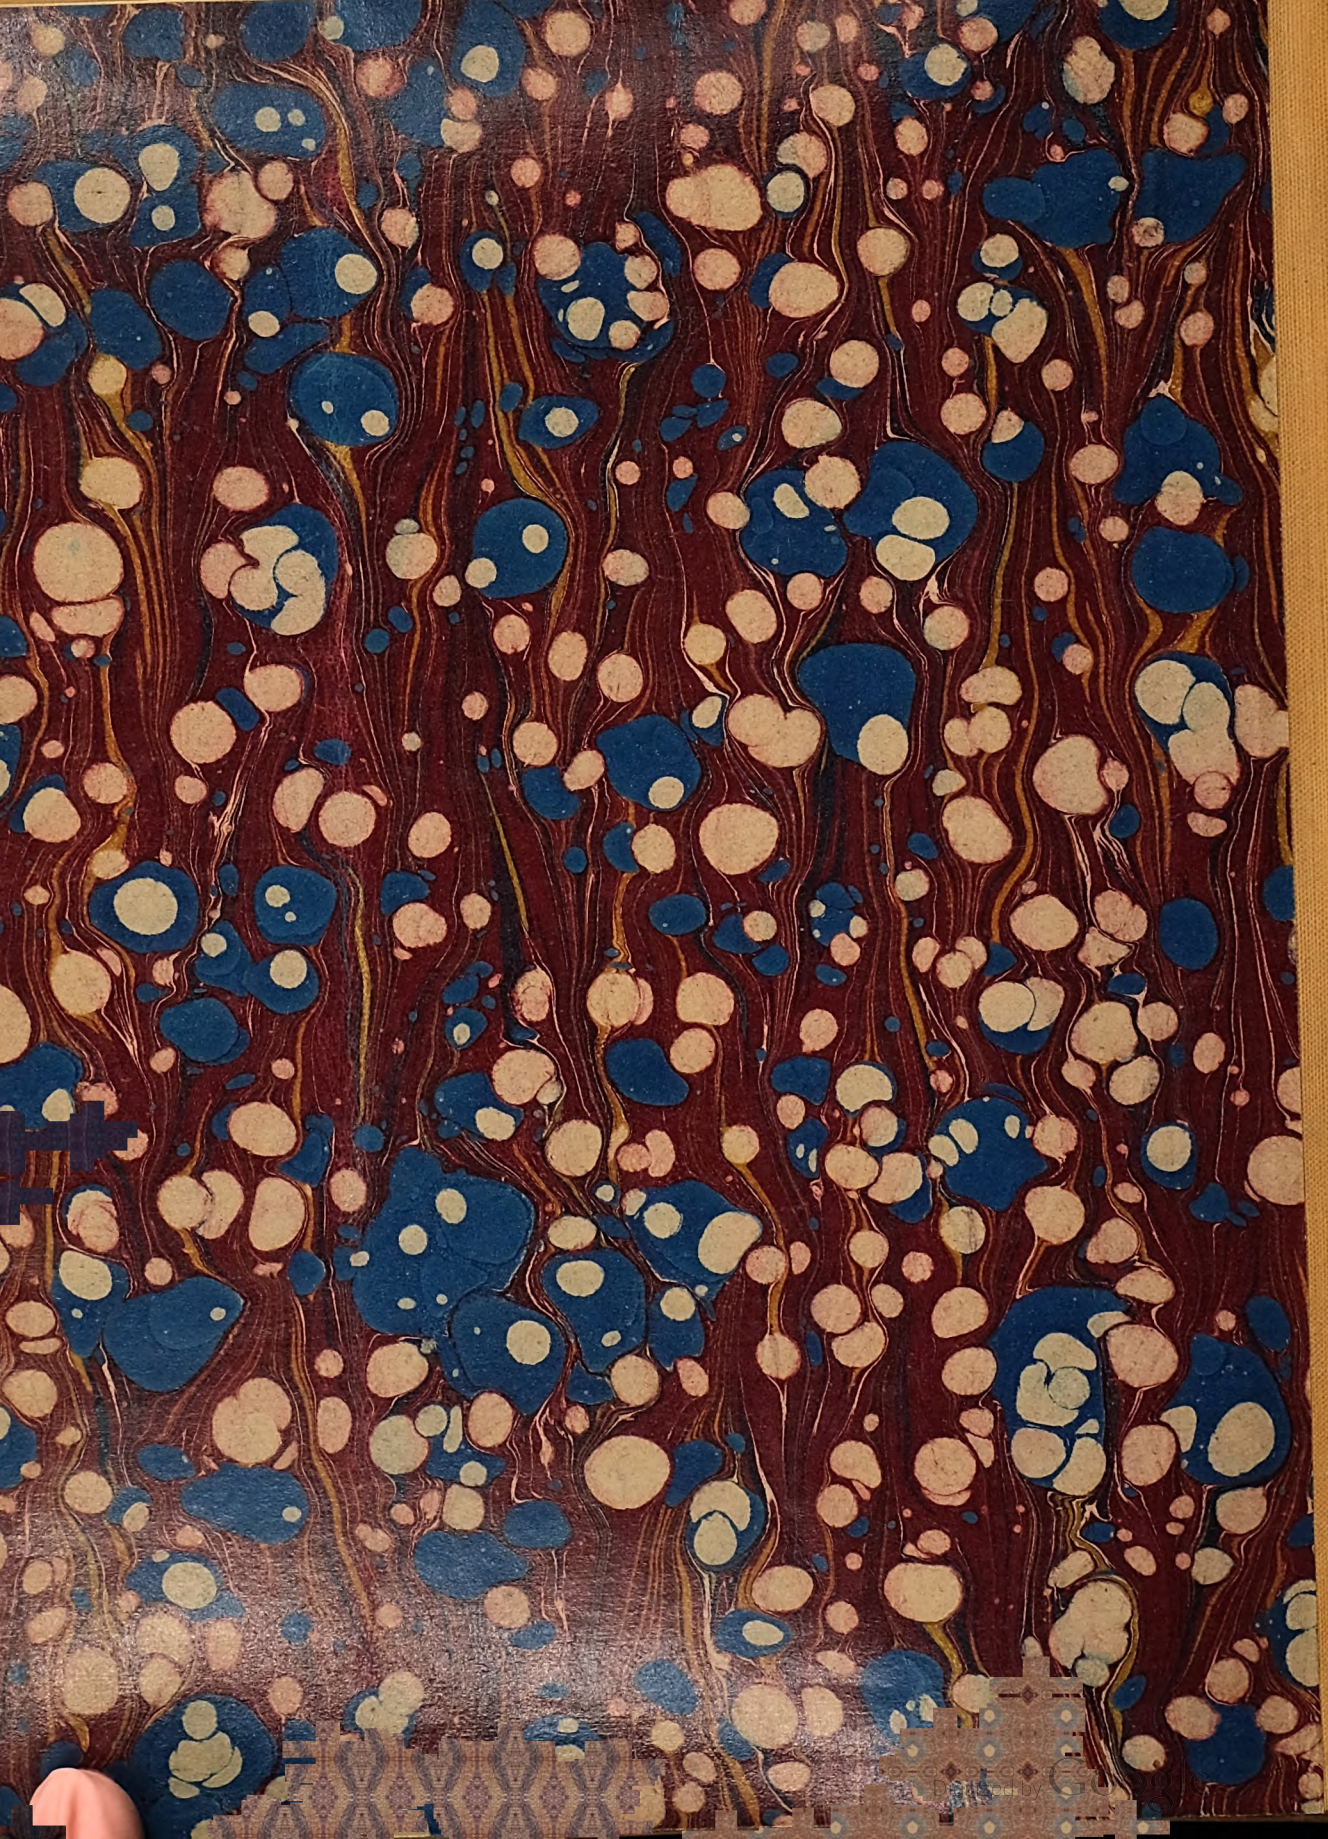
The Cure of Stoutness	Chap. I.	Bad Complexions: How to Cure Them	Chap. V.	The Hair in Ill-Health ...	Chap. VIII.
The Cure of Leanness	,, II.	The Complexion	,, VI.	Moles, Warts, and Superfluous Hair	,, XIII.
The Figure	,, IV.	The Hair in Health	,, VII.

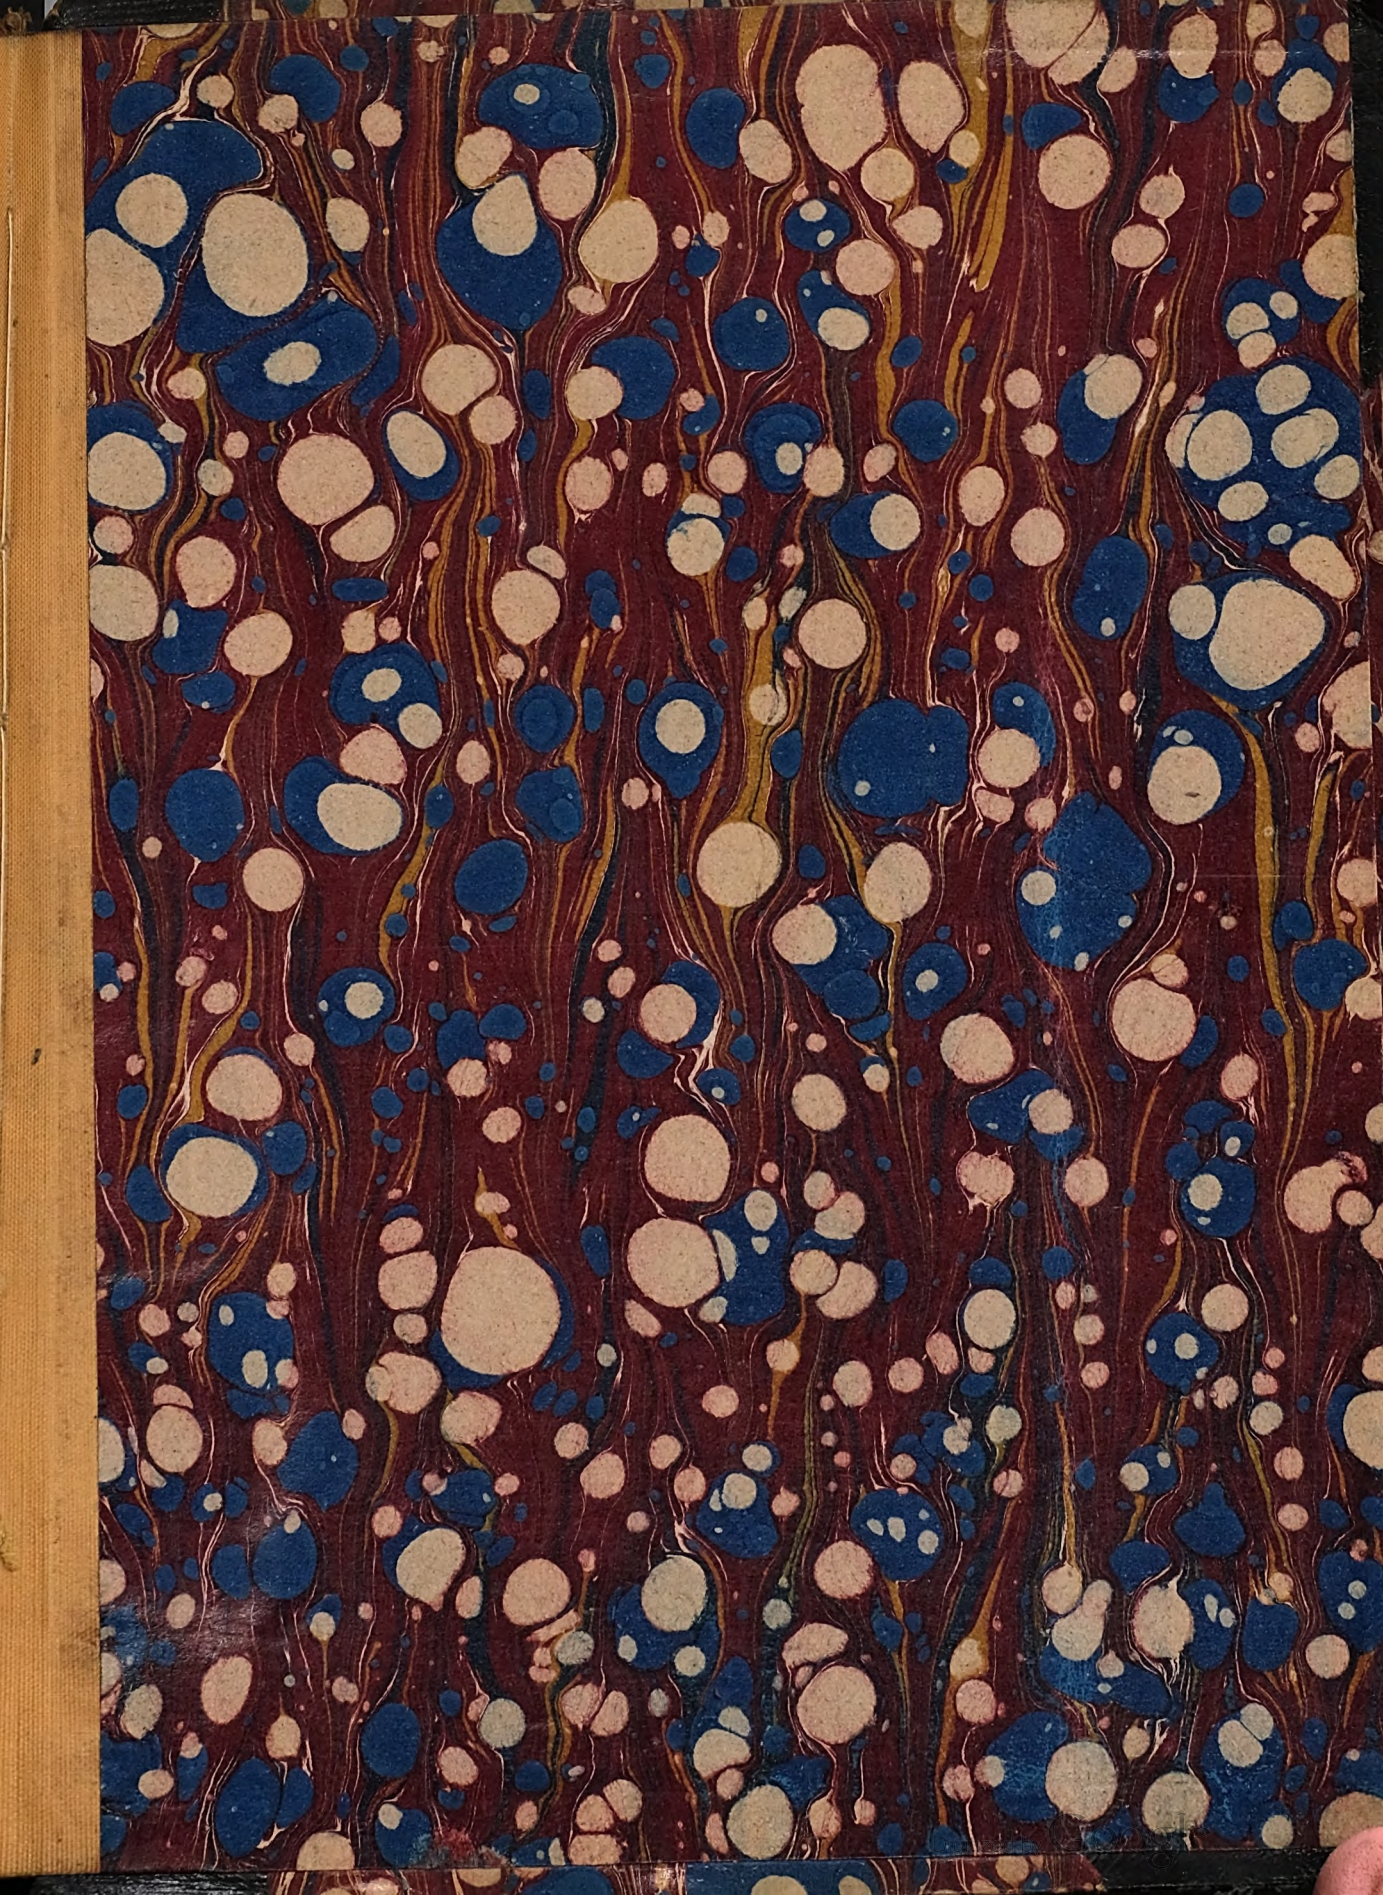
At all Bookstalls and Booksellers, and of C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google




Digitized by Google